C H A P. XIV.

The Campaign of 1777, in the Middle States.

COON after the declaration of independence, the authority of Congress was obtained for raising an army, that would be more permanent than the temporary 1777. levies, which they had previoufly brought into the field. It was at first proposed to recruit, for the indefinite term of the war, but it being found on experiment that the habits of the people were averse to engagements, for fuch an uncertain period of fervice, the recruiting officers were instructed to offer the alternative of, either enlisting for the war, or for three years. Those who engaged on the first conditions were promifed a hundred acres of land, in addition to their pay and bounty. The troops raifed by Congress for the fervice of the United States, were called, continentals. Though in September 1776, it had been refolved, to raife 88 battalions, and in December following, authority was given to general Washington to raife 16 more, yet very little progrefs had been made in the recruiting bufinefs, till after the battles of Trenton and Even after that period, fo much time was Princeton. neceffarily confumed before thefe new recruits joined the commander in chief, that his whole force at Morris-town, and the feveral out-posts, for some time, did not exceed 1500 men. Yet, what is almost incredible, these 1500 kept as many thousands of the British closely pent up in Brunfwick. Vol. II. A 1777. Brunfwick. Almost every party that was fent out by the latter, was fuccessfully opposed by the former, and the adjacent country preferved in a great degree of tranquility.

It was matter of aftonifhment, that the Britifh fuffered the dangerous interval between the difbanding of onearmy, and the raifing of another, to pafs away without attempting fomething of confequence againft the remaining fhadow of an armed force. Hitherto there had been a deficiency of arms and ammunition, as well as of men, but in the fpring of 1777, a veffel of 24 guns arrived from France at Portfmouth in New-Hampfhire, with upwards of 11,000 ftand of arms, and 1000 barrels of powder. Ten thoufand ftand of arms arrived about the fame time, in another part of the United States.

Before the royal army took the field, in profecution of the main bufinefs of the campaign, two enterprizes for the destruction of American stores were undertaken, in an opposite direction to what proved eventually to be the theatre of the operations of Sir William Howe. The first was conducted by colonel Bird, the fecond by major general Tryon. The former landed with about 500 men at Peek's-kill, near 50 miles from New-York. General Washington had repeatedly cautioned the commission not to fuffer large quantities of provisions to be near the water, in fuch places as were acceffible to fhipping, but his prudent advice had not been regarded. The few Americans, who were stationed as a guard at Peek's-kill, on the approach of colonel Bird, fired the principal ftorehouses, and retired to a good position, about two or three miles diftant. The lofs of provisions, forage, and other valuable articles, was confiderable.

Major general Tryon, with a detachment of 2000 men, embarked at New-York, and paffing through the Sound, landed between Fairfield and Norwalk. They advanced through the country without interruption, and arrived in about 20 hours at Danbury. On their approach the few continentals who were in the town withdrew from it. The British began to burn and deftroy, but abstained from injuring the property of fuch as were reputed tories.----18 houfes, 800 barrels of pork and beef, 800 barrels of flour, flour, 2000 bushels of grain, 1700 tents, and some other 1777. articles were loft to the Americans. Generals Woofter, Arnold and Silliman, having haftily collected a few hundred of the inhabitants, made arrangements for interrupting the march of the royal detachment, but the arms of those who came forward on this emergency, were injured by exceffive rains, and the men were worn down with a march of 30 miles in the course of a day. Such difpofitions were neverthelefs made, and fuch advantageous pofts were taken, as enabled them greatly to annoy the invaders when returning to their thips. General Arnold, with about 500 men, by a rapid movement, reached Ridgefield in their front---barricadoed the road, kept up a brifk fire upon them, and fuftained their attack, till they had made a lodgement on a ledge of rocks on his left. After the British had gained this eminence, a whole platoon levelled at general Arnold, not more than 30 yards distant. His horfe was killed, but he escaped. While he was extricating himfelf from his horfe, a foldier advanced to run him through with a bayonet, but he thot him dead with his piftol, and afterwards got off fafe. The Americans, in feveral detached parties, harraffed the rear of the British, and from various stands kept up a feattering fire upon them, till they reached their thipping.

The British accomplished the object of the expedition, but it cost them dear .--- They had by computation 2 or 300 men killed, wounded, or taken. The lofs of the Americans was about 20 killed, and 40 wounded. Among the former was Dr. Atwater, a gentleman of respectable character, and confiderable influence. Colonel Lamb was among the latter. General Woofter, though feventy years old, behaved with the vigour and fpirit of youth. While glorioufly defending the liberties of his country, he received a mortal wound. Congress refolved, that a monument fhould be crefted to his memory, as an acknowledgment of his merit and fervices. They alfo refolved, that a horfe, properly caparifoned, flould be presented to general Arnold, in their name, as a token of their approbation of his gallant conduct.

Not long after the excursion to Danbury, colonel Meigs,

Meigs, an enterprifing American officer, transported a detachment of about 170 Americans, in whale boats, over the Sound, which feparates Long-Ifland from Connecticut,
 May 24. and burned twelve brigs and floops, belonging to the Britifh, and deftroyed a large quantity of forage and other articles, collected for their ufe in Sagg-Harbour on that ifland,---killed fix of their foldiers, and brought off 90 prifoners, without having a fingle man either killed cr wounded. The colonel and his party returned to Guilford in 25 hours from the time of their departure, having in that flort fpace not only completed the object of their expedition, but traverfed by land and water, a fpace not lefs than 90 miles. Congrefs ordered an elegant fword to be prefented to colonel Meigs, for his good conduct in this expedition.

June 9.

As the feafon advanced, the American army in New-Jerfey, was reinforced by the fucceffive arrival of recruits, but neverthelefs at the opening of the campaign, it amounted only to 7272 men.

Great pains had been taken to recruit the Britifh army with American levies. A commiffion of brigadier general had been conferred on Mr. Oliver Delancey, a loyalift of great influence in New-York, and he was authorifed to raife three battalions. Every effort had been made, to raife the men, both within and without the Britifh lines, and alfo from among the American prifoners, but with all thefe exertions, only 597 were procured. Mr. Courtland Skinner, a loyalift well known in Jerfey, was alfo appointed a brigadier, and authorifed to raife five battalions. Great efforts were alfo made to procure recruits for his command, but their whole number amounted only to 517.

Towards the latter end of May, general Washington quitted his winter encampment at Morristown, and took a ftrong position at Middlebrook. Soon after this movement was effected, the British marched from Brunswick, and extended their van as far as Somerset court-house, but in a few days retarned to their former station. This studden change was probably owing to the unexpected opposition which seemed to be collecting from all quarters, for

for the Jersey militia, turned out in a very spirited man- 1777. ner, to oppose them. Six months before that fame army marched through New-Jerfey, without being fired upon, and even fmall parties of them had fafely patrolled the country, at a diftance from their camp; but experience having proved that British protections were no fecurity for property, the inhabitants generally refolved to try the effects of refistance, in preference to a second fubmission. A fortunate miftake gave them an opportunity of affembling in great force on this emergency. Signals had been agreed on, and beacons erected on high places, with the view of communicating over the country, inftantaneous intelligence of the approach of the British. A few hours before the royal army began their march, 'the fignal of alarm, on the foundation of a falfe report, had been hoifted. The farmers, with arms in their hands, ran to the place of rendezvous from confiderable diftances. They had fet out at least twelve hours before the British, and on their appearance were collected in formidable numbers. Whether Sir William Howe intended to force his way through the country to the Delaware, and afterwards to Philadelphia, or to attack the American army, is uncertain, but whatever was his defign, he thought proper, fuddenly to relinquish it, and fell back to Brunswick. The British 'army, on their retreat, burned and destroyed the farm houses on the road, nor did they spare those buildings which were dedicated to the fervice of the Deity.

Sir William Howe, after his retreat to Brunfwick, endeavoured to provoke general Washington to an engagement, and left no manœuvre untried, that was calculated to induce him to guit his position. At one time he appeared as if he intended to pufh on without regarding the army opposed to him At another he accurately examined the fituation of the American encampment, hoping that fome unguarded part might be found, on which an attack might be made that would open the way to a general engagement. All these hopes were frustrated. General Washington knew the full value of his fituation. He had too much penetration to lofe it from the circumvention of military manœuvres, and too much tem5 per to be provoked to a dereliction of it. He was well apprized it was not the interest of his country, to commit its fortune to a fingle action.

Sir William Howe fuddenly relinquished his position in front of the Americans, and retired with his whole force to Amboy. The apparently retreating Britifli, were purfued by a confiderable detachment of the American army, and general Washington advanced from Middlebrook to Quibbletown, to be near at hand for the fupport of his advanced parties. The British general im. mediately marched his army back from Amboy, with great expedition, hoping to bring on a general action on equal ground, but he was difappointed. General Washington fell back, and posted his army in such an advantageous polition, as compensated for the inferiority of his numbers. Sir William Howe was now fully convinced of the impoflibility of compelling a general engagement on equal terms, and alfo fatisfied that it would be too hazardous to attempt paffing the Delaware, while the country was in arms, and the main American army in full force in his rear. He therefore returned to Amboy, and thence paffed over to Staten-Ifland, refolving to profecute the objects of the campaign by another route. During the period of these movements, the real designs of general Howe were involved in great obfcurity. Though the feafon for military operations was advanced as far as the month of July, yet his determinate object could not be afcertained. Nothing on his part had hitherto taken place, but alternately advancing and retreating. General Wafhington's embarraffment on this account, was increased by intelligence which arrived, that Burgoyne was coming in great force towards New-York, from Canada. Apprehending that Sir William Howe would ultimately move up the North-River, and that his movements, which looked fouthwardly were calculated to deceive, the American general, detached a brigade to reinforce the northern division of his army. Succeffive advices of the advance of Burgoyne, favoured the idea, that a junction of the two royal armies, near Albany, was intended. Some movements were therefore made by general Washington, towards towards Peek's-kill, and on the other fide towards Tren- 1777. ton, while the main army was encamped near the Clove, in readinefs to march either to the north or fonth, as the movements of Sir William Howe might require. At length, the main body of the royal army, confifting of thirty-fix British and Heffian battalions, with a regiment of light horfe, and a loyal provincial corps, called the Queen's rangers, and a powerful artillery, amounting in the whole to about 16,000 men, departed from Sandyhook, and were reported to fteer fouthwardly. About the time of this embarkation, a letter from Sir William Howe to general Burgoyne was intercepted. This contained intelligence, that the British troops were destined to New-Hampshire. The intended deception was fo fuperficially veiled, that in conjunction with the intelligence of the British embarkation, it produced a contrary effect. Within one hour after the reception of this intercepted letter, general Washington gave orders to his army to move to the fouthward, but he was neverthelefs fo much impreffed with a conviction, that it was the true intereft of Howe to move towards Burgoyne, that he ordered the American army to halt for fome time, at the river Delaware, fuspecting that the apparent movement of the royal army to the fouthward, was a feint calculated to draw him farther from the North-river. The British fleet having failed from Sandy-hook, were a week at fea, before they reached cape Henlopen. At this time and place, for reafons that do not obvioufly occur, general Howe gave up the idea of approaching Philadelphia, by afcending the Delaware, and refolved on a circuitous route by the way of the Chefapeak. Perhaps he counted, on being joined by large reinforcements from the numerous tories in Maryland or Delaware, or perhaps he feared the obstructions which the Pennfylvanians had planted in the Delaware. If these were his reasons, he was mistaken in both. From the tories he received no advantage, and from the obstructions in the river, his ships could have received no detriment, if he had landed his troops at New-Caftle, which was 14 miles nearer Philadelphia than the head of Chefapeak bay.

The

The British fleet, after they had left the capes of the 1777. Delaware, had a tedious and uncomfortable paffage, being twenty days before they entered the capes of Virginia. They afcended the bay, with a favourable wind, Aug.25. and landed at Turkey-point. The circumftance of the British fleet putting out to fea, after they had looked into the Delaware, added to the apprehension before entertained, that the whole was a feint calculated to draw the American army farther from the North-river, to as to prevent their being at hand to oppose a junction between Howe and Burgoyne. Washington therefore fell back to fuch a middle station, as would enable him, either fpeedily to return to the North-river, or advance to the relief of Philadelphia. The British fleet, after leaving the capes of Delaware, were not heard of for near three weeks, except that they had once or twice been feen near the coaft steering fouthwardly. A council of offi-21. cers convened at Nefhaminy, near Philadelphia, unanimoufly gave it as their opinion, that Charleftown, in South-Carolina, was most probably their object, and that it would be impossible for the army to march in feason for its relief. It was therefore concluded to try, to repair the lofs of Charleston, which was confidered as unavoidable, either by attempting fomething on New-York ifland, or by uniting with the northern army, to give more effectual opposition to Burgoyne. A fmall change of polition, conformably to this new fystem, took place. The day before the above refolution was adopted, the British fleet entered the Chefapeak. Intelligence thereof, in a few days, reached the American army, and difpelled that mift of uncertainty, in which general Howe's movements had been heretofore enveloped. The American troops were put in motion to meet the British army. Their numbers on paper amounted to 14,000, but their real effective force on which dependence might be placedin the day of battle, did not much exceed 8000 men. Every appearance of confidence was affumed by them as they passed through Philadelphia, that the citizens might be intimidated from joining the British. About the fame time a number of the principal inhabitants of that city, being being suspected of disaffection to the American cause, 1777. were taken into cuftody, and fent to Virginia.

Soon after Sir William Howe had landed his troops in Maryland, he put forth a declaration, in which he informed the inhabitants, that he had iffued the ftricteft orders to the troops " for the prefervation of regularity and good difcipline, and that the most exemplary punishment should be inflicted upon those who should dare to plunder the property, or moleft the perfons of any of his majefty's well-difpofed fubjects." It feemed as though fully apprized of the confequences, which had refulted from the indifcriminate plunderings of his army in Newlerfey, he was determined to adopt a more politic line, of conduct. Whatever his lordship's intentions might be, they were by no means feconded by his troops.

The royal army fet out from the eaftern heads of the Sept. 3. Chefapeak, with a fpirit which promifed to compensate for the various delays, which had hitherto wasted the campaign. Their tents and baggage were left behind, and they trufted their future accommodation to fuch quarters as their arms might procure. They advanced with boldnefs, till they were within two miles of the American army, which was then posted near New-port. General Washington soon changed his position, and took post on the high ground near Chadd's Fort, on the Brandywine creek, with an intention of difputing the paffage. It was the wifh, but by no means the interest of the Americans, to try their strength in an engagement. Their regular troops were not only greatly inferior in discipline, but in numbers, to the royal army. The opinion of the inhabitants, though founded on no circumstances more fubstantial than their wishes, imposed a species of necesfity on the American general to keep his army in front of the enemy, and to rifque an action for the fecurity of Philadelphia. Instead of this, had he taken the ridge of high mountains on his right, the British must have re-" spected his numbers, and probably would have followed him up the country. In this manner the campaign might have been wafted away in a manner fatal to the invaders, but the bulk of the American people were fo impatient Vol. II B of 1777. of delays, and had fuch an overweening conceit of the numbers and prowels of their army, that they could not comprehend the wildom and policy of manœuvres to fhun a general engagement.

On this occasion neceffity dictated, that a facrifice fhould be made on the altar of public opinion. A ge-Sep. 11. neral action was therefore hazarded. This took place at Chadd's Ford, on the Brandywine, a fmall fiream which empties itfelf into Christiana creek, near its conflux with the river Delaware.

The royal army advanced at day break in two columns, commanded by lieutenant general Kniphaufen, and by lord Cornwallis. The first took the direct road to Chadd's Ford, and made a shew of passing it, in front of the main body of the Americans. At the fame time the other column moved up on the west fide of the Brandywine to its fork, and crossed both its branches about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and then marched down on the east fide thereof, with the view of turning the right wing of their adversaries.

This they effected and compelled them to retreat with great lofs. General Kniphaufen amufed the Americans with the appearance of croffing the ford, but did not attempt it until lord Cornwallis having croffed above, and moved down on the oppofite fide, had commenced his attack. Kniphausen then croffed the ford, and attacked the troops posted for its defence. These, after a fevere conflict, were compelled to give way. The retreat of the Americans foon became general, and was continued to Chefter, under cover of general Weeden's brigade, which came off in good order. The final iffue of battles often depends on finall circumftances, which human prudence cannot control --- one of thefe occurred here, and prevented general Washington from executing a bold defign, to effect which, his troops were actually in motion. This was to have croffed the Brandywine, and attacked Kniphaufen, while general Sullivan and lord Stirling, fhould keep earl Cornwallis in check. In the most critical moment, general Washington received intelligence which he was obliged to credit, that the column of lord Cornwallis wallis had been only making a feint, and was returning 1777. to join Kniphausen. This prevented the execution of a plan, which, if carried into effect, would probably have given a different turn to the events of the day. The killed and wounded in the royal army, were near fix hundred. The lofs of the Americans was twice that number. In the lift of their wounded, were two of their general officers, --- The marquis de la Fayette, and general Woodford. The former was a French nobleman of high rank, who, animated with the love of liberty, had left his native country, and offered his fervice to Congress. While in France, and only nineteen years of age, he espoufed the caufe of the Americans, with the most difinterested and generous ardour. Having determined to join them, he communicated his intentions to the American commiffioners, at Paris. They juftly conceived, that a patron of fo much importance would be of fervice to their caufe, and encouraged his defign. Before he had embarked from France, intelligence arrived in Europe, that the American infurgents, reduced to 2000 men, were fleeing through Jerfey before a British force of 30,000. Under these circumstances, the American commissioners at Paris thought it but honeft to diffuade him from the prefent profecution of his perilous enterprife. It was in vain that they acted fo candid a part. His zeal to ferve a distreffed country, was not abated by her misfortunes. Having embarked in a veffel, which he purchased for the purpofe, he arrived in Charleston, early in 1777, and foon after joined the American army. Congress refolved, that " in confideration of his zeal, illustrious family and connexions, he flould have the rank of major general in their army." Independent of the rifque he ran as an American officer, he hazarded his large fortune in confequence of the laws of France, and alfo the confinement of his perfon, in cafe of capture, when on his way to the United States, without the chance of being acknowledged by any nation; for his court had forbidden his proceeding to America, and had difpatched orders to have him confined in the West-Indies, if found in that quarter. This gallant nobleman, who under all these difadvantages had 1777. had demonstrated his good will to the United States, re- $\boldsymbol{\mathcal{L}}$ ceived a wound in his leg, at the battle of Brandywine, but he neverthelefs continued in the field, and exerted himfelf both by word and example in rallying the Americans. Other forcigners of diffinction alfo fliared in the engagement. Count Pulaski, a Polish nobleman, the fame who a few years before had carried off king Staniflaus from his capital, though furrounded with a numerous body of guards, and a Ruffian army, fought with the Americans at Brandywine. He was a thunderbolt of war, 'and always fought for the post of danger as the post of honour. Soon after this engagement Congress appointed him commander of horfe, with the rank of brigadier. Monfieur du Coudray, a French officer of high rank, and great abilities, while on his way from Philadelphia to join the American army, about this time was drowned in the river Schuylkill. He rode into the flatbottomed boat on a spirited mare, whose career he was not able to ftop, and fhe went out at the farther end into the river, with her rider on her back.

The evening after the battle of Brandywine, a party of the British went to Wilmington, and took prefident M'Kinley prisoner. They also took possible of a shallop, loaded with the most valuable effects of the inhabitants.

Howe perfevered in his fcheme of gaining the right ftank of the Americans. This was no lefs fteadily purfued on the one fide, than avoided on the other. Wafhington came forward in a few days with a refolution of rifquing another action. He accordingly advanced as far as the Warren tavern on the Lancafter road. Near that place both armics were on the point of engaging with their whole force, but were prevented by a most violent Sep. 18. ftorm of rain, which continued for a whole day and

Sep. 18. from of rain, which continued for a whole day and night. When the rain ceafed, the Americans found that their ammunition was entirely ruined. They therefore withdrew to a place of fafety. Before a proper fupply was procured, the Britith marched from their pofition near the White Horfe tavern, down towards the Swedes Ford. The Americans again took poft in their front; but the Britifh, inftead of urging an action, began to march march up towards Reading. To fave the ftores which 1777. had been deposited in that place, Washington took a new position, and left the British in undisturbed possession of the roads which lead to Philadelphia. His troops were worn down with a fucceflion of fevere dutics. There were in his army above a thoufand men who were barefooted, and who had performed all their late movements in that. condition. About this time the Americans fustained a confiderable lofs by a night attack, conducted by general Grey on a detachment of their troops, which was encamped near the Paoli tavern. The outpofts and pickets were forced without noife, about one o'clock in the morning. The men had fcarcely time to turn out, and when they turned out they unfortunately paraded in the light of their fires. This directed the British how, and where to proceed. They rushed in upon them and put about 300 to death in a filent manner by a free and exclusive use of the bayonet. The enterprise was conducted with fo much addrefs, that the lofs of the affailants did not exceed eight.

Congrefs, which after a fhort refidence at Baltimore had returned to Philadelphia, were obliged a fecond time to confult their fafety by flight. They retired at first to Lancaster, and afterwards to Yorktown.

The bulk of the Britifh army being left in Germantown, Sir William Howe, with a fmall part, made his triumphal entry into Philadelphia, and was received with the hearty welcome of numerous citizens, who either from con-Sep. 26. fcience, cowardice, intereft, or principle, had hitherto feparated themfelves from the clafs of active whigs.

The poffeffion of the largeft city in the United States, together with the difperfion of that grand council which had heretofore conducted their public affairs, were reckoned by the fhort fighted as decifive of their fate. The fubmiffion of countries, after the conqueft of their capital, had often been a thing of courfe, but in the great conteft for the fovereignty of the United States the queftion did not reft with a ruler, or a body of rulers, nor was it to be determined by the poffeffion or lofs of any particular place. It was the public mind, the fentiments and opinions

1777. ions of the yeomanry of the country which were to decide. Though Philadelphia had become the refidence of the Britilh army, yet as long as the bulk of the people of the United States were oppofed to their government, the country was unfubdued. Indeed it was prefumed by the more difcerning politicians, that the luxuries of a great city would fo far enervate the Britifh troops as to indifpofe them for those active exertions to which they were prompted, while inconveniently encamped in the open country.

To take off the imprefiion the Britifh fucceffes, might make in France to the prejudice of America, Doctor Franklin gave them an ingenious turn, by obferving, "that inftead of faying Sir William Howe had taken Philadelphia, it would be more proper to fay, Philadelphia had taken Sir William Howe."

One of the first objects of the British, after they had got poffeffion, was to erect batteries to command the river, and to protect the city from any infult by water. The British shipping were prevented from ascending the Delaware, by obstructions hereafter to be defcribed, which were fixed near Mud-Ifland. Philadelphia, though poffeffed by the British army, was exposed to danger from the American veffels in the river. The American frigate Delaware, of 32 guns, anchored within 500 yards of the unfinished batteries, and being feconded by fome fmaller veffels, commenced a heavy cannonade upon the batteries and town, but upon the falling of the tide fhe ran aground. Being brifkly fired upon from the town, while in this condition flie was foon compelled to furrender. The other American veffels, not able to refift the fire from the batteries after lofing one of their number, retired.

General Washington, having been reinforced by 2500 men from Pecks-kill and Virginia; and having been informed, that general Howe had detached a confiderable part of his force, for reducing the forts on the Delaware, conceived a defign of attacking the British post at Germantown. Their line of encampment, crossed the town at right angles near its centre. The left wing extended extended to the Schuylkill, and was covered in front by 1777. the mounted and difmounted chaffeurs. The queen's "American rangers and a battalion of light infantry were in front of the right. The 40th regiment with another battalion of light infantry were posted on the Chefnuthill road, three quarters of a mile in advance. Lord Cornwallis lay at Philadelphia, with four battalions of grenadiers. A few of the general officers of the American army, whose advice was requested on the occasion unanimoufly recommended an attack; and it was agreed that it should be made in different places, to produce the greater confusion, and to prevent the feveral parts of the British forces, from affording support to each other. From an apprehension, that the Americans from the want of dicipline would not perfevere in a long attack, it was refolved that it fhould be fudden and vigorous, and if unfuccefsful to make an expeditious retreat. The divisions of Sullivan and Wayne flanked by Conway's brigade, were to enter the town by the way of Cheinut-hill, while general Armftrong with the Pennfylvania militia should fall down the Manatawny road, and gain the left and rear of the British. The divisions of Greene and Stephen's flanked by M'Dougal's brigade were to enter by the lime kiln road. The militia of Maryland and Jerfey under generals Smallwood and Furman, were to march by the old York road, and to fall upon the rear of their right.

Lord Stirling with Nashe's and Maxwell's brigade were Oct. 4. to form a corps de referve. The Americans began their attack about funrife on the 40th regiment, and a battalion of light infantry. Thefe two corps being obliged to retreat, were purfued into the village. On their retreat lieutenant colonel Mufgrove with fix companies took poft in Mr. Chew's ftrong ftone houfe, which lay in front of the Americans. From an adherence to the military maxim of never leaving a fort poffeffed by an enemy in the rear, it was refolved to attack the party in the houfe.

In the mean time general Greene got up with his column and attacked the right wing. Colonel Mathews routed a party of the British opposed to him, killed feveral.

veral, and took 110 prisoners, but from the darkness of 1777. the day loft fight of the brigade to which he belonged, J and having feparated from it, was taken prifoner with his whole regiment, and the prisoners which he had previoufly taken, were releafed. A number of the troops in Greene's division, were stopped by the halt of the party before Chew's houfe. Near one half of the American army remained for fome time at that place inactive. In the mean timegeneral Grey led on three battalions of the third brigade, and attacked with vigour. A fharp contest followed. Two British regiments attacked at the fame time on the opposite fide of the town. General Grant moved up the 49th regiment to the aid of those who were engaged with Greene's column.

The morning was extremely foggy .--- This, by concealing the true fituation of the parties occasioned mistakes. and made fo much caution neceffary as to give the Britifh time to recover from the effects of their first furprize. From thefe caufes the early promifing appearances on the part of the affailants were speedily reversed. The Americans left the field haftily, and all efforts to rally them were ineffectual. Lord Cornwallis arrived with a party of light horfe, and joined in the purfuit. This was continued for fome miles .--- The lofs of the royal army, including the wounded and prifoners, was about 500. Among their flain were brigadier general Agnew, and lieutenant colonel Bird. The lofs of the Americans, including 400 prifoners, was about 1000. Among their flain were general Nash and his aid de camp major Witherfpoon.

Soon after this battle the British left Germantown, and turned their principal attention towards opening a free communication between their army and their shipping.

Much induftry and ingenuity had been exerted for the fecurity of Philadelphia on the water fide. Thirteen gallies, two floating batteries, two zebeques, one brig, one fhip, befides a number of armed boats, fire fhips and rafts, were conftructed or employed for this purpofe. The Americans had also built a fort on Mud-Island, to which they

they gave the name of fort Mifflin, and crected thereon a 1777. confiderable battery. This island is admirably fituated for the crection of works to annoy fhipping on their way up the Delaware. It lies near the middle of the river, about 7 miles below Philadelphia. No veffels of burden can come up but by the main thip channel, which paffes clofe to Mud-Ifland, and is very narrow for more than a mile below. Opposite to fort Mifflin there is a height, called Red-Bank. This overlooks not only the river, but the neighbouring country. On this eminence, a respectable battery was erected. Between these two fortreffes, which are half a mile diftant from each other, the American naval armament for the defence of the river Delaware, made their harbour of retreat. Two ranges of chevaux de frife were alfo funk into the channel. Thefe confitted of large pieces of timber, ftrongly framed together, in the manner ufual for making the foundation of wharfs in deep water. Several large points of bearded iron projecting down the river were annexed to the upper parts of these chevaux de frise, and the whole was funk with ftones, fo as to be about four feet under the water at low tide. Their prodigious weight and ftrength could not fail to effect the deftruction of any vefiel which came upon them. Thirty of these machines were funk about 300 yards below fort Mifflin, fo as to ftretch in a diagonal line across the channel. The only open passage left was between two piers lying close to the fort, and that was fecured by a ftrong boom, and could not be approached but in a direct line to the battery. Another fortification was crected on a high bank on the Jersey shore, called Billingsport. And oppofite to this, another range of chevaux de frife was deposited, leaving only a narrow and shoal channel on the one fide. There was also a temporary battery of two heavy cannon, at the mouth of Mantua creek, about half way from Red-Bank to Billingfport. The British were well apprized, that without the command of the Delaware, their poffession of Philadelphia would be of no advantage. They therefore ftrained every nerve, to open the navigation of that river,--- to this end lord Howe had early taken the most effectual measures for

1777. for conducting the fleet and transports round from the Chefapeak to the Delaware, and drew them up on the Pennfylvania shore, from Reedy-Island to New-Castle. Early in October, a detachment from the British army croffed the Delaware, with a view of diflodging the Americans from Billingsport. On their approach, the place was evacuated. As the feason advanced, more vigorous measures for removing the obstructions were concerted between the general and the admiral. Batteries were erected on the Pennfylvania fhore to affift in diflodging the Americans from Mud-Ifland. At the fame time Count Donop with 2000 men, having croffed into New-Jerfey, opposite to Philadelphia, marched down on the eastern fide of the Delaware, to attack the redoubt at Red-Bank. This was defended by about 400 men under the command of colonel Greene. The attack immediately commenced by a fmart cannonade, under cover of which the Count advanced to the redoubt. This place was intended for a much larger garrifon than was then in ' it. It had therefore become neceffary to run a line in the middle thereof, and one part of it was evacuated. That part was eafily carried by the affailants, on which they indulged in loud huzzas for their fuppofed victory. The garrifon kept up a fevere well directed fire on the affailants by which they were compelled to retire. They fuffered not only in the affault, but in the approach to, and retreat from the fort. Their whole lofs in killed and wounded was about 400. Count Donop was mortally wounded and taken prifoner. Congress refolved, to prefent colonel Greene with a fword for his good conduct on this occasion. An attack made about the fame time on fort Mifflin by men of war and frigates, was not more fuccessful than the affault on Red-Bank. The Augusta man of war of 64 guns, and the Merlin, two of the veffels which were engaged in it, got aground. The former was fired and blew up. The latter was evacuated.

Though the first attempts of the British, for opening the navigation of the Delaware, were unfuccessful, they carried their point in another way that was unexpected. The chevaux de frise, having been funk fome confiderable able time, the current of the water was diverted by this 1777. great bulk into new chunnels. In confequence thereof the oaffage between the iflands and the Pennfylvania fhore was fo deepened as to admit veffels of fome confiderable draught of water. Through this paffage, the Vigilant, a large fhip, cut down fo as to draw but little water, mounted with 24 pounders, made her way to a polition from which fhe might enfilade the works on Mud-Ifland. This gave the Britith fuch an advantage, that the poft was no longer tenable. Colonel Smith, who had with great gallantry defended the fort from the latter end of September, to the 11th of November, being wounded, was removed to the main. Within five days after his removal, major Thayer, who as a volunteer had nobly offered to take charge of this dangerous post, was obliged to evacnate it.

This event did not take place till the works were entirely beat down---every piece of cannon difmounted, and one of the British ships fo near that the threw granadoes into the fort, and killed the men uncovered in the plat-The troops who had fo bravely defended fort form. Mifflin, made a fafe retreat to Red-Bank. Congress voted fwords to be given to lieutenant colonel Smith and commodore Hazlewood, for their gallant defence of the Delaware. Within three days after Mud-Ifland was evacuated, the garrifon was alfo withdrawn from Red-Bank, on the approach of lord Cornwallis, at the head of a large force prepared to affault it. Some of the American gallies and armed veffels efcaped by keeping clofe in with the Jerfey fhore, to places of fecurity above Philadelphia, but 17 of them were abandoned by their crews, and fired. Thus the British gained a free communication between their army and fhipping. This event was to them very defirable. They had been previoufly obliged to draw their provisions from Chefter, a distance of fixteen miles, at fome rifque, and a certain great expence. The long protracted defence of the Delaware, deranged the plans of the British, for the remainder of the campaign, and confequently faved the adjacent country.

About this time the chair of Congress became vacant, by

by the departure of Mr. Hancock, after he had difcharged 1777. - the duties of that office to great acceptance, two years and five months. Henry Laurens, of South-Carolina, was Nov. I. unanimoufly elected his fucceffor. He had been in England for fome years, antecedent to the hoftile determinations of parliament against the colonics, but finding the diffute growing ferious, he conceived that honour and duty called him to take part with his native country. He had been warmly folicited to flay in England, and offers were made him not only to fecure, but to double his American estate, in case of his continuing to refide there, --- but these were refused. To a particular friend in London, diffuading him from coming out to America, he replied on the 9th of Nov. 1774, when at Falmouth, on the point of embarking, " I shall never forget your " friendly attention to my intereft, but I dare not return. " Your ministers are deaf to information, and feem bent " on provoking unneceffary conteft. I think I have acted " the part of a faithful fubject, I now go refolved ftill to " labour for peace ; at the fame time determined in the " laft event to ftand or fall with my country."

> Immediately on his arrival in Charleston, he was elected a member, and soon after the president of the provincial congress,--- the president of the council of fastey---the vice-president of the state,--- and a member of congress.

> While Sir William Howe was fucceeding in every enterprize in Pennfylvania intelligence arrived, as shall be related in the next chapter, that general Burgoyne and his whole army had furrendered prifoners of war to the Americans.

General Washington foon after received a confiderable reinforcement from the northern army, which had accomplished this great event. With this increased force he took a position at and near Whitemarsh. The royal army having succeeded in removing the obstructions in pec.
4. the river Delaware, were ready for new enterprizes. Sir William Howe, marched out of Philadelphia with almost his whole force, expecting to bring on a general engagement. The next morning he appeared on Chefmut-hill in front of, and about three miles diflant from the

the right wing of the Americans. On the day follow- 1777. ing the British changed their ground, and moved to the right. Two days after they moved still farther to the right, and made every appearance of an intention to attack the American encampment. Some fkirmithes took place, and a general action was hourly expected: but inftead thereof on the morning of the next day, after various marches and countermarches, the British filed off from Dec. 9, their right, by two or three different routes, in full march for Philadelphia.

The polition of general Washington in a military point of view was admirable. He was fo fenfible of the advantages of it, that the manœuvres of Sir William Howe for fome days, could not allure him from it. In confequence of the reinforcement lately received, he had not in any preceding period of the campaign been in an equal condition for a general engagement. Though he ardently wished to be attacked, yet he would not relinquish a polition, from which he hoped for reparation for the adverfities of the campaign. He could not believe that general Howe with a victorious army, and that lately reinforced with four thousand men from New-York, should come out of Philadelphia only to return thither again. He therefore prefumed that to avoid the difgrace of fuch a movement, the British commander would, from a fense of military honour, be compelled to attack him, though under great difadvantages. When he found him cautious of engaging and inclining to his left, a daring defign was formed which would have been executed, had the British either continued in their position, or moved a little farther to the left of the American army. This was to have attempted in the night to furprife Philadelphia. The neceffary preparations for this purpofe were made, but the retreat of the British prevented its execution. Soon after thefe events general Smallwood with a confiderable force, was posted at Wilmington on the banks of the Delaware, and general Washington, with the main army retired to winter quarters at Valley Forge, 16 miles diftant from Philadelphia. This polition was preferred to diftant and more comfortable villages, as being calculated 1777. calculated to give the most extensive fecurity to the country adjacent to Philadelphia. The American army might have been tracked, by the blood of their feet, in marching without fhoes or ftockings over the hard frozen ground, between Whitemarsh and Valley Forge. Some hundreds of them were without blankets. Under thefe circumftances they had to fit down in a wood, in the latter end of December, and to build huts for their accommodation. This mode of procuring winter quarters, if not entirely novel, has been rarely if ever practifed in modern war. The cheerfulnefs with which the general and his army fubmitted to fpend a fevere winter, in fuch circumstances, rather than leave the country exposed, by retiring farther, demonstrated as well their patriotifm as their fixed refolution to fuffer every inconvenience, in preference to submiffion. Thus ended the campaign of 1777. Though Sir William Howe's army had been crowned with the most brilliant fuccefs, having gained two confiderable victories, and been equally triumphant in many fmaller actions, yet the whole amount of this tide of good fortune was no more than a good winter lodging for his troops in Philadelphia, whilft the men under his command poffeffed no more of the adjacent country than what they immediately commanded with their arms. The Congress, it is true, was compelled to leave the first feat of their deliberations, and the greatest city in the United States changed a number of its whig inhabitants for a numerous royal army; but it is as true that the minds of the Americans were, if poffible, more hoftile to the claims of Great-Britain than ever, and their army had gained as much by difcipline and experience, as compenfated for its diminution by defeats.

The events of this campaign were adverfe to the fanguine hopes which had been entertained of a fpeedy conqueft of the revolted colonies. Repeated proofs had been given, that, though general Wafhington was very forward to engage when he thought it to his advantage, yet it was impofible for the royal commander to bring him to action againft his confent. By this mode of conducting the defence of the new formed flates, two campaigns paigns had been wafted away, and the work which w 1777originally allotted for one, was ftill unfinithed.

An account of fome mifcellaneous transactions will clofe this chapter. Lieutenant colonel Barton, of a militia regiment of the ftate of Rhode-Ifland, accompanied by about forty volunteers, paffed by night from Warwick neck July 9: to Rhode-Ifland, and furprifed general Prefeot in his quarters, and brought him and one of his aids fafe off to the continent. Though they had a paffage of ten miles by water, they eluded the fhips of war and guard boats, which lay all round the ifland. The enterprize was conducted with fo much filence and addrefs, that there was no alarm among the Britifh till the colonel and his party had nearly reached the continent with their prize. Congrefs foon after refolved, that an elegant fword fhould be prefented to lieutenant colonel Barton, as a teftimonial of their fenfe of his gallant behaviour.

It has already been mentioned, that Congress in the latter end of November 1775, authorifed the capture of veffels, laden with ftores or reinforcements for their enemies. On the 23d of March 1776, they extended this permiffion fo far as to authorife their inhabitants to fit out armed veffels to cruife on the enemies of the united colonies. The Americans henceforth devoted themfelves to privateering, and were very fuccefsful. In the courfe of the year they made many valuable captures, particularly of homeward bound West-India men. The particulars cannot be enumerated, but good judges have calculated, that within nine months after Congress authorifed privateering, the British loss in captures, exclusive of tranfports and government ftore fhips, exceeded a million fterling. They found no difficulty in felling their prizes. The ports of France were open to them, both in Europe and in the Weft-Indies. In the latter they were fold without any difguife, but in the former a greater regard was paid to appearances. Open fales were not permitted in the harbours of France at particular times, but even then they were made at the entrance or offing.

In the French Weft-India iflands the inhabitants not only purchafed prizes, brought in by American cruifers, but 1777. but fitted out privateers under American colours and com? miffions, and made captures of British veffels. William Bingham, of Philadelphia, was stationed as the agent of Congress, at Martinico, and he took an early and active part in arming privateers in St. Pierre, to annoy and cruife against British property. The favourable disposition of the inhabitants furnished him with an opportunity, which he fuccefsfully improved, not only to diftrefs the Britifh commerce, but to fow the feeds of difcord between the French and English. The American privateers also found countenance in some of the ports of Spain, but not fo readily nor fo univerfally as in those of France. The British took many of the American veffels, but they were often of inferior value. Such of them as were laden with provisions, proved a feafonable relief to their West-India iflands, which otherwife would have fuffered from the want of those fupplies, which before the war had been ufually procured from the neighbouring continent.

The American privateers in the year 1777, increafed in numbers and boldnefs. They infulted the coafts of Great-Britain and Ireland, in a manner that had never before been attempted. Such was their spirit of adventure, that it became neceffary to appoint a convoy for the protection of the linen fhips from Dublin and Newry. The general Mifflin privateer, after making repeated captures, arrived at Breft, and faluted the French admiral. This was returned in form as to the veffel of an independent power. Lord Stormont, the British ambaffador, at the court of Verfailles, irritated at the countenance given to the Americans, threatened to return immediately to London, unlefs fatisfaction was given, and different meafures were adopted by France. An order was iffued in confequence of his application, requiring all American veffels to leave the ports of His Moft Chriftian Majefty, but though the order was positive, fo many evalions were practifed, and the execution of it was fo relaxed, that it produced no permanent discouragement of the beneficial intercourfe.

C H A P. XV.

The Northern Campaign of 1777.

PO effect a free communication between New-York and Canada, and to maintain the navigation of the intermediate lakes, was a principal object with the British, for the campaign of 1777. The Americans prefuming on this, had been early attentive to their fecurity, in that quarter. They had refolved to construct a fort on Mount Independence, which is an eminence adjoining the ftrait on which Ticonderoga stands, and nearly opposite to that fortrefs. They had also resolved to obstruct the navigation of the strait by cassons, to be funk in the water, and joined fo as to ferve at the fame time for a bridge between the fortifications on the east and west fide of it ;--- and that to prevent the British from drawing their fmall craft over land into lake George, the paffage of that lake fhould be obstructed, --- that Fort Schuyler, the fame which had formerly been called Fort Stanwix, should be strengthened, and other fortifications erected near the Mohawk river. Requisitions were made by the commanding officer in the department for 13,600 men, as neceffary for the fecurity of this district .--- The adjacent states were urged to fill up their recruits, and in all refpects to be in readinefs for an active campaign.

The British ministry were very fanguine in their hopes, from the confequences of forming a line of communication between New-York and Canada. They confidered the New-England people to be the foul of the confederacy, and promifed themfelves much by fevering them from all free communication with the neighbouring ftates. They hoped, when this was accomplished, to be able to furround them fo effectually with fleets and armies, and Indian allies, as to compel their fubmiffion. Animated with thefe expectations they left nothing undone, which bid fair for ensuring the fuccess of the plans they had formed for this purpose.

The regular troops, British and German, allotted to this fervice, were upwards of 7000. As artillery is confidered to be particularly useful in an American war, Vol. II. D where where numerous inhabitants are to be driven out of 1777. woods and fastnesses, this part of the fervice was particularly attended to. The brafs train that was fent out. was perhaps the fineft, and the most excellently supplied, both as to officers and men, that had ever been allotted to fecond the operations of an equal force. In addition to the regulars, it was fuppofed that the Canadians and the lovalifts, in the neighbouring flates, would add large reinforcements, well calculated for the peculiar nature of the fervice. Arms and accoutrements were accordingly provided to fupply them. Several nations of favages had alfo been induced to take up the hatchet, as allies to his Britannic majefty. Not only the humanity, but the policy of employing them, was queftioned in Great-Britain. The oppofers of it contended that Indians were capricious, inconftant and intractable, their rapacity infatiate, and their actions cruel and barbarous. At the fame time their fervices were reprefented to be uncertain, and that no dependence could be placed on their most folemn engagements. On the other hand, the zeal of British minifters for reducing the revolted colonies, was fo violent as to make them, in their exceffive wrath, forget that their adversaries were men. They contended, that in their circumftances every appearance of lenity, by inciting to difobedience, and thereby increasing the objects of punishment, was eventual cruelty. - In their opinion partial feverity was general mercy, and the only method of fpeedily crushing the rebellion, was to invelope its abettors in fuch complicated diffrefs, as by rendering their fituation intolerable, would make them willing to accept the proffered bleffings of peace and fecurity. The fentiments of those who were for employing Indians against the Americans, prevailed. Prefents were liberally distributed among them. Induced by thefe, and alfo by their innate thirst for war and plunder, they poured forth their warriors in fuch abundance, that their numbers threatened to be an incumberance.

The vaft force defined for this fervice was put under the command of lieutenant general Burgoyne, an officer whofe abilities were well known, and whofe fpirit of enter-

prize and thirft for military fame could not be exceeded. He was fupported by major general Philips of the artillery, who had eftablifhed a folid reputation by his good conduct during the late war in Germany, and by major general Reidefel, and brigadier general Speecht of the German troops, together with the Britifh generals Frazer, Powell and Hamilton, all officers of diftinguifhed merit.

The British had also undifputed possefilion of the navigation of Lake Champlain. Their marine force thereon, with which in the preceding campaign they had deftroyed the American shipping on the lakes, was not only entire, but unopposed.

A confiderable force was left in Canada for its internal fecurity, and Sir Guy Carleton's military command was reftricted to the limits of that province. Though the British ministry attributed the prefervation of Canada to his abilities in 1775 and 1776, yet by their arrangements for the year 1777, he was only called upon to act a fecondary part, in subferviency to the grand expedition committed to general Burgoyne. His behaviour on this occation, was conformable to the greatness of his mind. Instead of thwarting or retarding a fervice which was virtually taken out of his hands, he applied himself to fupport and forward it in all its parts, with the fame diligence as if the arrangement had been entirely his own, and committed to himself for execution.

The plan of the British for their projected irruption into the northwestern frontier of New-York, confisted of two parts. General Burgoyne with the main body, was to advance by the way of Lake Champlain, with politiveorders, as has been faid, to force his way to Albany, or at least fo far as to effect a junction with the royal army from New-York. A detachment was to afcend the river St. Lawrence, as far as Lake Ontario, and from that quarter to penetrate towards Albany, by the way of the Mohawk river. This was put under the command of lieutenant colonel St. Leger, and confitted of about 200 British troops, a regiment of New-York loyalists raifed and commanded by Sir John Johnson, and a large body of favages. Lieutenant general Burgoyne arrived in Quebec

June 20. up Lake Champlain and landed near Crown-Point. At ^{2 I} this place he met the Indians---gave them a war feaft, and made a fpeech to them. This was well calculated to excite them to take part with the royal army, but at the fame time to reprefs their barbarity. He pointedly forbad them to fned blood when not opposed in arms, and commanded that aged men, women, children, and prifoners, fhould be held facred from the knife and the hatchet, even in the heat of actual conflict. A reward was promifed for prifoners, and a fevere enquiry threatened for fcalps, though permiffion was granted to take them from those who were previoufly killed in fair oppofition. These refrictions were not fufficient, as will appear in the fequel, to reftrain their barbarities. The Indians having decidedly, taken part with the British army, general Burgoyne iffued a proclamation, calculated to fpread terror among the inhabitants. The numbers of his Indian affociates weremagnified, and their eagerness to be let loofe to their prey defcribed in high founding words. The force of the British armies and fleets prepared to crush every part of the revolted colonies, was alfo difplayed in pompous language. Encouragement and employment were promifed to those who should affist in the re-establishment of legal government, and fecurity held out to the peaceable and induftrious, who continued in their habitations. All the calamities of war arrayed in their most terrific forms, were denounced against those who should perfevere in a military opposition to the royal forces.

June 30.

General Burgoyne advanced with his army in a few days to Crown-Point. At this place he iffued orders of which the following words are a part: "The army embarks to-morrow to approach the enemy. The fervices required on this expedition are critical and confpicuous. During our progrefs occasions may occur, in which, nor difficulty, nor labour, nor life, are to be regarded. This army muft not retreat." From Crown-Point the royal army proceeded to invest Ticonderoga. On their approach to it, they advanced with equal caution and order

on

on both fides of the lake, while their naval force kept in its center. Within a few days they had furrounded threetourths of the American works at Ticonderoga and Mount Independence, and had alfo advanced a work on Sugar Hill which commands both, fo far towards completion, that in 24 hours it would have been ready to open. In these circumstances general St. Clair the commanding officer, refolved to evacuate the poft at all events; but conceiving it prudent to take the fentiments of the general officers, he called a council of war on the occasion. It was reprefented to this council, that their whole numbers were not fufficient to man one half of the works, and that as the whole must be on constant duty, it would be impoffible for them to fuftain the neceffary fatigue for any length of time, and that as the place would be completely invefted on all fides within a day, nothing but an immediate evacuation of the pofts could fave their troops. The fituation of general St. Clair was eminently embarraffing. Such was the confidence of the ftates in the fancied ftrength of this post, and of the supposed superiority of force for its defence, that to retreat without rifquing an action could not fail of drawing on him the execration of the multitude. To ftand ftill, and by fuffering himfelf to be furrounded to rifque his whole army for a fingle post, was contrary to the true interest of the states. In this trying fituation, with the unanimous approbation of a council of his general officers, he adopted the heroic refolution of facrificing perfonal reputation to fave his army.

The affumption of confident appearances by the garrifon, had induced their adverfaries to proceed with great caution. While from this caufe they were awed into refpect, the evacuation was completed with for much fecrecy and expedition, that a confiderable part of the public ftores was faved, and the whole would have been embarked, had not a violent gale of wind which fprung up in the night, prevented the boats from reaching their ftation.

The works abandoned by the Americans, were as follow: The old French lines conftructed in the late war between between France and England, which looked towards ge-1777. neral Burgoyne's encampment had been repaired the year before, and were in good order. About the center was a battery of fix guns. Thefe occupied about two-thirds of the high ground from the ftrait to the old fort. The remaining third was open, but fome fleches were thrown up for its fecurity. The old fort was in ruins, but fome, guns were mounted on a ravelin thereof, that looked towards the lake. There was also a battery of four guns in the French lines, which had the fame afpect. On the point above the bridge was a battery of four guns, and on Mount Independence another of fix or eight. The fort. on that fide was nearly a mile from the battery, and was formed of piquets. The defence of it might have employed four hundred men, but it could not have refifted a fix pounder. There were no barracks within it, nor a drop of water, but at a confiderable diffance. From the battery at the point, a line of entrenchment ran round the mount, upwards of a mile and a half in length. There: had been a ftrong abbatis in front of this line the year before, but it had been confumed by fire, as was alfo that in front of the French lines. Towards the caft of the mount was a block-houle. Another was on the Ticonderoga fide. New works were begun on the mount, but there was neither time nor ftrength of hands to complete them. A great deal of timber had been felled between the east creek and the foot of the mount, to retard the approaches of the British. All the redoubts on the low ground were abandoned, for want of men to occupy them. These works, together with 93 pieces of ordnance, and a large collection of provisions, fell into the hands of the Britifh.

This evacuation of Ticonderoga was the fubject of a fevere ferutiny. Congrefs recalled their general officers in the northern department, and ordered an enquiry into their conduct. They also nominated two gentlemen of eminence in the law to affift the judge advocate in profecuting that enquiry, and appointed a committee of their own body to collect evidence in fupport of the charges, which were on this occasion brought against them. General neral St. Clair, from the neceffity of the cafe, fubmitted 1777. to this innovation in the mode of conducting courts martial, but in behalf of the army protested against its being drawn into precedent. Charges of no lefs magnitude than cowardice, incapacity and treachery, were brought forward in court against him, and believed by many. The public mind, fore with the lofs of Ticonderoga, and apprehensive of general distress, sought to ease itself by throwing blame on the general. When the fituation of the army permitted an enquiry into his conduct, he was honourably acquitted. In the courfe of his trial it was made to appear, that though 13,600 men had been early called for as neceffary to defend the northern pofts, yet on the approach of general Burgoyne, 'the whole force collected to oppose him was only 2546 continentals, and 000 militia badly equipped, and worfe armed. From the infufficiency of their numbers, they could not poffefs themselves of Sugar-hill, nor of Mount-Hope, though the former commanded the works both of Ticonderoga and Mount Independence, and the latter was of great importance for fecuring the communication with Lake George, and had been fortified the year before with that view. To the queftion which had been repeatedly afked, "why was the evacuation, if really neceffary, delayed, till the Americans were fo nearly furrounded, as to occasion the lofs of fuch valuable ftores ? It was answered, that " from various circumftances it was impoffible for general St. Clair to get early information of the numbers opposed to him. They made no debarkation till they came to Gilliland's creek, which is about 40 miles to the northward of Ticonderoga, and from this they fpeedily reimbarked. The favages which they kept in front, deterred fmall reconnoitring parties from approaching fo near as to make any discoveries of their numbers. Large parties from the nature of the ground, could not have been fupported without rifquing a general action, and that from the combined operation of these circumstances, the numbers of the approaching royal army were effectually concealed from the garrifon, till the van of their force appeared in full view before it." The retreating army embarked as much

1777. much of their baggage and ftores as they had any pro-- fpect of faving on board batteaux, and difpatched them under convoy of five armed gallies to Skenefborough. Their main body took its route towards the fame place by way of Caftleton. The British were no fooner apprized of the retreat of the Americans than they purfued them. General Frazer, at the head of the light troops, advanced on their main body. Major general Reidefel was alfo ordered with the greater part of the Brunfwic troops, to march in the fame direction. General Burgoyne in per-The obstructions fon conducted the purfuit by water. to the navigation, not having been completed, were foon cut through. The two frigates --- the Royal George and the Inflexible, together with the gun boats, having effected their paffage, purfued with fo much rapidity, that in the courfe of a day the gun boats came up with and attacked the American gallies near Skenefborough falls. On the approach of the frigates all opposition ceafed. Two of the gallies were taken and three blown up. The Americans fet fire to their works, mills and batteaux. They were now left in the woods, deftitute of provisions. In this forlorn fituation they made their escape up Woodcreek to fort Anne. Brigadier Frazer purfued the retreating Americans --- came up with, and attacked their rear guard, at Hubbordton. In the courfe of the engage-July 7. ment he was joined by the German troops, commanded by general Reidefel. The Americans commanded by colonel Warner, made a gallant refiftance, but after fuftaining confiderable lofs, were obliged to give way. Lieut. colonel Hall, with the ninth British regiment, was detached from Skenefborough by general Burgoyne, to take poft near fort Anne. An engagement enfued between this regiment and a few Americans, but the latter, after a conflift of two hours, fired the fort, and retreated to fort Edward. The deftruction of the gallies and batteaux of the Americans at Skenefborough, and the defeat of their rear, obliged general St. Clair, in order to avoid being between two fires, to change the route of his main body, and to turn off from Caftleton to the left. After a fatiguing and diftreffing march of feven days, he joined general general Schuyler at fort Edward. Their combined forces, 7777. inclusive of the militia, not exceeding in the whole 4400 men, were not long after on the approach of general Burgoyne, compelled to retire farther into the country, bordering on Albany. Such was the rapid torrent of fuccefs, which in this period of the campaign fwept away all oppofition from before the royal army. The officers and men were highly elated with their good fortune. They confidered their toils to be nearly at an end; Albany to be within their grafp, and the conquest of the adjacent provinces reduced to a certainty. In Great-Britain intelligence of the progress of Burgoyne diffused a general joy. As to the Americans, the loss of reputation which they fustained in the opinion of their European admirers, was greater than their lofs of pofts, artillery and troops. They were fligmatifed as wanting the refolution and abilities of men in the defence of their dearest rights. Their unqualified fubjugation, or unconditional fubmiffion was confidered as being near at hand. An opinion was diffused, that the war in effect was over, or that the farther refiftance of the colonifts would ferve only to make the terms of their fubmiffion more humiliating. The terror which the lofs of Ticonderoga fpread throughout the New-England flates was great, but neverthelefs no difpolition to purchase fafety by fubmiffion appeared in any quarter. They did not fink under the apprehenfions of danger, but acted with vigour and firmnefs. The royal army, after these successes, continued for some days in Skenesborough, waiting for their tents, baggage and provision. In the mean time general Burgoyne put forth a proclamation, in which he called on the inhabitants of the adjacent towns to fend a deputation of ten or more perfons from their respective townships, to meet colonel Skene at Caftleton, on the 15th of July. The troops were at the fame time bufily employed in opening a road, and clearing a creek, to favour their advance, and to open a paffage for the conveyance of their flores. A party of the royal army which had been left behind at Ticonderoga, was equally industrious in carrying gun boats, provifion, veffels, and batteaux over land, into lake George. VOL. II. E An 1777. An immenfity of labour in every quarter was necessary, - but animated as they were with paft fucceffes and future hopes, they difregarded toil and danger.

From Skenefborough general Burgovne directed his courfe acrofs the country to Fort Edward, on Hudfon's-River. Though the distance in a' right line from one to. the other is but a few miles, yet fuch is the impracticable nature of the country, and fuch were the artificial difficulties thrown in his way, that nearly as many days were confumed as the diftance paffed over in a direct line would have measured in miles. The Americans under the direction of general Schuyler, had cut large trees on both fides of the road, fo as to fall across with their branches interwoven. The face of the country was likewife fo broken with creeks and marshes, that they had no lefs than forty bridges to construct, one of which was a logwork over a morafs, two miles in extent. This difficult march might have been avoided, had general Burgoyne fallen back from Skenefborough to Ticonderoga, and thence proceeded by lake George, but he declined this route, from an apprehension that a retrograde motion on his part would abate the panic of the enemy. He had alfo a fufpicion that fome delay might be occasioned by the American garrifon at Fort George, as in cafe of his taking that route, they might fafely continue to refift to the laft extremity, having open in their rear a place of retreat. On the other hand it was prefumed, that as foon as they knew that the royal army was marching in a direction which was likely to cut off their retreat, they would confult their fafety by a feafonable evacuation. In addition to thefe reafons he had the advice and perfuation of colonel Skene. That gentleman had been recommended to him as a perfon proper to be confulted. His land was fo fituated, that the opening of a road between Fort Edward and Skenefborough would greatly enhance its value. This circumftance might have made him more urgent in his recommendations of that route, efpecially as its being the fhortest, it bid fair for uniting the royal interest with private convenience. The opinion formed by general Burgovne of the effect of his direct movement from Skenefborough borough to Fort Edward on the American garrifon, was 1777. verified by the event; for being apprehenfive of having their retreat cut off, they abandoned their fort and burnt their veffels. The navigation of Lake George being thereby left free, provisions and ammunition were brought forward from Fort George to the first navigable parts of Hudfon's-River. This is a diftance of 15 miles, and the roads of difficult passage. The intricate combination of land and water carriage, together with the infufficient means of transportation, and exceflive rains, caused fuch delays, that at the end of fifteen days there were not more than four days provision brought forward, nor above ten batteaux in the river. The difficulties of this conveyance, as well as of the march through the wildernefs from Skenefborough to Fort Edward, were encountered and overcome by the royal army, with a fpirit and alacrity which could not be exceeded. At length, after incredible fatigue and labour, general Burgoyne, and the army un- July 30. der his command reached Fort Edward, on Hudfon's-River. Their exultation on accomplishing, what for a long time had been the object of their hopes, was unufually great.

While the British were retarded in their advance by the combined difficulties of nature and art, events took place, which proved the wifdom and propriety of the retreat from Ticonderoga. The army faved by that means, was between the inhabitants and general Burgoyne. This abated the panic of the people, and became a center of rendezvous for them to repair to. On the other hand, had they flood their ground at Ticonderoga, they must in the ordinary courfe of events, in a fhort time, either have been cut to pieces, or furrendered themfelves prifoners of war. In either cafe, as general St. Clair reprefented in his elegant defence : "Fear and difmay would have feized on the inhabitants from the falle opinion that had been formed of the ftrength of thefe pofts, wringing grief and moping inelancholy, would have filled the habitations of those whose dearest connexions were in that army, and a lawlefs hoft of ruffians, fet loofe from every focial principle, would have roamed at large through the defencelefs

1777. lefs country, while bands of favages would have carried havock, devastation and terror before them. Great part of the flate of New-York must have submitted to the conqueror, and in it he would have found the means to profecute his fuccefs. He would have been able effectually to have co-operated with general Howe, and would probably foon have been in the fame country with him--that country where the illustrious Washington, with an inferior force made fo glorious a ftand, but who must have been obliged to retire, if both armies had come upon him at once --- or he might have been forced to a general and decifive action in unfavourable circumstances, whereby the hopes, the now well founded hopes of America -- of liberty, peace and fafety might have been cut off forever." Such, it was apprehended, would have been the confequences, if the American northern army had not retreated from their pofts at Ticonderoga. From the adoption of that measure very different events took place. In a few days after the evacuation, general Schuyler iffued a proclamation, calling to the minds of the inhabitants the late barbarities and defolations of the royal army in Jerfey--warning them that they would be dealt with as traitors, if they joined the British, and requiring them with their arms to repair to the American flandard. Numerous parties were alfo employed in bringing off public ftores, and in felling trees. and throwing obstructions in the way of the advancing royal army. At first an universal panic intimidated the inhabitants, but they foon recovered. The laws of felf-prefervation operated in their full force, and diffused a general activity through the adjacent states. The formalities of convening, draughting and officering the militia, were in many inftances difpenced with. Hundreds feized their firelocks, and marched on the general call, without waiting for the orders of their immediate commanders. The inhabitants had no means of fecurity, but to abandon their habitations, and take up arms. Every individual faw the neceffity of becoming a temporary foldier. The terror exited by the Indians, inftead of difpofing the inhabitants to court British protection, had a contrary effect. The friends of the royal caufe, as well as its enemies, mies, suffered from their indiferiminate barbarities. Among 1777. other instances, the murder of Miss M'Crea excited an 4 universal horror. This young lady, in the innocence of youth, and the bloom of beauty---the daughter of a fteady lovalift, and engaged to be married to a British officer, was on the very day of her intended nuptials, maffacred by the favage auxiliaries, attached to the British army. * Occasion was thereby given to inflame the populace, and to blacken the royal caufe. The cruelties of the Indians, and the caufe in which they were engaged, were affociated together, and prefented in one view to the alarmed inhabitants. Those whose interest it was to draw forth the militia in fupport of American independence, ftrongly expressed their execrations of the army, which fubmitted to accept of Indian aid, and they loudly condemned that government which could call fuch auxiliaries into a civil contest, as were calculated not to fubdue, but to exterminate a people whom they affected to reclaim as fubjects. Their cruel mode of warfare, by putting to death as well the fmiling infant and the defencelefs female, as the refifting armed man, excited an univerfal fpirit of refistance. In conjunction with other circumftances, it inipreffed on the minds of the inhabitants a general conviction that a vigorous determined oppofition was the only alternative for the prefervation of their property, their children and their wives. Could they have indulged the hope of fecurity and protection while they remained peaceably at their homes, they would have found many excufes for declining to affume the profession of foldiers, but when they contrasted the dangers of a manly refistance. with those of a passive inaction, they chose the former, as the least of two unavoidable evils. All the feeble aid, which

* This, though true, was no premeditated barbarity. The circumflances were as follows : Mr. Jones, her lover, from an anxiety for her fafety, engaged fome Indians to remove her from among the Americans, and promifed to reward the perfon who fhould bring her fafe to him, with a barrel of run. Two of the Indians, who had conveyed her fome diffance, on the way to her intended hulband, difputed, which of them flould prefent her to Mr. Jones. Both were anxious for the receiving it. Burgoyne obliged the Indians to dealiver up the murderer, and threatened to put him to death. His life was only fpared, upon the Indians agreeing to terms, which the general thought would be more efficacious than an execution, in preventing fimilar mikhiefs.

1777. which the royal army received from their Indian auxiliaries, was infinitely overbalanced by the odium it brought on their cause, and by that determined spirit of opposition which the dread of their favage cruelties excited. While danger was remote, the preffing calls of Congress, and of the general officers, for the inhabitants to be in readinefs to oppose a distant foe were unavailing, or tardily executed, but no fooner had they recovered from the first impreffion of the general panic, than they turned out with unexampled alacrity. The owners of the foil came forward with that ardor, which the love of dear connections and of property infpires. An' army was fpeedily poured forth from the woods and mountains. When they who had begun the retreat were nearly wafted away, the fpirit of the country immediately fupplied their place with a much greater and more formidable force. In addition to these incitements, it was early conjectured, that the royal army, by pufhing forward would be fo entangled as not to be able to advance or retrat on equal terms. Men of abilities and of eloquence, influenced with this expectation, harangued the inhabitants in their feveral towns --- fet forth in high-colouring, the cruelties of the favage auxiliaries of Great-Britain, and the fair profpects of capturing the whole force of their enemies. From the combined influence of thefe canfes, the American army foon amounted to upwards of 13,000 men.

While general Burgoyne was forcing his way down towards Albany, lieutenant colonel St. Leger was co-operating with him in the Mohawk country. He had afcended the river St. Lawrence, croffed Lake Ontario, and commenced the fiege of Fort Schuyler. On the approach of this detachment of the royal army, general Harkimer collected about 800 of the whig militia of the parts adjacent, for the relief of the garrifon.

St. Leger aware of the confequences of being attacked in his trenches, detached Sir John Johnfon, with fome tories and Indians to lie in ambufh, and intercept the advancing militia. The ftratagem took effect. The general 6, and his militia were furprifed, but feveral of the Indians were neverthelefs killed by their fire. A fcene of confu-fion followed. Some of Harkimer's men run off, but others posted themselves behind logs, and continued to fight with bravery and fuccefs. The lofs on the fide of the Americans was 160 killed, befides the wounded. Among the former was their gallant leader general Harkimer. Several of their killed and wounded were principal inhabitants of that part of the country. Colonel St. Leger availed himfelf of the terror excited on this occasion, and endeavoured by strong representations of Indian barbarity to intimidate the garrifon into an immediate furrender. He fent verbal, and written meflages, " demanding the furrender of the fort, and stating the impossibility of their obtaining relief, as their friends under general Harkimer were entirely cut off, and as general Burgovne had forced his way through the country, and was daily receiving the fubmiffion of the inhabitants," he reprefented " the pains he had taken to foften the Indians, and to obtain engagements from them, that in cafe of an immediate furrender every man in the garrifon fhould be fpared," and particularly enlarged on the circumftance, " that the Indians were determined, in cafe of their meeting with farther opposition, to maffacre not only the garrifon, but every man, woman or child in the Mohawk country." Colonel Ganfevort, who commanded in the fort, replied, " that being by the United States entrusted with the charge of the garrifon, he was determined to defend it to the laft extremity, against all enemies whatever, without any concern for the confequences of doing his duty."

It being refolved maugre, the threats of Indian barbarities to defend the fort.---Lieutenant colonel Willet undertook, in conjunction with lieutenant Stockwell, to give information to their fellow citizens, of the ftate of the garrifon. Thefe two adventurous officers paffed by night through the befiegers works, and at the hazard of falling into the hands of favages, and fuffering from them the feverity of torture, made their way for fifty miles through dangers and difficulties, in order to procure relief for their befieged affociates. In the mean time the Britifh carried on their operations with fuch induftry, that in lefs than three weeks they had advanced within 150 yards of the fort. The 1777.

1777. The brave garrifon, in its hour of danger, was not forgotten. General Arnold, with a brigade of continental troops, had been previoufly detached by general Schuyler for their relief, and was then near at hand. -Mr. Toft Schuyler who had been taken up by the Americans, on fufpicion of his being a fpy, was promifed his life and his eftate, on confideration that he fhould go on and alarm' the Indians with fuch reprefentations of the numbers marching against them, as would occasion their retreat. He immediately proceeded to the camp of the Indians, and being able to converfe in their own language, informed them that vast numbers of hostile Americans were near at hand. They were thoroughly frightened and determined to go off. St. Leger used every art to retain them, but nothing could change their determination. It is the characteristic of these people on a reverse of fortune to betray irrefolution, and a total want of that conftancy, which is neceffary to ftruggle for a length of time with difficulties. They had found the fort ftronger and better defended than was expected. They had loft feveral headmen in their engagement with general Harkimer, and had gotten no plunder. Thefe circumstances, added to the certainty of the approach of a reinforcement to their adverfaries, which they believed to be much greater than it really was, made them quite untractable. Part of them inftantly decamped, and the remainder threatened to follow, if the British did not immediately retreat. This measure was adopted, and the fiege raifed. From the diforder, occafioned by the precipitancy of the Indians, Aug. 22 the tents, and much of the artillery and stores of the be-fiegers, fell into the hands of the garrifon. The difcontented favages, exafperated by their ill fortune, are faid, on their retreat, to have robbed their British affociates, of their baggage and provisions.

While the fate of Fort Schuyler was in fuspense, it occurred to general Burgoyne, on hearing of its being befieged, that a fudden and rapid movement forward would be of the utmost confequence. As the principal force of his adverfaries was in front between him and Albany, he hoped by advancing on them, to reduce them them to the neceffity of fighting, or of retreating out of 1777. his way to New-England. Had they to avoid an attack, retreated up the Mohawk river, they would, in cafe of St. Leger's fuccefs, have put themfelves between two fires. Had they retreated to Albany, it was fuppofed their fituation would have been worfe, as a co-operation from New-York was expected. Befides, in cafe of that movement, an opportunity would have been given for a junction of Burgoyne and St. Leger. To have retired from the fcene of action by filing off for New-England, feemed to be the only opening left for their efcape. With fuch views general Burgoyne promifed himfelf great advantages, from advancing rapidly towards Albany. The principal objection against this plausible project, was the difficulty of furnishing provisions to his troops. To keep up a communication with Fort George, fo as to obtain from that garrifon, regular fupplies at a diftance daily encreafing, was wholly impracticable., The advantages which were expected from the proposed measure, were too dazzling to be eafily relinquished. Though the impossibility of drawing provisions from the ftores in their rear, was known and acknowledged, yet a hope was indulged that they might be elsewhere obtained. A plan was therefore formed to open refources, from the plentiful farms of Vermont. Every day's account, and particularly the information of colonel Skene, induced Burgoyne to believe, that one defcription of the inhabitants in that country were panic ftruck, and that another, and by far the moft numerous, were friends to the British interest, and only wanted the appearance of a protecting power to fhew themfelves. Relying on this intelligence, he detached only 500 men, 100 Indians, and two field pieces, which he fuppofed would be fully fufficient for the expedition. The command of this force was given to lieutenant colonel Baum, and it was supposed that with it he would be enabled to feize upon a magazine of fupplies which the Americans had collected at Bennington, and which was only guarded by militia. It was also intended to try the temper of the inhabitants and to mount the dragoons. Lieutenant colonel Baum was instructed to keep the re-' VOL. II. F gular gular force posted, while the light troops felt their way; 1777. and to avoid all danger of being furrounded, or of having his retreat cut off. But he proceeded with lefs caution than his perilous fituation required. Confiding in the numbers and promifed aid of those who were depended upon as friends, he prefumed too much. On his approaching the place of his deftination, he found the American militia ftronger than had been fuppofed. He therefore took poft in the vicinity, --- entrenched his party, and difpatched an express to general Burgoyne, with an account of his fituation. Colonel Breyman was detached to reinforce him. Though every exertion was made to puth forward this reinforcement, yet from the impracticable face of the country and defective means of tranfportation, 32 hours elapfed before they had marched 24 miles. General Starke who commanded the American militia at Bennington, engaged with them before the junction of the two roval detachments could be effected. On this occasion about 800 undifciplined militia, without bayonets, or a fingle piece of artillery, attacked and routed 500 regular troops advantageoufly' posted behind, entrenchments --- furnished with the best arms, and defended with two pieces of artillery. The field pieces were taken from the party commanded by col. Baum, and the greateft part of his detachment was either killed or captured. Colonel Breyman arrived on the fame ground and on the fame day, but not till the action was over. Inftead of meeting his friends, as he expected; he found himfelf brifkly attacked. This was begun by colonel Warner, (who with his continental regiment, which having been fent for from Manchester, came opportunely at this time) and was well fupported by Stark's militia, which had juft defeated the party commanded by colonel Baum. Brevman's troops, though fatigued with their preceding march, behaved with great refolution, but were at length compelled to abandon their artillery, and retreat. In thefe two actions the Americans took four brafs field pieces, twelve brafs drums, 250 dragoon fwords, 4 ammunition waggons, and about 700 prifoners. The lofs of the Americans, inclusive of their wounded, was about 100 men. Congrefs

Congrefs refolved, "that their thanks be prefented to gen. Stark, of the New-Hampfhire militia, and the officers and troops under his command, for their brave and fuccefsful attack upon, and fignal victory over the enemy in their lines at Bennington, and alfo, that brigadier Stark, be appointed a brigadier general in the army of the United States." Never were thanks more defervedly beftowed. The overthrow of thefe detachments was the first link in a grand chain of caufes, which finally drew down ruin on the whole royal army. The confidence with which the Americans were infpired, on finding themfelves able to defeat regular troops, produced furprifing effects. It animated their exertions, and filled them with expectation of farther fucceffes.

That military pride, which is the foul of an army, was nurtured by the captured artillery, and other trophies of victory. In propertion to the elevation of the Americans, was the depression of their adversaries. Accustomed to fuccefs, as they had been in the preceding part of the campaign, they felt unufual mortification from this unexpected check. Though it did not diminish their courage, it abated their confidence. It is not eafy to enumerate all the difaftrous confequences which refulted to the royal army, from the failure of their expedition to Bennington. These were so extensive, that their loss of men was the leaft confiderable. It deranged every plan for pushing the advantages which had been previoutly obtained. Among other embarraffments it reduced general Burgoyne to the alternative of halting, till he brought forward fupplies from Fort George, or of advancing without them at the rifque of being ftarved. The former being adopted, the royal army was detained from August 16th, to September 13th .- This unavoidable delay, gave time and opportunity for the Americans to collect in great numbers.

The defeat of lieutenant colonel Baum, was the first event which for a long time had taken place in favour of the American northern army. From December 1775, it had experienced one misfortune, treading on the heels of another, and defeat fucceeding defeat. Every movement had been either retreating or evacuating. The fub-1777. sequent transactions present a remarkable contrast. Fortune, which previous to the battle of Bennington, had not for a moment quitted the British standard, seemed after that event, as if the had totally deferted it, and gone over to the opposite party.

After the evacuation of Ticonderoga, 'the Americans had fallen back from one place to another, till they at last fixed at Vanshaick's island. Soon after this retreating fystem was adopted, Congress recalled their general officers, and put general Gates at the head of their northern army. His arrival gave fresh vigour to the exertions Aug. 19 of the inhabitants. The militia flushed with their recent victory at Bennington, collected in great numbers to his ftandard. They foon began to be animated with a hope of capturing the whole British army. A fpirit of adventure burft forth in many different points of direction. While general Burgoyne was urging his preparations for advancing towards Albany, an enterprize was undertaken by general Lincoln to recover Ticonderoga, and the other pofts in the rear of the royal army. He detached colonel Brown with 500 men to the landing at Lake George. The colonel conducted his operations with fo much addrefs, that he furprifed all the outposts between the landing at the north end of Lake George, and the body of the fortrefs at Ticonderoga. He alfo took Mount Defiance and Mount Hope, the French lines, and a block-houfe, 200 batteaux, feveral gun boats, and an armed floop, together with 200 prifoners, and at the fame time releafed 100 Americans. His own lofs was triffing. Colonel Brown and colonel Johnson, the latter of whom had been detached with 500 men, to attempt Mount Independence, on examination found that the reduction of either that post or of Ticonderoga, was beyond their ability. When the neceffary ftores for thirty days fublistence, were brought forward from Lake George, general Burgoyne gave up all communication with the magazines in his rear, and 13. croffed Hudson's river. This movement was the fubject * 14. of much difcuffion. Some charged it on the impetuofity of the general, and alledged, that it was premature before he he was fure of aid from the royal forces posted in New- 1777. York, but he pleaded the peremptory orders of his fuperiors. The rapid advance of Burgoyne, and especially his paffage of the North-River, added much to the impracticability of his future retreat, and in conjunction with fubfequent events made the total ruin of his army in a great degree unavoidable.

General Burgoyne, after crofling the Hudson, advanced along its fide, and in four days encamped on the heights, about two miles from general Gates' camp, which was three miles above Stillwater. The Americans, evated with their fucceffes at Bennington and Fort Schuyler, thought no more of retreating, but came out to meet the advancing British, and engaged them with firmness and refolution. The attack began a little before midday, be- Sept. 19. tween the fcouting parties of the two armies. The commanders on both fides, supported and reinforced their respective parties. The conflict, though fevere, was only partial for an hour and a half, but after a short pause it became general, and continued for three hours, without any intermission. A constant blaze of fire was kept up, and both armies feemed to be determined on death or victory. The Americans and British alternately drove, and were driven by each other. Men, and particularly officers, dropped every moment, and on every fide. Several of the Americans placed themfelves in high trees, and as often as they could diftinguish an officer's uniform, took him off by deliberately aiming at his perfon. Few actions have been characterifed by more obstinacy in attack or defence. The British repeatedly tried their bayonets, but without their ufual fuccefs in the ufe of that weapon. At length, night put an end to the effusion of blood. The British loft upwards of 500 men, including their killed, wounded, and prifoners. The Americans, inclusive of the miffing, loft 319. Thirty-fix, out of forty-eight British matrofles were killed, or wounded. The 62d British regiment, which was 500 frong, when it left Canada, was reduced to 60 men, and 4 or 5 officers. This hard fought battle decided nothing, and little elfe than honour was gained by either army, but neverthelefs it 1777. it was followed by important confequences. Of thefe - one was the diminution of the zeal and alacrity of the Indians in the British army. The dangerous fervice, in which they were engaged, was by no means fuited to their habits of war. They were difappointed of the plunder they expected, and faw nothing before them but hardfhips and danger. Fidelity and honour were too feeble motives in the minds of favages, to retain them in fuch an unproductive fervice. By deferting in the feafon when their aid would have been most useful, they furnifhed a fecond inftance of the impolicy of depending upon them. Very little more perfeverance was exhibited by the Canadians, and other British provincials. They alfo abandoned the British standard, when they found, that instead of a flying and dispirited enemy, they had a numerous and refolute force opposed to them. These defertions were not the only difappointments which general Burgoyne experienced. From the commencement of the expedition, he had promifed himfelf a ftrong reinforcement from that part of the British army, which was stationed at New-York. He depended on its being able to force its way to Albany, and to join him there, or in the vicinity. This co-operation, though attempted, failed in the execution, while the expectation of it contributed to involve him in fome difficulties, to which he would not have otherwife been exposed.

Sept. 21.

General Burgoyne received intelligence in a cypher, that Sir Henry Clinton, who then commanded in New-York, intended to make a diversion in his favour, by attacking the fortreffes which the Americans had erected on Hudson's river, to obstruct the intercourse between New-York and Albany. In answer to this communication he dispatched to Sir Henry Clinton fome trusty perfons, with a full account of his situation, and with instructions to press the immediate execution of the proposed co-operation, and to affure him, that he was enabled in point of provisions, and fixed in his resolution, to hold his prefent position till the 12th of October, in the hopes of favourable events. The reasonable expectation of a diversion from New-York, founded on this intelligence, made made it difgraceful to retreat, and at the fame time im- 1777. proper to urge offenfive operations. In this pofture of affairs, a delay of two or three weeks, in expectation of the promifed co-operation from New-York became neceffary. In the mean time the provisions of the royal army were leffening, and the animation and numbers of the American army increasing. The New-England people were fully fenfible, that their All was at ftake, and at the fame time fanguine, that by vigorous exertions Burgoyne would be fo entangled, that his furrender would be unavoidable. Every moment made the fituation of the Britifh army more critical. From the uncertainty of receiving farther supplies, general Burgoyne leffened the Oct. to foldiers provisions. The 12th of October, the term till which the royal army had agreed to wait for aid from New-York, was fast approaching, and no intelligence of the expected co-operation had arrived. In this alarming fituation it was thought proper to make a movement to the left of the Americans. The body of troops employed for this purpose confisted of 1500 chosen men, and was commanded by generals Burgovne, Philips, Reidefel, and Frazer. As they advanced, they were checked by a fudden and impetuous attack; but major Ackland, at the head of the British grenadiers, fustained it with great firmnefs. The Americans extended their attack along the whole front of the German troops, who were pofted on the right of the grenadiers, and they also marched a large body round their flank, in order to cut off their retreat. To oppose this bold enterprife, the British light infantry, with a part of the 24th regiment, were directed to form a fecond line, and to cover the retreat of the troops into the camp. In the mean time the Americans pushed forward a freth and a strong re-inforcement, to renew the action on Burgoyne's left. That part of his army was obliged to give way, but the light infantry, and 24th regiment, by a quick movement, came to its fuc-, cour, and faved it from total ruin. The British lines being exposed to great danger, the troops which were neareft to them returned for their defence. General Arnold, with a brigade of continental troops, puffied for the works poffeffed poffeffed by lord Balcarras, at the head of the British light 1777. infantry ; but the brigade having an abbatis to crofs, and many other obstructions to furmount, was compelled to retire. Arnold left this brigade, and came to Jackfon's regiment, which he ordered inftantly to advance, and attack the lives and redoubt in their front, which were defended by lieutenant colonel Breyman at the head of the German grenadiers. The affailants pushed on with rapidity, and carried the works. Arnold was one of the first who entered them. Lieutenant colonel Breyman was killed. The troops commanded by him retired firing. They gained their tents about 30 or 40 yards from their works, but on finding that the affault was general, they gave one fire, after which fome retreated to the British camp, but others threw down their arms. The night put an end to the action.

This day was fatal to many brave men. The Britifh officers fuffered more than their common proportion. Among their flain general Frazer, on account of his diftinguifhed merit, was the fubject of particular regret. Sir James Clark, Burgoyne's aid de camp, was mortally wounded. The general himfelf had a narrow efcape, a fhot paffed through his hat, and another through his waiftcoat. Majors Williams and Ackland were taken, and the latter was wounded. The lofs of the Americans was inconfiderable, but general Arnold, to whofe impetuofity they were much indebted for the fuccefs of the day, was among their wounded. They took more than 200 prifoners, befides 9 pieces of brafs artillery, and the encampment of a German brigade, with all their equipage.

The royal troops were under arms the whole of the next day, in expectation of another action, but nothing more than fkirmithes took place. At this time, general Lincoln, when reconnoitring, received a dangerous wound: An event which was greatly regretted, as he poffeffed much of the efteem and confidence of the American army.

The position of the British army, after the action of the 7th, was to dangerous, that an immediate and total change became neceffary. This hazardous measure was executed without loss or diforder. The British camp, camp, with all its appurtenances, was removed in the mount of a fingle night. The American general now faw a fair profpect of overcoming the army opposed to him, without exposing his own to the danger of another battle. His measures were therefore principally calculated to cut off their retreat, and prevent their receiving any farther fupplies.

While general Burgoyne was pufhing on towards Albany, an unfuccessful attempt to relieve him was made by the British commander in New-York. For this purpose, Sir Henry Clinton conducted an expedition up Oct. 5. Hudson's river. This confisted of about 3000 men, and was accompanied by a fuitable naval force. After making many feints he landed at Stoney Point, and marched over the mountains to Fort Montgomery, and attacked the different redoubts. The garrifon commanded by governor Clinton, a brave and intelligent officer, made a gallant refiftance. But as the post had been defigned principally to prevent the paffing of thips, the works on the land fide were incomplete and untenable. When it began to grow dark, the British entered the fort with 6. fixed bayonets. The lofs on neither fide was great. Governor Clinton, general James Clinton, and most of the officers and men effected their efcape under cover of the thick finoke and darknefs that fuddenly prevailed.

The reduction of this post furnished the British with an opportunity for opening a paffage up the North-River, but inftead of puffing forward to Burgoyne's encampment, or even to Albany, they fpent feveral days in laying wafte the adjacent country. The Americans deftroyed Fort Conftitution, and alfo fet fire to two new frigates, and fome other veffels. General Tryon at the fame time destroyed a settlement, called Continental Village, which contained barracks for 1500 men, befides many ftores. Str James Wallace with a flying fquadron of light frigates, and general Vaughan with a detachment of land forces, continued on and near the river for feveral days, defolating the country near its margin. General Vaughan fo completely burned Efopus, a fine flourishing village, that a fingle houfe was not left ftand-VOL. II. G ing.

Their authors might have hoped to divert the attention of general Gates, and thus indirectly relieve general Burgoyne, but if this was intended the artifice did not take effect. The prefervation of property was with the Americans only a fecondary object. The capturing of Burgoyne promifed fuch important confequences, that they would not fuffer any other confideration to interfere with it. General Gates did not make a fingle movement that leffened the probability of effecting his grand purpofe. He wrote an expostulatory letter to Vaughan, part of which was in the following terms : " Is it thus your king's generals think to make converts to the royal caufe ? It is no lefs furprizing than true, that the measures they adopt to ferve their master, have a quite contrary effect. Their cruelty eftablishes the glorious act of independence upon the broad bafis of the refentment of the people." Whether policy or revenge led to this devastation of property is uncertain, but it cannot admit of a doubt that it was far from being the most effectual method of relieving Burgoyne,

The paffage of the North-River was made fo practicable by the advantages gained on the 6th of October, that Sir Henry Clinton, with his whole force, amounting to 3000 men, might not only have reached Albany, but general Gates' encampment, before the 12th, the day till which Burgoyne had agreed to wait for aid from New-York. While the British were doing mischief to individuals without ferving the caufe of their royal mafter, it feems as though they might by pufling forward about 136 miles in fix days, have brought Gates' army between two fires, at leaft twenty-four hours before Burgoyne's necessity compelled his fubmiffion to articles of capitulation. Why they neglected this opportunity of relieving their fuffering brethren, about thirty-fix miles to the northward of Albany, when they were only about one hundred miles below it, has never yet been fatisfactorily explained.

Gates posted 1400 men on the heights opposite the fords

fords of Saratoga, and 2000 more in the rear, to prevent 1777. a retreat to Fort Edward, and 1500 at a ford higher up. Burgoyne receiving intelligence of thefe movements, concluded from them, especially from the last, that Gates meant to turn his right. This, if effected, would have entirely enclosed him. To avoid being hemmed in, he refolved on an immediate retreat to Saratoga. His hofpital, with the fick and wounded, were neceffarily left behind, but they were recommended to the humanity of general Gates, and received from him every indulgence their fituation required. When general Burgoyne arrived at Saratoga, he found that the Americans had posted a confiderable force on the opposite heights, to impede his paffage at that ford. In order to prepare the way for a retreat to Lake George, general Burgoyne ordered a detachment of artificers, with a strong efcort of British and provincials, to repair the bridges and open the road leading thither. Part of the efcort was withdrawn on other duty, and the remainder on a flight attack of an inconfiderable party of Americans, ran away. The workmen thus left without fupport, were unable to effect the bufinefs on which they had been fent. The only practicable route of retreat, which now remained, was by a night march to Fort Edward. Before this attempt could be made, fcouts returned with intelligence, that the Americans were entrenched opposite to those fords on the Hudfon's river, over which it was propofed to pafs, and that they were alfo in force on the high ground between Fort Edward and Fort George. They had at the fame time parties down the whole fhore and pofts, fo near as to obferve every motion of the royal army. Their polition extended nearly round the British, and was by the nature of the ground in a great measure fecured from attacks. The royal army could not ftand its ground where it was, from the want of the means neceffary for their fubfistence; nor could it advance towards Albany, without attacking a force greatly fuperior in number; nor could it retreat without making good its way over a river in face of a ftrong party, advantageoufly posted on the opposite side. In case of either attempt, the Americans were 1777. were fo near as to difcover every movement, and by means of their bridge could bring their whole force to operate.

> Truly diftreffing was the condition of the royal army. Abandoned in the most critical moment by their Indian allies---unfupported by their brethren in New-York--weakened by the timidity and defertion of the Canadians ---worn down by a feries of inceffant efforts, and greatly reduced in their numbers by repeated battles, they were invefted by an army nearly three times their number, without a poffibility of retreat, or of replenishing their exhausted stock of provisions. A continual cannonade pervaded their camp, and rifle and grape shot fell in many parts of their lines. They nevertheless retained a great store of fortitude.

> In the mean time the American army was hourly increafing. Volunteers came in from all quarters, eager to fhare in the glory of deftroying or capturing those whom they confidered as their most dangerous enemies. The 13th of October at length arrived. The day was spent in anxious expectation of its producing fomething of confequence. But as no prospect of assistance appeared, and their provisions were nearly expended, the hope of receiving any in due time for their relief, could not reafonably be further indulged. General Burgoyne thought proper in the evening, to take an account of the provisions left. It was found on enquiry, that they would amount to no more than a fcanty fubfiftence for three days. In this state of distrefs, a council of war was called, and it was made fo general, as to comprehend both the field officers and the captains. Their unanimous opinion was, that their present fituation justified a capitulation on honourable terms. A meffenger was therefore difpatched to begin this bufinefs. General Gates in the first instance demanded, that the royal army fhould furrender prifoners of war. 'He also proposed that the British should ground their arms. But general Burgoyne replied, " This article is inadmiffible in every extremity ;---fooner than this army will confent to ground their arms in their encampment, they will rush on the enemy, determined to take no quarter." After various meffages, a convention was fettled, by

by which it was fubftantially ftipulated as follows: The troops under general Burgoyne, to march out of their camp with the honours of war, and the artillery of the intrenchments to the verge of the river, where the arms and artillery are to be left. The arms to be piled by word of command from their own officers. A free paffage to be granted to the army under lieutenant general Burgovne to Great-Britain, upon condition of not ferving again in North-America during the prefent contest, and the port of Bofton to be affigned for the entry of the transports to receive the troops whenever general Howe shall to order. The army under lieutenant general Burgoyne to march to Maffachufetts-Bay, by the eafieft route, and to be quartered in, near, or as convenient as poffible, to Bofton. The troops to be provided with provision by general Gates' orders, at the fame rate of rations as the troops of his own army. All officers to retain their carriages, bat-horfes, and no baggage to be molefted or fearched. The officers are not, as far as circumftances will admit, to be feparated from their men. The officers to be quartered according to their rank. All corps whatever of lieutenant general Burgoyne's army, to be included in the above articles. All Canadians, and perfons belonging to the Canadian eftablishment, and other followers of the army, to be permitted to return to Canada--to be conducted to the first British post on Lake George, and to be fupplied with provisions as the other troops, and to be bound by the fame condition of not ferving during the prefent contest. Passports to be granted to three officers, to carry defpatches to Sir William Howe --- Sir Guy Carleton, and to Great-Britain. The officers to be admitted on their parole, and to be permitted to wear their fide arms." Such were the embarraffments of the royal army, incapable of fubfifting where it was, or of making its way to a better fituation, that thefe terms were rather more favourable than they had a right to expect. On the other hand it would not have been prudent for the American general at the head of his army, which, though numerous, confifted mostly of militia or new levies, to have provoked the despair of even an inferior number of brave brave difciplined regular troops. General Gates rightly 1777. judged that the best way to fecure his advantages was to use them with moderation. Soon after the convention was figued, the Americans marched into their lines, and were kept there till the royal army had deposited their arms at the place appointed. The delicacy with which this bufinefs was conducted, reflected the higheft honour on the American general. Nor did the politeness of Gates end here. Every circumftance was withheld, that could conftitute a triumph in the American army. The captive general was received by his conqueror with refpect and kindnefs. A number of the principal officers of both armies, met at general Gates' quarters, and for a while, feemed to forget in focial and convivial pleafures, that they had been enemies. The conduct of general Burgoyne in this interview with general Gates was truly dignified, and the hiftorian is at a lofs whether to admire most, the magnanimity of the victorious, or the fortitude of the vanquifhed general.

> The British troops partook liberally of the plenty that reigned in the American army. It was the more acceptable to them, as they were defitute of bread and flour, and had only as much meat left, as was fufficient for a days fubfiftance.

> By the convention which has been mentioned, 5790 men were furrendered prifoners. The fick and wounded left in camp, when the British retreated to Saratoga, together with the numbers of the British, German and Canadian troops, who were killed, wounded or taken, and who had deferted in the preceding part of the expedition, were reckoned to be 4689. The whole royal force, exclufive of Indians, was probably about 10,000. The ftores which the Americans acquired, were confiderable. The captured artillery confifted of 35 brafs field pieces. There were alfo 4647 mulkets, and a variety of other ufeful and much wanted articles, which fell into their hands. The continentals in general Gates' army were 9093, the militia 4129, but of the former 2103 were fick or on furlough, and 562 of the latter were in the fame fituation. The number of militia was conftantly fluctuating.

The

The general exultation of the Americans, on receiving the agreeable intelligence of the convention of Saratoga, difarmed them of much of their refentment. The burnings and devastations which had taken place were fufficient to have inflamed their minds, but private feelings were in a great measure absorbed by a confideration of the many advantages, which the capture of fo large an army promifed to the new formed ftates.

In a fhort time after the convention was figned, general Gates moved forward to ftop the devaftations of the British on the North-River, but on hearing of the fate of Burgoyne, Vaughan and Wallace retired to New-York.

About the fame time the British, which had been left in the rear of the royal army, destroyed their cannon, and abandoning Ticonderoga, retreated to Canada. The whole country, after experiencing for feveral months the confusions of war, was in a moment restored to perfect tranquility.

Great was the grief and dejection in Britain, on receiving the intelligence of the fate of Burgoyne. The expedition committed to him had been undertaken with the most confident hopes of fucces. The quality of the troops he commanded, was such, that from their bravery, directed by his zeal, talents and courage, it was prefumed that all the northern parts of the United States would be fubdued before the end of the campaign. The good fortune which for fome time followed him justified these expectations, but the catastrophe proved the folly of planning diftant expeditions, and of projecting remote conquests.

The confequences of thefe great events, vibrated round the world. The capture of Burgoyne was the hinge on which the revolution turned. While it encouraged the perfeverance of the Americans by well grounded hopes of final fuccefs, it encreafed the embarrafsments of that miniftry, which had fo ineffectually laboured to compel their fubmiffion. Oppofition to their meafures gathered new ftrength, and formed a flumbling block in the road to conqueft. This prevented Great-Britain from actingwith that collected force which an union of fentiments and 1777. and councils would have enabled her to do. Hitherto the beft informed Americans had doubts of fuccefs in eftablifhing their independence, but henceforward their language was, "That whatever might be the event of their prefent ftruggle, they were forever loft to Great-Britain." Nor were they deceived. The eclat of capturing a large army of British and German regular troops, foon procured them powerful friends in Europe.

"Immediately after the furrender of the troops, commanded by lieutenant general Burgoyne, they were marched to the vicinity of Bofton. 'On their arrival they were quartered in the barracks on Winter and Prospect hills. The general court of Maflachufetts paffed proper refolutions for procuring fuitable accommodations for the prifoners ; but from the general unwillingness of the people to oblige them, and from the feebleness of that authority which the republican rulers had at that time over the property of their fellow citizens, it was impoffible to provide immediately for fo large a number of officers and foldiers, in fuch a manner as their convenience required, or as from the articles of convention they might reafonably expect. The officers remonstrated to general Burgoyne, that fix or feven of them were crouded together in one room, without any regard to their respective ranks, in violation of the 7th article of the convention. General Burgoyne, on the 14th of November forwarded this account to general Gates, and added, " the public faith is broken." This letter being laid before Congress, gave an alarm. It corroborated an apprehention, previoufly entertained that the captured troops on their embarkation would make a junction with the British garrifons in America. The declaration of the general, that " the public faith was broken" while in the power of Congress, was confidered by them as deftroying the fecurity which they before had in his perfonal honour, for in every event he might adduce his previous notice to justify his future conduct. They therefore refolved, " That the embarkation of lieutenant general Burgoyne, and the troops under his command, be postponed, till a diffinct and explicit ratification of the convention of Saratoga be properly notified by

by the court of Great-Britain to Congress." General 1777. Burgoyne explained the intention and construction of the paffage objected to in his letter, and pledged himfelf, that his officers would 'join with him in figning any inftrument that might be thought neceffary for confirming the convention, but Congress would not recede from their refolution. They alledged, that it had been often afferted by their adverfaries that " faith was not to be kept with rebels," and that therefore they would be deficient in attention to the interests of their constituents, if they did not require an authentic ratification of the convention by national authority, before they parted with the captured troops. They urged farther, that by the law of nations, a compact broken in one article, was no longer binding in any other. They made a deftinction between the fufpenfion and abrogation of the convention, and alledged that ground to fuspect an intention to violate it, was a juftifying reafon for fuspending its execution on their part, till it was properly ratified. The defired ratification if Great-Britain was ferioufly disposed to that measure, might have been obtained in a few months, and Congrefs uniformly declared themfelves willing to carry it into full effect, as foon as they were fecured of its obfervance by proper authority on the other fide.

About eight months after certain royal commissioners, whose official functions shall be hereafter explained, made a requisition respecting these troops---offered to ratify the convention, and required permission for their embarkation. On enquiry it was found, that they had no authority to do any thing in the matter which would be obligatory on Great-Britain. Congress therefore resolved, "that no ratification of the convention, which may be tendered in confequence of powers, which only reach that case by construction and implication, or which may fubject whatever is transacted relative to it, to the future approbation or disapprobation of the parliament of Great-Britain, can be accepted by Congress."

Till the capture of Burgoyne the powers of Europe were only fpectators of the war between Great-Britain and her late colonies, but foon after that event they were Vol. II. H 57

The letters, addreffes, and other public acts of Congrefs, were admired by many who had no perfonal intereft in the conteft. Liberty is fo evidently the undoubted right of mankind, that even they who never posseffed it feel the propriety of contending for it, and whenever a people take up arms either to defend or to recover it, they are fure of meeting with encouragement or good wifnes from the friends of humanity in every part of the world.

From the operation of these principles, the Americans had the efteem and good wifnes of multitudes in all parts of Europe. They were reputed to be ill ufed, and were reprefented as a refolute and brave people, determined to refist oppreffion. Being both pitied and applauded, generous and sympathetic fentiments were excited in their favour. These circumstances would have operated in every cafe, but in the present, the cause of the Americans was patronised from additional motives. An universal jealoufy prevoiled against Great-Britain. Her navy had long tyranifed over the nations of Europe, and demanded as a matter of right that the fhips of all other powers should strike their fails to her, as mistress of the ocean. From her eagerness to prevent fupplies going to her rebellious colonists, as the called the Americans, the veffels of foreign powers had for fome time past been subjected to fearches and other interruptions, when fteering towards America, in a manner that could not but be impatiently born by independent nations. That pride and infolence which brought on the American war, had long difgufted her neighbours, and made them rejoice at her misfortunes, and efpecially at the profpect of difmembering her overgrown empire.

C H A P. XVI.

The Alliance between France and the United States. The Campaign of 1778.

COON after intelligence of the capture of Burgoyne's army reached Europe, the court of France concluded at Paris, treaties of alliance and commerce with the United States. The circumftances which led to this great event, deferve to be particularly unfolded. The colonifts having taken up arms, uninfluenced by the enemies of Great-Britain, conducted their opposition for feveral months after they had raifed troops, and emitted money, without any reference to foreign powers. They knew it to be the interest of Europe, to promote a separation between Great-Britain and her colonies, but as they began the contest with no other view than to obtain a redrefs of grievances, they neither wifhed in the first period of their opposition to involve Great-Britain in a war, nor to procure aid to themfelves by paying court to her enemies. The policy of Great-Britain in attempting to depeive the Americans of arms, was the first event which made it neceffary for them to feek foreign connexions. At the time the was urging military preparations to compel their fubmission, she forbad the exportation of arms, and folicited the commercial powers of Europe, to co-operate with her by adopting a fimilar prohibition. To frustrate the views of Great-Britain Congress, besides recommending the domeftic manufacture of the materials for military ftores, appointed a fecret committee with powers to procure on their account arms and ammunition, and alfo employed agents in foreign countries for the fame purpofe. The evident advantage which France might derive from the continuance of the difpute and the countenance which individuals of that country daily gave to the Americans, encouraged Congress to fend a political and commercial agent to that kingdom, with inftructions to folicit its friendship, and to procure military stores. Silas Deane, being chosen for this purpose, failed for France early in 1776, and was foon after his arrival at Paris instructed to found count de Vergennes, the French minister for foreign 1773. foreign affairs, on the fubject of the American controverfy. As the public mind, for reafons which have been mentioned, clofed againft Great-Britain, it opened towards other nations.

> On the 11th of June 1776, Congrefs appointed a committee, to prepare a plan of a treaty to be proposed to foreign powers. The difcussion of this novel subject engaged their attention till the latter end of September. While Congrefs was deliberating thereon, Mr. Deane was foliciting a supply of arms, ammunition and foldiers cloathing, for their fervice. A sufficiency for lading three veffels was soon procured. What agency the government of France had in furnishing these fupplies, or whether they were fold or given as prefents, are questions which have been often asked, but not fatisfactorily answered, for the business was so conducted that the transaction might be made to assume a variety of complexions, as circumftances might render expedient.

It was most evidently the interest of France to encourage the Americans in their opposition to Great Britain, and it was true policy to do this by degrees and in a private manner, left Great-Britain might take the alarm. Individuals are fometimes influenced by confiderations of friendship and generosity, but interest is the pole star by which nations are universally governed. It is certain that Great-Britain was amufed with declarations of the most pacific dispositions on the part of France, at the time the Americans were liberally supplied with the means of defence, and it is equally certain, that this was the true line of policy for promoting that dismemberment of the British empire which France had an interest in accomplishing.

Congrefs knew, that a diminution of the overgrown power of Britain, could not but be defirable to France. Sore with the lofs of her poffeffions on the continent of North-America by the peace of Paris in the year 1763, and alfo by the capture of many thoufands of her failors in 1755, antecedent to a declaration of war, fhe muft have been fomething more than human, not to have rejoiced at an opportunity of depreffing an antient and formidable midable rival. Befides the increasing naval fuperiority of 1778. Great-Britain, her vaft refources, not only in her antient dominions, but in colonies growing daily in numbers and wealth, added to the haughtiness of her flag, made her the object both of terror and envy. It was the interest of Congress to apply to the court of France, and it was the interest of France to listen to their application.

. Congress having agreed on the plan of the treaty, which they intended to propofe to his Moft Chriftian Majefty, proceeded to elect commissioners to folicit its acceptance. Dr. Franklin, Silas Deane, and Thomas Jefferfon were chofen. The latter declining to ferve, Arthur Lee, who was then in London, and had been very ferviceable to his country in a variety of ways, was elected in his room. It was refolved, that no member should be at liberty to divulge any thing more of thefe transactions than "that Congress had taken fuch steps as they judged neceffary for obtaining foreign alliances" The fecret committee were directed to make an effectual lodgement in France of ten thousand pounds sterling, subject to the order of these commissioners. Dr. Franklin, who was employed as agent in the bufinefs, and afterwards as minifter plenipotentiary at the court of France, was in poffeffion of a greater proportion of foreign fame, than any other native of America. By the dint of fuperior abilities, and with but few advantages in early life, he had attained the higheft eminence among men of learning, and in many inftances extended the empire of fcience. His genius was vaft and comprehensive, and with equal eafe inveftigate the mysteries of philosophy and the labyrinths of politics. His fame as a philosopher had reached as far as human nature is polifhed or refined. His philanthropy knew no bounds. The prosperity and happiness of the human race were objects which at all times had attracted his attention. Difgusted with great Britain, and glowing with the most ardent love for the liberties of his oppreffed native country, he left London, where he had refided fome years in the character of agent for feveral of the colonies, and early in 1775 returned to Philadelphia,

- 1778. phia, and immediately afterwards was elected by the legiflature of Pennfylvania, to fhare in the oppofition to Great-Britain as a member of Congress. Shortly after
- Oct. 27. his appointment to folicit the interests of Congress in France, he failed for that country. He was no fooner
- Dec. 13. landed than univerfally carreffed. His fame had fmoothed the way for his reception in a public character. Doctor Franklin, Silas Deane, and Arthur Lee, having rendezvoufed at Paris, foon after opened their bufinefs in a pri-
 - 23. vate audience with count de Vergennes. The Congress could not have applied to the court of France under more favourable circumftances. The throne was filled by a prince in the flower of his age, and animated with the defire of rendering his reign illustrious. Count de Vergennes was not less remarkable for extensive political knowledge, than for true greatnefs of mind. He had grown old in the habits of government, and was convinced that conquests are neither the furest nor the shortest way to fubstantial fame. He knew full well that no fuccels in war, however brilliant, could fo effectually promote the fecurity of France, as the emancipation of the colonies of her ancient rival. He had the fuperior wifdom to difcern, that there were no prefent advantages to be obtained by unequal terms, that would compenfate for those lasting benefits which were likely to flow from a kind and generous beginning. Instead of grasping at too much, or taking any advantages of the humble fituation of the invaded colonies, he aimed at nothing more than by kind, and generous terms to a diffreffed country, to perpetuate the feparation which had already taken place between the component parts of an empire, from the union of which his fovereign had much to fear.

Truly difficult was the line of conduct, which the real intereft of the nation required of the minifters of His Moft Chriftian Majefty. An haughty referve would have difcouraged the Americans. An open reception, or even a legal countenance of their deputies might have alarmed the rulers of Great-Britain, and difpofed them to a compromife with their colonies, or have brought on an immediate rupture between France and England. A middle dle line as preferable to either, was therefore purfued. 1778. Whilft the French government prohibited, threatened and even punished the Americans; private perfons encouraged, fupplied, and fupported them. Prudence, as well as policy required, that France fhould not be overhafty in openly espousing their cause. She was by no means fit for war. From the ftate of her navy, and the condition of her foreign trade, the was vulnerable on every fide. Her trading people dreaded the thoughts of a war with Great-Britain, as they would thereby be exposed to great loffes. Thefe confiderations were ftrengthened from another quarter. The peace of Europe was fuppofed to beunstable from a prevailing belief, that the fpeedy death of the elector of Bavaria was an event extremely probable. But the principle reafon which induced a delay, was an opinion, that the difpute between the Mother Country and the colonies would be compromifed. Within the 13 years immediately preceding, twice had the conteffed claims of the two countries brought matters to the verge of extremity. Twice had the guardian genius of both interpofed, and reunited them in the bonds of love and affection. It was feared by the fagacious ministry of France, that the prefent rupture would terminate in the fame manner. These wife observers of human nature apprehended, that their too early interference would fayour a reconciliation, and that the reconciled parties would direct their united force against the French, as the disturbers of their domestic tranquility. It had not yet entered into the hearts of the French nation, that it was poffible for the British American colonists, to join with their antient enemies against their late friends.

At this period Congrefs did not fo much expect any direct aid from France, as the indirect relief of a war between that country and Great-Britain. To fubferve this defign, they refolved, that " their commiffioners at the court of France should be furnished with warrants and commiffions, and authorifed to arm and fit for war in the French ports any number of vessels (not exceeding fix) at the expence of the United States, to war upon British property, provided they were fatisfied this measure would not 1778. not be difagreeable to the court of France." This refolution was carried into effect, and in the year 1777 marine officers, with American commiftions, both failed out of French ports, and carried prizes of British property into them. They could not procure their condemnation in the courts of France, nor fell them publicly, but they nevertheless found ways and means to turn them into money. The commanders of these vessels were fometimes punished by authority to please the English, but they were oftener careffed from another quarter to please the Americans."

While private agents on the part of the United States were endeavouring to embroil the two nations, the American commiffioners were urging the ministers of His Most Chriftian Majefty to accept the treaty propofed by Congrefs. They received affurances of the good wifhes of the court of France, but were from time to time informed, that the important transaction required farther confideration, and were enjoined to obferve the most profound fecrecy. Matters remained in this fluctuating ftate from December 1776, till December 1777. Private encouragement and public difcountenance were alternated, but both varied according to the complexion of news from America. 'The defeat on Long-Ifland, the reduction of New-York, and the train of difastrous events in 1776, which have already been mentioned, funk the credit of the Americans very low, and abated much of the national ardor for their fupport. Their fublequent fucceffes at Trenton and Princeton, effaced thefe impressions, and rekindled active zeal in their behalf. The capture of Burgoyne fixed thefe wavering politics. The fuccefs of the Americans in the campaign of 1777, placed them on high ground. Their enmity had proved itfelf formidable to Britain, and their friendship became defirable to France. Having helped themfelves, they found it less difficult to obtain help from others. The fame intereft, which hitherto had directed the court of France to a temporifing policy, now required decifive conduct. Previous delay had favoured the difmemberment of the empire, but farther procrastination bid fair to promote, at leaft fuch a fæderal alliance of the disjointed disjointed parts of the British Empire as would be no 17,78. lefs hoftile to the intereits of France than a re-union of its fevered parts. The news of the capitulation of Saratoga reached France, very early in December, 1777. The American deputies took that opportunity to prefs for an acceptance of the treaty, which had been under confideration for the preceding twelve months. The capture of Burgoyne's army convinced the French, that the opposition of the Americans to Great Britain was not the work of a few men who had got power in their hands, but of the great body of the people, and was like to be finally fuccessful. It was therefore determined to take them by the hand, and publicly to efpouse their caufe. The commissioners of Congress were informed by Mr. Gerard one of the fecretaries of the King's coun- Dec. 16. cil of State, "that it was decided to acknowledge the independence of the United States and to make a treaty with them. That in the treaty no advantage would be taken of their fituation to obtain terms which, otherwife, it would not be convenient for them to agree to. That his Most Christian Majesty defired the treaty once made should be durable, and their amity to subfift forever. which could not be expected, if each nation did not find an interest in its continuance, as well as in its commencement. It was therefore intended that the terms of the treaty fhould be fuch as the new formed states would be willing to agree to if they had been long fince established. and in the fulnefs of ftrength and power; and fuch as they should approve of when that time should come. That his most Christian Majesty was fixed in his determination not only to acknowledge, but to fupport, their independence. That in doing this he might probably foon be engaged in a war, yet he fhould not expect any compenfation from the United States on that account, nor was it pretended that he acted wholly for their fakes. fince befides his real good will to them, it was manifeftly the interest of France, that the power of England should be diminished, by the separation of the colonies from its government. The only condition he fhould require and rely on would be, that the United States in no peace to be-made, fhould give up their independence and return to the obedience of the British government." At any time previously to the 16th of December, 1777, when Mr. Gerard made the foregoing declaration, it was in the power of the British ministry to have ended the American war, and to have established an alliance with the United States, that would have been of great service to both; but from the same haughtines which for some time had predominated in their councils, and blinded them to their interests, they neglected to improve the favourable opportunity.

Conformably to the preliminaries propoled by Mr. Gerard, his most Christian Majesty Lewis the 16th, on the 6th of February 1778, entered into treaties of amity and commerce, and of alliance with the United States, on the footing of the most perfect equality and reciprocity. By the latter of these, that illustrious monarch became the guarantee of their fovereignty, independence and commerce.

On a review of the conduct of the French minifiry, to the Americans, the former appear to have acted uniformly from a wife regard to national intereft. Any, line of conduct, different from that which they adopted, might have overfet the measures which they wished to establish. Had they pretended to act from difinterested principles of generofity to the diffrested, the known felfishness of human nature would have contradicted the extravagant pretension. By avowing the real motive of their conduct they furnished fuch a proof of candor as begat confidence.

The terms of reciprocity on which they contracted with the United States were no lefs recommended by wife policy than dictated by true magnanimity. As there was nothing exclusive in the treaty, an opening was left for Great Britain to clofe the war when the pleafed, with all the advantages for future commerce that France had ftipulated for herfelf. This judicious measure made the establishment of American independence the common caufe of all the commercial powers of Europe, for the question then was, whether the trade of the United States should by the fubverfion of their independence be again monopolifed by Great Britain, or by the eftablishment of it, laid open on equal terms to all the world.

In national events the public attention is generally fixed on the movements of armies and fleets. Mankind never fail to do homage to the able general and expert admiral. To this they are justly entitled, but as great a tribute is que to the statesman who, from a more elevated station, determines on measures in which the general fafety and welfare of empires are involved. This glory in a particular manner belongs to the Count de Vergennes, who, as his most Christian Majesty's minister for foreign affairs, conducted the conferences which terminated in these treaties. While the ministers of his Britanic Majefty were pleafing themfelves with the flattering idea of permanent peace in Europe, they were not leis furprifed than provoked by hearing of the alliance, which had taken place between his moft Chriftian Majefty, and the United States. This event though often foretold was difbelieved. The zeal of the British miniftry to reduce the colonies to fubmiffion, blinded them to danger from every other quarter. Forgetting that intereft governs public bodies perhaps more than private perfons, they fupposed that feebler motives would outweigh its all commanding influence Intent on carrying into execution the object of their withes, they fancied that becaufe France and Spain had colonies of their own, they would refrain from aiding or abetting the revolted British colonifts, from the fear of establishing a precedent, which at a future day might operate against themselves. Transported with indignation against their late fellow fubjects, they were fo infatuated with the American war, as to suppose that triffing evils, both diftant and uncertain, would induce the court of France to neglect an opportunity of fecuring great and immediate advantages.

How far this interference of the court of France can be justified by the laws of nations, it is not the province of history to decide. Measures of this kind are not determined by abstract reasoning. The present feelings of a nation, and the probable confequences of loss or gain influence more than the decisions of speculative men. Suffice

1778. fice it to mention, that the French exculpated themfelves from the heavy charges brought against them, by this fummary mode of reafoning, "We have found" faid they "the late colonies of Great Britain in actual polfeflion of Independence, and in the excrcise of the prerogatives of fovereignty. It is not our bufinefs to enquire, whether they had, or had not, fufficient reafon to withdraw themfelves from the government of Great Britain, and to erect an independent one of their own. We are to conduct towards nations, agreeably to the political flate in which we find them, without inveftigating how they acquired it. Observing them to be independent in fact, we were bound to fuppofe they were fo of right, and had the fame liberty to make treaties with them as with any other fovereign power." They also alleged, that Great Britain could not complain of their interference, fince fhe had fet them the example only a few years before, in fupporting the Corficans in opposition to the court of France. They had befides many well founded complaints against the British, whose armed vessels had for months past haraffed their commerce, on the idea of preventing an illicit trade with the revolted colonies.

> The marquis de la Fayette, whofe letters to France had a confiderable fhare in reconciling the nation to patronife the United States, was among the first in the American army who received the welcome tidings of the treaty. In a transport of joy, mingled with an effusion of tears, he embraced general Washington exclaiming "The king my master has acknowledged your Independence, and entered into an alliance with you for its eftablishment." The heart-felt joy, which fpread from breaft to breaft, exceeded defcription. The feveral brigades affembled by order of the commander in chief. Their chaplains offered up public thanks to Almighty God, and delivered difcourfes suitable to the occasion. A feu de joie was fired, and on a proper fignal being given, the air refounded with "Long live the king of France," poured forth from the breast of every private in the army. The Americans, having in their own ftrength for three years weathered the ftorms of war, fancied the port of peace to be in full view view. Replete with the fanguine hopes of vigorous youth, 1778. they prefumed that Britain, whofe northern army had been reduced by their fole exertions, would not continue the unequal contest with the combined force of France and America. Overvaluing their own importance, and undervaluing the refources of their adverfaries, they were tempted to indulge a dangerous confidence. That they might not be lulled into carelessnes, Congress made an animated addrefs to them, in which, after reviewing the leading features of the war, they informed them "They must yet expect a severe conflict; that though foreign alliances fecured their independence, they could not fecure their country from devastation." -- The alliance between France and America had not been concluded three days, before it was known to the British ministry, and in less than five weeks more, it was officially communicated to the court of London in a refeript, delivered by the French ambaffador, to lord Weymouth. In this new fituation of affairs, there were fome in Great Britain who advocated the measure of peace with America, on the footing of Independence: But the point of honor, which had before precipitated the nation into the war, predominated over the voice of prudence and intereft. The king and parliament of Great Britain refolved to punish the French nation for treating with their fubjects, which they termed " An unprovoked aggreffion on the honor of the crown, and effential interefts of the kingdom." And at the fame time a vain hope was indulged, that the alliance between France and the United States, which was supposed to have originated in paffion, might be diffolved. The national prejudices against the French, had been fo instilled into the minds of Englishmen, and of their American descendants, that it was supposed practicable, by negotiations and conceffions, to detatch the United States from their new alliance, and re-unite them to the parent state. Eleven days after the treaty between France and America had been Feb. 17. concluded, the British minister introduced into the house of commons a project for conciliation, founded on the idea of obtaining a re-union of the new States with Great Britain. This confifted of two bills, with the following titles, 1778. titles, "A bill for declaring the intention of Great Britain, concerning the exercise of the right of imposing Sin taxes within his Majefty's colonies, provinces and plantations, in North America," and a bill to" enable his Majefty to appoint commissioners with fufficient powers, to treat, confult and agree, upon the means of quieting the diforders now fubfifting in certain of the colonics, plantations and provinces of North America." Thefe bills were hurried through both houses of Parliament, and before they paffed into acts, were copied and fent acrofs the Atlantic, to lord and general Howe. On their arrival in America, they were fent by a flag to Congress at Yorktown. When they were received, Congress was uninformed of the treaty which their commissioners had lately April concluded at Paris. For upwards of a year, they had 21. not received one line of information from them on any fubject whatever. One packet had in that time been received, but all the letters therein were taken out before it was put on board the veffel which brought it from France, and blank paper put in their ftead. A committe of Congrefs was appointed to examine thefe bills, and report on them. Their report was brought in the day following, and was unanimoufly adopted. By this they rejected the propofals of Great Britain. The vigorous and firm language in which Congress expressed their rejection of these offers, confidered in connection with the circumftance of their being wholly ignorant of the late treaty with France, exhibits the glowing ferenity of fortitude. While the royal commissioners were industriously circulating thefe bills in a partial and fecret manner, as if they fufpected an intention of concealing them from the common people, Congress trufting to the good fense of their constiquents, ordered them to be forthwith printed for the public information. Having directed the affairs of their country with an honeft reference to its welfare, they had nothing to fear from the people knowing and judging for themfelves. They fubmitted the whole to the public. Their act, after fome general remarks on the bill, concluded as follows,

From

"From all which it appears evident to your committee, that the faid bills are intended to operate upon the hopes and fears of the good people of thefe flates, fo as to create divisions among them, and a defection from the common caufe, now, by the bleffing of Divine Providence, drawing near to a favourable iffue: That they are the fequel of that infidious plan, which, from the days of the flampact, down to the prefent time, hath involved this country in contention and bloodthed. And that, as in other cafes fo in this, although circumflances may force them at times to recede from their unjuftifiable claims, there can be no doubt but they will, as heretofore, upon the firft favourable occation, again difplay that luft of domination, which hath rent in twain the mighty empire of Britain.

Upon the whole matter; the committee beg leave to report it as their opinion, that as the Americans united in this arduous conteft upon principles of common intereft, for the defence of common rights and privileges, which union hath been cemented by common calamities, and by mutual good offices and affection, fo the great caufe for which they contend, and in which all mankind are interefted, muft derive its fuccefs from the continuance of that union. Wherefore any man or body of men, who fhould prefume to make any feparate or partial convention or agreement with commificients under the crown of Great-Britain, or any of them, ought to be confidered and treated as open and avowed enemies of thefe United States.

And further, your committee beg leave to report it as their opinion, that these United States cannot, with propriety, hold any conference with any commissioners on the part of Great-Britain, unless they shall, as a preliminary thereto, either withdraw their fleets and armies, or elfe, in positive and express terms, acknowledge the independence of the said states:

And in as much as it appears to be the defign of the enemies of thefe flates to lull them into a fatal fecurity---to the end that they may act with a becoming weight and importance, it is the opinion of your committee, that the feveral flates be called upon to use the most fireneous exertions 1778. tions to have their refpective quotas of continental troops in the field as foon as poffible, and that all the militia of the 1 d flates be held in readinefs, to act as occasion may requise

The conclustory bills were fpeedily followed by royal committioners, deputed to folicit their reception. Gov. Johnnone, Lord Carlifle and Mr. Eden, appointed on this bufine's attempted to open a negotiation on the fubject. June. 9. They requested General Washington, to furnish a passport for their fecretary Dr. Ferguson, with a letter from them to Congres, but this was refused, and the refusal was unanimously approved by congres. They then forwarded in the usual channel of communication, a letter addressed "to his Excellency Henry Laurens, the president, and other the members of congres," in which they communicated a copy of their commission and of the acts of Parliament on which it was founded, and offered to concur in every fatisfactory and just arrangement towards the following among other purposes.

To confent to a ceffation of hostilities, both by fea and land.

To reftore free intercourfe, to revive mutual affection, and renew the common benefits of naturalization, through the feveral parts of this empire.

To extend every freedom to trade that our respective interests can require.

To agree that no military forces shall be kept up in the different states of North-America, without the consent of the general congress or particuliar assemblies.

To concur in measures calculated to discharge the debts of America, and to raise the credit and value of the paper circulation.

To perpetuate our union by a reciprocal deputation of an agent or agents from the different ftates, who fhall have the privilege of a feat and voice in the parliament of Great-Britain; or, if fent from Britain, in that cafe to have a feat and voice in the affemblies of the different ftates to which they may be deputed refpectively, in order to attend the feveral interefts of those by whom they are deputed.

In

In fhort, to establish the power of the respective legiflatures in each particular state, to settle its revenue, in civil and military eftablishment, and to exercise a perfect freedom of legiflation and internal government, fo that the British states throughout North-America, acting with us in peace and war under one common fovereign, may have the irrevocable enjoyment of every privilege, that is thort of a total feparation of interests, or confistent with that union of force, on which the fafety of our common religion and liberty depends.

A decided negative having been already given, previous to the arrival of the British commissioners, to the overtures contained in the conciliatory bills, and intelligence of the treaty with France having in the mean time arrived, there was no ground left for farther deliberation. Prefident Laurens therefore, by order of Congress, return- Jun. 17. ed the following answer.

I have received the letter from your excellencies of the oth inftant, with the enclosures, and laid them before Congrefs. Nothing but an earnest defire to spare the farther effusion of human blood could have induced them to read a paper, containing expressions fo disrespectful to his most Christian Majesty, the good and great ally of these states; or to consider propositions fo derogatory to the honour of an independent nation.

The acts of the British parliament, the commission from your fovereign, and your letter, fuppofe the people of these states to be subjects of the crown of Great-Britain, and are founded on the idea of dependence, which is utterly inadmissible.

I am further directed to inform your excellencies, that Congress are inclined to peace, notwithflanding the unjust claims from which this war originated, and the favage manner in which it hath been conducted. They will, therefore, be ready to enter upon the confideration of a treaty of peace and commerce, not inconfistent with treaties already fubfifting, when the King of Great-Britain shall demonstrate a fincere disposition for that purpose. The only folid proof of this difposition will be, an explicit acknowledgment of the independence of these frates, or the withdrawing his fleets and armies. Though

778. Though Congress could not, confistently with national honor, enter on a difcuffion of the terms proposed by the British commissioners, yet fome individuals of their body ably proved the propriety of rejecting them. Among these Governeur Morris, and W. H. Drayton, with great force of argument and poignancy of wit, justified the decisive measures adopted by their countrymen.

As the British plan for conciliation was wholly founded on the idea of the States returning to their allegiance, it was no fooner known than rejected. In addition to the facred ties of plighted faith and national engagements, the leaders in Congress and the legislative affemblies of America, had tafted the fweets of power and were in full poffeffion of . its bleffings, with a fair profpect of retaining them without any foreign control. The war having originated on the part of Great-Britain from a luft of power, had in its progrefs compelled the Americans in felf defence to affume and exercife its higheft prerogatives. The paffions of human nature which induced the former to claim power, operated no lefs forcibly with the latter, against the relinquifhment of it. After the colonies had declared themfelves independent ftates, had repeatedly pledged their honor to abide by that declaration had under the fmiles of heaven maintained it for three campaigns without foreign aid, after the greatest monarch in Europe, had entered into a treaty with them, and guarantied their independence: After all this to expect popular leaders in the enjoyment of power voluntarily to retire from the helm of government to the languid indifference of private life, and while they violated national faith, at the fame time to deprefs their country from the rank of fovereign flates to that of dependent provinces, was not more repugnant to univerfal experience, than to, the governing principles of the human heart. The high spirited ardor of citizens in the youthful vigor of honor and dignity, did not fo much as enquire whether greater political happinefs might be expected from clofing with the propofals of Great-Britain, or by adhering to their new allies. Honor forbad any balancing on the fubject, nor were its dictates difobeyed ... Though peace was defirable and the offers of Great Britain

Brithin fo liberal, that if proposed in due time, they 1778. would have been acceptable, yet for the Americans, after they had declared themselves independent, and at their own folicitation obtained the aid of France, to defert their new allics, and leave them exposed to British refentment incurred on their account, would have argued a total want of honor and gratitude. The folly of Great Britain in expecting such conduct from virtuous freemen, could only be exceeded by the baseness of America, had her citizens realifed that expectation.

These offers of conciliation in a great measure originated in an opinion that the Congress was supported by a faction, and that the great body of the people was hoftile to independence, and well disposed to re-unite with Great Britain. The latter of these affertious was true, till a certain period of the contest, but that period was elapsed. With their new fituation, new opinions and attachments had taken place. The political revolution of the government was lefs extraordinary than that of the file and manner of thinking in the United States. The independent American citizens faw with other eyes, and heard with other ears, than when they were in the condition of British fubjects. That parrownefs of fentiment, which prevailed in England towards France, no longer exifted among the Americans. The British commissioners unapprised of this real change in the public mind, expected to keep a hold on the citizens of the United States, by that illiberality which they inherited from their forefathers. Prefuming that the love of peace, and the ancient national antipathy to France, would counterbalance all other ties, they flattered themfelves that by perfeverance an impreffion favourable to Great Britain might yet be made on the mind of America. They therefore renewed their efforts to open a negociation with Congress, in a letter of the 11th of July. As they had been informed in answer to their preceding letter of the 10th of June, that an explicit acknowledgment of the independence of the United States, or a withdrawing of their fleets and armies must precede an entrance on the confideration of a treaty of peace, and as neither branch of this alternative had been complied 1778. complied with, it was refolved by Congress that no answer fhould be given to their reiterated application.

In addition to his public exertions as a commiffioner, Governor Johnstone endeavoured to obtain the objects on which he had been fent by opening a private correfpondence with fome of the members of Congress, and other Americans of influence. He in particular addreffed himfelf by letter to Henry Laurens. Joseph Reed, and Robert Morris. His letter to Henry Laurens, was in thefe words.

DEAR SIR,

I beg to transfer to my friend Dr. Ferguson, the private civilities which my friends Mr. Manning, and Mr. Ofwald, requeft in my behalf. He is a man of the utmost probity and of the highest esteem, in the republic of letters.

If you fhould follow the example of Britain, in the hour of her infolence and fend us back without a hearing, I shall hope from private friendship, that I may be permitted to fee the country, and the worthy characters fhe has exhibited to the world, upon making the request in any way you may point out." The following anfwer was ininiediately written.

York Town, June 14th, 1778.

DEAR SIR,

Yefterday I was honoured with your favour of the reth, and thank you for the transmission of those from my dear and worthy friends, Mr. Ofwald, and Mr. Manning. Had Dr. Ferguson been the bearer of these papers, I should have shewn that gentleman every degree of respect and attention, that times and circumstances admit of.

It is fir, for Great Britain to determine, whether, her commiffioners shall return unheard by the representatives of the United States, or revive a friendship with the citizens at large, and remain among us as long as they pleafe.

You are undoubtedly acquainted with the only terms upon which Congrefs can treat for accomplifning this good end, terms from which, although writing in a private character, character, I may venture to affert with great affurance, in they never will recede, even admitting the continuance of hoffile attempts, and that from the rage of war, the good people of thefe States, fhall be driven to commence a treaty weft-ward of yonder mountains. And permit me to add, Sir, as my humble opinion the true intereft of Great Britain, in the prefent advance of our conteft, will be found in confirming our independence.

Congrefs in no hour have been haughty, but to fuppofe that their minds are lefs firm in the prefent than they were, when, defitute of all foreign aid, even without expectation of an alliance---when, upon a day of general public fafting and humiliation in their houfe of worfhip, and in prefence of God, they refolved " to hold no conference or treaty with any commiffioners on the part of Great-Britain unlefs they fhall, as a preliminary thereto, either withdraw their fleets and armies, or in pofitive and exprefs terms acknowledge the independence of thefe States," would be irrational.

At a proper time, Sir, I shall think myself highly honoured by a personal attention, and by contributing to render every part of these frates agreeable to you; but until the basis of mutual confidence shall be established, I believe fir, neither former private friendship, nor any other confideration, can influence Congress to confent, that even Governor Johnstone, a gentleman who has been to defervedly esteemed in America shall see the country. I have but one voice, and that shall be against it. But iet me intreat you my dear fir, do not hence conclude that I am deficient in affection to my old friends, through whose kindness I have obtained the honor of the prefent correspondence, or that I am not with very great personal respect and esteem,

Sir,

Your most obedient,

And moft humble fervant, (Signed) HENRY LAURENS, Philadelphia.

The Honorable Geo. Johnstone, Efq.

77

In a letter to Joseph Reed of April the 11th, governor Johnstone faid, "The man who can be instrumental in bringing us all to act once more in harmony, and to unite together the various powers which this conteft has drawn forth, will deferve more from the king and people, from patriotifm, humanity, and all the tender ties that are affected by the quarrel and reconciliation, than ever was yet bestowed on human kind." On the 16th of June he wrote to Robert Morris, " I believe the men who have conducted the affairs of America incapable of being influenced by improper motives, but in all fuch tranfactions there is rifk, and I think, that whoever ventures flould be fecured, at the fame time that honor and emolument should naturally follow the fortune of those, who have feered the veffel in the ftorm, and brought her fafely to port. I think Washington and the Prefident have a right to every favour, that grateful nations can beflow, if they could once more unite our interest, and fpare the miferies and devastations of war."

June 21.

To Jofeph Reed, private information was communicated, that it had been intended by gov. Johnstone, to offer him, that in cafe of his exerting his abilities to promote a re-union of the two countries, if confiftent with his principles and judgment, ten thoufand pounds fterling, and any office in the colonies in his Majeîty's gift. To which Mr. Reed replied "I am not worth purchafing, but fuch as I am, the king of Great Britain is not rich enough to do it." Congress ordered all letters, received by members of Congress from Toly 9. any of the British commissioners, or their agents, or from any fubject of the king of Great Britain, of a public nature, to be laid before them. The above letters and information being communicated, Congress refolved "That the fame cannot but be confidered, as direct attempts to corrupt their integrity, and that it is incompatible with the honor of Congress, to hold any manner of correspondence or intercourse with the faid George Johnstone Eiquire, especially to negociate with him upon affairs in which the caufe of liberty is interested." Their determination,, with the reafons thereof, were expressed in in the form of a declaration, a copy of which was figned by the Prefident, and fent by a flag to the committioners at New-York. This was answered by governor Johnstone, by an angry publication, in which he denied or explained away, what had been alleged against him. Lord Carlifle, Sir Henry Clinton and Mr. Eden, denied their having any knowledge of the matter charged on governor Johnstone.

The commissioners failing in their attempts to negociate with Congress had no resource left, but to perfuade the inhabitants to adopt a line of conduct, counter to that of their reprefentatives. To this purpose they published a manifesto and proclamation, addressed to Congress, the affemblies, and all others the free inhabitants of the colonies, in which they observed. " The policy, as well as the benevolence of Great-Britain, have thus far checked the extremes of war, when they tended to diffrefs a people still confidered as our fellow-fubjects, and to defolate a country fhortly to become a fource of mutual advantage : But when that country professes the unnatural defign not only of eftranging herfelf from us, but of mortgaging herfelf and her refources to our enemies, the whole conteft is changed; and the queftion is, how far Great-Britain may, by every means in her power, deftroy or render ufelefs a connection contrived for her ruin, and for the aggrandizement of France. Under fuch circumstances the laws of felf-prefervation must direct the conduct of Great-Britain; and if the British colonies are to become an acceffion to France, will direct her to render that acceffion of as little avail as poffible to her enchy."

Congrefs upon being informed of the defign of the commiffioners to circulate thefe papers declared, that the agents employed to diffribute the manifeftoes and proclamation of the commiffioners, were not entitled to protection from a flag. They also recommended to the feveral flates to fecure and keep them in clofe custody, but that they might not appear to hood-wink their conflituents, they ordered the manifestoes and proclamation to be printed in the news-papers. The proposals of the commiffioners were not more favourably received by the peo-

1778. ple than they had been by Congrefs. In fome places the flags containing them were not received, but ordered inftantly do depart, in others they were received, and forwarded to Congrefs, as the only proper tribunal to take cognizance of them. In no one place, not immediately commanded by the Britifh army, was there any attempt to accept, or even to deliberate, on the propriety of clofing with the offers of Britain.

To deter the British from executing their threats of laying waste the country, Congress published to the world a refolation and manifesto in which they concluded October with these words.

"We, therefore, the Congress of the United States of America, do folemnly declare and proclaim, that if our enemies prefume to execute their threats, or perfift in their prefent career of barbarity, we will take fuch exemplary vengeance as shall deter others from a like conduct. We appeal to that God who fearcheth the hearts of men, for the rectitude of our intentions; and in his holy prefence we declare, that as we are not moved by any light and hafty fuggestions of anger and revenge, fo through every possible change of fortune we will adhere to this our determination."

This was the last effort of Great Britain, in the way of negotiation, to regain her colonies. It originated in folly, and ignorance of the real ftate of affairs in Ame-She had begun with wrong meafures, and had now rica. got into wrong time. Her conceffions, on this occasion, were an implied justification of the refistance of the colonifts. By offering to concede all that they at first asked for, the virtually acknowledged herfelf to have been the aggreffor in an unjust war. Nothing could be more favourable to the cementing of the friendship of the new allies, than this unfuccessful negociation. The flates had an opportunity of evincing the fincerity of their engagements, and France abundant reafon to believe that by preventing their being conquered, her favourite fcheme of leffening the power of Great Britain, would be fecured beyond the reach of accident.

After the termination of the campaign of 1777, the 1778. British army retired to winter quarters in Philadelphia, and the American army to Valley-Forge. The former enjoyed all the conveniencies which an opulent city afforded, while the latter not half cloathed, and more than once on the point of starving, were enduring the feverity of a cold winter in a hutted camp. It was well for them that the British made no attempt to disturb them, while in this deftitute condition.

The winter and fpring paffed away without any more remarkable events in either army, than a few fuccefsful excursions of parties from Philadelphia to the neighbouring country, for the purpose of bringing in supplies, or destroying property. In one of these, a party of the British proceeded to Bordenton, and there burned four ftore-houses full of useful commodities. Before they returned to Philadelphia, they burned two frigates, nine fhips, fix privateer floops, twenty three brigs, with a number of floops and fchooners.

Soon after, an excursion from Newport was made by 500 British and Hessians, under the command of lieut. col. Campbell. Thefe having landed in the night, marched next morning in two bodies, the one for War- May 25. ren, the other for the head of Kickemuet river. They deftroyed about 70 flat bottomed boats, and burned a quantity of pitch, tar and plank. They also fet fire to the meeting houfe at Warren, and feven dwelling houfes. At, Briftol they burned the church and 22 houfes. Several other houses were plundered, and women were ftripped of their fhoe-buckles, gold rings and handkerchiefs.

A French squadron, confisting of 12 ships of the line and 4 frigates, commanded by count D'Estaing, failed from Toulon for America, in about two months after the treaty had been agreed upon between the United States Apr. 13. and the king of France. After a passage of 87 days, July 9. the count arrived at the entrance of the Delaware. From an apprehension of fomething of this kind, and from the prospect of greater fecurity; it was resolved in Great Britain, forthwith to evacuate Philadelphia and to con-Vol. II. Τ. centrate

- 1778. centrate the royal force in the city and harbour of New-York. The commiffioners brought out the orders for this movement, but knew nothing of the matter. It had an unfriendly influence on their proposed negotiations, but it was indifpenfibly neceffary; for if the French fleet had blocked up the Delaware, and the Americans befieged Philadelphia, the escape of the British from either, would have been fcarcely possible.
- Jun. 18. The royal army paffed over the Delaware into New-Jerfey Gen. Wathington, having penetrated into their defign of evacuating Philadelphia, had previoufly detatched Gen. Maxwell's brigade, to co-operate with the Jerfey militia, in obstructing their progress, till time would be given for his army to overtake them. The British were incumbered with an enormous baggage, which, together with the impediments thrown in their way, greatly retarded their march. The American army having, in purfuit of the British, croffed the Delaware, fix hundred men were immediately detatched under col. Morgan, to reinforce Gen. Maxwell. Wathington halted his troops, when they had marched to the Jun. 24. vicinity of Princeton. The general officers in the American army, being afked by the commander in chief, "Will it be adviseable to hazard a general action?" anfwered in the negative, but recommended a detatchment of 1500 men, to be immediately fent, to act as occasion might ferve, on the enemy's left flank and rear. This was immediately forwarded under General Scott. When

Sir Henry Clinton had advanced to Allen-Town, he determined inftead of keeping the direct courfe towards Staten-Ifland, to draw towards the fea coaft and to pufa on towards Sandy-Hook. Gen. Wafhington on receivingintelligence that Sir Henry was proceeding in that direction towards Monmouth court-houfe, difpatched 1000 men under Gen. Wayne, and fent the Marquis de la Fayette to take command of the whole advanced corps, with orders to feize the first fair opportunity of attacking the enemy's rear. Gen. Lee who having been lately exchanged had joined the army, was offered this command, but he declined it, as he was in principle againft hazarding hazarding an attack. The whole army followed at a proper distance, for fupporting the advanced corps, and reached Cranberry the next morning. Sir Henry Clinton fenfible of the approach of the Americans, placed his grenadiers, light-infantry and chafeurs in his rear. and his baggage in his front. Gen. Washington increafed his advanced corps with two brigades, and fent Gen. Lee, who now wished for the command, to take charge of the whole, and followed with the main army to give it support. On the next morning orders were fent to Lee, to move on and attack, unlefs there thould be powerful reafons to the contrary. When Washington had marched about five miles to support the advanced corps, he found the whole of it retreating by Lee's orders, and without having made any opposition of confequence. Wathington rode up to Lee and proposed certain queftions to him, which implied cenfure. Lee answered with warmth and unfuitable language. The commander in chief ordered Col. Stewart's and Lieut, Col. Ramfay's battalions, to form on a piece of ground, which he judged fuitable for giving a check to the advancing enemy. Lee was then afked if he would command on that ground, to which he confented, and was ordered to take proper measures for checking the enemy, to which he replied, " your orders shall be obeyed, and I will not be the first " to leave the field." Walhington then rode to the main army, which was formed with the utmost expedition. A warm cannonade immediately commenced, between the British and American artillery, and a heavy firing between the advanced troops of the British army, and the two battalions which Gen. Washington had halted. Thefe ftood their ground, till they were intermixed with a part of the British army. Lieut. Col. Ramfay the commander of one of them, was wounded and taken prifoner. Gen. Lee continued till the last on the field of battle, and brought off the rear of the retreating troops.

The check the British received, gave time to make a difposition of the left wing, and fecond line of the American army in the wood, and on the eminence to which Lee was retreating. On this, fome cannon were placed by

by lord Sterling, who commanded the left wing, which, 1778. with the co-operation of fome parties of infantry, effectually ftopped the advance of the British in that quarter. Gen. Greene took a very advantageous polition, on the right of lord Sterling. The British attempted to turn the left flank of the Americans, but were repulsed. They also made a movement to the right, with as little fuccefs, for Greene with artillery difappointed their defign. Wayne advanced with a body of troops, and kept up fo fevere and well directed a fire, that the British were foon compelled to give way. They retired and took the polition, which Lee had before occupied. Washington refolved to attack them, and ordered Gen. Poor to move round upon their right, and Gen. Woodford to their left; but they could not get within reach, before it was dark. Thefe remained on the ground, which they had been directed to occupy during the night, with an intention of attacking early next morning, and the main body lay on their arms in the field to be ready for fupporting them. Gen. Wafhington reposed himself in his cloak, under a tree, in hopes of renewing the action the next day. But thefe hopes were frustrated: The British troops marched away in the night, in fuch filence, that Gen. Poor, though he lay very near them, knew nothing of their departure. They left behind them, four officers and about forty privates, all fo badly wounded, that they could not be removed. Their other wounded were carried off. The Britifh purfued their march without further interruption, Jun. 30. and foon reached the neighbourhood of Sandy-Hook, without the lofs of either their covering party or baggage. The American general declined all farther purfuit of the royalarmy, and foon after drew off his troops to the borders of the North river. The lofs of the Americans, in killed and > wounded, was about 250. The lofs of the royal army, inclusive of prifoners, was about 350. Lt. col. Monckton, one of the British flain, on account of his fingular merit, was univerfally lamented. Col. Bonner of Pennfylvania, and major Dickenson of Virginia, officers highly esteemed by their country, fell in this engagement. The emotions of the mind, added to fatigue in a very hot > > day,

day, brought on fuch a fatal fuppreffion of the vital powers, that fome of the Americans, and 59 of the Britifh, were found dead on the field of battle, without any marks of violence upon their bodies.

It is probable, that Washington intended to take no farther notice of Lee's conduct in the day of action, but the latter could not brook the expressions used by the former at their first meeting, and wrote him two passionate letters. This occasioned his being arrested, and brought to trial. The charges exhibited against him were-- 1st. For difobedience of orders, in not attacking the enemy on the 28th of June, agreeable to repeated instructions.

2dly. For mifbehaviour before the enemy, on the fame day, by making an unneceffary, diforderly and fhameful retreat.

3dly, For difrespect to the commander in chief in two letters. After a tedious hearing before a court-martial of which lord Sterling was prefident, Lee was found guilty and fentenced to be fuspended from any command in the armies of the United States, for the term of one year, but the fecond charge was foftened by the court martial, who in their award only found him guilty of mifbehaviour before the enemy, by making an unneceffary and in fome few inftances a diforderly retreat. Many were displeased with this fentence. They argued " that by the tenor of Lee's orders, it was fubmitted to his diferetion, whether to attack or not, and alfo, that the time and manner were to be determined by his own judgment. That at one time heintended to attack, but altered his opinion on apparently good grounds. That the propriety of an attack confidering the fuperiority of the British cavalry, and the opennels of the ground was very questionable. That though it might have distreffed the enemy's rear in the first inftance; it would probably have brought on a general action, before the advanced corps could have been fupported by the main body, which was fome miles in the rear." If faid they " Lee's judgment was against attacking the enemy, he could not be guilty of difobeying an order for that purpofe, which was fuspended on the condition of his own approbation of the measure." They also agreed that

1778. that a suspension from command, was not a sufficient pumithment for his crimes, if really guilty. They therefore inferred a prefumption of his innocence from the lenient fentence of his judges. Though there was a diverfity of opinions relative to the first and fecond charges, all were agreed in pronouncing him guilty of difrespect to the commander in chief. The Americans had formerly idolifed Gen. Lee, but some of them now went to the opposite extreme, and pronounced him treacherous or deficient in courage, though there was no foundation for either of these fuspicions. His temper was violent, and his impatience of fubordination had led him often to guarrel with those whom he was bound to respect and obey; but his courage and fidelity could not be queftioned:

> Soon after the battle of Monmouth, the American army took poft at the White-Plains, a few miles beyond Kingfbridge and the British though only a few miles difsant, did not moleft them. They remained in this pofition from an early day in July, till a late one in the autumn, and then the Americans retired to Middle-Brook in Jerfey, where they built themfelves huts in the fame manner as they had done at Valley-Forge.

. Immediately on the departure of the British from Philadelphia, Congrefs, after an absence of nine months, returned to the former feat of their deliberations. Soon. after their return, they were called upon, to give a pub-Aug. 6. lic audience to a Minister Plenipotentiary from the court. of France. The perfon appointed to this office, was M. Gerard, the fame who had been employed in the negotiations, antecedent to the treaty. The arrival and reception of a minister from France, made a ftrong impreflion on the minds of the Americans. They felt the weight and importance, to which they were rifen among nations. That the fame fpot, which in lefs than acentury, had been the refidence of favages, fhould become the theztre on which, the reprefentatives of a new, free and ci-; wilifed nation, gave a public audience to a minister Plenipotentiary, from one of the oldest and most powerful. kingdoms of Europe; afforded ample materials for philokophic contemplation. That in lefs than three years' from from the day, on which an answer was refused by Great 1778. Britain to the united supplications of the colonists, praying for peace, liberty and fastery, they should, as an independent people, be honored with the refidence of a minister from the court of France, exceeded the expectation of the most fanguine Americans. The patriots of the new world revolved in their minds these transactions, with heart-felt fatisfaction, while the devout were led to admire that Providence, which had, in fo short a space, stationed the United States among the powers of the earth, and clothed them in robes of Sovereignty.

The British had but barely completed the removal of their fleet and army, from the Delaware and Philadelphia to the harbour and city of New-York, when they received intelligence, that a French fleet was on the coaft of America. This was commanded by count D'Eftaing, and contifted of twelve thips of the line and three frigates. Among the former, one carried 90 guns, another 85 and fix 74 guns each. Their first object was the furprife of lord Howe's fleet in the Delaware, but they arrived too late. In naval hiftory, there are few more narrow escapes than that of the British fleet, on this occafion. It confifted only of fix 64 gun fhips, three of 50, and two of 40, with fome frigates and floops. Moft of these had been long on fervice, and were in a bad condition. Their force, when compared with that of the French fleet, was fo greatly inferior, that had the latter reached the mouth of the Delaware, in 75 days from its leaving Toulon, their capture, in the ordinary course of events, would have been inevitable. This ftroke was providentially prevented, by the various hinderances which retarded D'Estaing in his voyage to the term of 87, days, in the last eleven of which, lord Howe's fleet, not only quitted the Delaware, but reached the harbour of New-York. D'Eftaing, difappointed in his first scheme, purfued and appeared off Sandy-Hobk. American pi- July 11 lots of the first abilities, provided for the purpose, went on board his fleet. Among them were perfons, whofe circumftances placed them above the ordinary rank of pilcts.

The

1778. The fight of the French fleet raifed all the active paffions of their adverfaries. Transported with indignation against the French, for interfering in what they called a domeflic quarrel, the British displayed a spirit of zeal and bravery which could not be exceeded. A thousand volunteers were dispatched from their transports to man their fleet. The masters and mates of the merchantmen and traders at New-York, took their sput to fea in light veffels, to watch the motions of their enemies. The officers and privates of the British army, contended with for much cagerness to ferve on board the men of war as marines, that it became necessary to decide the point of honor by lot.

The French fleet came to anchor, and continued without the Hook for eleven days. During this time the British had the mortification of feeing the blockade of their fleet, and the capture of about 20 veffels under Englifh colours. On the 22d, the French fleet appeared under weigh. It was an anxious moment to the British. They fuppofed that Count D'Eftaing would force his way into the harbour, and that an engagement would be the confequence. Every thing with them was at ftake. Nothing lefs than deftruction or victory would have ended the conteft. If the first had been their lot, the vast fleet of transports and victuallers and the army must have fallen. The pilots on board the French fleet, declared it to be impoffible to carry the large fhips thereof over the bar, on account of their draught of water. D'Eftaing on that account and by the advice of Gen. Washington, left the Hook and failed for Newport. By his departure the-British had a fecond escape, for had he remained at the

July 22. British had a fecond cicape, for had he remained at the Hook but a few days longer, the fleet of admiral Byron muft have fallen into his hands. That officer had been fent out to relieve lord Howe who had folicited to be recalled, and the fleet under his command had been fent to reinforce that which had been previoufly on the coaft of America. Admiral Byron's fquadron had met with bad weather, and was feparated in different ftorms. It now arrived, fcattered, broken, fickly, difmafted difmasted or otherwise damaged. Within 8 days after the departure of the French fleet, the Renown, the Raisonable, the Centurion, and the Cornwall, arrived fingly at Sandy-Hook.

The next attempt of Count D'Estaing was against Rhode-Ifland, of which the British had been in poffestion fince December, 1776. A combined attack against it was projected, and it was agreed that Gen. Sullivan should command the American land forces. Such was the eagernefs of the people to co-operate with their new allies, and fo confident were they of fuccess, that fome thoufands of volunteers engaged in the fervice. The militia of Maffachusetts was under the command of Gen. Hancock. The royal troops on the ifland, having been lately reinforced, were about 6000. Sullivan's force was about 10,000. Lord Howe followed Count D'Eftaing, and came within fight of Rhode-Island, the day after the French fleet entered the harbour of New-Port. The British fleet exceeded the French in point of number, but was inferior with respect to effective force and weight of metal. On the appearance of lord Howe, the French admiral put out to fea with his whole fleet, to engage him. While the two commanders were exerting their naval fkill to gain respectively the advantages of position, a ftrong gale of wind came on which afterwards increased to a tempeft, and greatly damaged the thips on both fides. In this conflict of the elements, two capital French. ships were difinasted. The Languedoc of 90 guns, D'Eftaing's own thip, after lofing all her mafts and her rudder, was attacked by the Renown of 50 guns, commanded by Capt. Dawfon. The fame evening the Prefton of 50 guns, fell in with the Tonnant of 80 guns with only her mainmaft ftanding, and attacked her with fpirit, but night put an end to the engagement. Six fail of the French fquadron came up in the night, which faved the difabled fhips from any farther attack. There was no fhip or veffel loft on either fide. The British fuffered lefs in the ftorm than their adversaries, yet enough to make it neceffary for them to return to New-York, for the purpose of refitting. The French fleet came to anchor, on M the VOL. II.

the 20th, near to Rhode Island, but failed on the 22d, to 1778. Bofton. Before they failed, Gen. Greene and the Marquis de la Fayette went on board the Languedoc, to confult on measures proper to be purfued. They urged D'Eftaing to return with his fleet into the harbour, but his principal officers were opposed to the measure, and protefted against it. He had been instructed to go to Bofton, if his fleet met with any misfortune. His officers infifted on his ceafing to profecute the expedition against Rhode-Island, that he might conform to the orders of their common fuperiors. Upon the return of Gen. Greene and the Marquis de la Fayette, and their reporting the determination of Count D'Eftaing, a proteft was drawn up and fent to him, which was figned by John Sullivan, Nathaniel Greene, John Hancock, I. Glover, Ezekiel Cornel, William Whipple, John Tyler, Solomon Lovell, Jon. Fitconnell. In this they protefted against the Count's taking the fleet to Bofton, as derogatory to the honor of France, contrary to the intention of his most Chriftian Majefty, and the intereft of his nation, and destructive in the highest degree to the welfare of the United States, and highly injurious to the alliance formed between the two nations. Had D'Eftaing profecuted his original plan within the harbour, either before or immediately after the pursuit of lord Howe, the reduction of the British post on Rhode-Island would have been probable, but his departure in the first instance to engage the British fleet, and in the fecond from Rhode-Island to Bofton, fruftrated the whole plan. Perhaps Count D'Estaing, hoped by fomething brilliant to efface the impreffions m de by his late failure at New-York. Or he might have thought it imprudent to ftake his whole fleet. within an haroour poffeffed by his enemies.

After his fhips had fuffered both from battle and the ftorm, the letter of his inftructions---the importunity of his officers, and his anxiety to have his fhips fpeedily refitted, might have weighed with him to fail directly for Bofton. Whatever were the reafons which induced his adoption of that measure, the Americans were greatly diffatisfied. They complained that they had incurred great great expence and danger, under the profpect of the most effective co-operation --- that depending thereon, they had rifqued their lives on an ifland, where without naval protection, they were exposed to particular danger .--- That in this fituation, they were first deferted, and afterwards totally abandoned, at a time, when by perfevering in the original plan, they had well grounded hopes of fpeedy fuccefs. Under these apprehensions, the discontented militia went home in fuch crowds, that the regular army which remained, was in danger of being cut off from a retreat. In these embarrasfing circumstances, General Sullivan extricated himfelf with judgment and ability. He began to fend off his heavy artillery and baggage August. on the 26th, and retreated from his lines on the night of the 28th. It had been that day refolved in a council of war, to remove to the north end of the ifland--fortify their camp, fecure a communication with the main, and hold the ground till it could be known whether the French fleet would return to their affiftance. The Marquis de la Fayette by defire of his affociates fet off for Bofton, to request the speedy return of the French fleet. To this Count D'Eftaing would not confent, but he made a fpirited offer to lead the troops under his command, and co-operate with the American land forces against Rhode-Island.

Sullivan retreated with great order, but he had not been five hours at the north end of the ifland, when his troops were fired upon by the British, who had purfued. them on difcovering their retreat. The purfuit was made by two parties and on two roads, to one was oppofed Col. Henry B. Livingston, to the other John Laurens, aid de camp to Gen. Washington, and each of them had a command of light troops. In the first instance, these light troops were compelled by fuperior numbers to give way, but they kept up a retreating fire. On being reinforced they gave their purfuers a check, and at length repulfed them. By degrees the action became in fome respects general, and near 1200 Americans were engaged. The lofs on each fide was between two and three hundred.

Lord Howe's fleet with Sir Henry Clinton and about 1778. 4000 troops on board, being feen off the coaft, General Sullivan concluded immediately to evacuate Rhode-Ifland. As the centries of both armies were within 400 yards of each other, the greatest caution was necessary. To cover the defign of retreating, the fhew of refiftence and Aug.30. continuance on the ifland was kept up. The retreat was made in the night, and mostly completed by twelve Towards the last of it the Margus de la Favette o'clock. returned from Bofton. He had rode thither from Rhode-Island, a diftance of near 70 miles in 7 hours, and returned in fix and a half. Anxious to partake in the engagement, his mortification was not little at being out of the way on the day before. He was in time to bring off the picquets, and other parties that covered the retreat of the American army. This he did in excellent order. Not a man was left behind, nor was the fmalleft article loft.

The bravery and good conduct which John Laurens difplayed on this occafion, were excelled by his republican magnanimity, in declining a military commiffion which was conferred on him, by the reprefentatives of his country. Congrefs refolved, that he thould be prefented with a continental commiffion, of Lieut. Colonel, in teftimony of the fenfe which they entertained of his patriotic and fpirited fervices, and of his brave conduct in feveral actions, particularly in that of Rhode-Ifland on the 29th of August.

On the next day he wrote to Congrefs a letter, expreffing "his gratitude for the unexpected honor which they were pleafed to confer on him, and of the fatisfaction it would have afforded him, could he have accepted it without injuring the rights of the officers in the line of the army, and doing an evident injuftice to his colleagues, in the family of the commander in chief. That having been a fpectator of the convultions occafioned in the army by diffutes of rank, he held the tranquillity of it too dear, to be inftrumental in diffurbing it, and therefore intreated Congrefs to fupprefs their refolve, ordering him the committion of Lieut. Colonel, and to accept his fincere thanks for the intended honor."

With

AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

With the abortive expedition to Rhode-Ifland, there was an end to the plans, which were in this first campaign projected by the allies of Congress, for a co-operation. The Americans had been intoxicated with hopes of the most decifive advantages, but in every inflance they were difappointed. Lord Howe with an inferiority of force, not only preferved his own fleet, but counteracted and defeated all_the views and attempts of Count D'Eftaing, The French fleet gained no direct advantages for the Americans, yet their arrival was of great fervice to their caufe. Befides deranging the plans of the British, it carried conviction to their minds, that his most Christian Majesty was ferioully difpofed to fupport them. The good will of their new allies was manifested to the Americans, and though it had failed in producing the effects expected from it, the failure was charged to winds, weather, and unavoidable incidents. Some cenfured Count D'Eftaing, but while they attempted to confole themfelves. by throwing blame on him, they felt and acknowledged their obligation to the French nation, and were encouraged to perfevere in the war, from the hope that better fortune would attend their future co-operation.

Sir Henry Clinton finding that the Americans had left Rhode-Ifland, returned to New-York, but directed Gen. Grey to proceed to Bedford and the neighbourhood, where feveral American privateers reforted. On reaching the place of their deftination the General's party landed, and in a few hours destroyed about 70 fail of shipping, befides a number of fmall craft. They also burnt magazines, wharfs, ftores, warehoufes, veffels on the ftocks, and a confiderable number of dwelling houfes. The buildings burned in Bedford, were effimated to be worth £ 20,000 fterling. The other articles destroyed were worth much more. The royal troops proceeded to Martha's vineyard. There they deftroyed a few veffels, and made a requifition of the militia arms, the public money, 300 oxen and 2000 fheep, which was complied with.

A fimilar expedition under the command of Capt. Ferguson, was about the fame time undertaken against Little Egg-

1778. Egg-Harbour, at which place the Americans had a number of privateers and prizes, and alfo fome falt-works. Several of the veffels got off but all that were found were deftroyed. Previous to the embarkation of the British from Egg-Harbour for New-York, Capt. Ferguson with 250 men, furprised and put to death about fifty of a party of the Americans, who were posted in the vicinity. The attack being made in the night, little or no quarter was given.

The lofs fuftained by the Britifh in thefe feveral excursions was trifling, but the advantage was confiderable, from the fupplies they procured, and the check which was given to the American privateers.

One of the most difastrous events, which occurred at this period of the campaign, was the furprife and maffacre of an American regiment of light dragoons, commanded by Lieut. Col. Baylor. While employed in a detatched fituation, to intercept and watch a British foraging party, they took up their lodging in a barn near Taa-The officer, who commanded the party which pan. furprised them, was Major Gen: Grey. He acquired the name of the " No flint General " from his common practice of ordering the men, under his command, to take the flints out of their muskets, that they might be confined to the use of their bayonets. A party of militia, which had been stationed on the road, by which the British advanced, quitted their poft, without giving any notice to Col. Baylor. This diforderly conduct was the occasion of the difaster which followed. Grey's men proceeded with fuch filence and addrefs, that they cut off a ferjeant's patrol without noife, and furrounded old Taapan without being difcovered. They then rufbed in upon Baylor's regiment, while they were in a profound fleep. Incapable of defence or refistance, cut off from every prospect of felling their lives dear, the furprifed dragoons fued for quarters. Unmoved by their fupplications, their adverfaries appled the bayonet and continued its repeated thrufts, while objects could be found, in which any figns of life appeared. A few escaped, and others, after having received from five to eleven bayonet wounds in the trunk of the

the body, were reflored, in a course of time, to perfect health. Baylor himfelf was wounded, but not dangeroufly: He loft, in killed, wounded and taken, 67 privates out of 104. About 40 were made prisoners. These were indebted, for their lives, to the humanity of one of Grey's captains, who gave quarters to the whole fourth troop, though contrary to the orders of his fuperior officers. The circumstance of the attack being made in the night, when neither order nor difcipline can be obferved, may apologife in fome degree, with men of a certain defcription, for this bloody scene. It cannot be maintained, that the laws of war require that quarters fhould be given in fimilar affaults, but the lovers of mankind must ever contend, that the laws of humanity are of fuperior obligation to those of war. The truly brave will fpare when refiftance ceafes, and in every cafe where it can be done with fafety. The perpetrators of fuch actions may justly be denominated the enemies of refined fociety. As far as their example avails, it tends to arreft the growing humanity of modern times, and to revive the barbarism of Gothic ages. On these principles, the maffacre of Col. Baylor's regiment was the fubject of much complaint. The particulars of it were afcertained, by the oaths of fundry credible witneffes, taken before Gov. Livingston of Jerfey, and the whole was fubmitted to the judgment of the public.

In the fummer of this year, an expedition was undertaken againft Eaft-Florida. This was refolved upon, with the double view of protecting the State of Georgia from depredation, and of caufing a diversion. Gen. Robert Howe, who conducted it, had under his command about 2000 men, a few hundred of which were continental troops, and the remainder militia of the States of South-Carolina and Georgia. They proceeded as far as St. Mary's river, and without any opposition of confequence. At this place, the British had erected a fort, which, in compliment to Tonyn, governor of the province, was called by his name. On the approach of Gen. Howe, they deftroyed this fort, and after fome flight fkirmishing, retreated towards St. Augustine. The feasion was more fatal 1778. tal to the Americans than any opposition they experienced from their enemies. Sicknefs and death raged to fuch a degree that an immediate retreat became neceffary; but before this was effected, they loft nearly one fourth of their whole number.

> The royal commissioners having failed in their attempts to induce the Americans to refume the character of Britill fubjects, and the fucceffive plans of co-operation between the new allies, having alfo failed, a folemn paufe enfued. It would feem as if the commiffioners indulged a hope, that the citizens of the United States, on finding a difappointment of their expectation from the French, would reconfider and accept the offers of Great-Britain. Full time was given, both for the circulation of their manifesto, and for observing its effects on the public mind, but no overtures were made to them from any quarter. The year was drawing near to a clofe, before any interesting expedition was undertaken. With this new æra, a new fystem was introduced. Hitherto the conqueft of the ftates had been attempted by proceeding from north to fouth : But that order was henceforth inverted, and the fouthern states became the principal theatre, on which the British conducted their offenfive operations. Georgia being one of the weakeft flates in the union, and at the fame time abounding in provisions, was marked out as the first object of renewed warfare. Lieut. Colonel Campbell, an officer of known courage and ability embarked from New-York, for Savannah, with a force of about 2000 men, under the convoy of fome thips of war commanded by commodore Hyde Parker. To make more fure of fuccefs in the enterprise, Major Gen. Prevoft who commanded the royal forces in East-Florida, was directed to advance with them into the fouthern extremity of The fleet that failed from New-York, in a-Georgia. bout three weeks effected a landing near the mouth of the river Savannah. From the landing place a narrow caufeparty under Capt. Smith, posted for the purpose of imped-1778. ing their paffage. Capt. Cameron was killed, but the British made their way good, and compelled Capt. Smith to retreat. General Howe, the American officer to whom the defence of Georgia was committed, took his station on the main road, and posted his little army, confifting of about 600 continentals and a few hundred militia, between the landing-place and the town of Savannah, with the river on his left and a morafs in front. This difpotition announced great difficulties to be overcome, before the Americans could be diflodgd. While Col. Campbell was making the neceffary arrangements for this purpofe, he received intelligence from a negro, of a private path through the fwamp, on the right of the Americans, which lay in fuch a fituation that, the British troops might march through it unobserved. Sir James Baird, with the light infantry, was directed to avail himfelf of this path, in order to turn the right wing of the Americans and attack their rear. As foon as it was fuppofed that Sir James Baird had cleared his paffage, the British in front of the Americans, were directed to advance and engage. Howe, finding himfelf attacked in the rear as well as in the front, ordered an immediate retreat. The British purfued with great execution: Their victory was complete. Upwards of 100 of the Americans were killed. Thirty eight officers, 415 privates, 48 pieces of cannon, 23 mortars, the fort with its ammunition and ftores, the fhipping in the river, a large quantity of provisions with the capital of Georgia, were all, in the fpace of a few hours in the poffeffion of the conquerors. The broken remains of the American army retreated up the river Savaunah for feveral miles, and then took fhelter by croffing into South-Carolina. Agreeably to inftructions. Gen. Prevost had marched from East-Florida, about the fame time that the embarkation took place from New-York. After encountering many difficulties, the king's troops from St. Augustine reached the inhabited parts of Georgia, and there heard the welcome tidings of the arrival and fuccels of Col. Campbell. Savannah having fallen, the fort at Sunbury furrendered. Gen. Prevoft marched to Savannah, and took the command of the combined VOL. II. forces N

1778. forces from New-York and St. Augustine. Previous to his arrival, a proclamation had been iffued, to encourage the inhabitants to come in and fubmit to the conquerors, with promifes of protection, on condition that with their arms they would fupport royal government.

> Lieut. Col. Campbell acted with great policy, in fecuring the fubmiffion of the inhabitants. He did more in a fhort time, and with comparatively a few men, towards the re-eftablishment of the British interest, than all the general officers who had preceded him. He not only extirpated military opposition, but fubverted for fome time every trace of republican government, and paved the way for the re-establishment of a royal legislature. Georgia foon after the reduction of its capital exhibited a fingular fpectacle. It was the only ftate of the union, in which after the declaration of independence, a legiflative body was convened under the authority of the crown of Great Britain. The moderation and prudence of Lieut. Col. Campbell were more fucefsfull in reconciling the minds of the citizens to their former conftitution, than, the fevere measures which had been generally adopted by other Britifli commanders. - 17

> The errors of the first years of the war forced on Congress fome useful reforms, in the year 1778. The infufficiency of the provision, made for the fupport of the officers of their army, had induced the refignation of between two and three hundred of them, to the great injury of the fervice. From a conviction of the juffice and policy of making commissions valuable, and from respect to the warm, but difinterested recommendations of Gen. Washington, Congress refolved "That half-pay should be allowed to their officers, for the term of feven years', after the expiration of their fervice." This was, afterwards, extended to the end of their lives. And finally, that was commuted for full pay, for five years. Refignations were afterwards rare, and the States reaped the benefit of experienced officers continuing in fervice, till the war was ended.

A fystem of more regular discipline was introduced into the American army, by the industry, abilities and judicious dicious regulations of Baron de Steuben a most excellent disciplinarian, who had ferved under the king of Prussia. A very important reform took place in the medical department, by appointing different officers, to difcharge the directing and purveying business of the military hospitals, which had been before united in the fame hands. Dr. Russ principally instrumental, in effecting this beneficial alteration. Some regulations, which had been adopted for limiting the prices of commodities, being found not only impracticable, but injurious, were abolisted.

A few detached events, which could not be introduced without interrupting the narrative of the great events of the campaign, fhall clofe this chapter.

Cap. James Willing, in the fervice of the United States, arrived, with a few men from Fort-Pitt, at the Natches, Feb. 19. a Britifh fettlement in Weft-Florida. He fent out parties, who, without any refiftance, made the inhabitants prifoners. Articles of agreement were entered into, between them and Capt. Willing, by which they promifed to obferve a neutrality in the prefent conteft, and in return it was engaged, that their property flould be unmolefted.

The Randolph, an American frigate of 36 guns and Mar. 7. 305 meu, commanded by Capt. Biddle, having failed on a cruite from Charlefton, fell in with the Yarmouth of 64 guns, and engaged her in the night. In about a quarter of an hour, the Randolph blew up. Four men only were faved, upon a piece of her wreck. Thefe had fubfitted for four days on nothing but rain water, which they fucked from a piece of blanket. On the 5th day, Cap. Vincent of the Yarmouth, though in chafe of a fhip, on difcovering them, fufpended the chafe and took them on board. Capt. Biddle, who perifhed on board the Randolph, was univerfally lamented. He was in the prime of life, and had excited high expectations of future ufefulnefs to his country, as a bold and fkillful naval officer.

Major Talbot took the British schooner Pigot, of 8 Oct. 29. twelve pounders, as she lay on the eastern fide of Rhode-Island.

The Major, with a number of troops on board a fmall veffel, made directly for the Pigot in the night, and fuftaining the fire of her marines, 'referved his own till he had run his jibb-boom through her fore-fhrouds. He then fired fome cannon, and threw in a volley, of mulquetry, loaded with bullets and buck-fhot, and immediately boarded her. The captain made a gallant refistance, but he was not feconded by his crew. Major Talbot foon gained undifturbed poffession, and carried off his prize in fafety. Congress, as a reward of his merit, prefented him with the commission of Lieutenant Colonel.

Campaign of 1779.

HROUGHOUT the year 1779, the British feem to have aimed at little more, in the States to the northward of Carolina, than diffress and depredati-Having publicly announced their refolution of on. making " The colonies of as little avail as poffible to their new connections ", they planned fundry expeditions, on this principle.

May 10.

One of these confisting of both a naval and land force, was committed to Sir George Collyer and Gen. Mathews, who made a descent on Virginia. They failed for Portsmouth, and on their arrival took poffeffion of that defencelefs town. The remains of Norfolk on the oppofite fide of the river, fell of courfe into their hands. -The Americans burned fome of their own veffels, but others were made prizes by the invaders. The British guards marched 18 miles in the night, and arriving at Suffolk by morning proceeded to the deftruction of veffels, naval ftores, and of a large magazine of provisions, which had been deposited in that place. A fimilar destruction was carried on at Kemp's landing, Shepherds-gofport, Tanners creek, and other places in the vicinity. The frigates and armed veffels were employed on the fame bufinefs along along the margin of the rivers. Three thousand hog- 1778. fheads of tobacco were taken at Portfmouth. Every house in Suffolk was burnt except the church, and one dwelling houfe. The houfes of feveral private gentlemen in the country, shared the same fate. Above 130 vessels were either deftroyed or taken. All that were upon the ftocks were burned, and every thing relative to the building or fitting of fhips, was either carried off or deftroyed. The fleet and army after demolishing fort Nelfon, and fetting fire to the ftore-houfes, and other public buildings in the dockyard at Gofport, embarked from Virginia, and returned with their prizes and booty fafe to New-York, in the fame month in which they had left it. This expedition into Virginia diffreffed a number of its-inhabitants, and enriched the British forces, but was of no real fervice to the royal caufe. It was prefumed that by involving the citizens in loffes and diffrefs, they would be brought to reflect on the advantages of fubmitting to a power, against which they had not the means, of defending themselves: But the temper of the times was unfavourable to these views. Such was the high toned ftate of the American mind, that property had comparatively loft its value. It was fashionable to fuffer in the caufe of independence. Some hearty whigs gloried in their loffes, with as much pride as others gloried in their poffeffions. The British supposing the Americans to be influenced, by the confiderations which bias men in the languid scenes of tranquil life, and not reflecting on the facrifices which enthufiaftic patriotifm is willing to make, proceeded in their fchemes of diftrefs: But the more extenfively they carried on this mode of warfare, the more obstacles they created to the re-union of the empire. In about five weeks after the termination of the expedition to Virginia, a fimilar one was projected against the exposed margin of Connecticut. Gov. Tryon was appointed to the command of about 2600 land forces, employed on this bufinefs and he was fupported by Gen. Garth. The transports which conveyed these troops, were covered by a fuitable number of armed veffels, commanded by Sir George Collyer. They proceeded from New-York, July 5.

by the way of Hell-gate, and landed at Eaft-Haven. The royal commanders made an addrefs to the inhabitants, in which they invited them to return to their duty and allegiance, and promifed protection to all who fhould remain peaceably in their ufual, place of refidence, except the civil and military officers of the government. It alfo ftated " that their property lay fill within the grafp of that power, whofe lenity had perfifted in its mild and noble efforts, though branded with the most unworthy imputation. That the existence of a fingle house on their defencelefs coast, ought to be a constant reproof of their, ingratitude. That they who lay fo much in the British power, afforded a firiking monument of their mercy, and therefore ought to fet the first example of returning to their allegiance."

One of the many addreffes, from which the above extract is taken, was fent, by a flag to Col. Whiting of the militia near Fairfield. The Col. was allowed an hour for his answer, but he had scarcely time to read it before the town was in flames. He neverthelefs returned the following answer " Connecticut, having nobly dared to take up arms against the cruel despotifm of Great Britain, and the flames having preceded the anfwer to your flag, they will perfift to oppose to the utmost, the power exerted againftinjured innocence". The British marched from their landing to New-Haven. The town on their entering it, was delivered up to promiscuous plunder, a few instances of protection excepted. The inhabitants were ftripped of their houshold furniture and other moveable property. The harbour and water fide was covered with feathers, which were difcharged from opened beds. An aged citizen who labored under a natural inability of fpeech, had his tongue cut out by one of the royal army. After perpetrating every fpecies of enormity, but that of burning houses, the invaders fuddenly re-imbarked and proceeded by water to Fairfield. The militia of that place and the vicinity, posted themselves at the court-house green, and gave confiderable annoyance to them, as they were advancing, but foon retreated to the height back of the town. On the approach of the British the town was evacuated evacuated by most of its inhabitants. ' A few women remained with the view of faving their property. They imagined, that their fex would protect them. They alfo reposed confidence in an enemy who they knew had been formerly famed for humanity and politeness, but they bittes ly repented their prefumption. Parties of the royal army entered the deferted houfes of the inhabitants, broke open defks, trunks, clofets and chefts, and took every thing of value that came in their way. They robbed the women of their buckles; rings, bonnets, aprons and handkerchiefs. They abufed them with the fouleft language; threatened their lives, and prefented the bayonets to their breafts. A fucking infant was plundered of part of its cloathing, while the bayonet was preferited to the breaft of its mother. Towards evening, they began to burn the houfes, which they had previoufly plundered. The women begged Gen. Tryon to fpare the town. Mr. Sayre, the epifcopal minister, who had fuffered for his attachment to the royal caufe, joined the wol men in their requests, but their joint supplications were difregarded: " They then begged, that a few houfes might be fpared for a general fhelter. This was at first denied; but at length Tryon confented to fave the buildings of Mr. Burr and of Mr. Elliot, and alfo faid, that the houfes. for public worship should be spared. After his departure on the next morning with the main body, the rear guard confifting of German yaugers fet fire to every thing which Tryon had fpared, but on their departure the inhabitants extinguished the flames, and faved fome of the houses. The militia were joined by numbers from the country which fucceflively came in to their aid, but they were too few to make effectual opposition.

The British in this excursion, also burned East-Haven, and the greatest part of Green's farms, and the flourishing town of Norwalk. A confiderable number of ships, either finished or on the stocks, with whale-boats and a large amount of stores and merchandise, were deftroyed. Particular accounts of these devastations were, in a short time, transmitted by authority to Congress. By these it appeared that they were burnt at Norwalk two houfes of public worfhip, 80 dwelling houfes, 87, 1778. barns, 22 ftores, 17 shops, 4 mills and 5 veffels; And at Fairfield two houfes of public worthip, 15 dwelling houses, 11 barns and feveral ftores. There were at the fame time a number of certificates transmitted to Gen. Washington, in which fundry perfons of veracity bore witnefs on oath to various acts of brutality, rapine and cruelty, committed on aged perfons, women and prifoners. Congrefs, on receiving fatisfactory atteftation of the ravages of the British in this and other fimilar expeditions, July 19. refolved " To direct their marine committee to take the most effectual measures, to carry into execution their manifefto of October 30th 1778, by burning or deftroying the towns belonging to the enemy in Great Britain or the West-Indies;" but their refolve was never carried into effect.

The elder citizens of the United States, who had grown up with habits of love and attachment to the British nation, felt the keeneft fenfations of regret, when they contrafted the years 1759 and 1779. The former was their glory, when in the days of their youth, they were difpofed to boaft of the honors of their common country, but the latter filled them with diffrefs, not only for what they fuffered, but for the degradation of a country they revered as the natal foil of their forefathers. The one enobled the British name with the conquest of Crown-Point, Ofwego, Montreal, Quebec and the whole province of Canada. The other was remarkable only, for the burning of magazines, ftore-houses, dock-yards, the towns of Fairfield, and Norwalk, and for the general diftrefs of a defenceless peusantry.

The fires and deftruction which accompanied this expedition, were feverely cenfured by the Americans, and apologifed for by the British in a very unfatisfactory manner. The latter in their vindication, alleged that the houses which they had burned gave shelter to the Americans, while they fired from them, and on other occafions concealed their retreat.

Tryon, who was a civil governor as well as a general, undertook the justification of the measure, on principles of policy. "I fhould be very forry" faid he " if the deftruction of thefe villages would be-thought lefs reconcileable with humanity, than the love of my country, my duty to the king, and the laws of arms. The ufurpers have profeffedly placed their hopes of fevering the empire, in avoiding decifive actions---upon the wafte of the Britifh treafures, and upon the efcape of their own property during the protracting of the war. Their power is fupported by the general dread of their tyranny and threats, practifed to infpire a credulous multitude, with a prefumptuous confidence in our forbearance; I wifh to detect this delufion." Thefe devaftations were the fubject of an elegant poem, written on the fpot a few days after, by Col. Humphries.

While the British were proceeding in these defolating operations, Gen. Wathington was called upon for continental troops, but he could spare very few. He durst not detach largely, as he apprehended that one defign of the British in these movements was to draw off a proportion of his army from Weft Point, to favour an intended attack on that important poft. General Parfons, though closely connected with Connecticut, and though from his fmall force he was unable to make fuccefsful opposition to the invaders, yet instead of preffing General Washington for a large detachment of continental troops, wrote to him as follows, " The British may probably diffrefs the country exceedingly, by the ravages they will commit, but I would rather fee all the towns on the coaft of my country in flames, than that the enemy flould possels West-Point."

The inhabitants feared much more than they fuffered. They expected that the whole margin of their country, 120 miles in extent, would fuffer the fate of Fairfield and Norwalk. The feafon of the year added much to their difficulties, as the clofe attention of the farmers to their harvefting could not be omitted, without hazarding their fubfiftence. Thefe fears were not of long duration. In about ten days after the landing of the Britift troops, an order was iffued for their immediate return to New-York. This they effected, in a fhort time, Vol. II. O and

and with a lofs fo inconfiderable, that in the whole expedition, it did not exceed 150 men.

While the Britifh were fuccefsfully making thefe defultory operations, the American army was incapable of covering the country. The former, having by means of their fuperior marine force, the command of the numerous rivers, bays and harbours of the United States, had it in their power to make defcents, where they pleafed, with an expedition that could not be equalled by the American land forces. Had Gen. Wafhington divided his army, conformably to the wifnes of the invaded citizens, he would have fubjected his whole force to be cut up August. In detail. It was therefore his uniform practice, to rifque no more by way of covering the country than was confistent with the general fafety.

> His army was posted at some distance from British head quarters in New York, and on both fides of the North river. The van thereof confisting of 300 infantry and 150 cavalry, under the command of Col. Anthony Walton White, patroled constantly, for several months, in front of the British lines, and kept a constant watch on the Sound and on the North river. This corps had fundry skirmiss with parties of the British, and was particularly useful in checking their excursions, and in procuring and communicating intelligence of their movements.

> About this time Gen. Putnam, who had been flationed with a refpectable command at Reading in Connecticut, when on a vifit to his out-poft at Horfe-Neck, was attacked by Gov. Tryon, with about 1500 men. Gen. Putnam had only a picket of 150 men, and two iron field pieces without horfes or drag-ropes. He however planted his cannon on the high ground, near the meeting houfe, and by feveral fires retarded the advancing enemy, and continued to make oppofition till he perceived the enemy's horfe, fupported by the infantry, were about to charge. Gen. Putnam after ordering the picket to provide for their fafety, by retiring to a fwamp it acceffible to horfe, plunged down the precipice at the church. This is fo fleep as to have artificial flairs, com-

pofed of nearly one hundred ftone fteps, for the accommodation of foot paffengers. The dragoons ftopped fhort, with out venturing down the abrupt declivity, and before they got round the brow of the hill, Putnam was far enough beyond their reach; of the many balls that were fired at him, all miffed except one, which went through his hat. He proceeded to Stamford, and having ftrengthened his picket with fome militia, faced about and purfued Governor Tryon on his return.

The campaign of 1779, though barren of important events, was diftinguished by one of the most gallant enterprifes, which took place in the course of the war. This was the capture of Stoney-Point, on the North river. Gen. Wayne, who had the honor of conducting this enterprife, fet out at the head of a ftrong deatchment of the most active infantry in the American army July 15. at noon, and completed a march of about 14 miles, over bad roads, by eight o'clock in the evening. The detachment being then within a mile and a half of its object, was halted and formed into columns. The General, with a few of his officers, advanced and reconnoitred the works. At half past eleven, the whole moved forward to the attack. The van of the right, confifting of 150 volunteers under the command of Lieut. Col. Fleury, advanced with unloaded mufkets, and fixed bayonets. These were preceded by 20 picked men, who were particularly inftructed to remove the abbatis and other obstructions. The van of the left was led by Major Stewart, and advanced with unloaded mufkets and fixed bayonets. It was also preceded by a fimilar forlorn hope. The General placed himfelf at the head of the right columu, and gave the most pointed orders not to fire, but to depend folely on the bayonet. The two columns directed their attacks to opposite points of the works, while a detachment engaged the attention of the garrifon, by a feint in their front. The approaches were more difficult than had been apprehended. The works were defended by a deep morafs, which was alfo, at that time, overflowed by the tide. Neither the morafs, the double row of abbatis, nor the firength of the works, damped the ardor

of the affailants. In the face of a most tremendous fire of mufketry, and of cannon loaded with grape-fhot, they forced their way, at the point of the bayor e, through every obstacle, until both columns met in the centre of the works, at nearly the fame inftant. Gen. Wayne as he paffed the last abbatis, was wounded in the head by a musket ball, but nevertheless infisted on being carried forward, adding as a reafon for it, that if he died he wished it might be in the fort." Lieutenants Gibbons and Knox, who led the forlorn hope, efcaped unhurt, although the first lost 17 men out of 20, and the last nearly as many. The killed and wounded of the Americans amounted to 98. The killed of the garrifon were 63, and the number of their prifoners 543. Two flags, two flandards, 15 pieces of ordnance, and a confiderable quantity of military ftores, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The vigor and fpirit, with which this enterprife was conducted, was matter of triumph to the Americans. Congress gave their thanks to Gen. Washington "For the vigilance, wifdom and magnanimity with which he had conducted the military operations of the States, and which were among many other fignal inftances manifested in his orders for the above enterprife. " They alfo gave thanks to Gen. Wayne, and ordered a medal, emblematical of the action, to be ftruck and one of gold to be prefented to him. They directed a filver one to be prefented to Lieut. Col. Fleury, and alfo to Major Stewart. At the fame time, they paffed general refolutions in honor of the officers and men, but particularly defignating Lieut. Col. Fleury, Major Stewart, Lieutenants Gibbons and Knox. To the two latter and alfo to Mr. Archer, the General's volunteer aid-de-camp, they gave the rank of Captain. The clemency fhewn to the vanquished, was universally applauded. The cuftoms of war, and the recent barbarities at Fairfield and Norwalk, would have been an apology for the conquerors, had they put the whole garrifon to the fword, but the affailants, no lefs generous than brave, ceafed to deftroy as foon as their adversaries ceased to refift. Upon the capture of Stoney Point, the victors turned its artillery

lery against Verplank's-Point, and fired upon it with fuch 1779. effect, that the fhipping in its vicinity cut their cables and fell down the river. As foon as the news of thefe events reached New-York, preparations were inftantly made to relieve the latter post and to recover the former. It by no means accorded with the cautious prudence of Gen. Washington, to rifque an engagement for either or for both of them. He therefore removed the cannon and ftores, deftroyed the works, and evacuated the captured post. Sir Henry Clinton regained possession of Stoney-Point, on the third day after its capture, and placed in it a ftrong garrifon.

The fuccefsful enterprife of the Americans at Stoney-Point, was speedily followed by another, which equalled it in boldnefs of defign. This was the furprife of the Britifh garrifon at Powles-Hook, opposite to New-York, which was effected by Major Lee with about 350 men. July 19 Major Sutherland the commandant, with a number of - 1779. Heffians got off fafe to a fmall block-houle on the left of the fort, but about 30 of his men were killed and 160 taken prifoners. The lofs of the Americans was inconfiderable. Major Lee in conformity to the orders he had received, made an immediate retreat, without waiting to deftroy either the barracks or the artillery. Congress honored him with their thanks, and ordered a medal of gold, emblematical of the affair to be ftruck, and prefented to him as a reward " for his prudence, address and bra-. very." They also paffed refolutions applauding his humanity, and expressing their high fense of the good conduct of his troops, and at the fame time, ordered a con-. fiderable donative in money, to be distributed among them.

These advantages were more than counterbalanced, by an unfuccefsful attempt, made by the flate of Maffachufetts, on a British post at Penobscot. Col. Macleane by the direction of Sir Henry Clinton, landed with a detachment of 650 men from Halifax, on the banks of Jun. 16. Penobscot river, in the eastern confines of New-England, and proceeded foon after to conftruct a fort in a well chofen fituation. This occafioned an alarm at Bofton. To. counterad

- 1779. counteract the establishment of the post, vigorous measures were refolved upon. That armed vessels, transports and failors, might be fecured for an expedition, which was immediately projected for this purpose, an embargo for 40 days was laid by the state of Massachusets, on all their shipping. A considerable armament consisting of 18 armed vessels betides transports, was fitted out with extraordinary expedition, and put under the command of Com. Saltonstal. The largest vessel in this fleet, was the Warren of 32 guns, 18 and 12 pounders. The others varied from 24 to 12 guns. A body of land forces commanded by Gen. Lovel, embarked on this expedition. On the
- July 25. 25th of July, the American fleet confifting of 37 fail appeared off Penobfcot. Col. Macleane had four days before gained information; of what was intended againft him. This induced him to redouble his exertions in firengthening his fort, which was in an unfinifhed flate. Two of the baffions were untouched. The remaining two were in no part above 4 or 5 feet high. The ditch was only about 3 feet deep. There was no platform laid, nor any artillery mounted. The American general on his landing, fummoned the colonel to furrender, which be-
- July 28. ing refufed, he proceeded to creft a battery at the diffance of 750 yards. A cannonading commenced, and was kept . up for about a fortnight, but without any confiderable effect. While the befiegers were making preparation for an affault, which they had in immediate contemplation, Sir George Collyer appeared full in view, with a fquadron for the relief of the garrifon. He had failed from
- Aug. 3. Sandy-Hook, on hearing of the intended attack on Col. Macleane's party, and in about 11 days arrived in the river Penobfcot. His marine force confifted of the Raifonable of 64 guns and five frigates. The Americans at firft made a fnew of refiftance, but they intended no more than to give the transports time to move up the river, that the troops might have an opportunity of landing, and making their efcape. The fuperior force and weight of metal of the Raifonable was irrefiftible, and the efcape of the Americans was impracticable, A general flight on the one fide, and a general chafe chafe on the other took place. Sir George deftroyed and took 17 or 18 armed veffels. The American foldiers and failors had to return a great part of their way by land, and to explore their route through thick woods.

While the war languithed as to great objects in the country where it originated, it was raging on a new element, and involving diftant countries in its wide fpreading fame. Hoftilities between the fleets of France and Great-Britain, were carrying on in both the Indies and in the European feas, as well as on the coaft of America. His most Catholic Majesty was alfo, about this time, induced to take a decided part with France against Great-Britain.

To the furprife of many, the Marquis D'Almodovar Jun. 16. the Spanish ambaffador delivered a manifesto to lord Vifcount Weymouth, amounting to a declaration of war against Great-Britain. This event had often been predicted by the minority in the British parliament, but difbelieved by the ministry. The latter reasoned " that Spain could have no interest in joining their adversaries .--- That the had colonies of her own, and could not fet fo bad an example to them, as to give any countenance to the Americans. It was alfo faid that Spain was naturally attached to Great-Britain, and unable to enter into war". They were fo far imposed upon by their eagernefs to effect the conquest of the United States, as to believe that to be true which they wished to be fo. The event proved that the politics of fovereign powers, are not reducible to fixed principles. Sometimes one intereft clashes with another, and it is not always the cafe that the ftrongeft preponderates. Whether the influence of the French counfels, or the profpect of recovering Gibralter, Jamaica and the two Floridas, or the preffure of recent injuries determined the court of Spain to adopt this measure it is impossible with certainty to decide, but circumstances make it probable, that the hope of regaining Gibraltar and Jamaica, was the principal inducement.

The fituation of Great Britain, was at this time tru'y diffreffing. She was weakened and diffracted in a domeftic on cteft, in which victory produced no advantages, but 1779. but defeat all its natural effects. In the midft of this wafting conteft, in which her ability to reduce her revolted colonies, though without foreign aid was doubtful, fhe was fuddenly involved in a new and much more dangerous war with one of the greateft powers in Europe. At this very time while fhe was engaged in this double warfare, againft old friends and old enemies, his moft Catholic Majefty added his force to that of her numerous foes.

> In this fituation a direliction of the American war was recommended by fome leading characters in the nation, but every proposition of that kind was over-ruled, and affurances from both houfes of Parliament, were given to his Majefty "to fupport him in carrying on the war against all his enemies".

> From these events which only affected the United-States as far as they increased the embarrassiments of Great Britain, I return to relate the transactions which took place within their own limits. In the year 1779, though the war was carried on for little more than diftrefs or depredation in the northern states, the re-establishment of British government was feriously attempted in Carolina and Georgia. After the reduction of Savannah, a great part of the ftate of Georgia was reftored to the King's peace. The royal army in that quarter was ftrengthened by a numerous re-inforcement from East Florida, and the whole was put under the command of Major Gen. Prevoft. The force then in Georgia gave a ferious alarm to the adjacent flates. There were at that time but few continental troops in Georgia, or South Carolina, and fcarce any in North-Carolina, as during the late tranquillity in the fouthern flates, they had been detached to ferve in the main army commanded by Gen. Washington. A body of militia was raifed and fent forward by North Carolina to aid her neighbours. Thefe joined the continental troops, but not till they had retreated out of Georgia, and taken post in South Carolina. Towards the close of the year 1778 Gen. Lincoln, at the request of the delegates of South Carolina, was appointed by Congress, to take the command of their fouthern army.

This

This confifted only of a few hundred continentals. To fupply the deficiency of regular foldiers, a confiderable body of militia was ordered to join him, but they added much more to his numbers than to his effective force. They had not yet learned the implicit obedience neceffary for military operations. Accustomed to activity on their farms, they could not bear the languor of an encampment. Having grown up in habits of freedom and independence, they reluctantly fubmitted to martial difcipline. The royal army at Savannah being reinforced by the junction of the troops from St. Augustine, was in condition to extend their pofts. Their first object was to take poffeffion of Port-Royal, in South-Carolina. Major Gardiner with two hundred men being detached with this view, landed on the ifland, but Gen. Moultrie at the head of an equal number of Americans, in which there were only nine regular foldiers, attacked and drove him off it. This advantage was principally gained by two field pieces, which were well ferved by a party of Charlefton militia artillery. The British lost almost all their officers. The Americans had eight men killed and 22 wounded. Among the former, was Lieut. Benjamin Wilkins an artillery officer of great merit, and a citizen of diftinguished virtue, whose early fall deprived a numerous family of their chief fupport. He was the first officer of South-Carolina who loft his life in fupporting its independence. This repulse reftrained the British from attempting any immediate enterprife to the northward of Savannah, but they fixed posts at Ebenezer, and Augusta, and extended themselves over a great part of Georgia. They also endeavored to ftrengthen themfelves by reinforcements from the tories, in the western fettlements of Georgia and Carolina.

Emiffaries were fent among the inhabitants of that defcription, to encourage them to a general infurrection. They were affured that if they embodied and added their force to that of the King's army in Georgia, they would have fuch a decided fuperiority as would make a fpeedy return to their homes practicable, on their own terms. Several hundreds of them accordingly rendez-Vol. II. P voufed, voused, and set off to join the royal forces at Augusta. Among those who called themselves loyalists, there were many of the most infamous characters. Their general complexion was that of a plundering banditti, more folicitous for booty, than for the honor and interest of their royal mafter. At every period before the war, the western wildernefs of thefe States which extended to the Missifippi, afforded an afylum for the idle or diforderly, who difrelished the reftraints of civil fociety. While the war raged, the demands of militia duty and of taxes contributed much to the peopling of those remote fettlements, by holding out profpects of exemption from the control of government. Among these people the royal emiffaries had fuccessfully planted the standard of loyalty, and of that class was a great proportion of those, who in the upper country of the Carolinas and Georgia, called themfelves the King's friends. They had no fooner embodied and begun their march to join the royal army at Augusta, than they commenced fuch a scene of plundering of the defenceless fettlements through which they paffed, as induced the orderly inhabitants to turn out to oppose them. Col. Pickens, with about 300 men of the latter character, immediately purfued and came up with them, near Kettle-creek. An action took place, which lasted three quarters of an hour. The tories were totally routed. About forty of them were killed, and in that number was their leader Col. Boyd, who had been fecretly employed by British authority to collect and head them. By this action the British were disconcerted. The tories were difperfed. Some ran quite off. Others went to their homes, and cast themselves on the mercy of their country. These were tried by the laws of South Carolina for offending against an act called the fedition act, which had been paffed fince the revolution for the fecurity of the new government. Seventy of them were condemned to die, but the fentence was only executed on five of their ringleaders.

As the British extended their posts on the Georgia fide of Savannah river, Gen. Lincoln fixed encampments at Black-Swamp, and nearly opposite to Augusta on the Carolina fide.

fide. From these posts he formed a plan of croffing in- 1779. to Georgia, with the view of limiting the British to the low country, near the ocean. In the execution of this defign, Gen. Afh with 1500 North-Carolina militia and a few regular troops, after croffing the river Savannah, took a position on Briar-creek; But in a few days he was furprifed by Lieut. Col. Prevoft, who having made a cir- May 3. cuitous march of about 50 miles, came unexpectedly on his rear with about 900 men. The militia were thrown into confusion, and fled at the first fire. One hundred and fifty of the Americans were killed, and 162 were taken. Few had any chance of escaping but by croffing the Savannah, in attempting which many were drowned. Of those who got off fafe, a great part returned home. The number that rejoined the American camp did not exceed 450 men. The few continentals under Col. Elbert made a brave refistence, but the furvivors of them, with their gallant leader, were at last compelled to furrender. This event deprived Gen. Lincoln of one fourth of his numbers, and opened a communication between the British, the Indians, and the tories of North and South-Carolina.

Unexperienced in the art of war, the Americans were subject to those reverses of fortune, which usually attend young foldiers. Unacquainted with military ftratagems, deficient in discipline, and not thoroughly broken to habits of implicit obedience, they were often furprised, and had to learn by repeated misfortunes the neceffity of fubordination, and the advantages of watchfulnefs and difcipline. Their numbers in the field, to those who are acquainted with European wars, must appear inconfiderable, but fuch is the difference of the ftate of fociety and of the population in the old and new world, that in America, a few hundreds decided objects of equal magnitude with those, which in Europe would have called into the field as many thousands. The prize contended for was nothing lefs than the Sovereignty of three millions of people, and of five hundred millions of acres of land, and yet from the remote fituation of the invading powers, and the thin population of the invaded States, efpecially IIS pecially in the fouthern extreme of the union, this momentous queftion was materially affected by the confequences of battles, in which only a few hundreds engaged.

The feries of difasters which had followed the American arms fince the landing of the British near Savannah, occafioned well founded apprehension for the fafety of the adjacent States. The militia of South-Carolina was therefore put on a better footing, and a regiment of cavalry was raifed. John Rutledge a Carolinian of the most diftinguished abilities, was called to the chair of government by an almost unanimous vote, and in imitation of the ancient republic of Rome invefted, in conjunction with his council, with dictatorial powers. By virtue of his authority, he convened a large body of the militia near the centre of the State, that they might be in conftant readinefs to march whitherfoever public fervice required. The original plan of penetrating into Georgia was refumed. Part of the American force was stationed on the north fide of the Savannah at Purryfburgh and Black-fwamp, while Gen. Lincoln and the main army croffed into Georgia near Augusta. General Prevoft availed himfelf of the critical moment, when the American army had afcended 150 miles towards the fource of the Savannah, and croffed into Carolina over the fame river near to its mouth, with about 2400 men. A confiderable body of Indians, whofe friendship the British had previously fecured, were affociated with the British on this expedition. The fuperior British force which croffed Savannah river, foon compelled General Moultrie, who was charged with the defence of South-Carolina, to retire. Lincoln on receiving information of these movements, detached 300 of his light troops to reinforce Moultrie, but proceeded with the main army towards the capital of Georgia. He was induced to purfue his original intention, from an idea that Gen. Prevost meant nothing more than to divert him by a feint on Carolina, and becaufe his marching down on the fouth fide of the river Savannah, would occasion very little additional delay in repairing to its defence. When Lincoln found found that Prevoft was ferioufly puffing for Charlefton, 1779. he re-croffed the Savannah and purfued him. The Britifh proceeded in their march by the main road near the fea coaft, with but little opposition, and in the mean time the Americans retreated before them towards Charleston. Gen. Moultrie, who ably conducted this retreat, had no cavalry to check the advancing foe. Inftead of his receiving reinforcements from the inhabitants, as he marched through the country, he was abandoned by many of the militia who went to their homes. Their families and property lay directly in the route of the invading army. The absence of the main army under Lincoln, the retreat of Moultrie, the plunderings and devastations of the invaders, and above all the dread of the Indian favages which accompanied the royal army, diffused a general panic among the inhabitants. The terror of each individual became a fource of terror to another. From the influence of these causes, many were induced to apply for British protection. New converts to the royal standard endeavoured to ingratiate themfelves with their protectors, by encouraging them to attempt the reduction of Charlefton. Being in their power, they were more anxious to frame intelligence on the idea of what was agreeable, than of what was true. They reprefented the inhabitants as being generally tired of the war, and withing for peace at all events. They also stated that Charleston was incapable of much refistance. These circumstances combined with the facility with which the British marched through the country, induced Gen. Prevoft to extend his plan and push for Charleston. Had he defigned it at first, and continued his march with the fame rapidity with which it was begun, the town would probably have been carried by a coup-de-main, but he halted two or three days when advanced near half the diltance In that interval every preparation was made by the South-Carolinians, for the defence of their capital. All the houses in its fuburbs were burnt. Lines and abbatis were, in a few days, carried acrofs the peninfula between Ashley and Cooper rivers, and cannon were mounted at proper intervals on its whole extent. Though this vifit of 3779. of the British, and especially an attack on the land fide, was unexpected, yet in a few days great preparations were made, and a force of 3300 men affembled in Charleston for its defence.

The main body and baggage of the British army, being left on the fouth fide of Ashley river, an advanced May 11. detachment of 900 men, croffed the ferry and appeared before the town. In the mean time Lincoln was marching on as fast as possible, for the relief of Charleston, but as his arrival was doubtful and the crifis hazardous, to gain time was a matter of confequence. A whole day was therefore fpent in the exchange of flags. Commilioners from the garrifon were inftructed "to propofe a neutrality during the war between Great Britain and America, and that the queftion whether the ftate shall belong to Great Britain, or remain one of the United States, be determined by the treaty of peace between these powers". The British commanders refused this advantageous offer, alledging that they did not come in a legiflative capacity, and infifted that as the inhabitants and others were in arms, they fhould furrender prifoners of war. This being refused the garrifon prepared for an immediate affault, but this was not attempted. About this time Major Benjamin Huger commanding a party without the lines, was through miftake killed by his countrymen. This was a lofs indeed. The liberality, generofity and public fpirit, which diftinguished him as a citizen, added to great political and military talents, rendered his untimely death the fubject of univerfal regret. By his fall the country was deprived of one of its firmeft and most useful friends, and the army lost one of its brighteft ornaments. Prevoft knowing by an intercepted letter, that Lincoln was coming on in his rear, retreated from Charleston, and filed off with his whole force from the main to the iflands near the fea, that he might avoid being between two fires. Both armies encamped in the vicinity of Charleston, watching each others motions Jun, 20. till the 20th of June, when an attack was made with about 1200 Americans on fix or 700 of the British, advantageoufly posted at Stono ferry. The latter had re-

By a preconcerted plan, a feint was to have been made from James Island, with a body of Charleston militia, at the moment when Gen. Lincoln began the attack from the main, but from mismanagement, they did not reach their place of deftination till the action was over. The attack was continued for an hour and twenty minutes, and the affailants had the advantage, but the appearance of a reinforcement, to prevent which the feint from James Island was intended, made their retreat necessary. The lofs of the Americans in killed and wounded was about 150. Among the former was Col. Roberts, an artiflery officer of diffinguished abilities. Having been bred to arms in his native country England, he had been particularly ferviceable in diffusing military knowledge among the lefs informed American officers. In the flort interval between his being wounded and his dying, he was vifited on the field of battle by his fon Capt. Roberts, of his own regiment. The expiring father prefented his fword to his fon, with an exhortation to behave worthy of it, and to use it in defence of liberty and his country. After a fhort conversation he defired him to return to his proper station, adding for reason "that there he might be ufeful, but to him he could be of no fervice".

Immediately after this attack, the American militia impatient of abfence from their homes returned to their plantations, and about the fame time the British left the islands adjacent to Charleston, retreating from one to another, till they arrived at Port-royal and Savannah. A confiderable garrifon was left at the former place under Col. Maitland, but the main body went to Savannah.

This incursion into South-Carolina contributed very little to the advancement of the royal caufe, but added much to the wealth of the officers, foldiers and followers of the British army, and fill more to the distresses of the inhabitants. The forces under the command of Gen. Prevost spread themselves over a considerable part of the richest fettlements of the flate, and where there are the fewest white inhabitants in proportion to the number of flaves.

They not only rifled the inhabitants of houfhold furniture, but of wearing apparel, money, rings and other perfonal ornaments. Every place, in their line of march, experienced the effects of their rapacity.

> - Soon after the affair at Stono, the continental forces under the command of Gen. Lincoln retired to Sheldon, a healthy fituation in the vicinity of Beaufort. Both armies remained in their refpective encampments, till the airival of a French fleet on the coaft, roufed the whole country to immediate activity.

Count D'Eftaing having repaired and victualled his fleet at Bofton, failed for the Weft-Indies, " and on the fame day Commodore Hotham with five men of war, a Nov. 3. bomb veffel and fome frigates, fet out from New-York to 1778. convoy a number of transports with Gen. received inftructions from the King his mafter to act in concert with the forces of the United States, and being ftrongly folicited by Gen. Lincoln, Prefident Lownds, Gov. Rutledge, and Mr. Plombard Conful of France in Charleston, he failed for the American continent with expectation of rendering effential fervice, in operating Sept. 1. against the common enemy. He arrived on the coast of Georgia, with a fleet confifting of twenty fail of the line, two of fifty guns and eleven frigates. His appearance was fo unexpected that the Experiment man of war, of 5 guns commanded by Sir James Wallace, and three frigates fell into his hands.

As foon as his arrival on the coaft was known, Gen. Lincoln with the army under his command, marched for the vicinity of Savannah, and orders were given for the militia of Georgia and South-Carolina to rendezvous near the fame place. The British were equally diligent in preparing for their defence. Great numbers were employ- $\mathbf{c}\mathbf{d}$

ed both by day and night, in ftrengthening and extending 1779. their lines. The American militia, flushed with the hope of fpeedily expelling the British from their fouthern poffeffions, turned out with an alacrity which far furpaffed their exertions in the preceding campaign. D'Eftaing before the arrival of Lincoln demanded the furrender of the town to the arms of France. Prevoft in his answer declined furrendering on a general fummons, and requested that specific terms should be proposed, to which he would give an answer. The Count replied that it was the part of the befieged to propofe terms. Prevoft then asked for a suspension of hostilities, for 24 hours, for preparing proper terms. This was inconfiderately granted. Before the 24 hours elapfed, Lieut. Col. Maitland with feveral hundred men who had been stationed at Beaufort, made their way good through many obstacles, and joined the royal army in Savannah. The garrifon, encouraged by the arrival of fo refpectable a force, determined on refiftance. The French and Americans, who formed a junction the evening after, were therefore reduced to the neceffity of ftorming or befieging the garrifon. The refolution of proceeding by fiege being adopted, feveral days were confumed in preparing for it, and in the mean time the works of the garrifon were hourly ftrengthened by the labour of feveral hundred negrocs, directed by that able engineer Major Moncrief. Oct. 4. The befiegers opened with nine mortars, thirty feven pieces of cannon from the land fide, and fifteen from the water. Soon after the commencement of the cannonade, Prevoft folicited for leave to fend the women and children out of town, but this was refused. The combined army fulpected that a defire of fecreting the plunder, lately taken from the South-Carolinians, was covered under the veil of humanity. It was also prefumed that a refusal would expedite a furrender. On a report from the engineers that a confiderable time would be neceffary to reduce the garrifon by regular approaches, it was determined to make an affault. This measure was forced on Count D'Eftaing by his marine officers, who had remonstrated against his continuing to risk fo valuable Vol. II. a fleet

In a few days the lines of the befiegers might have been carried into the works of the befieged, but under these critical circumstances, no farther delay could be admitted. To affault or raife the fiege was the alternative. Prudence would have dictated the latter, but a fenfe of honor determined the befiegers to adopt the for-Two feints were made with the country militia, mer. and a real attack on Spring-hill battery early in the morning, with 3500 French troops, 600 continentals, and 350 of the inhabitants of Charleston. These boldly marched up to the lines, under the command of D'Eftaing and Lincoln, but a heavy and well directed fire from the batteries, and a crois fire from the gallies, threw the front of their columns into confusion. Twofandards were neverthelefs planted on the British redoubts. A retreat of the assailants was ordered, after they had flood the enemies fire for 55 minutes. Count D'Eftaing and Count Pulafki were both wounded. The former flightly, but the latter mortally. Six hundred and thirty feven of the French, and upwards of 200 of the continentals and militia were killed or wounded. Gen. Prevoft, Lieut. Col. Maitland, and Major Moncrief defervedly acquired great reputation by this fucceffful defence. The force of the garrifon was between 2 and 3000, of which about 150 were militia. The damage fustained by the befieged was trifling, as they fired from behind works, and few of the affailants fired at all. Immediately after this unfuccefsful affault, the militia, almost univerfally, went to their homes. Count D'Estaing reimbarked his troops and artillery, and left the continent.

> While the fiege of Savannah was pending, a remarkable enterprife was effected by Col. John White of the Georgia line. Capt. French had taken post with about 100 men near the river Ogechee, fome time before the fiege began. There were alfo at the fame place forty failors on board of five British vessels, four of which were were armed. All these men, together with the vessels 1779. and 130 stand of arms, were furrendered to Col. White, Capt. Elholm and four others, one of which was the Colonel's fervant. On the preceding night this small party kindled a number of fires in different places, and adopted the parade of a large encampment. By these and a variety of deceptive stratagems, Capt. French was fully impressed with an opinion, that nothing but an instant furrender, in conformity to a peremptory summons, could fave his men from being cut to pieces by a superior force. He therefore gave up, without making any refissance.

This visit of the fleet of his most Christian Majefty to the coast of America, though unfuccessful as to its main object, was not without utility to the United States. It disconcerted the measures already digested by the British commanders, and caused a confiderable waste of time, before they could determine on a new plan of operations. It also occasioned the evacuation of Rhode-Island. But this was of no advantage to the United States. For of all the blunders committed by the British in the course of the American war, none was greater than their stationing near 6000 men, for two years and eight months, on that Island, where they were lost to every purpose of co-operation, and where they could render very little more fervice to the royal cause, than could have been obtained by a couple of frigates cruising in the vicinity.

The fiege being raifed, the continental troops retreated over the river Savannah. The vicifitudes of an autumnal atmosphere made a fevere impression on the irritable fibres of men, exhausted with fatigue and dejected by defeat. In proportion to the towering hopes, with which the expedition was undertaken, was the depression of fpirits subsequent to its failure. The Georgia exiles, who had affembled from all quarters to reposse themfelves of their estates, were a fecond time obliged to flee from their country and posses. The most gloomy apprehensions, respecting the Southern States, took posfession of the minds of the people.

Thuş

Thus ended the fouthern campaign of 1779, without any thing decifive on either fide. After one year, in which the Britith had over-run the State of Georgia for 150 miles from the fea coaft, and had penetrated as far as the lines of Charlefton, they were reduced to their original limits in Savannah. All their fchemes of cooperation with the tories had failed, and the fpirits of that clafs of the inhabitants, by fucceffive difappointments, were thoroughly broken.

The campaign of 1779 is remarkable for the feeble exertions of the Americans. Accidental caufes, which had previoufly excited their activity, had in a great meafure ceased to have influence. An enthusiasm for liberty made them comparatively difregard property, and brave all danger in the first years of the war. The successes of their arms near the beginning of 1777, and the hopes of capturing Burgoyne's army in the clofe of it, together with the brifk circulation of a large quantity of paper money in good credit, made that year both active and decifive. The flattering profpects infpired by the alliance with France in 1778 banished all fears of the fuccess of the revolution, but the failure of every fcheme of co-opcration produced a defpondency of mind unfavourable to great exertions. Inftead of driving the British out of the country, as the Americans vainly prefumed, the campaign of 1778 and 1779 terminated without any direct advantage from the French fleet fent to their aid. Expecting too much from their allies, and then failing in thefe expectations, they were less prepared to profecute the war from their own refources, than they would have been had D'Eftaing not touched on their coaft. Their army was reduced in its numbers, and badly cloathed: In the first years of the war the mercantile character was loft in the military fpirit of the times, but in the progrefs of it the inhabitants, cooling in their enthufiafm, gradually returned to their former habits of lucrative bufinefs. This made distinction between the army and the citizens, and was unfriendly to military exertions. While feveral foreign events tended to the embarrafiment of Great-Britain, and indirectly to the establishment of independence, a variety of of internal caufes relaxed the exertions of the Americans, and for a time made it doubtful, whether they would ultimately be independent citizens or conquered fubjects. Among thefe, the daily depreciation of their bills of credit held a diffinguished pre-eminence. This fo materially affected every department as to merit a particular difcusfion The fubject, to prevent an interruption of the thread of the narrative, is treated of in a feparate appendix.

TN the modern mode of making war, money is not lefs effential, than valour in the field, or wifdom in the cabinet. The deepeft purse decides the fate of contending nations, as often as the longeft fword. It early occurred to the founders of the American empire, that the eftablished revenues of Great Britain, must eventually overbalance the fudden and impetuous fallies of men contending for freedom, on the fpur of the occafion, and without the permanent means of defence ; but how to remedy the evil, puzzled their wifest politicians. Gold and filver, as far as was known, had not a physical existence in the country, in any quantity equal to the demands of war, nor could they be procured from abroad, as the channels of commerce had been previously thut, by the voluntary affociation of Congress to fuspend foreign America having never been much taxed in trade. any direct way, and being without eftablished governments, and efpecially as the was contending against what was lately lawful authority, could not immediately proceed to taxation. Belides as the contest was on the fubject of taxation, the laying on of taxes adequate to the exigencies of war, even though it had been practicable, would have been impolitic The only plaufible expedient in their power to adopt, was the emiffion of bills of credit reprefenting specie, under a public engagement to be ultimately funk by equal taxes, or exchanged for gold or filver. This practice had been familiar from the first fettlement of the colonies, and under proper reftrictions had 1779. had been found highly advantageous. Their refolution to raife an army in June 1775, was therefore followed by another to emit bills of credit, to the amount of two millions of dollars. To that fum on the 25th of the next month, it was refolved to add another million. For their redemption they pledged the confederated colonies, and directed each colony to find ways and means, to fink its proportion and quota, in four annual payments, the first to be made on or before the last of Nov. 1779. That time was fixed upon from an expectation, that previous to its arrival, the contest would be brought to a conclusion. On the 29th of November, 1775, an effimate having been made by Congress of the public expences a'ready incurred,, or likely to be incurred in carrying on their defence till the 10th of June, 1776, it was refolved to emit a farther fum of three millions of dollars, to be redeemed as the former by four annual payments, the first to be made on or before the last day of Novem. 1783. It was at the fame time determined, that the quotas of bills to be redeemed by each colony, fhould be in a relative proportion to their refpective numbers of inhabitants. This effimate was calculated to defray expences to the 10th of June, 1776, on the idea that an accommodation would take place before that time. Hitherto all arrangements, both for men and money were temporary, and founded on the fuppofed probability of a reconciliation. Early in 1776, Congrefs obtained information, that Great Britain had contracted for 16,000 foreign mercenaries, to be fent over for the purpose of subduing America. This enforced the neceffity of extending their plan of defence, beyond the 10th of the next June. They therefore on the 17th of February 1776, ordered four millions of dollars to be emitted, and on the 9th of May and the 22d of July following, emitted ten millions more on the fame fecurity. Such was the animation of the times, that these feveral emissions amounting in the aggregate to 20 millions of dollars, circulated for feveral months without any depreciation, and commanded the refources of the country for public fervice, equally with the fame fum of gold or filver.

filver. The United States derived for a confiderable time, as much benefit from this paper creation of their own, though without any eftablished funds for its fupport or redemption, as would have refulted from a free gift of as many Mexican dollars. While the ministry of England were puzzling themfelves for new taxes, andfunds on which to raife their fupplies, Congress raifed theirs by refolutions, directing paper of no intrinfic value to be struck off, in form of promisfory notes. But there was a point both in time and quantity, beyond which this congressional alchymy ceased to operate. That time was about 18 months from the date of their first emission, and that quantity about 20 millions of dollars.

Independence being declared in the fecond year of the war, and the object for which arms were at first assumed being changed, it was obvious that more money must be procured, and equally fo that if bills of credit were multiplied beyond a reafonable fum for circulation, they must necessarily depreciate. It was therefore on the 3d of October 1776 refolved to borrow five millions of dollars, and in the month following a lottery was fet on foot for obtaining a farther fum on loan. The expences of the war were fo great, that the money ariling from both, though confiderable, was far fhort of a fufficiency. The rulers of America thought it ftill premature to urge taxation. They therefore reiterated the expedienz of farther emifiions. The eafe with which the means of procuring fupplies were furnished by ftriking off bills of credit, and the readinefs of the people to receive them. prompted Congress to multiply them beyond the limits of prudence. A diminution of their value was the unavoidable confequence. This at first was fearcely perceivable, but it daily increased. The zeal of the people neverthelefs fo far overbalanced the nice mercantile calculations of interest, that the campaigns of 1776 and 1777 were not affected by the depreciation of the paper currency. Congress forefaw that this could not long be the cafe. It was therefore on the 22d of November 1777 recommended to the feveral States, to raife by taxes the fum 1779. fum of five millions of dollars, for the fervice of the year 1778.

> Previoufly to this it had been refolved to borrow larger fums, and for the encouragement of lenders, it was agreed to pay the interest which should accrue thereon by bills of exchange, payable in France, out of monies borrowed there for the use of the United States. This tax unfortunately failed in feveral of the States. From the impoffibility of procuring a fufficiency of money either from loans or taxes, the old expedient of farther emiffions was reiterated; but the value decreased as the quantity increafed. Congress anxious to put a ftop to the increafe of their bills of credit, and to provide a fund for reducing what were iffued, called upon the States on the 1ft of January 1779, to pay into the continental treafury their respective quotas of fifteen millions of dollars for the fervice of that year, and of fix millions annually from and after the year 1779, as a fund for reducing their early emiffions and loans. Such had been the miftaken ideas, which originally prevailed of the duration of the contest, that though the war was raging, and the demands for money unabated, yet the period was arrived which had been originally fixed upon for the redemption of the first emissions of Congress.

> In addition to thefe 15 millions called for on the 1ft of January 1779, the States were on the 21ft of May following called upon to furnish, for public fervice within the current year, their respective quotas of 45 millions of dollars. Congress wished to arrest the growing depreciation, and therefore called for taxes in large fums, proportioned to the demands of the public, and alfo to the diminished value of their bills. These requisitions, though nominally large, were by no means fufficient. From the fluctuating state of the money, it was impossible to make any certain calculations, for it was not two days of the fame value. A fum which when demanded, would have purchased a sufficiency of the commodities wanted for the public fervice, was very inadequate, when the collection was made, and the money lodged in the treafury. The depreciation began at different periods in different States:

States; but in general about the middle of the year 1777, 1779. and progreffively increased for three or four years. Towards the last of 1777, the depreciation was about two or three for one; in 1778 it advanced from two or three for one to five or fix for one; in 1779, from five or fix for one to 27 or 28 for one; in 1780 from 27 or 28 for one to 50 or 60 for one, in the first four or five months. Its circulation was afterwards partial, but where it paffed it foon depreciated to 150 for one. In fome few parts it continued in circulation for the first four or five months of 1781, but in this latter period many would not take it at any rate, and they who did, received it at a depreciation of feveral hundreds for one.

As there was a general clamor on account of the floods of money, which at fucceffive periods had deluged the States, it was refolved in October 1779 that no farther fum fhould be iffued on any account whatever than what, when added to the prefent fum in circulation, would in the whole be equal to 200 millions of dollars. It was at the fame time refolved, that Congress should emit only fuch a part of the fum wanting to make up 200 millions, as fhould be abfolutely neceffary for the public exigencies, before adequate fupplies could be otherwife obtained, relying for fuch fupplies on the exertions of the feveral States. This was for- Sept. 13. cibly represented in a circular letter from Congress to their conflituents, and the States were earneftly intreated to prevent that deluge of evils which would flow from their neglecting to furnish adequate supplies for the wants of the confederacy. The fame circular letter stated the practicability of redeeming all the bills of Congress at par with gold and filver, and rejected with indignation the fuppofition that the States would ever tarnish their credit by violating public faith. These strong declarations in favour of the paper currency deceived many to repole confidence in it to their ruin. Subfequent events compelled Congress to adopt the very measure in 1780, which in the preceding year they had fincerely reprobated.

From the non-compliance of the States, Congress was obliged in a fhort time after the date of their circular letter to iffue fuch a farther quantity, as when added to Vol. II. previous R

1779. previous emiffions made the fum of 200 millions of dollars. Betides this immenfe fum, the paper emiffions of the different States amounted to many millions; which mixed with the continental money, and added to its depreciation. What was of little value before now beeame of lefs. The whole was foon expended, and yet from its increafed depreciation the immediate wants of the army were not fupplied. The fource which for five years had enabled Congrefs to keep an army in the field being exhausted, Gen. Washington was reduced for fome time to the alternative of difbanding his troops, or of fupplying them by a military force. He preferred the latter, and the inhabitants of New-York and New-Jerfey, though they felt the injury, faw the neceffity, and patiently fubmitted.

The States were next called upon to furnish in lieu of money determinate quantities of beef, pork, flour and other articles, for the use of the army. This was called a requifition for specific supplies or a tax in kind, and was found on experiment to be fo difficult of execution, fo inconvenient, partial and expensive, that it was speedily abandoned. About this time, Congress resolved upon another expedient. This was to iffue a new species of paper money, under the guarantee of the feveral States. The old money was to be called in by taxes, and as foon as brought in to be burnt, and in lieu thereof, one dollar of the new was to be emitted for every twenty of the old, fo that when the whole 200 millions were drawn in and cancelled, only ten millions of the new fhould be iffued in their place, four tenths of which were to be fubject to the order of Congress, and the remaining fix tenths to the order of the feveral States. Thefe new bills were to be redeemable in fpecie within fix years, and to bear an interest at the rate of five per cent. to be paid alfo in fpecie, at the redemption of the bills, or at the election of the owner annually in bills of exchange on the American commissioners in Europe, at four shillings and fix pence for each dollar.

From the execution of thefe refolutions it was expected, that the old money would be cancelled---that the currency currency would be reduced to a fixed ftandard --- that the 1779. States would be fupplied with the means of purchafing the fpecific fupplies required of them, and that Congress would be furnished with efficient money, to provide for the exigencies of the war. That thefe good effects would have followed, even though the refolutions of Congrefs had been carried into execution, is very queftionable, but from the partial compliances of the States the experiment was never fairly made, and the new paper anfwered very little purpofe. It was hoped by varying the ground of credit, that Congress would gain a repetition of the advantages which refulted from their first paper expedient, but these hopes were of short duration. By this time much of the popular enthusiafm had fpent itfelf, and confidence in public engagements was nearly expired. The event proved, that credit is of too delicate a nature to be fported with, and can only be maintained by honefty and punctuality. The feveral expedients proposed by Congress for raising supplies having failed, 'a crifis followed very interefting to the fuccefs of the revolution. The particulars of this shall be related among the public events of the year 1781, in which it took place. Some observations on that primary instrument of American Independence, the old continental bills of credit, shall for the present close this subject.

It would have been impoffible to have carried on the war, without fomething in the form of money. There was fpirit enough in America to bring to the field of battle as many of her fons, as would have out-numbered the armies of Britain, and to have rifqued their fate on a general engagement; but this was the very thing they ought to avoid. Their principal hope lay in evacuating, retreating, and protracting to its utmost length a war of pofts. The continued exertions, neceffary for this species of defence, could not be expected from the impetuous fallies of militia. A regular permanent army became neceffary. Though the enthusiafm of the times might have difpenfed with prefent pay, yet without at leaft as much money, as would support them in the field, the most patriotic army must have dispersed.

The impoflibility of the Americans procuring gold and filver even for that purpofe, doubtlefs weighed with the British as an encouragement, to bring the controversy to the decision of the fword. What they knew could not be done by ordinary means, was accomplished by those which were extraordinary. Paper of no intrinsic value was made to answer all the purposes of gold and filver, and to support the expences of five campaigns. This was in fome degree owing to a previous confidence, which had been begotten by honefty and fidelity, in difcharging the engagements of government. From New-York to Georgia there never had been in matters relating to money, an inftance of a breach of public faith. In the fcarcity of gold and filver, many emergencies had impofed a neceffity of emitting bills of credit. These had been uniformly and honeftly redeemed. The bills of Congress being thrown into circulation, on this favourable foundation of public confidence, were readily received. The enthusiasm of the people contributed to the same effect. That the endangered liberties of America ought to be defended, and that the credit of their paper was effentially neceffary to a proper defence, were opinions engraven on the hearts of a great majority of the citizens. It was therefore a point of honor and confidered as a part of duty, to take the bills freely at their full value. Private gain was then fo little regarded, that the whig citizens were willing to run all the hazards incidental to bills of credit, rather than injure the caufe of their country by undervaluing its money. Every thing human has its limits. While the credit of the money was well fupported by public confidence and patriotifm, its value diminished from the increase of its quantity. Repeated emissions begat that natural depreciation, which refults from an excels of quantity. This was helped on by various caufes, which affected the credit of the money. The enemy very ingenioufly counterfeited their bills, and industrioufly circulated their forgeries through the United States. Congrefs allowed to their public agents a commiffion on the amount of their purchases. Instead of exerting shemfelves to purchase at a low price, they had therefore fore an intereft in giving a high price for every thing. 1779. So ftrong was the force of prejudice, that the British mode of fupplying armies by contract, could not for a long time obtain the approbation of Congress. While these causes operated, confidence in the public was abating, and at the fame time, that fervor of patriotifm which difregarded intereft was daily declining. To prevent or retard the depreciation of their paper money, Congress attempted to prop its credit by means which wrecked private property, and injured the morals of the people without answering the end proposed. They recommended to the States to pass laws for regulating the prices of labour, manufacture and all forts of commodities, and for confifcating and felling the eftates of tories, and for invefting the money arising from the fales thereof in loan-office certificates. As many of those who were difaffected to the revolution abfolutely refufed to take the bills of Congress even in the first stage of the war, when the real and nominal value was the fame, with the view of counteracting their machinations, Congress early recommended to the States to pass laws for making the paper money a legal tender, at their nominal value in the discharge of bona fide debts, though contracted to be paid in gold or filver. With the fame views, they farther recommended that laws should be passed by each of the States, ordaining that "whofoever fhould afk or receive more, in their bills of credit for gold or filver or any fpecies of money whatfoever, than the nominal fum thereof in Spanish dollars, or more in the faid bills for any commodities whatfoever, than the fame could be purchafed from the fame perfon in gold and filver, or offer to fell any commodities for gold or filver, and refuse to fell the fame for the faid bills, shall be deemed an enemy to the liberties of the United States, and forfeit the property fo fold or offered for fale". The laws which were paffed by the States, for regulating the prices of labor and commodities, were found on experiment to be visionary and impracticable. They only operated on the patriotic few, who were difposed to facrifice every thing in the caufe of their country, and who implicitly obeyed every mandate of

of their rulers. ¹Others difregarded them, and either refused to part with their commodities, or demanded and obtained their own prices.

These laws in the first instance, made an artificial fearcity, and had they not been repealed would foon have made a real one, for men never exert themselves unless they have the fruit of their exertions fecured to them, and at their own disposal.

The confifcation and fale of the property of tories, for the most part brought but very little into the public trea-The fales were generally made for credit, and by furv. the progreffive depreciation, what was dear at the time of the purchase, was very cheap at the time of payment. The most extensive mischief refulted in the progress, and towards the close of the war from the operation of the laws, which made the paper bills a tender, in the difcharge of debts contracted payable in gold or filver. When this measure was first adopted little or no injustice refulted from it, for at that time the paper bills were equal, or nearly equal to gold or filver, of the fame nominal fum. In the progrefs of the war, when depreciation took place, the cafe was materially altered. Laws which were originally innocent became eventually the occasion of much injustice.

The aged who had retired from the fcenes of active bufinefs, to enjoy the fruits of their industry, found their fubstance melting away to a mere pittance, infufficient for their fupport. The widow who lived comfortably on the bequefts of a deceased hutband, experienced a frustration of all his well meant tenderness. The laws of the country interpofed, and compelled her to receive a shilling, where a pound was her due. The blooming virgin who had grown up with an unquestionable title to a liberal patrimony, was legally ftripped of every thing but her perfonal charms and virtues. The haplefs orphan, inftead of receiving from the hands of an executor, a competency to fct out in bulinefs, was obliged to give a final difcharge on the payment of 6d. in the pound. In many inftances, the earnings of a long life of care and diligence were, 'in the fpace of a few years, reduced to a trifling fum. A few perfons efcaped thefe thefe affecting calamities, by fecretly transferring their bonds, or by flying from the prefence or neighbourhood of their debtors. The evils which refulted from the legal tender of thefe paper bills, were foreign from the intentions of Congrefs, and of the State legiflatures. It is but juffice to add farther, that a great proportion of them flowed from ignorance. Till the year 1780, when the bills fell to forty for one, it was defigned by most of the rulers of America, and believed by a great majority of the people, that the whole fum in circulation would be appreciated by a reduction of its quantity, fo as finally to be equal to gold or filver. In every department of government the Americans erred from ignorance, but in none fo much, as in that which related to money.

Such were the evils which refulted from paper money. On the other hand, it was the occasion of good to many. It was at all times the poor man's friend. While it was current, all kinds of labor very readily found their reward. In the first years of the war, none were idle from want of employment, and none were employed, without having it in their power to obtain ready payment for their fervices. To that clafs of people, whofe daily labor was their fupport, the depreciation was no difadvantage. Expending their money as fast as thes received it, they always got its full value. The reverfe was the cafe with the rich, or those who were disposed to hoarding. No agrarian law ever had a more extensive operation, than continental money. That for which the Gracchi loft their lives in Rome, was peaceably effected in the United States, by the legal tender, of these depreciating bills. The poor became rich, and the rich hecame poor. Money lenders, and they whofe circumftances enabled them to give credit, were effentially injured. All that the money loft in its value was fo much taken from their capital, but the active and industrious indemnified themfelves, by conforming the price of their fervices to the prefent state of the depreciation. The experience of this time inculcated on youth two falutary leffons, the impolicy of depending on paternal acquifitions, and the necessity of their own exertions. They who were

were in debt, and possefield property of any kind, could eafily make the latter extinguish the former. Every thing that was useful when brought to market readily found a purchaser. A hog or two would pay for a flave; a few cattle for a comfortable house; and a good horse for an improved plantation. A small part of the productions of a farm would discharge the long outstanding accounts, due from its owner. The dreams of the golden age were realised to the poor man and the debtor, but unfortunately what these gained, was just so much taken from others.

The evils of depreciation did not terminate with the war. They extend to the prefent hour. That the helplefs part of the community were legiflatively deprived of their property, was among the leffer evils, which refulted from the legal tender of the depreciated bills of credit. The iniquity of the laws eftranged the minds of mahy of the citizens from the habits and love of juffice.

The nature of obligations was fo far changed, that he was reckoned the honeft man, who from principle delayed to pay his debts. The mounds which government had erected, to fecure the obfervance of honefty in the commercial intercourfe of man with man, were broken down. Truth, honor, and juftice were fwept away by the overflowing deluge of legal iniquity, nor have they yet affumed their ancient and accuftomed feats. Time and induftry have already, in a great degree, repaired the loffes of property, which the citizens fuftained during the war, but both have hitherto failed in effacing the taint which was then communicated to their principles, nor can its total ablution be expected till a new generation arifes, unpractifed in the iniquities of their fathers.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Indians and Expeditions into the Indian Country.

HEN the English colonies were first planted in North America, the country was inhabited by numerous tribes of Indians, who principally supported themselves

themfelves by the fpontaneous productions of nature. The arts and arms of Europeans foon gave them an afcendency over fuch untutored favages. Had the latter underftood their intereft, and been guided by a fpirit of union, they would foon have expelled the invaders, and in that cafe they might now be flourishing in the poffeffion of their ancient territories and independence. By degrees the old inhabitants were circumferibed within narrower limits, and by fome ftrange fatality, their numbers have been conftantly leffening. The names of feveral nations who in the last century boasted of feveral thousands, are now known only to those who are fond of curious refearches. Many are totally extinct, and others can fhew no more than a few ftraggling individuals, the remnants of their fallen greatnefs. That fo many tribes should, in fo fhort a time, lofe both their country and their national existence, is an event scarcely to be paralleled in the history of the world. Spiritous liquors, the finall pox, and an abridgment of territory, to a people whofe mode of life needed an extensive range, evils which chiefly refulted from the neighbourhood of Europeans, were among the principal caufes of their destruction. The reflections which may be excited by reviewing the havoc made among the native proprietors of this new world, is in fome degree alleviated by its counterpart. While one fet of inhabitants was infenfibly dwindling away, another improving in the arts of civil and focial life was growing in numbers, and gradually filling up their places. As the emigrants from Europe, and their dependents extended their poffeffions on the fea coaft, the Aborigines retired from it. By this gradual advance of the one and retiring of the other, the former always prefented an extenfive frontier, to the incursions of the latter. The European emigrants from an avidity for land, the poffession of which is the ultimate object of human avarice, were prone to encroach on the territories of the Indians, while the Indians from obvious principles of human nature, beheld with concern the descendants of the ancient proprietors circumfcribed in their territory by the defcendants of those strangers, whom their fathers had per-VOL. II. mitted S

mitted to refide among them. From these causes and 1779. efpecially from the licentious conduct of diforderly individuals of both Indians and white people, there were frequent interruptions of the peace in their contiguous fettlements. In the war between France and England which commenced in 1755, both parties paid affiduous attention to the Aborigines. The former fucceeded in fecuring the greatest number of adherents, but the fuperior fuccefs of the latter in the progrefs, and at the termination of the war, turned the current of Indian affections and interest in their favor. When the dispute between Great Britain and her colonies began to grow ferious, the friendship of the Indians became a matter of confequence to both parties. Stretching for fifteen hundred miles along the whole north-western frontier of the colonies, they were to them defirable friends and formidable enemies. As terror was one of the engines by which Great Britain intended to enforce the fubmiflion of the colonies, nothing could be more conducive to the excitement of this paffion, than the co-operation of Indians. Policy, not cruelty, led to the adoption of this expedient : But it was of that over-refined fpecies which counteracts itfelf. In the competition for the friendship of the Indians, the British had advantages far superior to any which were poffefied by the the colonifts. The expulsion of the French from Canada, an event which had only taken place about 13 years before, was still fresh in the memory of many of the favages, and had infpired them with high ideas of the martial fuperiority of British troops. The first steps taken by the Congress to oppose Great Britain, put it out of their power to gratify the Indians. Such was the effect of the non-importation agreement of 1774. While Great Britain had accefs to the principal Indian tribes through Canada on the north, and the two Floridas on the fouth, and was abundantly able to fapply their many wants, the colonifts had debarred themfelves from importing the articles which were neceffary. for the Indian trade.

It was unfortunate for the colonics, that fince the peace of Paris 1763, the transactions with the Indians

had been mostly carried on by fuperintendants appointed 1779. and paid by the King of Great Britain. Thefe being under obligations to the crown, and expectants of further favours from it, generally ufed their influence with the Indians in behalf of the Mother Country, and against the. colonies. They infinuated into the minds of the uninformed favages, that the King was their natural protector against the encroaching colonist, and that if the latter fucceeded in their opposition to Great Britain, they would probably next aim at the extirpation of their red neighbours. By fuch reprefentations, feconded with a profusion of prefents, the attachment of the Indians was pre-engaged in fupport of the British interest.

The Americans were not unmindful of the Savages on their frontier. They appointed commiffioners to explain to them the grounds of the difpute, and to cultivate their friendship by treaties and prefents. They endeavoured to perfuade the Indians that the quarrel was by no means relative to them, and that therefore they should take part with neither fide.

For the greater convenience of managing the intercourfe between the colonies and the Indians, the latter were divided into three departments, the northern, fouthern and middle, and commiffioners were appointed for Jan. 26. each. Congress also refolved to import and distribute among them a fuitable affortment of goods, to the amount of £40,000 sterling, on account of the United States; but this was not executed. All the exertions of Congress were infufficient for the fecurity of their weftern frontiers. In almost every period of the war, a great majority of the Indians took part with Great Britain against the Americans. South-Carolina was among the first of the States, which experienced the effects of British influence over the Indians. The Cherokees and Creeks inhabit lands, not far diftant from the weftern fettlements of Carolina and Georgia. The intercourfe with thefe tribes had, for feveral years prior to the American war, been exclusively committed to John Stuart an officer of the crown, and devoted to the royal intereft. His influence, which was great, was wholly exerted in favor of Great Britain. A plan was fettled by him, in concert 1779. with the King's governors, and other royal fervants, to land a royal armed force in Florida, and to proceed with it to the western frontier of the Southern States, and there in conjunction with the tories and Indians, to fall on the friends of Congress, at the fame time that a fleet and army should invade them on the fea coast. The whole fcheme was providentially difcovered by the capture of Mofes Kirkland, one of the principal agents to be employed in its execution, while he was on his way to Gen. Gage with defpatches, detailing the particulars, and foliciting for the requisite aid to accomplish it. The possession of Kirkland, and of his papers, enabled the Americans to take fuch fteps as in a great degree fruftrated the views of the royal fervants, yet fo much was carried into effect, that the Cherokees began their maffacres, at the very time the Britith fleet attacked the fort on Sullivan's Ifland. The undifturbed tranquillity, which took place in South-Carolina and the adjacent States, after the British had failed in their defigns against them in the fpring and fummer of 1776, gave an opportunity for carrying war into the Indian country. This was done, not fo much to punish what was past, as to prevent all future co-operation between the Indians and British in that quarter.

Virginia, North-Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia each fent about the fame time a confiderable force over the Alleghany mountains, which traverfed the Indian feitlements, burned their towns, and deftroyed their fields of corn. Above 500 of the Cherokees were obliged, from the want of provisions, to take refuge in Weft-Florida, and were there fed at the expence of the British government. These unfortunate misled people fued for peace in the most submissive terms, and foon after affented to a treaty, by which they ceded a confiderable part of their land to South-Carolina. The decifion with which this expedition was conducted intimidated the Cherokees, for fome years, from farther hostilities. Very different was the cafe of those Indians who were in the vicinity of the British posts, and contiguous to the frontier of the northern and mildle States. The prefents which they continually continually received from England, the industry of the British agents, and the influence of a great number of American refugees who had taken shelter among them, operating on their native passion for rapine, excited them to frequent hostile excursions. Col. John Butler a Connecticut tory, and one Brandt a half Indian by blood, were the principal leaders of the Savages in these expeditions. The vast extent of frontier, and remote fituation of the fettlements, together with the exact knowledge which the refugees possible of the country, made it practicable for even finall marauding parties to do extensive mischief.

A ftorm of Indian and tory vengeance burft with par- 1778. ticular violence on Wyoming, a new and flourishing fet- July 1. tlement on the eastern branch of Sufguehannah. Unfortunately for the fecurity of the inhabitants, the foil was claimed both by Connecticut and Pennfylvania. From the collifion of contradictory claims, founded on royal charters, the laws of neither were fleadily enforced. In this remote fettlement, where government was feeble, the tories were under lefs control, and could eafily affemble undifcovered. Neverthelefs at one time 27 of them were taken, and fent to Hartford in Connecticut, but. they were afterwards releafed. Thefe and others of the fame defcription, inftigated by revenge against the Americans, from whom fome of them had fuffered banifhment and lofs of property, made a common caufe with the Indians, and attacked the Wyoming fettlement with their combined forces estimated at 1100 men, 000 of which were Indians. The whole was commanded by Col. John Butler, a Connecticut tory. One of the forts, which had been constructed for the fecurity of the inhabitants, being very weak, furrendered to this party: but fome of the garrifon had previoufly retired to the principal fort at Kingston, called Forty-Fort. Col. John 'July 2 Butler next demanded the furrender of that. Col. Zebulon Butler a continental officer who commanded there. fent a meffage to him, proposing a conference at a bridge without the fort. This being agreed to, Col. Zebulon Butler, Dennifon, and fome other officers repaired to the July 3. place place appointed, and they were followed by the whole garrison, a few invalids excepted. None of the enemy appeared. The Wyoming people advanced, and fuppofed that the enemy were retiring. They continued to march on, till they were about three miles from the fort. They then faw a few of the enemy, with whom they exchanged fome fhot, but they prefently found themfelves ambufcaded and attacked by the whole body of Indians and tories. They fought gallantly, till they found that their retreat to the fort was cut off. Universal confusion then enfued. Of 417 who had marched out of the fort, about 360 were inftantly flain. No quarters were given. Col. John Butler again demanded the furrender of Forty-Fort. This was agreed to under articles of capitulation, by which the effects of the people therein were to be fecured to them. The garrifon confifted of 30 men and 200 women. These were permitted to crofs the Sufquehannah, and retreat through the woods to Northampton county. The most of the other feattered fettlers had previoufly retired, fome through the woods to Northampton county, others down the river to Northumberland county. In this retreat, fome women were delivered of children in the woods, and many fuffered from want of provisions. Several of the fettlers at Wyoming had erected good houses and barns, and made very confiderable improvements. Thefe and all the other houses in the vicinity, except about half a dozen, were deftroyed. Their horfes, cattle, fheep, and hogs were for the most part killed or driven away by the enemy.

The diffress of this fettlement were uncommonly great. A large proportion of the male inhabitants were, in one day, flaughtered. In a fingle engagement, near 200 women were made widows, and a much greater number of children were left fatherlefs.

Soon after the defruction of the Wyoming fettlement, an expedition was carried on againft the Indians by Col. Butler of the Pennfylvania troops. Heand his party, having gained the head of the Delaware, marched down the river for two days, and then ftruck acrofs the country to the Sufquehannah. They totally burnt or diffroyed the 1779-Indian villages, both in that quarter and the other fettlements, but the inhabitants escaped. The destruction was extended for feveral miles on both fides of the Sufquehannah. The difficulties which Col. Butler's men encountered in this expedition, could not be undergone but by men who poffeffed a large fhare of hardinefs, both of body and mind. They were obliged to carry their provisions on their backs, and thus loaded, frequently to wade through creeks and rivers. After the toil of a hard march, they were obliged to endure chilly nights and heavy rains, without even the means of keeping their arms dry. They completed their bufinefs in fixteen days. Nov. 4. About four weeks after Col. Butler's return, fome hundreds of Indians, a large body of tories, and about 50 regulars entered Cherry-Valley within the State of New-York. They made an unfuccefsful attempt on fort Alden, but they killed and fcalped thirty two of the inhabitants, mostly women and children, and alfo Col. Alden and ten foldiers.

An expedition which was to have taken place under Henry Hamilton Lt. Gov. of Detroit, fortunately for the Virginian back fettlers, against whom it was principally directed fell through, in confequence of the fpirited conduct of Col. Clarke. The object of the expedition was extensive and many Indians were engaged in it. Hamilton took poft at St. Vincents in the winter, to have all things in readinefs for invading the American fettlements, as foon as the feafon of the year would permit. Clarke on hearing that Hamilton had weakened himfelf by fending away a confiderable part of his Indians against the frontier fettlers, formed the refolution of attacking him, as the beft expedient for preventing the mischiefs which were defigned against his country. After furmounting many difficulties he arrived with 130 men unexpectedly at St. Vincents,

The town immediately gave up to the Americans, and affisted them in taking the fort. The next day Hamilton, Feb. 23. with the garrison, agreed to furrender prifoners of war on articles of capitulation. Clarke on hearing that a convoy of British goods and provisions was on its way from Detroit.

troit, detached a party of fixty men which met them, and 1779. made prize of the whole. By this well conducted and fpirited attack on Hamilton, his intended expedition was nipped in the bud. Col. Clarke transmitted to the council of Virginia letters and papers, relating to Lt. Gov. Hamilton, Philip De Jean justice of peace for Detroit, and William Lamothe captain of volunteers, whom he had made prifoners. The board reported that Hamilton had incited the Indians to perpetrate their accustomed crueities on the defenceles inhabitants of the United States--had at the time of his captivity fent confiderable detachments of Indians against the frontiers--had appointed a great council of them, to meet him and concert the operations of the enfuing campaign--had given ftandingrewards for fcalps, and had treated American prifopers with cruelty. They also reported, that it appeared that De Jean was the willing and cordial inftrument of Hamilton, and that Lamothe was captain of the volunteer fcalping parties of Indians and tories, who went out from time to time, under general orders to fpare neither men, women, nor children. They therefore confidering them as fit objects, on which to begin the work of retaliation -advised the Governor to put them in irons--confine them in the dungeon of the public jail--debar them the use of pen; ink and paper, and exclude them from all converse, except with their keeper.

Col. Goofe Van Schaick, with 55 men, marched from Apr. 19. fort Schuyler to the Onandago fettlements, and burned the whole, confifting of about 50 houfes, together with a large quantity of provisions. Horfes, and flock of every kind, were killed. The arms and ammunition of the Indians were either deftroyed or brought off, and their fettlements were laid wafte. Twelve Indians were killed, and 34 made prifoners. This expedition was performed in lefs than fix days, and without the lofs of a fingle man.

In this manner, the favage part of the war was carried on in America. Wafte and fometimes cruelty were inflicted and retorted, with infinite variety of fcenes of horror and difguft. The felfifh paffions of human nature unrestrained by focial ties, broke over all bounds of decency decency or humanity. The American refugees, who had fied to the weftern wildernefs, indulged their paffion for rapine by affuming the colour and drefs of Indians. At other times they acted as guides, and conducted thefe mercilefs ravagers into fuch fettlements, as afforded the most valuable booty, and the fairest prospect of escape. The favages encouraged by British prefents and agents, and led on by American refugees well acquainted with the country, and who cloaked the most consummate villainy under the specious name of loyalty, extended their depredations and murders far and near.

A particular detail of the devastation of property--of the diffress of great numbers who escaped, only by fleeing to the woods, where they fubfisted without covering on the spontaneous productions of the earth---and of the barbarous murders which were committed on perfons of every age and fex, would be fufficient to freeze every breast with horror.

In fundry expeditions which had been carried on against the Indians, ample vengeance had been taken on fome of them, but these partial fucceffes produced no lasting benefit. The few who escaped, had it in their power to make thousands miserable. For the permanent fecurity of the frontier inhabitants, it was refolved in the year 1779 to carry a decifive expedition into the Indian country. A confiderable body of continental troops was. felected for this purpofe, and put under the command of Gen. Sullivan. The Indians who form the confederacy of the fix nations, commonly called the Mohawks, were the objects of this expedition. They inhabit that immense and fertile tract of country, which lies between New-England, the middle States and the province of Canada. They had been advifed by Congress, and they had promifed, to obferve a neutrality in the war, but they foon departed from this line of conduct. The Oneidas and a few others were friends to the Americans. but a great majority took 'part decidedly against them. Overcome by the prefents and promifes of Sir John Johnson and other British agents, and their own native appetite for depredation, they invaded the frontiers VOL. II. T carrying carrying flaughter and devastation wherever they went. $779. From the vicinity of their fettlements, to the inhabited parts of the United States, they facilitated the inroads of the more remote Indians. Much was therefore 'expected from their expulsion. When Gen: Sullivan was on his way to the Indian country he was joined by the American Gen. Clinton with upwards of 1000 men. The latter made his way down the Sufguehannah by 'a fingular contrivance. The fiream of water in that river was too low to float his batteaux. To remedy this inconvenience, he raifed with great, induftity a dam acrofs' the mouth of the Lake Otlego, which is one of the fources of the river Sufquehannah. The lake being confrantly fupplied by fprings foon rofe to the height of the dam. General Clinton having got his batteaux' ready, opened a paffage through the dam for the water to flow. "This raifed the river fo high that he was enabled to embark all' his troops and to float them down to Tioga. By this exertion they foon joined Sullivan. The Indians on hearing of the expedition projected against them, acted with firmnefs. They collected their ftrength, took poffeffion of proper ground, and fortified it with judgment. Gen. Sullivan attacked them in their works: They flood a cannonade for more than two hours but then gave way. This engagement proved decifive: After the trenches Aug. were forced, the Indians fled without making any attempt 29. to rally. They were purfued for fome miles but without effect. The confernation occasioned among them by this defeat was fo great, that they gave up all ideas of farther refiftance. As the American's advanced into their fettlements, the Indians retreated before thein, without throwing any obstructions in their way. Gen. Sullivan penetrated into the heart of the country inhabited by the Mohawks, and fpread defolation every where. Many fettlements in the form of towns were deftroyed, befides detached habitations. All their fields of corn, and whatever was in a flate of cultivation, underwent the fame fate. Scarce any thing in the form of a house was left flanding, nor was an Indian to be feen. To the furprife of the Americans, they found the lands about the Indian towns towns well cultivated, and their houfes both large and commodious. . The quantity of corn destroyed was immenfe. Orchards in which were feveral hundred fruit trees were cut down, and of them many appeared to have been planted for a long feries of years. Their gardens, which were enriched with great quantities of ufeful vegetables of different kinds, were laid wafte. The Amerieans were fo full of refentment against the Indians, for the many outrages they had fuffered from them, and fo beat on making the expedition decifive, that the officers and foldiers cheerfully agreed to remain till they had fully completed the destruction of the settlement. The fupplies obtained in the country, leffened the inconvenience of thort rations. The ears of corn were to remarkably large, that many of them measured twenty two inches in length. Neceffity fuggested a novel expedient for pulverifing the grains thereof. The foldiers perforated a few of their camp kettles with bayonets. The protrufions occafioned thereby formed a rough furface, and by rubbing the ears of corn thereon, a coarfe meal was produced, which was eafily converted into agreeable nonrithment.

In about three months from his fetting out, Sullivan reached Easton in Pennfylvania, and foon after rejoined the army.

The Indians, by this decifive expedition, being made to feel in the moft fentible manner, those calamities they were wont to inflict on others, became cautions and timid. The fufferings they had undergone, and the dread of a repetition of them, in case of their provoking the refentment of the Americans, damped the ardor of their warriors from making incursions into the American fettlements. The frontiers, though not restored to perfect tranquility, experienced an exemption from a great proportion of the calamities, in which they had been lately involved.

Though thefe good confequences refulted from this expedition, yet about the time of its commencement, and before its termination, feveral detached parties of Indians diffreffed different fettlements in the United States. Though

The militia from Gofhen and the vicinity, to the amount of 149, collected and purfued them, but with fo little caution that they were furprifed and defeated. About this time, Gen. Williamfon and Col. Pickens, both of South-Carolina, entered the Indian country adjacent to the frontier of their State, burned and deftroyed the corn of eight towns, and infifted upon the Indians removing immediately from their late habitations into more remote fettlements.

In the fame month, Col. Broadhead engaged in a fuccefsful expedition against the Mingo, Munsey, and Seneka Indians. He left Pittsburg with 605 men, and was gone about five weeks, in which time he penetrated about 200 miles from the fort, destroyed a number of Indian huts and about 500 acres of corn.

The State of New-York continued to fuffer in its frontier, from Indians and their tory affociates. Thefe burnt 50 houfes, and 47 barns, the principal part of Canijohary, a fine fettlement about 56 miles from Albany. They alfo deftroyed 27 houfes at Schoharie, and 20 at Normans creek. In about two months after, they made a fecond irruption, and attacked Stone Arabia, Canafforaga and Schohavie. At the fame time, they laid wafte a great extent of country about the Mohawk river, kifled a number of the fettlers, and made many prifoners.

The Cherokee Indians, having forgot the confequences of provoking the Americans to invade their fettlements in the year 1776, made an incursion into Ninety-Six district in South-Carolina, massacred fonie fami-

On this occafion, a new and fuccelsful mode of fighting them was introduced. The American militia rufhed forwards on horfe-back, and charged the Indians with drawn fwords. The vanquifhed Cherokees again fued for peace, in the moft fubmiffive terms and obtained it, but not till they had promifed, that inftead of liftening to the advice of the royalifts, inftigating them to war, they would deliver to the authority of the State of South-Carolina, all who fhould vilit them on that errand.

Towards the end of the war, there was a barbarous and unprovoked maffacre of fome civilifed Indians, who had been fettled near the Muskingum. These under the influence of 'lome pious miffionaries of the Moravian perfuafion, had been formed into fome degree of civil and religious order. They abhorred war, and would take no part therein, giving for reafon that "The Great Being did not makesmen to destroy men, but to love and affist each other." From a love of peace they advifed those of their own colour, who were bent on war, to defift from it. They were also led from humanity, to inform the white people of their danger, when they knew that their fettleinents were about to be invaded. This provoked the hoftile Indians to fuch a degree, that they carried these pacific people quite away from Mufkingum to a bank of Sandusky creek. They finding corn dear and fcarce in their new habitations, obtained liberty to come back in the fall of the fame year to Muskingum, that they might collect the crops they had planted before their removal.

When the white people, at and near Monongahala, heard that a number of Indians were at the Moravian towns on the Muskingum, they gave out that their intentions were hostile. Without any further enquiry, 160 of them crossed the Ohio, and put to death these harmless, inoffensive people, though they made no resistance. In conformity to their religious principles, these Moravians patiently fubmitted to their hard fate, without attempting to deftroy their murderers. Upwards of ninety of this pacific fet were killed by men, who while they called themfelves Chriftians, were infinitely more deferving of the name of Savages than those whom they inhumanly murdered.

murdered. Soon after this unprovoked maffacre, a party of the Americans fct out for Sandufky, to deftroy the Indian towns in that part; but the Delawares, Wyandots, and other Indians opposed them. An engagement enfued, in which fome of the white people were killed, and feveral were taken prifoners. Among the latter was Col. Crawford and his fon in law. The Colonel was facrificed to the manes of those Indians, who were maffacred at the Moravian towns. The other prifoners were put to death with the tomahawk.

with the tomahawk. Throughout the American war, the defolation brought by the Indians on the frontier fettlements of the United States, and on the Indians by the Americans, were fufficient to excite compafion in the most obdurate hearts.

Not only the men and warriors, but the women and children, and whole fettlements were involved in the promifcuous defolations. Each was made a fourge to the other, and the unavoidable calamities of war were rendered doubly diffreffing, by the differition of families, the breaking up of fettlements, and an addition of favage cruelties to the most extensive devastation of those things, which conduce to the comfort of human life.

La Campaign of 1780' in the Southern States: " por the new ward with Co

H E fuccefsful defence of Savannah, together with the fubfequent departure of Count D'Eftaing from the coaft of the United States; foon diffipated all apprehenfions, previoufly entertained for the fafety of New-York. These circumstances pointed out to Sir Henry Clinton, the propriety of renewing offentive operations. Having effected nothing of importance for the two preceding campaigns,7 he turned his attention fouthwardly; and regaled himfelf with flattering prospects of easy conquest, among the weaker States. The fuitablenefs of the climate for winter operations, the richnels of the country, and its diffance from' fupport, defignated South-Carolina'as a proper object of enterprize: No fooner therefore was the departure of the French fleet known and confirmed, than Sir Henry Clinton committed the command of the royal army in New-York to Lieut, Gen. Kniphaufen, and embarked for the fouthward, with four flank battalions, 12 regiments, and a corps Britich, Heffian and provincial, a powerful detachment of artillery, 250 cavalry, together with an ample fupply of military flores and provisions. Vice Admiral Arbuthnot, with a fuitable naval force, undertook to convey the troops to the place of their deftination. The whole failed from New-York. After a tedious and dangerous passage, in Dec. 26. which part of their ordnance, most of their artillery, and all their cavalry horfes were loft, the fleet arrived' at Tybee in Georgia. In a few days, the transports with Jan. 31. the army on board, failed from Savannah for North-Edifto, and afteria fhort paffage, the troops made good their landing about 30 miles from Charleston, and took Feb. 11. poffeffion of John's Ifland and Stono ferry, and foon after of James Ifland, and Wappoo-cut .--- A bridge was thrown over the, canal, and part of the royal army took' puft on the banks of Ashley river opposite to Charleston.

The affembly of the State was fitting when the British landed, but broke up after " delegating to Gov. Rutledge, and fuch of his council as he could conveniently confult, a power to do every thing neceffary for the public good, except except the taking away the life of a citizen without a legal trial." The Governor immediately ordered the militia to rendezvous. Though the neceffity was great, few obeyed the preffing call. A proclamation was iffued by the Governor, under his extraordinary powers, requiring fuch of the militia as were regularly draughted, and all the inhabitants and owners of property in the town," to repair to the American ftandard and join the garrifon immediately, under pain of confifcation. This fevere though neceffary meafure produced very little effect. The country was much defpirited by the late repulfe at Savannah.

The tedious paffage from New-York to Tybee, gave the Americans time to fortify Charleston. " This together" with the loffes which the royal army had fuftained in the late tempestuous weather, induced Sir Henry Clinton, to difpatch, an order to New-York' for reinforcements of men and ftores. Healfo directed Major General Prevoft," to fend on to him twelve hundred men from the garrifon of Savannah! Brigadier. General Patterfon, at the head? of; this detachment, made his way good over the river Savannah, and through the intermediate country, and foon after joined Sir, Henry Clinton near the banks of A fhley river. The royal forces without delay proceeded to the fiege. At Wappoo on James Ifland, they formed a depot, and erected fortifications both on that ifland and on the main, opposite to the fouthern and western ex-1 tremities of Charleston. An advanced party croffed Afliley river, and foon after broke ground at the diftance of 1100 yards from the American works. At fucceflive periods, they erected five batteries on Charleston neck. The garrifon was equally affiduous in preparing' for its defence. The works which had been previoufly thrown up, were ftrengthened and extended. Lines and redoubts were continued across from Cooper to Ashley. river. In front of the whole was a ftrong abbatis, and a wet ditch made by passing a canal from the heads of fwamps, which run in opposite directions.". Between the! abbatis and the lines, deep holes were dugat fhort intervals. The lines were made particularly ftrong on the right and left, and fo constructed as to rake the wet ditch in almost its whole extent. To fecure the center, a hornwork had been erected, which being clofed during the tiege formed a kind of citadel. Works were alfo thrown up on all fides of the town, where a landing was practicable. Though the lines were no more than field works, yet Sir Henry Clinton treated them with the refpectful homage of three parallels. From the 2d to the 10th of April, the first parallel was completed, and immediately after the town was fummoned to furrender. On the 12th, the batteries were opened, and from that day an almost inceffant fire was kept up. About the time the batteries were opened a work was thrown up near Wando river, nine miles from town, and another at Lempriere's point, to preferve the communication with the country by water. A poft was also ordered at a ferry over the Santee, to favour the coming in of reinforcements, or the retreat of the garrifon when neceffary. The British marine force confisting of one ship of fifty guns, two of forty four guns, four of thirty two, and Mar. 21. the Sandwich armed thip, croffed the bar in front of Rebellion road and anchored in Five fathom hole. The American force opposed to this was the Bricole, which though pierced for forty four guns, did not mount half of that number, two of 32 guns, one of 28, two of 26, two of 20, and the brig Notre Dame of 16 guns. The first object of its commander Commodore Whipple. was to prevent Admiral Arbuthnot from croffing the bar, but on farther examination this was found to be impracticable. He therefore fell back to Fort Moultrie, and afterwards to Charleston. The crew and guns of all his veffels, except one, were put on thore to reinforce the batteries.

Admiral Arbuthnot weighed anchor at Five fathom April 9. hole, and with the advantage of a ftrong foutherly wind, and flowing tide, paffed Fort Moultrie without flopping to engage it, and anchored near the remains of Fort Johnfon. Colonel Pinckney who commanded on Sullivan's Island, kept up a brifk and well directed fire on the fhips in their paffage, which did as great execution as could be expected. To prevent the royal armed veffels Vol. II. TT from

from running into Cooper river, eleven veffels were funk in the channel opposite to the exchange. The batteries \sim of the befiegers foon obtained a fuperiority over those of the town. The former had 21 mortars and royals, the latter only two. The regular force in the garrifon was much inferior to that of the beliegers, and but few of the militia could be perfuaded to leave their plantations, and reinforce their brethren in the capital. A camp was formed at Monk's corner, to keep up the communication between the town and country, and the militia without the lines, were requested to rendezvous there : But this was furprifed and routed by Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton. The British having now less to fear, extended themfelves to the eaftward of Cooper river. Two hundred and fifty horfe, and 600 infantry were detached on this fervice, but neverthelefs in the opinion of a Apr. 16 council of war, the weak state of the garrison, made it improper to detach a number fufficient to attack that 18. fmall force. About this time Sir Henry Clinton received a reinforcement of 3000 men from New-York. A fe-204 cond council of war held four days after the first, agreed 21. that " a retreat would be attended with many diffreffing inconveniences, if not altogether impracticable," and advifed, " that offers of capitulation before their affairs became more critical fhould be made to General Clinton. which might admit of the army's withdrawing, and afford fecurity to the perfons and property of the inhabitants." These terms being proposed, were instantly rejected, but the garrifon adhered to them, in hopes that fuccours would arrive from the neighbouring States. The bare offer of capitulating, dispirited the garrifon, but they continued to refift in expectation of favorable events. The British speedily completed the investiture of the town, both by land and water. After Admiral Arbuthnot had paffed Sullivan's Ifland, Colonel Pinckney, with 150 of the men under his command, were withdrawn May 6. from that post to Charleston. Soon after the fort on the ifland was furrendered without opposition to Captain Hudson of the royal navy. On the same day, the remains of the American cavalry which escaped from the furprife furprife at Monk's corner, on the 14th of April, were again furprifed by Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton at Laneau's ferry on Santee, and the whole either killed, captured or difperfed. While every thing profpered with the British, Sir Henry Clinton began a correspondence with General Lincoln, and renewed his former offers to the gardifon in cafe of their furrender. Lincoln was difpofed to clofe with them, as far they refpected his army, but some demur was made with a view of gaining better terms for the citizens, which it was hoped might be obtained on a conference. This was afked : But Clinton initead of granting it, anfwered " that hoftilities fhould recommence at 8 o'clock." Neverthelefs, neither party fired till nine. The garrifon then recommenced hoftilities. The befiegers immediately followed, and each cannonaded the other with unufual britknefs. The British batteries of the third parallel opened on this occasion. Shells and carcafes were thrown into almost all parts of the town, and feveral houfes were burned. The cannon and mortars played on the garrifon at a lefs diftance than a hundred yards. The Heffian chaffeurs were fo near the American lines, that with their rifles they could eafily ftrike any object that was visible on them. The Britifh having croffed the wet ditch by fap, advanced within 25 yards of the American works, and were ready for making a general affault by land and water. All expectation of fuccour was at an end. The only hope left was that 9000 men, the flower of the British army, feconded by a naval force, might fail in ftorming extensive lines defended by lefs than 3000 men. Under thefe circumstances, the siege was protracted till the 11th. On that day a great number of the citizens addreffed General May 11. Lincoln in a petition, expreffing their acquiescence in the terms which Sir Henry Clinton had offered, and requesting his acceptance of them. On the reception of this petition, General Lincoln wrote to Sir Henry, and offered to accept the terms before proposed. The royal commanders withing to avoid the extremity of a ftorm, and unwilling to prefs to unconditional fubmiffion an enemy, whofe friendship they wished to concili-

The lofs on both fides during the fiege was nearly equal. Of the King's troops, 76 were killed, and 189 wounded. Of the Americans 80 were killed and 140 wounded. Upwards of 400 pieces of artillery were furrendered. By the articles of capitulation, the garrifon was to march out of town, and to deposit their arms in front of the works, but the drums were not to beat a British march, nor the colors to be uncafed. The continental troops and feamen were to keep their baggage, and remain prifoners of war till exchanged. The militia were to be permitted to return to their refpective homes as prifoners on parole, and while they adhered to their parole, were not to be molested by the British troops in perfon or property. The inhabitants of all conditions to be confidered as prifoners on parole, and to hold their property on the fame terms with the militia. The officers of the army and navy to retain their fervants fwords, piftols and baggage unfearched. They were permitted to fell their horfes, but not to remove them. A veffel was allowed to proceed to Philadelphia with Gen. Lincoln's difpatches unopened.

The numbers which furrendered prifoners of war, inclufive of the militia and every adult male inhabitant, was above 5000, but the proper garrifon at the time of the furrender did not exceed 2500. The precife number of privates in the continental army was 1977, of which number 500 were in the hofpitals. The captive officers were much more in proportion than the privates, and confifted of one Major General, 6 Brigadiers, 9 Colonels, 14 Lieut. Colonels, 15 Majors, 84 Captains, 84 Lieutenants, 32 fecond Lieutenants and Enfigns. The gentlemen of the country, who were moftly militia officers, from a fenfe of honor repaired to the defence of Charlefton, though they could not bring with them privates equal to their refpedive commands. The regular regiments were fully officered, though greatly deficient in privates.

This was the first instance, in which the Americans had attempted to defend a town. The unfuccessful event with with its confequences, demonstrated the policy of facrificing the towns of the Union, in preference to endangering the whole, by rifquing too much for their defence.

Much cenfure was undefervediv caft on Gen. Lincoln, for attempting the defence of Charleston. Though the contrary plan was in general the beft, he had particular reasons to justify his deviation from the example of the commander in chief of the American army. Charlefton was the only confiderable town in the fouthern extreme of the confederacy, and for its prefervation, South-Carolina and the adjacent States feemed willing to make great exertions. The reinforcements, promifed for its defence, were fully fufficient for that purpofe. The Congrefs, and the States of North and South-Carolina gave Gen. Lincoln ground to expect an army of 9900 men to fecond his operations, but from a variety of caufes this army, including the militia, was little more than onethird of that number. As long as an evacuation was practicable, he had fuch affurances of fupport, that he. could not attempt it with propriety. Before he could be . ascertained of the futility of these asturances, the British had taken fuch a pofition, that in the opinion of good judges a retreat could not be fuccefsfully made.

Shortly after the furrender, the commander in chief adopted fundry measures to induce the inhabitants to return to their allegiance. It was flated to them in an hand bill, which though without a name feemed to flow from authority: "That the helping hand of every man was wanting to re-eftablish peace and good government -- That the commander in chief withed not to draw them into danger, while any doubt could remain of his fuccefs, but as that was now certain, he trusted that one and all would heartily join, and give effect to necessary measures for that purpofe." Those who had families were informed "That they would be permitted to remain at home, and form a militia for the maintenance of peace and good order, but from those who had no families it was expected that they would chearfully affift in driving their oppreffors, and all the miferies of war, from their borders." To fuch it was promifed "That when on fervice, they would would be allowed pay, ammunition and provisions, in the fame manner as the King's troops." About the fame May 22.

May 22. time, Sir Henry Clinton in a proclamation declared "That if any perfon fhould thenceforward appear in arms in order to prevent the eftablishment of his Majefty's government in that country, or should under any pretence or authority whatever, attempt to compel any other perfon for or perfons fo to do, or who should hinder the King's faithful subjects from joining his forces, or from performing those duties their allegiance required, such performs thould be treated with the utmost feverity, and their June 1. eftates be immediately feized for confifcation." In a few dute after. Sir Henry Clinton and Admiral Arbuthnot.

days after, Sir Henry Clinton and Admiral Arbuthnot, in the character of commiffioners for reftoring peace, offered to the inhabitants, with fome exceptions, "Pardon for their paft treafonable offences, and a re-inftatement in the poffeffion of all those rights and immunities which they heretofore had enjoyed under a free British government exempt from taxation, except by their own legislatures."

The capital having furrendered, the next object with the British was to fecure the general submission of the whole body of the people.

To this end, they posted garrifons in different parts of the country to awe the inhabitants. They also marched with upwards of 2000 men towards North-Carolina. This caufed an immediate retreat of fome parties of Americans, who had advanced into the northern extremity of South-Carolina, with the expectation of relieving-Charleston. One of these, confisting of about 300 continentals commanded by Col. Buford, was overtaken at Wachaws by Lt. Col. Tarleton and completely defeated. Five out of fix of the whole were either killed or fo badly wounded, as to be incapable of being moved from the field of battle; and this took place though they made fuch ineffectual opposition as only to kill 12 and wound five of the British. This great disproportion of the killed on the two fides, arofe from the circumftance that Tarleton's party refused quarter to the Americans, after they had ceafed to refift and laid down their arms. Sir

Sir Henry Clinton having left about 4000 men for 1780. the fouthern fervice, embarked early in June with the main army for New-York. On his departure the command devolved on Lieut. Gen. Cornwallis. The feafon of the year, the condition of the army, and the unfettled state of South-Carolina, impeded the immediate invasion of North-Carolina. Earl Cornwallis difpatched inftructions to the principal loyalifts in that flate to attend to the harvest, prepare provisions, and remain quiet till the latter end of August or beginning of September. His Lordthip committed the care of the frontier to Lord Rawdon, and repairing to Charlefton, devoted his principal attention to the commercial and civil regulations of South-Carolina. In the mean time, the impoffibility of fleeing with their families and effects, and the want of an army to which the militia of the States might repair, induced the people in the country, to abandon all fchemes of farther refistance. At Beaufort, Camden, and Ninety-Six, they generally laid down their arms, and fubmitted either as prifoners or as fubjects. Excepting the extremities of the state bordering on North-Carolina, the inhabitants who did not flee out of the country preferred . fubmission to refistance. This was followed by an unufual calm, and the British believed that the state was thoroughly conquered. An opportunity was now given to make an experiment from which much was expected, and for the omiffion of which, Sir Henry Clinton's predeceffor Sir William Howe, had been feverely cenfured. It had been confidently afferted, that a majority of the Americans were well affected to the British government, and that under proper regulations, fubftantial fervice might be expected from them, in reftoring the country to peace. At this crifis every biafs in favor of Congrefs was removed. Their armies in the fouthern States were either captured or defeated. There was no regular force to the fouthward of Pennfylvania, which was fufficient to awe the friends of royal government. Every encouragement was held forth, to those of the inhabitants who would with arms fupport the old conftitution. Confifcation and death were threatened as the confequence

quence of oppofing its re-establishment. While there was no regular army within 400 miles to aid the friends of independence, the British were in force posted over all the country. The people were thus left to themfelves, or rather strongly impelled to abandon an apparently finking caufe, and arrange themfelves on the fide of the conquerors. Under these favorable circumstances, the experiment was made, for supporting the British interest by the exertion of loyal inhabitants, unawed by American armies or republican demagogues. It foon appeared that the difguife which fear had imposed, fubfifted no longer than the prefent danger, and that the minds of the people though overawed were actuated by an hoffile fpirit. In profecuting the fcheme for obtaining a military aid from the inhabitants, that tranquillity which previous fucceffes had procured was diffurbed, and that afcendency which arms had gained was interrupted. The inducement to fubmiffion with many, was a hope of obtaining a refpite from the calamities of war, under the shelter of British protection. Such were not less aftonished than confounded, on finding themselves virtually called upon to take arms in fupport of royal government. This was done in the following manner: After the inhabitants by the fpecious promifes of protection and fecurity, had generally fubmitted as fubjects, or taken their parole as prifoners of war, a proclamation was iffued by Sir Henry Clinton which fet forth "That it was proper for all perfons to take an active part in fettling and fecuring his Majefty's government "--- And in which it was declared " That all the inhabitants of the province who were then prifoners on parole (those who were taken in Fort Moultrie and Charleston, and fuch as were in actual confinement excepted) flould, from and after the 20th of June, be freed from their paroles, and reftored to all the rights and duties belonging to citizens and inhabitants." And it was in the fame proclamation farther declared that all perfons under the defeription abovementioned, who should afterwards neglect to return to their allegiance, and to his Majefty's government, fhould be confidered as enemies and rebels to the fame, and treated accordingly accordingly." It was defigned by this arbitrary change of 1780. the political condition of the inhabitants from prifoners to citizens, to bring them into a dilemma, which would force them to take an active part in fettling and fecuring the royal government. It involved a majority in the neceffity of either fleeing out of the country, or of becoming a British militia. With this proclamation the declenfion of British authority commenced, for though the inhabitants from motives of fear or convenience, had. generally fubmitted," the greatest part of them retained an affection for their American brethren, and fhuddered at the thought of taking arms against them. Among fuch it was faid "if we must fight, let it be on the fide of America, our friends and countrymen". A great number confidering this proclamation as a difcharge from their paroles, armed themfelves in felf defence, being induced thereto by the royal menaces, that they who did not return to their allegiance as British subjects, must expect to be treated as rebels. A greater number from being in the power of the British, exchanged their paroles as prisoners for the protection of subjects, but this was done in many cafes, with a fecret refervation of breaking the compulfory engagement, when a proper opportunity should present itself.

A party always attached to royal government, though they had conformed to the laws of the flate, rejoiced in the afcendency of the royal arms, but their number was inconfiderable, in comparifon with the multitude who were obliged by neceffity, or induced by convenience, to accept of British protection.

The precautions taken to prevent the rifing of the royalifts in North-Carolina, did not anfwer the end. Several of the inhabitants of Tryon county, under the direction of Col. Moore took up arms, and were in a few days defeated by the whig militia, commanded by Gen. Rutherford. Col. Bryan another loyalift, though equally injudicious as to time, was fuccefsful. He reached the 71ft regiment flationed in the Cheraws with about 800 men, affembled from the neighbourhood of the river Yadkin.

VOL. II.

While

While the conquerors were endeavoring to ftrengthen the party for royal government, the Americans were not inattentive to their interests. Governor Rutledge who during the fiege of Charleston had been requested by. Gen. Lincoln to go out of town, was industriously and fuccefsfully negociating with North-Carolina, Virginia and Congress, to obtain a force for checking the progress of the British arms. Representations to the fame effect, had alfo been made in due time by Gen. Lincoln. Congrefs ordered a confiderable detachment from their main army, to be marched to the Southward. North-Carolina alfo ordered a large body of militia to take the field. As the British advanced to the upper country of South-Carolina, a confiderable number of determined whigs retreated before them, and took refuge in North-Carolina. In this class was Col. Sumter a diffinguished partizan, who was well qualified for conducting military operations. A party of exiles from South-Carolina, made choice of him for their leader. At the head of this little band of freemen, he returned to his own ftate, and took the field against the victorious British, after the inhabitants had generally abandoned all ideas of farther refistance. This unexpected impediment to the extension of British conquests roufed all the passions which disappointed ambition can infpire. Previous succeffes had flattered the royal commanders with hopes of diffinguified rank among the conquerors of America, but the renewal of hoftilities obfeured the pleafing profpect. Flushed with the victories they had gained in the first of the campaign, and believing every thing told them favorable to their wifhes to be true, they conceived that they had little to fear on the fouth fide of Virginia. When experience refuted these hopes, they were transported with indignation against the inhabitants, and confined feveral of them on fuspicion of their being acceffary to the recommencement of hoftilities.

The first effort of renewed warfare was two months July 12. after the fall of Charleston, when 133 of Col. Sumter's corps attacked and routed a detachment of the royal forces and militia, which were posted in a lane at Williamfon's fon's plantation. This was the first advantage gained over the British, fince their landing in the beginning of the year. The fleady perfevering friends of America, who were very numerous in the North-western frontier of South-Carolina, turned out with great alacrity to join Col. Sumter, though opposition to the British government, had entirely ceafed in every other part of the State. His troops in a few days amounted to 600 men. With this increase of strength, he made a spirited attack on a party of the British at Rocky Mount, but as he had no artillery, and they were fecured under cover of earth filled in between logs, he could make no impression upon them, and was obliged to retreat. Senfible that the minds of men are influenced by enterprife and that to keep militia together it is neceffary to employ them, this active partizan attacked another of the royal detachments, confifting of the Prince of Wales' regiment, and a large body of tories posted at the Hanging rock. The Prince of Wales' regiment was almost totally destroyed. From 278 it was reduced to 9. The loyalifts, who were of that party which had advanced from North Carolina under Col. Bryan, were difperfed. The panic occasioned by the fall of Charleston daily abated. The whig militia on the extremities of the frate formed themfelves into parties, under leaders of their own choice, and fometimes attacked détachments of the Britith army, but more frequently those of their own countrymen, who as a royal militia were co-operating with the King's forces. While Sumter kept up the fpirits of the people by a fucceffion of gallant enterprizes, a respectable continental force was advancing through the middle States, for the relief of their fouthern brethren. With the hopes Mar. 26. of relieving Charlefton, orders were given for the Maryland and Delaware troops to march from Gen. Washington's head quarters to South-Carolina, but the Quartermafter-general was unable to put this detachment in motion as foon as was intended.

The manufacturers employed in providing for the army would neither go on with their bufinefs, nor deliver the articles they had completed, declaring they had fuffered fo much from the depreciation of the money, that they would 1780. would not part with their property without immediate payment. Under these embarrasling circumstances, the Southern States required an aid from the northern army, to be marched through the intermediate fpace of 800 miles. The Maryland and Delaware troops were with great exertions at length enabled to move. After marching through Jerfey and Pennfylvania, they embarked at Apr. 16. the Head of Elk and landed foon after at Petersburg, and thence proceeded through the country towards South-Carolina. This force was at first put under the command of Major Gen. Baron de Kalb, and afterwards of Gen. Gates. The fuccess of the latter in the northern campaigns of 1776 and 1777, induced many to believe that his prefence as commander of the fouthern army, would re-animate the friends of Independence. While Baron de Kalb commanded, a council of war had advifed him to file off from the direct road to Camden, towards the well cultivated fettlements in the vicinity of the Waxhaws: But Gen. Gates on taking the command did not conceive this movement to be neceffary, fuppoling it to be most for the interest of the States that he should proceed immediately with his army, on the fhortest road to the vicinity of the British encampments. This led through a barren country, in paffing over which, the Americans feverely felt the fcarcity of provisions. Their. murmurs became audible, and there were ftrong appearances of mutiny, but the officers who shared every calamity in common with the privates interposed, and conciliated them to a patient fufferance of their hard lot. They principally fublifted on lean cattle, picked up in the woods. The whole army was under the neceffity of using green corn, and peaches in the place of bread. They, were fublisted for feveral days on the latter alone. Dyfenteries became common in consequence of this diet. The heat of the feafon, the unhealthinefs of the climate, together with infufficient and unwholfome food, threatened destruction to the army. The common foldiers, inftead of defponding, began after fome time to be merry with their misfortunes. They used "ftarvation" as a cant word, and vied with each other in burlefquing their.

fituation. The wit and humour difplayed on the occafion contributed not a little to reconcile them to their fufferings. The American army, having made its way Aug.13. through a country of pine-barrens, fand-hills and fwamps, reached Clermont, 13 miles from Camden. The next day, Gen. Stephens arrived with a large body of Virginia militia.

As the American army approached, South-Carolina, lord Rawdon concentered his force at Camden. The retreat of the British from their out-posts, the advances of the American army, and the impolitic conduct of the conquerors towards their new fubjects, concurred at this juncture to produce a general revolt in favor of Congress. The people were daily more diffatisfied with their fituation. Tired of war, they had fubmitted to British government with the expectation of bettering their condition, but they foon found their miftake. The greateft addrefs should have been practifed towards the inhabitants. in order to fecond the views of the Parent State in reuniting the revolted colonies to her government, That the people might be induced to return to the condition of fubjects, their minds and affections, as well as their armies, ought to have been conquered. This delicate talk was rarely attempted. The officers, privates, and followers of the royal army, were generally more intent on amaffing fortunes by plunder and rapine, than on promoting a re-union of the diffevered members of the empire. Inftead of increasing the number of real friends to royal government, they difgufted those that they found. The high spirited citizens of Carolina, impatient of their rapine and infolence, rejoiced in the prospect of freeing their country from its oppressors. Motives of this kind, together with a prevailing attachment to the caufe of Independence, induced many to break through all ties to join Gen. Gates, and more to wilh him the completeft fuccefs.

The fimilarity of language and appearance between the Britifh and American armies, gave opportunities for impofing on the inhabitants. Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton with a party, by affuming the name and drefs of Americans, paffed themfelves near Black river, for the

the advance of General Gates' army. Some of the neighbouring militia were eagerly collected by Mr. Bradley, to co-operate with their fuppofed friends, but after fome time the veil being thrown afide, Bradley and his volunteers were carried to Camden, and confined there as prifoners.

General Gates on reaching the frontier of South-Carolina, iffued a proclamation inviting the patriotic citizens " to join heartily in refcuing themfelves and their country, from the oppression of a government imposed on them by the ruffian hand of conqueft." He alfo gave " affurances of forgiveness and perfect fecurity, to fuch of the unfortunate citizens as had been induced by the terror of fanguinary punifhment, the menace of confifcation, and the arbitrary meafures of military domination, apparently to acquiefce under the British government, and to make a forced declaration of allegiance and fupport to a tyranny, which the indignant fouls of citizens refolved on freedom, inwardly revolted at with horror and deteftation," excepting only from this amnefty, " those who in the hour of devastation, had exercised acts of barbarity and depredation on the perfons and property of their fellow citizens" The army with which Gates advanced, was by the arrival of Stephens' militia, increased nearly to 4000 men, but of this large number, the whole regular force was only 900 infantry and 70 cavalry. On the approach of Gates, Earl Cornwallis haftened from Charlefton to Camden, and arrived there on the 14th. The force which his Lordship found collected on his arrival, was 1700 infantry and 300 cavalry. This inferior number would have justified a retreat, but he chofe rather to ftake his fortune on the decision of a battle. On the night of the 15th, he marched from Camden with his whole force, intending, to attack the Americans in their camp at Clermont. In the fame night Gates, after ordering his baggage to the Waxhaws, put his army in motion, with an intention of advancing to an eligible position, about 8 miles from Camden. The American army was ordered to march at 10 o'clock P. M. in the following order. Colonel Armand's advance

eavalry. Colonel Porterfield's light infantry, on the right flauk of Colonel Armand's in Indian-file, 200 yards from the road. Major Armftrong's light infantry in the fame order as Colonel Porterfield's on the left flank of the legion advanced guard of foot, composed of the advanced piquets, first brigade of Maryland, fecond brigade of Maryland---division of North-Carolina, Virginia rear guard, volunteer cavalry, upon flanks of the baggage equally divided. The light infantry upon each flank were ordered to march up and fupport the cavalry, if it should be attacked by the British cavalry, and Colonel Armand was directed in that case to fland the attack at all events.

The advance of both armies met in the night and engaged. Some of the cavalry of Armand's legion, being wounded in the first fire fell back on others, who recoiled fo fuddenly, that the first Maryland regiment was broken, and the whole line of the army was thrown into confusion. This first impression struck deep, and dispirited the militia. The American army foon recovered its order, and both they and their adversaries kept their ground, and occasionally skirmished through the night. Colonel Porterfield, a most excellent officer, on whose abilities General Gates particularly depended, was wounded in the early part of this night attack. In the morning a fevere and general engagement took place. At the first onfet, the great body of the Virginia militia, who formed the left wing of the army, on being charged with fixed bayonets by the British infantry, threw down their arms, and with the utmost precipitation fled from the field. A confiderable part of the North-Carolina militia followed the unworthy example, but the continentals who formed the right wing of the army, inferior as they were in numbers to the British, stood their ground and maintained the conflict with great refolution. Never did men acquit themfelves better: for fome time they had clearly the advantage of their opponents, and were in poffeffion of a confiderable body of prifoners: overpowered at last by numbers, and nearly furrounded by the enemy, they were compelled reluctantly to leave the ground. In juftice

tice to the North-Carolina militia, it should be remarked that part of the brigade' commanded by Gen. Gregory acquitted themfelves well. They were formed immediately on the left of the continentals, and kept the field while they had a cartridge to fire. Gen. Gregory himfelf was twice wounded by a bayonet in bringing off his men, and feveral of his brigade, who were made prifoners, had no wounds except from bayonets.* Two hundred and ninety American wounded prifoners were carried into Camden, after this action, of this number 206 were continentals, 82, were North-Carolina militia, and 2 were Virginiamilitia. The refiftance made by each corps, may in fome degree be estimated from the number of wounded. The Americans loft the whole of their artillery, eight field pieces, upwards of 200 waggous, and the greatest part of their baggage, almost all their officers were feparated from their respective commands. Every corps was broken in action and difperfed. The fugitives who fled by the common road, were purfued above 20 miles by the horfe of Tarleton's legion, and the way was covered with arms, baggage and waggons. Baron de Kalb, the fecond in command, a brave and experienced officer, was taken prifoner and died on the next day of his wounds. The baron who was a' German by birth, had long been in the French fervice. He had travelled through the Britifh provinces, about the time of the stamp act, and is faid to have reported to his fuperiors on his return, " that the colonists were fo firmly and univerfally attached to Great Britain, that nothing could fhake their loyalty." The Congress refolved that a monument should be erected to his memory in Annapolis, with a very honorable infcription. General Rutherford of North-Carolina, was wounded and taken prifoner.

The royal army fought with great bravery, but the completeness of their victory was in a great degree owing to their fuperiority in cavalry, and the precipitate flight of the American militia. Their whole loss is fupposed to have amounted to feveral hundreds. To add to the diffresses distresses of the Americans, the defeat of Gates was im-1780. mediately followed by the furprife and difperfion of Sumter's corps. While the former was advancing near to the British army, the latter who had previously taken post between Camden and Charleston, took a number of prisoners and captured fundry British stores, together with their convoy. On hearing of the defeat of his fuperior officer, he began to retreat with his prifoners and ftores. Tarleton with his legion, and a detachment of infantry, purfued with fuch celerity and addrefs as to overtake and furprize this party at Fifling Creek. The British rode into their camp before they were prepared for defence. The retreating Americans, having been four days with little or no fleep, were more obedient to the calls of nature, than attentive to her first law felfprefervation. Sumter had taken every prudent precaution to prevent a furprize, but his videttes were fo overcome with fatigue, that they neglected their duty. With great difficulty he got a few to ftand their ground for a fhort time, but the greater part of his corps fled to the river or the woods. He loft all his artillery, and his whole detachment was either killed, captured or difperfed. The prifoners he had lately taken were all retaken. On the 17th and 18th of Aug, about 150 of Gates' army rendezvoused at Charlette. Thefe had reafon to apprehend that they would be immediately purfued and cut to pieces. There was no magazine of provisions in the town, and it was without any kind of defence. It was therefore concluded to retreat to Salifbury. A circumftantial detail of this, would be the picture of complicated wretchedness. There were more wounded men than could be conveniently carried off. The inhabitants hourly expecting the British to advance into their fettlement, and generally intending to flee, could not attend to the accommodation of the fuffering foldiers. Objects of diftrefs occurred in every quarter. There were many who flood in need of kind affistance, but there were few who could give it to them. Several men were to be feen with but one arm, and fome without any. Anxiety, pain and dejection, poverty, hurry and confusion, promiscuously marked the VOL. II. Y gloomy 1780. gloomy fcene. Under thefe circumftances the remains of that numerous army, which had lately caufed fuch terror to the friends of Great-Britain, retreated to Salifbury and foon after to Hillfborough. General Gates had previoufly retired to this laft place, and was there in concert with the government of North-Carolina, devifing plans of defence, and for renewing military operations.

> Though there was no army to oppofe Lord Cornwallis, yet the feafon and bad health of his army, reftrained him from purfuing his conquefts. By the complete difperfion of the continental forces, the country was in his power. The prefent moment of triumph feemed therefore the moft favorable conjuncture, for breaking the fpirits of thofe who were attached to independence. To prevent their future co-operation with the armies of Congrefs, a feverer policy was henceforward adopted.

> Unfortunately for the inhabitants, this was taken up on grounds which involved thousands in diftress, and not a few in the lofs of life. The British conceived themfelves in poffeffion of the rights of fovereignty over a conquered country, and that therefore the efforts of the citizens, to affert their independence exposed them to the penal confequences of treafon and rebellion. Influenced by thefe opinions, and transported with indignation against the inhabitants, they violated the rights which are held facred between independent hoftile nations. Orders were given by Lord Cornwallis "that all the inhabitants of the province, who had fubmitted, and who had taken part in this revolt, fhould be punished with the greatest rigor --- that they should be imprisoned, and their whole property taken from them or deftroyed." He also ordered in the most pofitive manner " that every militia man, who had born arms with the British, and afterwards joined the Americans, fhould be put to death." At Augusta, at Camden and elfewhere, feveral of the inhabitants were hanged in confequence of these orders. The men who fuffered had been compelled by the neceffities of their families, and the profpect of faving their property, to make an involuntary fubmiffion to the royal conquerors. Experience foon taught them the inefficacy of these fubmissions. This in their

their opinion abfolved them from the obligations of their engagements to fupport the royal caufe, and left them at liberty to follow their inclinations. To treat men thus circumstanced, with the feverity of punishment ufually inflicted on deferters and traitors, might have a political tendency to difcourage farther revolts, but the impartial world muft regret that the unavoidable horrors of war, should be aggravated by fuch deliberate effusions of human blood.

Notwithstanding the decisive fuperiority of the British armies in South-Carolina, feveral of the most respectable citizens, though in the power of their conquerors, refifted every temptation to refume the character of fubjects. To enforce a general fubmiffion, orders were given by lord Cornwallis immediately after his victory, to fend out of South-Carolina a number of its principal citizens. Lieut. Gov. Gadfden, most of the civil and militia officers and fome others, who had declined exchanging their paroles Aug. 27. for the protection of British fubjects, were taken up, put on board a veffel in the harbour, and fent to St. Auguftine. General Moultrie remonstrated against the confinement and removal of these gentlemen, as contrary to their rights derived from the capitulation of Charlefton. They at the fame time challenged their adverfaries to prove any conduct of theirs, which merited expulsion from their country and families. They received no farther fatisfaction, than that the measure had been " adopted from motives of policy." To convince the inhabitants, that the conquerors were ferioufly refolved to remove from the country, all who refused to become fubjects, an additional number of about thirty citizens of South-Carolina, who remained prifoners on parole, were fent off to the fame place in lefs than three months. Gen. Rutherford and Col. Ifacs both of North-Carolina, who had been lately taken near Camden, were affociated with them.

To compel the re-establishment of British government, lord Cornwallis, in about four weeks after his victory, if- Sept. 16. fued a proclamation for the fequestration of all estates belonging to the active friends of Independence. By the

this he conftituted " John Cruden commiffioner, with full 1780. power and authority, on the receipt of an order or warrant, to take into his poffeffion the eftates both real and perfonal (not included in the capitulation of Charleston) of those in the fervice or acting under the authority of the rebel Congress, and also the estates, both real and perfonal, of those perfons who by an open avowal of rebellious principles, or by other notorious acts, manifefted a wicked and defperate perfeverance in oppofing the re-establishment of his Majesty's just and lawful authority;" and it was farther declared " That any perfon or perfons obstructing or impeding the faid commissioner in the execution of his duty, by the concealment or removal of property or otherwife, should on conviction be punished as aiding and abetting rebellion."

> An adherent to Independence was now confidered as one who courted exile, poverty and ruin. Many yielded to the temptation, and became British subjects. The mischievous effects of flavery, in facilitating the conquest of the country, now became apparent. As the flaves had no interess at state, the subjugation of the State was a matter of no confequence to them. Instead of aiding in its defence, they by a variety of means threw the weight of their little influence into the opposite scale.

> Though numbers broke through all the ties which bound them to fupport the caufe of America, illustrious facrifices were made at the fhrine of liberty. Several of the richeft men in the flate fuffered their fortunes to remain in the power and poffeffion of their conquerors, rather than ftain their honor, by joining the enemies of The patriotifm of the ladies contributed their country. much to this firmnefs. They crowded on board prifon fhips, and other places of confinement, to folace their fuffering countrymen. While the conquerors were regaling themfelves at concerts and affemblies, they could obtain very few of the fair fex to affociate with them; but no sooner was an American officer introduced as a prifoner, than his company was fought for, and his perfon treated with every poflible mark of attention and respect. On other occasions the ladies in a great measure retired retired from the public eye, wept over the diftresses 1780. their country, and gave every proof of the warmest attachment to its fuffering caufe. Among the numbers who were banished from their families, and whose property was feized by the conquerors, many examples could be produced of ladies cheerfully parting with their fons, hufbands and brothers, exhorting them to fortitude" and perfeverance; and repeatedly entreating them never to fuffer family-attachments to interfere with the duty they owed to their country. When, in the progress of the war, they were also comprehended under a general fentence of banishment, with equal refolution they parted with their native country, and the many endearments of home --- followed their hufbands into prifon-fhips and distant lands, where they were reduced to the necessity of receiving charity.

Animated by fuch examples, as well as by a high fenfe of honor and the love of their country, a great proportion of the gentlemen of South-Carolina deliberately adhered to their first refolution, of rifquing lifeand fortune in fupport of their liberties. Hitherto the royal forces in South-Carolina had been attended with almost uninterrupted fuccefs. Their ftandards overfpread the country, penetrated into every quarter, and triumphed over all opposition.

The Britifh miniftry by this flattering pofture of affairs, were once more intoxicated with the hope of fubjugating America. New plans were formed, and great expectations indulged, of fpeedily re-uniting thie diflevered members of the empire. It was now afferted with a confidence bordering on prefumption, that fuch troops as fought at Camden, put under fuch a commander as Lord Cornwallis, would foon extirpate rebellion, fo effectually as to leave no veftige of it in America. The Britifh miniftry and army by an impious confidence in their own wifdom and prowefs, were duly prepared to give, in their approaching downfal, an ufeful leffon to the world.

The difafter of the army under General Gates, overspread at first the face of American affairs, with a difmal mal gloom, but the day of profperity to the United States, began as will appear in the fequel, from that moment to dawn. Their profpects brightened up, while thofe of their enemies were obfcured by difgrace, broken by defeat, and at laft⁴ covered with ruin. Elated with their victories, the conquerors grew more infolent and rapacious, while the real friends of independence became refolute and determined.

We have feen Sumter penetrating into South-Carolina, and re-commencing a military opposition to British government. Soon after that event, he was promoted by Governor Rutledge, to the rank of Brigadier General. About the fame time Marion was promoted to the fame rank, and in the northeaftern extremities of the State, fuccefsfully profecuted a fimilar plan. This valuable officer after the furrender of Charleston, retreated to North-Carolina. On the advance of General Gates, he ob. tained a command of fixteen men. With thefe he penetrated through the country, and took a polition near the Santee. On the defeat of General Gates, he was com-1 pelled to abandon the State, but returned after an abfence of a few days. For feveral weeks he had under his command only 70 men. At one time hardfhips and dangers reduced that number to 25, yet with this inconfiderable number he fecured himfelf in the midft of furrounding foes. Various fchemes were tried to detach the inhabitants from co-operating with him. Major Wemys burned fcores of houfes on Pedee, Lynch's creek and Black river, belonging to fuch as were fuppofed to do duty with Marion, or to be fubfervient to his views. This had an effect different from what was intended. Revenge and despair co-operated with patriotifm, to make thefe ruined men keep the field. Having no houfes to shelter them, the camps of their countrymen became their homes. For feveral months, Marion and his party were obliged to fleep in the open air, and to flielter themfelves in the receffes of deep fwamps. From thefe retreats they fallied out, whenever an opportunity of harraffing the enemy, or of ferving their country prefented irfelf.

Opposition

Opposition to British government was not wholly confined to the parties commanded by Sumter and Marion. It was at no time altogether extinct in the extremities of the State. The disposition to revolt, which had been excited on the approach of General Gates, was not extinguished by his defeat. The spirit of the people was overawed, but not fubdued. The feverity with which revolters who fell into the hands of the British were treated, induced those who escaped to perfevere and feek fafety in fwamps.

From the time of the general fubmiffion of the inhabitants in 1780, pains had been taken to encreafe the royal force by the co-operation of the yeomanry of the country. The British perfuaded the people to form a royal militia, by reprefenting that every profpect of fucceeding in their scheme of independence was annihilated, and that a farther opposition would only be a prolongation of their distreffes, if not their utter ruin. Major Ferguson of the 71st regiment, was particularly active in this bufinefs. He vifited the fettlements of the difaffected to the American caufe, and collected a corps of militia of that description, from which much active fervice was expected. He advanced to the northwestern fettlements, to hold communication with the loyalifts of From his prefence, together with afboth Carolinas. furances of an early movement of the royal army into North-Carolina, it was hoped that the friends of royal government would be roufed to activity in the fervice of their King. In the mean time every preparation was made for urging offensive operations, as foon as the feafon and the ftate of the ftores would permit.

That fpirit of enterprize, which has already been mentioned as beginning to revive among the American militia about this time, prompted Col. Clarke to make an attempt on the British post at Augusta in Georgia; but in this he failed and was obliged to retreat. Major Furguson with the hope of intercepting his party, kept near the mountains and at a considerable distance from support. These circumstances, together with the depredations of the loyalists, induced those hardy republicans, who reside on the west fide of the Alleghany mountains,

1780. to form an enterprize for reducing that diffinguished partizan. This was done of their own motion, without any direction from the governments of America, or from the officers of the continental army.

There was, without any apparent defign, a powerful combination of feveral detached commanders of feveral adjacent States, with their respective commands of militia. Col. Campbell of Virginia, Colonels Cleveland, Shelby, Sevier, and M'Dowel of North-Carolina, together with Colonels Lacey, Hawthorn and Hill, of South-Carolina, all rendezvoufed together, with a number of men amounting to 1600, though they were under no general command, and though they were not called upon to embody by any common authority, or indeed by any authority at all, but that of a general impulse on their own minds. They had fo little of the mechanism of a regular army, that the Colonels of fome of the States by common confent, commanded each day alternately. The hardfhips thefe volunteers underwent were very great. Some of them fublisted for weeks together, without tafting bread or falt, or fpiritous liquors, and flept in the woods without blankets. The running ftream quenched their thirst. At night the earth afforded them a bed, and the heavens, or at most the limbs of trees were their only covering. Ears of corn or pompions thrown into the fire, with occational fupplies of beef or venifon, killed and roafted in the woods, were the chief articles of their provisions. They had neither commissiries, quarter-masters, nor stores of any kind. They selected about a thousand of their best men, and mounted them on their fleetest horfes, 'Thefe attacked Major Fergufon on the top of King's mountain, near the confines of North and South-Carolina. The Americans formed three parties. Col. Lacey of South-Carolina led one, which attacked on the weft, end.

The two others were commanded by Cols. Campbell and Clevelahd, one of which attacked on the eaft end and the other in the centre. Fergufon with great boldnefs attacked the affailants with fixed bayonets, and compelled them fucceffively to retire, but they only fell back a little way, and getting behind trees and rocks, renewed their fire in almost every direction. The British being. 1780. uncovered, were aimed at by the American mark fmen, and many of them were flain. An unufual number of the killed were found to have been that in the head. Riflemen took off riflemen with fuch exactors, that they killed each other when taking fight, fo effectually that their eves remained after they were dead, one fhut and the other open, in the ufual manner of markimen when levelling at their object. Major Fergufon difplayed as much bravery as was poffible in his fituation: But his encampment on the top of the mountain was not well chofen, as it gave the Americans an opportunity of covering themfelves in their approaches. Had he purfued his march on charging and driving the first party of the militia which gave way, he might have got off with the most of his men, but his unconquerable spirit disdained either to flee or to furrender. After a fevere conflict he received a mortal wound. No chance of efcape being left, and all profpect of fuccefsful refiftance being at an end, the conteft was ended by the fubmission of the furvivors. Upwards of 800 became prifoners, and 225 had been previously killed or wounded. Very few of the affailants fell, but in their number was Col. Williams a diftinguished militia officer in Ninety-Six district, who had been very active in oppofing the re-establishment of Britifh government. Ten of the royal militia who had furrendered were hanged by their conquerors. They were provoked to this measure by the feverity of the British, who had lately hanged feveral of the captured Americans, in South-Carolina and Georgia. They also alleged that the men who fuffered were guilty of previous felonies, for which their lives were forfeited by the laws of the land. The fall of Ferguson was in itself a great loss to the royal caufe. He poffessed fuperior abilities as a partizan, and his spirit of enterprife was uncommon. To a diftinguilhed capacity for planning great defigns, he alfo added the practical abilities necessary to carry them into execution. The unexpected advantage which the Americans gained over him and his party, in a great degree frustrated a well concerted scheme for strengthening VOL. II. Z the

the Britifh army by the co-operation of the tory inhabitants, whom he had undertaken to difcipline and prepare for active fervice. The total rout of the party, which had joined Major Fergufon, operated as a check on the future exertions of the loyalifts. The fame timid caution, which made them averfe to joining their countrymen in oppofing the claims of Great Britain, reftrained them from rifquing any more in fupport of the royal caufe. Henceforward they waited to fee how the fcales were likely to incline, and referved themfelves till the Britifh army, by its own unaffifted efforts, fhould gain a decided fuperiority.

In a few weeks after the general action near Camden, Lord Cornwallis left a fmall force in that village, and marched with the main army towards Salifbury, intending to pufh forwards in that direction. While on his way thither, the North Carolina militia was very industrious and fuccefsful in annoying his detachments. Riflemen frequently penetrated near his camp, and from behind trees made fure of their objects. The late conquerors found their fituation very uneafy, being exposed to unfeen dangers if they attempted to make an excurfion of only a few hundred yards from their main body. The defeat of Major Ferguson, added to these circumftances, gave a ferious alarm to lord Cornwallis, and he foon after retreated to Winnfborough. As he retired, the militia took feveral of his waggons, and fingle men often rode up within gunfhot of his army, difcharged their pieces, and made their escape. The panic occafioned by the defeat of Gen. Gates had in a great meafure worn off. The defeat of Major Fergufon and the confquent retreat of lord Cornwallis, encouraged the American militia to take the field, and the neceffity of the times induced them to fubmit to ftricter discipline. Sumter soon after the dispersion of his corps on the 18th of August, collected a band of volunteers, partly from new adventurers, and partly from those who had escaped on that day. With these, though for three months there was no continental army in the State, he conftantly kept the field in fupport of American independence." He varied his position from time time to time about Evoree, Broad and Tyger rivers, 1780. and had frequent fkirmifhes with his adverfaries. Having mounted his followers he infefted the British parties with frequent incursions --- beat up their quarters --intercepted their convoys, and fo harraffed them with fucceffive alarms, that their movements could not be made but with caution and difficulty. His fpirit of enterprize was fo particularly injurious to the British, that they laid fundry plans for deftroying his force, but they all failed in the execution. He was attacked at Nov. 12. Broad river by Major Wemys, commanding a corps of infantry and dragoons. In this action the British were defeated, and their commanding officer taken prifoner. Eight days after he was attacked at Black-Stocks, near Nov. 20. Tyger river, by Lieut. Col. Tarleton. The attack was begun with 170 dragoons and 80 men of the 63d regiment. A confiderable part of Sumter's force had been thrown into a large log barn, from the apertures of which they fired with fecurity. Many of the 63d regiment were killed. Tarleton charged with his cavalry, but being unable to diflodge the Americans retreated, and Sumter was left in quiet possession of the field. The lofs of the British in this action was confiderable. Among their killed were three officers, Major Money, Lieut. Gibson and Cope. The Americans loft very few, but Gen. Sumter received a wound, which for feveral months interrupted his gallant enterprizes in behalf of his country. His zeal and activity in animating the militia, when they were difcouraged by repeated defeats, and the bravery and good conduct he difplayed in fundry attacks on the British detachments, procured him the applause of his countrymen, and the thanks of Congrefs.

For the three months which followed the defeat of the American army near Camden, Gen. Gates was industriously preparing to take the field. Having collected a force at Hillfbury he advanced to Salifbury, and very Novem. foon after to Charlotte. He had done every thing in his power to repair the injuries of his defeat, and was again in a condition to face the enemy; but from that influence

1780. influence which popular opinion has over public affairs in a commonwealth, Congress resolved to superfede him, and to order a court of enquiry to be held on his conduct. This was founded on a former refolve, that whoever loft a post should be subject to a court of inquiry. The cafes were no ways parallel, he had loft a battle but not a post. The only charge that could be exhibited against Gen. Gates was that he had been defeated. His enemies could accufe him of no military crime, unless that to be unfuccessful night be reckoned fo. The public, fore with their loffes, were defirous of a change, and Congress found it necessary to gratify them, though at the expence of the feelings of one of their beft, and till August 1780, one of their most fuccessful officers. Virginia did not fo foon forget Saratoga. When Gen. Gates was at Richmond on his way home from Carolina, Dec. 28. the houfe of Burgeffes of that State unanimoufly refolved" that a committee of four be appointed to wait on Gen. Gates, and affure him of their high regard and efteem, and that the remembrance of his former glorious fervices could not be obliterated by any reverfe of fortune; but that ever mindful of his great merit, they would omit no opportunity of teftifying to the world the

> These events together with a few unimportant fkirmillies not worthy of being particularly mentioned, clofed the campain of 1780 in the fouthern States. They afforded ample evidence of the folly of profecuting the American war. Though British conquests had rapidly fucceeded each other, yet no advantages accrued to the victors. The minds of the people were unfubdued, or rather more alienated from every idea of returning to their former allegiance. Such was their temper, that the expence of retaining them in fubjection, would have exceeded all the profits of the conquest. British garrifons kept down open refiftance in the vicinity of the places where they were established, but as foon as they were withdrawn, and the people left to themfelves, a fpirit of revolt hoftile to Great-Britain always difplayed itfel£

Campaign of 1780, in the Northern States.

THILE the war raged in South-Carolina, the campaign of 1780, in the northern States was barren of important events. At the close of the preceding campaign, the American northern army took post at Morristown and built themselves huts, agreeably to the practice which had been first introduced at Valley-Forge. This position was well calculated to cover the country from the excursions of the British, being only 20 miles from New-York.

Lord Sterling made an ineffectual attempt to furprife January, a party of the enemy on Staten-Ifland. While he was on the island, a number of perfons from the Jerfey fide paffed over and plundered the inhabitants, who had fubmited to the British government. In these times of confusion, licentious perfons fixed themselves near the lines, which divided the British from the Americans. Whenfoever an opportunity offered, they were in the habit of going within the fettlements of the oppofite party, and under the pretence of diftreffing their enemies, committed the most shameful depredations. In the first months of the year 1780, while the royal army was weakened by the expedition against Charleston, the Britifh were apprehenfive for their fafety in New-York. The rare circumstance which then existed of a connexion between the main and York illand, by means of ice feemed to invite to the enterprife, but the force and equipments of the American army were unequal to it. Lieutenant General Kniphausen, who then commanded in New-York, apprehending fuch a defign, embodied the inhabitants of the city as a militia for' its defence. They very chearfully formed themfelves into companies, and difcovered great zeal in the fervice. An

An incursion was made into Jersey from New-York 1780. Loral with 5000 men, commanded by Lieutenant General June 16. Kniphaufen. They landed at Elizabeth-town, and proceeded to Connecticut farms. In this neighbourhood lived the Reverend Mr. James Caldwell, a Prefbyterian clergyman of great activity, ability and influence, whole fuccefsful exertions in animating the Jerfey militia to defend their rights, had rendered him particularly obnoxious to the British. When the royal forces were on their way into the country, a foldier came to his houfe in his absence, and fhot his wife Mrs. Caldwell inftantly dead, by levelling his piece directly at her through the window of the room, in which the was fitting with her children. Her body at the request of an officer of the new levies, was moved to fome diffance, and then the houfe and every thing in it was reduced to afhes. The British burnt about 12 other houses, and also the Presbyterian church, and then proceeded to Springfield. As they advanced they were annoyed by Colonel Dayton with a few militia. On their approach to the bridge near the town, they were farther oppofed by General Maxwell, who with a few continental troops was prepared to difpute its paffage. They made a halt and foon after returned to Elizabeth town. Before they had retreated, the whole American army at Morriftown marched to oppofe them. While this royal detachment was in Jerfey, Sir Henry Clinton returned with his victorious troops from Charleston to New-York. He ordered a reinforcement to Kniphaufen, and the whole advanced a fecond time towards Springfield. They were now opposed by General Greenc. with a confiderable body of continental troops. Colonel Angel with his regiment and a piece of artillery was posted to fecure the bridge in front of the town. A fevere action took place which lasted forty minutes. Superior numbers forced the Americans to retire. General Greene took poft with his troops on a range of hills, in hopes of being attacked. Inftead of this the British began to burn the town. Near fifty dwelling houfes were reduced to ashes. The British then retreated, but were purfued by the enraged militia, till they entered Elizabethtown town. The next day they fet out on their return to New-York. The lofs of the Americans in the action was about 80, and that of the British was supposed to be confiderably more. It is difficult to tell what was the precife object of this expedition. Perhaps the royal commanders hoped to get poffeffion of Morriftown, and to deftroy the American ftores. Perhaps they flattered themfelves that the inhabitants were fo difpirited by the recent lofs of Charleftown, that they would fubmit without refiftance; and that the foldiers of the continental army would defert to them: But if thefe were their views, they were difappointed in both. The firm opposition which was made by the Jerfey farmers, contrasted with the conduct of the same people in the year 1776, made it evident that not only their averfion to Great-Britain, continued in full force; but that the practical habits of fervice and danger had improved the country inilitia, fo as to bring them near to an equality with regular troops.

By fuch defultory operations, were hoftilities carried on at this time in the northern States. Individuals were killed, houfes were burnt, and much mitchief done; but nothing was effected which tended either to reconcilement or fubjugation.

The loyal Americans who had fled within the British lines, commonly called refugees, reduced a predatory war into fystem. On their petition to Sir Henry Clinton, they had been in the year 1779, permitted to fet up a diftinct government in New-York, under a jurifdiction called the honorable board of affociated loyalifts. They had fomething like a fleet of fmall privateers and cruifers, by the aid of which, they committed various depredations. A party of them who had formerly belonged to Maffachuffets, went to Nantucket, broke open the warehouses, and carried off every thing that fell in their way. They also carried off two loaded brigs and two or three schooners. In a proclamation they left behind them, they observed "that they had been deprived of their property, and compelled to abandon their dwellings, friends and counections. And that they conceived themfelves warranted by the laws of Ged and man, to wage . 1

war againft their perfecutors, and to endeavour by every means in their power, to obtain compensation for their fufferings." These affociated loyalists eagerly embraced every adventure, which gratified either their avarice or their revenge. Their enterprifes were highly lucrative to themselves, and extremely diftress to the Americans. Their knowledge of the country and superior means of transportation, enabled them to make hasty descents and successful enterprises. A war of plunder in which the feelings of humanity were often sufferended, and which tended to no valuable public purpose, was carried on in this schameful manner, from the double excitements of profit and revenge. The adjoining coasts of the continent, and especially the maritime parts of New-Jersey, became scenes of waste and havoc.

The diffrefs which the Americans fuffered from the diminished value of their currency, though felt in the year 1778 and still more fo in the year 1779, did not arrive to its higheft pitch till the year 1780. Under the preffure of fufferings from this caufe, the officers of the Jerfey line addreffed a memorial to their state legislature, fetting forth " that four months pay of a private, would not procure for his family a fingle bufhel of wheat, that the pay of a Colonel would not purchase oats for his horfe; that a common laborer or express rider received four times as much as an American officer." They urged " that unlefs a fpeedy and ample remedy was provided, the total diffolution of their line was inevitable," and concluded with faying " that their pay fhould either bemade up in Mexican dollarsor infomething equivalent." In addition to the infufficiency of their pay and fupport, other causes of discontent prevailed. The original idea of a continental army, to be raifed, paid, fubfifted and regulated upon an equal and uniform principle, had been in a great measure exchanged for State establishments. This mischievous measure partly originated from necefity, for State credit was not quite fo much depreciated as continental. Congress not posseffing the means of supporting their army, devolved the bufinefs on the component parts of the confederacy. Some States, from their internal internal ability and local advantages, furnished their troops 1780. not only with cloathing, but with many conveniencies. Others fupplied them with fome neceffaries, but on -a more contracted scale. A few from their particular fituation could do little or nothing at all. The officers and men in the routine of duty, mixed daily and compared circumstances. Those who fared worse than others, were diffatisfied with a fervice which made fuch injurious diftinctions. From caufes of this kind, fuperadded to a complication of wants and fufferings, a difpolition to mutiny began to shew itself in the American army. This broke forth into full action among the foldiers, which were stationed at fort Schuyler. Thirtyone of the men of that garrifon went off in a body. Being purfued fixteen of them were overtaken, and thirteen of the fixteen, were instantly killed. About the fame time, two regiments of Connecticut troops mutivied and got under arms. They determined to return home, or to gain fubfistence at the point of the bayonet. Their officers reasoned with them, and urged every argument, that could either interest their pride or their passions. They were reminded of their good conduct, of the important objects for which they were contending, but their answer was "our fufferings are too great and we want present relief." After much expostulation they were at length prevailed upon to go to their hutts. It is remarkable, that this mutinous disposition of the Connecticut troops, was in a great measure quelled by the Pennfylvania line, which in a few months, as shall hereafter be related, planned and executed a much more ferious re--volt, than that which they now fuppreffed. While the army was in this feverifh state of difcontent from their accumulated diftreffes, a printed paper addreffed to the foldiers of the continental army, was circulated in the American camp. This was in the following words. " The time is at length arrived, when all the artifices and falfehoods of the Congress and of your commanders, can no longer conceal from you the miferies of your fituation. You are neither fed, cloathed nor paid. Your numbers are wafting away by fickness, famine and nakedness, and VOL. II. Aa rapidly.

rapidly fo by the period of your flipulated fervices being expired. This is now the period to fly from flavery and fraud."

" I am happy in acquainting the old countrymen that the affairs of Ireland are fully fettled, and that Great Britain and Ireland are united as well from intereft as from affection. I need not tell you who are born in America, that you have been cheated and abufed. You are both fenfible that in order to procure your liberty you must quit your leaders, and join your real friends, who fcorn to impofe upon you, and who will receive you with open arms, kindly forgiving all your errors. You are told you are furrounded by a numerous militia. This is alfo falfe. Affociate then together, make ufe of your firelocks, and join the Britifh army, where you will be permitted to difpofe of yourfelves as you pleafe."

About the fame time or rather a little before, the news arrived of the reduction of Charlefton, and the capture of the whole American fouthern army. Such was the firmnefs of the common foldiery, and fo ftrong their attachment to the caufe of their country, that though danger impelled, want urged, and British favor invited them to a change of fides, yet on the arrival of but a fcanty supply of meat for their immediate fubfishence, military duty was cheerfully performed, and no uncommon defertion took place.

So great were the necefities of the American army, that Gen. Wafhington was obliged to call on the magiftrates of the adjacent counties for fpecified quantities of provifions, to be fupplied in a given number of days. At other times he was compelled to fend out detachments of his troops, to take provifions at the point of the bayonet from the citizens. This expedient at length failed, for the country in the vicinity of the army afforded no further fupplies. Thefe imprefiments were not only injurious to the morals and difcipline of the army, but tended to alienate the affections of the people. Much of the fupport, which the American general had previoufly experienced from the inhabitants, proceeded from the difference of treatment they received from their own army, compared compared with what they fuffered from the British. The General, whom the inhabitants hitherto regarded as their protector, had now no alternative but to difband his troops, or to fupport them by force. The fituation of Gen. Washington was eminently embarrassing. The army looked to him for provisions, the inhabitants for protection of their property. To fupply the one, and not offend the other, feemed little lefs than an impoffibility. To preferve order and fubordination in an army of free republicans, even when well fed, paid and clothed, would have been a work of difficulty, but to retain them in fervice and reftrain them with discipline, when destitute, not only of the comforts, but often of the neceffaries of life, required addrefs and abilities of fuch magnitude as are rarely found in human nature. In this choice of difficulties Gen. Washington not only kept his army together, but conducted with fo much diferetion, as to command the approbation both of the army and of the citizens.

- So great a fcarcity, in a country ufually abounding with provisions, appears extraordinary, but various remote caufes had concurred about this time to produce an unprecedented deficiency. The feafons both in 1779 and 1780 were unfavorable to the crops. ' The labors of the hufbandmen, who were attached to the caufe of independence, had been frequently interrupted by the calls for militia duty Those who cared for neither fide, or who from principles of religion held the unlawfulnefs of war, or who were ferretly attached to the royal intereft, had been very deficient in industry. Such fometimes reafoned that all labor on their farms, beyond a bare fupply of their own neceffities, was unavailing; but the principal caufe of the fufferings of the army was the daily diminishing value of the continental bills of credit. The farmers found, that the longer they delayed the payment of taxes, the lefs quantity of country produce would difcharge the ftipulated fum. They also observed, that the longer they kept their grain on hand, the more of the paper currency was obtained in exchange for it. This either difcouraged them from felling, or made them very tardy in coming to market. Many fecreted their provifions 187

fions and denied their having any, while others who were 1780. contiguous to the British, fecretly fold to them for gold or filver. The patriotifm which at the commencement of the war had led fo many to facrifice property for the good of their country, had in a great degree fubfided. Though they ftill retained their good wifnes for the caufe. yet these did not carry them fo far as to induce a willingnefs to exchange the hard earned produce of their farms, for a paper currency of a daily diminishing value. For provisions carried to New-York, the farmers received real money, but for what was carried to the Americans, they only received paper. The value of the first was known, of the other daily varying, but in an unceasing progression from bad to worfe. Laws were made against this intercourse, but they were executed in the manner laws uniformly have been in the evalion of which multitudes find an immediate intereft.

> In addition to thefe difafters from thort crops, and depreciating money, diforder and confution pervaded the departments for fupplying the army. Syftems for thefe purpofes had been haftily adopted, and were very inadequate to the end propofed. To provide for an army under the beft eftabliftments, and with a full military cheft, is a work of difficulty, and though guarded by the precautions which time and experience have fuggefted, opens a door to many frauds; but it was the hard cafe of the Americans to be called on to difcharge this duty without fufficient knowledge of the bufinefs, and under ill digefted fyftems, and with a paper currency that was not two days of the fame value. Abufes crept in; frauds were practifed, and œconomy was exiled.

> To obviate thefe evils, Congrefs adopted the expedient of fending a committee of their own body to the camp of their main army. Mr. Schuyler of New-York, Mr. Peabody of New-Hampfhire, and Mr. Mathews of South-Carolina, were appointed. They were furnished with ample powers and instructions to reform abufes---to alter preceding fystems, and to establish new ones in their room. This committee proceeded to camp in May 1780, and thence wrote fundry letters to Congrefs and and the States, in which they confirmed the reprefentations previously made of the distreffes and diforders every where prevalent. In particular they flated" that the army was unpaid for five months---that it feldom had more than fix days provision in advance, and was on feveral occasions for fundry fuccessive days without meat---that the army was defitute of forage---that the medical department had neither fugar, coffee, tea, chocolate, wine nor "piritous liquors of any kind---that every department of the army was without money, and had not even the fladow of credit left---that the patience of the foldiers, born down by the preffure of complicated fufferings, was on the point of being exhausted."

A tide of misfortunes from all quarters was at this time pouring in upon the United-States. There appeared not however, in their public bodies, the smallest difpolition to purchase fafety by concessions of any fort. They feemed to rife in the midft of their diftreffes, and to gain strength from the pressure of calamities. When Congress could neither command money nor credit for the subsistence of their army, the citizens of Philadelphia formed an affociation to procure a fupply of neceffary articles for their fuffering foldiers. The fum of 300,000 dollars was fubscribed in a few days, and converted into a bank, the principal defign of which was to purchase provisions for the troops, in the most prompt and efficacious manner. The advantages of this inftitution were great, and particularly enhanced by the critical time in which it was inftituted. The lofs of Charleston, and the fubfequent British victories in Carolina, produced effects directly the reverse of what were expected. It being the deliberate refolution of the Americans never to return to the government of Great-Britain, fuch unfavorable events as threatened the fubversion of independence, operated as incentives to their exertions. The patriotic flame which had blazed forth in the beginning of the war was re-kindled. A willingnefs to do, and to fuffer, in the caufe of American liberty, was revived in the breafts of many. Thefe dispositions were invigorated ated by private affurances, that his moft Chriftian Majefty would, in the courfe of the campaign, fend a powerful armament to their aid. To excite the States to be in readinefs for this event, Congrefs circulated among them an addrefs of which the following is a part. " The crifis calls for exertion. Much is to be done in a little time, and every motive that can fimulate the mind of man prefents itfelf to view. No period has occurred in this long and glorious ftruggle, in which indecifion would be fo deftructive on the one hand, and on the other, no conjuncture has been more favorable to great and deciding efforts."

The powers of the committee of Congress in the American camp, were enlarged fo far as to authorife them to frame and execute fuch plans as, in their opinion, would most effectually draw forth the refources of the country, in co-operating with the armament expected from France. In this character they wrote fundry letters to the States, ftimulating them to vigorous exertions. It was agreed to make arrangements for bringing into the field 35,000 effective men, and to call on the States for fpecific fupplies of every thing neceffary for their fupport. To obtain the men it was propofed to complete the regular regiments by draughts from the militia, and to make up what they fell thort of 35,000 effectives, by calling forth more of the militia. Every motive concurred to roufe the activity of the inhabitants. The States nearly exhaufted with the war, ardently wifhed for its determination. An opportunity now offered for firiking a decifive blow, that might at once, as they fuppofed, rid the country of its diffreffes. The only thing required on the part of the United States, was to bring into the field 35,000 men, and to make effectual arrangements for their fupport. The tardinefs of deliberation in Congrefs was in a great meafure done away, by the full powers given to their committee in camp. Accurate estimates were made of every article of fupply, neceffary for the enfuing campaign. Thefe, and alfo the numbers of men wanted, were quotaed on the ten northern States in proportion to their abilities and numbers. In conformity to thefe requifitions, quifitions, vigorous refolutions were adopted for carrying them into effect. Where voluntary enliftments fell fhort of the proposed number, the deficiencies were, by the laws of feveral States, to be made up by draughts or lots from the militia. The towns in New-England and the counties in the middle States, were respectively called on for a specified number of men. Such was the zeal of the people in New-England, that neighbours would often club together, to engage one of their number to go into the army. Being without money, in conformity to the practice usual in the early stages of fociety, they paid for military duty with cattle. 'Twenty head were frequently given as a reward for eighteen months fervice. Maryland directed her Lieutenants of counties to clafs all the property in their refpective counties, into as many equal claffes as there were men wanted, and each clafs was by law obliged within ten days thereafter, to furnish an able bodied recruit to ferve during the war, and in cafe of their neglecting or refufing fo to do, the county Lieutenants were authorifed to procure men at their expence, at any rate not exceeding 15 pounds in every hundred pounds worth of property, classed agreeably to the law. Virginia alfo claffed her citizens, and called upon the respective classes for every fifteenth man for public fervice. Pennfylvania concentered the requifite power in her Prefident Joseph Reed, and authorised him to draw forth the refources of the State, under certain limitations, and if neceffary to declare martial law over the State. The legiflative part of thefe complicated arrangements was fpeedily paffed, but the execution though uncommonly vigorous lagged far behind. Few occasions could occur in which it might fo fairly be tried, to what extent in conducting a war, a variety of wills might be brought to act in unifon. The refult of the experiment was, that however favorable republics may be to the liberty and happiness of the people in the time of peace, they will be greatly deficient in that vigor and difparch, which military operations require, unlefs they initate the policy of monarchies, by committing the executive departments of government to the direction of a fingle will.

While these preparations were making in America, \sim thearmament which had been promised by his most Chriftian Majefty was on its way. As foon as it was known in France, that a refolution was adopted, to fend out troops to the United States, the young French nobility difcovered the greatest zeal to be employed on that fervice. Court favor was fcarcely ever folicited with more earnestnefs, than was the honor of ferving under General Washington. The number of applicants was much greater than the fervice required. The difpofition to fupport the American revolution, was not only prevalent in the court of France, but it animated the whole body of the nation. The winds and waves did not fecond the ardent wifnes of the French troops. Though they failed from France on the first of May 1780, they did not reach a port in the United States till the 10th of July following. On that day to the great joy of the Americans, M. de Ternay arrived at Rhode-Island, with a fquadron of feven fail of the line, five frigates, and five smaller armed vessels. He likewise convoyed a fleet of transports with four old French regiments, besides the legion de Lauzun. and a battalion of artillery, amounting in the whole to 6000 men, all under the command of Lieutenant General Count de Rochambeau. To the French as foon as they landed poffeffion was given of the forts and batteries on the ifland, and by their exertions, they were foon put in a high state of defence. In a few days after their arrival, an addrefs of congratulation from the General Affembly of the State of Rhode-Ifland, was prefented to Count de Rochambeau, in which they expressed " their most grateful fense of the magnanimous aid afforded to the United States, by their illustrious friend and ally the Monarch of France, and also gave affurances of every exertion in their power for the fupply of the French forces, with all manner of refreshments and necessaries for rendering the fervice happy and agreeable." Rochambeau declared in his anfwer, " that he only brought over the vanguard of a much greater force which was deftined for their aid; that he was ordered by the King his mafter to affure them, that his whole power should be exerted exerted for their fupport:" "The French troops" he faid "were under the fricteft difcipline, and acting under the orders of General Washington, would live with the Americans as brethren. He returned their compliments by an affurance, that as brethren, not only his own life, but the lives of all those under his command were devoted to their fervice."

Gen. Washington recommended in public orders to the American officers, as a fymbol of friendship and affection for their allies, towear black and white cockades, the ground to be of the first colour, and the relief of the second.

The French troops, united both in intereft and affection with the Americans, ardently longed for an opportunity to .co-operate with them against the common enemy. The continental army wilhed for the fame with equal ardor. One circumstance alone feemed unfavourable to this fpirit of enterprife. This was the deficient clothing of the Americans. Some whole lines, officers as well as men, were shabby, and a great proportion of the privates were without shirts. Such troops, brought along fide even of allies fully clad in the elegance of uniformity, must have been more or lefs than men to feel no degradation on the contrast.

Admiral Arbuthnot had only four fail of the line at New-York, when M. de Ternay arrived at Rhode-Ifland. This inferiority was in three days reverfed, by the arrival of Admiral Greaves with fix fail of the line. The Britifh Admiral, having now a fuperiority, proceeded to Rhode-Ifland. He foon difcovered that the French were perfectly fecure from any attack by fea. Sir Henry Clinton, who had returned in the preceding month with his victorious troops from Charleston, embarked about 8000 of his beft men, and proceeded as far as Huntingdon-bay on Long-Island, with the apparent defign of concurring with the British fleet, in attacking the French force at Rhode-Ifland. When this movement took place, Gen. Washington fet his army in motion, and proceeded to Peeks-kill. Had Sir Henry Clinton profecuted what appeared to be his defign, Gen. Washington intended to VOL. II. B b have 1780. have attacked New-York in his abfence. Preparations were made for this purpole, but Sir Henry Clinton infantly turned about from Huntingdon-bay towards New-York.

In the mean time, the French fleet and army being blocked up at Rhode-Island, were incapacitated from cooperating with the Americans.' Hopes were neverthelefs indulged, that by the arrival of another fleet of his most Christian Majesty then in the West-Indies, under the command of Count de Guichen, the superiority would be fo much in favor of the allies, as to enable them to profecute their original intention, of attacking New-York. When the expectations of the Americans were raifed to the highest pitch, and when they were in great forwardnefs of preparation to act in concert with their allies, intelligence arrived that Count de Guichen had failed for France. This difappointment was extremely mortifying. The Americans had made uncommon exertions, on the idea of receiving fuch an aid from their. allies, as would enable them to lay effectual fiege to New-York, or to firike fome decifive blow. Their towering expectations were in a moment levelled with the duft. Another campaign was anticipated, and new shades were added to the deep cloud, which for fome time paft had overshadowed American affairs.

The campaign of 1780, paffed away in the northern States as has been related, in fucceffive difappointments. and reiterated distreffes. The country was exhausted, the continental currency expiring. The army for want of fubfistence, keptinactive, and brooding over its calamities. While these difasters were openly menacing the ruin of the American caufe, treachery was filently undermining it. A diftinguished officer engaged for a ftipulated fum of money, to betray into the hands of the British an important post committed to his care. General Arnold who committed this foul crime was a native of Connecticut. That State, remarkable for the purity of its morals, for its republican principles and patriotifin, was the birth place of a man to whom none of the other States have produced an equal. He had been among the

the first to take up arms against Great-Britain, and to widen the breach between the Parent State and the colonies. His diftinguished military talents had procured him every bonor a greatful country could beftow. Poets and Painters had marked him as a fuitable fubject for the display of their respective abilities. He posseffed an elevated feat in the hearts of his countrymen, and was in the full enjoyment of a substantial fame, for the purchase of which, the wealth of worlds would have been infufficient. His country had not only loaded him with honors, but forgiven him his crimes. Though in his accounts against the States there was much room to fufpect fraud and imposition, yet the recollection of his gallantry and good conduct, in a great measure ferved as a cloak to cover the whole. He who had been prodigal of life in his country's cause was indulged in extraordinary demands for his fervices. The generofity of the States did not keep pace with the extravagance of their favorite officer. A sumptuous table and expensive equipage, unfupported by the refources of private fortune, unguarded by the virtues of œconomy and good management, foon increafed his debts beyond a pollibility of his difcharging them. His love of pleafure produced the love of money, and that extinguithed all fentibility to the obligations of honor and duty. The calls of luxury were various and preffing, and demanded gratification though at the expence of fame and country. Contracts were made, speculations entered into, and partnerships instituted, which could not bear investigation. Oppreftion, extortion, misupplication of public money and property, furnished him with the farther means of gratifying his favorite paffions. In these circumstances, a change of fides afforded the only hope of evading a fcrutiny, and at the fame time, held out a profpect of replenishing his exhausted coffers. The disposition of the American forces in the year 1780, afforded an opportunity of accomplifying this fo much to the advantage of the British, that they could well afford a liberal reward for the beneficial treachery. The American army was stationed in the strong holds of the highlands

1780. on both fides of the North-river. In this arrangement, Arnold folicited for the command of West-point. This has been called the Gibraltar of America. It was built after the lofs of fort Montgomery, for the defence of the North river, and was deemed the most proper for commanding its navigation. Rocky ridges rifing one behind another, rendered it incapable of being invefted, by lefs than twenty thousand men. Though fome even then entertained doubts of Arnold's fidelity, yet Gen. Wafhington in the unfuspecting spirit of a foldier, believing it to be impoffible that honor fhould be wanting in a breaft which he knew was the feat of valor, cheerfully granted his requeft, and intrusted him with the important post. Gen. Arnold thus invefted with command, carried on a negociation with Sir Henry Clinton, by which it was agreed that the former should make a disposition of his forces, which would enable the latter to furprife Weftpoint under fuch circumstances, that he would have the garrifon fo completely in his power, that the troops muft either lay down their arms or be cut to pieces. The object of this negociation was the ftrongeft post of the Americans, the thoroughfare of communication, between the eaftern and fouthern State, and was the repository of their most valuable stores. The loss of it would have been feverely felt.

> The agent employed in this negociation on the part of Sir Henry Clinton, was Major André, adjutant general of the British army, a young officer of great hopes, and of uncommon merit. Nature had bestowed on him an elegant tafte for literature and the fine arts, which by industrious cultivation he had greatly improved. He poffeffed many amiable qualities, and very great accomplifiments. His fidelity together with his place and character, eminently fitted him for this bufinefs; but his high ideas of candor, and his abhorrence of dupicity, made him inexpert in practifing those arts of deception which it required. To favor the neceffary communications, the Vulture floop of war had been previoufly flationed in the North river, as near to Arnold's posts as was practicable, without exciting fuspicion. Before this a written correspondence pondence between Arnold and André, had been for fome 1780. time carried on, under the fictitious names of Gustavus and Anderson. A boat was fent at night from the sore Sep. 21. to fetch Major André. On its return, Arnold met him at the beach, without the posts of either army. Their bufinefs was not finished till it was too near the dawn of day for André to return to the Vulture. Arnold told him he must be concealed till the next night. For that purpofe, he was conducted within one of the American posts, against his previous stipulation and knowledge, and continued with Arnold the following day. The boatmen refused to carry him back the next night, as the Vulture, from being exposed to the fire of some cannon brought up to annoy her, had changed her position. André's return to New-York by land, was then the only practicable mode of efcape. To favor this he quitted his uniform which he had hitherto worn under a furtout, for a common coat, and was furnished with a horse, and under the name of John Anderson, with a pafiport " to go to the lines of White Plains or lower if he thought proper, he being on public bufinefs." He advanced alone and undifturbed a great part of the way. When he thought himfelf almost out of danger, he was stopt by three of the New-York militia, who were with others fcouting between the out posts of the two armies. Major André instead of producing his pass, asked the man who ftopt him "where he belonged to" who answered "to below" meaning New-York. He replied "fo do I" and declared himfelf a British officer, and preffed that he might not be detained. He foon difcovered his miftake. His captors proceeded to fearch him: Sundry papers were found in his possession. These were secreted in his boots, and were in Arnold's hand writing. They contained exact returns of the state of the forces, ordnance and defences at Weft-Point, with the artillery orders, critical remarks on the works, &c.

André offered his captors a purfe of gold and a new valuable watch, if they would let him pafe, and permanent provision and future promotion, if they would conyey and accompany him to New-York. They nobly difdained dained the proffered bribe, and delivered him a prifoner to Lieut. Col. Jameson, who commanded the fcouts. ing parties. In testimony of the high fenfe entertained of the virtuous and patriotic conduct of John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Vert, the captors of André, Congress refolved " That each of them receive annually two hundred dollars in fpeice during life, and that the board of war be directed to procure for each of them a filver medal, on one fide of which should be a shield with this inscription, Fidelity; and on the other, the following motto, Vincit, Amor Patria: and that the commander in chief be requested to prefent the same, with the thanks of Congress, for their fidelity and the eminent fervice they had rendered their country." André when delivered to Jameson continued to call himfelf by the name of Anderion, aud asked leave to fend a letter to Arnold, to acquaint him with Anderfon's detention. This was inconfiderately granted. Arnold on the receipt of this letter abandoned every thing, and went on board the Vulture floop of war. Lieut. Col. Jamefon forwarded to Gen. Washington all the papers found on André, together with a letter giving an account of the whole affair, but the express, by taking a different route from the General, who was returning from a conference at Hartford with Count de Rochambeau, miffed him. This caufed fuch a delay as gave Arnold time to effect his efcape. The fame packet which detailed the particulars of André's capture, brought a letter from him, in which he avowed his name and character, and endeavoured to fhew that he did not come under the description of a spy. The letter was expressed in terms of dignity without infolence, and of apology without meannefs. He stated therein, that he held a correspondence with a person under the orders of his General. That his intention went no farther than meeting that perfon on neutral ground, for the purpofe of intelligence, and that, against his stipulation, his intention, and without his knowledge beforehand, he was brought within the American pofts, and had to concert his efcape from them. Being taken on his return he was betrayed into the vile condition of an enemy in difguife. His

His principal request was that " whatever his fate might be, a decency of treatment might be observed, which would mark, that though unfortunate he was branded with nothing that was dishonourable, and that he was involuntarily an imposter."

General Washington referred the whole cafe of Major André to the examination and decision of a board, confifting of fourteen general officers. On his examination, he voluntarily confessed every thing that - related to himfelf, and particularly that he did not come ashore under the protection of a flag. The board did not examine a fingle witnefs, but founded their report on his own confession. In this they stated the following facts: " That Major André came on shore on the night of the 21st of September in a private and fecret manner, and that he changed his drefs within the American lines, and under a feigned name and difguifed habit paffed their works, and was taken in a difguifed habit when on his way to New-York, and when taken, feveral papers were found in his poffeffion, which contained intelligence for the enemy." From thefe facts they farther reported it as their opinion " That Major André ought to be confidered as a fpy, and that agreeably to the laws and ulages of nations he ought to fuffer death."

· Sir Henry Clinton, Lieutenant General Robertfon, and the late American General Arnold, wrote preffing letters to General Washington, to prevent the decision of the board of general officers from being carried into effect. General Arnold in particular urged, that every thing done by Major Andié was done by his particular requeft, and at a time when he was the acknowledged commanding officer in the department. He contended " that he had a right to transact all these matters for which though wrong, Major André ought not to fuffer." An interview alfo took place between General Robertion on the part of the British, and General Greene, on the part of the Americans. Every thing was urged by the former, that ingenuity or humanity could fuggeft for averting the proposed execution, Greene made a proposition for delivering up André for Arnold; but finding

1780. ing this could not be acceded to by the British, without S offending against every principle of policy. Robertson urged " that Andre went on fhore under the fanction of a flag, and that being then in Arnold's power, he was not accountable for his fubfequent actions, which were faid to be compulfory." To this it was replied that * he was employed in the execution of measures very foreign from the objects of flags of truce, and fuch as they were never meant to authorife or countenance, and ; that Major André in the courfe of his examination had candidly confeficd, that it was impossible for him to fuppose that he came on fhore under the fanction of a flag.", As Greene and Robertson differed fo widely both in their statement of facts, and the inferences they drew from them, the latter proposed to the former, that the opinions of difinterested gentlemen might be taken on the fubject, and, propofed Kniphaufen and Rochambeau. Robertson alfo urged that Andre poffeffed a great fhare of Sir Henry, Clinton's effeem; and that he would be infinitely obliged if he thould be spared. He offered that in case André was permitted to return with him to New-York, any perfon whatever, that might be named, fhould be fet at liberty. All thefe arguments and entreaties having failed, Robertson prefented a long letter from Arnold, in which he endeavoured to exculpate André, by acknowledging himfelf the author of every part of his conduct, " and particularly infifted on his coming from the Vulture, under a flag which he had fent for that purpofe," He declared that if André, fuffered he should think himfelf bound in honour to retaliate. He also obferved " that forty of the principal inhabitants of South-Carolina had juftly forfeited their lives, which had hitherto been spared only through the clemency of Sir Henry Clinton, but who could no longer extend his mercy if Major André fuffered : an event which would probably open a fcene of bloodfhed, at which humanity must revolt." He intreated Washington by his own honour, and for that of humanity not to fuffer an unjust fentence to touch the life of André, but if that warning should be difregarded and André suffer, he called Heaven and earth to witnefs, that he alone would be juftly anfwerable for the torrents of blood that might be fpilt in confequence."

Every exertion was made by the royal commanders to fave André, but without effect. It was the general opinion of the American army that his life was forfeited, and that national dignity and found policy required that the forfeiture fhould be exacted.

André though superior to the terrors of death, wished to die like a foldier. To obtain this favour, he wrote a letter to Gen. Washington, fraught with sentiments of military dignity. From an adherence to the ufages of war, it was not thought proper to grant this requeft; but his delicacy was faved from the pain of receiving a negative anfwer. The guard which attended him in his confinement, marched with him to the place of execution. The way, over which he paffed, was crouded on each fide by anxious spectators. Their sensibility was strongly impressed by beholding a well dreffed youth, in the bloom of life, of a peculiarly engaging perfon, mien and afpect, devoted to immediate execution. . Major André walked with firmnefs, composure and dignity, between two officers of his guard, his arm being locked in theirs. Upon feeing the preparations at the fatal fpot, he asked with fome degree of concern " Muft I die in this manner ?"---He was told it was unavoidable --- He replied, " I am reconciled to my fate, but not to the mode;" but foon fubjoined, " It will be but a momentary pang." He afcended the cart with a pleafing countenance, and with a degree of composure, which excited the admiration and melted the hearts of all the spectators. He was asked when the fatal moment was at hand, if he had any thing to fay; he answered nothing but to request " That you will witnefs to the world that I die like a brave man." The fucceeding moments clofed the affecting fcene.

This execution was the fubject of fevere cenfures. Barbarity, cruelty and murder, were plentifully charged on the Americans, but the impartial of all nations allowed, that it was warranted by the ufages of, war. It cannot be condemned, without condemning the maxims of felf-Vol. II, C c prefervation prefervation, which have uniformly guided the practice of hoftile nations. The finer feelings of humanity would have been gratified, by difpenfing with the rigid maxime of war in favour of fo diftinguished an officer, but thefe feelings must be controlled by a regard for the public fafe-Such was the diftreffed state of the American artv. iny, and fo abundant were their causes of complaint, that there was much to fear from the contagious nature of treachery. Could it have been reduced to a certainty that there were no more Arnolds in America, perhaps André's life might have been spared; but the necessity of difcouraging farther plots, fixed his fate, and ftamped it with the feal of political neceffity. If conjectures in the boundlefs field of poffible contingencies were to be indulged, it might be faid that it was more confonant to 'extended humanity to take one life, than by ill timed lenity to lay a foundation, which probably would occasion not only the lofs of many, but endanger the independence of a great country.

Though a regard to the public fafety impofed a neceffity for inflicting the rigors of martial law, yet the rare worth of this unfortunate officer made his unhappy cafe the fubject of univerfal regret. Not only among the partifans of royal government, but among the firmeft American republicans, the friendly tear of fympathy freely flowed, for the early fall of this amiable young man. Some condemned, others jufified, but all regretted the fatal fentence which put a period to his valuable life.

This grand project terminated with no other alteration in refpect of the British, than that of their exchanging one of their best officers for the worst man in the American army. Arnold was immediately made a Brigadier General, in the fervice of the King of Great Britain. The failure of the feheme respecting West-Point, made it neceffary for him to difpel the cloud, which overschadowed his character, by the performance of fome fignal fervice for his new masters. The condition of the American army, afforded him a prospect of doing fomething of confequence. He flattered himfelf that by the allurements allurements of pay and promotion, he flould be able to raife a numerous force, from among the diffreffed American foldiery. He therefore took methods for accomplifting this purpofe, by obviating their foruples, and working on their paffious. His first public measure was iffuing an addrefs, directed to the inhabitants of America, dated from New-York, five days after André's execution. Oft. 7. In this he endeayoured to justify himfelf for deferting their caufe. He faid "that when he first engaged in it, he conceived the rights of his country to be in danger, and that duty and honor called him to her defence. A redrefs of grievances was his only aim and object. He however acquiefced in the declaration of independence, although he thought it precipitate. But the reafons that then were offered to justify that measure, no longer could exift, when Great Britain with the open arms of a parent, offered to embrace them as children and to grant the wished for redrefs. From the refusal of these propofals, and the ratification of the French alliance, all his ideas of the justice and policy of the war were totally changed, and from that time, he had become a profefied loyalift. He acknowledged that " in these principles he had only retained his arms and command, for an opportunity to furrender them to, Great Britain.". This addrefs was foon followed by another, inferibed to the officers and foldiers of the continental army. This was intended to induce them to follow his example, and engage in the royal fervice. He informed them, that he was authorifed to raife a corps of cavalry and infantry, who were to be on the fame footing with the other troops in the British fervice. To allure the private men, three guineas were offered to each, befides payment for their horfes, arms and accoutrements. Rank in the British army was alfo held out to the American officers, who would recruit and bring in a certain number of men, proportioned to the different grades in military fervice. Thefe offers were proposed to unpaid foldiers, who were fuffering from the want of both food and cloathing, and to officers who were in a great degree obliged to fupport themfelves from their own refources, while they were fpending fpending the prime of their days, and rifquing their lives in the unproductive fervice of Congrefs. Though they were urged at a time when the paper currency was at its loweft ebb of depreciation, and the wants and diftreffes of the American army were at their higheft pitch, yet they did not produce the intended effect on a fingle fentinel or officer. Whether the circumftances of Arnold's cafe, added new fhades to the crime of defertion, or whether their providential efcape from the deep laid fcheme againft Weft-point, gave a higher tone to the firmnefs of the American foldiery, cannot be unfolded: But either from thefe or fome other caufes, defertion wholly ceafed at this remarkable period of the war.

It is matter of reproach to the United States, that they brought into public view a man of Arnold's character, but it is to the honor of human nature, that a great revolution and an eight years war produced but one. In civil contefts, for officers to change fides has not been unufual, but in the various events of the American war, and among the many regular officers it called to the field, nothing occurred that bore any refemblance to the conduct of Arnold. His fingular cafe enforces the policy of conferring high trufts exclusively on men of clean hands, and of withholding all public confidence from thofe who are fubjected to the dominion of pleafure.

Nov. 28.

A gallant enterprize of Major Talmadge about this time fhall clofe this chapter. He croffed the found to Long-Ifland with 80 men, made a circuitous march of 20 miles to Fort-George, and reduced it without any other lofs than that of one private man wounded. He killed and wounded eight of the enemy, captured a Lt. Colonel, a Captain and 55 privates.

Foreign Affairs, connected with the American Revolution 1780, 1781.

HAT fpark which was first kindled at Boston, gradually expanded itefelf till fundry of the nations of Europe were involved in its wide fpreading flame. France, Spain and Holland were in the years 1778, 1779 and 1780 fucceffively drawn in for a fhare of the general : it a lore calamity.

Thefe events had fo direct an influence on the American war, that a short recapitulation of them becomes neceffary.

Soon after his most Catholic Majesty declared war against Great-Britain, expeditions were carried on by Don' Galvez the Spanish governor of Louisiana, against the British fettlements in West-Florida. Thefe were eafily reduced. The conquest of the whole province May 5, was completed in a few months by the reduction of 1781. Penfacola. The Spaniards were not fo fuccefsful in . their attempts against Gibraltar and Jamaica. They had blockaded the former of these places on the landfide ever fince July 1779, and foon after invested it as closely by fea, as the nature of the gut, and variety of wind and weather, would permit." Towards the close of the year the garrifon was reduced to great firaits. Vegetables were with difficulty to be got at any price, but bread, the great effential both of life and health, was most deficient. Governor Elliott who commanded in the garrifon, made an experiment to afcertain what quantity of rice would fuffice a fingle perfon, and lived for eight fucceffive days, on thirty two ounces of that nutritious Feb. 8, grain. 1780.

The critical fituation of Gibraltar called for relief. A ftrong fquadron was prepared for that purpose, and the command of it given to Sir George Rodney He when on his way thither fell in with 15 fail of merchant men, under a flight convoy bound from St. Sebastian to Cadiz, and captured the whole. Several of the veffels were laden with provisions which being fent into Gibraltar proved a feasonable supply. In eight days after, he engaged near Cape St. Vincent with a Spanish squadron July 18. of eleven fail of the line, commanded by Don Juan de Langara. Early in the action the Spanish ship San Domingo mounting 70 guns, and carrying 600 men blew up, and all on board perified. The action continued with great vigor on both fides for ten hours. The Spanish Admiral's fhip the Phœnix of 80 guns, with three of 70, were carried into a British port. The San Julian of 70, guns was taken. A Lieutenant with 70 British feamen was put on board, but as fhe ran on fhore, the victors became prisoners. Another ship of the fame force was alfo taken, but afterwards totally loft. Four efcaped, but two of them were greatly damaged. The Spanish Admiral did not ftrike till his fhip was reduced to a mere wreck. Captain Macbride of the Bienfaifcent, to whom he ftruck, difdaining to convey infection even to an enemy, informed him that a malignant fmall pox prevailed on board the Bienfaiscent; and offered to permit the Spanifh prifoners to flay on board the Phænix, rather than by a removal to expose them to the fmall pox, trufting to the Admira'ls honor, that no advantage would be taken of the circumstance. The propofal was chearfully embraced, and the conditions honorably obferved. The confequence of this important victory was the immediate and complete relief of Gibraltar. This being done, Rodney proceeded to the Weft-Indies. The Spaniards neverthelefs perfevered with steadinefs, in their original defign of reducing Gibraltar. They feemed to be entirely abforbed in that object. The garrifon, after fome time, began again to fuffer the inconveniences which flow from deficient and unwholfome food : But in April 1781, Apr. 12. complete relief was obtained through the intervention of a British fleet, Commanded by Admiral Darby.

The court of Spain mortified at this repeated difappointment, determined to make greater exertions. Their works was carried on with more vigor than ever. Having on an experiment of 20 months found the inefficacy of a blockade, they refolved to try the effects of a bombardment. Their batteries were mounted with guns of the heavieft heaviest metal, and with mortars of the largest dimenfions. These difgorged torrents of fire on a narrow spot. It feemed as if not only the works, but the rock itfelf must have been overwhelmed. All distinction of parts was loft in flame and fmoke. This dreadful cannonade continued day and night, almost inceffantly for three weeks, in every 24 hours of which 100,000lbs. of gunpowder were confumed, and between 4 and 5000 fhot and shells went through the town. It then flackened, but was not intermitted for one whole day for upwards of a twelve month. The fatigues of the garrifon were extreme, but the lofs of men was lefs than might have been expected. For the first ten weeks of this unexampled bombardment, the whole number of killed and wounded was only about 300. The damage done to the works was triffing. The houses in town about 500 in number were mostly destroyed. Such of the inhabitants as were not buried in the ruins of their houses, or torn to pieces by the shells, fled to the remote parts of the rocks, but destruction followed them to places which had always been deemed fecure. No scene could be more deplorable. Mothers and children clafped in each others arms, were fo completely torn to pieces, that it feemed more like an annihilation, than a difperfion of their fhattered fragments. Ladies of the greatest fensibility and most delicate conftitutions deemed themfelves happy to be admitted to a few hours of repose in the casemates, amidit the noife of a crouded foldiery, and the groans of the wounded.

At the first onfet Gen. Elliot retorted on the besiegers a shower of fire, but foresceing the difficulty of procuring supplies he soon retrenched, and received with comparative unconcern, the fury and violence of his adverfaries. By the latter end of November, the besiegers had brought their works to that state of perfection which they intended. The care and ingenuity employed upon them were extraordinary. The best engineers of France and Spain had united their abilities, and both kingdoms were filled with fanguine expectations of speedy fucces. In this conjuncture, when all Europe was in suspence concerning cerning the fate of the garrifon, and when from the prodigious efforts made for its reduction, many believed that it could not hold out much longer, a fally was projected and executed, which in about two hours deftroyed thofe works which had required fo much time, fkill and labor to accomplifh.

1781. A body of 2000 chofen men, under the command of Nov. 27. Brig. 'Gen. Rofs, marched out about 2 o'clock in the morning, and at the fame inftant made a general attack on the whole exterior front of the lines of the befiegers. The Spaniards gave way on every fide, and abandoned their works. The pioneers and artillery men fpread their fire with fuch rapidity, that in a little time every thing combuftible was in flames. The mortars and cannon were fpiked, and their beds, platforms and carriages deftroyed. The magazines blew up, one after another. The lofs of the detachment, which accomplifhed all this deftruction, was inconfiderable.

> This unexpected event difconcerted the befiegers, but they foon recovered from their alarm, and with a perfeverance almost peculiar to their nation, determined to go on with the fege. Their fubfequent exertions, and re-iterated defeats, fhall be related in the order of time in which they took place.

> While the Spaniards were urging the fiege of Gibraltar, a fcheme which had been previoufly concerted with the French was in a train of execution. This confifted of two parts: The object of the first, concerted between the French and Spaniards, was no lefs than the conquest of Jamaica. The object of the fecond, in which the French and the Americans were parties, was the reduction of New-York. In conformity to this plan, the monarchs of France and Spain early in the year 1780, assembled a force in the West-Indies, superior to that of the British. Their combined fleets amounted to thirty fix fail of the line, and their land forces were in a correspondent proportion. By acting in concert, they hoped to make rapid conquests in the West Indies.

> Fortunately for the British interest, this great hostile force carried within itself the caufe of its own overthrow. The

The Spanish troops from being too much crouded on board their transports, were feized with a mortal and contagious diftemper. This spread through the French fleet and land forces, as well as their own. With the hopes of arrefting its progrefs, the Spaniards were landed in the French illands. By these difastrous events, the fpirit of enterprife was damped. The combined fleets, having neither effected nor attempted any thing of confequence, defifted from the profecution of the objects of the campaign. The failure of the first part of the plan, occasioned the failure of the second. Count de Guichen the commander of the French fleet, who was to have followed M. de Ternay, and to have co-operated with Gen. Washington, instead of coming to the American continent, failed with a large convoy collected from the French islands, directly to France.

The abortive plans of the French and Spaniards, operated directly against the interest of the United States, but this was in a short time counterbalanced, by the increased embarrass occasioned to Great Britain, by the armed neutrality of the northern powers, and by a rupture with Holland.

The naval fuperiority of Great Britain, had long been the fubject of regret and of envy. As it was the intereft, fo it feemed to be the wifh of European fovereigns, to avail themfelves of the prefent favourable moment, to effect an humiliation of her maritime grandeur. That the flag of all nations must strike to British ships of war, could not be otherwife than mortifying to independent fovereigns. This haughty demand was not their only caufe of complaint. The activity and number of British privateers had rendered them objects of terror, not only to the commercial fhipping of their enemies, but to the many vefiels belonging to other powers, that were emploved in trading with them. Various litigations had taken place between the commanders of British armed veffels, and those who were in the fervice of neutral powers, respecting the extent of that commerce, which was confistent with a strict and fair neutrality. The Britifh infifted on the lawfulnefs of feizing fupplies, which D d VOL. II. were were about to be carried to their enemies. Having been in the habit of commanding on the fea, they confidered power and right to be fynonimous terms. As other nations from a dread of provoking their vengeance, had fubmitted to their claim of dominion on the ocean, they fancied themfelves invefted with authority to controul the commerce of independent nations, when it interfered with their views. This haughtinefs worked its own overthrow. The Emprefs of Ruffia took the lead in eftablifhing a fyflem of maritime laws, which fubverted the claims of Great Britain. Her trading veffels had long been harraffed by British fearches and feizures, on pretence of their carrying on a commerce inconfiftent with neutrality. The prefent crifis favoured the re-eftablifhment of the laws of nature, in place of the ufurpations of Great Britain.

Feb. 26. 1780.

A declaration was published by the empress of Ruffia, addreffed to the courts of London, Verfailles and Madrid. In this it was obferved "that her Imperial Majefty had given fuch convincing proofs of the ftrict regard fhe had for the rights of neutrality, and the liberty of commerce in general, that it might have been hoped her impartial conduct, would have entitled her fubjects to the enjoyment of the advantages belonging to neutral nations. Experience had however proved the contrary; her fubjects had been molested in their navigation, by the ships and privateers of the belligerent powers." Her Majefty therefore declared " that fhe found it neceffary to remove these vexations which had been offered to the commerce of Ruffia, but before the came to any ferious measures, fhe thought it just and equitable, to expose to the world and particularly to the belligerent powers, the principles the had adopted for her conduct, which were as follows.

"That neutral fhips fhould enjoy a free navagation, even from port to port, and on the coafts of the belligerent powers. That all effects belonging to the belligerent powers, fhould be looked on as free on board fuch neutral fhips, with an exception of places actually blocked up or befieged, and with a provifo that they do not carry to the enemy contraband articles." Thefe were limited limited by an explanation, fo as to " comprehend only warlike ftores and ammunition," her imperial Majefty declared that " fhe was firmly refolved to maintain thefe principles, and that with the view of protecting the commerce and navigation of her fubjects, fhe had given orders to fit out a confiderable part of her naval force." This declaration was communicated to the States General, and the emprefs of Ruffia invited them to make a common caufe with her, fo far as fuch an union might ferve to protect commerce and navigation. Similar communications and invitations were allo made to the courts of Copenhagen, Stockholm and Litbon. A civil anfwer was received from the court of Great-Britain, and a very cordial one from the court of France. On this occafion, it was faid by his most Christian Majefty " that what her Imperial Majefty claimed from the belligerent powers, was nothing more than the rules prefcribed to the French navy" The Kings of Sweden and Denmark, alfo formally acceded to the principles and measures proposed by the empress of Ruffia. The States General did the fame. The Queen of Portugal was the only fovereign who refufed to concur. The powers engaged in this affociation refolved to support each other against any of the belligerent nations, who thould violate the principles which had been laid down, in the declaration of the empress of Ruffin.

This combination affumed the name of the armed neutrality. By it a refpectable guarantee was procured to a commerce, from which France and Spain procured a plentiful fupply of articles, effentially conducive to a vigorous profecution of the war. The ufurped authority of Great Britain on the highway of nature received a fatal blow. Her embarraffments from this fource were aggravated by the confideration, that they came from a power in whofe friendship the had confided.

About the fame time the enemies of Great Britain were increased by the addition of the States General. Though these two powers were bound to each other; by the obligations of treaties, the conduct of the latter had long been confidered, rather as hostile than friendly. Few Few Europeans had a greater prospect of advantage from American independence than the Hollanders. The conquest of the United States, would have regained to Great Britain a monopoly of their trade; but the eftablifhment of their independence promifed to other nations, an equal chance of participating therein. As commerce is the foul of the United Netherlands, to have neglected the prefent opportunity of extending it, would have been a deviation from their established maxims of policy. Former treaties framed in diftant periods, when other views were predominant, opposed but a feeble barrier to the claims of prefent intereft. The past generation found it to their advantage, to feek the friendship and protection of Great Britain. But they who were now on the ftage of life, had fimilar inducements to feek for new channels of trade. Though this could not be done without thwarting the views of the court of London, their recollection of former favours was not fufficient to curb their immediate favorite paffion. From the year 1777, Sir Joseph Yorke, the British minister at the Hague, had made fundry reprefentations to their High Mightinesses of the clandestine commerce, carried on between their fubjects and the Americans. He particularly stated that Mr. Van Graaf, the Governor of St. Eustatius, had permitted an illicit commerce with the Americans; and had at one time returned the falute of a veffel carrying their flag. Sir Joseph, therefore demanded a formal difavowal of this falute, and the difmiffion and immediate recall of Governor Van Graaf. 'This infolent demand was answered with a pufillanimous temporifing reply. On the 12th of September 1778, a memorial was prefented to the States General, from the merchants and others of Amfterdam, in which they complained that their lawful commerce was obstructed by the ships of his Britannic Majefty. On the 22d of July, 1770, Sir Jofeph Yorke demanded of the States General, the fuccours which were flipulated in the treaty of 1678: But this was not complied with. Friendly declarations and unfriendly actions followed each other in alternate fucceffion. At length a declaration was published by the King of

of Great Britain, by which it was announced " that the fubjects of the United Provinces, were henceforth to be confidered upon the fame footing with other martial powers, not privileged by treaty" Throughout the whole of this period, the Dutch by means of neutral ports, continued to fupply the Americans and the Englith, to infult and intercept their navigation, but open hostilities were avoided by both. The former aimed principally at the gains of a lucrative commerce, the latter to remove all obstacles which stood in the way of their favourite fcheme of conquering the Americans. The event which occasioned a formal declaration of war, was the capture of Henry Laurens. In the deranged ftate of the American finances, that gentleman had been deputed by Congrefs, to folicit a loan for their fervice in the United Netherlands; and alfo to negociate a treaty between them and the United States On his way thither, he was taken by the Vestal frigate commanded by Captain Kep- Sep. 3. ple. He had thrown his papers overboard; but great 1780. part of them were neverthelefs recovered without having received much damage. His papers being delivered to Oct. 6. the ministry, were carefully examined. Among them was found one purporting to be a plan of a treaty of amity and commerce, between the States of Holland and the United States of America. This had been originally drawn up in confequence of some conversation between William Lee, whom Congress had appointed commissioner to the courts of Vienna and Berlin; and John de Neufville, merchant of Amfterdam, as a plan of a treaty deftined to be concluded hereafter : But it had never been proposed either by Congress or the States of Holland, though it had received the approbation of the Penfionary Van Berkel, and of the city of Amsterdam. As this was not an official paper, and had never been read in Congress the original was given to Mr. Laurens as a paper that might be useful to him in his projected negociations. This unauthentic paper, which was in Mr. Laurens' poffeffion by accident, and which was fo nearly funk in the ocean, proved the occasion of a national war. The court of Great Britain, was highly offended at it. The

Nov. 5. The paper itfelf and fome others, relating, to the fame Nov. 10. fubject were delivered to the Prince of Orange, who laid 1780. them before the States of Holland and Weft-Friefland.

Sir Jofeph Yorke prefented a memorial to the States General, in which he afferted "That the papers of Mr. Laurens, who stiled himself President of the pretended Congress, had furnished the discovery of a plot unexampled in all the annals of the republic. That it appeared by these papers, that the gentlemen of Amsterdam had been engaged in a clandeftine correspondence with the American rebels, from the month of August 1778, and that inftructions and full powers, had been given by them for the conclusion of a treaty of indifputable amity with those rebels, who were the fubjects of a fovereign, to whom the republic was united by the closeft engagements." He therefore, in the name of his mafter, demanded " A formal difavowal of this irregular conduct, and a prompt fatisfaction proportioned to the offence, and an exemplary punifhment of the Penfionary. Van Berkel, and his accomplices, as diffurbers of the public peace and violaters of the laws of nations. The States General difavowed the intended treaty of the city of Amfterdam, and engaged to profecute the Penfionary according to the laws of the country; but this was not deemed fatisfacto-Dec. 20. ry. Sir Joseph Yorke was ordered to withdraw from the Hague, and foon after a manifesto against the Dutch was published in London. This was followed by an order of council " That general reprifals be granted against the ships, goods and subjects, of the States General." Whatever may be thought of the policy of this measure, its boldness must be admired. Great Britain, already at war with the United States of America, the monarchies of France and Spain, deliberately refolves on a war with Holland, and at a time when fhe might have avoided open hoftilities. Her spirit was still far> ther evinced by the confideration that fhe was deferted by her friends, and without a fingle ally. Great muft have been her refources to fupport fo extensive a war against fo many hoftile fovereigns, but this very ability, by proving that her overgrown power was dangerous to the the peace of Europe, furnished an apology for their combination against her.

A war with Holland being refolved upon, the form of Britith vengeance first burst on the Dutch Island of St. Eustatius. This though intrinsically of little value, had long been the feat of an extensive commerce. It was the grand freeport of the West-Indies, and as such was a general market and magazine to all nations. In confequence of its neutrality and fituation, together with its unbounded freedom of trade, it reaped the richest harvests of commerce, during the feasons of warfare among its neighbours. It was in a particular manner, a convenient channel of fupply to the Americans.

The Ifland is a natural fortification, and very capable of being made ftrong; but as its inhabitants were a motley mixture of transfient perfons, wholly intent on the gains of commerce, they were more folicitous to acquire property, than attentive to improve those means of security which the Island afforded.

Sir George Rodney and General Vaughan, with a large 1781. fleet and army, furrounded this Ifland, and demanded a Feb. 3. furrender thereof and of its dependencies within an hour. Mr. de Graaf returned for antwer "That being utterly incapable of making any defence against the force which invested the Island, he muss of necessfity furrender it, only recommending the town and its inhabitants to the known and usual elemency of British commanders."

The wealth accumulated in this barren fpot was prodigious. The whole Ifland feemed to be one vaft magazine. The ftore-houfes were filled, and the beach covered with valuable commodities. Thefe on a moderate calculation were estimated to be worth above three millons sterling. All this property, together with what was found on the Ifland, was indiferiminately feized and declared to be confifeated. This valuable booty was farther increafed by new arrivals. The conquerors for fome time kept up Dutch colors, which decoyed a number of French, Dutch and American veffels into their hands. Above 150 merchant veffel's, most of which were richly laden, were captured. A Dutch frigate of 38 guns, and five finall fmall armed veffels, fhared the fame fate. The neighbouring Iflands of St. Martin and Saba were in like manner reduced. Juft before the arrival of the Britifh, 30 large fhips, laden with Weft-India commodities, had failed from Euflatius for Holland, under the convoy of a fhip of fixty guns. Admiral Rodney defpatched the Monarch and Panther, with the Sybil frigate in purfuit of this fleet. The whole of it was overtaken and captured.

The Dutch West-India company, many of the citizens of Amsterdam, and feveral Americans were great fufferers by the capture of this Island, and the confifcation of all property found therein, which immediately followed, but the British merchants were much more fo. These confiding in the acknowledged neutrality of the island, and in acts of Parliament, had accumulated therein great quantities of Weft-India produce, as well as of European goods. They ftated their hard cafe to Admiral Rodney and Gen. Vaughan, and contended that their connexion with the captured ifland was under the fanction of acts of Parliament, and that their commerce had been conducted according to the rules and maxims of trading nations. To applications of this kind it was answered, "That the island was Dutch, every thing in it was Dutch, was under the protection of the Dutch flag, and as Dutch it fhould be treated."

The feverity with which the victors proceeded, drew on them pointed cenfures not only from the immediate fufferers, but from all Europe. It must be fupposed that they were filled with refentment for the fupplies which the Americans received through this channel, but there is alfo reafon to fufpect, that the love of gain was cloaked under the fpecious veil of national policy. The horrors of an universal havoc of property were realifed. The merchants and traders were ordered to give up their books of correspondence, their letters and alfo inventories of all their effects, inclusive of an exact account of all money and plate in their pofferfion. The Jews were defignated as objects of particular refentment. They were ordered to give up the keys of their ftores, to leave their wealth and merchandize behind them, and to depart depart the island without knowing the place of their destination. From a natural with to be furnished with the means of fupplying their wants, in the place of their future refidence, they fecreted in their wearing apparel. gold, filver and other articles of great value and fmall bulk. The policy of these unfortunate Hebrews did not avail them. The avarice of the conquerors, effectually counteracted their ingenuity. They were ftripped, fearched and defpoiled of their money-and jewels. In this state of wretchedness, many of the inhabitants were transported as outlaws and landed on St. Chriftopher's. The affembly of that ifland with great humanity, provided for them fuch articles as their fituation required. The lews were foon followed by the Americans; fome of thefe though they had been banifhed from the United States. on account of their having taken part with Great Britain, were banished a fecond time by the conquering troops of the fovereign, in whofe fervice they had previoufly fuffered. The French merchants and traders were next ordered off the ifland, and laftly the native Dutch were obliged to fubmit to the fame fentence. Many opulent perfons in confequence of these proceedings, were inftantly reduced to extreme indigence.

In the mean time public fales were advertifed, and perfons of all nations invited to become purchasers. The island of St. Eustatius became a scene of constant auctions. There never was a better market for buyers. The immenfe quantities exposed for fale, reduced the price of many articles far below their original coft. Many of the commodities fold on this occafion, became in the hands of their new purchafers, as effectual fupplies to the enemies of Great Britain, as they could have been in cafe the ifland had not been captured. The fpirit of gain, which led the traders of St. Eustatius to facrifice the interests of Great Britain, influenced the conquerors to do the fame. The friends of humanity, who with that war was exterminated from the world, or entered into only for the attainment of national justice, must be gratified when they are told, that this unexampled rapacity was one link in the great chain of caufes which, as hereafter fliall be ex-Vol. II. E-e plained.

plained, brought on the great event in the Chefapeak, which gave peace to contending nations. While Admiral Rodney and his officers were bewildered, in the fales of confifcated property at St. Euftatius, and efpecially while his fleet was weakened, by a large detachment fent off to convoy their booty to Great Britain, the French were filently executing a well digefted fcheme, which affured them a naval fuperiority on the American coaft, to the total ruin of the Britifh intereft in the United States.

C H A P. XXII.

The revolt of the Pennfylvania line; of part of the Jerfey troops; difireffes of the American army, Arnold's invafion of Virginia.

HOUGH General Arnold's addrefs to his countrymen produced no effect, in detaching the foldiery of America from the unproductive fervice of Congress, their fteadinefs could not be accounted for, from any melioration of their circumstances. They still remained without pay, and without fuch cloathing as the feafon required. They could not be induced to enter the Britifh fervice, but their complicated diftreffes at length broke out into deliberate mutiny. This event which had been long expected, made its first threatening appearance in the Pennfylvania line. The common foldiers enlifted in that State, were for the most part natives of Ireland, but though not bound to America by the accidental tie of birth, they were inferior to none in difcipline, courage, or attachment to the caufe of independence. They had been but a few months before, the most active instruments in quelling a mutiny of the Connecticut troops, and had on all occafions done their duty to admiration. An ambiguity in the terms of their inliftment, furnished a pretext for their conduct. A great part of them were enlifted for three years or during the war, the three years were expired, and the men infifted that the choice of flaying or going remained with them, while the officers contended that the choice was in the State. The

The mutiny was excited by the non-commillioned officers and privates, in the night of the 1ft of January 1781, and foon became fo universal in the line of that State as to defy all oppofition. The whole, except three regiments, upon a fignal for the purpose, turned out under arms without their officers, and declared for a redrefs of grievances. The officers in vain endeavoured to quell them. Several were wounded, and a captain was killed in attempting it. Gen. Wayne prefented his piftols, as if about to fire on them; they held their bayonets to his breaft and faid " We love and refpect you, but if you fire you are a dead man." "We are not going to the enemy, on the contrary, if they were now to come out, you should see us fight under your orders with as much alacrity as ever; but we will be no longer amufed, we are determined on obtaining what is our just due." Deaf to arguments and entreaties, they to the number of 1300 moved off in a body from Morriftown, and proceeded in good order with their arms and fix field pieces to Princeton. They elected temporary officers from their own body, and appointed a Serjeant Major, who had formerly deferted from the British army, to be their commander. Gen. Wayne forwarded provisions after the n, to prevent their plundering the country for their fubfiftence. They invaded no man's property, farther than their immediate neceffities made upavoidable. This was readily fubmitted to by the inhabitants, who had long been used to exactions of the fame kind, levied for fimilar purposes by their lawful rulers. They professed that they had no object in view, but to obtain what was juftly due to them, nor were their actions inconfistent with that profession.

Congrefs fent a committe of their body, confifting of General Sullivan, Mr. Mathews, Mr. Atlee and Dr. Witherfpoon, to procure an accommodation. The revolters were refolute in refufing any terms, of which a redrefs of their grievances was not the foundation. Every thing afked of their country, they might at any time after the 6th of January, have obtained from the Britifh, by paffing over into New-York. This they refufed refused. Their fufferings had exhaufted their patience but not their patriotifm. Sir Henry Clinton, by confidential messengers, offered to take them under the protection of the British government--- to pardon all their past offences --- to have the pay due them from Congress faithfully made up, without any expectation of military fervice in return, although it would be received if volunta. rily offered. It was recommended to them to move behind the South river, and it was promifed, that a detachment of British troops should be in readiness for their protection as foon as defired. In the mean time, the troops paffed over from New-York to Staten-Ifland, and the neceffary arrangements were made for moving them into New-Jerfey, whenfoever they might be wanted. The royal commander was not lefs difappointed than furprifed to find that the faithful, though revolting foldiers, difdained his offers. The meffengers of Sir Henry Clinton were feized and delivered to Gen. Wayne. Prefident Reed and General Potter were appointed, by the council of Pennfylvania, to accommodate matters with the revolters. They met them at Princeton, and agreed to difmifs all whole terms of enliftment were completed. and admitted the oath of each foldier to be evidence in his own cafe. A board of officers tried and condemned the British fpies, and they were instantly executed. Prefident Reed offered a purfe of 100 guineas to the mutineers, as a reward of their fidelity, in delivering up the fpies; but they refused to accept it, faying " That what they had done was only a duty they owed their country, and that they neither defired nor would receive any reward but the approbation of that country, for which they had fo often fought and bled."

Jan. 17.

7. By thefe healing meafures the revolt was completely quelled; but the complaints of the foldiers being founded in juffice, were first redressed. Those whose time of fervice was expired obtained their discharges, and others had their arrears of pay in a great measure made up to them. A general amness closed the business. On this occasion, the commander in chief stated in a circular letter to the four eastern states, the well founded complaints of of his army; and the impofibility of keeping them together, under the preflure of fuch a variety of fufferings. General Knox was requefted to be the bearer of , thefe difpatches; and to urge the States to an immediate exertion for the relief of the foldiers. He vifited Muffachufetts, New-Hampthire, Connecticut and Rhode-Ifland; and with great earneftnefs ond equal fuccefs, defcribed the wants of the army. Maffachufetts gave 24 filver dollars to each man of her line; and alfo furnifled them with fome cloathing. Other States about the fame time made fimilar advances.

The fpirit of mutiny proved contagious. About 160 January of the Jerfey troops followed the example of the Penn-178L. fylvania line; but they did not conduct with equal fpirit, nor with equal prudence. They committed fundry acts of outrage against particular officers, while they affected to be fubniiflive to others. Major General Howe, with a confiderable force, was ordered to take methods for reducing them to obedience. Convinced that there was no medium between dignity and fervility, but coercion, and that no other remedy could be applied without the deepeft wound to the fervice, he determined to proceed against them with decision. General Howe marched from Kingwood about midnight; and by the dawning of the next day, had his men in four different politions, to prevent the revolters from making their efcape. Every avenue being fecured, Colonel Barber of the Jerfey line was fent to them, with orders immediately to parade without arms; and to march to a particular fpot of ground. Some hefitation appearing among them, Colonel Sproat was directed to advance, and only five minutes were given to the mutineers to comply with the orders which had been fent them. This had its effect, and they to a man marched without arms to the appointed ground. The Jerfey officers gave a lift of the leaders of the revolt, upon which General Howe defired them to felect three of the greateft offenders. A field court martial was prefently held upon thefe three, and they were unanimoufly fentenced to death. Two of them were executed on the fpot, and the executioners were felected from among among the most active in the mutiny. The men were divided into platoons, and made public concessions to their officers, and promifed by future good conduct, to atone for pass offences

Thefe mutinies alarmed the States, but did not produce permanent relief to the army. Their wants with refpect to provisions were only partially fupplied, and by expedients from one fhort time to another. The most ufual was ordering an officer to feize on provisions wherever found. This differed from robbing only in its being done by authority for the public fervice, and in the officer being always directed to give the proprietor a certificate, of the quantity and quality of what was taken from him. At first some reliance was placed on these certificates as vouchers to fupport a future demand on the United States; but they foon became fo common as to be of little value. Recourfe was fo frequently had to coercion, both legiflative and military, that the people not only loft confidence in public credit but became impatient under all exertions of authority, for forcing their property from them. That an army fhould be kept together under fuch circumftances, fo far exceeds credibility as to make it neceffary to produce fome evidence of the fact. The American General Clinton in a letter to General Washington dated at Albany, April 16th 1781, wrote as follows. " There is not now (independent of fort Schuyler) three days provision in the whole department for the troops in cafe of an alarm, nor any profpect of procuring any. The recruits of the new levies, I cannot receive, becaufe I have nothing to give them. The Canadian families, I have been obliged to deprive of their feanty pittance, contrary to every principle of humanity. The quartermafter's department is totally ufelefs, the public armory has been thut up for near three weeks, and a total fuspension of every military operation has enfued." Soon after this General Washington was obliged to apply 9000 dollars, fent by the State of Maffachusetts for the payment of her troops to the use of the quartermaster's department, to enable him to tranfport provisions from the adjacent States. Before he confented fented to adopt this expedient, he had confumed every ounce of provision, which had been kept as a referve in the garrifon of West-Point; and had strained impress by military force, to fo great an extent, that there was reason to apprehend the inhabitants, irritated by fuch frequent calls, would proceed to dangerous infurrections. Fort Schuyler, West-Point, and the posts up the North river, were on the point of being abandoned by their ftarving garrifons. At this period of the war, there was little or no circulating medium, either in the form of paper or specie, and in the neighbourhood of the American army there was a real want of necessary provisions. The deficiency of the former occasioned many inconveniences, and an unequal distribution of the burdens of the war; but the infufficiency of the latter, had well nigh diffolved the army, and laid the country in every direction open to British excursions.

These events were not unforeseen by the rulers of America. From the progreffive depreciation of their bills of credit, it had for fome time paft occurred, that the period could not be far diftant, when they would ceafe to circulate. This crifis which had been ardently wilhed for by the enemies, and dreaded by the friends of American independence, took place in 1781; but without realifing the hopes of the one, or the fears of the other. New refources were providentially opened, and the war was carried on with the fame vigor as before. A great deal of gold and filver was about this time introduced into the United States, by a beneficial trade with the French and Spanish West-India islands, and by means of the French army in Rhode-Island. Pathetic reprefentations were made to the ministers of his most Christian Majefty by General Washington, Dr. Franklin, and particularly by Lieutenant Colonel John Laurens, who was fent to the court of Verfailles as a special minister on this occasion. The King of France gave the United States a fublidy of fix millons of livres, and became their fecurity for ten millions more, borrowed for their ufe in the United Netherlands. A regular fystem of finance was also about this time adopted. All matters relative to the the treafury the fupplies of the army and the accounts, were put under the direction of Robert Morris, who arranged the whole with judgment and œconomy. The iffuing of paper money by the authority of government was difcontinued, and the public engagements were made payable in coin. The introduction of fo much gold and filver, together with thefe judicious domeftic regulations, aided by the bank, which had been erected the preceding year in Philadelphia, extricated Congrefs from much of their embarraffment, and put it in their power to feed, cloath and move their army.

About the fame time the old continental money, by common confent, ceased to have currency. Like an aged man expiring by the decays of nature, without a figh or a groan, it fell afleep in the hands of its laft poffeffors. By the fcale of depreciation the war was carried on five years, for little more than a million of pounds fterling, and 200 millions of paper dollars were made redeemable by five millions of filver ones. In other countries, fuch meafures would probably have produced popular infurrections, but in the United States they were fubmitted to without any tumults. Public faith was violated, but in the opinion of most men public good was promoted. The evils confequent on depreciation had taken place, and the redemption of the bills of credit at their nominal value as originally promifed, inftead of remedying the diffreffes of the fufferers would in many cafes have increased them, by subjecting their small remains of property to exorbitant taxation. The money had in a great measure got out of the hands of the original proprietors, and was in the poffession of others. who had obtained it at a rate of value not exceeding what was fixed upon it by the fcale of depreciation.

Nothing could afford a ftronger proof that the refiftence of America to Great Britain was grounded in the hearts of the people, than thefe events. To receive paper bills of credit iffued without any funds, and to give property in exchange for them, as equal to gold or filver, demonstrated the zeal and enthusiafin with which the war was begun; but to confent to the extinction of the the fame after a currency of five years, without any adequate provision made for their future redemption, was more than would have been born by any people, who conceived that their rulers had feparate interests or views from themselves. The demise of one king and the coronation of a lawful fuccessor have often excited greater commotions in royal governments, than took place in the United States on the fudden extinction of their whole current money. The people faw the necessity which compelled their rulers to act in the manner they had done, and being well convinced that the good of the country was their object, quietly fubmitted to measures, which under other circumstances, would fcarcely have been explated by the lives and fortunes of their authors.

While the Americans were fuffering the complicated calamities which introduced the year 1781, their adverfaries were carrying on the most extensive plan of operation, which had ever been attempted fince the war. It had often been objected to the British commanders, that they had not conducted the war in the manner most likely to effect the subjugation of the revolted provinces. Military critics in particular, found fault with them for keeping a large army idle at New-York, which they faid. if properly applied, would have been fufficient to make fuccefsful impressions, at one and the fame time, on feveral of the States. The British feem to have calculated the campaign of 1781, with a view to make an experiment of the comparative merit of this mode of conducting military operations. The war raged in that year. not only in the vicinity of British head quarters at New-York, but in Georgia, South-Carolina, North-Carolina, and in Virginia. The latter State from its peculiar fituation,' and from the modes of building, planting and living, which had been adopted by the inhabitants, is particularly exposed, and lies at the mercy of whatever army is mafter of the Chefapeak. These circumstances, together with the pre-eminent rank which Virginia held in the confederacy, pointed out the propriety of making that State the object of particular attention. To favour, Ff VOL. II. lord lord Cornwallis' defigns in the fouthern States, Major Gen. Leflie, with about 2000 men, had been detached from New-York to the Chefapeak, in the latter end of 1780; but fubfequent events induced his lordfhip to order him from Virginia to Charlefton, with the view of his more effectually co-operating with the army under his own immediate command. Soon after the departure of General Leflie, Virginia was again invaded by another party from New-York. This was commanded by Gen. Arnold, now a Brigadier in the royal army. His force confifted of about 1600 men, and was fupported by fuch a number of armed veffels as enabled him to commit extenfive ravages, on the unprotected coafts of that well watered country. The invaders landed about 15 miles be-

- 1781. low Richmond, and in two days marched into the town, where they deftroyed large quantities of tobacco, falt, rum, fail-cloth and other merchandize. Succeffive excurfions were made to feveral other places, in which the royal army committed fimilar devaftations.
- In about a fortnight, they marched into Portfmouth Jan. 20. and began to fortify it. The lofs they fuftained from the feeble opposition of the dispersed inhabitants was inconfiderable. The havoc made by General Arnold, and the apprehension of a defign to fix a permanent post in Virginia, induced General Washington to detach the Marquis de la Fayette, with 1200 of the American infantry, to that State, and alfo to urge the French in Rhode-Island to co-operate with him in attempting to capture Arnold and his party. The French commanders eagerly clofed with the propofal. Since they had landed in the United States, no proper opportunity of gratifying their paffion for military fame, had yet prefented itfelf. They. rejoiced at that which now offered, and indulged a cheerful hope of rendering effential fervice to their allies, by cutting off the retreat of Arnold's party. With this view, their fleet with 1500 additional men on board, fail-March 8 ed from Rhode-Island for Virginia. ty four gun fhip, and two frigates, with orders to deftroy the British ships and frigates in the Chefapeak. These took or destroyed ten vessels, and captured the Romalus of 44 guns. Arbuthnot with a British fleet failed from Gardiner's-bay in purfuit of D'Eftouches. The former overtook and engaged the latter off the capes of Virginia. The British had the advantage of more guns than the French, but the latter were much more ftrongly manned than the former. The contest between the fleets thus nearly balanced, ended without the lofs of a fhip on either fide; but the British obtained the fruits of victory fo far as to frustrate the whole fcheme of their adversaries. The fleet of his most Christian Majesty returned to Rhode-Ifland, without effecting the object of the expedition. Thus was Arnold faved from imminent danger of falling into the hands of his exafperated countrymen. The day before the French fleet returned to Newport, a convoy arrived in the Chefapeak from New-York, with Major Gen. Philips and about 2000 men. This diffinguished officer, who having been taken at Saratoga had been lately exchanged, was appointed to be commander of the royal forces in Virginia. Philips and Arnold foon made a junction, and carried every thing before them. They fucceflively defeated those bodies of militia which came in their way. The whole country was open to their excursions. On their embarkation from Portfmouth, a detachment visited York-town, but the main body proceeded to Williamsburgh. On the 22d April 22 of April they reached Chickapowing. A party proceeded up that river 10 or 12 miles, and deftroyed much property. On the 24th they landed at City-point, and foon after they marched for Petersburgh. About one mile from the town they were opposed by a small force commanded by Baron Steuben; but this after making a gallant refistance was compelled to retreat.

· At Petersburgh they destroyed 4000 hogsheads of tobacco, a ship and a number of small vessels. Within three days one party marched to Chefterfield courthouse, and burned a range of barracks, and 300 barrels of flour. On the fame day, another party under the command

mand of Gen. Arnold marched to Ofborne's. About four miles above that place, a fmall marine force was drawn up to oppose him. Gen. Arnold fent a flag to treat with the commander of this fleet, but he declared that he would defend it to the last extremity. Upon this refufal, Arnold advanced with fome artillery, and fired upon him with decifive effect from the banks of the river. Two fhips and ten fmall veffels loaded with tobacco, cordage, flour, &c. were captured. Four thips, five brigantines and a number of fmall veffels were burnt or funk. The quantity of tobacco taken or deftroyed in this fleet, exceeded 2000 hogfheads, and the whole was effected without the lofs of a fingle man, on the fide of the British. The royal forces then marched up the fork till they arrived at Manchester. There they deftroyed 1200 hogsheads of tobacco; returning thence they made great havoc at Warmic. They defiroyed the fhips on the flocks, and in the river, and a large range of rope walks. A magazine of 500 barrels of flour, with a number of warehoufes, and of tan houfes, all filled with their refpective commodities, were alfo confumed in one general conflagration. On the 9th of May they returned to Peterfburgh, having in the courfe of the preceding three weeks, deftroyed property to an immenfe amount. With this expedition, Major Gen Philips terminated a life, which in all his previous operations had been full of glory. At early periods of his military career, on different occasions of a preceding war, he had gained the full approbation of Prince Ferdinand, under whom he had ferved in Germany. As an officer he was univerfally admired. Though much of the devastations committed by the troops under his command, may be vindicated on the principles of those who hold that the rights and laws of war, are of equal obligation with the rights and laws of humanity; yet the friends of his fame, have reafon to regret that he did not die three weeks fooner.

Campaign of 1781. Operations in the two Carolinas and Georgia.

THE fucceffes which, with a few checks, followed the Britifh arms fince they had reduced Savannah and Charlefton, encouraged them to purfue their object by advancing from fouth to north A vigorous invation of North-Carolina was therefore projected, for the bulinefs of the winter which followed Gen. Gates' defeat. The Americans were feafible of the neceffity of reinforcing, and fupporting their fouthern army, but were' deftitute of the means of doing it. Their northern army would not admit of being farther weakened, nor was there time to march over the intervening diftance of feven hundred miles, but if men could have been procured and time allowed for marching them to South-Carolina, money for defraying the unavoidable expences of their transportation, could not be commanded, either in the latter end of 1780, or the first months of 1781. Though Congress was unable to forward either men or money, for the relief of the Southern States, they did what was equivalent. They fent them'a general, whofe head was a council, and whofe military talents were equal to a reinforcement. The nomination of an officer for this important truft, was left to Gen. Washington. He mentioned General Greene, adding for reafon "that he was an officer in whofe abilities and integrity, from a long and intimate experience, he had the most entire confidence."

The army after its defeat and difperfion on the 16th of August 1780, rendezvoused at Hillsborough. In the latter end of the year they advanced to Charlotte-Town. At this place Gen. Gates transferred the command to Gen. Greene. The manly refignation of the one, was equalled by the delicate difinterestedness of the other. Expressions of civility, and acts of friendship and attention were reciprocally exchanged. Greene upon all occasions, was the vindicator of Gates' reputation. In his letters and conversation, he uniformly maintained that his predecession, had failed in no part of his military duty, and that that he had deferved fuccefs, though he could not com-1781. mand it. Within a few hours after Greene took charge com of the army a report was made of a gallant enterprize of Lieut. Col. Wathington. Being out on a foraging excurfion, he had penetrated within 13 miles of Camden, to Clermont the feat of Lieut. Col. Rigely of the British militia. This was fortified by a block houfe, and encompaffed by an abbatis, and was defended by upwards of one hundred of the inhabitants, who had fubmitted to the British government. Lieut. Col. Washington advanced with his cavalry, and planted the trunk of a pine tree, fo as to refemble a field piece. The lucky moment was feized and a peremptory demand of an immediate furrender was made, when the garrifon was impreffed with the expectation of an immediate cannonade in cafe of their refufal. The whole furrendered at difcretion, without a fhot on either fide. This fortunate incident, through the fuperstition to which most men are more or less fubject, was viewed by the army as a prefage of fuccels under their new commander.

> When Gen. Greene took the command, he found the troops had made a practice of going home without permiflion, flaying feveral days or weeks, and then returning to camp. Determined to enforce ftrict difcipline, he gave out that he would make an example of the first deferter of the kind he caught. One fuch being foon taken, was accordingly flot, at the head of the army, drawn up to be fpectators of the punishment. This had the defired effect, and put a ftop to the dangerous practice.

> The whole fouthern army at this time confifted of about 2000 men, more than half of which were militia. The regulars had been for a long time without pay, and were very deficient in cloathing. All fources of fupply from Charlefton were in poffeffion of the Britifh, and no imported article could be obtained from a diftance lefs than 200 miles. The procuring of provifions for this finall force was a matter of difficulty. The paper currency was depreciated fo far, as to be wholly unequal to the purchase of even fuch fupplies as the country afforded. Hard money had not a physical existence in any hands hands acceffible to the Americans. The only refource 178". left for fupplying the army was by the arbitrary mode of imprefs. To feize on the property of the inhabitants, and at the fame time to preferve their kind affections, was a difficult business and of delicate execution, but of the utmost moment, as it furnished the army with provifions without impairing the disposition of the inhabitants to co-operate with it in recovering the country. This grand object called for the united efforts of both. Such was the fituation of the country, that it was almost equally dangerous for the American army to go forward or ftand still. In the first cafe every thing was hazarded; in the last the confidence of the people would be lost, and with it all profpect of being fupported by them. The impatience of the fuffering exiles and others, led them to urge the adoption of rath measures. The mode of opposition they preferred was the least likely to effect their ultimate wifhes. The nature of the country thinly inhabited, abounding with fwamps, and covered with woods---the inconfiderable force of the American army, the number of the difaffected, and the want of magazines, weighed with Gen. Greene to prefer a partizan war. By clofe application to his new profession, he had acquired a fcientific knowledge of the principles and maxims for conducting wars in Europe but confidered them as often inapplicable to America. When they were adapted to his circumstances he used them, but oftener deviated from them, and followed his own practical judgement, founded on a comprehensive view of his real fituation.

With an inconfiderable army, miferably provided, Gen. Greene took the field againft a fuperior Britifh regular force, which had marched in triumph 200 miles from the fea coaft, and was flufhed with fucceffive victories through a whole campaign. Soon after he took the command, he divided his force and fent Gen. Morgan with a refpectable detachment to the weftern extremity of South-Carolina, and about the fame time marched with the main body to Hick's-creek, on the north fide of the Pedee, oppofite to Cheraw-Hill.

After

After the general fubmiffion of the militia in the year 1780, a revolution took place highly favourable to the intereft of America. The refidence of the British army, instead of increasing the real friends to royal government, diminished their number, and added new vigor to the opposite party. The British had a post in Ninety fix for thirteen months, during which time the country was filled with rapine, violence and murder. Applications were daily made for redrefs, yet in that whole period, there was not a fingle inftance wherein punishment was inflicted, either on the foldiery or the tories. The people foon found that there was no fecurity for their lives, liberties or property, under the military government of British officers, careless of their civil rights. The peaceable' citizens were reduced to that uncommon diftrefs, in which they had more to fear from oppreffion, than refistance. They therefore most ardently wished for an American force. Under these favourable circumstances General Greene detached General Morgan, to take a polition in that district. The appearance of this force, a fincere attachment to the caufe of independence, and the impolitic conduct of the British, induced feveral perfons to refume their arms, and to act in concert with the continental troops.

When this irruption was made into the diftrict of Ninety fix, lord Cornwallis was far advanced in his preparations for the invafion of North-Carolina. To leave General Morgan in his rear, was contrary to military policy. In order therefore to drive him from this ftation, and to deter the inhabitants from joining him, Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton was ordered to proceed with about 1 too men and " pufh him to the utmoft." He had two field pieces, and a fuperiority of infantry in the proportion of five to four, and of cavalry in the porportion of three to one. Befides this inequality of force, two thirds of the troops under General Morgan were militia. With thefe fair profpects of fuccefs, Tarleton engaged Morgan

North-Carolina, were put under the command of Colo- 1781. nel Pickens. These formed the first line, and were advanced a few hundred yards before the fecond, with orders to form on the right of the fecond, when forced to retire. The fecond line confifted of the light infantry, and a corps of Virginia militia riflemen. Lieutenant Colonel Walhington, with his cavalry and about 45 militia men, mounted and equipped with fwords, were drawn up at some distance in the rear of the whole. The open wood in which they were for med, was neither fecured in front, flank or rear. On the fide of the British, the light legion infantry and fufileers, though worn down with extreme fatigue, were ordered to form in line. Before this order was executed, the line, though far from being complete, was led to the attack by Tarleton himfelf. They advanced with a fout and poured in an inceffant fire of mulquetry. Colonel Pickens directed the men under his command to restrain their fire, till the Britifh were within forty or fifty yards. This order though executed with great firmnels was not fufficient to repel their advancing foes. The militia fell back. The Britifh advanced and engaged the fecond line, which after an obflinate conflict was compelled to retreat to the cavalry. In this crifis Lieutenant Colonel Washington made a fuccefsful charge on Captain Ogilvie, who with about forty dragoons, was cutting down the militia, and forced them to retreat in confusion. Lieutenant Colonel Howard, almost at the fame moment rallied the continental troops and charged with fixed bayonets. The example was inftantly followed by the militia, Nothing could exceed the aftonifhment and confusion of the Britifh occasioned by these unexpected charges. Their advance fell back on their rear, and communicated a panic to the whole. Two hundred and fifty horfe which had not been engaged fled with precipitation. The pieces of artillery were feized by the Americans, and the greatest confusion took place among the infantry. While they were in this state of diforder, Lieutenant Colonel Howard called to them, to "lay down their arms," and promifed them good quarter. Some hundreds accepted the offer VOL. II. and Gg

1781. and furrendered. The firft battalion of the 71ft, and two Britifh light infantry companies, laid down their arms to the American militia. A party which had been left fome diffance in the rear to guard the baggage, was the only body of infantry that efcaped. The officer of that detachment on hearing of Tarleton's defeat, deftroyed a great part of the baggage, and retreated to lord Cornwallis. Upwards of 300 of the Britifh were killed or wounded, and above 500 prifoners were taken. Eight, hundred mufkets, two field pieces, 35 baggage waggons, and 100 dragoon horfes fell into the hands of the conquerors. The Americans had only 12 men killed and 60 wounded.

General Morgan's good conduct on this memorable day, was honoured by Congress with a gold medal. They alfo prefented medals of filver to Lieutenant Colonels Wafhington and Howard, a fword to colonel Pickens, a brevet majority to Edward Giles the General's aid de camp, and a Captaincy to Baron Glafsbeck. Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton hitherto triumphant in a variety of fkirmifhes, on this occasion loft his laurels, though he was supported by the 7th regiment, one battalion of the 71ft, and two companies of light infantry; and his repulse did more effential injury to the British interest, than was equivalent to all the preceding advantages he had gained. It was the first link in a chain of causes which finally drew down ruin, both in North and South Carolina on the royal intereft. That impetuofity of Tarleton which had acquired him great reputation, when on former occafions he had furprifed an incautious enemy, or attacked a panic ftruck militia, was at this time the occasion of his ruin. Impatient of delay he engaged with fatigued troops, and led them on to action, before they were properly formed, and before the referve had taken its ground. He was alfo guilty of a great overfight in not bringing up a column of cavalry to fupport and improve the advantages he had gained when the Americans retreated.

a confiderable body of troops under the command of 1781. lord Rawdon. These were principally stationed at Camden, from which central fituation they might eafily be drawn forth to defend the frontiers or to fuppress infurrections. To facilitate the intended operations against North-Carolina, Major Craig, with a detachment of about 300 men from Charleston, and a small marine force took poffeffion of Wilmington. While thefe 'arrangements were making, the year 1781 commenced with the fairest prospects to the friends of British government. The arrival of General Leflie in Charlefton, with his late command in Virginia gave Earl Cornwallis a decided fuperiority, and enabled him to attempt the reduction of North-Carolina, with a force fufficient to bear down all probable opposition. Arnold was before him in Virginia, while South-Carolina in his rear, was confidered as completely fubdued. His lordfhip had much to hope and little to fear. His admirers flattered him with the expectation, that his victory at Camden would prove but the dawn of his glory; and that the events of the approaching campaign would immortalize his name as the conqueror, at least of the fouthern States. Whilst lord Cornwallis was indulging thefe pleafing profpects, he received intelligence, no lefs unwelcome than unexpected, that Tarleton his favourite officer, in whom he placed the greateft confidence, instead of driving Morgan out of the country, was completely defeated by him. This furprised and mortified, but did not discourage his lordthip. He hoped by vigorous exertions foon to obtain reparation for the late difastrous event, and even to recover what he had loft. With the expectation of retaking the prifoners captured at the Cowpens, and to obliterate the impreffion made by the iffue of the late action at that place, his lordship instantly determined on the purfuit of General Morgan, who had moved off towards Virginia with his prifoners. The movements of the royal army in confequence of this determination induced General Greene immediately to retreat from Hick's creek, left the British by croffing the upper fources of the Pedee, should get between him and the detachment, which

which was incumbered with the prifoners. In this cri-1781. tical fituation General Greene left the main army, under the command of General Huger, and rode 15b miles through the country, to join the detachment under General Morgan, that he might be in front of lord Cornwallis, and direct the motions of both divisions of his army, fo as to form a fpeedy junction between them. Immediately after the action, on the 17th of January, Morgan fent on his prifoners under a proper guard, and having made every arrangement in his power for their fecurity retreated with expedition. Neverthelefs the British gained ground upon him. Morgan intended to crofs the mountains with his detachment and prifoners, that he might more effectually fecure the latter : But Greene on his arrival ordered the prifoners to Charlotteville, and directed the troops to Guildford court-houfe, to which place he had alfo ordered General Huger to proceed with the main army.

In this retreat the Americans underwent hardfhips almost incredible. Many of them performed this march without fhoes over frozen ground, which fo gashed their naked feet, that their blood marked every ftep of their progrefs. They were fometimes without meat, often without flour, and always without fpiritous liquors. Their march led them through a barren country, which fcarcely afforded neceffaries for a few ftraggling inhabitants. In this fevere feafon, alfo with very little cloathing, they were daily reduced to the neceflity of fording. deep creeks, and of remaining wet without any change of cloaths, till the heat of their bodies and occasional fires in the woods dried their tattered rags. To alk these difficulties they submitted without the loss of a fingle centinal by defertion. Lord Cornwallis reduced the quantity of his own baggage, and the example was followed by the officers under his command. Every thing which was not neceffary in action, or to the exiftence of the troops, was deftroyed. No waggons were. referved except those loaded with hospital ftores, falt and ammunition, and four empty ones for the ule of the fick. The royal army, encouraged by the example of his lordthip, thip, submitted to every hardship with cheerfulness. 1781. They beheld, without murmuring, their most valuable baggage deftroyed their spiritous liquors staved, when they were entering on hard fervice, and under circumftances which precluded every profpect of fupply.

The British had urged the purfuit with fo much rapidity, that they reached the Catawba on the evening of the fame day on which their fleeing adverfaries had croffed it. Before the next morning a heavy fall of rain made that river impaffable. The Americans, confident of the justice of their cause, confidered this event as an interpolition of providence in their favour. It is certain that if the rifing of the river had taken place a few hours earlier, Gen. Morgan with his whole detachment and 500 prifoners would have fearcely had any chance of escape. When the fresh had subsided so far as to leave the river fordable, a large proportion of the King's troops received, orders to be in readineis to march at one o'clock in the morning. Fein's had been made of paf- Feb. 1, fing at feveral different fords, but the real attempt was made at a ford near M'Cowans, the north banks of which were defended by a fmall guard of militia commanded by Gen. Davidson. The British marched through the river upwards of 500 yards wide and about three feet deep, fustaining a constant fire from the militia on the oppofite bank without returning it till they had made good their paffage. The light infantry and grenadier companies as foon as they reached the land difperfed the Americans, Gen. Davidson the brave leader of the latter was killed at the first onfet. The militia throughout the neighbouring fettlements were difpirited, and but few of them could be perfuaded to take or keep the field. A fmall party which collected about ten miles from the ford was attacked, and difperfed by Lt. Col. Tarleton. All the fords were abandoned, and the whole royal army croffed over without any farther oppofition. The passage of the Catawba being effected, the Americans continued to flee and the British to pursue. The former by expeditious movements croffed the Yadkin, partly in flats, and partly by fording on the fecond and third days of February, and fecured their boats on the

the north fide. Though the Britifh were clofe in their rear, yet the want of boats and the rapid rifing of the river from preceding rains made their croffing impoffible. This fecond hair breadth efcape was confidered by the Americans as a farther evidence that their caufe was favoured by Heaven. That they in two fucceffive infrances fhould effect their paffage, while their purfuers only a few miles in their rear could not follow, impreffed the religious people of that fettlement with fuch fentiments of devotion as added fresh vigor to their exertions in behalf of American independence.

The British having failed in their first scheme of paffing the Yadkin, were obliged to crofs at the upper fords; but before this was completed, the two divisions of the American army made a junction at Guildford court-houfe. Though this had taken place, their combined numbers were fo much inferior to the British, that Gen. Greene' could not with any propriety rifque an action. He therefore called a council of officers, who unanimoufly concurred in opinion that he ought to retire over the Dan, 'and to avoid an engagement till he was reinforced. Lord Cornwallis knowing the inferiority of the American force conceived hopes, by getting between General Greene and Virginia, to cut off his retreat, intercept Lis fupplies and reinforcements, and oblige him to fight under many difadvantages. With this view, his lordfhip kept the upper country where only the rivers are fordable --- fuppofing that his adverfaries, from the want of a sufficient number of flats, could not make good their paffage in the deep water below, or in cafe of their attempting it, he expected to overtake and force them to action before they could crofs. In this expectation he was deceived. Gen. Greene by good management eluded his lordship. The British urged their pursuit with fo much rapidity, that the American light troops were on the 14th compelled to retire upwards of 40 miles. By the most indefatigable exertions Gen. Greene had that day tranfported his army, artillery and baggage, over the river Dan into Virginia. So rapid was the purfuit, and fo narrow the efcape, that the van of the purfuing British juft

just arrived as the rear of the Americans had croffed. The hardfhips and difficulties, which the royal army had undergone in this march, were exceeded by the mortification that all their toils and exertions were to no purpofe. They conceived it next to impoffible that General Greene could efcape, without receiving a decifive blow. They therefore cheerfully fubmitted to difficulties, of which they who refide in cultivated countries can form no adequate ideas. After furmounting incredible hardfhips, when they fancied themfelves within grafp of their object, they difcovered that all their hopes were blafted.

The continental army being driven out of North-Carolina, Earl Cornwallis thought the opportunity favourable for affembling the loyalifts. With this view he left the Dan, and proceeded to Hillfborough. On his arrival there, he erected the King's ftandard, and published a proclamation, inviting all loyal fubjects to repair to it with their arms and ten days provision, and affuring them of his readiness to concur with them in effectual measures for fuppreffing the remains of rebellion, and for the reeftablishment of good order and constitutional govern-Soon after the King's ftandard was crefted at ment. Hillfborough, fome hundreds of the inhabitants rode into the British camp. They feemed to be very defirous of peace, but averfe to any co-operation for procuring it. They acknowledged the continentals were chafed out of the province, but expressed their apprehensions that they would foon return, and on the whole declined to take any decided part in a caufe which yet appeared dangerous. Notwithstanding the indifference or timidity of the lovalists near Hillsborough, lord Cornwallis hoped for fubfrantial aid from the inhabitants between Haw and Deep river. He therefore detached Lieut. Col. Tarleton with 450 men, to give countenance to the friends of royal government in that diftrict. Greene being informed that many of the inhabitants had joined his lordfhip, and that they were repairing in great numbers to make their fubmiffion, was apprehenfive that unlefs fome foirited meafure was immediately takeh, the whole country would be loft to the Americans. He therefore conclud-

Immediately after the return of the Americans to North-Carolina, fome of their light troops, commanded by Gen. Pickens and Lieut. Colonel Lee, were detached in purfuit of Tarleton, who had been fent to encourage the infurrection of the loyalifts. Three hundred and fifty of thefe tories commanded by Col. Pyles, when on their way to join the British, fell in with this light American party, and miftook them for the royal detachment fent for their fupport. The Americans attacked them, laboring under this miftake, to great advantage, and cut them down as they were crying out "God fave the King" and making protestations of their loyalty. Natives of the British colonies, who were of this character, more rarely found mercy than European foldiers. They were confidered by the whig Americans as being cowards, who not only wanted spirit to defend their constitutional rights, but who unnaturally co-operated with ftrangers in fixing the chains of foreign domination on themfelves and countrymen. Many of them on this occasion fuffered the extremity of military vengeauce. Tarleton was refreshing his legion, about a mile from this fcene of flaughter. Upon hearing the alarm, he re-croffed the Haw and returned to Hillfborough. On his retreat he cut down feveral of the royalists, as they were advancing to join the Britilh army, miftaking them for the rebel militia of the Thefe events, together with the return of the country. The absence of the Ameria can army, for one fortnight longer, might have turned the fcale. The advocates for royal government being difcouraged by thefe adverfe accidents, and being alfo generally deficient in that ardent zeal which characterifed the patriots, could not be induced to act with confidence. They were fo difperfed over a large extent of a thinly fettled country, that it was difficult to bring them to u- 1781. nite in any common plan. They had no fuperintending Congrefs to give fystem or concert to their fchemes. While each little district purfued separate measures, all were obliged to fubmit to the American governments. Numbers of them, who were on their way to join lord Cornwallis, ftruck with terror at the unexpected return of the American ariny, and with the unhappy fate of their brethren, went home to wait events. Their policy was of that timid kind, which difpofed them to be more attentive to perfonal fafety, than to the fuccefs of either army.

Though Gen. Greene had recroffed, his plan was not to venture upon an immediate action, but to keep alive the courage of his party--to deprefs that of the loyalifts, and to harafs the foragers and detachments of the British, till reinforcements fhould arrive. While Greene was unequal even to defensive operations, he lay feven days within ten miles of Cornwallis' camp, but took a new polition every night, and kept it a profound fecret where the next was to be. By fuch frequent movements lord Cornwallis, could not gain intelligence of his fituation in time to profit by it. He manœuvered in this manner, to avoid anaction for three weeks, during which time he was often obliged to afk bread from the common foldiers, having none of his own. By the end of that period, two brigades of militia from North-Carolina, and one from Virginia, together with 400 regulars raifed for 18 months, joined his army, and gave him a fuperiority of numbers. He therefore determined. no longer to avoid an engagement. Lord Cornwallishaving long fought for this, no longer delay took place on either fide. The American army confifted of about 4400 men, March of which more than one half were militia. The British of about 2400, chiefly troops grown veteran in victories. The former was drawn up in three lines. The front composed of North-Carolina militia, the fecond of Virginia militia, the third and laft of continental troops commanded by Gen. Huger and Col. Williams. After a brifk cannonade in front, the British advanced in three columns. The Heffians on the right, the guards in the VOL. II. Ηh center

This gave way when their adversaries were at the distance of 140 yards, and was occasioned by the misconduct of a colonel, who on the advance of the enemy, called out to an officer at fome distance "that he would be furrounded." The alarm was fufficient: Without enquiring into the probability of what had been injudicioufly fuggefted, the militia precipitately quitted the field: As one good officer may fometimes mend the face of affairs, fo the mifconduct of a bad one may injure a whole army. Untrained men when on the field are fimilar to each other. The difference of their conduct depends much on incidental circumftances, and on none more than the manner of their being led on, and the quality of the officers by whom they are commanded.

The Virginia militia flood their ground, and kept up their fire till they were ordered to retreat. Gen. Stevens their commander, had posted 40 riflemen at equal diftances, twenty paces in the rear of his brigade, with orders to fhoot every man who fhould leave his poft. That brave officer though wounded through the thigh did not quit the field. The continental troops were last engaged, and maintained the conflict with great fpirit for an hour and a half. At length the difcipline of veteran troops gained the day. They broke the fecond Maryland brigade, turned the American left flank, and got in rear of the Virginia brigade. They appeared to be gaining Greene's right, which would have encircled the whole of the continental troops, a retreat was therefore ordered. This was made in good order, and no farther than over the reedy fork, a diftance of about three miles. Greene halted there and drew up till he had collected most of the stragglers, and then retired to Speedwell's iron works, ten miles diftant from Guildford. merit died of his wounds, to the great regret of the whole 1781. royal army. Generals O'Hara and Howard, and Lieutenant Colonel Tarleton, were wounded. About 300 of the continentals, and one hundred of the Virginia militia were killed or wounded. Among the former was Major Anderson of the Maryland line a most valuable officer, of the latter were Generals Huger and Stevens. The early retreat of the North-Carolinians faved them from much lofs. The American army fustained a great diminution, by the numerous fugitives who inflead of rejoining the camp went to their homes. Lord Cornwallis fuffered to much that he was in no condition to improve the advantage he had gained. The British had only the name, the Americans, all the good confequences of a victory. General Greene retreated, and lord Cornwallis kept the field, but notwithstanding the British intereft in North-Carolina was from that day ruined. Mar. 18 Soon after this action, lord Cornwallis iffued a proclamation fetting forth his complete victory, and calling on all loyal fubjects to ftand forth, and take an active part in reftoring order and good government, and offering a pardon and protection to all rebels, murderers excepted, who would furrender themselves on or before the 20th of April. On the next day after this proclamation was iffued, his lordfhip left his hofpital and 75 wounded men, with the numerous loyalifts in the vicinity, and began a march towards. Wilmington, which had the appearance of a retreat. Major Craig who for the purposes of cooperating with his lordfhip, had been flationed at Wilmington, was not able to open a water communication with the British army while they were in the upper country. The distance, the narrowness of Cape Fear river. the commanding elevation of its banks, and the hoffile fentiments of the inhabitants on each fide of it forbad the attempt. The defitute condition of the British army, made it neceffary to go to thefe fupplies, which for thefe reafons could not be brought to them.

General Greene no fooner received information of this movement of lord Cornwallis, than he put his army in motion to follow him, As he had no means of providing 1781. providing for the wounded, of his own, and the Britiss the forces, he wrote a letter to the neighbouring inhabitants of the Quaker perfuasion, in which he mentioned his being brought up a Quaker, and urged them to take care of the wounded on both fides. His recommendations prevailed, and the Quakers supplied the hospitals with every comfort in their power.

March 28.

The Americans continued the purfuit of Cornwallis till they had arrived at Ramfay's mill on Deep river, but for good reafons detifted from following him any farther.

Lord Cornwallis halted and refreshed his army for about three weeks at Wilmington, and then marched across the country to Petersburg in Virginia. Before it was known that his lordthip had determined on this movement, the bold refolution of returning to South-Carolina, was formed by Gen. Greene. This animated the friends of Congress in that quarter. Had the American army followed his lordthip, the fouthern. States would have conceived themfelves conquered; for their hopes and fears prevailed just as the armies marched north or fouth. Though lord Cornwallis marched through North-Carolina to Virginia, yet as the American army returned to South-Carolina, the people confidered that movement of his lordthip in the light of a retreat.

While the two armies were in North-Carolina, the whig inhabitants of South-Carolina were animated by the gallant exertions of Sumter and Marion. Thefe diftinguifhed partifans, while furrounded with enemies, kept the field. Though the continental army was driven into Virginia, they did not defpair of the commonwealth. Having mounted their followers, their motions were rapid, and their attacks unexpected. With their light troops they intercepted the Britifh convoys of provifions, infefted their out pofts, beat up their quarters, and haraffed their detachments with fuch frequent alarms, that they were obliged to be always on their guard. In the weftern extremity of the State, Sumter was powerfully fupported by Cols. Niel, Lacey, Hill, Winn, Bratton, Bratton, Brandon and others, each of whom held mili- 1781. tia commissions, and had many friends. In the north eastern extremity, Marion received in like manner great affistance from the active exertions of Cols. Peter Horry, and Hugh Horry, Lt. Col. John Baxter, Col. James Postell, Major John. Postell, and Major John James. The inhabitants, either as affection or vicinity induced them, arranged themfelves under fome of the militia officers and performed, many gallant enterprifes. Thefe fingly were of too little confequence to merit a particular relation, but in general they difplayed the determined fpirit of the people and embarraffed the British. One in which, Major John Postell commanded may ferve as an illustration of the, fpirit of the times, and particularly of the indifference for property which then prevailed. / Capt. James de Peyfier of the royal army, with 25 grenadiers, having taken post in the house of the Major's father, the Major posted his small command of 21 militia men, in fuch positions as commanded its doors, and demanded their furrender. This being refufed, he fet fire to an outhouse, and was proceeding to burn that in which they were posted, and nothing but the immediate submission of the whole party refirained him from facrificing his father's valuable property, to gain an advantage to his country.

While lord Cornwallis was preparing to invade Virginia, Gen. Greene determined to re-commence offenfive military operations in the fouthern extreme of the confederacy, in preference to purfuing his lordfhip into Virginia. Gen. Sumter, who had warmly urged this meafure, was about this time authorifed to raife a State brigade, to be in fervice for eighteen months. He had alfo prepared the militia to co-operate with the returning continentals. With thefe forces an offenfive war was recommenced in South-Carolina, and profecuted with fpirit and fuccefs.

Before Greene fet out on his march for Carolina, he fent orders to General Pickens, to prevent fupplies from going to the British garrifons at Ninety-Six and Augusta, and alfo, detached Lieutenant Colonel Lee to advance before before the continental troops. The latter in eight days penetrated through the intermediate country to General Marion's quarters upon the Santee. 'I he main army, in a few more days, completed their march from Deep river to Camden. The British had erected a chain of posts from the capital to the extreme districts of the State, which had regular communications with each other. Lord Cornwallis being gone to Virginia, thefe became objects of enterprize to the Americans. While Gen. Greene was marching with his main force against Camden, fort Watfon, which lay between Camden and Charlefton, was inyefted by Gen. Marion and Lieut. Col. Lee. The befiegers fpeedily erected a work which overlooked the fort, though that was built on an Indian mount upwards of 30 feet high, from which they fired' into it with fuch execution that the belieged durft not fhew themfelves. Under thefe circumstances the garrifon, confisting of 114 men, furrendered by capitulation.

Camden, before which the main American army was encamped, is a village fituated on a plain, covered on the fouth and east fides by the Wateree and a creek, the western and northern by fix redoubts. It was defended by lord Rawdon with about 900 men. The American army, confifting only of about an equal number of continentals, and between two and three hundred militia, was unequal to the tafk of carrying this post by ftorm, or of completely invefling it. Gen. Greene therefore took a good position about a mile distant, in expectation of alluring the garrifon out of their lines. Lord Rawdon armed his whole force, and with great fpirit fallied on the 25th. An engagement enfued. Victory for fome time evidently inclined to the Americans, but in the progress of the action, the premature retreat of two companies eventually occasioned the defeat of the whole American army. Greene with his usual firmness, instantly took measures to prevent lord Rawdon from improving the fuccefs he had obtained. He retreated with fuch order that most of his wounded and all his artillery, together with a number of prifoners, were carried off. The British retired to Camden, and the Americans encamped camped about five miles from their former polition. Their 1781. lofs was between two and three hundred. Soon after this action Gen. Greene, knowing that the British garrifon could not fubfift long in Camden without freth fupplies from Charlefton or the country, took fuch politions as were most likely to prevent their getting any. May 7.

_, Lord Rawdon received a reinforcement of 4 or 500 men by the arrival of Col. Watfon from Pedee. With this increase of firength, he attempted on the next day to compel Gen. Greene to another action, but found it to be impracticable. Failing in this defign, he returned to Camden and burned the jail, mills, many private houfes and a great deal of his own baggage. He then evacuated the post, and retired to the fouthward of Santee. His lordship discovered as much prudence in evacuating Camden, as he had fhewn bravery in its defence. The fall of fort Watfon broke the chain of communication with Charleston, and the position of the American army, in a great meafure intercepted fupplies from the adjacent country. The British in South-Carolina, now cut off from all communication with lord Cornwallis; would have hazarded the capital, by keeping large detachments in their diftant out-posts. They therefore refolved to contract their limits by retiring within the Santee. This measure animated the friends of Congress in the extremities of the State, and disposed them to co-operate with the American army. While Greene lay in the neighbourhood of Camden, he hung in one day eight foldiers, who had deferted from his army. This had fuch effect afterwards that there was no defertion for three months. May 11. On the day after the evacuation of Camden the post at Orangeburg, confifting of 70 British militia and 12 regulars, furrendered to Gen. Sumter. On the next day fort Motte capitulated. This was fituated above the fork May 12. on the fouth fide of the Congaree. The British had built their works round Mrs. Motte's dwelling houfe. She with great cheerfulnefs furnished the Americans with materials for firing her own houfe. Thefe being thrown by them on its roof foon kindled into flame. The firing of the houfe,

May 15.

On the day following, fort Granby, garrifoned by 352 men mostly royal militia, furrendered to Lieut. Col. Lee: Very advantageous terms were given them, from an apprehenfion that lord Rawdon was marching to their relief.

Their baggage was fecured, in which was included an immense quantity of plunder. The American militia were much difgusted at the terms allowed the garrifon, and difcovered a difposition to break the capitulation and kill the prifoners; but Greene reftrained them, by declaring in the most peremptory manner that he would inftantly put to death any one, who fhould offer violence to those who by furrendering were under his protection.

General Marion with a party of militia, marched about this time to Georgetown, and began regular approaches against the British post in that place. On the. first night after his men had broken ground, their adverfaries evacuated their works, and retreated to Charlefton; fhortly after one Manfon, an inhabitant of South-Carolina, who had joined the British, appeared in an armed veffel, and demanded permission to land his men in the town. This being refused, he fent a few of them ashore and fet fire to it. Upwards of forty houses were fpeedily reduced to afhes.

In the rapid manner just related, the British lost fix pofts, and abandoned all the northeaftern extremities of South-Carolina. They still retained posiefion of Augusta and Ninety-fix, in addition to their pofts near the fea coaft. Immediately after the furrender of fort Granby, Lieutenant Colonel Lee began his march for Augusta, and in four days completed it.

May 21.

The British post at Silver-Bluff, with a field piece and confiderable flores, furrendered to a detachment of Lee's legion commanded by Captain Rudolph. Lee on his arrival at Augusta joined Pickens, who with a body of militia had for fome time past taken post in the vicinity. They

They jointly carried on their approaches against fort 1781. Cornwallis at Augusta, in which Colonel Brown commanded. Two batteries were erected within 30 yards of the parapet, which overlooked the fort. From thefe eminences the American riflemen shot into the infide of the works with fuccefs : The garrifon buried themfelves in a great measure under ground, and obstinately refused to capitulate, till the neceffity was fo preffing that every man who attempted to fire on the befiegers, was immediately shot down. At length when farther resistance would June 5. have been madnefs, the fort with about 300 men furrendered, on honorable terms of capitulation. 'The Americans during the fiege had about forty men killed and wounded. After the furrender, Lieutenant Colonel Grierfon of the British militia, was shot by the . Americans. A reward of 100 guineas was offered, but in vain, for the perpetrator of the perfidious deed. Lieutenant Colonel Brown, would probably have fhared the fame fate, had not his conquerors furnished him with an efcort to the royal garrifon in Savannah. Individuals whole paffions were inflamed by injuries, and exasperated with perfonal animofity, were eager to gratify revenge in violation of the laws of war. Murders had produced murders. Plundering, affaffinations, and houfe burnings, had become common. Zeal for the King or the Congress were the oftenfible motives of action; but in feveral of both fides, the love of plunder, private pique, and a favageness of disposition, led to actions which were difgraceful to human nature. Such was the flate of parties in the vicinity of Savannah river, and fuch the exafperation of whigs against tories, and of tories against whigs; and fo much had they fuffered from and inflicted on each other, that the laws of war, and the precepts of humanity afforded but a feeble fecurity for the obfervance of capitulations on either fide. The American officers exerted themfelves to procure to their prifoners that fafety which many of the inhabitants, influenced by a remembrance of the fufferings of themfelves, and of their friends, were unwilling to allow them.

While

While operations were carrying on against the small posts, Greene proceeded with his main army and laid fiege to Ninety-fix, in which Lieutenant Colonel Cruger, with upwards of 500 men was advantageoufly posted. On the left of the befiegers was a work, erected in the form of a ftar. On the right was a ftrong blockade fort, with two block houses in it. The town was also picquetted in with ftrong picquets, and furrounded with a ditch, and a bank, near the height of a common parapet. The befiegers were more numerous than the befieged, but the difparity was not great.

The fiege was profecuted with indefatigable industry. The garrifon defended themfelves with fpirit and addrefs. On the morning after the fiege began, a party fallied from the garrifon, and drove the advance of the befiegers from their works. The next night, two ftrong block batteries were erected at the diftance of 350 yards. Another battery 20 feet high, was erected within 220 vards, and foon after a fourth one was creeted within 100 yards of the main fort, and laftly, a rifle battery was erected 30 feet high, within 30 yards of the ditch; from all of which the befiegers fired into the British works. The abbatis was turned, and a mine and two trenches were fo far extended, as to be within fix feet of the ditch. At that interesting moment, intelligence was conveyed into the garrifon, that lord Rawdon was near at hand, with about 2000 men for their relief. These had arrived in Charleston from Ireland after the fiege began, and were marched for Ninety-fix, on the feventh day after they landed. In these circumstances, Gen. Greene had no alternative but to raife the fiege, or attempt the June 18, reduction of the place by affault. The latter was attempted. Though the affailants difplayed great refolution, they failed of fuccess. On this General Greene raifed the fiege, and retreated over Saluda. His lofs in the affault and previous conflicts was about 150 men. Lieutenant Colonel Cruger defervedly gained great reputation by this fuccefsful defence. He was particularly indebted to Major Greene, who had bravely and judicioufly defended that redoubt, for the reduction of which, the greatef greateft exertions had been made. Truly diffreffing was the fituation of the American army. When they were nearly mafters of the whole country, they were compelled to feek fafety by retreating to its remotest extremity. In this gloomy fituation Greene was advifed to retire with his remaining force to Virginia. To fuggestions of this kind he nobly replied. " I will recover Sonth-Carolina or die in the attempt." This diftinguithed officer whofe genius was most vigorous in those perilous extremities, when feeble minds abandon themfelves to defpair, adopted the only expedient now left him, that of avoiding an engagement till the British force should be divided. Lord Rawdon who by rapid marches was near Ninety-fix, at the time of the affault, purfued the Americans as far as the Enoree river ; but without overtaking them. Defifting from this fruitlets pursuit he drew off a part of his force from Ninty-fix, and fixed a detachment at the Congaree. General Greene on hearing that the British force was divided, faced about to give them battle. Lord Rawdon no lefs furprifed than alarmed at this unexpected movement of his lately retreating foe, abandoned the Congaree in two days after he had reached it, and marched to Orangeburgh. General Greene in his turn purfued July 12. and offered him battle. His lordship would not venture out, and his adverfary was too weak to attack him in his encampment, with any profpect of fuccels.

Reafons fimilar to those which induced the British to evacuate Camden, weighed with them about this time, to withdraw their troops from Ninety-fix. While the American army lay near Orangeburgh, Lieutenant Colonel Cruger, having evacuated the post he had gallantly defended, was marching with the troops of that garrifon, through the forks of Edifto, to join lord Rawdon at Orangeburgh. General Greene being unable to prevent their junction, and still lefs fo to stand before their combined force, retired to the high hills of Santee. The evacuation of Camden having been effected by ftriking at the posts below it, the fame manœuvre was now attempted to induce the British to leave Orangeburgh. With this view Generals Sumter and Marion, with their brigades, and the legion legion cavalry, were detached to Monk's corner and Dorchefter. They moved down different roads, and commenced feparate and fuccefsful attacks, on convoys and detachments in the vicinity of Charlefton. In this manner was the war carried on. While the Britifh kept their forces compact, they could not cover the country, and the American General had the prudence to avoid fighting. When they divided their army, their detachments were attacked and defeated. While they were in the upper country, light parties of Americans annoyed their fmall pofts in the lower fettlements. The people foon found that the late conquerors were not able to afford them their promifed protection. The fpirit of revolt became general, and the royal intereft daily declined.

The British having evacuated all their posts to the northward of Santee and Congaree, and to the weftward of Edifto, conceived themfelves able to hold all that fertile country, which is in a great measure enclosed by these rivers. They therefore once more refumed their fration. near the junction of the Wateree and Congaree. This induced Gen. Greene to concert farther measures for forcing them down towards Charleston. He therefore croffed the Wateree and Congaree, and collected his whole force on the fouth fide of the latter, intending to act offenfively. On his approach the British retired about 40 miles nearer Charleston, and took post at the Eutaw forings. Gen. Greene advanced with 2000 men, to attack them in their encampment at this place. His force was drawn up in two lines: The first was composed of militia, and the fecond of continental troops. As the Americans advanced they fell in with two parties of the British, three or four miles a head of their main army. Thefe being brifkly attacked foon retired. The militia continued to pursue and fire, till the action became general, and till they were obliged to give way. They were well fupported by the continental troops. In the hotteft of the action Col. O. Williams, and Lieut. Col. Campbel with the Maryland and Virginia continentals charged with trailed arms. Nothing could furpafs the intrepidity of both officers and men on this occafion. They rufhed on in in good order through a heavy cannonade, and a flower of mulketry, with fuch unfhaken refolution, that they bore down all before them. Lieut. Col. Campbel, while bravely leading his men on to that fuccefsful charge, received a mortal wound. After he had fallen he enquired, who gave way, and being informed that the British were flecing in all quarters, replied "I die contented," and immediately expired. The British were vigorously purfued, and upwards of 500 of them were taken prifoners. On their retreat they took post in a ftrong brick house, and in a picquetted garden: From these advantageous politions they renewed the action. Four fix pounders were ordered up before the houfe, from under cover of which the British were firing. The Americans were compelled to leave these pieces and retire, but they left a strong picquet on the field of battle, and only retreated to the nearest water in their rear. In the evening of the next day, Lieut. Col. Stuart who commanded the British on this occasion, left feventy of his wounded men and a thoufand ftand of arms, and moved from the Eutaws towards Charleston. The loss of the Britifi inclusive of prifoners, was upwards of 1 too men; that of the American sabove 500, in which number were fixty efficers.

Congrefs honored Gen. Greene for his good conduct in this action, with a British standard and a golden medal. They also voted their thanks to the different corps and their commanders

Soon after this engagement, the Americans retired to their former position on the high hills of Santee, and the British took post in the vicinity of Monks-Corner. In the close of the year Gen. Greene moved down into the lower country, and about the fame time the British abandoned their outposts, and retired with their whole force to the quarter house on Charleston-neck. The defence of the country was given up, and the conquerors, who had lately carried their arms to the extremities of the State, feldom aimed at any thing more than to fecure themfelves in the vicinity of the capital. The crops, which had been planted in the fpring of the year under British

British aufpices, and with the expectation of affording 1781. Ling them fupplies, fell into the hands of the Americans and administered to them a feafonable relief. The battle of Eutaw may be confidered as clofing the national war in South-Carolina. A few excursions were afterwards made by the British, and fundry small enterprizes were executed. but nothing of more general confequence than the lofs of property, and of individual lives. Thus ended the campaign of 1781, in South-Carolina. At its commencement the British were in force over all the State: at its clofe they durft not, but with great precaution, venture 20 miles from Charleston. History affords but few instances of commanders, who have achieved fo much with equal means, as was done by Gen. Greené in the fhort fpace of a twelve month. He opened the campaign with gloomy profpects, but clofed it with glory. His uiipaid and half naked army had to contend with veteran foldiers, fupplied with every thing that the wealth of Britain or the plunder of Carolina could procure. Under all these difidvantages, he compelled fuperior numbers to reise from the extremity of the State, and confine themfelves in the capital and its vicinity. Had not his mind been of the firmest texture he would have been discouraged, but his enemies found him as formidable on the evening of a defeat, as on the morning after a victory.

C H A P. XXIV.

Campaign of 1781. Operations in Virginia: Cornwallis captured: New-London destroyed.

T has already been mentioned that lord Cornwallis, foon after the battle of Guildford, marched to Wilmington in North-Carolina. When he had completed that march, various plans of operation were prefented to his view. It was faid in favour of his proceeding fouthwardly, that the country between Wilmington and Camden was barren and of difficult paffage---that an embarkation for Charlefton would be both tedious and difgraceful, graceful---that a junction with the royal forces in Vir-1781. ginia, and the profecution of folid operations in that quarter, would be the most effectual plan for effecting and fecuring the fubmiffion of the more fouthern States. Other arguments of apparently equal force urged his return to South-Carolina. Previous to his departure for Virginia, he had received information that Gen. Greene had begun his march for Camden, and he had reafon from past experience to fear that if he did not follow him, the inhabitants by a fecond revolt, would give the American army a fuperiority over the finall force left under lord Rawdon. Though his lordfhip was very apprehenfive of danger from that quarter, he hoped either that lord Rawdon would be able to ftand his ground, or that Gen. Greene would follow the royal army to Virginia, or in the most unfavourable event he flattered himfelf, that by the conquest of Virginia, the recovery of South-Carolina would be at any time practicable. His lordship having too much pride to turn back, and prefering the extensive scale of operations which .Virginia prefented, to the narrow one of preferving past conquests, determined to leave Carolina to its fate. Before the end Apr. 25. of April, he therefore proceeded on his march, from Wilmington towards Virginia. To favour the paffage of the many rivers, with which the country is interfected, two boats were mounted on carriages and taken along with his army. . The King's troops proceeded feveral days without opposition, and almost without intelligence. The Americans made an attempt at Swift-creek and afterwards at Fishing-creek to stop their progress, but without any effect. The British took the shortest road to Halifax, and on their arrival there defeated feveral parties of the Americans and took fome ftores, with very little lofs on their fide. The Roanoke, the Meherrin, and the Nottaway rivers were fucceffively croffed by the royal army, and with little or no opposition from the difperfed inhabitants. In lefs than a month the march May 20. from Wilmington to Petersburg was completed. The latter had been fixed upon as the place of rendezvous, in a private correspondence with Gen. Philips. By this combination

1781. combination of the royal force previously employed in Virginia, with the troops which had marched from Wilmington, lord Cornwallis was at the head of a very powerful army. This junction was fearcely completed, when lord Cornwallis received lord Rawdon's report of the advantage he had gained over Gen. Greene, on the 25th of the preceding month. About the fame time he received information that three British regiments had failed from Cork for Charleston.

Thefe two events eafed his mind of all anxiety for South-Carolina, and infpired him with brilliant hopes of a glorious campaign. He confidered himfelf as having already fubdued both the Carolinas, and as being in a fair way to increase his military fame, by the addition of Virginia to the lift of his conquefts. By the late combination of the royal forces under Philips and Cornwallis, and by the recent arrival of a reinforcement of 1500 men directly from New-York, Virginia became the principal theatre of operations for the remainder of the campaign. The formidable force, thus collected in one body, called for the vigorous exertions of the friends of independence. The defensive operations, in opposition to it, were principally entrufted to the Marquis de la Favetie. Early in the year he had been detached from the main American army on an expedition, the object of which was a co-operation with the French fleet in capturing Gen. Arnold. On the failure of this, the Marquis marched back as far as the head of Elk. There he received an order to return to Virginia to oppose the Britifh forces, which had become more formidable by the arrival of a confiderable reinforcement, under Gen. Philips. He proceeded without delay to Richmond, and arrived there the day before the British reached Manchester, on the opposite fide of James river. Thus was the capital of Virginia, at that time filled with almost all the military flores of the State, faved from imminent danger. So great was the fuperiority of numbers on the fide of the British, that the Marquis had before him a labor of the greatest difficulty, and was presed with many embarrafiments. In the first moments of the rifing ing tempeft, and till he could provide against its utmost 1781. rage, he began to retire with his little army, which confisted only of about 1000 regulars, 2000 militia, and 60 dragoons.

Lord Cornwallis advanced from Petersburg to James river which he croffed at Weftown, and thence marching through Hanover county croffed the South Anna or Pamunkey river. The Marquis followed his motions, but at a guarded diftance. The fuperiority of the Britifh army, especially of their cavalry, which they eafly fupplied with good horfes from the stables and pastures of private gentlemen in Virginia, enabled them to traverfe the country in all directions. Two diftant expeditions were therefore undertaken. The one was to Charlotteville, with the view of capturing the Governor and Affembly of the State. The other to Point of Fork to deftroy ftores. Lt. Col. Tarleton to whom the first was committed, fucceeded fo far as to disperse the Affembly, capture feven of its members, and to deftroy a great quantity of ftores at and near Charlotteville. Theother expedition which was committed to Lt. Col. Simcoe, was only in part fuccefsful, for the Americans had previoully removed the most of their stores from Point of Fork. In the courfe of these marches and counter marches, immense quantities of property were destroyed and fundry unimportant fkirmithes took place. The British made many partial conquests, but these were feldom of longer duration than their encampments. The young Marquis, with a degree of prudence that would have done honor to an old foldier, acted fo cautiously on the defensive and made to judicious a choice of posts, and shewed fo much vigor and defign in his movements, as to prevent any advantage being taken of his weaknefs. In his circumstances, not to be deftroyed, was triumph. He effected a junction at Racoonford with Gen. Wayne, who was at the head of 800 Pennfylvanians. While this junction was forming the British got between the American army and its ftores, which had been removed from Richmond to Albemarle old court house. The possession of these was an ob-VOL. H. The Britifh general confidered himfelf as fure of his adverfary for he knew that the flores were his object; and he conceived it impracticable for the Marquis to get between him and the flore; but by a road in pafsing which he might be attacked to advantage. The Marquis had the addrefs to extricate himfelf from this . difficulty, by opening in the night a nearer road to Albemarle old court houfe which had been long difufed and was much embarraffed. To the furprize of lord
- June 18. Cornwallis, the Marquis fixed himfelf the next day between the Britifh army and the American flores. Lord Cornwallis, finding his fchemes fruftrated fell back to Richmond. About this time the Marquis' army was reinforced by Steuben's troops, and by militia from the parts adjacent He followed lord Cornwallis, and had the addrefs to imprefs him with an idea that the American army was much greater then it really was. His lord-June 26. fhip therefore retreated to Williamfburg. The day after the main body of the British army arrived there, their rear was attacked by an American light corps under Col. Butler and suftained a confiderable loss.

About the time lord Cornwallis reached Williamfburg he received intelligence from New-York, fetting forth the danger to which the royal army in that city was expofed from a combined attack, that was faid to be threatened by the French and Americans. Sir Henry Clinton therefore required a detachment from Earl Cornwallis, if he was not engaged in any important enterprife, and recommended to him a healthy flation, with an ample defensive force, till the danger of New-York was difperfed. Lord Cornwallis thinking it expedient to comply with this requifition, and judging that his command afterwards would not be adequate to maintain his prefent pofition at Williamfburg, determined to retire to Portfmouth. For the execution of this project, it was neceffary to crofs James river. The Marquis de la Fayette, conceiving this to be a favourable opportunity for acting offenfively offensively, advanced on the British. Gen. Wayne rely- 1781. ing on the information of a countryman, that the main body of the British had croffed James river, pushed forwards with about 800 light troops to harafs their rear. Contrary to his expectations, he found the whole British army drawn up ready to oppose him. He instantly conceived that the best mode of extricating himself from his perilous fituation would be, to affume a bold countenance, and engage his adverfaries before he attempted to July 6. retreat. He therefore pressed on for some time, and urged an attack with spirit before he fell back. Lord Cornwallis, perhaps fuspecting an ambuscade, did not purfue. By this bold manœuvre Wayne got off but with little lofs.

In the course of these various movements, the British were joined by few of the inhabitants, and fcarcely by any of the natives. The Virginians for the most part either joined the Americans, or what was much more common, kept out of the way of the British. To purchafe fafety by fubmiffion was the policy of very few, and these were for the most part natives of Britain. After Earl Cornwallis had croffed James river, he marched for Portfmouth. He had previoufly taken the neceffary fteps for complying with the requifition of Sir Henry Clinton, to fend a part of his command to New York. But before they failed, an express arrived from Sir Henry Clinton with a letter, expreffing his preference of Williamfburgh to Portfmouth for the refidence of the army. and his defire that Old-Point-Comfort or Hampton road should be fecured as a station for line of battle ships. The commander in chief, at the fame time, allowed his lordship to detain any part or the whole of the forces under his command, for completing this fervice. On examination, Hampton road was not approved of as a station for the navy. It being a principal object of the campaign to fix on a ftrong permanent poft or place of arms in the Chefapeak for the fecurity of both the army and navy, and Portfmouth and Hampton road having both been pronounced unfit for that purpofe, York-Town and Gloucefter Points were confidered as most likely to accord with the views of the royal commanders. Portfmouth was therefore evacuated, and its garrifon transferred 1781. transferred to York-Town. Lord Cornwallis availed himfelf of Sir Henry Clinton's permiffion to retain the whole force under his command, and impreffed with the neceffity of establishing a strong place of arms in the Chefapeak, applied himfelf with industry to fortify his new posts, fo as to render them tenable by his prefent army, amounting to 7000 men, against any force that he supposed likely to be brought against them.

At this period the officers of the British navy expected that their fleet in the West-Indies would join them, and that folid operations in Virginia would in a short time re-commence with increased vigor.

While they were indulging thefe hopes Count de Graffe with a French fleet of 28 fail of the line from the West-Indies entered the Chefapeak, and about the fame time intelligence arrived, that the French and American armies which had been lately flationed in the more northern States, were advancing towards Virginia. Count de Graffe, without lofs of time, blocked up York river with three large thips and fome frigates, and moored the principal part of his fleet in Lynhaven-bay. Three thou-" fand two hundred French troops, brought in this fleet from the West-Indies, commanded by the Marquis de St. Simon, were difembarked and foon after formed a junction with the continental troops under the Marquis de la Favette, and the whole took post at Williamsburg. An attack on this force was intended, but before all the arrangements subservient to its execution were fixed upon, letters of an early date in September were received by lord Cornwallis from Sir Henry Clinton, announcing that he would do his utmost to reinforce the royal army in Chefapeak, or make every diversion in his power, and that Admiral Digby was hourly expected on the coaft. On the receipt of this intelligence Earl Cornwallis, not thinking himfelf juftified in hazarding an engagement, abandoned the refolution of attacking the combined force of Fayette and St. Simon. It is the province of hiftory to relate what has happened, and not to indulge conjectures in the boundlefs field of contingencies; otherwife it might be added that Earl Cornwallis, by this change of opinion, loft a favourable opportunity of extricating 1781. himfelf from a combination of hoftile force, 'which by ' farther concentration foon became irrefiftible. On the other hand if an attack had been made, and that had proved unfuccefsful, he would have been charged with rashness in not waiting for the promised co-operation. On the fame uncertain ground of conjecturing what ought to have been done, it might be faid that the knowledge Earl Cornwallis had of public affairs would have juftified him in abandoning York-Town, in order to return to South-Carolina. It feems as though this would have been his wiseft plan; but either from an opinion that his inftructions to ftand his ground were politive, or that effectual relief was probable, his lordship thought proper to rifque every thing on the iffue of a fiege. An attempt was made to burn or diflodge the French ships in the river, but none to evacuate his posts at this early period, when that measure was practicable.

Admiral Greaves with 20 fail of the line, made an effort for the relief of lord Cornwallis, but without effecting his purpofe. When he appeared off the capes of Virginia, M. de Graffe went out to meet him, and an indecifive engagement took place. The British were wil- Sep. 74 ling to renew the action; but de Graffe for good reasons declined it. His chief object in coming out of the capes was to cover a French fleet of eight line of battle fhips, which was expected from Rhode-Ifland. In conformity to a preconcerted plan, Count de Barras commander of this fleet, had failed for the Chefapeak, about the time de Graffe failed from the West-Indies for the fame place. To avoid the British fleet, he had taken a circuit by Bermuda. For fear that the British fleet might intercept him on his approach to the capes of Virginia; de Graffe came out to be at hand for his protection. While Greaves and de Graffe were manœuvering near the mouth of the Chesapeak, Count de Barras passed the former in the night, and got within the capes of Virginia. This gave the fleet of his most Christian Majesty a decided superiority. Admiral Greaves foon took his departure, and M. de Graffe re-entered the Chefapeak. All this time conformably formably to the well digefted plan of the campaign, the French and the American forces were marching through the middle ftates on their way to York-town. To underftand their proper connexion, the great events fhortly to be deferibed, it is neceffary to go back and trace the remote caufes which brought on this grand combination of fleets and armies which put a period to the war.

The fall of Charleston in May 1780, and the complete rout of the American fouthern army in August following, together with the increasing inability of the Americans to carry on the war, gave a ferious alarm to the friends of independence. In this low ebb of their affairs, a pathetic statement of their distresses was made to their illustrious ally the King of France. To give greater efficacy to their folicitations, Congress appointed Lieutenant Colonel John Laurens their fpecial minister, and directed him after repairing to the court of Verfailles, to urge the neceffity of speedy and effectual succour, and in particular to folicit for a loan of money, and the cooperation of a French fleet, in attempting fome important enterprise against the common enemy. His great abilities as an officer, had been often difplayed; but on this occasion, the fuperior talents of the ftatefman and negotiator were called forth into action. Animated as he was with the ardor of the warmest patriotism, and feeling most fensibly for the distresses of his country, his whole foul was exerted to intereft the court of France in giving a vigorous aid to their allies. His engaging manners and infinuating addrefs, procured a favourable reception to his representations. He won the hearts of those who were at the helm of public affairs, and inflamed them with zeal to affift a country whole caufe was fo ably pleaded, and whofe fufferings were fo pathetically reprefented. At this crifis his most Christian Majesty gave his American allies, a fubfidy of fix millions of livres, and became their fecurity for ten millions more borrowed for their use in the United Netherlands. A naval co-operation was promifed and a conjunct expedition against their common foes was projected.

The

The American war was now fo far involved in the 1781. confequences of naval operations, that a fuperior French fleet, feemed to be the only hingeon which it was likely foon to take a favourable turn. The British army being parcelled in the different fea ports of the United States, any division of it blocked up by a French fleet, could not long refift the fuperior combined force, which might be brought to operate against it. The Marquis de Castries who directed the marine of France, with great precifion calculated the naval force, which the British could concentre on the coaft of the United States, and disposed his own in fuch a manner as enfured him a fuperiority. In conformity to thefe principles, and in fubferviency to the defign of the campaign, M. de Graffe failed in March 1781, from Breft with 25 fail of the line, feveral thoufand land forces, and a large convoy amounting to more than 200 ships. A fmall part of this force was destined for the East-Indies, but M. de Graffe with the greater part failed for Martinique. The British fleet then in the West-Indies, had been previously weakened by the departure of a fquadron for the protection of the fhips, which were employed in carrying to England the booty which had been taken at St. Euffatius. The British Admirals Hood and Drake, were detached to intercept the outward bound French fleet commanded by M. de Grade, but a junction between his force and eight thios of the line and one of 50 guns, which were previoufly at Martinique and St. Domingo, was neverthelefs effected. By this combination of fresh ships from Europe, with the French fleet previously in the West-Indies, they had a decided superiority. M. de Graffe having finished his bufinefs in the West-Indies, failed in the beginning of August with a prodigious convoy. After feeing this out of danger he directed his course for the Chefapeak, and arrived there as has been related on the thirtieth of the fame month. Five days before his arrival in the Chefapeak, the French fleet in Rhode-Ifland failed for the fame place. Thefe fleets notwithstanding their original diftance from the scene of action and from each other, coincided in their operations in an extraordinary manner, far far beyond the reach of military calculation. They all tended to one object and at one and the fame time, and that object was neither known nor fufpected by the British, till the proper feafon for counter-action was elapfed. This co-incidence of favourable circumftances, extended to the marches of the French and American land forces. The plan of operations had been fo well digefted, and was fo faithfully executed by the different commanders, that Gen. Washington and Count Rochambeau, had paffed the British head quarters in New-York, and were confiderably advanced in their way to York-town, before Count de Graffe had reached the American coaft. This was ef-

May 6. fected in the following manner, Monfr. de Barras appointed to the command of the French fquadron at Newport, arrived at Bufton with dispatches for Count de Rochambeau. An interview foon after took place at Weathersfield, between Gen. Washington, Knox and du Portail on the part of the Americans, and Count de Rochambeau and the Chavalier Chastelleux, on the part of the French. At this interview, an eventual plan of the whole campaign was fixed. This was to lay fiege to New-York in concert with a French fleet, which was to arrive on the coaft in the month of August. It was agreed that the French troops fhould march towards the North-river. Letters were addreffed by Gen. Washington to the executive officers of New-Hampfhire, Maffachufetts, Connecticut and New-Jerfey, requiring them to fill up their battalions, and to have-their quotas 6200 militia in readinefs, within a week of the time they might be called for. Conformably to these outlines of the campaign, the French troops marched from Rhode-Ifland in June, and carly in the following month joined the American army. About the time this junction took place, Gen. Wafhington marched his army from their winter encampment , near Peeks-kill, to the vicinity of Kingfbridge. General Lincoln fell down the North-river with a detachment in boats, and took poffession of the ground where fort Independence formerly ftood. An attack was made upon him but was foon difcontinued. The British about this time, retired with almost the whole of their force to York-Ifland, York-Island. Gen. Washington hoped to be able to 1781. to commence operations against New-York, about the middle, or at farthest the latter end of July. Flat bottomed boats fufficient to transport 5000 men were built near Albany, and brought down Hudson's river to the neighbourhood of the American army before New-York. Ovens were erected opposite to Staten-Island, for the use of the French troops. Every movement was made which was introductory to the commencement of the fiege. It was not a little mortifying to Gen. Washington, to find himself on the 2d of August to be only a few hundreds stronger, than he was on the day his army first moved from their winter quarters. To have fixed on a plan of operations, with a foreign officer at the head of a refpectable force: To have brought that force from a confiderable distance, in confident expectation of reinforcements fufficiently large to commence effective operations against the common enemy, and at the fame time to have engagements in behalf of the state violated in direct opposition to their own interest, and in a manner derogatory to his perfonal honour, was enough to have excited ftorms and tempests, in any mind lefs calm than that of Gen. Washington, He bore this hard trial with his usual magnanimity, and contented himfelf with repeating his requifitions to the states, and at the fame time urged them by every tie, to enable him to fulfil engagements entered into on their account, with the commander of the French troops.

That tardinefs of the ftates, which at other times had brought them near the brink of ruin, was now the accidental caufe of real fervice. Had they fent forward their recruits for the regular army, and their quotas of militia as was expected, the fiege of New-York would have commenced, in the latter end of July, or early in August. While the feafon was wasting away in expectation of these reinforcements, lord Cornwallis as has been mentioned. fixed himfelf near the capes of Virginia. His fituation there, the arrival of a reinforcement of 3000 Germans from Europe to New-York, the fuperior ftrength of that garrifon, the failure of the flates in filling up their Vol. II. LI battalions battalions and embodying their militia, and effectially re-1781. cent intelligence from Count de Graffe, that his destination was fixed to the Chefapeak, concurred about the mid-

Aug. 15 dle of August, to make a total change of the plan of the campaign.

The appearance of an intention to attack New-York was neverthelefs kept up. While this deception was played off, the allied army croffed the North-river, and paffed on by the way of Philadelphia, through the intermediate country, to York-town. An attempt to reduce the British force in Virginia promised fuccess with more expedition, and to fecure an object of nearly equal importance as the reduction of New York. No one can undertake to fay what would have been the confequence, if the allied forces had perfevered in their original plan; but it is evident from the event, that no fuccefs could have been greater, or more conducive to the eftablishment of their schemes, than what resulted from their operations in Virginia.

While the attack of New-York was in ferious contemplation, a letter from General Washington detailing the particulars of the intended operations of the campaign, being intercepted, fell into the hands of Sir Henry Clinton. After the plan was changed, the royal commander was fo much under the impreffion of the intelligence contained in the intercepted letter, that he believed every movement towards Virginia to be a feint, calculated to draw off his attention from the defence of New-York. Under the influence of this opinion he bent his whole force to ftrengthen that poft, and fuffered the French and American armies to pafs him without any moleftation. When the best opportunity of striking at them was elapfed, then for the first time he was brought to believe that the allies had fixed on Virginia, for the theatre of their combined operations. As truth may be made to answer the purposes of deception, fo no feint of attacking New-York, could have been more fuccessful than the real intention.

Aug. 24.

In the latter end of August the American army began their march to Virginia, from the neighbourhood of New-

York. Gen. Washington had advanced as far as Chef- 1781. ter, before he received the news of the arrival of the fleet, commanded by Monfr. de Graffe. 'The French troops marched at the fame time, and for the fame place. In the courfe of this fummer they paffed through all the extensive fettlements which lie between Newport and York-Town. It feldom, if ever happened before, that an army led through a foreign country, at fo great a distance from their own, among a people of different principles, cuftoms, language, and religion, behaved with fo much regularity. In their march to York-Town they had to pass through 500 miles of a country abounding in fruit, and at a time when the most delicious productions of nature, growing on and near the public highways, prefented both opportunity and temptation to gratify their appetites. Yet fo complete was their difcipline, that in this long march, fcarce an inftance could be produced of a peach or an apple being taken, without the confent of the inhabitants. Gen. Washington and Count Rochambeau reached Williamsburg on the 14th Sep. 14. of September. They with Generals Chaftelleux, Du Portail, and Knox proceeded to visit Count de Graffeon board his fhip the Ville de Paris, and agreed on a plan of operations.

The Count afterwards wrote to Washington, that in cafe a British fleet appeared, " he conceived that he ought to go out and meet them at fea, inflead of rifquing an engagement in a confined fituation." This alarmed the General. He fent the Marquis de la Fayette, with a letter to diffuade him from the dangerous measure. This letter and the perfuasions of the Marquis had the defired effect.

The combined forces proceeded on their way to Yorktown, partly by land, and partly down the Chefapeak. The whole, together with a body of Virginia militia, under the command of General Nelfon, amounting in the aggregate to 12,000 men, rendezvoused at Williamsburg on the 25th of September, and in five days after, moved down to the investiture of York-town. The French fleet at the fame time moved to the mouth of York-river, and 1781. and took a pofition which was calculated to prevent lord Cornwallis, either from retreating, or receiving fuccour by water. Previoufly to the march from Williamfburg to York-town, Washington gave out in general orders as follows. " If the enemy should be tempted to meet the army on its march, the General particularly enjoins the troops to place their principal reliance on the bayonet, that they may prove the vanity of the boast, which the British make of their peculiar prowess, in deciding battles with that weapon."

The combined army halted in the evening, about two miles from York-town, and lay on their arms all night. On the next day Colonel Scammell, an officer of uncommon merit, and of the most amiable manners, in approaching the outer works of the Britith, was mortally wounded and taken prifoner. About this time Earl Cornwallis received a letter from Sir Henry Clinton, announcing the arrival of Admiral Digby with three fhips of the line from Europe, and the determination of the General and flag officers in New-York to embark 5000 men in a fleet, which would probably fail on the 5th of October--- that this fleet confisted of 23 fail of the line, and that joint exertions of the navy and army would bemade for his relief. On the night after the receipt of this intelligence, Earl Cornwallis quitted his outward polition, and retired to one more inward.

The works erected for the fecurity of York-town on the right, were redoubts and batteries, with a line of ftockade in the rear. A marfhy ravine lay in front of the right, over which was placed a large redoubt. The morafs extended along the center, which was defended by a line of ftockade, and by batteries : On the left of the center was a hornwork with a ditch, a row offraize and an abbatis. Two redoubts were advanced before the left. The combined forces advanced and took poffefiion of the ground from which the Britifh had retired. A bout this time the legion cavalry and mounted infantry, paffed over the river to Gloucefter, General de Choify invefted the Britifh poft' on that fide fo fully, as to cut off all communication between it and the country, In the mean time the royal army army was ftraining every nerve to ftrengthen their works and their artillery was conftantly employed in impeding the operations of the combined army. On the oth and 10th of October, the French and Americans opened their batteries. They kept up a brifk and well directed fire from heavy cannon, from mortars and howitzers. The shells of the besiegers reached the ships in the harbour, the Charon of 44 guns and a transport ship were burned. On the 10th a meffenger arrived with a difpatch from Sir Henry Clinton to Earl Conwallis, dated on the 30th of September, which stated various circumstances tending to leffen the probability of relief being obtained, by a direct movement from New-York. Earl Cornwallis was at this juncture advised to evacuate York-town, and after paffing over to Gloucester, to force his way into the country. Whether this movement would have been fuccefsful, no one can with certainty pronounce, but it could not have produced any confequences more injurious to the royal interest, than those which resulted from declining the attempt. On the other hand had this movement been made, and the royal army been defeated or captured in the interior country, and in the mean time had Sir Henry Clinton with the promifed relief, reached York town, the precipitancy of the noble Earl, would have been perhaps more the fubject of centure, than his refolution of ftanding his ground and relifting to the laft extremity. From this uncertain ground of conjectures, I proceed to relate real events. The befiegers commenced their fecond parallel 200 yards from the works of the befieged. Two redoubts which were advanced on the left of the British, greatly impeded the progress of the combined armies. It was therefore proposed to carry them by ftorm. . To excite a fpirit of emulation, the reduction of the one was committed to the French, of the other to the Americans. The affailants marched to the affault with unloaded arms; having paffed the abbatis and palifades, they attacked on all fides, and carried the redoubt in a few minutes with the lofs of 8 killed and 28 wounded, Lieutenant Colonel Laurens perfonally took the commanding officer prifoner. His humanity and that 269

that of his affociates, fo overcame their referiments that they fpared the Britifh, though they were charged when they went to the affualt, to remember New-London (the recent maffacres at which place fhall be hereafter related) and to retaliate by putting the men in the redoubt to the fword. Being afked why they had difobeyed orders by bringing them off as prifoners, they anfwered, "We could not put them to death, when they begged for their lives." About five of the Britifh were killed and the reft were captured. Colonel Hamilton who conducted the enterprife, in his report to the Marquis de la Fayette mentioned to the honour of his detachment, "that incapable of imitating examples of barbarity, and forgetting recent provocations, they fpared every man who ceafed to refift."

The French were equally fuccefsful on their part. They carried the redoubt affigned to them with rapidity, but loft a confiderable number of men. Thefe two redoubts were included in the fecond parallel, and facilitated the fubfequent operations of the befiegers. The Britifh could not with propriety rifque repeated fallies. One was projected at this time confifting of 400 men, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Abercrombie. He proceeded fo far as to force two redoubts, and to fpike eleven pieces of cannon. Though the officers and foldiers difplayed great bravery in this enterprife, yet their fuccefs produced no effential advantage. The cannon were foon unfpiked and rendered fit for fervice.

> By this time the batteries of the befiegers were covered with nearly a hundred pieces of heavy ordnance, and the works of the befieged were fo damaged, that they could fearcely fhew a fingle gun. Lord Cornwallis had now no hope left but from offering terms of capitulation or attempting an efcape. He determined on the latter. This though lefs practicable than when first propofed, was not altogether hopelefs. Boats were prepared to receive the troops in the night, and to transport them to Gloucefter-Point. After one whole embarkation had croffed, a violent from of wind and rain disperfed the boats employed on this business, and frustrated the whole scheme. The royal army, thus weakened by division, was exposed to increased danger.

Orders were fent to those who had paffed, to re-cross 1781the river to York-Town. With the failure of this fcheme the last hope of the British army expired. Longer refiftance could answer no good purpole, and might occafion the lofs of many valuable lives. Lord Cornwallis therefore wrote a letter to Gen. Washington, requesting a ceffation of arms for 24 hours, and that committioners might be appointed to digeft terms of capitulation. It is remarkable while Lieut. Col. Laurens, the officer employed by Gen.' Washington on this occasion, was drawing up these articles, that his father was closely confined in the tower of London, of which Earl Cornwallis was Couftable. By this fingular combination of circumstances, his lordship became a prisoner, to the fon of his own prifoner.

The posts of York and Gloucester were furrendered by a capitulation, the principal articles of which were as follows: The troops to be prifoners of war to Congrefs, and the naval force to France. The officers to retain their fide arms and private property of every kind; but all property, obvioufly belonging to the inhabitants of the United States, to be fubject to be reclaimed. The foldiers to be kept in Virginia, Maryland and Pennfylvania, and to be fupplied with the fame rations, as are al. lowed to foldiers in the fervice of Congress. A proportion of the officers to march into the country with the prifoners; the reft to be allowed to proceed on parole to Europe, to New-York, or to any other American maritime post in possession of the British. The honor of marching out with colors flying, which had been refused to Gen. Lincoln on his giving up Charleston, was now refused to Earl Cornwallis; and General Lincoln was appointed to receive the fubmiffion of the royal army at York-Town, precifely in the fame way his own had been conducted, about 18 months before. Lord Cornwallis endeavoured to obtain permiffion for the Britifh and German troops to return to their respective countries, under no other reftrictions than an engagement not to ferve against France or America. He also tried to obtain an indemnity for those of the inhabitants who had joined him; but he was obliged to recede from the former mer, and alfo to confent that the loyalifts in his camp fhould be given up, to the unconditional mercy of their countrymen. His lordfhip neverthelefs obtained permiffion for the Bonetta floop of war to pafs unexamined to New-York. This gave an opportunity of fcreening fuch of them, as were most obnoxious to the Americans.

The regular troops of France and America, employed in this fiege, confifted of about 7000 of the former, and 5500 of the latter; and they were affifted by about 4000 militia. On the part of the combined army about 300 were killed or wounded. On the part of the Britifh about 500; and 70 were taken in the redoubts, which were carried by affault on the 14th of October. The troops of every kind that furrendered prifoners of war exceeded 7000 men, but fo great was the number of fick and wounded, that there were only 3800 capable of bearing arms. The French and American engineers and artillery, merited and received the higheft applaufe. Brigadiers General Du Portail and Knox were both promoted to the rank of Major Generals, on account of their meritorious fervices. Lieut. Col. Gouvion and Captain Rochefontaine of the corps of engineers, refpectively received brevets, the former to the rank of a Colonel, and the latter to the rank of a Major.

Congress honored Gen. Washington, Count de Rochambeau, Count de Grasse and the officers of the different corps, and the men under them, with thanks for their fervices in the reduction of lord Cornwallis. The whole project was conceived with profound wisdom, and the incidents of it had been combined with fingular propriety. It is not therefore wonderful, that from the remarkable coincidence in all its parts, it was crowned with unvaried fuccefs.

A British fleet and an army of 7000 men, defined for the relief of lord Cornwallis, arrived off the Chefapeak on the 24th of. October; but on receiving advice of his lordship's furrender, they returned to Sandy-hook and New-York. Such was the fate of that General, from whose gallantry and previous fuccess the speedy conquests conqueîts of the fouthern States had been fo confidently expected. No event during the war bid fairer for overfetting the independence of at leaft a part of the confederacy, than his complete victory at Camden; but by the confequences of that action, his lordfhip became the occafion of rendering that a revolution, which from his previous fuccefs was in danger of terminating in a rebellion. The lofs of his army may be confidered as the clofing fcene of the continental war in North America.

The troops under the command of lord Cornwallis had fpread wafte and ruin over the face of all the country for four hundred miles on the fea coaft, and for two hundred miles to the west-ward. Their marches from Charleston to Camden, from Camden to the river Dan, from the Dan through North-Carolina to Wilmington, from Wilmington to Peter(burg, and from Peterfburg through many parts of Virginia, till they finally fettled in York-Town, made a route of more than eleven hundred miles. Every place through which they paffed in these various marches, experienced the effects of their rapacity. Their numbers' enabled them to go whitherfoever they pleafed, their rage for plunder disposed them to take whatever they had the mean's of removing, and their animofity to the Americans led them often to the wanton destruction of what they could neither use nor carry off. By their means thousands had been involved in diffrefs. The reduction of fuch an army occalioned unufual transports of joy, in the breafts of the whole body of the people. Well authenticated teftimony afferts that the nerves of fome were fo agitated, as to produce convulsions, and that at least one man expired under the tide of pleafure which flowed in upon him, when informed of his lordfhip's furrender*. The people throughout the United States difplayed a focial triumph and exultation, which no private profperity is ever able fully to infpire. General Washington, on the day after the furrender, ordered " that those who were under VOL. II. Mm formed to morrow in the different brigades and divisions. The commander in chief recommends, that all the troops' that are not upon duty do affist at it with a ferious deportment, and that fensibility of heart, which the recollection of the furprising and particular interposition of providence in our favour claims." Congress on receiving the official account of the great events, which had taken place at York-town, refolved to go in procession to church and return public thanks to Almighty God for the advantages they had gained. They also issues the united States the 13th of December as a day of thanksgiving and prayer." The fingularly interefting event of captivating a fecond royal army, produced ftrong emotions, which broke out in all the variety of ways with which the moft rapturous joy ufually difplays itfelf.

While the combined armies were advancing to the fiege of York-town, an excursion was made from New-York, which was attended with no finall lofs to the Americans. Gen. Arnold who had lately returned from Virginia, was appointed to conduct an expedition, the object of which, was the town of New-London in his native country. The troops employed therein, were landed in two detachments on each fide of the harbour. The one was commanded by Lieut. Col. Eyre and the other by General Arnold. The latter met with little opposition, fort 'Irumbull and a redoubt which was intended to cover the harbour, not being tenable were evacuated, and the men croffed the river to fort Grifwold on Groton hill. This was furioufly attacked by Lieut. Col. Eyre: The garrifon defended themfelves with great refolution, but after a fevere conflict of forty minutes, the fort was carried by the affailants. The Americans had not more than fix or feven men killed, when the British carried their lines, but a fevere execution took place afterwards, though refiftance had ceafed. An officer of the conquering troops enquired on his entering the fort who commanded. Col. Ledyard answered. « I did»

" I did, but you do now." And prefented him his fword. 1781. The Col. was immediately run through the body and killed. Between 30 and 40 were wounded, and about 40 were carried off prisoners. On the fide of the British 48 were killed and 145 wounded: Among the latter was Major Montgomery, and among the former was Colonel Eyre. About 15 veffels loaded with the effects of the inhabitants, retreated up the river, and four others remained in the harbour unhurt, but all excepting thefe were burned by the communication of fire from the burning ftores. Sixty dwelling houfes and 84 ftores were reduced to afhes, the lofs which the Americans fuftained by the deftruction of naval ftores, of provisions and merchandife, was immenfe. Gen. Arnold having completed the object of the expedition, returned in eight days to New-York. The Americans loft many valuable men, and much of their poffeffions by this incursion, but the caufe for which they contended was uninjured. Expeditions which feemed to have no higher object than the deftruction of property. alienated their affections still farther from British government. They were not fo extensive as to answer the ends of conqueft, and the momentary imprefiion refulting from them, produced no lafting intimidation. On the other hand, they excited a ipirit of revenge against the authors of fuch accumulated diffreffes.

The year 1781 terminated, in all parts of the United States, in favour of the Americans. It began with weaknefs in Carolina, mutiny in New-Jerfey, and devastation in Virginia; neverthelefs in its clofe, the British were confined to their firong holds in or near New-York, Charleston and Savannah, and their whole army in Virginia was captured. They in the course of the year had acquired much plunder by which individuals were enriched, but their nation was in no respect benefited. The whole campaign paffed away on their part without one valuable conqueft, or the acquisition of any post or place, from which higher purpofes were answered, than destroying public ftores or diffreffing individuals, and enriching the officers and privates of their army and navy. The important fervices rendered by France to the Americans, cemented cemented the union of the two nations with additional 1781. ties. The orderly inoffenfive behaviour of the French troops in the United States, contrasted with the havoc of property made by the British in their marches and excursions, was filently turning the current of popular efteem in favour of the former, and working a revolution in the minds of the inhabitants, greatly conducive to the establishment of that which had taken place in the government. . The property of the inhabitants of Rhode-Island, received no damage of any account from the French troops, during their eleven months refidence among them. The foldiers were rather a guard than a nuifance: The citizens met with no interruption when profecuting their lawful bufinefs, either by night or day, and were treated with every mark of attention and refpect. While the progrefs of the British army, in a circuitous march of 1100 miles from Charleston to Yorktown, was marked with rapine and defolation; the march of the French troops from Rhode-Island to the fame place, a diftance nearly equal in a right line, was productive of no inconvenience to the intermediate inhabitants. They were welcome guests wherever they came, for they took nothing by fraud or force, but punctually paid for all they wanted with hard money. In a contest where the good will of the people had fo powerful an influence on its final iffue, fuch opposite modes of conduct could not fail of producing their natural effects. The moderation and justice of the French, met with its reward in the general good will of the people, but the violence and rapine of the British, contributed among other things, to work the final overthrow of all their fchemes in America.

On the last day of this year Henry Laurens was releas-Dec. 31. ed from his long confinement in the tower of London. He had been committed there, as already related, on the 6th of October 1780, " On fuspicion of high treason," after being examined in the prefence of lord Stormont, lord George Germaine, lord Hillfborough, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Juffice Addington, and others. The commitment was accompanied with a warrant to the Lieutenant nant of the tower to receive and confine him. Their 1781. lordships orders were " To confine him a close prifoner; to be locked up every night; to be in the cuftody of two warders; not to fuffer him to be out of their fight one moment, day nor night;' to allow him no liberty of fpeaking to any perfon, nor to permit any perfon to fpeak to him; to deprive him of the use of pen and ink; to fuffer no letter to be brought to him, nor any to go from him." Mr. Laurens was then fifty five years old, and feverely afflicted with the gout and other infirmities In this fituation he was conducted to apartments in the tower, and was thut up in two fmall rooms which together made about twenty feet square, with a warder for his conftant companion, and a fixed bayonet under his window, without any friend to converfe, with and without any profpect or even the means of correspondence. Being debarred the use of pen and ink, he procured pencils, which proved an useful substitute. After a month's confinement, he was permitted to walk out on limited ground, but a warder with a fword in his hand followed clofe behind. This indulgence was occasionally taken for about three weeks, when lord George Gordon, who was alfo a prifoner in the tower, unluckily met and afked Mr. Laurens to walk with him. Mr. Laurens declined the offer and inftantly returned to his apartment. Governor Gore caught at this tranfgreffion of orders, and locked him up for 37 days, though the attending warder exculpated him from all blame. At the end of that time the Governor relented fo far, as to permit his prifoner to walk on the parade before the door, but this honor, as coming from him, was refused. General Vernon, on hearing of what had paffed, gave orders that Mr. Laurens should be permitted to walk out, and this exercise was in consequence thereof refumed, after an intermission of two months and a half.

About this time an old friend and mercantile correfpondent, having folicited the Secretaries of State for Mr. Feb. 26. Laurens' enlargement on parole, and having offered his whole fortune as fecurity for his good conduct, fent him the following meffage: "Their lordthips fay, if you will point point out any thing for the benefit of Great Britain, in 1781. the prefent difpute with the Colonies, you shall be enlarged." This proposition filled him with indignation, and provoked a fharp reply, part of which was in the following words: " I perceive from the meffage you fent me, that if I were a rafcal I might prefently get out of the tower, but I am not. You have pledged your word and fortune for my integrity. I will never difhonour you nor myfelf. I can forefee what will come to pafs, happen to me what may. I fear no poffible confequences."

Mar. 7.

The fame friend foon after visited Mr. Laurens, and being left alone with him, addreffed him as follows, " I converse with you this morning, not particularly as your friend, but as the friend of Great Britain. I have certain propositions to make, for obtaining your liberty, which I advife you should take time to confider." Mr. Laurens defired to know what they were, and added " That an honeft man required no time to give an anfwer, in a cafe where his honor was concerned;" If," faid he, " the Secretaries of State will enlarge me upon parole, I will firicily conform to my engagement to do nothing directly or indirectly to the hurt of this kingdom. I will return to America, or remain in any part of England which may be affigned, and furrender myfelf when demanded." It was anfwered " No, Sir, you muft ftay in London among your friends: 'The ministers will often have occasion to fend for and confult you: You can write two or three lines to the ministers, and barely fay you are forry for what is paft: A pardon will be granted: Every man has been wrong, at fome time or other of his life, and should not be ashamed to acknowledge it." Mr Laurens replied " I will never fubscribe to my own infamy, and to the diffionour of my children." He was then told of long and painful confinement, and hints were thrown out of the possible confequences of his refusal: To which he replied "I am, afraid of no confequences but fuch as would flow from difhonourable acts."

Mar. 14 In about a week after this interview, Major General James Grant, who had long been acquainted with Mr. Laurens

AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Laurens, and had ferved with him near twenty years before, on an expedition againft the Cherokee Indians, vifited him in the tower, and talked much of the inconveniences of his fituation, and then addreffed him thus, "Colonel Laurens, I have brought paper and pencil to take down any propofitions you have to make to administration, and I will deliver them myfelf." Mr Laurens replied, "I have pencil and paper, but not one propofition, beyond repeating a requeft to be enlarged on parole. I had well weighed what confequences might follow before I entered into the prefent difpute. I took the path of juffice and honour, and no perfonal evils can caufe me to thrink."

About this time Lieutenant Colonel John Laurens, the eldeft fon of Henry Laurens arrived in France, as the fpecial minister of Congress. The father was requested to write to the fon to withdraw himself from the court of France, and affurances were given that it would operate in his favour. To these requests he replied, "my for is of age, and has a will of his own; if I should write to 'him in the terms you request, it would have no effect: He would only conclude, that confinement and perfuasion had fostened me. I know him to be a man of honour: He loves me dearly, and would lay down his life to fave mine; but I am fure he would not facrifice his honour to fave my life, and I applaud him."

Mr. Laurens penciled an addrefs to the fecretaries of June 29. State for the ufe of pen and ink, to draw a bill of exchange on a merchant in London who was in his debt, for money to anfwer his immediate exigencies, and to requeft that his youngeft fon might be permitted to vifit him, for the purpose of concerting a plan for his farther, education and conduct in life. This was delivered to their lordthips; but they, though they had made no provision for the fupport of their prisoner, returned no answer. Mr. Laurens was thus left to languish in confinement under many infirmities, and without the means of applying his own refources on the spot, for his immediate fupport.

As

As foon as Mr. Laurens had completed a year in the m tower, he was called upon to pay £ 9 7/10. fterling to the two warders for attending on him. To which he replied, "I was fent to the tower by the fecretaries of State without money (for aught they knew) -- their lord thips have never fupplied me with any thing --- It is now upwards of three months fince I informed their lordfhips that the fund I had hitherto fublifted upon was nearly exhaufted; and prayed for leave to draw a bill on Mr. John Nutt, who was in my debt, which they have been pleafed to refuse by the most grating of all denials a total filence. and now a demand is made for £97/10. If their lordthips will permit me to draw for money where it is due to me, I will continue to pay my own expences, but I will not pay the warders whom I never employed, and whofe attendance I fhall be glad to difpenfe with".

> Three weeks after, the fecretaries of State confented that Mr. Laurens should have the use of pen and ink, for the purpose of drawing a bill of exchange, but they were taken away the moment that bufinefs was done.

> About this time Henry Laurens jun. wrote an humble request to lord Hillsborough for permission to fee his father, which his lordfhip refufed to grant. He had at first been permitted to visit his father, and converse with him for a fhort time; but these interviews were no longer permitted. They neverthelefs occasionally met on the lines and faluted each other, but durft not exchange a fingle word, left it might occasion a fecond confinement, fimilar to that to which lord George Gordon had been acceflary.

> As the year 1781 drew near a clofe, Mr. Laurens' fufferings in the tower became generally known, and excited compation in his favour, and odium against the authors of his confinement. It had been alfo found by the inefficacy of many attempts, that no conceffions could be ob-It was therefore refolved to releafe tained from him. him, but difficulties arofe about the mode. Mr. Laurens would not confent to any act, which implied that he was a British fubject, and he had been committed as fuch, on charge of high treafon. Ministers to extricate themfelves from from this difficulty, at length proposed to take bail for his appearance at the court of King's-Bench. When the words of the recognizance, " Our Sovereign Lord the King," were read to Mr. Laurens, he replied in open court "Not my Sovereign," and with this declaration he, with Mr. Ofwald and Mr. Anderfon as his fecurities, entered into an obligation for his appearance at the court of King's-Bench the next Eafter term, and for not departing thence without leave of the court. Thus ended a long and a painful farce. Mr. Laurens was immediately releafed. When the time of his appearance at court drew near, he was not only difcharged from all obligations to attend, but was requested by lord Shelburne to go to the continent, in fubferviency to a fcheme for making peace with America. Mr. Laurens, ftartled at the idea of being releafed without any equivalent, as he had uniformly held himfelf to be a prisoner of war, replied that "He durst not accept himself as a gift, and that as Congress had once offered Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne for him, he had no doubt of their now giving Lieut. Gen. Earl Cornwallis for the fame purpofe."

APPENDIX, No. III.

Of the treatment of prisoners, and of the distresses of the Inhabitants.

A NY circumftances concurred to make the American war particularly calamitous. It was originally a civil war in the effimation of both parties, and a rebellion to its termination, in the opinion of one of them. Unfortunately for mankind doubts have been entertained of the obligatory force of the taw of nations in fuch cafes. The refinement of modern ages has ftripped war of half its horrors, but the fyftems of fome illiberal men have tended to re-produce the barbarifm of Gothic times, by withholding the benefits of that refinement from those who are effecting revolutions. An enlightened philanthropift embraces the whole human race and en-Vot. II, N n quires 281

quires, not whether an object of diffrets is or is not an unit of an acknowledged nation. It is fufficient that he is a child of the fame common parent, and capable of happinefs or mifery. The prevalence of fuch a temper would have greatly leffened the calamities of the American war, but while from contracted policy, unfortunate captives were confidered as not entitled to the treatment of prifoners, they were often doomed without being guilty, to fuffer the punifhment due to criminals.

The first American prifoners were taken on the 17th of June 1775. Thefe were thrown indifcriminately into the jail at Boston, without any confideration of their rank. Aug 11. Gen. Wathington wrote to Gen. Gage on this subject, 1775. to which the latter answered by afferting that the prifoners had been treated with care and kindness, though indifcriminately "as he acknowledged no rank that was not derived from the King." To which Gen. Washington replied "You affect, Sir, to despise all rank not derived from the fame fource with your own; I cannot concelve one more honorable, than that which flows from the uncorrupted choice of a brave and free people, the pureft fource and original fountain of all power."

Gen. Carleton during his command conducted towards the American prifoners with a degree of humanity, that reflected the greateft honor on his character. Before he commenced his operations on the lakes in 1776, he fhipped off thofe of them who were officers for New-England, but previoufly fupplied them with every thing requifite to make their voyage comfortable. The other prifoners, amounting to 800, were fent home by a flag after exacting an oath from them, not to ferve during the war unlefs exchanged. Many of thefe being almoft naked were comfortably cloathed by his orders, previoufly to their being fent off.

The capture of Gen. Lee proved calamitous to feveral individuals. Six Heffian field officers were offered in exchange for him, but this was refufed. It was faid by the Britifh, that Lee was a deferter from their fervice, and as fuch could not expect the indulgences ufually given to prifoners of war. The Americans replied, that as he

he had refigned his British commission previously to his accepting one from the Americans, he could not be confidered as a deferter. He was nevertheless confined, watched, and guarded. Congress thereupon refolved. that Gen. Washington be directed to inform Gen. Howe, that fhould the proffered exchange of Gen. Lee for fix field officers not be accepted, and the treatment of him as above mentioned be continued, the principles of retaliation should occasion five of the faid Hessian field officers, together with Lt. Col. Archibald Campbell to be detained, in order that the faid treatment which Gen. Lee received, should be exactly inflicted on their perfons." The Campbell thus defignated as the fubject of retaliation, was a humane man, and a meritorious officer, who had been captured by fome of the Maffachufett's privateers near Boston, to which, from the want of information, he was proceeding foon after the British had evacuated it. The above act of Congress was forwarded to Maffachusetts with a request that they would detain Lt. Col. Campbell and keep him in fafe cuftody till the further order of Congress. The council of Maffachusett's exceeded this requeft, and fent him to Concord jail, where he was lodged in a gloomy dungeon of twelve or thirteen feet fquare. The attendance of a fingle fervant on his perfon was denied him, and every visit from a friend refused.

The prifoners captured by Sir William Howe in 1776, amounted to many hundreds. The officers were admitted to parole, and had fome wafte houfes affigned to them as quarters; but the privates were fhut up in the coldeft feason of the year in churches, fugar houses, and fuch like large open buildings. The feverity of the weather, and the rigor of their treatment, occasioned the death of many hundreds of these unfortunate men. The filth of the places of their confinement, in confequence of fluxes which prevailed among them, was both offenfive and dangerous. Seven dead bodies have been feen in one building, at one time, and all lying in a fituation flocking to humanity. The provisions ferved out to them were deficient in quantity, and of an unwholfome quality. Thefe fuffering prisoners were generally 283

1781. generally preffed to enter into the British fervice, but - hundreds fubmitted to death, rather than procure a melioration of their circumftances by enlifting with the enemies of their country. After Gen. Washington's fucceffes at Trenton and Princeton, the American prifoners fared fomewhat better. Those who furvived were or. dered to be fent out for exchange, but fome of them fell down dead in the ftreets, while attempting to walk to the veffels. Others were fo emaciated that their appearance was horrible. A fpecdy death clofed the fcene with many.

Dec. I.

The American board of war, after conferring with Mr. Boudinot the commiffary-general of prifoners, and 1777examining evidences produced by him, reported among other things, " That there were 900 privates and 300. officers of the American army, prifoners in the city of New-York, and about 500 privates and 50 officers prifoners in Philadelphia. That fince the beginning of October all thefe prifoners, both officers and privates, had been confined in prifon fhips or the Provost: That from the best evidence the fubject could admit of, the general allowance of prifoners, at most did not exceed four ounces of meat per day, and often fo damaged as not to be eatable: That it had been a common practice with the British, on a prisoner's being first captured, to keep him three, four or five days without a morfel of meat, and then to tempt him to enlift to fave his life: That there were numerous inftances of prifoners of war, perifhing in all the agonies of hunger."

Dec.24.

About this time there was a meeting of merchants in 1777. London, for the purpole of railing a fum of money to relieve the diftreffes of the American prisoners, thea in England. The fum fubfcribed for that purpofe amounted in two months to £4647 155. Thus while human nature was difhonoured by the cruelties of fome of the British in America, there was a laudable display of the benevolence of others of the fame nation in Europe. The American failors, when captured by the British, fuffered more than even the foldiers, which fell into their hands. The former were confined on board prifon thips. They

They were there crouded together in fuch numbers, and their accommodations were fo wretched, that difeafes broke out and fwept them off in a manner, that was fufficient to excite compaffion in breafts of the least fenfibility. It has been afferted, on as good evidence as the cafe will admit, that in the laft fix years of the war upwards of eleven thousand perfons died on board the Jerfey, one of thefe prifon fhips, which was stationed in east river near New-York. On many of thefe, the rights of fepulture were never, or but very imperfectly conferred. For fome time after the war was ended, their bones lay whitening in the fun, on the states of Long-Island.

The operations of treafon laws added to the calamities of the war. Individuals on both fides, while they were doing no more than they fuppofed to be their duty, were involved in the penal confequences of capital crimes. The Americans in conformity to the ufual policy of nations, demanded the allegiance of all who relided among them, but feveral of these preferred the late royal government and were difpofed, when opportunity offered, to fupport it. While they acted in conformity to thefe fentiments, the laws enacted for the fecurity of the new government, condemned them to death. Hard is the lot of a people involved in civil war; for in fuch circumstances the lives of individuals may not only be legally forfeited, but justly taken from those, who have acted folely from a fense of duty. It is to be wished that some more rational mode than war might be adopted for deciding national contentions; but of all wars, those which are called civil are most to be dreaded. They are attended with the bitterest refentments, and produce the greatest quantity of human woes. In the American war, the diftreffes of the country were aggravated, from the circumftance that every man was obliged, fome way or other, to be in the public fervice. In Europe, where military operations are carried on by armies hired and paid for the purpole, the common people partake but little of the calamities of war: but in America, where the whole people were enrolled as a militia, and where both fides endeavoured to firengthen themfelves by oaths and by by laws, denouncing the penalties of treafon on those who aided or abetted the opposite party, the fufferings of individuals were renewed, as often as fortune varied her ftandard. Each fide claimed the co-operation of the inhabitants, and was ready to punish when it was withheld. Where either party had a decided fuperiority the common people were comparatively undisturbed; but the intermediate space between the contending armies, was subject to the alternate ravages of both.

In the first institution of the American governments, the boundaries of authority were not properly fixed. Committees exercifed legiflative, executive and judicial powers. It is not to be doubted, that in many inftances thefe were improperly ufed, and that private refentments were often covered under the fpecious veil of patriotifm. The fufferers in paffing over to the royalifts, carried with them a keen remembrance of the vengeance of committees, and when opportunity prefented, were tempted to retaliate. From the nature of the cafe, the original offenders were lefs frequently the objects of retaliation, than those who were entirely innocent. One instance of feverity begat another, and they continued to encreafe in a proportion that doubled the evils of common war. From one unadvised step, individuals were often involved in the lofs of all their property. Some from prefent appearances, apprehending that the British would finally conquer, repaired to their ftandard. Their return after the partial form which intimidated them to fubmiffion, had blown over, was always difficult and often impoffible. From this fingle error in judgement, fuch were often obliged to feek fafety by continuing to fupport the interest of those to whom, in an hour of temptation, they had devoted themfelves. The embarraffments on both fides were often fo great, that many in the humbler walks of life, could not tell what courfe was best to purfue. It was happy for those who having made up their minds on the nature of the contest, invariably followed the dictates of their confciences, for in every inftance they enjoyed felf-approbation. Though they could not be deprived of this reward, they were not always fuccefsful in faving their

their property. They who varied with the times, in like 1781. manner often miffed their object, for to fuch it frequently happened that they were plundered by both, and loft the efteem of all. A few faved their credit and their property; but of these, there was not one for every hundred of those, who were materially injured either in the one or the other. The American whigs were exasperated against those of their fellow citizens who joined their enemies. with a refentment which was far more bitter, than that which they harboured against their European adversaries. Feeling that the whole ftrength of the ftates was fcarcely fufficient to protect them against the British, they could not brook the defertion of their countrymen to invading foreigners. They feldom would give them credit for acting from principle, but generally fuppofed them to be influenced either by cowardice or interest, and were therefore inclined to proceed against them with rigor. They were filled with indignation at the idea of fighting for the property of fuch as had deferted their country, and were therefore clamorous, that it should be feized for public fervice. The royalists raifed the cry of perfecution and loudly complained that merely for fupporting the government, under which they were born, and to which they owed a natural allegiance, they were doomed to fuffer all the penalties due to capital offenders. Those of them who acted from principle felt no confciousness of guilt, and could not look but with abhorrence upon a government, which inflicted fuch fevere punishments on what they deemed a laudable line of conduct. Humanity would shudder at a particular recital of the calamities which the whigs inflicted on the tories, and the tories on the whigs. It is particularly remarkable that on both fides, they for the most part confoled themselves with the belief, that they were acting or fuffering in a good caufe. Though the rules of moral right and wrong never vary, political innocence and guilt, changes fo much with circumftances, that the innocence of the fufferer, and of the party that punifhes, are often compatible. The diffreffes of the American prisoners in the fouthern states, prevailed particularly towards the close of the war. Colonel Campbell

Campbell, who reduced Savannah, though he had perfonally fuffered from the Americans, treated all who fell into his hands with humanity. Those who were taken at Savannah and at Ashe's defeat, fuffered very much from his fucceffors in South-Carolina. The American prisoners with a few exceptions, had but little to complain of till after Gates' defeat. Soon after that event, fundry of them, though entitled to the benefits of the capitulation of Charleston, were separated from their families and fent into exile; others in violation of the fame folemn agreement were crouded into prifon fhips, and deprived of the use of their property. When a general exchange of prifoners was effected, the wives and children of those inhabitants who adhered to the Americans, were exiled from their homes to Virginia and Philadelphia. Upwards of one thousand perfons were thrown upon the charity of their fellow citizens in the more northern flates. This fevere treatment was the occasion of retaliating on the families of those who had taken part with the British. In the first months of the year 1781, the British were in force in the remotest settlements of South-Carolina, but as their limits were contracted in the course of the year, the male inhabitants who joined them, thought proper to retire with the royal army towards the capital. In retaliation for the expulsion of the wives and children of the whig Americans from the flate, Governor Rutledge ordered the brigadiers of militia, to fend within the British lines, the families of fuch of the inhabitants as adhered to their intereft. In confequence of this order, and more especially in confequence of the one which occasioned it, feveral hundreds of helplefs women and children were reduced to great diffrefs.

The refugees who had fled to New-York, were formed into an affociation under Sir Henry Clinton, for the purpofes of retaliating on the Americans, and for reimburfing the loffes they had fuftained from their countrymen. The depredations they committed in their feveral excursions would fill a volume, and would answer little purpofe but to excite compassion and horror. Towards the close of the war, they began to retaliate on a bolder feale fcale. Captain Joshua Huddy who commanded a small 178 i. party of Americans at a block houfe, in Monmouth County New-Jerfey was, after a gallant refistance, taken prisoner by a party of these refugees. He was brought to New-York and there kept in clofe cuftody fifteen days, and then told "that he was ordered to be hanged." Four days after, he was fent out with a party of refugees, and hanged on the highths of Middleton. The following label was affixed to his breaft "We the refugees having long with grief beheld the cruel murders of our brethren, and finding nothing but fuch measures daily carrying into execution; we therefore determine not to fuffer without taking vengeance for the númerous cruelties, and thus begin, and have made use of Capt. Huddy as the first object to prefent to your view, and further determine to hang man for man. while there is a refugee existing: Up goes Huddy for Philip White." The Philip White in retaliation for whom Huddy was hanged, had been taken by a party of the Jerfey militia, and was killed in attempting to make his efcape.

. Gen. Washington resolved on retaliation for this deliberate murder, but instead of immediately executing a British officer he wrote to Sir Henry Clinton, that unless the murderers of Huddy were given up, he should be under the necessity of retaliating. The former being refused, Capt. Afgill was defignated by lot for that purpose. In the mean time the Britith inftituted a court martial for the trial of Capt. Lippencutt, who was fuppofed to be the principal agent, in executing Capt. Huddy. It appeared in the course of this trial that Gov. Franklin, the Prefident of the board of affociated loyalists, gave Lippencutt verbal orders for what he did, and that he had been defignated as a proper fubject for retaliation, having been, as the refugees flated, a perfecutor of the loyalifts, and particularly as having been inftrumental in hanging Stephen Edwards, who had been one of that defcription. The court having confidered the whole matter gave their opinion " That as what Lippencutt did was not the effect of malice or ill will, but proceed-" ed from a conviction that it was his duty to obey the or-Vot. ders of the board of directors of affociated loyalifts, and 1781. as he did not doubt their having full authority to give fuch orders, he was not guilty of the murder laid to his charge, and therefore they acquitted him." Sir Guy Carleton, who a little before this time had been appointed commander in chief of the British army, in a letter to Gen. Washington, accompanying the tryal of Lippencutt, declared "that notwithstanding the acquittal of Lippencutt, he reprobated the measure, and gave affurances of profecuting a farther enquiry." Sir Guy Carleton about the fame time, broke up the board of affociated lovalifts. which prevented a repetition of fimilar exceffes. The war alfo drawing near a clofe, the motives for retaliation as tending to prevent other murders, in a great measure ceased. In the mean time Gen. Washington received a letter from the Count de Vergenes interceding for Capt. Afgill, which was alfo accompanied with a very pathetic Nov. 7. one, from his mother Mrs. Afgill to the Count. Copies of these feveral letters were forwarded to Congress, and 1782. foon after they refolved, "that the commander in chief be directed to fet Capt. A fgill at liberty." The lovers of humanity rejoiced that the neceffity for retaliation was fuperfeded, by the known humanity of the new commander in chief, and still more by the well founded prospect of a fpeedy peace. Afgill who had received every indulgence, and who had been treated with all poffible politenefs, was releafed and permitted to go into New-York.

Campaign of 1782. Foreign events and negotiations. Peace 1782.

FTER the capture of lord Cornwallis, General Washington, with the greatest part of his force returned to the vicinity of New-York. He was in no condition to attempt the reduction of that post, and the royal army had good reasons for not urging hostilities without their lines: An obstruction of the communication between town and country, fome indecisive skirmistes and and prædatory excursions, were the principal evidences of 1782. an exifting state of war. This in a great measure was alfo the cafe in South-Carolina. From December 1781, General Greene had poffetfion of all the ftate except Charlefton and the vicinity. The British fometimes fallied out of their lines for the acquisition of property and provisions, but never for the purpofes of con- Aug 27. queft. In oppofing one of these near Combahee Lieu-1782. tenant Colonel John Laurens, an accomplished officer of uncommon merit, was mortally wounded. ' Nature had adorned him with a large proportion of her choicest gifts, and these were highly cultivatedby an elegant, useful and practical education. Hispatri otifm was of the most ardent kind. The moment he was of age, he broke off from the amufements of London, and on his arrival in America, inftantly joined the army. Wherever the war raged most, there was he to be found. A dauntless bravery was the least of his virtues, and an excefs of it his greatest foible. His various talents fitted him to fhine in courts or camps, or popular affemblies. He had a heart to conceive, a head to contrive, a tongue to perfuade, and a hand to execute fchemes of the most extensive utility to his country, or rather to mankind, for his enlarged philanthropy knowing no bounds, embraced the whole human race. This excellent young man, who was the pride of his country, the idol of the army, and an ornament of human nature, loft his life in the 27th year of his age, in an unimportant fkirmish with a foraging party, in the very last moments of the war.

At the commencement of the year 1782, the Britifh had more extensive range in Georgia, than in any other of the United States, but of this they were foon abridged. From the unfuccefsful iffue of the affault on Savannah in 1779, that State had eminently fuffered the defolations of war. Political hatred raged to fuch a degree that the blood of its citizens was daily fhed by the hands of each other, contending under the names of whigs and tories. A few of the friends of the revolution kept together in the weftern fettlements, and exercifed the powers of independent government. The whole extent 291

1782. extent between thefe and the capital, was fubject to the alternate ravages of both parties. After the furrender of lord Cornwallis, General Greene being reinforced by the Pennfylvania line, was enabled to detach General Wayne with a part of the fouthern army to Georgia. General Clarke who commanded in Savannah, on hearing of their advance, fent orders to his officers in the out pofts, to burn as far as they could, all the provitions in the country, and then to retire within the lines at the capital. The country being evacuated by the Britifh, the Governor came with his council from Augusta to Ebenezer, and re-eftablished government in the vicinity of May 21. the fea coaft.

May 21. the fea co 1782. Colonie

Colonel Brown at the head of a confiderable force marched out of the garrifon of Savannah, with the apparent intention of attacking the Americans. General Wayne by a bold manœuvre got in his rear, attacked him at 12 o'clock at night, and couted his whole party. A large number of Creek Indians, headed by a number of their chiefs and a British officer, made a furious attack on Wayne's infantry in the night. For a few minutes they poffeffed themfelves of his field pieces, but they were foon recovered. In the mean time Colonel White with a party of the cavalry came up, and preffed hard upon them. Both fides engaged in close quarters. The Indians difplayed uncommon bravery, but were at length completely routed. Shortly after this affair, a period was put to the calamities of war, in that ravaged flate. In about three months after the capture of lord Cornwallis was known in Great-Britain, the parliament refolved to abandon all offenfive operations in America. In confequence thereof, every idea of conquest being given up, arrrangements were made for withdrawipg the royal forces from Georgia and South-Carolina. Peace was reftored to Georgia, after it had been upwards of three years in poffeilion of the British, and had been ravaged nearly from one extreme to the other. It is computed that the flate loft by the war, one thousand of its citizens, befides four thousand flaves. In about five months after the British left Georgia,

they in like manner withdrew their force, from South-Carolina. The inhabitants of Charleston, who had remained therein, while it was possefield by the British, felt themfelves happy in being delivered from the feverities of a parrifon life. The exiled citizens collected from all quarters and took poficifion of their effates. Thus in less than three years from the landing of the British in South-Carolina, they withdrew all their forces from it. In that time the citizens had fuffered an accumulation of evils. There was fcarcely an inhabitant however obfcure in character, or remote in fituation, whether he remained firm to one party or changed with the times, who did not partake of the general diffress.

In modern Europe the revolutions of public affairs feldom difturb the humble obscurity of private life, but the American revolution involved the interest of every family, and deeply affected the fortunes and happiness of almost every individual in the United States. South-Carolina loft a great number of its citizens, and upwards of 20,000 of its flaves. Property was sported with by both parties. Besides those who fell in battle or died of difeafes brought on by the war, many were inhumanly murdered by private affaffinations. The country abounded with widows and orphans. The feverities of a military life co-operating with the climate, deftroyed the healths and lives of many hundreds of the invading army. Excepting those who enriched themselves by plunder, and a few fuccessful speculators, no private advantage was gained by individuals on either fide, but an experimental conviction of the folly and madnefs of war.

Though in the year 1782 the United States afforded few great events, the reverfe was the cafe with the other powers involved in the confequences of the American war.

Minorca after a tedious fiege furrendered to the Duke Feb. 5. de Crillon in the fervice of his most Catholic Majesty. About the fame time the fettlements of Demarara and Effequibo, which in the preceding year had been taken by the British, were taken from them by the French. The gallant Marquis de Bouille added to the fplendor of his former fame by reducing St. Eustatia and St. Kitts, the former

at the close of the year 1781, and the latter early in the 1782. year 1782. The iflands of Nevis and Monferrat follow-~~ ed the fortune of St. Kitts. The French at this period. feemed to be established in the West-Indies, on a firm foundation. Their islands were full of excellent troops, and their marine force was truly respectable. The exertions of Spain were alfo uncommonly great. The ftrength of these two monarchies had never before been to confpicuoufly difplayed, in that quarter of the globe. Their combined navies amounted to threefcore fhips of the line, and thefe were attended with a prodigious multitude of frigates and armed veffels. With this immenfe force they entertained hopes of wrefting from his Britannic Majesty a great part of his West-India islands.

In the mean time, the British ministry prepared aftrong squadron, for the protection of their possessions in that quarter. This was commanded by Admiral Rodney and amounted, after a junction with Sir Samuel Hood's squadron, and the arrival of three ships from Great Britain, to 36 fail of the line.

It was the defign of Count de Graffe, who commanded the French flect at Martinque amounting to 34 fail of the line, to proceed to Hifpaniola and join the Spanifh Admiral Don Solano, who with fixteen fhips of the line and a confiderable land force was waiting for his arrival, and to make in concert with him an attack on Jamaica.

The British admiral wished to prevent this junction, or at least to force an engagement before it was effected.

Apr. 8. Admiral Rodney came up with Count de Graffe, foon after he had fet out to join the Spanish fleet at Hispaniola. Partial engagements took place on the three first days, after they came near to each other. In these, two of the French ships were fo badly damaged, that they were

Apr 12. obliged to quit the fleet. On the next day a general engagement took place: This began at feven in the morning, and continued till paft fix in the evening. There was no apparent fuperiority on either fide till between twelve and one o'clock, when Admiral Rodney broke the French line of battle, by bearing down upon their centre, and penetrating through it. The land forces, deftined for 1712. the expedition against Jamaica, amounting to 5500 men, were distributed on board the French fleet. Their ships were therefore fo crouded, that the flaughter on board was prodigious. The battle was fought on both fides with equal fpirit, but with a very unequal iffue. The French for near a century, had not in any naval engagement been fo completely worfted. Their fleet was little lefs than ruined. Upwards of 400 men were killed on board one of their ships, and the whole number of their killed and wounded amounted to feveral thoufands, while the lofs of the British did not much exceed 1100 men. The French loft in this action, and the fubfequent pursuit, eight ships of the line. On board the captured fhips, was the whole train of artillery, with the battering cannon and travelling carriages, intended for the expedition against Jamaica. One of them was the Ville de Paris, fo called from the city of Paris, having built her at its own expence, and made a prefent of her to the King. She had coft four millions of livres, and was efteemed the most magnificent ship in France; she carried 110 guns and had on board 1300 men. This was truly an unfortunate day to Count de Graffe. Though his behaviour throughout the whole action was firm and intrepid, and his refiftance continued till he and two more were the only men left flanding upon the upper deck, he was at last obliged to strike. It was no fmall addition to his misfortunes that he was on the point of forming a junction, which would have fet him above all danger. Had this taken place, the whole British naval power in the West-Indies, on principles of ordinary calculation, would have been infufficient to have prevented him from carrying into effect, schemes of the most extensive confequence.

The fhips of the defeated fleet fled in a variety of directions. Twenty three or twenty four fail made the beft of their way to Cape François. This was all that remained in a body of that fleet, which was lately fo formidable. By this fignal victory, the defigns of France and Spain were frustrated. No farther enterprifes were undertaken

1782. undertaken against the fleets or possessions of Great Bris tain in the West-Indies, and fuch measures only were embraced, as seemed requisite for the purposes of fafety. When the news of Admiral Rodney's victory reached Great Britain, a general joy was diffused over the nation: Before there had been much despondency. Their loss in the Chefapeak and in the Weft-Indies, together with the increasing number of their enemies, had depreffed the fpirits of the great body of the people; but the advantages gained on the 12th of April, placed them on high ground, either for ending or profecuting the war. It was fortunate for the Americans, that this fuccels of the British was posterior to their loss in Virginia. It fo elevated the fpirits of Britain, and fo depreffed the hopes of France, that had it taken place prior to the furrender of lord Cornwallis, that event would have been lefs influential in difposing the nation to peace. As the catastrophe of York-Town clofed the national war in North-America; fo the defeat of de Graffe, in a great meafure, put a period to hostilities in the West-Indies.

> Other decifive events foon followed, which difpofed another of the belligerent powers to a pacification. Gibraltar though fucceffively relieved, ftill continued to be The reduction of Minorca infpired the Spabefieged. nith nation with fresh motives to perseverance. The Duke de Crillon, who had been recently fuccefsful in the fiege of Minorca, was appointed to conduct the fiege of Gibraltar, and it was refolved to employ the whole ftrength of the Spanish monarchy in seconding his operations. No means were neglected, nor expence spared, that promifed to forward the views of the befiegers. From the failure of all plans, hitherto adopted for effecting the reduction of Gibraltar, it was refolved to adopt new ones. Among the various projects for this purpofe, one which had been formed by the Chevalier D'Arcon, was deemed the most worthy of trial. This was to construct fuch floating batteries as could neither be funk nor fired. With this view their bottoms were made of the thickeft timber, and their fides of wood and cork long foaked in water, with a large layer of wet fand between,

To prevent the effects of red hot balls, a number of pipes were contrived to carry water through every part of them, and pumps were provided to keep these conftantly supplied with water. The people on board were to be sheltered from the sall of bombs by a cover of rope netting, which was made sloping and overlaid with wet hides.

These floating batteries, ten in number, were made out of the hulls of large veffels, cut down for the purpose, and carried from 28 to ten guns each, and were seconded by 80 large boats mounted with guns of heavy metal, and also by a multitude of frigates, ships of force, and fome hundreds of small craft.

General Elliott the intrepid defender of Gibraltar, was not ignorant that inventions of a peculiar kind were prepared against him, but knew nothing of their conftruction. He neverthelefs provided for every circumftance of danger that could be forefeen or imagined. The 13th day of Sept. was fixed upon by the befiegers for making a grand attack, when the new invented machines, with all the united powers of gunpowder and artillery in their higheft ftate of improvement, were to be called into action. The combined fleets of France and Spain in the bay of Gibraltar amounted to 48 fail of the line, Their batteries were covered with 154 pieces of heavy brafs The numbers employed by land and fea against cannon. the fortrefs were estimated at one hundred thousand men. With this force and by the fire of 300 cannon, mortars. and howitzers, from the adjacent ifthmus, it was intend ed to attack every part of the British works at one and, the fame inftant. The furrounding hills were covered with people affembled to behold the fpectacle. The canonade and bombardment was tremendous. The showers of fhot and shells from the land batteries, and the ships of the befiegers, and from the various works of the garrifon. exhibited a most dreadful scene. Four hundred pieces of the heaviest artillery were playing at the fame moment. The whole Peninfula feemed to be overwhelmed in the torrents of fire, which were inceffantly poured upon it. The Spanish floating batteries for fome time answered Vol. II. P p the the expectations of their framers. The heaviest shells 1782. often rebounded from their tops, while thirty two pound fhot, made no visible impression upon their hulls. For fome hours, the attack and defence were fo equally fupported, as fcarcely to admit any appearance of fuperiority on either fide. The conftruction of the battering fhips was fo well calculated, for withftanding the combined force of fire and artillery, that they feemed for fome time to bid defiance to the powers of the heaviest ordnance. In the afternoon the effects of hot fhot became visible. At first there was only an appearance of fmoke, but in the courfe of the night, after the fire of the garrifon had continued about 15 hours, two of the floating batteries were in flames, and feveral more were vifibly beginning to kindle. The endeavors of the befiegers were now exclufively directed to bring off the men from the burning veffels, but in this they were interrupted. Captain Curtis who lay ready with 12 gun boats, advanced and fired upon them with fuch order and expedition, as to throw them into confusion before they had finished their business. They fled with their boats, and abandoned to their fate great numbers of their people. The opening of day light difclosed a most dreadful spectacle. Many were feen in the midft of the flames crying out for help, while others were floating upon pieces of timber, exposed to equal danger from the oppofite element. The generous humanity of the victors equalled their valor, and was the more honorable, as the exertions of it exposed them to no lefs danger than those of active hostility. In endeavoring to fave the lives of his enemies, Capt: Curtis nearly loft his own. While for the most benevolent purpose, he was along fide the floating batteries one of them blew up, and fome heavy pieces of timber fell into his boat, and pierced through its bottom. By fimilar perilous exertions, near 400 men were faved from inevitable deftruction. The exercise of humanity to an eneny, under fuch circumstances of immediate action, and impending danger, conferred more true honor than could be acquired by the most splehdid feries of victories. It in some degree obscured the impression made to the difadvantage

of human nature, by the madness of mankind in destroying each other by wasteful wars. The floating batteries were all confumed. The violence of their explosion was fuch, as to burft open doors, and windows at a great diftance. Soon after the destruction of the floating batteries, lord Howe with 35 thips of the line, brought to the brave garrifon an ample fupply of every thing wanted, either for their fupport or their defence. This complete relief of Gibraltar, was the third decifive event in the courfe of a twelve month, which favoured the re-eftablishment of a general peace.

The capture of the British army in Virginia---the defeat of Count de Graffe, and the destruction of the Spanish floating batteries, inculcated on Great Britain, France and Spain, the policy of fheathing the fword, and ftopping the effusion of human blood. Each nation found on a review of past events, that though their loss were great, their gains were little or nothing. By urging the American war, Great Britain had encreafed her national debt one hundred millions of pounds sterling, and wasted the lives of at least 50,000 of her fubjects. To add to her mortification the had brought all this on herfelf, by pursuing an object the attainment of which feemed to be daily lefs probable, and the benefits of which, even though it could have been attained; were very problematical. While Great Britain, France and Spain were fucceflively brought to think favourably of peace, the United States of America had the confolation of a public acknowledgment of their independence, by a fecond power of Europe. This was effected in a great measure by the address of John Adams. On the capture of Jan. 1, Henry Laurens, he had been commissioned to be the minister plenipotentiary of Congress, to the States General of the United Provinces, and was alfo empowered to negociate a loan of money among the Hollanders. Soon Apr. 19 after his arrival he prefented to their High Mightineffes a memorial, in which he informed them that the United States of America, had thought fit to fend him a commiffion with full power and instructions, to confer with them concerning a treaty of amity and commerce, and that 1782. that they had appointed him to be their Minister Plenipotentiary to refide near them. Similar information, was at the fame time communicated to the Statholder the Prince of Orange.

Apr. 22 About a year after the prefentation of this memorial, 1782. it was refolved "that the faid Mr. Adams was agreeable to their High Mightineffes, and that he fhould be acknowledged in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary." Before this was obtained much pains had been taken and much ingennity had been exerted, to convince the rulers and people of the States General, that they had an intereft in connecting themfelves with the United States. These representations, together with fome recent fucceffes in their contents on the fea with Great Britain, and their evident commercial intereft, encouraged them to venture on being the fecond power of Europe, to acknowledge American Independence.

Mr. Adams having gained this point, proceeded on the negociation of a treaty of amity and commerce between the two countries. This was in a few months concluded, to the reciprocal fatisfaction of both parties. The fame fuccefs which attended Mr. Adams in these negociations, continued to follow him in obtaining a loan of money, which was a most feasonable supply to his almost exhausted country.

Mr. Jay had for nearly three years paft exerted equal abilities, and equal industry with Mr. Adams, in endeavouring to negociate a treaty between the United States and his most Catholic Majesty, but his exertions were not crowned with equal fucces.

To gain the friendship of the Spaniards, Congress passed fundry resolutions, favouring the wishes of his most Catholic Majesty to re-annex the two Floridas to his dominions. Mr Jay was instructed to contend for the right of the United States to the free navigation of the river Mississippi, and if an express acknowledgement of it could not be obtained, he was restrained from acceding to any stipulation, by which it should be relinquissed. But in February 1781, when lord Cornwallis was making rapid progress in overrunning the southern States, and when

when the mutiny of the Pennfylvania line and other unfavourable circumstances depressed the spirits of the Americans, Congress, on the recommendation of Virginia, directed him to recede from his instructions, fo far as they infift on the free navigation of that part of the river Miffiffippi, which lies below the thirty first degree of North Latitude, and on a free port or ports below the fame; provided fuch ceffion flould be unalterably infifted on by Spain, and provided the free navigation of the faid river above the faid degree of North Latitude should be acknowledged and guarantied by his Catholic Majefty, in common with his own fubjects.

These propositions were made to the ministers of his Sep. 22; most Catholic Majesty, but not accepted. Mr Jay in his 1781. own name informed them " That if the acceptance of this offer should, together with the proposed alliance, be postponed to a general peace, the United States would ceafe to confider themfelves bound by any propositions or offers he might then make in their behalf."

Spain having delayed to accept of these terms, which originated more in neceffity than in policy, till the crifis of American independence was past, Congress apprehensive that their offered relinquishment of the free navigation of the Miffiffippi should at that late hour be accepted, instructed their minister ". To forbear making any over- Aug. 7, tures to the court of Spain, or entering into any ftipulations, in confequence of any which he had previoufly made." The ministers of his most Catholic Majesty, from indecision and tardiness of deliberation, let flip an opportunity of gaining a fovourite point, which from the increasing numbers of the western settlements of the United States, feems to be removed at a daily increasing distance. Humiliating offers, made and rejected in the hour of diftrefs, will not readily be renewed in the day of profperity.

It was expected not only by the fanguine Americans, but by many in Eugland, that the capture of lord Cornwallis would inftantly dispose the nation to peace; but whatever might have been the wifh or the interest of the people, the American war was too much the favourite of ministry to be relinquished, without a struggle for its continuance.

- Juft after intelligence arrived of the capitulation of York-Town, the King of Great Britain, in his fpeech to Parliament, declared "That he fhould not anfwer the truft committed to the fovereign of a free people, if he confented to facrifice either to his own defire of peace, or to their temporary eafe and relief, thofe effential rights and permanent interefts, upon the maintenance and prefervation of which the future firength and fecurity of the country muft forever depend." The determined language of this fpeech, pointing to the continuance of the American war, was echoed back by a majority of both Lords and Commons.
- Dec. 12. In a few days after, it was moved in the houfe of commons that a refolution fhould be adopted declaring it to be their opinion "That all farther attempts to reduce the Americans to obedience by force would be ineffectual, and injurious to the true interefts of Great Britain." Though the debate on this fubject was continued till two o'clock in the morning, and though the oppofition received ad-1782, ditional ftrength, yet the queftion was not carried. The
- Jan. 4. fame ground of argument was foon gone over again, and the American war underwent, for the fourth time fince the beginning of the feffion, a full difcuffion; but no refolution, difapproving its farther profecution, could yet obtain the affent of a majority of the members. The advocates for peace becoming daily more numerous, it
- Feb. 22. was moved by Gen. Conway "That an humble addrefs be prefented to his Majefty, that he will be pleafed to give directions to his minifters not to purfue any longer the impracticable object of reducing his Majefty's revolted colonies by force to their allegiance, by a war on the continent of America." This brought forth a repetition of the former arguments on the fubject, and engaged the attention of the houfe till two o'clock in the morning. On a division, the motion for the addrefs was loft by a fingle vote. In the courfe of thefe debates, while the minority were gaining ground, the miniftry were giving up up one point after another. They at first confented that the war should not be carried on to the same extent as formerly---then that there should be no internal continental war--next that there should be no other war than what was necessary for the defence of the posts already in their possession---and last of all, none but against the French in America.

The miniftry as well as the nation began to be fenfible of the impolicy of continental operations, but hoped that they might gain their point, by profecuting hoftilities at fea. Every opposition was therefore made by them against the total direliction of a war, on the fuccefs of which they had fo repeatedly pledged themfelves, and on the continuance of which they held their places. General Conway in five days after, brought forward another Feb. 27 motion expressed in different words, but to the fame effect with that which he had lost by a fingle vote. This caufed a long debate which lasted till two o'clock in the morning. It was then moved to adjourn the debate till the 13th of March. There appeared for the adjournment 215, and against it 234.

The original motion, and an addrefs to the king formed upon the refolution were then carried without a divition, and the addrefs was ordered to be prefented by the whole houfe.

To this his majefty anfwered, " that in purfuance of their advice, he would take fuch meafures as fhould appear to him the moft conducive to the reftoration of harmony, between Great Britain and the revolted colonies." The thanks of the houfe were voted for this anfwer. But the guarded language thereof, not inconfiftent with farther hoftilities againft America; together with other fufpicious circumftances, induced General Conway to move another refolution, expressed in the most decisive language. This was to the following effect. "That the house would confider as enemies to his majesty and the country, all those who should advise or by any means attempt the further profecution of offensive war, on the the continent of North-America, for the purpose of reducing the colonies to obedience by force." on after a feeble opposition was carried without a division, and put a period to all that chicanery by which ministers meant to diffinguish between a profecution of offenfive war in North-America, and a total direliction of This refolution and the preceding address, to which it. it had reference, may be confidered as the clofing fcene of the American war. As it was made a parliamentary war, by an address from parliament for its profecution in February 1775. It now was no longer fo, by an address from the most numerous house of the same parliament in February 1782, for its discontinuance. A change of miniftry was the confequence of this total change of that political fystem which, for feven years, had directed the affairs of Great Britain. A new administration was formed under the aufpices of the Marquis of Rockingham, and was composed of characters who opposed the American war. It has been faid that the new minifter flipulated with the court before he entered into office, that there should be peace with the Americans, and that the acknowledgement of their independence should not be a bar to the attainment of it. Soon after the Marquis of Rockingham, on whom Great Britain relied with a well placed confidence, for extrication from furrounding embarraffments departed this life, and his much lamented death, for fome time obfcured the agreeable profpects which had lately begun to dawn on the nation. On the decease of the noble Marguis, Earl Shelburne was appointed his fucceffor. To remove conftitutional impediments to negociate with the late British colonies, an act of parliament was paffed, granting to the crown powers for negotiating or concluding a general or particular peace or truce with the whole, or with any part of the colonies, and for fetting afide all former laws, whole operations where in controvention to that purpofe.

Sir Guy Carleton, who was lately appointed to the command of the royal army in North-America, was inftructed to use his endeavours for carrying into effect the wishes of Great-Britain, for an accommodation with the Americans. He therefore dispatched a letter to General Washington, informing him of the late proceedings of parliament

May, 1782. parliament, and of the difpofitions fo favourable to America, which were prevalent in Great Britain, and at the fame time folicited a paffport for his fecretary, Mr. Morgan to pay a vifit to Congress. His request was refused. The application for it, with its concomitant circumftances were confidered as introductory to a fcheme for opening negotiations with Congress or the states, without the concurrence of their allies. This caufed no finall alarm and gave rife to fundry refolutions, by which feveral ftates declared, that a proposition from the enemy to all or any of the United States for peace or truce, feparate from their allies was inadmiffible. Congress not long after refolved " that they would not enter into the difcuffion of any overtures for pacification, but in confidence and in concert with his most Christian Majesty, and as a proof of this, they recommended to the feveral States to pafs laws; that no fubject of his Britannic Majefty coming directly or indirectly from any part of the British dominions, be admitted into any of the United States during the war." This decifive conduct extinguished all hopes that Great Britain might have entertained, of making a feparate peace with America. Two of the first fovereigns of Europe, the Empirefs of Ruffia, and the Emperor of Germany, were the mediators in accomplishing the great work of peace. Such was the flate of the contending parties, that the interceffion of powerful mediators was no longer neceffary. The disposition of Great Britain, to recognize the independence of the United States, had removed the principal difficulty, which had hitherto obstructed a general pacification. It would be curious to trace the fucceffive fteps by which the nation was brought to this meafure, fo irreconcilable to their former declarations. Various auxiliary caufes might be called in to account for this great change of the public mind of Great Britain, but the fum of the whole must be refolved into this fimple proposition, "That it was unavoidable." A state of perpetual war was inconfistent with the interest of a cominercial nation. Even the longer continuance of hoftilities was forbidden by every principle of wife policy.

The avowed object of the alliance between France and America, and the fleady adherence of both parties to enter into no negotiations without the concurrence of each other, reduced Great Britain to the alternative of continuing a hopelefs unproductive war, or of negotiating under the idea of recognizing American independence. This great change of the public mind in Great Britain, favourable to American independence, took place between November 1781, and March 1782. In that interval Mr. Laurens was releafed from his confinement in the tower. Before and after his releafe, he had frequent opportunities of demonstrating to perfons in power, that from his perfonal knowledge of the fentiments of Congress, and of their instructions to their ministers. every hope of peace, without the acknowledgement of independence was illufory. Seven years experience had proved to the nation that the conquest of the American. States was impracticable; they now received equal conviction, that the recognition of their independence, was an indifpentible preliminary to the termination of a war, from the continuance of which, neither profit nor honor. was to be acquired. The pride of Great Brithin for at long time refifted, but that usurping paffion was obliged to yield to the fuperior influence of interest. The feelings of the great body of the people were no longer to be controuled, by the honor of ministers, or romantic ideas of national dignity. At the close of the war, a revolution was effected in the fentiments of the inhabitants of Great Britain, not lefs remarkable than what in the beginning of it, took place among the citizens of America.

Independence which was neither thought of nor wifhed for by the latter in the year 1774, and 1775, became in the year 1776 their favorite object. A recognition of this, which throughout the war, had been with few exceptions the object of abhorrence to the British nation, became in the year 1782, a popular measure in Great Britain, as the means of putting an end to a ruinows war.

The commissioners for negotiating peace on the part of the United States, were John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay, and Henry Laurens. On the part of Great Britain, Mr. Fitzherbert, and Mr. Ofwald. Provisional visional articles of peace, between Great Britain and the United States were agreed upon by thefe gentlemen; which were to be inferted in a future treaty of peace; to be finally concluded between the parties, when that between Great Britain and France took place. By thefe the independence of the states was acknowledged in its fullest extent. Very ample boundaries were allowed them, which comprehended the fertile and extensive countries on both fides of the Ohio, and on the cash fide of the Misliffippi, in which was the refidence of upwards of twenty nations of Indians, and particularly of the five nations, who had long been the friends and allies of Great Britain. An unlimited right of fifhery on the banks of Newfoundland, and on other places where both nations had heretofore been accultomed to filh, was likewife confirmed to the Americans. From the neceffity of the cafe, the loyalists were facrificed, nothing further than a fimple recommendation for reflitution, being ftipulated in their favour. Five days after these provisional articles were figned, the British parliament met. They underwent a fevere parliamentary difcuffion. It was faid by the opposition that independence being recognized, every thing ceded by Great Britain required an equivalent; but that while they gave up the many posts they held in the United States, an immense extent of north and western territory, a participation in the fur trade, and in the fitheries, nothing was stipulated in return.

It muft be acknowledged, that the minifters of Congrefs procured for their countrymen better terms than they had reafon to expect; but from a combination of circumftances, it was fearcely poffible to end the war without fimilar conceffions on the part of Great Britain. By the alliance between France and America, there could be no peace without independence. That once granted, moft of the other articles followed of courfe. It is true the boundaries agreed upon, were more extensive than the States, when colonies had claimed, yet the furplus ceded could have been of little or no ufe to Great Britain, and might if retained have given an occasion to a future war.

The cafe of the loyalifts was undoubtedly a hard one, but unavoidable, from the complex conflication of the United States. The American ministers engaged as far as they were authorifed, and Congress did all that they conftitutionally could; but this was no more than fimply to recommend their cafe to the feveral States, for the purpofe of making them restitution. To have infisted on more, under fuch circumstances, would have been equivalent to faying that there should be no peace. It is true much more was expected from the recommendations of Congrefs, than refulted from 'them; but this was not the confequence of deception, but of misunderstanding the principles of the confederation. In conformity to the letter and fpirit of the treaty, Congress urged in strong terms the propriety of making reftitution to the loyalifts, but to procure it was beyond their power. In the animation produced by the war, when the Americans conceived their liberties to be in danger, and that their only fafety confilted in obeying their fæderal head, they yielded a more unreferved obedience to the recommendations of Congress, than is usually paid to the decrees of the most arbitrary fovereigns. But the cafe was widely different, when at the close of the war, a measure was recommended, in direct opposition to their prejudices. It was the general opinion of the Americans, that the continuance of the war, and the afperity with which it had been carried on, was more owing to the machinations of their own countrymen, who had taken part with royal government, than to their British enemies. It is certain that the former had been most active in predatory excurfions, and most forward in scenes of blood and murder. Their knowledge of the country enabled them to do mifchief, which would never have occurred to European foldiers. Many powerful paffions of human nature operated against making restitution to men, who were thus confidered as the authors of fo great a fhare of the general diffrefs.

There were doubtlefs a mong the loyalifts many worthy characters---friends to peace, and lovers of juffice: To fuch, reflitution was undoubtedly due, and to many fuch it was made; but it is one of the many calamities 1782. incident to war, that the innocent, from the impoffibility of diferimination, are often involved in the fame diftrefs with the guilty. The return of the loyalifts to their former places of refidence, was as much difrelished by the whig citizens of 'America, as the propofal for reimburfing their confifcated property. In fundry places committees were formed, which in an arbitrary manner, opposed their peaceable refidence. The fober and difpaffionate citizens exerted themfelves in checking thefe irregular meafures; but fuch was the violence of party fpirit, and fo-relaxed were the finews of government, that in oppfition to legal authority, and the private interference of the judicious and moderate, many indecent outrages were committed on the perfons and property of the returning loyalifts. Nor were thefe all the fufferings of those Americans who had attached themfelves to the royal caufe. Being compelled to depart their native country, many of them were obliged to take up their abodes in the inhospitable wilds of Nova Scotia, or on the barren fhores of the Bahama Iflands. Parliamentary relief was extended to them, but this was obtained with difficulty,' and distributed with a partial hand. Some who invented plaufible tales of loyalty and diffreis received much more than they ever poffeffed; but others, lefs artful, were not half reimburfed for their actual loffes. The bulk of the fufferings, fubfequent to the peace among the Americans, fell to the fhare of the merchants, and others, who owed money in England. From the operations of the war remittances were impossible. In the mean time payments were made in America by a depreciating paper, under the fanction of a law which made it a legal tender. The unhappy perfons, who in this manner fuffered payment, could not apply it to the extinguishment of their foreign debts. If they retained in their hands the paper which was paid to them, it daily decreafed in value: If they invefied it in public fecurities, from the deficiency of funds, their fituation was no better: If they purchased land, such was the superabundance of territory ceded by the peace, that it fell greatly ly in value. Under all thefe embarraffments, the American debtor was by treaty bound to make payments in fpecie of all his bona fide debts, due in Great Britain. The Britifh merchant was materially injured by being kept for many years out of his capital, and the American was often 'ruined by being ultimately held to pay in fpecie, what he received in paper. Enough was fuffered on both fides to make the inhabitants, as well in Great Britain as in America, deprecate war as one of the greateft evils incident to humanity.

APPENDIX, No. IV.

The State of parties; the advantages and difadvantages of the Revolution; its influence on the minds and morals of the Citizens.

REVIOUS to the American revolution, the in-habitants of the British colonies were universally loyal. That three millions of fuch fubjects fhould break through all former attachments, and unanimoufly adopt new ones, could not reasonably be expected. The revc-Intion had its enemies, as well as its friends, in every period of the war. Country religion, local policy, as well as private views, operated in difpofing the inhabitants to take different fides. The New-England provinces being moftly fettled by one fort of people, were nearly of one fentiment. The influence of placemen in Boston, together. with the connexions which they had formed by marriages, had attached fundry influential characters in that capital to the British intcrest, but these were but as the duft in the balance, when compared with the numerous independent whig yeomanry of the country. The fame and other caufes produced a large number in New-York, who were attached to roval government. That city had long been head quarters of the British army in America, and many intermarriages, and other connexions, had been made between British officers, and some of their first familics. The practice of entailing eftates had prevailed in New-York

AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

New-York to a much greater extent, than in any of the 1712. other provinces. The governors thereof had long been in the habit of indulging their favorites with extravagant grants of land. This had introduced the diffinction of landlord and tenant. There was therefore in New-York an ariftocratic party, refpectable for numbers, wealth and influence, which had much to fear from independence. The city was alfo divided into parties by the influence of two ancient and numerous families, the Livingftones and Delanceys. Thefe having been long accuftomed to oppofe each other at elections, could rarely be brought to unite, in any political measures. In this controverfy, one almost univerfally took part with America, the other with Great Britain.

The Irifh in America, with a few exceptions were attached to independence. They had fled from oppreffion in their native country, and could not brook the idea that it fhould follow them. Their national prepoffeffions" in favour of liberty, were strengthened by their religious opinions. They were Prefbyterians, and people of that denomination, for reasons hereafter to be explained, were mofily whigs. The Scotch on the other hand, though they had formerly facrificed much to liberty in their own country, were generally disposed to support the claims of Great-Britain. Their nation for fome years paft had experienced a large proportion of royal favour. A very abiurd affociation was made by many, between the caufe of John Wilkes and the caufe of America. The former had rendered himfelf fo univerfally odious to the Scotch, that many of them were prejudiced against a cause, which was fo ridiculoufly, but generally affociated, with that of a man who had grossly infulted their whole nation. The illiberal reflections caft by fome Americans on the whole body of the Scotch, as favourers of arbitrary power, reftrained high fpirited individuals of that nation, from joining a people who fuspected their love of liberty. Such of them as adhered to the caufe of independence, were fteady in their attachment. The army and the Congress ranked among their best officers, and most valuable members, fome individuals of that pation.

Such

THE HISTORY OF THE

1782. Such of the Germans, in America, as poffeffed the means of information, were generally determined whigs, but many of them were too little informed, to be able to chufe their fide on proper ground. They, efpecially fuch of them as refided in the interior country, were from their not underftanding the Englifh language, far behind moft of the other inhabitants, in a knowledge of the merits of the difpute. Their difaffection was rather paffive than active: A confiderable part of it arofe from principles of religion, for fome of their fects deny the lawfulnefs of war. No people have profpered more in America than the Germans. None have furpaffed, and but few have equalled them, in induftry and other republican virtues.

> The great body of tories in the fouthern ftates, was among the fettlers on their western frontier. Many of these were diforderly perfons, who had fled from; the old fettlements, to avoid the reftraints of civil government. Their numbers were encreased by a fet of men, called regulators. The expence and difficulty of obtaining the decision of courts, against horse-thieves and other criminals, had induced fundry perfons, about the year 1770, to take the execution of the laws into their own. hands, in fome of the remote fettlements, both of North, and South-Carolina. In punifling crimes, forms as well as fubitance, must be regarded. From not attending to the former, fome of thefe regulators, though perhaps aiming at nothing but what they thought right, commit-, ted many offences both against law and justice. By their violent proceedings regular government was proftrated. This drew on them the vengeance of royal governors. Theregulators having fuffered from their hands, were flow to oppose an established government, whose power to punish they had recently experienced. Apprehending that the measures of Congress were like their own regulating fchemes, and fearing that they would terminate in the fame difagreeable confequences, they and their adherents were generally oppofed to the revolution.

> Religion alfo divided the inhabitants of America. The prefbyterians and independents, were almost univer-

fally attached to the measures of Congress. Their religious focieties are governed on the republican plan.

From independence they had much to hope, but from Great Britain if finally fuccessful, they had reason to fear the establishment, of a church hierarchy. Most of the epifcopal ministers of the northern provinces, were penfioners on the bounty of the British government. The greatest part of their clergy, and many of their laity in these provinces, were therefore disposed to support a connexion with Great Britain. The epifcopal clergy in these fouthern provinces being under no fuch biafs, were often among the warmeft whigs. Some of them forefeeing the downfall of religious establishments from the fuccefs of the Americans, were lefs active, but in general where their church was able to fupport itself, their clergy and laity, zealoufly espoufed the caufe of independence. Great pains were taken to perfuade them, that those who had been called differters, were aiming to abolifh the epifcopal establishment, to make way for their own exaltation, but the good fense of the people, reftrained them from giving any credit to the unfounded fuggestion. Religious controversy was happily kept out of view: The well informed of all denominations were convinced, that the conteft was for their civil rights, and therefore did not fuffer any other confiderations to interfere. or difturb their union.

The quakers with a few exceptions were averfe to independence. In Pennfylvania they were numerous, and had power in their hands. Revolutions in government are rarely patronifed by any body of men, who forefee that a diminution of their own importance, is likely to refult from the change. Quakers from religious principles were averfe to war, and therefore could not be friendly to a revolution, which could only be effected by the fword. Several individuals feparated from them on account of their principles, and following the impulfe of their inclinations, joined their countrymen in arms. The fervices America received from two of their fociety, Generals Greene and Mifflin, made fome amends for the embarrafsment, which the difaffection of the great body of their people occasioned to the exertions of the active friends of independence.

The age and temperament of individuals had often an influence in fixing their political character. Old men were feldom warm whigs. They could not relifh the great changes which were daily taking place. Attached to ancient forms and habits, they could not readily accommodate themselves to new systems: ... Few of the very rich were active in forwarding the revolution. This was remarkably the cafe in the eaftern and middle States ; but the reverse took place in the fouthern extreme of the confederacy. There were in no part of Anverica, more -determined whigs than the opulent flaveholders in Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia, The active and fpirited part of the community, who felt themfelves poffeffed of talents, that would raife them to eminence in a free government, longed for the establishment of independent conflications : But those who were in possestion or expectation of royal favour, or of promotion from Great Britain, wifhed that the connexion between the Parent State and the colonies, might be preferved. The young, the ardent, the ambitions and the enterprising were mostly whigs, but the phlegmatic; the timid; the interested and those who wanted decision were, in general, favourers of Great Britain, or at least only the lukewarm inactive friends of independence. The whigs received a great reinforcement from the operation of continental money. In the year 1775, 1776, and in the first months of 17.77, while the bills of Congress were in good credit, the effects of them were the fame, as if a foreign power had made the United States a prefent of twenty million of filver dollars. The circulation of fo large a fum of money, and the employment given to great numbers in providing for the American army, increased the numbers and invigorated the zeal of the friends to the revolution : on the fame principles, the American war was patronifed in England, by the many contractors and agents for transporting and fupplying the British army. In both cafes the inconveniences of interrupted commerce were were leffened by the employment which war and a domeftic circulation of money fubfituted in its room. The convultions of war afforded excellent thelter for defperate, debtors. The fpirit of the times revolted againft dragging to jails for debt, men who were active and zealous in defending their country, and on the other hand, those who owed more than they were worth, by going within the British lines, and giving themfelves the merit of fuffering on the fcore of loyalty, not only put their creditors to defiance, but fometimes obtained promotion or other fpecial marks of royal favour.

The American revolution, on the one hand, brought forth great vices; but on the other hand, it called forth many virtues, and gave occasion for the difplay of abilities which, but for that event, would have been loft to the world. When the war began, the Americans were a mais of huibandmen, merchants, mechanics and filliermen; but the necetlities of the country gave a fpring to the active powers of the inhabitants, and fet them on thinking, fpeaking and acting, in a line far beyond that to which they had been accustomed. The difference between nations is not fo much owing to nature, as to education and circumstances. While the Americans were guided by the leading ftrings of the mother country, they had no fcope nor encouragement for exertion. All the departments of government were established and executed for them, but not by them. In the years 1775 and 1776 the country, being fuddenly thrown into a fituation that needed the abilities of all its fons, thefe generally took their places, each according to the bent of his inclination As they feverally purfued their objects with ardor, a vaft expansion of the human mind speedily followed. This difplayed itself in a variety of ways. It was found that the talents for great stations did not differ in kind, but only in degree, from those which were neceffary for the proper discharge of the ordinary business of civil fociety. In the buffle that was occasioned by the war, few inftances could be produced of any perfons who made a figure, or who rendered effential fervices, but from among those who had given specimens of similar talents in 1782. in their respective professions. Those who from indolence or diffipation, had been of little fervice to the community in time of peace, were found equally unferviceable in war, A few young men were exceptions to this general rule, Some of thefe, who had indulged in youthful follies, broke off from their vicious courfes, and on the preffing call of their country became ufeful fervants of the public: but the great bulk of thofe, who were the active inftruments of carrying on the revolution, were felf-made, industrious men. These who by their own exertions, had established or laid a foundation for eftablishing perfonal independence, were most generally trufted, and most fuccessfully employed in establishing that of their country. In these times of action, classical education was found of lefs fervice than good natural parts, guided by common fenfe and found judgement.

Several names could be mentioned of individuals who, without the knowledge of any other language than their mother tongue, wrote not only accurately, but elegantly, on public bufinefs. It feemed as if the war not only required, but created talents. Men whofe minds were warmed with the love of liberty, and whofe abilities were improved by daily exercife, and fharpened with a laudable ambition to ferve their diftreffed country, fpoke, wrote, and acted, with an energy far furpaffing all expectations which could be reafonably founded on their previous acquirements.

The Americans knew but little of one another, previous to the revolution. Trade and bufinefs had brought the inhabitants of their feaports acquainted with each other, but the bulk of the people in the interior country were unacquainted with their fellow citizens. A continental army, and Congrefs composed of men from all the States, by freely mixing together, were affimilated into one mafs. Individuals of both, mingling with the citizens, diffeminated principles of union among them. Local prejudices abated. By frequent collifion afperities were worn off, and a foundation was laid for the eftablifhment of a nation, out of different States were were much more common than before the war, and be-Unreasonable came an additional cement to the union. jealouses had existed between the inhabitants of the eastern and of the fouthern States; but on becoming better acquainted with each other, thefe in a great measure fubfided. A wifer policy prevailed. Men of liberal minds led the way in difcouraging local diffinctions, and the great body of the people, as foon as reafon got the better of prejudice, found that their best interests would be most effectually promoted by fuch practices and fentiments as were favourable to union. Religious bigotry had broken in upon the peace of various fects, before the American war. This was kept up by partial eftablishments, and by a dread that the church of England through the power of the mother country, would be made to triumph over all other denominations. These apprehenfions were done away by the revolution. The different fects, having nothing to fear from each other, difmiffed all religious controverfy. A propofal for introducing bishops into America before the war, had kindled a flame among the diffenters; but the revolution was no fooner accomplished, than a scheme for that purpose was perfected, with the confent and approbation of all those fects who had previoufly oppofed it. Pulpits which had formerly been fhut to worthy men, becaufe their heads had not been confecrated by the imposition of the hands of a Bithop or of a Prefbytery, have fince the eftablishment of independence, been reciprocally opened to each other, whenfoever the public convenience required it. The world will foon fee the refult of an experiment in politics, and and be able to determine whether the happinels of fociety is increased by religious establishments, or diminished by the want of them.

Though fchools and colleges were generally fhut up during the war, yet many of the arts and fciences were promoted by it. The Geography of the United States before the revolution was but little known; but the marches of armics, and the operations of war, gave birth to many geographical enquiries and difcoveries, which otherwife would not have been made. A paffionate fondnefs nefs for fludies of this kind, and the growing importance of the country, excited one of its fons, the Rev. Mr. Morfe, to travel through every State of the Union, and amafs a fund of topographical knowledge, far exceeding any thing heretofore communicated to the public. The neceffities of the States led to the fludy of Tactics, Fortification, Gunnery, and a variety of other arts connected with war, and diffufed a knowledge of them among a peaceable people, who would otherwife have had no inducement to fludy them.

The abilities of ingenious men were directed to make farther improvements in the art of deftroying an enemy. Among thefe, David Bufhnell of Connecticut invented a machine for fubmarine navigation, which was found to anfwer the purpofe of rowing horizontaily, at any given depth under water, and of rifing or finking at pleafurc. To this was attached a magazine of powder, and the whole was contrived in fuch a manner, as to make it practicable to blow up veffels by machinery under them. Mr. Bufhnell alfo contrived fundry other curious machines for the annoyance of Britifh fhipping; but from accident they only fucceeded in part. He deftroyed one veffel in charge of Commodore Symonds, and a fecond one near the fhore of Long-Ifland.

Surgery was one of the arts which was promoted by the war. From the want of hofpitals and other aids, the medical men of America, had few opportunities of perfecting themfelves in this art, the thorough knowledge of which can only be acquired by practice and obfervation. The melancholy events of battles, gave the American fludents an opportunity of feeing, and learning more in one day, than they could have acquired in years of peace. It was in the hofpitals of the United States, that Dr. Rufh firft difcovered the method of curing the lock jaw by bark and wine, added to other invigorating remedies, which has fince been adopted with fuccefs in Europe, as well as in the United States.

The fcience of government, has been more generally diffufed among the Americans by means of the revolution. The policy of Great Britain, in throwing them out of her protection, induced a necef- 1782. fity of establishing independent constitutions. This led to reading and reafoning on the fubject. The many errors that were at first committed by unexperienced ftatefmen, have been a practical comment on the folly of unbalanced conftitutions, and injudicious laws. The difcuffions concerning the new conftitution, gave birth to much reasoning on the subject of government, and particularly to a feries of letters figned Publius, but really the work of Alexander Hamilton, in which much political knowledge and wildom were difplayed, and which will long remain a monument of the ftrength and acutenels of the human understanding in investigating truth. -". When Great Britain first began her encroachments on -the colonies, there were few natives of America who had diftinguished themselves as speakers or writers, but the -controversy between the two countries multiplied their mumber.

The ftamp act, which was to have taken place in 1765, employed the pens and tongues of many of the colonifts, and by repeated exercife improved their ability to ferve their country. The duties imposed in 1767, called forth the pen of John Dickinson, who in a feries of letters figned a Pennfylvania Farmer, may be faid to have fown the feeds of the revolution. For being universally read by the colonist, they universally enlightened them on the dangerous confequences, likely to refult from their being taxed by the parliament of Great Britain.

In eftablifhing American independence, the pen and the prefs had merit equal to that of the fword. As the war was the people's war, and was carried on without funds, the exertions of the army would have been infufficient to effect the revolution, unlefs the great body of the people had been prepared for it, and alfo kept in a conftant dilpofition to oppofe Great Britain. To roufe and unite the inhabitants, and to perfuade them to patience for feveral years, under prefent fufferings, with the hope of obtaining remote advantages for their pofterity, was a work of difficulty: This was effected in a great meafure by the tongues and pens of the well informed citizens. 1782. citizens, and on it depended the fuccefs of military operations.

To enumerate the names of all those who were fuccefsful labourers in this arduous bufiness, is impossible. The following list contains in nearly alphabetical order, the names of the most diffinguished writers in favour of the rights of Δ merica.

John Adams, and Samuel Adams, of Bofton ;----Bland, of Virginia; John Dickinfon, of Pennfylvania; Daniel Dulany, of Annapolis; William Henry, Drayton, of South-Carolina; Dr. Franklin, of Philadelphia; John Jay, and Alexander Hamilton, of New-York; Thomas Jefferfon, and Arthur Lee of Virginia; Jonathan Hyman, of Connecticut; Governor Livington, of New-Jerfey; Dr. Mayhew, and James Otis, of Bofton; Thomas Paine, Dr. Rufh, Charles Thompson, and James Wilfon, of Philadelphia; William Tennant, of South-Carolina; Jofiah Quincy, and Dr. Warren, of Bofton. These and many others laboured in enlightening their countrymen, on the fubject of their political' interefts, and in animating them to a proper line of conduct, in defence of their liberties. To thefe, individuals may be added, the great body of the clergy, efpecially in New-England. The printers of news-papers, had alfo much merit in the fame way. Particularly, Eedes and Gill, of Bofton; Holt, of New-York; Bradford, of Philadelphia; and Timothy, of South-Carolina.

The early attention which had been paid to literature in New-England, was alfo eminently conducive to the fuccefs of the Americans in refifting Great Britain. The univerfity of Cambridge was founded as early as 1636, and Yale college in 1700. It has been computed, that in the year the Bofton port act was paffed, there were in the four eaftern colonies, upwards of two thoufand graduates of their colleges difperfed through their feveral towns, who by their knowledge and abilities, were able to influence and direct the great body of the people to a proper line of conduct, for oppofing the encroachments of Great Britain on their liberties. The colleges to the fouthward of New-Eugland, except that of William and Mary in Virginia, were but off of modern date; but they had been of a ftanding fufficiently long, to have trained for public fervice, a confiderible number of the youth of the country. The college of New-Jerfey, which was incorporated about 28 years before the revolution, had in that time educated upwards of 300 perfons, who, with a few exceptions, were active and useful friends of independence. From the influence which knowledge had in fecuring and preferving the liberties of America, the prefent generation may trace the wife policy of their fathers, in crecting fchools and colleges. They may alfo learn that it is their duty to found more, and fupport all fuch inftitutions. Without the advantages derived from thefe lights of this new world, the United States would probably have fallen in their unequal contest with Great Britain. Union which was effential to the fuccefs of their refiftance, could fcarcely have taken place, in the meafures adopted by an ignorant multitude. Much lefs could wifdom in council, unity in fystem, or perfeverance in the profecution of a long and felf denying war, be expected from an uninformed people. It is a well known fact, that perfons unfriendly to the revolution, were always most numerous in those parts of the United States, which had either never been illuminated, or but faintly warmed by the rays of fcience. The uninformed and the mifinformed, conftituted a great proportion of those Americans, who preferred the leading ftrings of the Parent State, though encroaching on their liberties, to a government of their own countrymen and fellow citizens.

As literature had in the first instance favoured the revolution, fo in its turn, the revolution promoted literature. The study of eloquence and of the Belle's lettres, was more fuccefsfully profecuted in America, after the disputes between Great Britain and her colonies began to be ferious, than it ever had been before. The various orations, addreffes, letters, differtations and other literary performances, which the war made neceffary, called forth abilities where they were, and excited the rising generation tostudy arts, which brought with them their own reward. Many incidents afforded materials for the favourites of the Vol. II. S s mufes muses, to difplay their talents. Even burlefquing royal proclamations, by parodies and doggerel poetry, had great effects on the minds of the people. A celebrated hiftorian has remarked, that the fong of Lillibullero forwarded the revolution of 1688 in England. It may be truly affirmed, that fimilar productions produced fimilar effects in America. Francis Hopkinfou rendered effential fervice to his country, by turning the artillery of wit and ridicule on the enemy. Philip Freneau laboured fuccefsfully in the fame way. Royal proclamations and other productions which iffued from royal printing preffes, were by the help of a warm imagination, arrayed in fuch dreffes as rendered them truly ridiculous Trumbull with a vein of original Hudibraftic humour, diverted his countrymen fo much with the follies of their enemies, that for a time they forgot the calamities of war. Humphries twined the literary with the military laurel, by fuperading the fame of an elegant poet, to that of an accomplifhed officer. Barlow increafed the fame of his country and of the diffinguithed actors in the revolution, by the bold defign of an epic poem ably executed, on the idea that Columbus forefaw in vision, the great scenes that were to be transacted on the theatre of that new world, which he had difcovered. Dwight ftruck out in the fameline, and at an early period of life finified, an elegant work entitled the conquest of Canaan, on a plan which has rarely been attempted. The principles of their mother tongue, were first unfolded to the Americans fince the revolution, by their countryman Webster. Pursuing an unbeaten track, he has made difcoveries in the genius and construction of the English language, which had efcaped the refearches of preceding philologifts. Thefe and a group of other literary characters have been brought into view by the revolution. It is remarkable, that of thefe, Connecticut has produced an unufual proportion. In that truly republican flate, every thing confpires to adorn human nature with its higheft honours.

From the later periods of the revolution till the prefent time, fchools, colleges, focieties and inftitutions for promoting literature, arts, manufactures, agriculture, and for

for extending human happinefs, have been increafed far. beyond any thing that ever took place before the declaration of independence. Every ftate in the union, has done more or lefs in this way, but Pennfylvania has done the most. The following institutions have been very lately founded in that ftate, and most of them in the time of the war or fince the peace. An university in the city of Philadelphia; a college of phyficians in the fame place; Dickinfon college at Carlifle; Franklin college at Lancafter ; the Protestant Episcopal academy in Philadelphia; academies at York-town, at Germantown, at Pittfburgh and Washington; and an academy in Philadelphia for young ladies; focieties for promoting political enquiries; for the medical relief of the poor, under the title of the Philadelphia Dispensary; for promoting the abolition of flavery, and the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage; for propagating the gofpel among the Indians, under the direction of the United Brethern; for the encouragement of manufactures and the ufeful arts; for alleviating the miferies of prifons. Such have been some of the beneficial effects, which have refulted from that expansion of the human mind, which has been produced by the revolution, but thefe have not been without alloy.

To overfet an effablished government unhinges many of those principles, which bind individuals to each other. A long time, and much prudence, will be necessary to reproduce a spirit of union and that reverence for government, without which society is a rope of fand. The right of the people to result their rulers, when invading their liberties, forms the corner stone of the American republics. This principle, though just in itself, is not favourable to the tranquillity of present establishments. The maxims and measures, which in the years 1774 and 1775 were successfully inculcated and adopted by American patriots, for oversetting the established government, will answer a similar purpose when recurrence is had to them by factious demagogues, for disturbing the freest governments that were ever devised.

War

War never fails to injure the morals of the people engaged in it. The American war, in particular, had an unhapp, influence of this kind. Being begun without funds or regular, eftablishments, it could not be carried on without violating private rights; and in its progrefs, it involved a necefity for breaking folenin promifes, and plighted public faith. The failure of national juffice, which was in fome degree unavoidable, increased the difficulties of performing private engagements, and weakened that fensibility to the obligations of public and private honor, which is a fecurity for the punctual performance of contracts.

In confequence of the war, the inftitutions of religion have been deranged, the public worfhip of the Deity fuspended, and a great number of the inhabitants deprived of the ordinary means of obtaining that religious knowledge, which tames the fiercenefs, and foftens the rudenels of human paffions and manners. Many of the temples dedicated to the fervice of the most High, were deftroyed, and thefe from a deficiency of ability and inclination, are not yet rebuilt. The clergy were left to fuffer, without proper fupport. The depreciation of the paper currency was particularly injurious to them. It reduced their falaries to a pittance, fo infufficient for their maintenance, that feveral of them were obliged to lay down their profession, and engage in other pursuits. Public preaching, of which many of the inhabitants were thus deprived, feldom fails of rendering effential fervice to fociety, by civilifing the multitude and forming them to union. No clafs of citizens have contributed more to the revolution than the clergy, and none have hitherto fuffered more in confequence of it. From the diminution of their number, and the penury to which they have been fubjected, civil government has loft many of the advantages it formerly derived from the public inftructions of that useful order of men.

On the whole, the literary, political, and military talents of the citizens of the United States have been improved by the revolution, but their moral character is inferior to what it formerly was. So great is the change for for the worfe, that the friends of public order are loudly called upon to exert their utmost abilities, in extirpating the vicious principles and habits, which have taken deep root during the late convulsions.

CHAP. XXVII.

The difcharge of the American army: The evacuation of New-York: The refignation of General Washington: Arrangements of Congress for the disposing of their western territory, and paying their debts: The distresses of the States after the peace: The inefficacy of the articles of the Confederation: A Grand Convention for amending the Government: The New Constitution: General Washington appointed President: An address to the people of the United States.

TTHILE the citizens of the United States were anticipating the bleffings of peace, their army which had fuccessfully stemmed the tide of British victories, was unrewarded for its fervices. The States which had been refcued by their exertions from flavery, were in no condition to pay them their ftipulated due. To difmifs officers and foldiers, who had fpent the prime of their days in ferving their country, without an equivalent for their labors, or even a fufficiency to enable them to gain a decent living, was a hard but unavoidable cafe. An attempt was made by anonymous and feditious publications to inflame the minds of the officers and foldiers, and induce them to unite in redreffing their own grievances, while they had arms in their hands. As foon as General Washington was informed of the nature of these papers, he requested the General and field officers, with one officer from each company, and a' proper reprefentation from the ftaff of the army, to affemble on an early day. He rightly judged that it would be much eafier to divert from a wrong to a right path, than to recal fatal and hafty steps, after they had once been taken. The period, previoufly to the meeting of the officers, was improved in preparing them for the adoption of moderate meafures measures. Gen. Washington fent for one officer after another, and enlarged in private, on the fatal confequences, and particularly on the lofs of character to the whole army, which would refult from intemperate refolutions. When the officers were convened the commander in chief addreffed them in a speech well calculated to calm their mind. He also pledged himself to exert all his abilities and influence in their favor, and requested them to rely on the faith of their country, and conjured them " as they valued their honor --- as they refpected the rights of humanity, and as they regarded the military and national character of America, to express their utmost detestation of the man, who was attempting to open the floodgates of civil difcord, and deluge their rifing empire with blood". Gen. Washington then retired. The minds of those who had heard him were in fuch an irritable state. that nothing but their most ardent patriotifm and his unbounded influence, prevented the propofal of rafh refolutions which if adopted, would have fullied the glory of feven years fervice. No reply whatever was made to the General's Speech. The happy moment was feized, while the minds of the officers foftened by the eloquence of their beloved commander, were in a yielding ftate, and a refolution was unanimoufly adopted by which they declared " that no circumftances of diffrefs or danger, fhould induce a conduct that might tend to fully the reputation and glory they had acquired, that the army continued to have an unshaken confidence, in the justice of Congress and their country. That they viewed with abhorrence and rejected with difdain, the infamous propolitions in the late anonymous address to the officers of the army. Too much praise cannot be given to Gen. Washington, for the patriotifm and decision which marked his conduct, in the whole of this ferious transaction. Perhaps in no inftance did the United States receive from heaven a more fignal deliverance, through the hands of the commander in chief.

March

Soon after these events, Congress completed a refolution which had been for some time pending, that the officers of their army, who preferred a sum in gross to an annuity

nuity, fhould be entitled to receive to the amount of five 1783. years full pay, in money or fecurities at fix per cent. per annum, inftead of the half pay for life, which had been previoufly promifed to them.

To avoid the inconveniences of difmiffing a great May 26. number of foldiers in a body, furloughs were freely granted to individuals, and after their difpersion they were not enjoined to return. By this arrangement a critical moment was got over. A great part of an unpaid army, was difbanded and difperfed over the States, without tumult or diforder. The privates generally betook themfelves to labor, and crowned the merit of being good foldiers, by becoming good citizens. Several of the American officers, who had been bred mechanics refumed their trades. In old countries the difbanding a fingle regiment, even though fully paid, has often produced ferious confequences, but in America where arms had been taken up for felf defence, they were peaceably laid down as foon as they became unneceffary. As foldiers had been eafily and speedily formed in 1775, out of farmers, planters and mechanics, with equal eafe and expedition in the year 1783, they dropped their adventitious character, and refumed their former occupations. About 80 of the Pennfylvania levies formed an exception to the prevailing peaceable difposition of the army. These in defiance of their officers, set out from Lancaster and marched to Philadelphia to feek a redrefs of their grievances, from the executive council of the flate. The June 20. 1783. mutineers in opposition to advice and intreaties, perfifted in their march, till they arrived at Philadelphia. They were there joined by fome other troops, who were quartered in the barracks. The whole amounting to upwards of 300 men, marched with fixed bayonets and drums, to the statehouse, in which Congress and the supreme executive council of Pennfylvania held their feffions. They placed guards at every door, and fent in a watten meffage to the Prefident and Council of the flate, and threatened to let loofe an enraged foldiery upon them, if they were not gratified as to their demand within 20 minutes. The fituation of Congress, though they were not

not the particular object of the foldiers refertment, was far from being agreeable. After being about three hours under dureffe they retired, but previoufly refolved that the authority of the United States had been grofsly infulted. Soon after they left Philadelphia, and fixed on Princeton as the place of their next meeting. General Washington immediately ordered a large detachment of his army, to march for Philadelphia. Previoufly to their arrival, the diffurbances were quieted without bloodsched. Several of the mutineers were tried and condemned, two to fuffer death, and four to receive corporal punishment, but they were all afterwards pardoned.

Oct. 13, Towards the close of the year, Congress iffued a pro-1783. clamation, in which the armies of the United States were applauded, "for having difplayed in the progress of an arduous and difficult war, every military and patriotic virtue, and in which the thanks of their country were given them, for their long, eminent and faithful fervices." Congress then declared it to be their pleasure, "that such part of their fæderal armies, as stood engaged to ferve during the war, should from and after the third day of November next, be absolutely discharged from the faid fervice."

Nov. 2, On the day preceding their difinifion, General Wathington iffued his farewell orders, in the moft endearing language. After giving them his advice refpecting their future conduct, and bidding them an affectionate farewell, he concluded with thefe words, "May ample juffice be done them here, and may the choiceft of Heaven's favours, both here and hereafter, attend thofe, who under the divine aufpices have fecured innumerable bleffings for others. With thefe wifnes, and this benediction, the commander in chief is about to retire from fervice; the curtain of feparation will foon be drawn, and the military fcene, to him, will be clofed forever."

With great exertions of the fuperintendant of finance, four months pay, in part of feveral years arrearages, were given to the army. This fum, though triffling, was all the immediate recompense the States were able to make to those brave men, who had conducted their country through an eight years war, to peace and independence. The

The evacuation of New-York, took place in about 1783. three weeks after the American army was difcharged. trained communication between that city, though a Britifh garrifon, and the adjacent country. The bitternefs of war paffed away, and civilities were freely interchanged between those, who had lately fought for opportunities to deftroy each other. General Washington and Governor Clinton, with their fuites, made a public entry into the city of New-York, as foon as the royal army was withdrawn. The Lieutenant Governor, and members of the council, the officers of the American army, and the citizens, followed in an elegant procession. It was remarked that an unufual proportion of those who in 1776, had fled from New-York, were by death cut off from partaking in the general joy, which flowed in upon their fellow citizens, on returning to their ancient habitations. The eafe and affluence which they enjoyed in the days of their prosperity, made the severities of exile inconvenient to all, and fatal to many, particularly to fuch as were advanced in life. Those who survived, both felt and expreffed the overflowings of joy, on finding their fufferings and fervices rewarded with the recovery of their country ; the expulsion of their enemies, and the establishment of their independence. In the evening there was a difplay of fireworks, which exceeded every thing of the kind before feen in the United States. They commenced by a dove's defcending with an olive branch, and fetting fire to a marron battery.

The honr now approached in which it became neceffary for General Washington to take leave of his officers, who had been endeared to him by a long feries of common fufferings and dangers. This was done in a folemn. manner. The officers having previously assembled for the purpose, General Washington joined them, and calling for a glass of wine, thus addressed them, " with an heart full of love and gratitude, I now take leave of you, I most devoutly with that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy, as your former ones have been glorious and honourable." The officers came up fuc-Vot. II. ceffively, and he took an affectionate leave of each of them. When this affecting fcene was over, Wafhington left the room, and paffed through the corps of light infantry, to the place of embarkation. The officers followed in a folemn mute proceffion, with dejected countenances. On his entering the barge to crofs the north river, he turned towards the companions of his glory, and by waving his hat, bid them a filent adieu. Some of them anfwered this laft fignal of refpect and affection with tears, and all of them hung upon the barge which conveyed him from their fight, till they could no longer diftinguifh in it the perfon of their beloved commander in chief.

A propofal was made to perpetuate the friendship of the officers, by forming themfelves into a fociety, to be named after the famous Roman patriot Cincinnatus. The extreme jealousy of the new republics suspected danger to their liberties, from the union of the leaders of their late army, and efpecially from a part of their inftitution, which held out to their posterity, the honour of being admitted members of the fame fociety. To obviate all grounds of fear, the general meeting of the fociety, recommended an alteration of their inftitution, which has been adopted by eight of the flate focieties. By this recommendation it was proposed to expunge every thing that was hereditary, and to retain little elfe than their original name, and a focial charitable inftitution for perpetuating their perfonal friendships, and relieving the wants of their indigent brethren. General Washington on the approaching diffolution of the American army, by a circular letter to the Governors or Prefidents of the individual flates, gave his parting advice to his countrymen; and with all the charms of eloquence, inculcated the neceffity of union, justice, fubordination and of fuch principles and practices, as their new fituation required.

The army being dibanded, the commander in chief proceeded to Annapolis, then the feat of Congrefs, to refign his commission. On his way thither, he delivered to the Comptroller in Philadelphia an account of the expenditure of all the public money he had ever received. This was in his own hand writing, and every entry was made in a very particular manner. The whole fum, which in the courfe of the war had paffed through his hands, amounted only to $f_{14,479}$ 18 9 fterling Nothing was charged or retained as a reward for perfonal fervices, and actual diffurfements had been managed with fuch economy and fidelity, that they were all covered by the above moderate fum.

In every town and village, through which the General paffed, he was met by public and private demonstrations of gratitude and joy. When he arrived at Anna- Dec. 19 polis, he informed Congress of his intention to ask leave to refign the commission he had the honor to hold in their fervice, and defired to know their pleasure in what manner it would be most proper to be done. They refolved that it should be in a public audience. When the Dec. 23 day fixed for that purpose arrived, a great number of diffinguissed perfonages attended the intrressing scene. At a proper moment, General Washington addressied Thomas Mission the Prefident, in the following words:

"Mr. Prefident,

"The great events on which my refignation depended, having at length taken place, I have now the honor of offering my fincere congratulations to Congress, and of prefenting myfelf before them to furrender into their hands, the truft committed to me, and to claim the indulgence of retiring from the fervice of my country."

"Happy in the confirmation of our independence and fovereignty, and pleafed with the opportunity afforded the United States of becoming a refpectable nation, I refign with fatisfaction the appointment I accepted with diffidence; a diffidence in my abilities to accomplish fo arduous a task, which however was superfielded by a confidence in the restitude of our cause, the support of the Supreme Power of the union, and the patronage of Heaven."

"The fuccefsful termination of the war has verified the most fanguine expectations, and my gratitude for the interposition of Providence, and the affistance I have received from my countrymen, increases with every review of the, momentous contest." 1783.

" While

"While I repeat my obligations to the army in general, I fhould do injuffice to my own feelings not to acknowledge, in this place, the peculiar fervices, and diftinguifhed merits of the perfons who have been attached to my perfon during the war: it was impoffible the choice of confidential officers to compofe my family fhould have been more fortunate; permit me, fir, to recommend in particular those who have continued in the fervice to the prefent moment, as worthy of the favourable notice and patronage of Congrefs"

" I confider it as an indifpenfible duty to clofe this laft folemn act of my official life, by commending the interefts of our deareft country to the protection of Almighty God, and those who have the fuperintendance of them, to His holy keeping."

"Having now finished the work affigned me, I retire from the great theatre of action; and bidding an affectionate farewell to this august body, under whose orders I have long acted, I here offer my commission, and take my leave of all the employments of public life."

To this the Prefident returned the following answer:

"The United States in Congress affembled, receive with emotions too affecting for utterance, the folemn refignation of the authorities under which you have led their troops with fuccess, through a perilous and doubtful war."

"Called upon by your country to defend its invaded rights, you accepted the facred charge before it had formed alliances, and whilft it was without friends or a government to fupport you."

"You have conducted the great military contest with wislom and fortitude, invariably regarding the rights of the civil power through all difasters and changes: you have by the love and confidence of your fellow citizens enabled them to difplay their martial genius, and tranfmit their fame to posterity; you have perfevered, till these United States, aided by a magnanimous King and nation, have been enabled, under a just Providence, to close the war in freedom, fastery and independence; on which happy event we fincerely join you in congratulations." "Having

"Having defended the ftandard of liberty in this new world---having taught a leffon ufeful to thofe who inflict, and to thofe who feel opprefion, you retire from the great theatre of action, with the bleffing of your fellow citizens; but the glory of your virtues will not terminate with your military command, it will continue to animate remoteft ages. We feel with you, our obligations to the army in general, and will particularly charge ourfelves with the intereft of thofe confidential officers, who have attended your perfon to this affecting moment."

"We join you in commending the interefts of our deareft country to the protection of Almighty God, befeeching Him to difpofe the hearts and minds of its citizens, to improve the opportunity afforded them, of becoming a happy and refpectable nation; and for YOU, we addrefs to Him our earneft prayers, that a life fo beloved may be foffered with all His care: That your days may be happy as they have been illuftrious, and that He will finally give you that reward which this world canpot give."

The great fcenes that crouded in upon the imagination of the General, and of the Prefident, fo affected them both, that they almost lost the power of utterance. The mingled emotions that agitated the minds of the fpectators, on feeing the commander in chief of their armies, refigning all public employments, and his country acknowledging his fervices, and loading him with their bleffings were beyond defcription. Immediately on refigning his commiffion, Mr. Washington, " hastened with ineffable delights," (to use his own words) to his feat at Mount Vernon, on the banks of the Potowmac in Virginia. Here the hiftorian would wifh to make a paufe, while he defcribed, the fimple and heartfelt joy of neighbours and domeffics, who welcomed him to his home. Let it not be deemed foreign to his prefent fubject, to do homage to the feelings and character of the anniable partner of his conjugal happinefs, upon this occasion. She deferved this tide of unparalelled female honour and felicity, for the loved her country, and bore with more than Roman---with christian patience and fortitude, the pains to which his long long abfence, and the perils of his health and life had exposed her. Fain would the historian purfue the illustrions hero of the revolution, a little further, and attempt to deferibe his feelings upon his first review of the events of the war, from the quiet station which he now occupied. But this digretsion would lead him far from the objects of his history.

To pais fuddenly from the toils of the first public commission in the United States, to the care of a farm; to exchange the instruments of war, for the implements of hufbandry, and to become at once, the patron and example of ingenious and profitable agriculture, would to most men have been a difficult task. But to the elevated mind of the late commander in chief, of the armies of the United States, it was natural and delightful; and should these pages defeend to posterity, and war continue ages hence to be the means of establishing national justice, let the commanders of armies learn from the example of General Washington, that the fame which is acquired by the fword, without guilt or ambition, may be preferved without power, or splendor, in private life.

Though the war was over, much remained for Congrefs to do. The proper difpolition of their unfettled weftern and northern frontier, became an object of ferious attention. The eaftern states had been fettled uniformly in towofhips, but the middle and fouthern flates by indifcriminate location. On a comparison of the merits of these different methods of fettling a new country, Congrefs gave a decided preference to the former. Conformably to these principles, an ordinance was passed on the 20th of May 1785, for difpoling of that part of the weftern territory, which bounds on Pennfylvania. Many fettlers foon migrated to this country. Civil Government was eftablished among them. A Governor and Judges were appointed and paid by Congress. They fixed their capital to which they gave the name of Marietta, at the conflux of the Mufkingum and Ohio. In the first years of their fettlement, Congress ordained that they should be governed as a colony of the United States, but engaged, that as foon as they had attained a population, equal to that of the finalleft of the old flates, they fhould be received into into the union on equal terms. By this liberal policy, the bleffings of a free government, may be gradually extended to the remoteft bounds of the United States.

These arrangements for promoting domestic tranquillity were accompanied by others, for forming commercial connexions with the fovereigns of Europe. Towards the clofe of the war, Dr. Franklin had concluded a treaty between the United States, and the King of Sweden. He Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson were appointed joint commiffioners for forming commercial treaties with foreign powers. They fucceeded in their negotiation with the King of Pruffia, and the Emperor of Morocco. Mr. Adams was also appointed Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, to the Court of Great Britain; and was instructed to folicit a treaty between these two powers, but the Ministers of his Britannic Majesty, declined entering into any treaty with him. They affigned the inability of Congress, to compel the different states to observe general commercial regulations, as a reafon for declining the propofed connexion. From mifmanagement, the United States with respect to trade were in fact nearly as dependent on Great Britain, after the peace, as before the war. They had loft the privileges of British fubjects with regard to fome branches of commerce, but fuffered moft of the inconveniences of that political condition, in confequence of their inability to regulate their commerce by one will. In this deranged state of public affairs, Great Britain could expect little more from a treaty with the United States, than what her merchants already poffeffed. She continued to reap the benefits of an extensive trade with America, without a reciprocity of advantages. Mr. Adams finding his labours ineffectual, defired leave to return to America, which was granted.

To provide funds for paying their continental debt, engaged the attention of Congress, for fome time before, and after the peace. The amount of this at the close of the war as nearly as could be calculated, was about forty millions of dollars. In profecuting the neceffary means for difcharging it, the inefficacy of the atticles of confederation foon became apparent. By these, Congress

grefs though bound to pay, poffeffed no power of raifing a revenue. Its conftitutional authority extended no farther, than to make regulitions on the feveral states for their quotas, to be afcertained in a relative proportion to the value of their lands. A proposition was made to the feveral states near to the close of the war, to invest Congress with a power to levy an impost of five per cent. at the time and place of importation, on the value of all goods imported from foreign countries, till the whole of their public debt fhould be extinguished. Danger being now nearly over, felfilh paffions began to operate. Objections were made, to trufting the purfe and the fword into the hands of the fame body of men, and that too, for an indefinite period of time. To obviate thefefcruples, Congress on a reconfideration, proposed to limit the grant of a continental impost to 25 years, and to confine the application of its neat proceeds exclusively, to the discharge of existing debts. On these principles, a system of revenue for funding and ultimately paying the whole public debt was completed, and offered to the ftates for their Apr. 18 ratification. By this, it was propofed to raife 2 millions 1783. and a half of dollars annually, to defray the interest of the continental debt. It was expected that the impost would bring in the first year one million of dollars, and increase every year afterwards. The states were respectively called upon to raife the balance, according to proportions affigned them, from some permanent efft.blifhed fund fubject to the difpofal of Congress. A proposition was also made, to change the federal rule of apportioning the public debt, from the value of land, to the more practicable one of numbers of inhabitants in Apr. 18 the different states. The whole fystem was transmitted to the flate legiflatures, and accompanied by an animated addrefs, enforcing the propriety of its immediate adoption. Some of the ftates adopted it in the whole; others only in part, and fome not at all. The ftates whofe population was great, and whofe lands were of an inferior quality, objected to changing the federal rule of apportionment, from the value of lands to numbers. Some of the states which from their having convenient ports, were

were called importing flates, found it to be more for their immediate advantage, to raife money by impost for their feparate use, than for the benefit of the union. They who received foreign goods through neighbouring states, and which were called confuming states, com--plained that by the revolution they had only changed inafters, for that inftead of being taxed by Great Britain without their confent, they were virtually taxed in like manner by their fifter flates, who happened to be more favourably fituated for importing foreign goods. From thefe jarring interests, and from the want of a difposition to fupport a fupreme head, and to give up local advantages for the general benefit, the revenue fystem of Congrefs was never put in operation. Its failure was the fource of many evils No efficient funds being provided to pay the interest of the national debt, the public fecurities of the United States fell in their value to ten for one, and became an article of fpeculation. The warwornfoldier who received at the close of the conteft only an obligation for the payment of his hard earned dues, was from necessity often obliged to transfer his rights for an infignificant fum. The monied man who had trufted his country in the hour of her diffrefs, was deprived not only of his interest, on which he counted for his daily fupport, but of a great part of the value of his capital. The non-payment of public debts, fometimes inferred a neceffity, and always furnished an apology, for not difcharging private contracts. Confidence between man and man received a deadly wound. Public faith being first violated, private engagements lost much of their obligatory force. Gen. Washington who nobly refused any thing for himfelf, had eloquently though unfaccefsfully pleaded the caufe of the army, and other public creditors, in his circular letter to the governors before his refignation, and predicted the evils which followed from the rejection of the revenue fystem of Congress. His observations were as follows: " As to the fecond article which respects the performance of public juftice; Congress have in their late address to the United States almost exhausted the subject. They have explained their ideas to fully, and have enforced the obligations VOL. II. Uц

ligations the ftates are under to render complete juffice to all the public creditors, with fo much dignity and energy, that in my opinion no real friend to the honor and independency of America, can hefitate a fingle moment refpecting the propriety of complying with the just and honorable measures proposed. If their arguments do not produce conviction, I know of nothing that will have greater influence, especially when we recollect that the fystem referred to, being the refult of the collected wildom of the continent, must be esteemed, if not perfect, certainly the least objectionable of any that could be devifed, and that if it fhall not be carried into immediate execution, a national bankruptcy with all its deplorable confequences will take place, before any different plan can poffibly be propofed or adopted. So preffing are the prefent circumfances, and fuch is the alternative now offered to the ftates." Congress continued to fend forth annual requifitions, for the fums wanted for the public fervice, and indulged the hope that the ftates would e'er long be convinced, of the neceffity of adopting an efficient fyftem of general revenue: But their requisitions as well as their fystem of revenue, were difregarded by some of the flates, and but partially complied with by others. From this failure of public juffice, a deluge of evils overflowed the United States. Thefe were also encreased by an unfavorable balance of trade. The ravages of armies, and the interruption of a free communication, between Europe and America during the war, had multiplied the wants of the latter, to a degree which exceeded all previous calculations. An inundation of European manufactures, was therefore one of the first effects which followed the establishment of peace. These were purchased by the Americans far beyond their means of payment. Adventurers grafping at the profits of trading with the new formed states, exported to América goods to a great amount, exceeding what either prudence or policy could juffify. The Americans foon found themfelves involved in a debt, to the difcharge of which their refources were unequal. In feveral inftances, these debts were contracted on credit by perfons to whom the United States were indebted. Thefe

These prefuming on the justice of their country, had involved themselves in private engagements, hoping that what they received from the public would furnish them with the means of payment. Such were doubly distrefsed.

The fufferings of the inhabitants were increased in confequence of the obstructions of their trade. That intercourfe with the West-India Islands, from which, when colonies they derived large fupplies of gold and filver, was forbidden to them in their new capacity of independent states. Their fisheries received a fevere check, from their being excluded from feveral ports in which, when colonies, they had found a ready fale for the fruits of their industry, which they drew from the ocean. Thefe evils were still farther aggravated by the stoppage of the bounty on whale oil, to which, when British fubjects they were entitled. To add to their other misfortunes, they could no longer fail with fafety in the Mediterranean, a privilege which they had always enjoyed, while they were a part of the British empire. Unable to defend themfelves from the Algerine corfairs, they were obliged either to guit that beneficial trade, or enfure it at a ruinous premium.

The United States from the want of power in their common head, were incapacitated from acting in concert, fo as to avail themfelves of their natural advantages. Congrefs called once more upon the States to enlarge their powers, and particularly to entruft them with the regulation of commerce for a limited number of years. Some ftates fully complied with this call, but others fettered their grants with fuch conditions, as prevented the formation of an uniform fyftem.

From the combined operation of thefe caufes trade languifhed; credit expired; gold and filver vanifhed; and in confequence thereof, real property was depreciated to an extent equal to that of the depreciation of continental money, in the 2d or 3d year of its emiffion. Inftead of imitating the wife policy of Great Britain, in making an artificial medium of circulation, by funding their debts, feveral of the ftates to alleviate the diftrefles arifing arifing from the want of money, adopted the fallacious expedient of emitting paper, to fupply the place of goldand filver: But the remedy increafed the difeafe. If the funding plan had been adopted, the fum, due by the United States, was fo much within their refources, that by the ettablifhment of efficient funds, for the punctual difcharge of the intereft, the public debt might have eafily been made a public bleffing. It would have been a capital for the extension of agriculture, commerce and manufactures, as well as an honeft and effectual fublitute for real coin : But thefe advantages, which would have leffened much of the fafferings of the inhabitants, were loft by the imbecillity of the general government, and the want of concert in the frate legiflatures.

When the people on the return of peace fuppofed their troubles to be ended, they found them to be only varied. The calamities of war were followed by another clafs of evils, different in their origin, but not lefs injurious intheir confequences. The inhabitants feeling the preffure of their fufferings, and not knowing precifely from what fource they originated, or how to remedy them, became uneafy, and many were ready to adopt any defperate meait.es that turbulent leaders might recommend. In this irritable state, a great number of the citizens of Maffachusetts, fore with their enlarged portion of public calamity, were induced by feditious demagogues, tomake an open refistance to the operations of their ownfree government. Infurrections took place in many parts, and laws were trampled upon by the very men whofe deputies had enacted them, and whole deputies might have repealed them. By the moderation of the legislature, and efpecially by the bravery and good conduct of Generals Lincoln, and Shepherd, and the firmnefs of the well affected militia, the infurgents were fpeedily quelled, and good order reftored, with the lofs of about fix of the freemen of the ftate.

The untoward events which followed the re-effablifhment of peace, though evils of themfelves, were overruled for great national good. From the failure of their expectations of an immediate increase of political happinefs nefs, the lovers of liberty and independence began to be lefs fanguine in their hopes from the American revolution, and to fear that they had built a visionary fabric of government, on the fallacious ideas of public virtue; but that elasticity of the human mind, which is nurtured by free conftitutions, kept them from defponding. By an exertion of those inherent principles of felf-prefervation, which republics poffefs, a recurrence was had to the good fense of the people, for the rectification of fundamental diforders. While the country, free from foreign force and domestic violence, enjoyed tranquillity, a proposition was made by Virginia to all the other States to meet in convention, for the purpole of digefting a form of government, equal to the exigencies of the uni-The first motion for this purpose was made by Mr. 011. Madifon, and he had the pleafure of feeing it acceded to by twelve of the States, and finally to islue in the eftablishment of a New Constitution, which bids fair to repay the citizens of the United States for the toils, dangers and waftes of the revolution. The fundamental diffinction between the articles of confederation and the new conftitution lies in this; the former acted only on States, the latter on individuals; the former could neither raife men nor money by its own authority, but lay at the difcretion of thirteen different legislatures, and without their unanimous concurrence was unable to provide for the public fafety, or for the payment of the national The experience of feveral years had proved the debt. impoffibility of a government answering the end of its inftitution, which was dependent on others for the means neceffary for attaining thefe ends. By the new conftitution, one legiflative, executive, and judicial power pervades the whole union. This enfures an uniform obfervance of treaties, and gives a ftability to the general government, which never could be attained while the acts and requisitions of Congress were subject to the revision of thirteen legiflatures, and while thirteen diftinct and unconnected judiciaries, had a conftitutional right to decide on the fame fubject.' The people of the United States gave no new powers to their vulers, but made a more more judicious arrangement of what they had formerly They enlarged the powers of the general goceded. vernment, not by taking from the people, but from the State legislatures. They took from the latter a power of levying duties on the importation of merchandife from foreign countries, and transferred it to Congrefs for the common benefit of the union. They also invested the general government with a power to regulate trade. levy taxes and internal duties on the inhabitants. That these enlarged powers might be used only with caution and deliberation, Congress, which formerly confifted of only one body, was made to confift of two; one of which was to be chosen by the people in proportion to their numbers, the other by the State legislatures. The execution of the acts of this compounded legiflature was committed to a Supreme Magistrate, with the title of Prefident. The conflicution, of which thefe were the principal features, was fubmitted to the people for ratification. Animated debates' took place on the propriety of eftablifhing or rejecting it. Some States, who from their local fituation were benefited by receiving impost duties into their treasuries, were avorfe from the giving of them up to the union. Others, who were confuming but not importing States, had an interested inducement of an opposite kind, to support the proposed new constitution. The profpects of increased employment for shipping, and the enlargement of commerce, weighed with those States which abounded in failors and fhips, and alfo with feaport towns, to advocate the adoption of the new fystem; but those States or parts of States, which depended chiefly on agriculture, were afraid that zeal for encouraging an American marine, by narrowing the grounds of competition among foreigners for purchafing and carrying their produce, would leffen their profits. Some of this defcription therefore conceived that they had a local intereft in refufing the new fyftem.

Individuals who had great influence in ftate legiflatures, or who held profitable places under them, were unwilling to adopt a government which, by diminifhing the power of the ftates, would eventually diminifh their own own importance: others who looked forward to feats in the general government, or for offices under its authority, had the fame interested reason for fupporting its adoption. Some from jealoufy of liberty. were afraid of giving too much power to their rulers; others, from an honeft ambition to aggrandize their country, were for paving the way to national greatnefs by melting down the feparate States into a national mass. The former feared the New Constitution; the latter gloried in it. Almost every passion which could agitate the human breaft, interefted States and individuals for and against the adoption of the proposed plan of government. Some whole classes of people were in its favor. The mais of public creditors expected payment of their debts from the establishment of an efficient government, and were therefore decidedly for its adoption. Such as lived on falaries, and those who, being clear of debt, wifhed for a fixed medium of circulation and the free courfe of law, were the friends of a conflictation which prohibited the iffuing of paper money and all interference between debtor and creditor. In addition to thefe, the great body of independent men, who faw the neceflity of an energetic general government, and who, from the jarring interefts of the different States. could not forefee any probability of getting a better one than was proposed, gave their fupport to what the federal convention had projected, and their influence effected its establishment. After' a full confideration, and thorough difcuffion of its principles, it was ratified by the conventions of eleven of the original thirteen States, and the acceffion of the other two is foon expected.* The ratification of it was celebrated in most of the capitals of the States with elegant proceffions, which far exceeded any thing of the kind ever before exhibited in America. Time and experience only can fully difcover the effects of this new distribution of the powers of government; but in theory it feems well calculated to unite liberty with fafety, and to lay the foundation of national greatnets, while it abridges none of the rights of the States, or of the people. The

* North-Carolina fince writing the above, has acceded to the union.

The new conftitution having been ratified by eleven of the States, and fenators and reprefentatives having been chosen agreeably to the articles thereof, they met at New York and commenced proceedings under it. 'The old Congress; and confederation, like the continental money, expired without a figh or groan. A new Congress, with more ample powers and a new conftitution, partly national and partly federal, succeeded in their place to the great joy of all who wished for the happiness of the United States.

Though great diverfity of opinions had prevailed about the new conflication, there was but one opinion about the perfon who should be appointed its supreme executive officer. The people, as well anti-federalists as federalifts, (for by thefe names the parties for and against the new conftitution were called) unanimoufly turned their eyes on the late commander of their armies, as the most proper perfon to be their first President. Perhaps there was not a well informed individual in the United States, (Mr. Washington himself only excepted) who was not anxious that he should be called to the executive administration of the proposed new plan of government. Unambitious of farther honors he had retired to his farm in Virginia, and hoped to be excufed from all farther public fervice; but his country called him by an unanimous vote to fill the highest station in its gift. That honeft zeal for the public good, which had uniformly _ influenced him to devote both his time and talents to the fervice of his country, got the better of his love of retirement, and induced him once more to engage in the great bufinels of making a nation happy. The intelligence of his election being communicated to him, while on his farm in Virginia, he fet out foon after for New-York." On his way thither, the road was crouded with numbers anxious to fee the Man of the people. Efcorts of militia, and of gentlemen of the first character and ftation, attended him from State to State, and he was every where received with the highest honors which a grateful and admiring people could confer. Addreffes of congratulation were prefented to him by the inhabitants of almost every place of confequence through which he paffed paffed, to all of which he returned fuch modeft unaffuming anfwers as were in every_refpect fuitable to his fituation. So great were the honors, with which he was loaded, that they could fearcely have failed to produce haughtinefs in the mind of any ordinary man; but nothing of the kind was ever difcovered in this extraordinary perfonage. On all occafions he behaved to all men with the affability of one citizen to another. He was truly great in deferving the plaudits of his country, but much greater in not being elated with them.

Of the numerous addreffes which were prefented on this occafion, one fubfcribed by Dennis Ramfay the Mayor of Alexandria, in the name of the people of that city, who were the neighbours of Mr. Washington, was particularly and universally admired. It was in the following words:

"To GEORGE WASHINGTON, Efq. President of the United States, &c.

"AGAIN your country commands your care. Obedient to its wifnes, unmindful of your eafe, we fee you again relinquifhing the blifs of retirement; and this too, at a period of life, when nature itfelf feems to authorize a preference of repofe!

"Not to extol your glory as a foldier; not to pour forth our gratitude for past fervices; not to acknowledge the juffice of the unexampled honour which has been conferred upon you by the spontaneous and unanimous fuffrage of three millions of freemen, in your election to the fupreme magistracy; nor to admire the patriotifm which directs your conduct, do your neighbours and friends now addrefs you; themes lefs fplendid but more endearing, impress our minds. The first and best of citizens must leave us; our aged must lose their ornament; our youth their model; our agriculture its improver; our commerce its friend; our infant academy its protector; our poor their benefactor; and the interior navigation of the Potowmack (an event replete with the most extensive utility, already, by your unremitted exertions, brought into partial use) its inflitutor and promoter.

. VOL. II.

Farewell

"Farewell!--Go! and make a grateful people happy; a people, who will be doubly grateful, when they contemplate this recent facrifice for their intereft."

"To that Being, who maketh and unmaketh at his will, we commend you; and after the accomplifhment of the arduous bufinefs to which you are called, may he reftore to us again, the beft of men, and the moft beloved fellow citizen !"

To this Mr. Washington returned the following answer:

" GENTLEMEN,

" Although I ought not to conceal, yet I cannot defcribe the painful emotions which I felt in being called upon to determine whether I would accept or refuse the prefidency of the United States. The unanimity in the choice, the opinion of my friends, communicated from different parts of Europe, as well as from America, the apparent with of those who were not entirely fatisfied' with the conflitution in its prefent form; and an ardent defire on my own part to be inftrumental in connecting the good will of my countrymen towards each other; have induced an acceptance. Those who know me best (and you, my fellow citizens, are from your fituation, in that number) know better than any others, my love of retirement'is fo great, that no earthly confideration, fhort of a conviction of duty, could have prevailed upon me to depart from my refolution " never more to take any fhare in transactions of a public nature." For, at my age, and in my circumftances, what profpects or advantages could I propofe to myfelf, from embarking again on the tempefluous and uncertain ocean of public life ?

" I do not feel myfelf under the neceffity of making public declarations, in order to convince you, gentlemen, of my attachment to yourfelves, and regard for your interefts; the whole tenor of my life has been open to your infpection; and my paft actions, rather than my prefent declarations, muft be the pledge of my future conduct.

" In the mean time, I thank you most fincerely for the expressions of kindness, contained in your valedictory address. It is true, just after having bade adieu to my domestic connexions, this tender proof of your friendschips thip is but too well calculated, ftill further to awaken. my fenfibility, and increase my regret at parting from the enjoyment of private life.

" All that now remains for me, is to commit myfelf and you to the protection of that beneficent Being, who on a former occasion hath happily brought us together, after a long and diffreffing feparation; perhaps the fame gracious providence will again indulge me. Unutterable fenfations must then be left to more expressive filence; while from an aching heart, I bid you all, my affectionate friends, and kind neighbours, fareweil !

Gray's bridge over the Schuylkill which Mr. Washington had to pafs, was highly decorated with laureis and evergreens. At each end of it were erected magnificent arches composed of laurels, emblematical of the ancient Roman triumphal arches; and on each fide of the bridge, was a laurel fhrubbery. As Mr. Washington paffed the bridge a youth ornamented with fprigs of laurel, affifted by machinery let drop above his head, though upperceived by him, a civic crown of laurel Upwards of 20,000 citizens lined the fences, fields, and avenues, between the Schuylkill and Philadelphia. Through thefe he was conducted to the city, by a numerous and respectable body of the citizens, where he partook of an elegant entertainment provided for him. The pleafures of the day werefacceeded by a handfome difplay of fireworks in the evening.

When Mir. Wathington croffed the Delaware, and landed on the Jerfey thore, he was faluted with three cheets by the inhabitants of the vicinity. When he came to the brow of the hill, on his way to Trenton, a triumphal arch was crected on the bridge, by the direction of the ladies of the place. The crown of the arch was highly ornamented with imperial laurels and flowers, and on it was difplayed in large figures, December 26th 1776. On the fweep, of the arch, beneath was this infeription, The defender of the Mothers, will also protest their Daughters. On the north fide were ranged a number of young miffes dreffed in white, with garlands of flowers on their heads, and baikets of flowers on their arms; in the fecond row food the young ladies, and behind them the married ladies dies of the town. The inftant he paffed the arch, the young miffes began to fing the following ode:

"Welcome mighty chief once more,

"Welcome to this grateful shore:

" Now no mercenary foe

" Aims again the fatal blow,

" Aims at thee the fatal blow.

" Virgins fair, and matrons grave,

" Thefe thy conquering arm did fave,.

" Build for thee triumphal bowers,

"Strew, ye fair, his way with-flowers,

" Strew your Hero's way with flowers."

As they fung the laft-lines, they ftrewed their flowers on the road before their beloved deliverer. His fituation on this occasion, contrasted with what he had in Dec. 1776 felt on the fame fpot, when the affairs of America were at the lowest ebb of depression, filled him with fenfations that cannot be defcribed. He was rowed acrofs the bay from Elizabeth-Town to New-York, in an elegant barge by thirteen pilots. All the veffels in the harbour hoifted their flags. Stairs were erected and decorated for his reception. On his landing, universal joy diffused itfelf through every order of the people, and he was received and congratulated by the Governor of the State, and officers of the corporation. He was conducted from the landing place to the houfe which had been fitted up for his reception, and was followed by an elegant proceffion of militia in their uniforms, and by great puinbers of citizens. In the evening, the houfes of the inhabitants were brilliantly illuminated. A day was fixed, foon after his arrival, for his taking the oath of office, which was in the following words: " I do folemnly fwear that I will faithfully execute the office of Prefident of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preferve, protect, aud defend, the constitution of the United States." On this occasion he was wholly clothed in American manufactures. In the morning of the day appointed for this purpofe, the clergy of different denominations affembled their congregations in their refpective places of worfhip, and offered up public prayers for the Prefident and people of the United States. About ° noon noon a procession, followed by a multitude of citizens, moved from the Prefident's houfe to Federal Hall. When they came within a short distance from the Hall, the troops formed a line on both fides of the way, through which Mr. Washington, accompanied by the Vice-Prefident Mr. John Adams, paffed into the Senate chamber. Immediately after, accompanied by both houfes, he went into the gallery fronting Broad ftreet, and before them and an immenfe concourse of citizens, took the oath prefcribed by the conftitution; which was administered by R. R. Livingston, the Chancellor of the State of New-York. An awful filence prevailed among the spectators during this part of the ceremony. It was a minute of the most fublime political joy. The Chancellor then proclaimed him Prefident of the United States. This was answered by the discharge of 13 guns, and by the effusions of thouts, from near 10,000 grateful and affectionate hearts. The Prefident powed most respectfully to the people, and the air refounded again with their acclamations, He then retired to the Senate chamber, where he made the following speech to both houses:

"Fellow Citizens of the Senate, and of the Houfe of Reprefentatives.

"Among the viciflitudes incident to life, no event could have filled me with greater anxieties, that of which the notification was transmitted by your order, and received on the 14th day of the present month --- On the one hand, I was fummoned by my country, whole voice I can never hear but with veneration and love, from a retreat which I had chofen with the fondest predilection, and in my flattering hopes, with an immutable decifion, as the afylum of my declining years; a retreat which was rendered every day more neceffary as well as more dear to me, by the addition of habit to inclination, and of frequent interruptions in my health, to the gradual wafte committed on it by time .--- On the other hand, the magnitude and difficulty of the truft to which the voice of my country called me, being fufficient to awaken in the wifest and most experienced of her citizens, a diftruftful ferutiny into his qualifications, could not but overwhelm with despondence, one, who, inheriting inferior ferior endowments from nature; and unpractifed in the duties of civil administration, ought to be peculiarly confcious of his own deficiencies. In this conflict of emotions, all I dare aver, is, that it has been my faithful fludy to collect my duty from a just appreciation of every circumstance, by which it might be affected. All I dare hope, is, that, if in executing this task, I have been too much fwayed by a grateful rememberance of former infances, or by an affectionate fensibility to this transferdant proof of the confidence of my fellow citizens; and have thence too little confulted my incapacity as well as definclination, for the weighty and untried cares before me; my error will be palliated by the motives which mifled me, and its confequences be judged by my country, with fome fhare of the partiality in which they originated.

- "Such being the impreffions under which I have in obedience to the public fummons, repaired to the prefent fistion; it would be peculiarly improper to omit in this first official act my fervent fupplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the univerfe---who prefides in the councils of nations---and whofe providential aids can fupply every human defect---that His benediction may confectate to the liberties and happinels of the people of the United States, a government inftituted by themfelves for these effential purposes; and may enable every inftrument employed in its administration, to execute with fuccefs, the functions allotted to his charge. In tendering this homage to the Great Author of every public and private good, I affure myfelf that it expresses your fentiments not lefs than my own; nor those of my fellow citizens at large, lefs than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible Hand, which conducts the affairs of men, more than the people of the United States. Every flep by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation, feems to have been diftinguished by fome token of providential agency. And in the important revolution just accomplished in the fystem of their united government, the tranquil deliberations, and voluntary confent of fo many diftinct communities, from which the event has refulted, cannot be compared compared with the means by which moft governments have been eftablished, without fome return of pious gratitude, along with an humble anticipation of the future bleffings which the past feem to prefage. These reflections arising out of the prefent criss, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking, that there are none under the influence of which, the proceedings of a new and free government can more auspiciously commence.

" By the article eftablishing the executive department, it is made the duty of the Prefident "to recommend to your confideration, fuch measures as he shall judge neceffary and expedient." The circumstances under which I now meet you will acquit me from entering into that fubject, farther than to refer to the great conflicutional charter under which you are affembled, and which, in defining your powers, defignates the objects to which your attention is to be given. It will be more confistent with those circumstances, and far more congenial with the feelings which actuate me, to fubfitute, in place of a recommendation of particular measures, the tribute that is due to the talents, the rectitude, and the patriotifm which adorn the characters felected to devife and adopt them. In those honorable qualifications, I behold the furest pledges that as on one fide no local prejudices, or attachments --- no feparate views, nor party animofities, will mifdirect the comprehensive and equal eye which ought to watch over this great affemblage of communities and interefts; fo, on another, that the foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality; and the pre-eminence of free government, be exemplified by all the attributes which can win the affections of its citizens, and command the refpect of the world. I dwell on this profpect with every fatisfaction which an ardent love for my country can infpire. Since there is no truth more thoroughly eftablished, than that there exists in the economy and course of nature, an indiffoluble union between virtue and happinefs; between duty and advantage, between the genuine maxims of an honeft and magnanimous people people, and the folid rewards of public profperity and felicity. Since we ought to be no lefs perfuaded that the propitious fmiles of Heaven, can never be expected on a nation that diffegards the eternal rules of order and right, which Heaven itfelf has ordained. And fince the prefervation of the facred fire of liberty, and the deftiny of the republican model of government, are juftly confidered as deeply, perhaps as finally ftaked, on the experiment entrufted to the hands of the American people.

"Befides the ordinary objects fubmitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide, how far an exercife of the occasional power delegated by the 5th article of the constitution, is rendered expedient at the prefent juncture by the nature of objections which have been urged against the fystem, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them.

"Inftead of undertaking particular recommendations on this fubject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your differnment and purfuit of the public good.

"For l affure myfsif that whilft you carefully avoid every alteration which might endanger the benefits of an united and effective government, or which ought to await the future leffon of experience; a reverence for the characteriftic rights of freemen, and a regard for the public harmony, will fufficiently influence your deliberations on the queftion, how far the former can be more impregnably fortified, or the latter be fafely and advantageoufly promoted.

"To the preceding observations I have one to add, which will be most properly addressed to the House of Representatives. It concerns myself, and will therefore be as brief as possible.

"When I was first honored with a call into the fervice of my country, then on the eve of an arduous ftruggle for its liberties, the light in which I contemplated my duty required, that I should renounce every pecuniary compensation. From this resolution I have in no instance departed. And being still under the impressions which produced it, I must decline as inapplicable to myfelf 'felf, any fhare in the perfonal emoluments, which may be indifpenfibly included in a permanent provision for the executive department; and must accordingly pray, that the pecuniary estimates for the station in which I am placed, may, during my continuance in it, be limited to fuch actual expenditures as the public good may be thought to require.

"Having thus imparted to you my fentiments, as they have been awakened by the occafion which brings us together---I fhall take my prefent leave; but not without reforting once more to the benign Parent of the human race, in humble fupplication, that fince He has been pleafed to favor the American people with opportunities for deliberating in perfect tranquillity, and difpofitions for deciding with unparalleled unanimity on a form of government, for the fecurity of their union, and the advancement of their happines; fo His Divine bleffing may be equally confpicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate confultations, and the wife measures, on which the fucces of this government must depend."

The President, of Congress, then attended on divine fervice.

In the evening a very ingenious and fplendid fhew of fire works was exhibited. Betwixt the fort and the bowling green flood confpicuous, a fuperb and brilliant transparent painting, in the centre of which was the portrait of the Prefident represented under the emblem of fortitude, on his right hand was justice, representing the Senate of the United States, and on his left, Wisdom, representing the house of Representatives.

This memorable day completed the organization of the new conftitution. By this eftablifhment the rifing generation will have an opportunity of obferving the refult of an experiment in politics, which before has never been fairly made. The experience of former ages, has given many melancholy proofs, that popular governments have feldom anfwered in practice, to the theories and warm wifhes of their admirers. The prefent inhabitants of independent America, now have an opportunity to wipe off this afperfion, to affert the dignity of human nature, and the capacity of mankind for felf-government.

Vol. II.

Citizen

Citizens of the United States ! you have a well balanced conftitution eftablished by general confent, which is an improvement on all republican forms of government heretofore eftablished. It posseffes the good qualities of monarchy, but without its vices. The wifdom and ftability of an ariftocracy, but without the infolence of hereditary mafters. The freedom and independence of a popular affembly acquainted with the wants and wifnes of the people, but without the capacity of doing those mischiefs which refult from uncontrolled power in one affembly. The end and object of it is public good. If you are not happy it will be your own fault. No knave or fool can plead an hereditary right to fport with your property or your liberties. Your laws and your lawgivers' muft all proceed from yourfelves. You have the experience of nearly fix thousand vears, to point out the rocks on which former republics have been dashed to pieces. Learn wifdom from their misfortunes. Cultivate justice both public and private. No government will or can endure which does not protect the rights of its fubjects. Unlefs fuch efficient regulations are adopted, as will fecure property as well as liberty, one revolution will follow another. Anarchy, monarchy or despotism, will be the confequence. By just laws and the faithful execution of them, public and private credit will be reftored, and the reftoration of credit will be a mine of wealth to this young country. It will make a fund for agriculture, commerce and manufactures, which will foon enable the United States to claim an exalted rank among the nations of the earth. Such are the refources of your country, and fo trifling are your debts, compared with your refources, that proper fyftems wifely planned and faithfully executed, will foon fill your extensive territory with inhabitants, and give you the command of fuch ample capitals, as will enable you to run the career of national greatness, with advantages equal to the oldeft kingdoms of Europe. What they have been flowly growing to, in the course of near two thousand years you may hope to equal within one century. If you continue under one government, built on the folid foundations of public justice, and public virtue, there is no point of national greatnefs to which you may not afpire with a well founded hope of fpeedily speedily attaining it. Cherish and support a reverence for government, and cultivate union between the Ea.? and the South, the Atlantic and the Miffiffippi. Let the greatest good of the greatest number be the pole star of your public and private deliberations. Shun wars, they beget debt, add to the common vices of mankind, and produce others; which are almost peculiar to themfelves. Agriculture, manufactures and commerce, are your proper bufinefs. Seek not to enlarge your territory by conqueft. It is already fufficiently extensive. You have ample fcope for the employment of your most active minds, in promoting your own domeftic happinefs. ' Maintain your own rights and let all others remain in quiet poffession of theirs: Avoid difcord, faction, luxury and the other vices which have been the bane of commonwealths. 1 Cherith and reward the philosophers, the flatesmen and the patriots, who devote their talents and time at the expense of their private interests, to the toils of enlightening and directing their fellow citizens, and thereby refcue citizens and rulers of republics, from the common and too often merited charge of ingratitude. Practife induftry, frugality, temperance, moderation, and the whole lovely train of republican virtues. Banifi from vour borders the liquid fire of the West-Indies, which while it entails poverty and difeafe, prevents industry and foments private quarrels. Venerate the plough, the hoe, and all the implements of agriculture. Honour the men who with their own hands maintain their families, and raife up children who are inured to toil, and capable of defending their country. Reckon the neceffity of labour not among the curfes, but the bleffings of life. Your towns will probably e're long be engulphed in luxury and effeminacy. If your liberties and future prospects depended on them, your career of liberty would probably be thort; but a great majority of your country muft, and will be yeomanry, who have no other dependence than on Almighty God for his ufual bleffing on their daily labour. From the great excess of the number of fuch independent farmers in thefe States, over and and above all other claffes of inhabitants, the long continuance of your liberties may be reafonably prefumed.

Let the haples African fleep undifturbed on his nativir shore, and give over withing for the extermination of the ancient proprietors of this land. Universal juffice is univerfal intereft. The most enlarged happiness of one people, by no means requires the degradation or defirure. tion of another. It would be more glorious to civilife one tribe of favages than to exterminate or expel a fcore. There is territory enough for them and for you. Ind ftead of invading their rights, promote their happinefs, and give them no reafon to curfe the folly of their fathers, who fuffered yours to fit down on a foil which the common Parent of us both had previoufly affigned to them: but above all, be particularly careful that your own descendents do not degenerate into favages. Diffufe the means of education, and particularly of religious instruction, through your remotest settlements. To this end, fupport and ftrengthen the hands of public teachers, and especially of worthy clergymen. Let your voluntary contributions confute the difhonourable pofition, that religion cannot be fupported but by compulses ry establishments. Remember that there can be no potlitical happiness without liberty; that there can be no liberty without morality; and that there can be no inorality without religion.

It is now your turn to figure on the face of the earth, and in the annals of the world. You poffers a country which in lefs than a century will probably contain fifty millions of inhabitants. You have, with a great expence of blood and treafure, refcued yourfelves and your pofterity from the domination of Europe. Perfect the good work you have begun, by forming fuch arrangements and inflitutions as bid fair for enfuring to the prefent and future generations the bleflings for which you have fuccefsfully contended.

May the Almighty Ruler of the Univerfe, who has raifed you to Independence, and given you a place among the nations of the earth, make the American Revolution an Era in the hiftory of the world, remarkable for the progreffive increase of human happiness!--- An An Alphabetical Lift of the Members of Congrefs, who attended from the feveral States, from the 5th November, 1774, to the 3d of March, 1789.
