with President Angell, of the University of Michigan. From 1849 until 1852, he traveled in foreign countries and utilized the medical knowledge, previously acquired, by performing the function of ship's surgeon on several of the vessels upon which he sailed. After making a circuit of the globe, he returned to the United States in 1852, to pursue the study of medicine, and entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, also attending lectures at Jefferson Medical College. At about this time Dr. Cooke commenced the investigation of the principles and practice of homeopathy, for the purpose of making intelligent refutation of its tenets; but "though he came to scoff, he staid to pray," and became a firm adherent and exponent of its doctrines, graduating from the Homeopathic Medical College of Pennsylvania in the class of 1853-54. After his graduation he commenced the practice of medicine in Providence, R. I., with A. H. Okie, M.D., who was the first homeopathic graduate in the United States. In 1855, Dr. Cooke removed to Chicago, since which time, until his death, he was identified with the homeopathic practitioners of this city; where his scientific attainments, his classical scholarship and his varied and notable accomplishments not alone brought deserved repute to the man but also to the profession he adorned. In 1859, when the Hahnemann College was organized, he was selected as professor of chemistry, and afterward professor of theory and practice of medicine, which latter chair he occupied until he resigned in 1870. In addition to these positions, Dr. Cooke was twice elected to the professorship of the theory and practice of medicine in different medical institutions, with solicitations to remove his residence to the locations of the colleges; but he decided that Chicago was to be his permanent abiding place, and this decision caused him to resign the professorship of special pathology and diagnosis of the Pulte Homeopathic College, of Cincinnati, he having accepted that chair at the opening of the college in 1872, retaining it until the termination of the session. The Legislature of Michigan having decreed that a chair of theory and practice in the medical department of the University of Michigan should be awarded to a member of the homeopathic profession, a convention of that class of physicians was held at Ann Arbor, Mich., on the 7th of May, 1873, and Dr. Cooke was the first of the three physicians nominated for that professorship from whom the regents of the University were to make their selections. He was an able and scholarly author, and contributed extensively to both general and medical literature, including two comprehensive and notable works, entitled "Satan in Society" and "Antiseptic Medication." Dr. Cooke was married, on the 15th of October, 1856, to Laura Wheaton Abbot, of Warren, R. I., daughter of the late Commodore Joel Abbot, a highly distinguished officer of the "old" United States Navy, and has four children—Nicholas Francis, Jr., Abbot Stanislaus, Joseph Walter, and Mary Gertrude. The various attainments and qualifications of Dr. Cooke received, in 1880, another merited recognition,—the emeritus professorship of special pathology and diagnosis in the Hahnemann Medical College and Hospital of Chicago. He was a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy since 1854, becoming a "senior member" in 1878, and was elected vice-president of that body in 1879. He was made Doctor of Laws by St. Ignatius College, June 5, 1871. His death occurred on February 1, 1885, of disease of the heart, very suddenly; and thereby society lost an upright and honorable gentleman, the profession one of its most intellectual and capable members and his friends one whose memory will ever remain with them as one of the gentlest, yet staunchest, of men. His skill and experience have alleviated innumerable instances of bodily suffering; his kindly sympathy and ready benevolence were to the full as effectual in helping mental and physical distress; and none who sought his aid and counsel, as a physician or friend, "came empty away."

GEORGE E. SHIPMAN, M.D., founder and superintendent of the Foundlings' Home, was born on March 4, 1820, in the city of New York. After a residence of a year and a half at Middlebury College, Vermont, in the fall of 1836 he entered the sophomore class of the University of the City of New York, from which he graduated in 1839. He pursued his medical course in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, under the direction of Dr. Alfred C. Post, of New York City. He commenced to practice in January, and in September graduated from the college. Dr. Shipman came west soon afterward, going first to Peoria, but, in January, 1844, moved to Andover, Henry Co., Ill. In April, 1845, he married Miss Fannie E. Boardman, of Northford, Conn., and came to Chicago in October, 1846. At this period there were not more than half a dozen regular practicing physicians of the homeopathic school west of Buffalo. Dr. Shipman soon was recognized as a practitioner of ability, and when the homeopaths commenced to gain in number and influence, he took a most active part in organizing them into the local societies. In 1851, he was instrumental in the formation of the Western Homeopathic Association, and, in 1857, was appointed one of the homeopathic board who were allowed by the Common Council to be in attendance upon the patients of the new city hospital. In 1854, he had established the first homeopathic hospital in the city, on Kinzie Street; and, in 1855, when the Hahnemann College was founded, through the efforts of Dr. D. S. Smith, he was, by the act of incorporation, made one of its first board of trustees. Dr. Shipman subsequently became a member of the faculty, taking the chair of matéria medica and therapeutics. He continued in the successful practice of his profession, and, in January, 1871, opened the Foundlings' Home, the noble charity of which he still has the active management. It was first established at No. 54 South Green Street, but, for want of space, was afterward removed. Until May, 1872, Dr. Shipman carried the whole responsibility of the enterprise upon his own shoulders; but, at that time, the Home was incorporated and a board of trustees appointed under the general act. Two years thereafter, a removal was effected to its fine quarters on South Wood Street. As secretary and superintendent of the Foundlings' Home, he is still actively engaged in the practice of the profession which he has so long adorned and through which he is now doing so magnificent a work. In October, 1848, he began to publish the North-Western Journal, a monthly of sixteen pages, which was continued for four years. This was the first Homeopathic Medical Journal published in the West. At the second annual meeting of the Western Institute of Homeopathy, held in St. Louis, May, 1865, he was appointed editor of the United States Medical and Surgical Journal, published under the auspices of the Western Institute, the first number of which was issued in Chicago in September, 1865, and filled this position for five years with signal ability. At the request of Dr. VonGranovogel, surgeon-in-chief of the Bavarian army, he translated his Text-book of Homeopathy from the German, it being first published in the year 1870. Dr. Shipman has eight living children and twenty-three grandchildren.

Geo. E. Shipman

THOMAS CATTON DUNCAN, M.D., one of Chicago's very prominent physicians, is a native of Scotland, where he was born August 18, 1840. When he was but two years of age, his parents emigrated to Western New York, where they settled at Peoria. They there remained until 1848, when they again removed to Waukesha County, Wis., and there located. He there attended the public schools until he was seventeen years of age, when he entered the Palmyra High School, and from there went to Milton College. Having decided upon medicine as his profession, he was devoting his studies especially with that end in view, and had made fair progress when the news of Fort Sumter's fall flashed through the country. Mr. Duncan immediately dropped his books and enlisted in the 1st Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers. At Cape Girardeau he went into hospital service, where he remained until 1863, when, his health failing him, he left the service and returned to the North, and resumed his studies. He subsequently entered Hahnemann Medical College, from which institution he graduated with honor in 1866. Soon afterward he was appointed editor of the United States Medical Investigator, which position he still holds.

In 1809, he was elected lecturer on diseases of children in the Hahnemann College, and, in 1881, was elected clinical professor of diseases of children in Chicago Homeopathic Medical College, which position he filled for two years; but his extensive practice, added to the onerous labors consequent upon his occupancy of the editorial chair of a weekly medical journal, compelled him to resign his professorship. Doctor Duncan is a member, honorary and active, of a number of medical, literary, social and other organizations. He is also a voluminous writer, and his contributions to the medical and secular press display a philosophical as well as very practical mind. He is the author of a number of valuable medical treatises and works; among the latter is one entitled "Diseases of Infants and Children, and their Homeopathic Treatment," which is an eminent authority and text-book in this branch of medicine. The doctor's interest in children, as consulting physician to the Chicago Foundlings' Home, and his success in their treatment, led his friends to urge him to write a guide to mothers. This has been well executed in the book entitled "Feeding and Management of Children, and the Homeopathic and General Management of their Diseases." Doctor Duncan has been equally successful in the practice of his profession as with the literary laurels he has won by the use of his pen, and there are few practitioners who are more justly honored by the profession and esteemed by their clients, than Dr. T. C. Duncan.

EDWIN M. HALE, M.D., was born at Newport, N. H., in the year 1820, and is the son of Dr. S. Hale, a lineal descendant of the Hales of Norfolk, England. At the age of seven, his parents removed to Fredonia, Ohio. At the age of twenty, he began the study of law, but, finding it uncongenial, cast it aside, and entered the office of Dr. Blair, a prominent homeopathic physician of Newark, Ohio. Matriculating in the Cleveland Homeopathic College in 1850, he graduated therefrom in 1859, having practiced medicine in Jonesville, Mich., in the interval. While there he became associate editor of the North American Journal of Homeopathy and of the American Homeopathic Observer. In 1860, he produced "A Monograph of Gelsemium" and followed it by a work entitled "The Materia Medica and Therapeutics of New Remedies." During the year 1864, he accepted the chair of materia medica in the Hahnemann Medical College of Chicago, and was then associated with Dr. A. E. Small of this city. He produced "Therapeutics of Sterility" in 1869, a work of rare merit, and one year later was elected lecturer on diseases of the heart in the Hahnemann College. His lectures have since been published, and the work is now in its ninth edition. "A Compendium of Health," a large and exhaustive work, which has had an immense sale, containing the best remedies and methods of treatment for both men, animals, birds, etc., was written under his editorial supervision. His greatest work "New Remedies," has been re-printed in French, German and Spanish. He was married, October 18, 1855, to Miss Abbie George, of Jonesville, Mich., and has two children—Dr. Albert B. Hale and Mrs. Frances G. Gardiner, of this city. Dr. Hale was one of the organizers of the Chicago Homeopathic College, and is now one of the emeriti professors. He is an honorary member of the State Medical societies of New York, Michigan, Massachusetts and Illinois, and of the American Institute of Homeopathy, and associate editor of several medical journals.

SAMUEL PARKER HEDGES, M.D., was born at Sinclairville, Chautauque Co., N. Y., July 23, 1841, and is descended from English ancestors, who came to this country in the seventeenth century. He began his education in the public schools of his native town, and was prepared for college in the Jamestown Academy. Upon reaching his majority, he entered the office of his uncle, Dr. W. S. Hedges, of Jamestown, N. Y., and was in the midst of his medical studies when the first gun of the Rebellion was fired. He enlisted as a private in the 12th New York Volunteer Infantry, July 23, 1862, and was elected sergeant. In the following December he was made orderly sergeant, and shortly after received the commission of second lieutenant, and was placed upon the staff of General K. S. Foster. For distinguished services and praiseworthy conduct in the heat of battle, he was commissioned first lieutenant and adjutant of his regiment. During an engagement on James River he was captured. After long confinement in the Southern prisons, he was returned to the Federal lines broken in health, and was not fit for active service, until May, 1865. He was then appointed captain of Co. "F," and was assigned to duty on the staff of his brigade, under Colonel E. M. Ludwick, as acting assistant adjutant-general, and in 1865 was honorably discharged. He then resumed his medical studies in the Cleveland, Ohio Homeopathic College remaining until 1866, when he came to Chicago, and studied under the celebrated Professor Nicho. F. Cooke. Matriculating in the Hahnemann Medical College, he graduated therefrom in 1867. He was married to Miss Kaelin Danforth, daughter of E. H. Danforth of Jamestown, N. Y., March 13, 1867, and has five children—Corinna, William E., Robert D., Grace and Samuel. Dr. Hedges was corresponding secretary of the Illinois State Homeopathic Society for three years, secretary of the Cook County for two years, and was called to the chair of general and descriptive anatomy in his Alma Mater, and now is physician-in-chief of the Chicago Orphan Asylum. He was, also, one of the trustees of the Northwestern Theological Seminary. He is an active member of the American Institute of Homeopathy.

TEMPLE STOUGHTON HOYNE, M.D., the eldest son of Thomas Hoyne, LL.D., one of the oldest members of the Chicago Bar, and grandson of Dr. John T. Temple, of St. Louis, was born in Chicago, October 16, 1841. His first school days were spent in the Dearborn School, on Madison Street, opposite the old McVicker's theatre. When ten years of age, he was placed under the instruction of private tutors, and subsequently attended various select schools, until prepared to enter the Chicago University in 1863. He took the regular course in that institution, and graduated in 1863, receiving the degrees of B.S., M.S. and A.M. He then became a student under the tuition of Dr. Frank H. Hamilton, of New York City, and matriculated in the Bellevue Medical College of that city, receiving his diploma in 1865. Returning to Chicago in the same year, he began practice as a physician. During the War he was one of the volunteer surgeons called for by the governor of New York, and had charge of a Fredericksburg hospital at the time of the battle of the Wilderness. Dr. Hoyne was married, October 17, 1866, to Miss Fannie H. Vedder, of Palatine Bridge, N. Y., and has one daughter—Maud. Dr. Hoyne is a graduate of the Chicago Hahnemann Medical College, and occupies the responsible position of professor of practice and also of treasurer of that institution. He is the author of several valuable works, among which may be mentioned, "Clinical Therapeutics," and "A Monograph on Urinary and Venereal Diseases." He is also the editor of the Medical Visitor.

ROBERT NEWTON TOOKER, son and seventh child of Manly and Roxana (Farwell) Tooker, was born at Rochester, N. Y., on March 25, 1841. Shortly after his birth, his parents moved to Geneva, N. Y., where the early childhood of Robert Newton was passed. When he had reached his eighth year, the family again changed its place of residence. During the following ten years, young Tooker drifted from place to place in Western New York, in company with his parents, owing to the fact that the senior Tooker was a member of the Methodist ministry. In 1859, at the age of seventeen, Robert Newton entered the Genesee College, at Lima, N. Y. He had early given evidence of the possession of a studious mind, and, in order to foster the inclinations manifested, he was accorded the benefit of a college course, which continued uninterruptedly through four years, thus he acquired a thorough and general education. At college, he evinced tastes of a decided literary character, which, later in life, associated themselves closely with his reputation as a physician. Leaving Genesee College, he became, in 1863, a student in Rush Medical College, having acquired a desire for the study of medicine, where he remained for two years, prosecuting his studies with a vigor and an eagerness that foretold the success that awaited him. In 1865, he entered the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, of New York, from which institution he graduated with honors. Shortly afterward he was commissioned acting assistant surgeon of the United States Army, and was sent to the Barracks Hospital at New Orleans. After remaining there a year, he resigned his commission, and associated himself with his brother-in-law, Dr. J. E. Gross, who had established a Sanitarium at Richmond, Ind., taking charge of the male department of the institution, in which capacity he served for three years. At the expiration of that time he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, and for five years practiced his profession in that city. In 1873, he came to Chicago, where he has continued to reside and practice his profession. Dr. Tooker comes of a family noted for its exceptional education. His father was a man of broad knowledge and literary culture, and he held every office of trust in the gift of the Methodist Church, except that of Bishop. From his father Dr. Tooker inherits his literary talents, which have shed no little luster upon the pages of the "Medical Era," of which he is the editor. Dr. Tooker is a ready and brilliant writer, an independent thinker and philosophical reasoner, who has done much to enlighten the profession through the instrumentality of the "Era." He is noted for the interest he takes in young beginners in the profession, and there are many who can testify to the substantial encouragement they have met with from him. It is scarcely necessary to say that he occupies a prominent place among the medical fraternity of Chicago. He is president of the Illinois Homeopathic Medical Association, ex-president of the Chicago Academy of Homeopathic Physicians and Surgeons, and a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy. He has the honor of being one of the founders of the Chicago Homeopathic Medical College, in which, for five years, he filled the chair of physiology, since which time he has occupied the chair of professor of diseases of children. On May 18, 1868, in the city of Chicago, he was married to Clara Ann Johnson, by whom he has had six children, three of whom are living.

A. W. WOODWARD was born July 18, 1839, at Barnstable, Mass. In 1847, he came to Galena, Ill., and received his preliminary education at the preparatory school at Platteville, Wis., under the celebrated president, Professor J. L. Pickard, L.L.D., where he remained until 1857. He became interested in the study of medicine, and after deciding upon that as the profession which he would follow in his life's work, seized on every opportunity to read authorities upon that subject. In 1860, he came to this city, and engaged in mercantile pursuits until January, 1862, when he enlisted as a private in the 1st Illinois Artillery Volunteers, and was assigned to the battery commanded by Captain H. C. Waterhouse. He was among the first to join that regiment, and was promoted second lieutenant. The first engagement in which he participated was the battle of Pittsburg Landing, subsequently being present through the taking of Memphis, Tenn., and the first attack on Vicksburg, Miss. In 1863, in consequence of physical disability, he resigned his commission, and shortly thereafter entered Hahnemann Medical College of this city, from which he graduated in 1865. He immediately commenced practicing here, in which he has met with great success, and is at present one of the faculty of the Homeopathic Medical College, having been professor of materia medica and therapeutics since the organization of the college. In 1870, he married Miss Abbie E. Briggs, of Oakland, Cal.

CHICAGO HOMEOPATHIC MEDICAL SOCIETY.—The Chicago Homeopathic Medical Society was organized April 2, 1857, and held its first meetings at the offices of the prominent homeopathic practitioners of that period. After the establishment of the college at No. 168 South Clark Street, they held their meetings there. The earliest officers were A. E. Small, president, and Reuben Ludlam, secretary. In 1867, the Cook County Medical Society was formed, of which John Davies was president, Thomas C. Duncan secretary, and Temple S. Hoyne, treasurer. This Society, in 1869, was designated the Society of Homeopathic Physicians of the Chicago Academy, and Reuben Ludlam was president, John Davies vice-president, Temple S. Hoyne treasurer, and S. P. Hedges corresponding secretary. In 1870, Dr. Ludlam was still president, Willis Danforth was vice-president, Temple S. Hoyne treasurer, and John Davies corresponding secretary. During the same year the society became the Chicago Academy of Medicine, and its office was at No. 66 Lake Street, the officers being: Reuben Ludlam, president; Willis Danforth, vice-president; Temple S. Hoyne, recording secretary; John Davies, corresponding secretary; E. M. P. Ludlam, treasurer; F. A. Lord, C. A. Wilbur and A. W. Woodward, censors.

HOMEOPATHIC DISPENSARIES.—About May, 1859, Dr. Edward Rawson opened, at the office of the Ministry-at-large, on Washington Street, a homeopathic dispensary, where, in three months, one hundred and thirty-five patients were treated. On November 25, 1859, the building was demolished by the fall of Bryan's building, and three days thereafter the dispensary was re-opened in the basement of the Methodist Church Block, No. 104 Washington Street, where it existed for a few months. This was, presumptively, the first homeopathic dispensary in the city. On January 7, 1860, the central dispensary was opened at the office of Dr. John Davis, No. 86 LaSalle Street, opposite the Court House, where Drs. George E. Shipman, Stephen Seymour, Reuben Ludlam and Julius Ulrich were the physicians, and Drs. H. K. W. Boardman and John Davis were the surgeons. During 1860, the dispensary was removed to No. 168 South Clark Street, and re-organized under the charter of Hahnemann Medical College, where it was placed in the general charge of the faculty of the college. It was in this dispensary that the first course of clinical lectures on homeopathy ever delivered in the Northwest, was given by Dr. Reuben Ludlam.

DENTISTS.

THE CHICAGO DENTAL SOCIETY was organized on March 8, 1864, with the following officers:

E. W. Hadley, president; J. H. Young and L. Bush, vice-presidents; E. W. Sawyer, recording and corresponding secretary; J. C. Dean, treasurer; L. H. Hasckell, S. D. Noble and William Albaugh, executive committee; W. W. Allport, librarian.

The officers for subsequent years were as follows:

1865—G. H. Cushing, president; J. W. Ellis and J. C. Fuller, vice-presidents; J. C. Dean, secretary; S. B. Noble, treasurer; W. A. Stevens, librarian; A. J. Harris, S. B. Noble and W. C. Dyer, executive committee. 1867—S. B. Noble, president; A. N. Freeman and J. N. Young, vice-presidents; A. E. Brown, secretary; William Albaugh, treasurer; W. A. Stevens, librarian; George H. Cushing, J. W. Ellis and William Albaugh, executive committee. 1868—M. S. Dean, president; W. A. Stephens and A. E. Brown, vice-presidents; A. W. Freeman, secretary; William Albaugh, treasurer; S. B. Noble, G. H. Cushing and A. E. Brown, executive committee. 1869—M. S. Dean, president; A. W. Freeman, secretary. 1870—George H. Cushing, president; E. D. Swain, secretary. 1871—E. D. Swain, secretary.

JONATHAN A. KENNICOTT, D.D.S., a descendant of a celebrated English family of scholars and philologists, is a native of Albion, N. V., where he was born in 1824. His mother's family came from Kenwood, near Edinburgh, Scotland, and when the doctor settled upon the present site of Kenwood, Cook County, in 1853, he gave that beautiful suburb its name. In 1840, he began the study of medicine with his eldest brother, John A., obtaining the degree of M.D. from Rush Medical College three years thereafter. Instead of practicing medicine, however, he became a partner of another brother, William H., in dentistry. He afterward practiced in Milwaukee which city he left, doing 1852, to come to Chicago. The next year he received the degree of D.D.S. from the Ohio Dental College. "for valuable contributions to dental science." Among these were the application of the principles of atmospheric pressure to retain artificial teeth in the mouth, and the process of capping the exposed nerves of teeth instead of pursuing the painful operation of killing them. In fact, Dr Kennicott has never confined himself to the dull routine of his profession, accepting all its processes without question, but has made the subject of dental science a close study, and is not only a fine practitioner but an acknowledged authority in the most advanced lines of modern research. In 1854, Dr. Kennicott married Miss Marie Antoinette, daughter of the late Allen Fiske and sister of Albert A. and William A. Fiske, both clergymen of the Episcopal Church.

EDGAR DENMAN SWAIN was born at Westford, Vt., on August 14, 1836, the son of Dr. Marcus Swain and Charlotte (Woodbury) Swain. His early education was only that obtainable at the common schools, supplemented by a brief academical course. When he was seventeen years of age he went to Worcester, Mass., and worked in a machine shop for about one year, and while there decided upon adopting dentistry as a profession. He entered the office of a dentist at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in the spring of 1855, and there remained until 1857, when he removed to Oshkosh, Wis., and commenced the practice of his profession with Dr. L. D. Parker. In 1858, he removed to Aurora, Ill., where he became assistant to Dr. O. Wilson, and remained until 1859, in which year he removed to Batavia, Ill., where he practiced until 1861. In July, 1861, he enlisted in the volunteers, and, raising a company, was elected and commissioned, on July 22, 1861, as captain of Co. "I," 42d Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and he was mustered in, with that rank, on the 17th September, 1861. During the War, he served with honor to himself and his regiment, and was present at all the battles in the Department of the Cumberland, the regiment having been on the skirmish line during the entire Atlanta campaign. On October 13, 1863, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel, and, on April 13, 1864, was commissioned colonel of the regiment, but was never mustered in as such. In March, 1865, he was breveted colonel and placed in command of the regiment, which he retained until July, 1865, when he was, by order of General Stanley, placed in command of the Second Brigade, Second Division, Fourth Army Corps, and remained in command until its muster out in January, 1866. He was mustered out as lieutenant-colonel of the 42d Illinois Infantry Veteran Volunteers on December 16, 1865. He afterward returned to Chicago, and for three years was an assistant to Dr. George H. Cushing, dentist; after which he entered into partnership with Dr. Noble, and, in 1870, established a dental practice on his own behalf. He is an accomplished microscopist, and has paid much earnest attention and investigation to histology. He was president of the Chicago Dental Society in 1874, and of the Illinois State Dental Society during 1875. He married, in 1860, Miss Clara Smith, daughter of Benjamin Smith, an early settler of this city.

EMANUEL HONINGER was born in Henrysburg, Canada East, September 12, 1823. While a child, he was brought by his parents to Champlain, Clinton Co., N. Y., where he worked on a farm and attended school until he was seventeen years of age. In his eighteenth year he entered the office of Dr. H. J. Paine, of Troy, N. Y., for the purpose of studying dentistry. In the fall of 1847, he opened an office in Troy and soon built up an extensive and lucrative practice. He continued, however, to study upon the most improved methods of his profession, and among other things invented the rotating gum-lance and the combined blow-pipe and lathe, which are so well-known that a description of them is unnecessary. In April, 1853, Dr. Honinger removed to Chicago, and opened an office at No. 77 Lake Street, where he remained for thirteen years. In 1864, the Cincinnati Dental College conferred upon him the degree of D.D.S., and in 1866, he was one of the organizers of the Illinois Dental Society. During the latter year, Dr. Honinger was sent as one of the first general delegates to the American Dental Association, holding its session at Boston. He was for two years vice-president of the State society. The great fire destroyed his valuable library, account books, and all his instruments, the product of many years' thought and labor. He was not a man to be crushed, however, and, establishing an office in his residence was soon upon his feet again. His patrons from all sections of the city followed him to his new quarters, testifying to the fact that he had something more than a professional hold upon them. In 1879, he joined the Park-avenue M. E. Church, and, as one of its most prominent members and trustee, has had the satisfaction of seeing his Church entirely free of financial burdens, prosperous and growing.

ANDREW W. FREEMAN, son of John M. and Matilda M. Freeman, was born at Brookfield, Vt., October 3, 1829. He was kept hard at work on the farm or with the plane for most of the year, and during fall evenings and winter days he studied his books until he was sixteen. He afterward began a preparatory course at Thetford Academy, Vermont, and passed examination for Dartmouth College, which he entered September, 1850. He graduated in 1854. In the hay and harvest field by summer and in the school-room by winter, he obtained most of the means to pay his expenses. Six months of his senior year he was away as principal of Colebrook Academy, N. H. During 1854, he became principal of the Orange County Grammar School. Health failing, he came west to Rockford, Ill., and, in November, 1855, opened and graded the first public school of the city. He was subsequently principal of Homer Seminary, Ill., where he remained two years. While at Rockford, he began the study of dentistry under Dr. J. P. Norman, continuing his pupilage until 1859, when he began practice at Mahomet, Ill. In September, 1860, he commenced his profession in this city, in which he has been successful. He was one of the forming members of the Chicago Dental Society, of which he has been secretary, director and president. He is one of three surviving members of this city who organized the Illinois State Dental Society, and is also a member of the American Dental Association. He is a liberal supporter of Plymouth Congregational Church, and has been honored with its most important offices. On February 14, 1855, he married Aura S. Ingalls, daughter of Judge Waldo W. Ingalls, of Brookfield, Vt. Mrs. John S. Meigs of Normal Park, is their only surviving child.

KOSCOE F. LUDWIG was born at Waldoborough, Me., on September 29, 1845, where he attended school until 1857. He then removed to Chelsea, Mass., where he re-entered school and graduated five years later. In 1862, he enlisted, at the age of seventeen, for nine months' service in the 23d Maine Regiment, at the end of which time he returned home and was mustered out of the service. He then came to Chicago, arriving on October 1, 1863, having previously arranged with the well-known Dr. W. W. Allport of this city to study the profession of dentistry. He remained four years as a student, during which time he served a 100-day enlistment in the 134th Illinois Regiment, attended a course of lectures at the Chicago Medical College, a full course at Rush Medical College, and graduated in March, 1867, at the Ohio College of Dental Surgery as D.D.S. Since graduating, he has been in continual practice in Chicago. Dr. Ludwig is very highly spoken of among the dentists of this city as being a thorough and finished operator. He has an extensive practice and his patrons are of the very best class. In March, 1867, he was married to Miss Emma R. Scales. They have had four children, two sons and two daughters. The eldest child, Koscoe F., died in October, 1883, at the age of fourteen; the surviving children are Daisy Emma, Faustina and Leon Eugene.

J. FULLMORE THOMPSON is among the leading dentists here, by reason of his long residence in Chicago, as well as his established reputation. Dr. Thompson was born in Canandaigua, Ontario Co., N. Y., November 16, 1828, and there attended school at the Canandaigua Academy, graduating in his nineteenth year. In 1847, he commenced the study of dentistry at Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y., with W. W. Thompson, and remained with that gentleman about eighteen months. At the height of the California gold fever, in the early part of 1849, he went to the mines there, and remained about three years, a part of which time he did a little work at his profession. He returned to Chicago in 1862, and commenced practice. He was first located in an office at No. 85 Clark Street, where he remained until burned out at the time of the great fire in 1871. He then re-opened his office on West Washington Street, where he was established for eight years. In the early part of 1881 he moved to his present location. Dr. Thompson is a member of the Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, A. F. & A. M., and Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M. On January 1, 1855, he was married to Miss Diana W. Holt, of this State. They have three children—Helen A., James W. and Grace May.

WOMEN AS PHYSICIANS.

On December 19, 1859, a dispensary for women and children was established at No. 155 West Madison Street, by Miss C. A. Buckel, M.D., and Miss M. W. Jones, M.D. But the progressive spirit of Chicago was insufficiently advanced for medical ministrations by ladies, no matter how able their treatment. Doctors Buckel and Jones were both ladies of intelligence and refinement, and were esteemed by all with whom they professionally or personally came in contact. The members of the medical profession with whom they became acquainted respected them for the unostentatious dignity with which they performed their chosen work. After a brief effort, Dr. Buckel left the city, and is now a successful practitioner in California. Dr. Jones became the wife of a citizen of Chicago, and is now an efficient member of the present board of councilors of the hospital. The favorable impressions made by these ladies, undoubtedly, rendered it somewhat easier for Miss Thompson to gain recognition of the claims urged by her as an aspirant for rank in the medical profession.

Mary Harris Thompson* came to Chicago on July 3, 1863. This lady has successfully inaugurated and carried out a work that has resulted in obtaining indulgences for women, never before granted in the West from the medical profession. Soon after her arrival, she became acquainted with Dr. W. Godfrey Dyas and his wife, a lady who was fully in sympathy with the enlarging of the sphere of woman's work. Dr. Dyas soon recognized Dr. Thompson's merit as a lady of education with a fixed purpose in life, and he unhesitatingly assisted that purpose by introducing her to the profession. At the time of her arrival in the city the War was at its zenith, and Chicago contained many soldiers' families, who were unable to procure medical attendance and medicines save as they were gratuitously extended to them. The ladies connected with the Sanitary Commission, to whom these families applied for surgical and medical attendance, requested Dr. Thompson to take charge of their cases and relieve their necessities. To this proposition Dr. Thompson assented, and, to further the work upon which she thus entered, made arrangements with a few druggists whereby her patients could be furnished with medicine at small cost. Many of these patients, too impoverished to pay street-car fare, were compelled to walk distances too great for their enfeebled condition, and the exhaustion thus induced rendered treatment inefficacious. Thus it became apparent that such patients must become inhabitants of a hospital; but where could they go? The Marine Hospital admitted no female patients, save they were connected with the maritime service, and Mercy Hospital took care of the county poor at a remuneration of four dollars a week, while other patients paid seven dollars. This condition of things made an admirable opening, and demonstrated the necessity, for a hospital and dispensary for women and children.

* For many interesting facts relative to Dr. Thompson, the compiler is indebted to Eliza H. Root, M.D., and, in connection with the hospital, to Mrs. J. C. Hilton, president of the hospital.

This was one of the great opportunities of Dr. Thompson's life, and friends encouraged her to inaugurate such an institution, prominent among whom were the ladies of the Sanitary Commission and Mr. and Mrs. Freeland B. Gardner, the only family with whom Dr. Thompson was acquainted when she came to Chicago. In furtherance of this project, meetings were held, whereat discussions were had that resulted in the organization of this hospital in the winter of 1864 and 1865.

CHICAGO HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN.—Rev. Dr. Ryder called the first meeting having the organization in view, and Freeland B. Gardner subscribed the first one hundred dollars and collected the first one thousand dollars toward the hospital. In the spring of 1865, Dr. Mary H. Thompson, with the assistance of Dr. W. G. Dyas and his wife, established, and, on May 8, 1865, opened the hospital at the corner of Rush and Indiana streets. The officers at its establishment were: Jonathan Young Scammon, president; John V. Farwell and George S. Bowen, vice-presidents; Charles T. Morse, secretary, and E. I. Tinkham, treasurer. The medical staff were: Miss Mary H. Thompson, M.D., attending and resident physician; W. G. Dyas, F. R. S., M.D., Thomas Bevan, M.D., H. W. Jones, A. M., M.D., A. Fisher, M.D., C. G. Smith, M.D., T. D. Fitch, M.D., John Bartlett, M.D., S. C. Blake, M.D., and Edward L. Holmes, M.D., consulting physicians. Dr. Odellia Blinn, who was then a student, also assisted Dr. Thompson in her duties as interne.

On May 1, 1866, the hospital was removed to No. 212 Ohio Street; and at this locality was experienced the first opposition to the humane and charitable work in which Dr. Thompson was engaged. A barn in the rear of the hospital was used as a hospital laundry, and a German Jew, who resided in the vicinity, wished to rent the barn for stable purposes, and became highly incensed because he was refused its rental. To be revenged upon the management of the hospital, and in the hope that they might be officially ejected from the premises, he commenced the creation of a sentiment inimical to the hospital. In this he was aided by a man who was opposed to all systems of regular practice. They circulated a petition among the people living near the hospital, asking for its removal, alleging that it was a nuisance to the neighborhood. It is stated that the children were induced to sign their parents' names to this petition, which was thus officially disposed of in the proceedings of the Board of Health:

"June 5, 1866: Petition presented to have private hospital on Ohio Street suppressed. June 12: Health officer (Bridges) visited it, and reported it in clean and healthy condition."

The benefit of this animadversion was to convert all those who had signed the petition, upon misrepresentations made to them, except the two inaugurators of the document, into firm and influential friends of the hospital and staunch adherents of Dr. Mary Harris Thompson. The staff at this time appears to have been, Miss Mary Harris Thompson, M.D., physician, W. G. Dyas, M.D., C. G. Smith, M.D., S. C. Blake, M.D., A. Fisher, M.D., Edwin Powell, M.D., T. D. Fitch, M.D., Thomas Bevan, M.D., E. Marguerat, M.D., H. W. Jones, M.D., consulting physicians; Edward L. Holmes, M.D., oculist; and Miss Maggie Kissock, matron. The hospital remained in this location for about three years, until July, 1869, after which it was removed to No. 402 North State Street, where it remained until the fire of 1871. The building took fire about 9 o'clock on Monday morning, October 9, 1871. The cost of the house and lot was, so far as can be ascertained, $10,000. When the fire of 1871 was approaching the hospital, C. K. Nichols and his wife, who had been through the Portland (Maine) fire, opened their doors to Dr. Thompson and her patients and such few effects as they were able to save. But the fire followed them, and destroyed their haven on Lincoln Avenue; and Dr. Thompson, with her friends and three helpless patients, fled to the prairie for safety. Her personal effects were nearly all destroyed, while the hospital had nothing left but two pillows, a pair of blankets and a piece of carpet. Discouragement seemed the most vital force then present. But the fire epoch was no time for the Chicagoans to feel depressed. The necessities of the case were urgent, and the Relief and Aid Society asked that the hospital be re-opened to relieve the enormous pressure that was exerted by its supplicants and dependants upon its efforts and resources. Accordingly, Dr. Thompson quickly responded by renting a building, No. 598 West Adams Street, where an extemporized hospital was opened, and which did a noble work in the alleviation of pain and suffering, for the time it was there.

MARY HARRIS THOMPSON was born at Fort Ann, New York, the daughter of John Harris and Calista (Corbin) Thompson, who were both natives of that State. Her early education was obtained in the common school and a select school in her native town. At the age of fifteen she commenced teaching in the public schools, alternating the work of teaching with attendance at West Poughkeepsie (Troy Conference) Academy and Fort Edward Collegiate Institute, at which latter place she received the last of her English education. After this, she followed the profession of school-teacher for several successive years devoting all her time which was not thus occupied to the independent study of astronomy, chemistry, physiology and anatomy; which last two studies she introduced into the course of instruction she imparted at her school, and the innovation met with marked success. Miss Thompson found, however, that independent study left her without the drill and that thorough, methodical understanding of the subjects which a practical demonstration would afford; and to overcome this deficiency she became a student in the New England Female Medical College, of Boston—a regular school with a good corps of instructors. At the time of entering upon this course she had no thought of practicing medicine, nor even of taking a regular course and graduating; but, finding the painfully laborious work incident to the practical work of a medical course over-balanced by the interest of new truths, found at every step of this never-ending attainment, she decided upon taking a full course of study, for the purpose of fitting her to engage in the practice of medicine as her life-work. After three weeks of study and two courses of lectures, which were principally didactic, she experienced the necessity of instruction in practical treatment at the bed-side. She was advised by the faculty of the college to take her diploma, but fearing that the funds which her diploma would entitle her to earn, and the advice of friends, might induce her to change her plans, she resolutely refused to appear before the examining board—a resolution which she somewhat regretted subsequently, as three of the best professors in the college resigned, and their names not being upon her diploma, she felt assured, detracted from the value it otherwise would have had. In 1862 she entered the New York Infirmary, where she gave a year's time to practical work, under the supervision of Doctors Elizabeth and Emily Blackwell.* The work in this Infirmary and its outside practice embraced all branches of medicine. While there, she also availed herself of the clinical privileges of Bellevue Hospital and DeMilt Dispensary. At the close of this year of arduous labor she felt that she was entitled to a diploma, and accordingly returned to Boston and graduated from her Alma Mater in the spring of 1863. After her graduation she came to Chicago, despite the advice of her friends and their urgent solicitations that she would remain in the East. Her labors in connection with the Hospital for Women and Children have already been recapitulated, and her success, not alone therein, but in the practice of her profession, has been most gratifying in the complete testimony it has given to her efficiency in the various branches of her beloved field of action. As Dr. Root remarks: "While the doctor has been made to feel an existing prejudice against women as physicians, she has received from the profession, generally, only kind treatment; and has never asked for counsel but it has been cheerfully accorded, and many of the profession have nobly aided her with their advice and influence. The success that has crowned her efforts is but the reward of perseverance, a fixed purpose in life, and a whole heart engaged in her work. Many live to bless her for the benefits they have received at her hands, and her career is one no young medical student, man or woman, need be ashamed to emulate, and which is one that has shed luster upon the name of Mary Harris Thompson, and has established a prestige for women in medicine."

* See page 465, Vol. 1.

JULIA CONE WHALING, M.D., was born in New York City, April 2, 1832. During her earlier years her parents moved to Detroit, Mich., but she remained at Buffalo, N. Y., where she attended school until she was twelve years of age, returning, in 1844, to New York City, where she continued her education until 1850. In the meantime, she had made considerable progress in the study of medicine, also maintaining a careful course of study during two years of general travel throughout the United States and Mexico. Upon her return to the East, she entered the office of Dr. Naudine, with whom she remained for nearly a year, and then became a student under Dr. J. H. Hamilton. She then matriculated in the New York Hahnemann Medical College, from which she graduated in 1853; after which, she attended a course of lectures at the old Jefferson College, and, during the following winter, took another course of lectures at the Geneva College, at Buffalo, N. Y. In 1862, she began active practice in St. Louis, and received the appointment, from President Lincoln, of physician in the Fifth Street Hospital. At the battle of Pittsburg Landing, she was in the field for two days and one night, attending the wounded and affording them such relief as she was able, and also assisted in ninety-two surgical operations performed in the field hospital. On September 11, 1864, she came to this city, and for a long time was attending physician at Dr. Park's Military School, at Graceland. During a stay at Milwaukee, in September, 1851, she married Colonel John E. Cone, and has one son, Charles Davenport Cone; losing Grace Greenwood Cone, aged sixteen months at the time of her death, in 1854; and also Walter W. Cone, aged twenty-three years at his demise, on September 7, 1852. He was a member of Golden Rule Lodge, No. 726, A. F. & A. M., and was one of the most upright and noble of men and Masons. He was a member of the Episcopal Church from his eleventh year. On October 8, 1871, she became the wife of Judge William J. Whaling, deceased, a sketch of whom appears in the insurance history. Dr. Whaling suffered largely by the great fire of 1871, and lost everything, including a valuable medical manuscript, which was about to be given to the public, on the diseases of women and children. Mrs. Whaling, although engaged in a lucrative and extensive practice, merely engages in it through her fondness therefor, and, since the demise of Judge Whaling, she has continued in practice principally for the purpose of alleviating the suffering occasioned by his loss.

ECLECTIC MEDICINE.

These members of the healing art found it necessary, from the accessions to their ranks, to institute a college where their tenets could be taught; and hereafter is given the history of the establishment of their college.

BENNETT MEDICAL COLLEGE.—The Bennett College of Eclectic Medicine and Surgery was inaugurated November 2, 1868, in rooms in a building on the north side of Kinzie Street, between LaSalle and Wells streets, with a faculty composed of Robt. A. Gunn, professor of surgery; H. K. Whitford, professor of theory and practice of medicine; H. D. Garrison, professor of chemistry; A. L. Clark, professor of obstetrics and the diseases of women and children; John Forman, professor of anatomy; Hayes C. French, professor of physiology; and J. F. Cook, professor of materia medica. Thirty students attended the primal session, ten of whom received the diploma of Doctor of Medicine at the close of the course. In the winter of 1868, a charter was granted by the State Legislature to Laban S. Major, W. D. Atchison, H. C. French, H. D. Garrison, William M. Dale, H. K.

Justin Hayes

Whitford, A. L. Brown, John Forman, M. R. Teegarden, Robert A. Gunn, A. L. Clark and J. F. Cook, and their successors, as incorporators of The Bennett College of Eclectic Medicine and Surgery. Dr. Laban S. Major was chosen president of the board of trustees; and rooms were obtained at Nos. 180 and 182 Washington Street, where the opening exercises were held October 4, 1870. The faculty of the chartered college were Laban S. Major, emeritus professor of institutes of medicine;

Anson L. Clark, dean, professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children; James F. Cook, secretary, professor of materia medica and therapeutics; Henry K. Whitford, treasurer, professor of theory and practice of medicine and clinical medicine; Robert A. Gunn, professor of civil, military and clinical surgery; N. H. Young, professor of descriptive and surgical anatomy; J. Milton Jay, professor of physiology and pathology; Harold D. Garrison, professor of chemistry, pharmacy and toxicology; George C. Christian, professor of medical jurisprudence; W. H. Davis, lecturer on diseases of the throat and lungs; John E. Hurlbut, lecturer on microscopy; and E. L. Lathrop, prosector of surgery. At this building, and under the tuition of this faculty, the winter course of lectures of 1871 had just been commenced when the fire destroyed the building and its contents.

ELECTRO-MEDICAL SCHOOL.

Of this class of practitioners the earliest exponent, who combined medical and surgical knowledge with deep research into the curative properties of electricity, was Justin Hayes, M.D., and the innovation of his theories and his practical application thereof is best told biographically, as he was, himself, the only practitioner of this school before the fire.

JUSTIN HAYES was born in Burton, Geauga Co., Ohio, on October 26, 1823. He attended the common schools of the neighborhood, and afterward entered Williams Academy. At nineteen he passed the requisite examination and received a certificate to teach in the public schools. After teaching for three years, he commenced the study of medicine in 1845, graduating from Cleveland Medical College in 1850. On September 4, 1849, he married Miss Julia A. Haven, daughter of John Haven, a prominent citizen of Shalersville; and Dr. Hayes attributes much of his success to her noble qualities and able assistance. Their family consists of Professor Hymon S. Hayes, A. M., M. D., John M. Hayes and Grace Justina Hayes. After Dr. Hayes returned to his native town he entered into partnership with his preceptor, Dr. P. C. Bennett, and at the end of three years purchased his entire business. As Dr. Hayes advanced in life, his health improved so that he was able to attend to his general practice. He was physician and surgeon-in-chief to the Portage County Infirmary for several years. In 1861, he was called to take charge of the Ohio Inebriate Asylum, in Cleveland, an institution comprising mainly patients from the arts and professions; but the strain of the work being too exhaustive, he resigned the position, and, in April, 1862, he came to Chicago. In the fall of 1862, on the occasion of a very difficult and critical surgical operation performed on one of his patients, at which he had called to his assistance the late Dr. Daniel Brainard and Professor DeLaskie Miller, Dr. Brainard said to Dr. Hayes: "I see you have established yourself as a specialist. I think there is no other educated specialist here. I do not know how you can succeed unless you can do something better than the rest of us." Dr. Hayes replied: "That is what I hope with the aid of my electrical means to do." In 1864, he edited the People's Journal of Health, which had a good patronage, but he was obliged to abandon it on account of a severe attack of cerebro-spinal fever, which incapacitated him for labor of any kind for several months. In 1877, Jansen, McClurg & Co. published his celebrated work on the "Electro-Thermal Bath, with History of Cases," which is held by the profession to be the best work of the kind ever published. It is now twenty-two years since Dr. Hayes came to Chicago. His life has been crowned with the highest success, as the Medical and Electrical Institute for the Treatment of Nervous and Chronic Diseases, founded and established by Dr. Hayes, is most scientific and complete, and probably the best in the United States.

SANITARY HISTORY.

It was fortunate that the three years between 1858-60, were not rife with disaster to the population of Chicago.* No boards of health were appointed to supervise the sanitary condition of the city during those years, and the building of sewers and augmentation of hygienic measures were allowed to almost lapse. Fortunately, however, the public health remained tolerably good, but little increase being created in the mortality by the supineness of the authorities. Scarlet fever and dysentery prevailed, the former during the entire year, and the latter in July and August, 1858. The Board of Health, for 1859, comprised Mayor John C. Haines, J. W. Waughop, F. Mahla, A. J. Heald, A. Blakie, and F. B. Gardner, but they do not appear to have met. A report of the Chicago Medical Society, made by Drs. Swayne, Wickersham, and Edward L. Holmes, December 29, stated that "Chicago has been blessed during the past year with almost unparalleled exemption from sickness." And the city having been so free from epidemics, and otherwise manifesting no excessive death-rate, the functions of the Board of Health were not called into exercise by the authorities, and, on March 27, 1860, the Common Council passed an ordinance abolishing the health department and the offices of city physician and health officer, and transferring the duties of the health officer to the Police Department, under the direction of the mayor, and, on June 4, the duties of the health officer were delegated to the various street commissioners.

On February 21, 1861, the Legislature passed an act establishing a Police Board, which, among other things, was "to guard the public health," but Dr. Rauch states that "this duty was almost entirely ignored by them, and we find, in the records of their proceedings for 1861 and 1862, mention of only five official acts pertaining to the health of the city, and those were of a trivial character." During the year 1862, Dr. N. S. Davis made urgent efforts to secure the appointment of a competent medical health officer, but without avail; although the Council made an effort to accede to a suggestion made by him, some time previously, that the deaths occurring in the city should be registered. The attempt was futile.

On September 10, however, Mayor Sherman, perceiving the urgent necessity that there was for prompt measures toward enforcing the quarantine regulations relative to small-pox, which was then prevalent in the city, appointed Charles S. Perry, a policeman who was detailed on his staff, acting health officer. This official worked hard and energetically, but ineffectually, to prevent the spread of variola; and, as it was gaining ground, the pest-house was opened in October, and, pursuant to the recommendation of Mayor Sherman, on December 1, an ordinance was passed creating anew the office of city physician, and fixing his salary at $600 per annum. But as he was not required to vaccinate the poor, and no measures were taken to make recluses of those attacked by the disease, the infection spread, and from September 28, 1862, to May 18, 1863, eight hundred cases of small-pox were reported. General infraction of the isolatory ordinances, and those decreeing the advertisement of cases prevailed. The introduction of penalties into such ordinances, however, produced beneficial results. Sporadic erysipelas was malignant during the summer, and the disease became epidemic in November, and, during the winter, sixty-eight cases being reported in two months, and eighteen deaths occurring from this cause alone during the year. Dr. Edmund Andrews, in assigning the reason for such an unprecedented outbreak and spread of erysipelas, said:

* In the compilation of this topic, Dr. John H. Rauch has furnished valuable information, personally, and in his "Sanitary History of Chicago," Chicago: Lakeside Publishing and Printing Company, 1871.

"Along the South Branch, in particular, there are a great number of packing houses, where many hundreds of thousands of animals are slaughtered every year, the filth and offal of which block up with a semi-fluid mass of putrefaction, the sloughs and water-courses which empty into the river; while the more solid refuse materials are, or were, carried out and deposited in the fields beyond. The rapid and numerous growth of the city gave to this evil such an unexpected magnitude that the sanitary precautions previously found sufficient, were now made utterly ineffective, and, during the summer and autumn just past, the condition and odor of the river became abominable beyond expression. The stench could be perceived for miles in the direction of the wind, and the parts of the city nearest the stream were filled with a foul effluvia to an insupportable extent. * * * One of the earliest effects of air contaminated with putrefying matter, is the appearance of erysipelas among persons exposed to its influence."

Investigation by Dr. Andrews justified his theory, as the disease was found to "cling to the river"; but erysipelas was not the only virulent disease, as the doctor remarked, occasioned by the turbid and putrescent river. Small-pox increased, and, during this year of 1863, nine hundred and forty-seven cases of small-pox were reported, and one hundred and fifteen deaths resulted therefrom, making a percentage of 12 1-9. A peculiar fact in the mortality this year was that the number of deaths in January and December were almost equal to those in July and August, manifesting that the causes of mortality were not those ordinarily affecting the death-rate; and the fact that the number of deaths each month averaged about equally, exhibited the presence of a steady, unintermittent creation of death.

In 1864, the variola kept increasing; and, pursuant to the repeated representations of physicians and citizens, a new pest-house was erected. But the building of hundreds of edifices to accommodate the victims of neglect would not cleanse a city whose sanitary condition had been gradually growing from bad to worse since 1859 with no one to look after the civic hygiene save a policeman, who was occasionally assisted in such work by two more of the mayor's police, in 1863, and permanently by the same two officials in this year. But what precautionary measures could be expected from un-medical officers, whose powers, additionally, were limited to the execution of laws enacted, and were overworked in the attempt to do this? In 1865, the citizens became alarmed at the constant increase of epidemics, and at the prospective incursion of cholera; and a committee was appointed by the Board of Trade to advise with the Council as to the most efficacious method of cleansing the Chicago River, and a committee of thirty citizens were appointed for the same purpose and to devise means for cleansing the city.

On July 13, an ordinance, introduced by Alderman Shimp, was the first passed that made any provision for the regular and systematic scavenging of the city. For the first time the Council appear to have become thoroughly conscious of the necessity for prompt and decisive action, looking to the cleansing of the city and river, and the proper drainage and sewerage of the former. Valuable assistance was rendered the authorities by the Chicago Medical Society, not alone in intelligent and scientific advice, but also by some of its members acting as a consulting board of physicians to the municipal authorities, without recompense for their services. In November, Drs. N. S. Davis, J. W. Freer, J. P. Ross, H. Hitchcock, Ralph N. Isham and Brock McVickar, were appointed, at a public meeting of the medical profession in the city, a committee to make recommendations for the amelioration of the sanitary condition of the city. This they did in a series of valuable and feasible suggestions; they also recommended that a system of registration of deaths should be instituted that would answer the purpose,* "the present registry of deaths, so far as the causes of death are concerned, is a ridiculous farce." November 28, nineteen special policemen were detailed as assistant health officers, who were to be augmented by as many more as were needful, and on December 18, an ordinance was passed restricting slaughtering in the city to one particular place.* The improvement that was caused by the urgent action of the people, in the sanitary condition of the city, was, however, too late to arrest the cholera, which appeared in July, 1866; the vigilance which the police health-board manifested, the measures for abating nuisances and exterminating long tolerated abominations were futile. Good health can only be a result of preventive sanitary measures, and these were exactly what were not taken by the various Councils.

As the cholera approached, the official energy became more apparent. In January, thirty thousand nuisance notices were printed and thirty-one assistant health officers were on duty, February, thirty assistant health officers were on duty; March, thirteen thousand more notices were printed and thirty-two health-officers were on duty; and so forth.

In April, Dr. John H. Rauch called the attention of the authorities to the subject of intramural interments and their pernicious effect, and also alluded to the attempt made, in 1858, to prevent further interments in the City Cemetery, by a petition signed by the most influential citizens of the North Division. It was also advocated by the petitioners, and Dr. Rauch, that the bodies then in the City Cemetery should be exhumed as soon as possible, and the ground converted into a park. The southern extremity of Lincoln Park now covers the old City Cemetery. An excerpt from Dr. Rauch's pamphlet† will manifest how much reason there was for alarm in the mode of interment:

"The patients who died of the small-pox have been buried in the public part of the Chicago City Cemetery, at an average depth of from three to four feet, owing to the fact that graves can not be dug deeper on account of the water."

Subsequently the same author wrote:

"On an examination of the register, kept at the City Cemetery since June 24, 1861, it appears that 9,541 bodies were buried in it from that time to March 1, 1866, and, as near as can be ascertained, about 1,800 were buried from January, 1860, to the time from which the register dates. How many have been buried in the Catholic Cemetery the writer could not learn with any accuracy, but is satisfied that the number buried in both cemeteries from January, 1860, to the present time (1866) amounts to about twelve thousand. This number was swelled by the burial of three thousand eight hundred and seventy-one prisoners of war in the City Cemetery, which commenced in the latter part of 1862, and continued until July, 1865. These were brought from Camp Douglas, a distance of nearly six miles, and carried through the very heart of the city, and deposited in a soil already overcharged with decaying animal matter, and, as has been already shown, totally unfit, by its character and locality, for such a purpose. The writer is at a loss how to account for such an extraordinary procedure and the indifference manifested in regard to it. Why it was permitted is beyond his comprehension. It may well be challenged whether such an instance of flagrant violation of the laws of health has been anywhere perpetrated, within so recent a date, in any civilized community. Where was the Health officer? If his reports were regularly and properly made, the municipal authorities must have been cognizant of these facts, and should be, with him, equally responsible for any deleterious results that have, or may, follow to the community. After careful investigation, we

* This ordinance was, in 1866, decided to be unconstitutional, on the ground that a monopoly was thereby created, by the Supreme Court of Illinois.

† The authors were George F. Rumsey, Julian F. Rumsey, Walter F. Newberry, William Barry, Edward Day, Mathias Miller, Samuel Johnston, William S. Johnston, Jr., Samuel H. Kerfoot, Edward I. Tinkham, George W. Dole, John H. Hulbert, Thomas M. Hubbard, W. M. Larrabee, Charles V. Dyer, Ephraim Ward, Ogden, Fleetwood & Co., Benjamin F. Carver, John Forsythe, Ebenezer Peck, Gordon S. Hubbard, John H. Foster, Ezra B. McCagg, James H. Rees, E. Johnson, Jr., S. P. Putnam.

* Intra-mural Interments in Populous Cities, and their Influence upon Health and Epidemics; a paper read before the Historical Society, in 1858, by John H. Rauch, M.D., published in 1866.

* Dr. N. S. Davis made the same recommendation and remark, July 6, 1858, in a report to the Chicago Medical Society.

learn that the putrefaction process occupies, in the Chicago City Cemetery and in the old Catholic Cemetery, from five to fifteen years, depending upon the character of the ground, the season of the year, the age, sex, disease, the tightness of the coffin, and the character of the clothing in which the dead are enveloped. At this rate, from the records of interment for the last fifteen years in these cemeteries, there must be at least from eighteen thousand to twenty thousand bodies undergoing decomposition at this time, the same conditions having existed, and in nearly the same proportion for some time."

With this mass of putrid matter polluting the air, assisted by the foul river, the undrained streets and the imperfect sewerage, it is no marvel that the epidemics, small-pox, erysipelas, cholera infantum, diphtheria and typhoid fever were virulent, and that the cholera hastened to an arena where all things were so favorable for it to wreak devastation and death. During the month of April, arrangements were made whereby all dead animals and animal matter from slaughter-houses were removed from the city, and special instructions were issued relative to the disposition of fecal matter and garbage. Mayor Rice urgently recommended the employment of one thousand men, with teams, to clean the city, and the Council, on May 1, passed an ordinance authorizing the employment of one thousand more men, and directing the expenditure of $6,000 under the direction of the health officers; and a resolution was also passed asking the comptroller for $25,000, in addition to the estimates already sent by the board, for the use of the health department, in promoting the health of the city, employing help, building hospitals, and for the purchase of disinfectants. A preceding Council had, on March 27, 1860, abolished the Health Department, on account of "financial depression," when the members of the board of health served without pay. Chloride of lime and sulphate of zinc were freely used, and all interments were, on May 28, prohibited within the limits of the city.

THE CHOLERA.—On July 21, 1866, the first case of cholera was reported, that of Mrs. Corbett, No. 282 West Chicago Avenue, but the cases that occurred immediately afterward were designated cholera morbus, in a vain attempt to calm the public mind. On August 6, an emigrant was attacked, and carried to the County Hospital, where he communicated the contagion to others, and the epidemic was thoroughly engrafted. A temporary cholera hospital was erected at the corner of Thirty-third Street and Wentworth Avenue, of which Dr. Webber was given charge; physicians were detailed to board trains coming from infected localities, at a distance not less than ten miles from Chicago, and see if any cases of cholera were on the train, and assistant health officers were required to be at the depots, to take charge of any cases of cholera reported by the railroad quarantine physicians. In November, Dr. Webber submitted a report of the cholera hospital, as follows:

REPORT OF CASES ADMITTED, RECOVERED AND DIED DURING THE SEASON.

AGES.	Number.	Recovered.	Deaths.
1 to 5 years	4	3	1
5 to 10 years	5	3	2
10 to 20 years	12	9	3
20 to 30 years	41	23	18
30 to 40 years	24	11	13
40 to 50 years	9	1	8
50 to 60 years	6	2	4
60 to 70 years	5	2	3
Total	106	54	52

NATIVITY.	Number.	Recovered.	Died.
United States	13	5	8
England	3	1	2
Canada	3	2	1
Nova Scotia	1	1	—
Ireland	30	13	7
Germany	22	14	8
Holland	2	1	1
Poland	3	1	2
Norway	18	8	10
Sweden	2	2	—
Denmark	3	1	2
Switzerland	1	1	—
Bohemia	2	2	—
Colored	3	2	1
Total	106	54	52

July 21, the day the first cholera case was reported, was also the day when the phenomenal rain-fall that prevailed throughout the cholera season commenced, and this fall amounted to twenty and one-half inches in the succeeding four months, more than four times the amount that usually falls during that period. The following table gives the amount of rainfall, the mean of thermometer, the mortality per diem, the mortality by cholera, and the number of cases reported during the cholera season:

JULY.
	Mean of thermometer.	Rain.	Mortality.	Mortality by cholera.	Cases of cholera reported.
21	80	.205	27	—	1
22	73	.112	17	—	—
23	73	1.825	24	—	—
24	77	—	29	1	—
25	81	—	23	—	—
26	79	.685	17	—	—
27	79	—	16	—	—
28	79	—	21	—	—
29	79	—	18	1	—
30	78	—	17	—	—
31	82	—	13	—	—
	78	2.827	222	2	1

AUGUST.
	Mean of thermometer.	Rain.	Mortality.	Mortality by cholera.	Cases of cholera reported.
1	79	.210	34	—	—
2	74	—	19	—	—
3	74	.190	28	—	—
4	71	.685	21	—	—
5	73	—	34	2	—
6	72	.112	30	1	—
7	67	1.225	15	—	—
8	74	.255	30	—	—
9	76	—	24	—	—
10	75	—	23	2	—
11	70	1.570	30	—	—
12	72	2.015	22	—	—
13	73	—	23	1	—
14	75	.060	13	6	3
15	72	—	29	4	15
16	66	—	38	7	5
17	70	—	38	8	15
18	72	.095	38	10	12
19	72	—	35	12	17
20	72	—	45	10	14
21	71	—	36	9	14
22	63	—	36	12	19
23	63	.110	30	6	10
24	64	.118	33	10	10
25	66	—	24	4	14
26	71	—	44	13	5

AUGUST—CONTINUED.

	Mean thermometer.	Rain.	Mortality.	Mortality by cholera.	Cases of cholera reported.
27	71	-----	41	9	17
28	68	-----	26	7	10
29	68	-----	27	9	15
30	70	.273	28	6	7
31	74	.390	16	5	11
	71	8.178	940	154	213

SEPTEMBER.

	Mean thermometer.	Rain.	Mortality.	Mortality by cholera.	Cases of cholera reported.
1	75	.278	38	8	11
2	73	-----	31	3	2
3	73	-----	26	2	14
4	74	.393	39	9	9
5	71	-----	22	3	15
6	68	.105	30	8	7
7	64	.385	28	10	8
8	68	-----	25	4	9
9	65	-----	18	8	6
10	65	1.540	16	3	8
11	60	.110	22	8	10
12	60	-----	32	5	5
13	61	.130	23	6	4
14	64	-----	23	7	18
15	55	.260	14	3	7
16	64	1.010	25	9	3
17	59	.330	25	4	11
18	57	.365	29	10	9
19	56	.050	24	13	11
20	49	.735	28	14	14
21	55	-----	27	10	17
22	57	-----	26	10	8
23	62	-----	19	5	7
24	65	-----	23	3	7
25	60	.175	26	3	3
26	62	-----	20	9	8
27	69	-----	25	8	14
28	66	-----	10	2	10
29	68	-----	22	7	6
30	68	-----	23	8	5
	64	5.866	739	202	266

OCTOBER

	Mean thermometer.	Rain.	Mortality.	Mortality by cholera.	Cases of cholera reported.
1	69	-----	23	15	20
2	65	-----	29	11	9
3	58	-----	21	5	6
4	59	-----	30	14	14
5	60	-----	29	14	23
6	66	-----	38	15	16
7	69	-----	25	14	16
8	66	.435	47	24	44
9	59	.195	67	56	72
10	62	.015	98	82	174
11	58	-----	71	58	96
12	66	-----	82	50	77
13	58	-----	69	53	82
14	64	-----	61	46	61
15	60	-----	70	44	83
16	61	-----	52	30	57
17	61	-----	42	26	59
18	67	-----	49	31	31
19	64	.388	42	20	22
20	65	.215	30	12	13
21	64	.515	30	6	12
22	51	.210	19	12	20
23	43	.050	25	11	8
24	43	-----	18	5	7
25	40	.335	19	8	14
26	41	.095	19	3	8
27	42	.198	17	4	6
28	52	.098	15	6	1
29	44	-----	16	4	6
30	42	-----	17	5	4
31	41	-----	14	4	1
	57	2.749	1175	688	1062

NOVEMBER.

	Mean of thermometer.	Rain.	Mortality.	Mortality by cholera.	Cases of cholera reported.
1	53	-----	11	3	3
2	49	-----	16	2	10
3	50	-----	15	1	2
4	53	.015	12	-----	-----
5	44	-----	13	1	1
6	46	-----	14	1	-----
7	55	-----	11	1	-----
8	58	-----	17	1	4
9	54	-----	15	2	-----
10	48	.298	17	1	-----
11	44	.015	11	1	-----
12	45	-----	11	-----	-----
13	48	-----	15	-----	-----
14	46	.082	14	-----	-----
15	41	-----	19	-----	-----
16	42	-----	8	-----	-----
17	44	-----	14	-----	-----
18	47	.118	8	-----	-----
19	48	.453	13	-----	-----
20	46	.016	15	-----	-----
21	58	.212	10	-----	-----
22	59	.114	9	-----	-----
23	58	-----	14	-----	2
24	58	.078	12	-----	-----
25	58	-----	11	1	-----
26	44	.108	9	1	-----
	46	1.509	334	16	15

Another table gives the following as the statistics of this epidemic :

	NUMBER OF CASES REPORTED.	NUMBER OF DEATHS.
August	216	139
September	268	166
October	1,012	673
November	65	12
	1,561	990

It is a notable fact that only the extremest measures or the direst calamities will awaken an administration upon which the deathly lethargy has fallen. Small-pox did startle the various civic administrations now and then, but the cholera was needed to make it take decisive measures and remedy the foolish action of the Council of 1860, abolishing the Health Department. But, as has been customary in all cases requiring prompt and decisive action, the initiative was taken by a private citizen, who visited Philadelphia, New York and Boston, and investigated their various sanitary systems, becoming convinced from his investigations that the plan obtaining at that time in New York, in the establishment of the Metropolitan Board of Health, was the best. A meeting of citizens of Chicago was called, and a committee appointed to draft a bill embodying the prominent features of the metropolitan health bill of New York, for presentation to the State Legislature at the ensuing session. This committee was Elliott Anthony, Dr. John H. Rauch, Dr. James Van Zandt Blancy and A. C. Coventry. A copy of the bill as drafted by this committee was sent to the Common Council with a request that they co-operate to secure its passage. They, however, opposed it; but the Press, the Mercantile Association, the Board of Trade and the Police Board heartily indorsed it; and, after a contest before the Legislature between the champions of the bill and the Common Council, the act was passed on March 9, 1867, re-creating the Board of Health.

Pursuant to the provisions of said act, the Judges of the Superior Court appointed the following Board of Health: Dr. Hosmer A. Johnson (4 years), Dr. John H. Rauch (6 years), Dr. William Wagner (2 years), SAMUEL J. JONES.

Samuel Hoard (6 years), A. B. Reynolds (4 years), William Giles (2 years), and J. B. Rice, ex officio. On March 31, the board assembled and drew lots for the terms of office resulting as above: Mayor Rice was elected president. A sanitary inspection of the city was decided upon. Dr. John H. Rauch was appointed sanitary superintendent, and the following physicians sanitary inspectors:

West Division: H. W. Jones, H. M. Lyman, R. M. Lackey, T. P. Seeley and W. R. Marsh. South Division: Walter Hay, William C. Lyman and Edwin Powell. North Division: W. D. Winer, D. B. Trimble, George Schloetzer and Edward L. Holmes. Additional sanitary inspectors were subsequently nominated as follows: Drs. Brock, McVickar, J. M. Woodworth, E. O. F. Roler, M. Mannheim, F. W. Reilley, John Macalister, Philip Adolphus, George Kellogg, T. W. Miller and John Reid.

There were a few cases of cholera, and the attention

Health, and particularly by Dr. John H. Rauch, to whose energy, skill and science Chicago is indebted for a large proportion of her drainage and sewerage.

DRAINAGE AND SEWERAGE.—In 1856, when the first sewers were constructed, the influence they beneficially exerted was most marked. But sporadic activity only scintillated for a brief time amid the normal inactivity of the Council, and, in 1861, the construction of sewers almost ceased.* In the succeeding year their construction was re-commenced and urged forward. As a result of the drainage and sewerage systems may be cited the prevalence of cholera prior to the institution of the system in 1856, and its absence since that time and prior to 1872, save in one year, and then the districts where sewerage and drainage was the rule were not so afflicted with the disease as were those without adequate drainage and sewerage. The following tables will clearly exhibit the prophylactic influence sewers and drainage exert:

TABLE SHOWING PROPORTION OF SEWERAGE TO STATED AREA AND THE RATIO OF CHOLERA AND DEATHS IN VARIOUS YEARS, BY WARDS, OF THE CITY.

WARDS.	1866.				1867.			1868.		1869.		Maximum height level of the lake.	Minimum height level of the lake.
	No. of square yards to each foot of sewerage.	Density of population, No. of square yards to each person.	Cholera cases.	Ratio, one in	No. of square yards to each foot of sewerage.	Density of population.	Mortality.	No. of square yards to each foot of sewerage.	Mortality.	No. of square yards to each foot of sewerage.	Density of population.			Mortality.
1	35.12	130.07	79	122.1	25	133.92	*36	25	138.00	91	25	125.57	81	125	4.6
2	20.60	70.40	113	114.9	20	70.22	122	20	60.98	216	20	65.21	202	12.0	4.2
3	38.11	114.05	95	105.6	37	116.50	140	37	110.06	280	34	109.61	301	13.7	4.1
4	25.85	745.91	68	160.0	158	543.29	147	142	437.85	306	103	383.91	332	23.7	6.2
5	1,713.11	1,500.03	38	247.6	1,010	1,416.26	168	837	885.67	351	476	778.80	450	14.0	1.8
6	107.67	181.56	88	120.2	74	162.37	204	62	146.53	356	46	134.49	346	12	5.2
7	311.44	145.13	187	100.3	111	123.03	352	89	166.77	675	58	98.29	608	14.8	3.8
8	2,738.88	1,275.20	57	182.9	1,229	1,013.64	197	1,106	841.10	374	771	722.37	478	13.9	5.1
9	151.97	301.67	35	398.3	107	328.55	167	93	282.94	306	63	252.93	394	17.8	10.03
10	23.28	122.68	75	152.2	21	115.36	90	21	108.62	208	21	101.55	168	15.3	4.1
11	32.40	103.68	123	105.0	30	97.56	197	28	93.44	336	24	88.50	266	13.0	5.7
12	3,825.55	839.54	109	116.9	1,660	706.29	235	811	609.55	459	532	533.29	678	15.9	9.76
13	1,510.31	652.41	63	129.4	902	552.68	140	842	478.48	322	357	399.95	273	22.6	4.
14	228.85	205.81	155	78.7	113	184.96	204	88	167.93	381	65	148.87	373	10.5	3.12 of the board was given to its checking and suppression. They were successful, but, ad interim, on account of the neglect of the authorities to have vaccination performed since 1864, the small-pox had spread and become an epidemic. To check this, the systematic efforts of the board were manifested, and about thirty thousand persons were vaccinated. On July 1, 1867, regulations for the registry of births and death were made, and, upon the same day, the first case of cholera was reported. Sixty-seven cases occurred during the year, of which ten were fatal.
15	51.34	169.80	131	129.9	45	145.13	248	41	126.67	513	35	114.70	428	16.4	2.96
16	28.31	118.02	132	112.9	28	113.88	162	28	113.88	287	28	106.80	281	13.7	2.3

* Last six months.

During the early part of 1868, small-pox was very prevalent, but was extinguished by the rigid enforcement of the vaccination laws, and the disinfection and isolation of cases, by the Board of Health. Subsequently, however, it was introduced by emigrants; forty-eight cases of small-pox being taken out of that class, from railroad depots to the pest-house. Early in April, 1868, the sanitary survey was completed, with the result of demonstrating the urgent necessity there was for remedying deficient drainage and establishing new drains. Defective sewerage was also found to be omnipresent in the city. The existing defects were persistently presented to the Council by the Board of

CLEANSING THE RIVER.—An important factor in the health of Chicago has been the condition of the river. It was apparently innocuous until 1860, when, in July, the sewerage commissioners, through General Webster called E. S. Chesbrough's attention to the "possibility and probability of an enlargement and deepening of the canal to such an extent as to create a constant current from the lake to the Illinois River, only making a new channel through Mud Lake to the Desplaines River." Mr. Chesbrough reported adversely to the project, because he did not deem it advisable at that time. In the spring of 1861, however, the river became very offensive, and, on June 17, a committee of three aldermen was appointed to confer with the superintendent of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and

"Ascertain what arrangements could be made for pumping water from the river at Bridgeport into the canal, so as to create a current from the lake, which should supply the river with fresh water and relieve it of the offensive sewerage matter." But "if so happened that, before any arrangement was made, it became necessary to pump to supply the wants of the canal itself, and nothing more was done by the city. During the whole summer and the early part of autumn, the river, though receiving its full amount of sewerage, did not become so offensive at any time as to be a cause of complaint. Very soon, however, after the packing season commenced, a most disagreeable odor was observed near the Old (Eighteenth) Street Bridge, on the South Branch, which is above the outlet of the existing sewer. This peculiar odor could be traced afterward, as it moved down stream, till it reached the mouth of the river. As an additional proof that the sewers do not cause all the bad smell, it may here be mentioned that, in 1860, the discharge from piggeries and cow stables, high up on the North Branch made that stream exceedingly offensive to its mouth. It is also very offensive this winter (1861), and yet there is not a single sewer emptying into it at ordinary times, and only two, those on West Kinzie and Fulton streets, that do in times of heavy rain."

* For statistics of drainage and sewerage see Corporate History. It may be remarked that the Board of Sewerage Commissioners was incorporated by the Legislature on February 14, 1855.

From this extract from Mr. Chesbrough's report, it will be perceived that he estimated the main cause of the river's turbid filth was not sewerage. On March 10, 1862, the Council appropriated $10,000 to pay for pumping at Bridgeport, in order to cleanse Chicago River, which continued offensive during the year, notwithstanding the cleansing it derived by the spring freshet of 1862, which thoroughly polluted the water supply of the city, which was drawn from the lake.

In December, 1862, the Mayor received authority to make arrangements for drawing off the water of the canal through the Chicago River, so as to flush it, and thereby cleanse it from its impurities; and, in fact, throughout the whole year the authorities were agitating projects to remove the tainted and impure matter in the river, which Professor F. Mahla had analyzed and described, on September 22, to the Council. In 1863, the river "smelt to high heaven" again, and the epidemic of erysipelas that prevailed this year was ascribed to its fetid exhalations. And this despite the pumping that was maintained at intervals. In 1864, Aldermen Talcott, Sheridan, and Armstrong and City Engineer E. S. Chesbrough were appointed a committee to report upon the feasibility of cleansing the river. In 1865, two new and special members were added to the Board of Public Works by the amended charter—the members thus added being Roswell Bishop Mason and William Gooding. During the discussions which were held in the winter of 1864, and pursuant to the recommendation of a joint committee of the Common Council and the Board of Trade,* a commission was appointed, consisting of Mayor Francis C. Sherman and five engineers, William Gooding, Roswell Bishop Mason, John Van Nortwick, E. B. Talcott and E. S. Chesbrough. This commission received the notification of their appointment on January 9, 1865, and on March 6, rendered a report, whose recommendations were adopted. This report embraced these three features:

I. Intercepting sewers, which shall receive the filth that would otherwise flow into the river, and carry it to the lake, to some point or points, into which it would be pumped by machinery—thus keeping impurities out of the river to as great an extent as practicable.

II. Cutting canals, or making covered sewers from the two branches of the river to the lake; and, by pumping-works erected thereon, force the filthy water out or the lake water in, thus keeping up a constant and sufficient current to keep the river pure. We do not believe the necessary current can be produced by the natural action of the waves of the lake, as has been suggested.

III. Cutting down the summit of the Illinois and

* The committee from the Board of Trade were R. M. Hough and J. C. Dore, and from the Council, Aldermen Holden, Gunnskey and Lawson. On January 3, 1865, a public meeting was held at Metropolitan Hall, where resolutions were passed condemnatory of the wretched condition of the city, and thereat the following Committee of Thirty were appointed, of which J. H. Duoban was chairman: J. H. Duoban, Wirt Dexter, Roswell B. Mason, John V. Farrell, William F. Goodrich, Sidney Smith, J. L. Hancock, P. L. Voe, Jonathan V. Scammon, R. M. Hough, Charles Walker, E. C. Larcad, Daniel Brainard, Edwin H. Sheldon, W. Munger, J. B. Turner, James L. Stark, Charles G. Hammond, George L. Dunlap, Julia S. Binney, George Schneider, W. D. Houghtaling, F. W. Gates, J. M. Avery, John C. Hoines, H. G. Powers, F. B. Gardner, Samuel Hoard, Ira V. Munn, Martin Kyerson and Bacon Wheeler.

Michigan canal below the level of the lake, so that a sufficient quantity of water may be drawn from it to create the necessary current through the main river and South Branch (and, perhaps, to some extent, in the North Branch also) to thoroughly purify the same at all times. The estimated cost of this plan (III.) was $2,102,467.50.

The phraseology of the fifth annual report of the Board of Public Works concisely states the plan adopted and the condition of the river:

"It was stated in our last report that the board, including the special members, Messrs. Gooding and Mason, had adopted as their plan for the permanent cleansing of the river (or, more precisely, for the cleansing of the main river and South Branch), the deepening of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, between the Bridgeport lock and the lock this side of Lockport, a distance of twenty-six miles, so that there shall be a continuous movement of the water of the river through the canal, at the rate of 24,000 cubic feet per minute, at a low stage of water in the lake. Such arrangements were also made with the Board of Trustees of the Canal as to enable the board to avail themselves of the pumping at Bridgeport. The request of the board was complied with, although we had no occasion to avail ourselves of the works last summer (1865), as the river was kept sufficiently clean by the frequent rains. The pumps were set in motion in the latter part of last June (1866), and the river, since then, excepting the North Branch, has been kept in good condition and free from offensive smells."

In 1866, the pumping was commenced on June 19, and discontinued on September 5. During the springs of 1867 and 1868 there were freshets, which assisted the pumping in cleansing the river and its South Branch, but the North Branch was especially pestilential and offensive. In 1869,* the malodorous characteristics of the river were dominant, and it was then found, by experiment, that when there had been little or no rain-fall, "it almost seemed as if the upward current in the main river and South Branch, while the pumps were in operation acted as a barrier to the outlet of water from the North Branch." The stagnation of the water in the Ogden Slip and the Healy Slough was one continued source of trouble, anxiety, and deodorization.

The filthy condition of the river in 1870 rendered the service of the pumps at Bridgeport indispensable; but with both of them running at their full capacity it was found almost impossible to keep the river clean. But the new régime was on the eve of inauguration.

The deepening of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which was commenced in February, 1866, was completed on Saturday, July 15, 1871. By the cutting of the temporary dam across the canal at Bridgeport quite a current was at once created, and an entire change of the water in the main river and South Branch was effected in about thirty-six hours. This also had a good effect upon the North Branch, although more benefit was derived by abstaining from throwing garbage, offal and distillery filth into the Branch. The cost of deepening, from its inception up to April 1, 1871, exclusive of interest, was $2,982,437.13.†

VITAL STATISTICS.—The first registration of births was made on July 1, 1867, and the following table gives the births in Chicago from that date until 1871:

July 1 to December 31, 1867	2,886
January 1 to December 31, 1868	6,514
January 1 to December 31, 1869	7,955
January 1 to December 31, 1870	19,953
January 1 to December 31, 1871	11,142

* In 1867, pumping was commenced on June 10, and discontinued on November 15; in 1868, commenced July 10, and ceased September 30; in 1869, commenced August 6, and terminated November 15.

† The amount paid for cleansing the river by pumping is stated as—1866, $3,398.66; 1867, $17,875.21; 1868, 14,178.38. For 1869, the amount may be estimated as about $15,000; and for 1870, about $20,000; thus these temporary alleviations may be approximated as costing the city about $67,500.

‡ These figures are estimates, the records having been destroyed in the fire of 1871. For the last two and one-half months of 1871, the births were 1,431.

MORTALITY STATISTICS.—The following table gives the statistics of mortality, with the ratio of deaths to the population, since 1843—the earliest date at which there are any figures approximating to accuracy :

YEARS.	Reported mortality.	Estimated actual mortality.	Population.	Death rate per centum.	Deaths from epidemics and prevalent diseases.
1843----	129	141	7,580	1.86
1844----	306	336	10,170	3.30
1845----	313	344	12,088	2.84
1846----	359	394	14,169	2.78
1847----	520	572	16,857	3.39
1848----	580	638	20,023	3.18
1849----	1,547	1,791	23,047	7.38	Cholera, 678.
1850----	1,334	1,467	29,963	4.89	Cholera, 420.
1851----	843	927	34,000	3.66	Cholera, 216.
1852----	1,052	1,809	38,734	4.67	Cholera, 650.
1853----	1,205	1,325	59,130	2.24
1854----	3,834	4,217	65,872	6.49	{ Dysent'y, 242 Cholera, 1424.
1855----	1,983	2,181	80,023	2.72	Cholera, 147.
1856----	1,897	2,086	84,143	2.48	Dysentery, 305.
1857----	2,170	2,414	93,000	2.56	Dysentery, 465
1858----	2,050	2,255	84,000	2.68	{ Scarlet fever, 233. Dysentery, 224.
1859----	1,826	2,008	94,000	2.13	Scar. fever, 253.
1860----	2,059	2,264	109,260	2.07	{ Scarlet fever, 125. Diphtheria, 154.
1861----	2,072	2,279	120,000	1.89
1862----	2,578	2,835	137,030	2.06	Scar fever, 335.
1863----	3,523	3,875	150,000	2.58	{ Scarlet fever, 405. Small pox, 115. Erysipelas, 15. Small pox, 283.
1864----	4,044	4,448	161,288	2.75	Erysipelas, 34.
1865----	3,663	4,029	178,492	2.25	Small pox, 57.
1866----	5,931	6,524	200,418	3.22	Cholera, 990.
1867----	4,648	4,773	225,000	2.11	{ Small pox, 123 Cholera, 10.
1868----	5,984	---	252,054	2.37	Small pox, 146.
1869----	6,488	---	280,000	2.31
1870----	7,323	---	298,700	2.45
1871*----	6,976	---	334,270	2.08

BOARDS OF HEALTH.—The first Board of Health was composed of Dr. William Clark and Dr. Edmund Stoughton Kimberly, in 1834. Its duties were specific, and its tenure of office brief. On June 19, 1835, the first permanent board was constituted, consisting of Messrs. Curtis, Sweet, Morris, Peck, King, Fullerton and Temple, to which board were, afterward, added Samuel Jackson, Hiram Hugunin and Alanson Sweet. No record is extant of any action by this board; and on May 9, 1837, Dr. John W. Eldridge, Alexander N. Fullerton and D. Cox were elected members of the Board of Health, and Dr. Daniel Brainard was appointed the health officer. Mayor William B. Ogden was, ex officio, president. On March 16, 1838, the board comprised Mayor Buckner S. Morris and Drs. J. W. Eldridge, John Brinkerhoff and Daniel Brainard, Dr. E. J. Kimberly being health officer. On March 18, 1839, the board consisted of Benjamin W. Raymond, mayor, Dr. Daniel Brainard, Stephen B. Gay and Josiah T. Betts. Dr. Charles Volney Dyer, elected health officer at the beginning of the year, resigned September 30. On December 26, 1839, Dr. E. S. Kimberly was elected his successor. On April 20, 1840, Alexander Loyd, mayor, George W. Merrill, Dr. John Brinkerhoff and William Jones composed the board, Dr. Kimberly still being health officer.

* Two hundred and ninety-nine deaths from small pox in the last three months of 1871. Inquests were held on one hundred and seventeen bodies resultant from the fire: Burns, ninety-six; falling walls, five; shock and suffocation, sixteen.

On March 9, 1841, Francis C. Sherman, mayor, William Jones, Henry Brown and Jeremiah Price were the board, and Dr. John W. Eldridge was health officer. On March 14, 1842, the board comprised Mayor Benjamin W. Raymond, William Jones, Henry Brown and Jeremiah Price. The city physician was Dr. William Bradshaw Egan, and Orson Smith was health officer and city marshal. On March 12, 1843, the board were Augustus Garrett, mayor, William Jones, Jeremiah Price and Walter L. Newberry. Henry Brown was elected, but declined. Orson Smith was health officer. On May 9, 1844, Augustus Garrett, mayor, Jeremiah Price, William H. Brown and A. Peck composed the board, J. M. Underwood having been elected, but declined the office. Orson Smith was still health officer. On April 4, 1845, the members of the board were Augustus Garrett, mayor, William H. Brown, Jeremiah Price and Dr. David Sheppard Smith. Dr. Philip Maxwell was city physician, and Philip Dean health officer. In 1846, John P. Chapin, mayor, Dr. Daniel Brainard, Jeremiah Price and H. Brown were the board, and Ambrose Burnam was health officer. In 1847, the board consisted of James Curtiss, mayor, Dr. E. S. Kimberly, Sutton Marsh and Dr. Stewart. On June 29, A. F. Bradley took the place of Dr. Kimberly, and Jared Barrett that of Mr. Marsh. J. F. Wait was health officer. In 1848, James H. Woodworth, mayor, Sutton Marsh, S. J. Sherwood and F. C. Hagerman constituted the board, and Ambrose Burnam was health officer. On January 24, Dr. Henry S. Huber was appointed city physician. In 1849, the board was composed of J. J. Woodworth, mayor, Flavel Moseley, William H. Brown and J. M. Underwood. Dr. Levi D. Boone was city physician, and Ambrose Burnam health officer. On June 4, Mr. Moseley resigned, and Thomas Church was elected to fill the vacancy. In 1850, James Curtiss, mayor, Flavel Moseley, William H. Brown and Samuel Hoard were the board, Dr. Levi D. Boone city physician, and Orson Smith, health officer. On March 7, 1851, C. P. Bradley was appointed health officer, and the first meeting of the board was held April 1, 1851, when it comprised Walter L. Newberry, acting mayor, William H. Brown, Samuel Hoard and Flavel Moseley. August 1, W. S. Gurnee, mayor, became a member. On April 17, 1852, the board comprised W. S. Gurnee, mayor, and Messrs. Dodge, Dyer, Brinkerhoff and Carpenter. Dr. A. B. Palmer was city physician, and C. P. Bradley health officer. On March 22, 1853, the board was composed of Charles M. Gray, mayor, J. C. Dodge, I. Speer, C. Follansbee and James Andrews. Dr. Brock, McVickar was city physician, and W. B. H. Gray health officer. In 1854, the board consisted of Isaac L. Milliken, mayor, John C. Dodge, H. Whitbeck, C. L. Harmon and Isaac Speer. Dr. Brock, McVickar was city physician, and W. W. Taylor health officer—George P. Hansen being appointed health officer on Mr. Taylor's resignation on July 24. On March 22, 1855, the board was constituted by Levi D. Boone, mayor, Dr. B. McVickar, Isaac Speer, H. Whitbeck and George W. Dole. Dr. Isaac Lynn was city physician, and George P. Hansen health officer. On April 2, 1856, the new board met. It was composed of Thomas Dyer, mayor, Isaac Speer, G. W. Dole, Frederick A. Bryan and Hugh Maher. Dr. Brock, McVickar was city physician, and George P. Hansen health officer. On April 2, 1857, the board met, the members being John Wentworth, mayor, George W. Dole, Isaac Speer, W. H. Brown, William Whitbeck, Casper Butz and ——— Cleveland. Dr. Gerhard Christian Paoli was city physician, and Ambrose Burnam health officer. In 1858, there appears to have been no board; Dr. Gerhard C.

Paoli was city physician, and Ambrose Burnam health officer. In 1859, the board was composed of John C. Haines, mayor, J. W. Waughop, F. Mahla, A. J. Heald, A. Blakie and T. B. Gardner. Dr. William Wagner was city physician (which position was vacated by the ordinance of March 27, 1860), and James L. Abbott health officer. The latter resigned May 5, 1860, in consequence of said ordinance. In 1860, 1861 and 1862, there was no Board of Health. On September 10, of the latter year, Charles S. Perry, a policeman, was made acting health officer, and, on December 20, was detailed for that duty. December 1, 1862, Dr. Lucian P. Cheney was made city physician, at a salary of $600 per annum, "he to furnish all medicines, prescribed by him, at his own cost and expense," which would appear to be an overt method of discouraging the administration of remedies. On May 9, 1864, Dr. J. A. Hahn was appointed city physician, vice Dr. L. P. Cheney, deceased. Charles S. Perry was still acting health officer. On May 5, 1865, Dr. S. C. Blake was appointed city physician, and T. B. Bridges was elected health officer, on May 19, by the Board of Police. In 1866, Dr. Blake and Mr. Bridges still occupied the offices of city physician and health officer, respectively. On March 31, 1867, the Board of Health comprised J. B. Rice, mayor, Dr. William Wagner, Dr. Hosmer A. Johnson, Dr. John H. Rauch, William Giles, A. B. Reynolds and Samuel Hoard—all matters and things connected with the health department being transferred to this board by the Board of Police on April 3, at which date Dr. John H. Rauch was made sanitary superintendent. Dr. N. T. Quales was city physician, and Ambrose Burnam health officer. The same board and officers held office in 1868. On March 31, 1869, the board was composed of J. B. Rice, mayor, Dr. George Schlotzter, Dr. Hosmer A. Johnson, Dr. John H. Rauch, William Giles, A. B. Reynolds and Samuel Hoard—the sanitary superintendent, city physician and health officer being the same. In 1870, these officials were the same, with the exception of the health officer and city physician. The city physician was H. S. Hahn. Ambrose Burnam died October 21, 1870, and was succeeded by Joseph Lane. In 1871, the board consisted of Roswell B. Mason, mayor, Dr. John H. Rauch (sanitary superintendent), Dr. H. A. Johnson, Dr. George Schlotzter, Samuel Hoard, A. B. Reynolds and George Von Hollen. The city physician was H. S. Hahn, and George H. Germain was health officer.

AMBROSE BURNAM, one of Chicago's early settlers, and for many years one of its most trustworthy and public-spirited citizens, was a native of New York, born near Watertown in 1812. He was reared on a farm, and his early education consisted of only such learning as he could get by attending at odd times the common schools of his vicinity. In 1835, he came West and located in Chicago, which city was his home for nearly forty years. On his arrival here, he obtained employment as a clerk with Charles Follansbee, who then kept a general store on Lake Street, near Washab Avenue. A year or two later he went to Joliet, and engaged for a while in the drug trade on his own account; he, however, soon returned to Chicago and became connected, in a clerical way, with the Board of Canal Commissioners. In 1846, he was elected health officer, which position he held until his election as the third city marshal, in 1848. At that time, the police force of Chicago had not that system of organization that it had in later years, or that it now has; and from 1842 to 1855, the city marshals were practically the official heads of the Police Department. In June, 1855, the ordinance was passed creating the Police Department, and, in that year, Cyrus P. Bradley was elected captain or chief of police. Mr. Burnam held the office of city marshal from 1848 to 1852, being succeeded in the latter year by James L. Howe. His greatest services to the city were, however, in connection with its sanitary affairs. As has already been noted, his first connection with the Board of Health was in 1846, when he was elected health officer. He was again elected to this position in 1856, serving with signal ability for three years. In 1867, the Board of Health, remembering his valuable services during his former administration of the office, again chose him health officer, which position he continued to hold until his death, which occurred in October, 1870. Mr. Burnam married Miss Rhoda B. Reynolds, whose parents lived near Laporte, Ind. To them was born five sons, all but one of whom are still living. Alston, the eldest, died in 1843. Two others, Arthur and Frank, are residents of this city, and Lisle and Miles are in business in Iowa and Colorado, respectively.

ART AND ARCHITECTURE.

ART.

The year 1858 found Chicago too deeply engaged in commercial enterprises of every description to bestow more than a passing thought upon Art. The struggle for wealth engrossed alike the mental and physical activities of its citizens. Few were found at this period who were not contented to leave the entire subject of Art for future consideration. We can not bestow too much praise upon those earnest, hopeful artists who, with firm faith in the city's future, looked forward to a day when Chicago should become one of the leading Art centers of America, and were content to offer to the public, however unappreciative, the best productions of their genius. Among the artists of that time were L. W. Volk,* G. P. A. Healy, S. P. Tracy, Howard Strong, George S. Collis, and Daniel F. Bigelow.

To such men as E. B. McCagg, Horace White, J. Y. Scammon, S. H. Kerfoot, U. H. Crosby, Daniel Brainard, Walter L. Newberry, B. F. Culver, Thomas Hoyne and others, belong the distinction of having co-operated with the artists in educating the public taste to a point where genuine love for Art created a demand for its finest productions. To this union of effort, on the part of artists and connoisseurs, is due a progress in this direction which is absolutely without parallel in any city in the country.

On March 22, 1859, a meeting was called, to be held at the rooms of the Historical Society in the Newberry Block, the object of which was "To devise a plan for an Art Exposition, to consist of such select and approved paintings and sculptures as are in possession of our citizens, in order to afford to the public, and especially all persons interested in the Fine Arts, an opportunity to gratify and improve their taste in Art matters."

As a result of the deliberations of this meeting, an invitation to contributors was announced on April 12; and on May 9 the first Art Exposition in Chicago was formally opened to the public in Burch's Building, corner of Lake Street and Washab Avenue. The number of contributors was about seventy; the catalogue showed the presence of about three hundred and sixty-nine works of art, consisting of twenty specimens of statuary, over three hundred and twenty paintings in oil, and some twenty in crayon and water colors. The entire number of visitors registered was twelve thousand; gross receipts from admission fees and sales of catalogues amounted to $1,942.99; and the total disbursements were $1,123.55.

* To Leonard W. Volk, the sculptor, who generously proffered the use of his extensive and unique collection of newspaper articles, catalogues and other pamphlets relating to art matters, preserved by him with great care for many years, the compiler is indebted for much valuable matter.

Encouraged by the success attending this exhibition, some of the artists and art connoisseurs formed an organization known as the Chicago Art Union, having for its object the encouragement of Fine Art in the West. The first exhibition of this society was given in the gallery of Mr. Hesler, at No. 113 Lake Street, and included works of Volk, Healy, Strong and Tracy. The exhibition was opened on December 5, 1859, and closed, on or about January 1, 1860, with a distribution of forty-seven specimens of paintings and statuary, valued at $2,400, among the holders of eight hundred tickets.

MASK OF LINCOLN.

One of the most noteworthy events connected with the history of art in this city, during the period covered by the present sketch, was the execution by L. W. Volk, of a bust of Abraham Lincoln, from a mask cast in plaster from the features of the original, shortly before his nomination for the presidency in 1860. This bust, on account of its fidelity and delicacy of execution, excited much interest not only in art circles but also in every grade of society throughout the land. The original was presented by Mr. Volk to the Crosby Opera House Art Association in 1866, and was exhibited at the Paris Exposition of the succeeding year.

No other Art Exposition worthy of mention occurred in Chicago until December, 1862, when L. W. Volk, sculptor, and John Antrobus, painter, opened a gallery in the brick building at the northeast corner of State and Washington streets. This building, formerly a private residence, was remodeled with special reference to the new use for which it was designed, and was then known as the Art Building. This gallery was intended for the reception and free exhibition of specimens of the fine arts, by local and foreign artists of repute. The enterprise met with much favor; and while it afforded to artists a convenient method of bringing before the public works which they offered for sale, it was of great value as an educator of the public taste.

During the last week of October and the first week of November, 1863, the Ladies' Northwestern Fair for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission was held. One of the departments which attracted most attention from visitors was the Art Gallery, which was opened at McVicker's Theatre, under the management of the following committee: Mrs. J. S. Colt, of Milwaukee; Mrs. D. P. Livermore, of Chicago; Mrs. Doctor Carr, of Madison; and Miss Valeria Campbell, of Detroit. Leonard W. Volk was the manager of the gallery. Among the contributors from Chicago were W. L. Newberry, E. B. McCagg, U. H. Crosby, G. P. A. Healy, Dr. Rogers, Dr. Daniel Brainard, M. D. Ogden, W. B. Ogden, Bishops Whitehouse and Duggan, William Bross, George Stevens, L. W. Volk, Mark Skinner, H. C. Ford, Joseph Medill, Thomas Hoyne, S. H. Kerfoot, J. V. Scammon and E. Peck. Three hundred and twenty-three works of art were catalogued, and a comparison with the Exhibition of 1859 shows a marked growth in culture and the refinements of civilized life. Not more than two of the owners of private galleries declined to loan some of their choicest works to the exhibition, and many artists exhibited some of the finest specimens of their work. The interest shown in this exhibition may be inferred from the fact that on one evening alone seven hundred tickets of admission (exclusive of season tickets) were taken at the doors; and during the first five days over seven thousand catalogues were sold, the profits from which sale alone were sufficient to defray all expenses of the exhibition.

A still finer art collection was exhibited at the Great Northwestern Sanitary Fair, in June, 1865. Local artists and art connoisseurs again offered the gems of their collections, and many choice works were obtained from abroad. The list of artists embraced one hundred and forty-seven names (mostly of Americans) who represented every school of art, and included many of the most eminent artists of the past and present centuries.

It was in 1866, however, that the real history of Art in Chicago began, with the inception of the Academy of Design. This organization secured its first impetus from a few professional artists, who desired to found an institution which should promote and foster taste for the fine arts, and encourage harmonious emulation among artists. Their first meetings were held in the Portland Block, late in the year 1866, and the first officers chosen were as follows: President, Sheldon J. Woodman; Vice-President, Charles Peck; Secretary, Walter Shirlaw. A constitution and by-laws were adopted, in which the aims of the Academy and its scheme of government were set forth. Its support was to be derived from monthly dues paid by artists. Free schools were instituted for instruction in drawing from life and from antique models. It was early determined to give an exhibition of such works in painting and sculpture as could be collected from artists and private individuals, and the following announcement of the intentions of the society was made by circular to the public:

"The Chicago Academy of Design will give a literary, musical and dramatic festival at Crosby's Opera House on Friday evening, May 3, 1867, and on Monday evening, May 13, will open, at its gallery in Jevne & Almini's building, the first semi-annual exhibition of the Academy."

About thirty-five members were enrolled at this time, including some of the first artists in the city. The reception at the Opera House was very successful, but in the ten days that intervened before the exhibition public interest had flagged and the result was a pecuniary loss. Discordant elements were found to exist from its inception, and this society soon found its grave. This first effort to establish an Academy of the Arts, however, was felt to be a decided step forward.

ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

On November 18, 1867, a meeting of the principal artists in the city was held at Crosby's Opera House for the purpose of reorganizing the Academy upon a sure basis, founded upon principles broad and liberal, and incorporating features tending to elevate the character and condition of the arts of design. A revised constitution was adopted, and Leonard W. Volk was solicited to act as president, a position which he filled until 1878, with marked ability and harmonizing influence. "Life," "Antique" and "Rudimentary" drawing-schools were opened in Room 28, Opera House, in January, 1868. No salaries were paid, all labor, including tuition, being rendered gratuitously.

The monthly dues of one dollar from each artist member were soon found to be insufficient for the Academy's financial needs, and the administration issued a circular to the public announcing "An artists' reception to be given in the Opera House on Friday evening, March 6, for the double purpose of raising a sufficient sum to enable the Academy to make accessions of art in the antique school, and to warrant issuing invitations to the artists of the country, with a view of gathering together in this city a much larger and finer collection of art work for the annual exhibition in December."

The reception proved a brilliant affair. The Crosby Art Gallery and auditorium were rented, a large number of pictures were hung, the studios thrown open, and some classic art scenes of rare excellence given on the stage. The attendance was large, but the net profits footed up only $450; scarcely enough to liquidate accumulated indebtedness. Gifts of $500 from J. Young Scammon and $100 from B. F. Culver, however, enabled the society to purchase the desired casts. On April 1, 1868, Conrad Diehl was employed to teach the schools at a salary of $1,000. In ten months from the commencement of the schools, thirty-five pupils had been received, eight of whom were admitted to associate membership. The tuition was about ten dollars a month, no charges being made to members of the Academy. On November 5, of the same year, the first distribution of premiums among the pupils occurred, and the third annual exhibition was opened on December 18. At this exhibition the highest catalogue number was one hundred and eighteen; amount of sales of pictures, $4,000, of which the academy received ten per cent.; sale of tickets to exhibition, $850.

On March 16, 1869, an act of incorporation was secured through the efforts of E. B. McCagg, Charles Knickerbocker, the corresponding secretary, with the following artists included as incorporators: H. C. Ford, Charles Knickerbocker, S. E. Loring, Alvah Bradish, J. C. Cochrane, W. Cogswell, L. W. Volk, Conrad Diehl, J. F. Gookins, Louis Kurz, R. E. Moore, Theodore Pine, P. F. Reed, W. Shirlaw, G. P. A. Healy and Charles Peck.

At the annual meeting of the Academy on November 5 of the same year, the address of the president and the reports of the committee presented an encouraging view of the work accomplished and a favorable account of the society's condition.

Owing to a refusal of the use of the Opera House Art Gallery, no exhibition was given this season. This refusal, although at first depressing to members, was the means of stimulating a desire for independence, which bore fruit the following year, in leasing a new and beautiful marble-front building on Adams Street, between State and Dearborn.

A new feature was grafted on the policy of the administration about this time, in the establishment of life-memberships and life-memberships in perpetuity, upon the payment of $100, and $500, respectively—a measure which, it was believed, would increase both the moral and material resources of the Academy; and the result justified the expectation.

On March 22, 1870, the new building was formally opened to the public by a reception given under the auspices of the Academy, the society having taken possession of its new quarters. The building had been erected expressly to meet the wants of the society by Jonathan Clark. It had a frontage on Adams Street was eighty feet, and its depth seventy-five feet. The material used in its construction was Cleveland stone. The lower story was occupied by stores and the four upper floors by the Academy. It contained two galleries, a hall and lecture room, large school rooms and sixteen commodious studios.

An event which excited no small interest in art circles, was the formation, in 1866, of the Crosby Opera House Art Association for the sale of the Opera House, and three hundred valuable oil paintings. The Association announced the object of the sale to be the re-imbusement of Mr. Crosby for sacrifices made in the cause of art, and engravers and publishers co-operated with the artists in coming to his relief. Among the best known works of art enumerated on the list of premiums were Bierstadt's "Yosemite Valley," Cropsey's "An American Autumn," Schussel's "Washington Irving and his Friends," Hart's "Woods in Autumn," Gignoux's "Alpine Scenery," and Volk's original bust of Lincoln. The drawing occurred in October, 1866.

With the growth of the love for art, private collections in the city became more numerous and extensive. Originals by such masters as Rembrandt, Teniers, Couture and others were loaned by citizens of Chicago to the various exhibitions which have been described. Among the owners of large and valuable private collections during the period antecedent to the fire may be mentioned James Robb, U. H. Crosby, Bishop Whitehouse, George Stevens, J. Young Scammon and E. B. McCagg.

Art stores multiplied. Mr. Atkins opened a gallery for the exhibition and sale of paintings in Crosby's Opera House, which continued in successful operation until the time of the fire. Other dealers of prominence were Jevne & Almini, Hovey & Heffron, W. T. Noble & Co. and Martin O'Brien, the last named having in 1869, founded the Chicago Art Journal, the first Art serial ever published in the West.

LEONARD WELLS VOLK, whose name is so intimately connected with the progress of art in Chicago, was born at Willstown, Montgomery (now Hamilton) Co., N. Y., November 7, 1828. His mother belonged to the historical family of Anneke Jans Bogardus. At the age of sixteen, he began to learn the trade of a marble cutter from his father. From Massachusetts, he removed to Bethany, N. Y., from which place he went to Albion, and subsequently to Batavia, N. Y., where he established himself in business with his brother. Having become impressed with the advantages offered by St. Louis, Mr. Volk removed to that city. There he determined to carry into execution a project long before conceived—to abandon his trade and strive to attain success in art. Acting upon the new resolve, he opened a modest studio in St. Louis in 1849. His first work was the execution, from a daguerreotype, of Dr. J. K. Barlow, the father of his future wife. The story of Mr. Volk's attachment for and subsequent marriage to Miss Emily C. Barlow constitutes a veritable romance. Their acquaintance was formed while Leonard W. Volk was working at his trade in Bethany, N. Y. Dr. Barlow shortly thereafter removed to Quincy, Ill., and Miss Barlow was a not infrequent guest at the residence of her brother in St. Louis. It is perhaps, not too much to surmise that his affection exerted a potent influence in determining his choice of the profession of an artist, and we may readily believe that an ennobling love for a true woman was to him, in his early struggles, at once a solace, a stimulant and a safeguard. To become worthy of the woman he loved was his aim, and each success was to him doubly gratifying because he saw in it one new step toward the goal of his desires. Miss Barlow was among the visitors to the young sculptor's sanctum, and it may be imagined how her presence lighted up the little room and infused new courage into the lover's heart. During those early years in St. Louis, Mr. Volk studied faithfully and worked hard, nor was he compelled to wait many years for recognition. Among the productions of his chisel during that period was a copy of Hart's bust of Henry Clay, the first piece of marble sculpture completed west of the Mississippi. The bust was highly praised by the local press, and served to bring the artist prominently before the public. Mr. Volk subsequently disposed of it to admirers of the great Kentucky statesman in Louisville. Shortly thereafter, he was commissioned by the Catholic archbishop of the diocese to execute two figures for the Cathedral, and his faithful execution of the order gained for him high encomiums from the prelate. In 1852 his reputation having been established, he was married to Miss Barlow, and took up his residence at Galena, Ill. Here he was visited by Senator Stephen A. Douglas, a cousin of Mrs. Volk. Mr. Volk returned to St. Louis, but not meeting with the success for which he had hoped, established himself at Rock Island. There he was again visited by Senator Douglas, who offered to defray the expense of Mr. Volk's pursuing his studies at Rome. The offer was accepted, and, in September, 1855, Mr. Volk made his first visit to Europe, leaving his wife and child with his mother, at Pittsfield, Mass. After spending some time in England and France, and having visited the galleries of Paris, and attended the first French International Exposition, he went to Rome. He devoted himself earnestly to the study of his profession for a year and a half, and there modeled his first statue—"The boy Washington cutting down the cherry tree." From Rome, Mr. Volk went to Florence, whence, after a few months, he sailed for New York. In June, 1857, he arrived in Chicago, and opened a studio on Clark Street, opposite the Sherman House. From that time his public career has been almost identical with the history of art in Chicago. During the first year of his residence, he executed a life-size bust of Senator Douglas, which, with other works, made him immediately and favorably known throughout the Northwest. His connection with the various art exhibitions in this city has been already mentioned, as also his identification with the movement for the establishment of the Academy of Design, whose president he was during a period of eight and a half years. It would be useless to enumerate the works of Mr. Volk, as they are so well known to every citizen of Chicago. His bust of Douglas, his statue of the same statesman (executed for Governor Matteson), his mask of Lincoln, his bust of the late Daniel Brainard (now in possession of Rush Medical College) are familiar to every resident of the city. The mask of Lincoln by Mr. Volk is without doubt the most faithful portraiture of the features of the great National martyr ever executed, and has served as a model and guide for all who have since attempted to portray that rugged, homely, yet strong and pleasant face. At the outbreak of the Rebellion, Mr. Volk enlisted as a private in Colonel John Van Arman's regiment, and drilled with that organization in the old Board-of-Trade building, but the seventy-five thousand troops called for by the Government having already responded, the regiment was disbanded. In December, 1868, Mr. Volk made his second visit to Rome; and in January, 1871, he visited Rome for the third time, being accompanied by his wife, daughter, and son, Stephen Arnold Douglas Volk. During his absence the great fire occurred, in which his losses were serious. It is worthy of remark that on his return in 1872, he ordered, at Geneva, the first shipment of Carrara marble (400 tons) ever made direct from Italy to Chicago. His losses in the conflagration only served to revive the energy of his youth, and his works since that date show no impairment of his genius or his faithful zeal. Among these may be mentioned his statues of Lincoln and Douglas (now in the State House at Springfield), his busts of Henry Keep and the late Zachariah Chandler, G. B. Armstrong, Gardon S. Hubbard, Rev. Jeremiah Porter, and Zuinglius Grover, president of Dearborn Seminary. The crowning effort of Mr. Volk's professional career is, beyond doubt, the superb monument over the tomb of Senator Douglas, which is one of the glories of Chicago. Mr. Volk was for several years secretary of the Douglas Monument Association, and the massive pile itself stands to-day not only as a tribute of a State's love and gratitude toward the eminent statesman, but as a monument of the genius and devotion of the artist. Mr. and Mrs. Volk have two children living, a daughter, Mrs. William B. Colt, and a son, Douglas Volk, who is an artist of rising fame in New York.

GEORGE P. A. HEALY was born in Boston, Mass., July 15, 1813, and is the eldest son of Captain William and Mary Healy. From his mother, Mr. Healy inherited a talent for painting, of which, however, he gave no indication until at the age of sixteen, when it was developed by drawing maps at school. Two years later he was presented to Thomas Sully, the great artist, who requested him to make a study of nature and copy a head by Stuart. When they were completed and shown to Mr. Sully he, with his characteristic kindness, said: "By all means, Mr. Healy, make painting your profession." Seven years later, while on his way to England to paint a portrait of Queen Victoria, Mr. Sully chanced to look at a portrait of Audubon, painted by the young student, and he said, "Mr. Healy, you have no reason to regret having taken my advice." This encouraged Mr. Healy, and he took a studio; but he did not earn enough money to pay his first quarter's rent, and his landlord, Richard Tucker, ordered pictures made of his son John and son-in-law, John Henry Gray. These were exhibited at the Athenaeum in 1832. The following spring he painted the portrait of Lieutenant Van Brunt of the navy, and through him he became acquainted with, and secured sittings from, Mrs. Harrison Gray Otis. He painted her portrait and hung it in the exhibition of that summer. She was a handsome woman, and made a beautiful portrait, which proved a valuable aid to the struggling artist. It enabled him to leave a considerable sum of money with his mother, and to go to Europe, with a thousand dollars in his pocket, in the spring of 1834. He spent two years in Paris, studying from the life and copying pictures in the Louvre. In the spring of 1836, he visited London for the first time, and painted, with great success, till the spring of 1838, when the American Minister, Andrew Stevenson, commissioned him to paint a portrait of Marshal Soult. The arrangements for the sittings were made through General

Cass, Minister in Paris, who also ordered Mr. Healy to paint himself and family. While there he, also, painted a portrait of Louis Philippe. In 1838, he painted the portrait of Mrs. Cass, which, in the exhibition at the Louvre, in the spring of 1840, obtained for him his first gold medal. He also, in that year, returned to London, and married Miss Louisa Phipp, and then went back to Paris to resume the sittings of Louis Philippe. His Majesty attended a ball given by General Cass in commemoration of Washington's birthday, and, while there, observed one of Mr. Healy's works, a full-length portrait of General Washington, copied from an engraving in the work written by Sparks. The king commissioned Mr. Healy to paint a full-length portrait of Washington for his historical gallery at Versailles. In 1844, Louis Philippe commissioned Mr. Healy to make copies of the royal personages, from Elizabeth down to William IV, together with those of the most eminent statesmen. While executing these, he was instructed to proceed with all haste to paint the portraits of General Jackson and several of the presidents and statesmen of our country. He afterward returned to the United States, to make studies for his great picture of "Webster Replying to Hayne," the studies for and execution of which work occupied him seven years. His next important work was the representation of Franklin, Lee and Dean negotiating a treaty of alliance between France and the struggling colonies. This work obtained for him his second gold medal at the Universal Exhibition in Paris, in 1855, in which year Mr. Healy first came to Chicago. In this city he has become well known by the many portraits of eminent citizens he has painted.

MRS. MARIE ANTOINETTE KENNICOTT is one of the pioneer teachers of drawing and painting now living in Chicago, having taught in the Chicago Female Seminary, on Clark Street, as early as 1851. Mrs. Kennicott displayed talents as a child, which were encouraged by her mother, a woman of rare accomplishments, and a teacher in an academy at Auburn, N. Y. By her she was educated in drawing and water-color painting, and by her father in the higher branches of learning; so that, when her mother died, although Marie was but thirteen years of age, she was considered competent to take her place in the academy. Mrs. Kennicott's father, Allen Fiske, had formerly practiced law in New York City, where she was born, but being solicited by many of his former college classmates to open a school in Troy, to educate their young sons, he renounced his profession and entered upon his work at once. Later, he removed to Auburn, N. Y., where he became principal of the academy, and it was there, as his assistant, that his daughter became her mother's successor. She remained at Auburn two years, and afterward taught in the academies of Aurora and Skaneateles, and in the Troy Female Seminary. At the latter institution she made much progress in painting, also acquiring a fine musical education, and teaching vocal culture. Having lost her voice, through illness, Mrs. Kennicott again turned her attention to painting, and, after spending three years with relatives in Brooklyn, came to Chicago in 1851, when she opened the seminary, previously spoken of, which she conducted until 1854. During this year she was married to Dr. J. A. Kennicott, and went with him to reside at Kenwood. She resided there for a number of years, supervising the education of her three daughters, still keeping alive her early love for art. In 1870, she established a seminary at her own home, which she conducted for eight years. She went abroad, in 1878, with a class of young ladies, and also studied art, making a speciality of water-color painting. Since her return from Europe, Mrs. Kennicott has studied and taught continuously, spending her vacations in New York and Washington, where superior advantages are offered for her improvement, and where her paintings of fruit and flowers meet with a ready sale. Of Mrs. Kennicott's three daughters, one of them has adopted music as a profession, while the other two have, until recently, been associated with their mother in her studio. Mrs. Kennicott has, for three years, made a speciality of portraiture in pastel, crayon, and oil, having some years ago studied in oil under several proficient instructors, especially under William Morgan, of New York City, and in pastel under Professor Mounier, a French artist, as well as other artists.

JOHN H. DRURY, one of the oldest artists of Chicago, and a prominent landscape painter, was born June 30, 1816, in the District of Columbia. His father, Samuel Drury, was, for many years, a justice of the peace in high standing. After being educated in the district schools of his native place, he went into the dry-goods business, and, for several years thereafter, was in the Post-office Department at Washington. At an early age, he evinced strong artistic tastes, and was ever busy with his pencil and brush. His first regular lessons were taken under Thomas Doughty, at the time one of the best known landscape artists of the country. In 1856, Mr. Drury went to Europe. After visiting London, Munich, Rome, and most of the centers of art, he decided to remain at Paris and receive instructions at the hands of Thomas Couture, the eminent painter, whose pupil he was for three years. He returned to New York and Washington, and, soon after the breaking out of the Civil War, removed to Chicago. His studio was the first opened in the Crosby Opera House. Afterward, Mr. Drury moved to the Academy of Design, and there some of his choicest treasures were destroyed in the great fire, the artist being at the time absent in Washington. Since that casualty, Mr. Drury has continued to work at his profession, being still inspired with the love and enthusiasm of his earlier years. His scenes of pastoral life, and views of the sublimity of the Rocky Mountains, are recognized as masterpieces of art. He confines himself, however, to no speciality, but does fine work in figure-painting and representative herds of cattle. Mr. Drury was married, in 1845, to Miss Mary C. Donelan, of Boston.

C. HIGHWOOD is one of the few artists in Chicago who have received a thorough European education, having spent all his early years in Munich, where, for twelve years, he was connected with the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, a portion of this period studying under Peter Cornelius, the historical painter of world-wide fame, and for a long time director of the Academy. In 1848, Mr. Highwood opened a studio in New York City, where he met with marked success. The first portrait which brought him into prominence was that of Henry Clay, painted from sittings in New York during 1850. The artist became acquainted with the statesman through William H. Seward. After the portrait was completed, he received a letter from Mr. Clay, speaking in the most flattering terms of the faithfulness of the work. This precious document was unfortunately burned. The portrait, which is still in Mr. Highwood's possession, represents the eloquent Kentuckian in a position of repose, with folded arms and hands, his head erect, and his whole attitude and expression one of intense interest, as if he were about to reply to some adversary with his brilliant rhetoric. In 1853, Mr. Highwood's studio, adjoining the Lafarge House, was destroyed by fire, after which, in company with other artists, he started on a tour of observation to gather material for his profession. For a number of years he continued his travels, exploring, in the course of his wanderings, nearly every State of the Union, from Maine to California. At the breaking out of the War he joined the 3d Michigan Cavalry as captain, but resigned in 1863 and came to Chicago, where he opened a studio in the Wood's Museum building, corner of Clark and Randolph streets. He afterward removed to Crosby's Opera House, his studio being the second one opened after that of John H. Drury. After the fire he visited New Orleans, and went to Europe in 1873, and returned to Chicago while the financial panic was at its height. Although he had collected about one hundred paintings from the richest galleries of Germany, his friends were doubtful of the feasibility of establishing a sale-gallery for foreign productions in the midst of such financial distress. But his venture was a success in every way, as Mr. Highwood disposed of some $40,000 worth of paintings within the first few years. For four seasons he made European trips, and, in 1879, disposed of his entire collection. In the spring of 1883, he again permanently opened a studio, having been for the previous six years afflicted with a trouble of his eyes, which by proper treatment and this long season of rest were permanently cured. During the past few years he has, in addition to portrait-painting, devoted much time to landscape and figure painting. As he has been an extensive traveler, and has made sketches of the most notable scenery which he has witnessed, he has much material upon which to work. Mr. Highwood has, of late, been engaged on several pieces representing scenes of great beauty in Northern Michigan, and during the coming season is to start upon a tour through Arizona. Mrs. Highwood is a lady of discriminating and natural artistic tastes, and has herself a very fine collection of paintings.

FRANK M. PEBBLES, sometimes known as the "gubernatorial and judicial portrait painter," was born in Wyoming County, N. Y., October 16, 1830, being the son of Samuel and Mary J. (Warren) Pebbles. His father was a country merchant, and in 1849, removed with his family to Monroe, Wis. Six years later they settled in Waupun, where, when seventeen years of age, young Pebbles painted his first portrait under the instructions of Mr. Metcalf, having his father, half asleep, for his subject. After working some time in a desultory way, also attending school and assisting his father in his business, he determined upon portrait painting as his profession, and learning that Mr. Catlin, the nephew of George B. Catlin, the famous Indian painter, was at Beaver Dam, Wis., he determined to take lessons of him. He made arrangements to stay with Mr. Catlin six months, who agreed to give him instructions in portrait painting during that time. He was busily at work in painting houses and signs, and only made two portrait copies. At the breaking out of the War, he opened a shop for himself, then studied portrait painting for a few weeks with Mr. Metcalf, and with his brother, and then returned to the painting of signs and other ornamental work as an occupation, which "promised to have more money in it." Leaving his brother in charge of the business, in the spring of 1865, he left home, to look around. He reached Chicago on March 6, and his first work was to ornament one of Frank Howe's circus wagons. Soon he became foreman of the Pullman Car Company's paint shops, and thus continued as long as they remained in Chicago, about three months. Obtaining employment with the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company, he commenced ornamenting engines with portraits of those gentlemen from whom they were named, such as Rufus Hatch, George L. Dunlap, Judge H. W. Blodgett, John B. Turner, John C. Gault, etc.; Judge Blodgett and Mr. Gault had fitted up a room for him in the Wells-street depot, where he had his sittings. He was also given a letter of introduction to G. P. A. Healy, who advised him to attend the National Academy of Design in New York. Friends who had made the depot-studio possible sent him there rejoicing, as he would also enjoy the thorough instruction of Edwin White, the great historical painter. Mr. Healy's letter of introduction to Daniel Huntington, president of the Academy, was of great assistance to him in obtaining the entrée to the studios of the leading artists in the city. After spending a portion of 1867-68 in these studies, he returned to Chicago, and immediately commenced to receive orders from his old railroad friends. A large figure-painting, representing George L. Dunlap and eight subordinate officers, and on which he was engaged during all his spare time for over two years, was destroyed in the great fire with other valuable pictures. Among the latter, were portraits of Perry H. Smith, J. B. Turner and George M. Kimbark and others, his studio, at the time being in the new building of the Academy of Design, on Adams Street. After the fire, he removed, with a number of artists, to the corner of Sangamon and Madison streets. He remained one year in Chicago and spent two years in Michigan, with headquarters at Detroit. He then removed to San Francisco, and spent nearly six years in the Western States. While there, he painted three of the ex-governors of the State of California, the bonanza and the railroad kings, and the unfortunate President Ralston. At Sacramento, he obtained a sitting from General Grant, while he was on his tour around the world—the portrait being an order from Mrs. E. B. Crocker, and hangs in her gallery at Sacramento. A picture of the Chinese consul-general, his production, was sent to Canton, China. For the State of Nevada he painted the famous "Bill Nye," its first governor, twenty-one members of the Legislature, and three judges. Colorado, Oregon and Arizona all furnished their quota of governors and judges. The portrait of Judge Napton, the pioneer judge of Missouri, which hangs in the capitol of Missouri, is also the work of Mr. Pebbles; as is a picture of Governor Crittenden. Previous to going to California, he painted portraits of Senator Timothy O. Howe, of Green Bay, Wis., which hangs in the rooms of the Historical Society, at Madison; of Perry H. Smith, full figure, for the Historical Society Rooms at Madison, and also a portrait for Hamilton College, N. Y.; portraits of Judge Thomas H. Drummond, Judge Nathaniel Pope, and Judge H. W. Blodgett were painted for the United States District Court Rooms in Chicago; portraits of Judge William I. Barnum, Justice Harlan, George A. Ingalls, a niece of Mark Hopkins, and others too numerous to mention, were subsequently executed. Many of the United States officials in Chicago have called upon him and his busy brush. In June, 1862, Mr. Pebbles was married to Clara M. Russell, of Laconia, N. H. They have one daughter—Alice May, now Mrs. F. G. Baker, of Oak Park, and one son, Frank C.

DANIEL F. BIGELOW, one of the oldest artists now living in Chicago, and one of the original members of the Academy of Design, is a native of Clinton County, N. Y., where he was born in 1823. In this picturesque and beautiful country his boyhood was spent. Possessing from childhood a passionate love for nature, the mists and shadows of the Adirondack Mountains, and the calm beauties of Lake Champlain, developed that love into a style of art peculiarly his own. Many of his landscape paintings are founded upon sketches taken by him during the years of his boyhood and early manhood. Since coming to Chicago, Mr. Bigelow's fidelity to nature has been so admired by citizens whose homes were in New York, Maine and other Eastern States, that he has often been commissioned to reproduce on canvas the scenes which surrounded them before they journeyed to the West. Mr. Bigelow received his first instruction as a boy, in Clinton County, from a cousin of Hiram Powers. His bent was originally toward portrait and figure painting, but before coming to Chicago he abandoned this for landscape work, in which he greatly excels. He has been a resident of Chicago since 1865, and all his works have shown an exquisite tenderness and delicacy of feeling, though not devoid of strength. His landscapes are received with favor by all the art galleries of Chicago, as are his studies in fruits and flowers, the two latter topics exhibiting, in a marked degree, the perfection of coloring and delicacy of manipulation for which Mr. Bigelow is noted.

J. F. GOOKINS is an historical and mythological artist of decided standing and thorough training under world-renowned masters of Munich. He, with Walter Shirlaw, now of the American Artists' League, of New York, were, perhaps, the originators of the Chicago Academy of Design. Mr. Gookins was born in Terre Haute, Ind., on December 30, 1840, the son of S. B. and Mary C. (Osborn) Gookins. Young Gookins, after receiving a preliminary education at the district schools, entered Wabash College, at Crawfordsville. At the breaking out of the War, he joined the 11th Indiana Regiment of Zouaves as a private, serving through the first three months' term, and afterward acting as volunteer aide on General Wallace's staff, and spending part of his time in Virginia and Tennessee as special artist of Harper's Weekly; the last year of the War he was stationed at Indianapolis, and at the close of the War resigned, and came to Chicago. In 1865 and 1868, Mr. Gookins went across the plains in his own conveyance, in order to pursue his artistic studies. He came to Chicago in 1865, after having been under the instruction of the Beards, of Cincinnati. He opened a studio in the Methodist Church Block, afterward removing to the Crosby Opera House, where the great fire found him. In 1870, he was married to Cora Donnelly, daughter of P. M. Donnelly, of Terre Haute. Mr. Gookins went to Europe, in 1870, for the purpose of study. He spent a short time in London, Paris and Vienna, and studied three years in Munich, under Kaab, Wagner and Piloty, of the Royal Academy. The latter offered him a scholarship in his class, a privilege accorded to but few. This honor he was obliged to decline, as his interests were all in America, and he would have been forced to bind himself to a course of instruction of several years. He declined a seat upon the art jury of the Vienna Exhibition, for reasons of propriety, as the contest was between the French and the German schools of painting, and then was elected by the American Commission to write their art report. He returned to Chicago during the same year, having gained much valuable information regarding the workings of art instructions for the benefit of the Chicago Academy of Design, whose development was to him a dear object. Of his productions best known to the public, are "Little Red," "Wishing Cap," "Court-Day in Elf Land," "Flower Perfumers," "Humming Bird Hunters," "Psyche Land" and "Origin of Music." For many years he has been engaged on a series of pictures, descriptive of "Sherman's March to the Sea." He has also painted many striking pictures of scenes in the Alps and the Rocky Mountains, and has done much illustrative work for Harper Brothers. Mr. Gookins has made his mark as an art critic, having been a contributor to the Pall Mall Gazette (London), American Register (of Paris), Harper's Weekly, Cincinnati Commercial and the Gazette, Knickerbocker Magazine, Baltimore Bulletin, Indianapolis Journal and the Saturday Evening Herald, Chicago Art Journal, Art Review, Evening Journal, Weekly Magazine and Republican (C. A. Dana's), Wabash Magazine, of which he was editor for two years, Terre Haute Mail and The Express. He has also written for a large number of art papers, has been the successful competitor on prize poems, and has been twice appointed poet of the Phi-Delta-Theta Society, and delivered his poems at the general conventions held at Indianapolis, in 1865, and at Chicago, in 1868. Mr. Gookins has two children now living—Margarite Ethel and Shirlaw Donnelly Gookins. The latter, a boy of ten years, was born in Munich, and even at this early age has exhibited evidences of talent which point to a bright future in the field of art. They have lost one son—Samuel D. Mrs. Gookins is a lady of rare accomplishments in music, art and letters.

JOHN PHILLIPS, one of the leading portrait artists of the country and an original member of the Academy of Design, was born in Paisley, Renfrewshire, Scotland, on May 8, 1822. From his earliest years he had a fondness for drawing. In 1836, his parents emigrated to Canada, leaving their son in the care of relatives, but his desire to see the West overcame the cautions which he had received, and the next year he determined, without the knowledge of his parents, to join them in America. He sailed for New York, intending to go to Toronto, where his father had decided to locate. While he was at Rochester, he accidentally learned that his parents had passed through that city, three weeks previously, on their way back to Scotland. He determined to work out his own career, and accordingly engaged himself with the proprietor of the Langworth Farm and Nursery. There, after the labors of the day, in a log cabin, he busily engaged himself with his pencil. At the age of twenty, he launched out as a portrait painter, and it may be imagined that his first efforts were crude and his progress slow. In 1847, he obtained his first orders of distinction, having been commissioned to paint, while in Albany, the portraits of Governor Young of New York, Ira Harris, Henry O'Reilly, of the Court of Appeals, and many of the State senators. In 1848, Mr. Phillips married the daughter of Major Hartshorn, of Angelica, Allegany Co., N. Y., and the next year started with his wife for Porto Rico, West Indies. There he worked to such good financial advantage that, in 1852, he was enabled to go to Europe to prosecute his studies, his wife accompanying him on this trip. He carried with him letters to Sir John Watson Gordon, of Edinburgh; from him to Sir Edwin Landseer; and from the latter to John Phillip, the painter of the famous gypsy scenes, who had then returned from Spain. Upon the recommendation of the latter artist, Mr. Phillips went to Madrid, to study the works of Velasquez, Murillo, Titian and VanDyke. During his two years' stay in that city, Mr. Phillips attracted much attention, his career being referred to in flattering terms, by Tuckerman, in his book entitled "American Artists." He afterward visited Italy, and passed a few weeks in Paris, returning to New York in 1854, and opening a studio on Broadway, in the same building occupied by George Inness and Arthur Tait, and afterward by James Hart. In the winter of 1858-59, he was located in Cuba, and engaged in painting the portraits of Captain-General Concha and others, but the reports of yellow fever so alarmed Mrs. Phillips that her husband left all his work unfinished and departed for Key West. There he remained until May when he returned to New York, painting, within the next two years, the portraits of such men as Governor King, of New York, William H. Seward, Thurlow Weed and Lieutenant-Governor G. W. Patterson. The head of Dr. Bartolletti, which he exhibited in the National Academy of Design, was highly praised by fellow-artists and members of the press, many ranking it as the best in the exhibition. In the spring of 1861, he went to Montreal, to paint the portrait of Henry Moulson, for McGill College, and while there he was kept busy in painting portraits for many other celebrities. While resting from his arduous labors, upon the advice of his physician, Mr. Phillips was tempted to invest his savings of many years in the famous "Oil Rock" well in Western Virginia. He continued in the business four years, lost all his money, and found himself in debt. Obligated to commence life anew, he next opened a studio in Chicago in 1868, and, through Mr. Tuckerman's book, found himself already well known. During this year he became a member of the Academy of Design, and has since been warmly attached to that institution. Up to the time of the fire, his success was great, his portraits during that period numbering among the hundreds and embracing such distinguished persons as General Phil. H. Sheridan, Thomas Ewing, Wilbur F. Storey, of the Times, Mayor John B. Rice, Mahlon D. Ogden, Alfred Cowles, Robert Laird Collier, Louis and Christian Wahl, Matthew Lafin, Philo Carpenter and S. P. Rounds. He also painted President Blanchard, of Wheaton University, Christine Nilsson, Edwin Adams, the actor, James Robinson, the great circus rider, and Brigham Young. The three last-named portraits, and others not mentioned, were lost in the great fire, together with the links in the system of color upon which he had been studying for years, and valuable copies from Murillo, Velasquez, Titian and VanDyke. Mr. Phillips also met with a loss in the second fire, but previously had painted portraits of many famous characters, such as John McCulloch, in the character of Richelieu, Stanley, the African explorer, and Rubinstein, the pianist, all of his work being taken from the living subjects. A call to Rochester followed, where he painted portraits of Bishop McQuaid, and others, and in New York City, of Colonel John Tappan, Mr. Francklyn, of the Cunard Line, and General Jones. It may be added also that the State of Colorado has had all her ex-governors painted by Mr. Phillips. Since coming to Chicago, in 1880, he has further added to his reputation by placing upon canvas likenesses of such men as John Wentworth, for the Historical Society, Cyrus H. McCormick, Erskine M. Phelps, John Allston and Dr. J. Adams Allen, for Rush Medical College. His latest portrait was that of John Norquay, premier of Manitoba. The above were from sittings. From photographs, he has painted the late Thomas Hoyme, for the Iroquois Club; Samuel Medill, for the Press Club, and ex-Mayor John B. Rice, for the Historical Society. In fact, his portraits are scattered over many lands, and all give evidence of that thorough training and warm touch of life which have ever characterized his work.

A. D. BEECHER, one of the oldest artists of Chicago, and a member of the Academy of Design, was born at Avon Springs, N. Y., in 1839, the son of Lewis W. and Lois (Wheelock) Beecher. Mr. Beecher early showed a taste for art, but was opposed by his father, who wished him to study law. In 1854, he entered the office of Judge Hosmer, of Avon Springs, with the intention of adopting that profession, but his inclination was so against it, that his father consented to his making art his profession, and accordingly he studied, during the same year, with Colby Kimball, of Rochester, N. Y., remaining with him three years. During this time he painted numerous pictures, which were scattered among friends and acquaintances. During the summer months the visitors at Avon Springs were mostly wealthy families from New York, Philadelphia and the South, who were attracted to the young artist's studio; and he painted many portraits and figure-subjects. In 1865, he opened a studio at Rochester, meeting with good success as a painter of portraits, and also receiving many orders for figure-subjects. He painted fine portraits of the poet Hosmer, of Judge Gardner, Dr. Backus, William Reynolds; also of twin children of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gaffney. He also painted, for Rufus Keeler, then mayor, a composition-piece entitled "Corn Husking," wherein were four figures—a production so well liked by that gentleman, that he received an order from him for a companion-piece, and painted "The Noon-day Lunch." In 1870, he came to Chicago, and opened a studio in the Major Block. He painted portraits of Dr. Major and wife, Dr. Dyer, Captain George Brooks, Mrs. H. R. Phillip, and others. The fire of 1871 destroyed the artist's studio, books, pictures, sketches and a valuable collection of oil studies made in New York. After the fire, he removed to Geneva, Ill. He subsequently spent some time in New York City painting portraits, among them those of Mr. and Mrs. Hoyt, Mrs. Andrew McKinney, John W. Merrill, Dr. Chapin, Albert Holden (organist of Dr. E. H. Chapin's church); also, Miss Emma Abbott, then the leading singer at the same church. In 1877, he returned to Chicago. Mr. Beecher has been occupied chiefly with portraits of late, but has found time to paint quite a number of figure-subjects, among which may be mentioned "The Old Smoker," owned by William L. Pope; "The Fruit Girl," "The Comfort of a Smoke," and "Waiting for the Train," owned by Marshall M. Kirkman; "The Morning Paper," owned by George Sturges; "The Music Lesson," "The Christmas Presents," and "The Street Organ Player," painted for Dr. Crittenden; "A Beggar Girl" and "Meditation," painted for Professor Hopkins, of New York. All of these pictures bear the impress of careful study, and are among his best works.

GEAN SMITH is recognized as among the finest animal painters of the country, having, for several years past, made a specialty of reproducing upon canvas the grace and strength of the horse. Born at Phillipsport, Sullivan Co., N. Y., in 1854, all his early life was passed in close companionship with that noble animal. His habits of careful observation, coupled with his artistic tastes, produced a love for his special work, which has grown with experiment and experience. In 1870, he opened a studio in Chicago, where many of his productions have called forth most favorable comment from the general public. His "First American Derby," representing the start of all the horses which took part in the last June meeting at the Washington Park, and also, "The Finish," a companion-piece, are among his largest pieces, and were exhibited at the New Orleans Exposition. "Maud S." is a large picture, which has been much admired, showing the famous beauty at full length, her chestnut coat—fine and soft as seal-skin—fairly glistening, each delicate limb clear-cut as steel, and her long, intelligent head stretched out, as if investigating the pretensions of a baby, who is held out toward her by a nurse. "The Call for Aid" is also a striking piece of work. A wounded cavalryman has fallen from his horse on the retreat from a wintry battle-field, and as the soldier lies in the foreground, the faithful horse stands close by, and neighs loudly for assistance. Among the horse celebrities which Mr. Smith has placed upon canvas are Jay Eye See (the Pride of Racine), St. Julien, Karus, Edwin Thorne, Director Johnston, Little Brown Jug, Richball, Flora Belle, Westmont, Leonatus, General Harding and Drake Carter. "Round Lake Herd," a cattle scene, and "Zero," representing a group of horses in a bleak field, with their heads over each other's backs trying to keep warm, are also paintings which show boldness of execution and faithfulness to nature. It may be mentioned, in conclusion, that Mr. Smith has also done some work with his pencil, in the line of book illustrations—"Peck's Bad Boy" and "The Lime-Kiln Club" being examples.

ARCHITECTURE.

The period from 1857 to 1871 was marked by a decided and general advance in the direction of building. Not only did the number of new buildings constantly multiply, but each year saw a better class of structures in process of erection. Yet the city had still to learn the lesson taught by the great fire—the danger of using wood as a building material. During the period named, wood was employed almost entirely in private dwellings. More thought and expense were devoted to securing a pleasing exterior, than toward rendering buildings fireproof, or even substantial. As an illustration, the old Water Works, was built of stone, at a great cost, and roofed with shingles.

It is not possible within the limits of the present chapter to do more than enumerate some of the most noticeable buildings on account of architectural design and finish, which are best remembered by the citizens of the ante-fire era, without attempting to enter into a detailed description of any of them. The various views presented in this work, will convey a more intelligent idea of the character and progress of architecture than mere description could do.

The old Post-office, on Dearborn, between Madison and Monroe streets, erected in 1855, was still in use. The Court House and City Hall, on Randolph and Washington streets, had been enlarged by additions until it was an imposing edifice in size, yet lacked unity of design.

Churches, rivaling in size and beauty those of any American city, had sprung up as if by magic. Catholics, Unitarians, Presbyterians, Methodists and Episcopalians vied with each other in the erection of imposing temples of worship.

The Sherman and Tremont were still the leading hotels, although the Grand Pacific—intended to surpass them both—was ready to receive its furniture, and the foundations of the Palmer House had been laid at the time of the fire.

The leading theatres were the Crosby Opera House, Wood's Museum, McVicker's and Hooley's, the first named having been thoroughly renovated and made one of the most justly famed places of amusement in this country.

Several of the railroad companies had erected large and costly passenger depots, notable among which were those of the Illinois Central and the Union Depot of the Lake Shore and Rock Island roads.

The newspapers occupying their own buildings were the Tribune, Times and Staats-Zeitung. The first named paper had, in 1869, at a cost of $225,000, erected a four-story building of stone, with iron front frames and roof, having iron shutters, which at the time was considered absolutely fireproof.

Among the largest bank-buildings were those of the First National and Marine Banks and the Depository Building,—all costly edifices, erected with special reference to the uses for which they were designed, with offices on the upper floors. Of the insurance companies, the Republic Life, the Hartford, and the Merchants' possessed fine quarters.

Among the business houses occupied by wholesale dealers, may be mentioned that of Field, Leiter & Co., on Market Street, and the Drake-Farwell block, on Wabash Avenue and Washington Street. But the wholesale merchants of that day did not, generally, own the buildings which they occupied; and the same statement applies to the retail dealers, with few exceptions.

The most pretentious office-buildings were found on State, Lake, Dearborn, Clark, Washington, Madison, Monroe and LaSalle streets; although Wabash and Michigan avenues, near the business center of the city, were being rapidly transformed from residence streets into avenues of trade.

But few iron-front buildings had then been erected, the Lloyd Block, on Randolph and Wells streets, being among the first. Some of the blocks, conspicuous for their size and architectural beauty, were the Honoré, on Dearborn, near Adams; the Bryan, LaSalle and Monroe; Arcade, Clark, between Madison and Monroe; the Boone, LaSalle, near Washington; the Bowen, Randolph, near Wabash Avenue; Cobb's, Washington, near Dearborn; Dickey's, Dearborn and Lake; Fullerton's, Washington and Dearborn; Garrett's, Randolph and State; Link's, Lake and LaSalle; McCarthy's, Dearborn and Washington, and another on Clark and Randolph; Magie's, LaSalle and Madison; Morrison's, Clark, near Monroe; Oriental, LaSalle, near Madison; Otis, Madison and LaSalle; Portland, Dearborn and Washington; Scammon, Randolph Street and Michigan Avenue; Union, LaSalle and Washington. These mentioned will serve as representatives of their class. They have been selected somewhat at random, since to give a complete list would occupy too much space, and be of little practical value. On the North Side, the Purple Block stood on the corner of Clark and Ontario streets, and the Uhlich Block on Clark, near Kinzie.

POTTER PALMER BUILDING.

From what has been said, it will appear that building in Chicago was progressing rapidly when the great disaster of 1871 fell upon the city. Substantial brick, stone and iron-front buildings, were being erected with wonderful rapidity. On State Street alone, during the year 1869-70, over forty stone buildings, all six stories high, were constructed.

But, as has been already intimated, the eagerness to build pervading all classes of capitalists had become almost a mania, the feverish excitement having reached a point where it was no longer controlled by the cooler judgment of the builders. Utility, speed of construction, and a prospective large return on the capital invested, were the fundamental considerations. When the conflagration of October, 1871, visited the city, not a single building within the district swept by the flames was able to offer any resistance to their progress. In a few instances the walls were left standing, grim monuments of buried hopes and warnings against future folly. How thoroughly Chicago learned the lesson of the great fire, and the consequent improvement in the character of the buildings erected since that terrible experience, will be told in another volume.

Among the architects of the period named, may be enumerated the following, whose biographical sketches are appended:

HONORÉ BUILDING.

JOHN M. VAN OSDEL.—To this gentleman, more than to any one man, is Chicago indebted for the architectural improvement in her buildings, as he was the first architect to find employment here, and has been thoroughly identified with its progress since his arrival in 1836. Mr. Van Osdel was born at Baltimore, on July 31, 1811. His father was a carpenter, and the son worked at that trade with him until, after passing through the grade of master-builder and contractor, he finally devoted himself solely to architecture. His early educational advantages were limited to what knowledge he could obtain by reading after working hours, but such good use did he make of his time that, in 1833, when but twenty-two years of age, he began the publication of a work on practical house carpentry. In 1836, through the influence of William B. Ogden, he came to Chicago, and the following year designed and erected for Mr. Ogden the residence on Ontario Street. He also turned his attention to ship-building, and completed two of the first vessels ever built here—the steamboats “James Allen” and “George W. Dole.” In 1839, he constructed several large pumps for lifting water out of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, then being constructed, and soon after invented a horizontal wind-mill which greatly increased the power of the pumps. In the fall of 1840, he removed to New York, and became associate editor of the American Mechanic, now the Scientific American, but the work proving too confining he returned to Chicago the following year and resumed the practice of his profession. In 1841 he built Chicago’s first grain elevator. In 1843, with Elisha Granger as a partner, he entered the iron foundry and machine business, but abandoned it two years later. He then established an office on Clark Street, and was at that time the most prominent architect in the city. Mr. Van Osdel saved his valuable papers and books, though his office was burned in the great fire. After the fire he occupied rooms on the corner of Monroe and LaSalle streets, but was soon compelled, by increase of business, to seek more commodious quarters. Among the many elegant buildings in this city designed by Mr. Van Osdel are the Palmer House, the Tremont House, the Oriental, Kendall and Hawley buildings, and the McCormick and Keaper blocks, as well as many of the finest residences. Owing to failure of health, produced by overwork, he was, in 1873, forced temporarily to suspend his labors. The next two years he spent in traveling through the Far West and in Europe, and returned completely restored. Though having no ambition for political advancement, Mr. Van Osdel has occupied a seat in the City Council, and has been frequently called upon to serve upon committees where his professional knowledge made him particularly useful. He is one of the trustees of the Illinois Industrial University as well as of the City University. In 1832, he married Miss Caroline Gailer, of Hudson, N. Y., who died in February, 1845, and, in 1846, he was married to Miss Martha McClellan, daughter of James McClellan, of Kendall County, Illinois. Mr. Van Osdel has no children of his own, but has adopted three girls and one boy, the latter dying when a youth.

W. A. BOYINGTON stands in the foremost ranks of the architects of Chicago. He received his professional education, in great part, from Professor Stone, of New York City, who was a scientific as well as a practical architect. In order to become thoroughly familiar with materials used in all kinds of architecture, he became an employé of Charles Stearns, who at once made him foreman, so untiring had been his application up to the age of twenty. Three years later, he commenced business for himself as architect and builder, and after a successful competition with others, he lost all the contents of his shop by fire. In less than a year, however, his steadily increasing business compelled him to seek a location affording better facilities. About this time, he associated with Mr. Deere, under the firm name of Deere, Boyington & Co. For five years success attended the firm. Once more, Mr. Boyington was a victim of fire, and lost not only his building and machinery, but also his lumber yard. A year prior to the destruction of his property, he had been elected a member of the State Legislature, and was made chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings. The following year, he declined a re-nomination in order to give his whole attention to the re-organizing of his business, which was very quickly in a flourishing condition. Subsequently, he sold out his interest, and devoted himself entirely to architecture. In the spring of 1853, Mr. Boyington came to Chicago, and being satisfied that a great field was open here, he closed up his business in Massachusetts, returning to this city in November of the same year. His first work here was to draw the plans for the Central Union Depot. His subsequent success is attested by the many magnificent churches, business blocks, hotels and school-houses of which he has been the architect. Among the churches in Chicago designed by him may be mentioned the following: St. Paul’s, First Presbyterian, Wabash-avenue Methodist, First Baptist, North Presbyterian, Centenary, and Ada-street Methodist. Many others, of equally elaborate designs, have been constructed by Mr. Boyington in Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Iowa and Wisconsin. Among the hotels erected according to his plans and under his supervision are the Grand Pacific Hotel, Sherman House, Massasoit House, and Metropolitan Hotel, all of Chicago. The Newhall House, Milwaukee, Wis., Brewster House, Freeport, Ill., and Ottawa Hotel, Ottawa, Ill., were also planned by him. Among the public buildings which he has designed, are the University of Chicago and Dearborn Observatory, Female Seminary at Hyde Park, Female Seminary and Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, the building and towers of the Chicago Water Works, the fireproof buildings of the land department of the Illinois Central Railroad, the Grand Union Depot of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad companies, Crosby’s Opera House and Art Building, Farwell Hall, Masonic Hall and Oriental Building, all of which were erected previous to the great fire of 1871. Mr. Boyington has also planned and constructed an extensive High School building at Des Moines, Iowa, the Insane Asylum and County House at Knoxville, State Arsenal at Des Moines, Iowa, fireproof county jail in Pike County, and the penitentiary at Joliet were principally constructed under his supervision. He has also designed many handsome business edifices, among which are Bowen Bros.’ and McKay Bros.’ marble front blocks, McCormick’s and Farwell’s blocks, Wadsworth & Keep’s, and Mills, Follansbee & Co.’s marble blocks on Lake Street, and many others less pretentious, for wholesale purposes. During the year immediately following the fire of 1871, the value of the buildings designed by him and erected under his charge, aggregated over two million and a half dollars. Among the best known of these structures are the Grand Pacific Hotel, the Sherman House, and the depot of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern and Rock Island & Pacific Railroad companies. Many of the handsome business blocks erected since the fire are monuments of Mr. Boyington’s professional skill.

EDWARD BURLING was born in Newburg, Orange Co., N. Y., in April, 1819. At an early age he went to New Jersey to live with an uncle, where he received such educational advantages as were afforded by the local schools. He returned to Newburg at the age of fifteen, and was apprenticed to a carpenter. He followed the trade until he came West. In 1843, he came to Chicago, when he at once entered upon the business of a contractor and builder, there being at that time little demand for professional architects. His first effort in building in this city was to erect a dwelling on the corner of Monroe Street and Wabash Avenue, for E. B. Williams, which was afterward changed into what was known to old citizens as the "Maison d'Orée," and which stood on the site afterward occupied by Fisk's millinery store. He was next employed by General Webster in erecting the old Marine Hospital, situated near the light-house, and not far from the site of old Fort Dearborn. At the completion of this work, he abandoned the occupation of a builder and entered the service of William B. Ogden, with whom he remained about three years, when he resumed his former vocation. Having an inborn taste for architecture, it was not difficult for him to rise in his chosen profession. From the date on which he first opened an office in Chicago, his success has been uniform. During his professional career he has superintended the erection of the custom house and post-office in this city, besides planning and superintending the construction of many other large public and private buildings, among which may be mentioned the Tribune Building, First National Bank Building and St. James' Episcopal Church. In 1876, he was elected a county commissioner, which office he held three years. He was married in Orange County, N. Y., in 1844, to Miss Eliza G. Proctor, and has three children living—Helen, Lizzie G. and Edward Burling, Jr.

AUGUST BAUER is a native of Germany, born near Frankfort, in Hesse-Darmstadt, on June 16, 1827. His father was Jacob Bauer, a prominent educator and professor of literature, who gave to his children a liberal education. At the age of eighteen, August had completed his preparatory studies, and then entered upon a scientific course in the polytechnic school of Darmstadt, from which he graduated with high honors in 1850. The profession for which Mr. Bauer had especially prepared himself, that of an architect, was one, at the time he quitted school, which offered but little inducement to its followers, owing to the unsettled condition of his country's affairs, consequent upon the revolution of 1848. Accordingly, in 1851 he emigrated to New York City, where he at once entered upon the practice of his profession, and eight months later was appointed to the position of assistant architect and engineer of the famous Crystal Palace building. He served in this capacity until the completion of the building in 1853. In that year he came West, and, after visiting the principal cities, located, in September, at Chicago, which has since been his home. Of his success in his professional career from that time, it is needless to speak, except to has since followed. In 1853, he was engaged on the Illinois Central Railroad, being attached to the engineer corps at Galena and Decatur, Ill., under Colonel R. B. Mason, who had his headquarters at Chicago. At this time, S. Perrier, an elderly French gentleman, was the architect of the company. At Mr. Perrier's death, in 1854, Colonel Mason appointed Mr. Matz architect of the road, and he at once prepared the plans and superintended the building known as the great Union Depot, at the foot of South Water Street, the most prominent building in Chicago at that time. He also designed and superintended the construction of the large freight houses, the round-house and shops, and, indeed, most of the company's buildings along the line of the road, extending over seven hundred and ten miles of track. He continued with them until 1857, when he concluded to open an office in Chicago, and enter upon the practice of his profession independently. His first office was in the old Post-office Building, on Dearborn Street, where, for four years, he met with much success. In July, 1861, he was appointed assistant engineer in the U. S. Army, and reported for duty to General Fremont, in Missouri. After the reorganization of the department, he remained at the headquarters of General Halleck, until after the siege and occupation of Corinth, Miss., when he was attached to General Grant's army on the march south. Returning to Memphis, he was commissioned by Governor Yates, of Illinois, a major of Illinois Volunteers, upon the recommendation of Generals Grant, Logan, McPherson and Wilson. He remained on engineer duty with General Grant through the siege of Vicksburg, and was engaged on the topographical surveys and military defenses of that campaign. In 1864, he returned to Chicago, and resumed his profession. In 1868, he was appointed architect of the public schools by the Board of Education, and has since occupied a prominent place as an architect in the city. When it was determined to build the Chicago Court House and City Hall, the commissioners offered a prize of $5,000 for the best plan, and, although there were fifty-four plans submitted from all over the country, the prize was awarded to Mr. Matz. He has designed and superintended the erection of several prominent public buildings since the fire, among which may be mentioned the hospital of the Alexian Brothers, Chicago Hospital for Women and Children, and numerous business blocks and fine dwellings. He was married, in Chicago, in 1857, to Miss Mary E. Lewis, sister of H. L. Lewis, of Chicago, and has three children—Hermann L., Rudolph and Evelyn.

OTIS LEONARD WHEELLOCK was born in Cambridge, Washington Co., N. Y., on August 21, 1816, a son of Amariah and Roxana (Darby) Wheellock. In the spring of 1839, he set out for Chicago in a lumber wagon. On his arrival, he learned, to his great disappointment, that the last boat of the season had sailed on the preceding day. Finding himself thus compelled to winter in Chicago, he sought employment, and found it on the old Tremont House (then being built by the Couch Brothers) and on the Clybourne House (the first brick building ever erected in Chicago). In the following spring, being unable to get his pay, and in utter disgust with the Far West, he resolved to bid it a final farewell. Selling what effects he still retained, he departed, abandoning a half acre of land at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Madison Street, on which he had made one payment. He established himself at Watertown, N. Y. While following his trade as a builder, he drew the plans and supervised the erection of a Baptist church in that village, and in the course of its construction carved with his own hands the capitals for the Ionic columns of the portico and made the moulds for the ornamental plaster work of the interior, although totally un instructed in either carving or moulding. His friends, recognizing his success in this new field, urged him to devote himself to architecture as a profession. Adopting this advice, Mr. Wheelock proceeded to New York, and entered the office of Minard LeFevre, one of the most eminent architects of his day, as a student. He afterward returned to Watertown, and soon had an opportunity to prove his professional skill in re-building the business portion of the town, which had been shortly before swept by a conflagration. After the town had been re-built, he found comparatively little demand for his professional services, and in January, 1856, he returned to Chicago. This time he was accompanied by his young wife, having married Miss Minerva M., daughter of Leonard D. Mansfield, of Pulaski, N. Y. A co-partnership was formed with W. W. Boyington, but was dissolved in two years, when Mr. Wheelock established himself alone, at No. 79 Dearborn Street, where he conducted an extensive and prosperous business for a quarter of a century, returning to his former location immediately upon the re-building of the edifice after the fire of 1871. During the sixteen years preceding that calamity, he designed and superintended the erection of many important and elegant buildings in Chicago, as well as in other cities of the Northwest. In connection with Mr. Boyington, he was commissioned by the State to prepare the plans and supervise the building of the penitentiary at Joliet. Previous to its construction (which occupied nine years), say that it has been fairly and honorably earned. He is the president of the Chicago Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, a position of no small distinction. Mr. Bauer married, in this city, Miss Anna Appel, a native of Berlin, but who was reared and educated in Chicago. She is a lady of fine literary and musical attainments. They have five children, three sons and two daughters—Max, Herman, Robert, Hattie and Clara.

RUINS, HONORÉ BUILDING.

OTTO H. MATZ was born in Berlin, Prussia, in 1830, and received a thorough education, which fitted him for the profession he

Mr. Wheelock was delegated to accompany commissioners of the State on a tour of inspection of large prisons in other States. In the great fire, he lost his professional library and his valuable collection of drawings and instruments. His residence, No. 2250 Wabash Avenue, escaped the flames, and he opened a temporary office, at once, in the billiard room of his house, and was soon overwhelmed with work, finding it necessary, at times, to employ as many as thirty draughtsmen. Space forbids even an attempt to enumerate the many elegant edifices erected after his designs. Since January, 1878, W. W. Clay has been associated with him in business. Perhaps Mr. Wheelock's most artistic work has been the mausoleum erected for the remains of the late Henry Keep. To the execution of this work he brought not only the skill of an artist, but the affection which had grown out of a life long intimacy. Mr. and Mrs. Wheelock have two children—Harry B. and Charlotte, wife of C. A. Hall, now a resident of Minnesota. The former was educated at the University of Michigan, and is now a student in the office of his father.

DANKMAR ADLER was born in Germany, on July 3, 1844, and came to America ten years later. His home being in Detroit, he attended the public schools of that place and the high school in Ann Arbor. He began the study of architecture in the office of E. Willard Smith, of Detroit, in 1859, and came to Chicago two years after, and spent much of his time in the office of A. Bower, architect. When the War broke out, he enlisted in Battery "M," 1st Illinois Artillery, serving from August, 1862, to the close of the Rebellion. He was in the engagement at Chickamauga and Atlanta, and the last six months of service were passed in the topographical department of the engineer corps of the Military Division of the Tennessee. After the War closed, he went back to the office of Mr. Bower, but remained only a short time. He was next associated with O. S. Kinney, and, after his death, in company with A. J. Kinney, a son, carried on the uncompleted work of the office. In January, 1871, he formed a partnership with Edward Burling, with whom he was associated till 1879, and they were engaged on work for new buildings to take the place of those destroyed in the conflagration of 1871. Among the buildings planned by them may be mentioned the First National Bank, Tribune, Dickey, Manierre, Garrett, Marine Bank, Kingsbury and Ogden buildings, St. James' Church, Grace Church, Sinai Temple, and many others fully as well known. After separating from Mr. Burling, Mr. Adler was engaged in such work as the erection of Central Music Hall, re-construction of the Hamlin—now Grand Opera House—Building, the erection of the Ryerson and Borden blocks, and the arrangements in the Exposition Building for the May Festival of 1880-82 and for the Republican and Democratic Conventions of 1884. In 1882, he associated with him Louis H. Sullivan, his present partner, and they planned the erection of Haverly's Theatre, and re-constructed the interior of Hooley's Theatre, the erection of the Hammond Library and Troeschler buildings, and perfected the arrangements in the Exposition Building for the Grand Opera Festival of 1885. Mr. Adler was married, in 1872, to Miss Dila Kohn, daughter of Abraham Kohn, a gentleman well and favorably known to most of the older residents of Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Adler have three children—Abraham, Sidney and Sarah. Mr. Adler is secretary of Chicago Lodge, No. 437, A. F. & A. M., and was secretary of the United Hebrew Relief Association for four years. He was also secretary of the Standard Club for several years.

LOTIS H. SULLIVAN, junior member of the firm of Adler & Sullivan, was born in Boston, Mass., September 3, 1856. After graduating from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, he went to Philadelphia, Penn., and was in the office of Furness & Hewitt for about six months. Coming then to this city, in 1873, he continued his studies with W. L. B. Jenney, and in June, 1874, went to Paris to further perfect himself in his profession. After taking a special course in the school of Fine Arts, and passing the required examination, he studied under the famous Parisian architect, M. Vaudremer. He returned to Chicago in July, 1875, and after five years more of faithful and practical study with leading firms, he formed his present partnership with Dankmar Adler.

EDWARD BAUMANN was born near Dantzic, Prussia, August 18, 1838, and is a son of Albert Baumann, a leading merchant of that city. He was given a liberal education, completing his literary and preparatory course at the age of fifteen, when he entered the polytechnic school of Graudenz, from which he graduated in 1856. Immediately following this he came to America, and, in the spring of 1857, arrived in this city and entered the office of Burling & Baumann, architects, with whom he remained several years. In 1860, he went to Memphis, Tenn., where he began the practice of his profession on his own account. The breaking out of the Civil War, in the following year, caused him to leave the South and to return to this city, where he has since resided. Mr. Baumann has been eminently successful in his professional work, and he is likewise highly esteemed both as a man and a citizen.

Among the memorials now standing of his labors may be mentioned the Metropolitan Block, the Ashland Block, and several of the large grain elevators of this city. Mr. Baumann married, in 1868, Miss Elise Steinbauer, a native of Prussia, and a lady of rare culture and worth. They have two children—Lettie and Edgar.

WILLOUGHBY J. EDBROOKE.—Among the many architects and designers of whom our city may be proud, not only for his social qualities, but also for the eminence he has reached in his high profession as a designer, is Willoughby J. Edbrooke, who has, for many years, added to the city's architectural beauty in superb blocks of residences as well as business houses and public buildings. He was one of the competing architects who submitted plans for the new Court House, and his design was by many considered the best submitted to the authorities for approval. Mr. Edbrooke was born near Chicago, September 3, 1843, of English parents, who settled in this city in 1836, where, for many years, his father ranked as a leading contractor and builder. In the earlier years of his life, Willoughby manifested a decided taste for designing and construction as well as for architectural drawing, and, during the latter part of his scholastic education, he devoted all his leisure time to the study of those branches which were allied to architecture. Leaving school at the age of seventeen, he served as apprentice to his father, and applied all his energies to the acquirement of a thorough practical knowledge of the details of architecture, his father's business giving him abundant proofs of the practical value of his theories. In 1861, he began the business of a contractor and builder on his own account, combining with that work the practice of his profession. After seven years in that business he abandoned it, and devoted himself exclusively to architecture. The results have shown that Mr. Edbrooke is eminently fitted for his chosen profession. Mr. Edbrooke has for years been an active as well as prominent member of the Order of Freemasons as well as of the Knights of Pythias.

CORD H. GOTTIG was born in Hamburg, Germany, in February, 1829. He was educated at the Academy at Munich, giving all of his attention to the study of architecture. After finishing his studies, he went into the employ of the government, and remained until 1852, when he became the architect of the Attona-Kiel Railroad running from Hamburg to Kiel and was in their service for about three years. In 1857, he came to Chicago, and, after his arrival, went into an office as a draughtsman, in order to become familiar with our style of architecture, and the year following acted as architect for the Illinois Central Railroad Company in erecting the buildings along its line, and was three years in charge of this work. In 1861, he opened an office for himself on Washington, near LaSalle Street. The building was destroyed by fire in 1871, when he lost the entire contents of his office, and was compelled to erect a temporary shanty in Reed's lumber yard, on the West Side, where he at once commenced work. He removed afterward to the Exchange Building, corner of Clark and Washington streets, and finally located in his present quarters. He has been a persistent worker in his profession, and has matured plans for many fine structures in this city. He was married, in Chicago, in 1877, to Mrs. Amelia Van Haecke, and has one child—Della.

WILLIAM THOMAS was born in New York City on May 7, 1830, and is descended from a long line of ancestors who followed architecture as a profession. His grandfather was named Thomas Thomas, and was a prominent architect of London, England, having studied his profession in that city, his three sons—Griffith, Thomas, Jr., and William, father of the subject of this notice—also following in that business. In 1826, William Thomas, Sr., came to Chicago, and in 1857, William Thomas, Jr., followed him, and continued the study of his profession with his father, who established himself as an architect here upon his arrival. After two years, he formed a partnership with his father, under the firm name of William Thomas & Son, which continued until the former's death in 1868; after which Mr. Thomas sustained the business alone. He has made a speciality of private residences, some of which are among the finest in the city. He also made the plans for, and superintended the construction of, Lill & Diversey's extensive brewing establishment, as well as that of the J. J. Sands' Union Brewing Company, and several other similar buildings that were destroyed in the fire of 1871. Mr. Thomas is a member of Hesperia Lodge, No. 411, A. F. & A. M.; of York Chapter, No. 148, R.A.M.; and of Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K.T. He is also a member of the Royal Arcanum. He was married in this city, in 1862, to Emma E. Davies, daughter of the late John Davies, a silk manufacturer of Staffordshire, England, where Mrs. Thomas was born. They have seven children—Emma, Lillian, Grace, Maud, William, Eugene and Harry. Mr. Thomas and family are members of the First Congregational Church.

JOHN CROMBIE COCHRANE was born November 8, 1833 in New Boston, Hillsboro' Co., N. H., the son of William C. and Harriet C. Cochrane. Mr. Cochrane's education was obtained in the common school and the academy. After completing his studies, he entered the office of his uncle, to study engineering and architecture. In 1855, he came West, and obtained employment in an architect's office in Chicago, remaining nine months. After that he opened an office in Davenport, Iowa, and during the years 1856, to 1858, he designed and superintended the erection of all the prominent buildings in that city, among which was the Burtis House, St. Luke's Church and Metropolitan Hall. In the spring of 1859, Mr. Cochrane removed to St. Louis, where he practiced his profession until 1861, when he returned to the East, and for four years divided his time between Boston and Manchester, N. H. In 1864, he returned to Chicago, and opened an office on Monroe Street. He designed the Iowa State House in connection with his partner, and they were employed as architects. He was the architect for the court-houses at Bloomington, Olney, Pontiac and Joliet, Ill.; for the court-houses at Crown Point and Valparaiso, Ind. Marshall, Mo., and at Atlantic and Marshalltown, Iowa; for the Cook County and Michael Keese hospitals in Chicago, Cook County Infirmary at Jefferson, Rush Medical College at Chicago, and the State University Medical College at Iowa City; the Chamber of Commerce, First Presbyterian Church, Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, Central Baptist Church, and the Church of the Messiah in Chicago; also a large number of churches, colleges and school-houses throughout the Northwest. Mr. Cochrane's practice in the line of private residences has been extensive, and there are many streets in Chicago indebted to him for the architectural beauty of their buildings. No man has left a deeper impress on the style of Chicago architecture. In June, 1866, Mr. Cochrane married Anna E. Coates, daughter of William A. Coates, formerly of Buffalo, N. Y. From this union there are three children—Nellie French, Florence, and Anna. Mr. Cochrane had been married to Miss Nellie W. French, of Nashua, N. H., on August 23, 1860.

REAL ESTATE INTERESTS.

In the first volume will be found frequent mention of early transactions in real estate, and the instances cited will serve as a basis for this narrative. The prices quoted as given for certain "lots, parcels and pieces" of ground, necessarily appear remarkably cheap to the reader of the present date; whether they were cheap for the city of four thousand one hundred and seventy-nine inhabitants is a mooted question. Apparently, from the manner in which these bargains had to be forced upon those who realized from them, they were not deemed the most eligible investments that presented themselves to early residents.

Many early settlers have claimed prophetic vision as to the phenomenal growth of Chicago and the consequent augmentation of value of her real estate. John S. Wright was esteemed a visionary fanatic in his vaticinations, yet his prophecies are dwarfed by the actualities of our city. The various "old-boots," "cords-of-wood," and other real-estate trades, wherein the man who disposed of his realty at any price was ostensibly the gainer, do not manifest any great confidence in the future of the commodity sold. And, in reason, why should such confidence have been evinced? The resident of Chicago of 1850, 1860, 1870, or 1880 had data whereon to base his estimates, and from these he could make computations, as to values, with almost mathematical certainty. But the resident of early Chicago had no experience upon which he could found his calculations, and no one need wonder, under such circumstances, that the speculator deemed present value of more importance than future value.

One other fact in connection with the value of real estate, as compared with what it was fifty years since, is often overlooked, the commentator being oblivious of the fact that property has advanced in price, not alone from increased demand for actual or possible purposes, but also from the augmentation resulting from a large amount of money having been spent upon the land without return. During all these years, taxes and assessments have been levied and assessed with regularity, and one question seems pertinent for each would-be buyer of fifty years ago and holder until the present to ask himself, Whether he is sure he would have had the money to bestow upon the property requisite to its being this held? No real estate owner in Chicago needs to be reminded of the vast amount of property, in city and suburbs, whose value has been eaten up over and over in accessory expenses—some property having become in twelve years, exactly double in cost to the owner, from such expenses, while its market price was but slightly advanced. This of course, applies solely to unimproved real estate.

In improved real estate, then, the profits derived from improvements must be considered apart from the possibilities of profit on the real estate. There are those who contend that an owner of improved real estate would have done far better if he had placed his improvements upon leased ground, with a five-year re-valuation clause in the lease. The fact is that, in the growth of Chicago, there have been multitudes of opportunities for aggrandizement in every line of trade; and when a scale of prices is instituted as to real estate, it is an index of values generally in this city at that period, as well as of the market price of the land whereon such values obtained; so that, whether augmented prices of real estate, or realizations from rents, are discussed, a profit of sufficient magnitude is evolved to make an unsuccessful person keenly aware of the grand possibilities that he has failed to realize.

In the following pages one fact is unmistakably presented, that, whatever their opinions may be as to the desirability of real-estate over other investments in the past, its value as a savings-bank for the future is unsurpassed, this statement being predicated upon sound bases.

In a resumé of the real estate market during the epoch prior to 1857, there appears to be but two periods whereon it is useful to comment, besides the land craze of 1837, and they are the years 1855-56, when property again became an object of speculative investment, and in 1857, when financial embarrassment reduced its salable price far below its intrinsic worth.

It is, however, germane to this article to state some facts connected with real estate anterior to 1858. One of such is recapitulated in a letter written to Hon. John Wentworth by Father St. Cyr, and in the possession of the Chicago Historical Society:

CARONDELET, Mo., Jan. 30, 1880.

* * * * It may be interesting to your Historical Club to know who were the first owners of that tract of land, that lies north of Chicago River. It first belonged, by a concession of the Indians, to a man who lived at Grosse Pointe, called Bonhomme (whether it was his real name I don't know). Being in need of money he one day—long before Chicago was a village, town or city—met Mr. Peter Menhard,* who wished to buy some land in that direction. Mr. Bonhomme told him that he would sell to him all that tract of land. P. M. asked: For how much? $50.00 was the reply of B.; and, in consequence, they drew up a contract in due form by which that tract of land extending along the river passed into the hands of P. Menhard as second owner. But returning home to Taz[e]well County, Ill., and finding land much cheaper near Peoria and of much better quality for cultivation, he repented of his first bargain, went back to Chicago, and sold his land to the Kenzies for the same amount for which he had bought it; $50.00. Consequently the want of foresight in P. M. was the cause of J. & R. Kenzie's great fortune. I hold this from P. M., who came to Chicago in 1835, and whilst we were walking together in the street he pointed with his right hand to that tract of land and said: Would you believe Fath. St. Cyr, that I was once the owner of that land there, for which I paid $50.00 and which I sold again to the K— for the same price. How foolish I was, he said with great agitation.

* Pierre Ménard.

"You ask for my full name. It is that of your obedient servant,
"REV. JOHN MARY IRENEUS ST. CYR."

This letter is given just as it was written at Father St. Cyr's dictation, he being blind at the time, his signature, evidently, having been written tactilely, and not by sight. This may be classed among the very first of the real-estate transactions of Chicago, and is inserted on that account.

Some of John S. Wright's transactions in real estate are interesting as mementoes, and are here given. On Friday, March 7, 1834, he bought of Lieutenant Jamison, Lot 4, Block 17, Original Town, containing 80 x 150 feet, for $3,500. On March 12, 1834, he purchased 90½ acres for $3,500, 73 acres of this tract were on the North Branch, the west half of the southwest quarter of Section 4, in Township 39. On March 17, 1834, he bought Lot 5, Block 19, Original Town, for $1,200, paying $300 cash. Mr. Wright says, annotating this transaction: "$17 from father's store and $283 borrowed from C. & I. Harmon, William McCorristen (a soldier) and Peter Cohen." On October 15, 1834, he bought 43 87-100 acres in Section 22, Township 39 north, of Range 14 east—being comprised within Lake and State streets, and running from Twelfth Street south—at $80 an acre. On January 2, 1835, he bought 40 acres—afterward Butler, Wright & Webster's Addition—and sold them on April 10, 1835, for $10,000. On January 27, 1835, he bought eighty acres, the south half of the southeast quarter of Section 34, Township 39, for $800. On May 11, 1835, he bought 80 acres—afterward Bushnell's Addition—for $6,000. Mr. Wright failed, in 1837, and had to close out a large number of his real-estate deals at a sacrifice.

He made herculean efforts to sell Chicago real estate in 1849, by compiling a statistical table of increase in values of realty, so that foreign capitalists might become interested in such property, and, seeing the great inducements offered, would invest. This schedule of probable growth was indorsed by Benjamin W. Raymond, George W. Dole, George Steel, John H. Kinzie, Elisha S. Wadsworth, Thomas Dyer, John P. Chapin, W. H. Brown and George Gibbs. But capitalists failed to be allured by Mr. Wright's statements—proved far beyond his most glowing anticipations by the lapse of time.

Among the very early real-estate dealers, were Gurdon S. Hubbard, and John Wright, the father of John S. Wright, who advertised, in 1833, that he rented houses and did a real-estate business. His son was in the business in 1835, as was William G. Hubbard, while the firm of Kinzie & Hunter and Dr. W. B. Egan seem to have gone into the business in 1836. The directory of 1839 designates the following as pioneers in this profession, and the ante-types of the numerous gentlemen who have followed in their footsteps: Hiram Baker, attorney and real-estate agent; Francis G.

Abraham Pierce

Blanchard, real-estate dealer; Major James B. Campbell, real-estate agent; Charles H. Chapman, real-estate dealer; George H. Chapman, real-estate dealer; Norman Clarke, dealer in land claims; Stephen M. Edgel, Dr. William B. Egan and William Bailey French, real-estate dealers; Larned B. Harkness, real-estate operator; Leonard C. Hugunin, speculator; Gholsom Kercheval, real-estate; James Kinzie, real-estate agent;

Lucius Peyton

Isaac Legg and John R. Livingston, real-estate dealers; James A. Marshall, auction, commission, etc.; Walter L. Newberry, attorney and real-estate office; John Noble and Mark Noble, each real-estate; William B. Ogden, real-estate dealer; Colonel Hiram Pearsons, real-estate dealer; Philip F. W. Peck, real-estate speculator; Dr. Peter Temple, real-estate agent; J. B. Wetherell, George Wheeler and Lot Whitcomb, real-estate dealers; and John S. Wright, forwarding and commission merchant. In 1844, the following additional real-estate men are found: Julius Wadsworth,

Elisha S. Peacock
Receiver Land Office

Ogden & Jones (comprising William B. Ogden and William E. Jones), R. C. Bristol, Theron Pardee, George Smith & Co., the bankers, J. B. Russell, S. B. Collins & Co., Augustus Garrett, J. T. Whitney and B. W. Raymond; while in 1848, James H. Rees and Stout & Sampson are noted, the latter firm consisting of A. H. Stout and William H. Sampson.

A syllabus of the information contained in the directories from 1854 to 1871 is as follows:

YEARS.	REAL ESTATE AGENTS.	DEALERS.	BROKERS.
1854-55	43	----	----
1855-56	48	----	----
1856-57	89	----	----
1858	91	----	----
1859	97	----	----
1860	137	----	----
1861	31	30	40
1862	118	----	----
1863	94	----	----
1864	109	----	----
1865	93	----	----
1866	104	----	31
1867	179	----	----
1868	167	35	74
1869	47	25	22*
1870	190	85	104
1871	180	84	82

* This is unqualifiedly inaccurate; it is taken from the first of the Edwards' Directories, and those who were "classified" paid for the privilege, hence this poor showing of real-estate men.

OGDEN, SHELDON & Co.—In May, 1835, William B. Ogden came to Chicago to manage an estate that had been purchased by himself and other gentlemen. This was the embryo out of which grew the real estate firm of Ogden, Sheldon & Co., whose history is hereafter recounted. In 1844, Mr. Ogden associated with him William E. Jones, of New York City, who had been secretary of the American Land Company and possessed a general experience in real-estate matters, the firm becoming Ogden & Jones. In 1846, Edwin H. Sheldon entered their office, and Mahlon D. Ogden followed his example during the ensuing year. In 1850, these gentlemen were admitted to partnership, the firm comprising William B. and Mahlon D. Ogden, William E. Jones and Edwin H. Sheldon, the firm name being changed to Ogden, Jones & Co. In 1851, Mr. Jones died, and in 1856, Stanley H. Fleetwood having joined the firm, the firm-name was altered to Ogden, Fleetwood & Co. In 1868, William B. Ogden and Stanley H. Fleetwood retired, and the corporate name again became Ogden, Sheldon & Co., which name is still borne by this, the oldest of Chicago's real-estate houses. Some of the large properties managed by this firm have been in their hands for a long time; for instance, in 1851 they were selected as the agents of the Chicago Land Company—they still continue its management, although the Company has been placed in the hands of a receiver by the United States Court, E. H. Sheldon, however, having been appointed receiver. Samuel Russell, who originated the celebrated house of Russell & Co., at Hong Kong, designated them as the agents of his estate in 1844; they administered his estate, and now represent his grandchildren. In 1845, Ogden & Jones purchased the property now known as Sheffield's Addition, on joint account for Joseph E. Sheffield and the firm, and they now represent his estate. The first account current made out by William B. Ogden in 1835 is still in existence;—their papers, deeds, etc., being fortunately saved by the vault in which they were stored at the time of the fire. Many persons have expatiated, in glowing terms, upon the sentiments they experienced when they have been in the treasure-houses of banks and safety-deposit companies, but, standing amid these evidences of forty-nine years of titles to the fundamental source of wealth—Chicago's real estate—it was not difficult to imagine the magnitude of the interests that Messrs Ogden, Sheldon & Co. conserve, nor the hundreds of thousands—aye millions—of dollars' worth of property these papers represent. Only a short time since, Edwin H. Sheldon prepared a document for the celebrated jurist, Charles O'Connor, to be used in evidence, wherein were specific accounts running through forty years. The first sale made by William B. Ogden was on June 12, 1835, of Block 1, Original Town of Chicago, to Royal Stewart, Alexander N. Fullerton, Grant Goodrich and Truman G. Wright for $35,000. As to the change in value that has occurred in Chicago property, the following cases were cited by E. H. Sheldon: On November 1, 1834, Major David Hunter sold to Arthur Bronson, of New York, for $20,000, property on the north side of the river, which the latter sold to Charles Butler and others, in February 1835, for $100,000. On June 15, 16 and 17, 1835, an auction was held of the property purchased by Mr. Butler as above, and on those days sales were made amounting to $158,210. The balance of the property unsold, as per inventory in the hands of the firm, made at that time, foots up about $600,000. This property Mr. Ogden became interested in after its transfer to Arthur Bronson. At the sale of June 15, 16 and 17, cited, Block 27, Kinzie's Addition to Chicago, was sold to Hugh T. Dickey and Charles A. Spring for $25,000. The same property was subsequently re-acquired by Mr. Butler and his associates, and re-sold to Haines H. Magie, in the spring of 1840, for $5,000.* This is the same block upon which Judge Lambert Tree, the son-in-law of Mr. Magie, built his mansion, and which block is estimated by Mr. Sheldon to be worth, at the present writing, about $200,000. Another striking instance of the increase of value in property, is found in the history of twelve acres of land sold by William B. Ogden to John Burton, an English gardener, in 1845, for $50 an acre. This plot was bounded by North Avenue, Dearborn Avenue, Clark Street and the River; and, in 1857, lots in this parcel sold at the rate $50,000 per acre. During the augmentation of value of Mr. Burton's property, he had pie-plant and asparagus beds laid out thereon, whose product brought him $1,000 per annum, which enabled him to pay taxes and hold his property without difficulty. Mr. Burton was living and was the owner of the property at the date of this sale.

Prior to proceeding further, however, with a recapitulation of real estate experiences and prophecies, it is but just to listen to Samuel H. Kerfoot, one of Chicago's oldest real estate men, and one who thoroughly antagonizes the problem that anything could have been a more desirable or remunerative investment than real-estate, unimproved. In the Real Estate Review for January, 1879, Mr. Kerfoot said:

"A retrospect on the part of those who can make it, will show that in the face of, and notwithstanding the present tremendous depression in value of real estate, it has proven, during the past thirty years, as compared with all other subjects of investment or places of deposit, the best and ultimately the safest. This assertion is true beyond question, and will so commend itself to the minds of all who think calmly of the utter and entire loss, without any resulting benefit to any one else, sustained by so many, who, during that period of time, have been dealing in stocks, bonds, merchandise, shipping, manufacturing and other business, which it is possible to wipe out and destroy, leaving nothing at all to show for their original investment, or to rise again, as real estate always does, no matter how low it may go in dark times. * * * In other words, the material or subject-matter in which a real-estate investor places his money is not capable of utter destruction, and hence its value can never be wholly destroyed. Individuals, of whom there have been a great many of us in Chicago, paying part of the purchase-price on it and mortgaging it for the balance, or men who borrow on it and are unable to pay the debts they thus incur, do constantly lose their title to it, and their title to it is annihilated—destroyed, reduced to absolutely nothing so far as they are concerned; but the real estate, reduced no matter how much in value it may be, is there to rise, and become, sooner or later, but surely, of use, and hence of intrinsic worth to the new owner. * * * Instances are numerous of men who, from their profits actually made, having from time to time added lot to lot and land to land, come out rich, and, after quiet and unanxious lives, leave estates large for the locality in which they lived; all of which, it is perceived, draws a wide distinction between mere speculative purchases of real estate and bona-fide investments of money in well-chosen property. In the one case, the speculator too often pays part of the purchase-price, hoping to pay the balance out of the rise in value; while in the other, the bona-fide purchaser is able, with his already acquired means, to pay for the property. The laws of trade—general prosperity and growth of the business and population of the region—usually conduce to the increase in value of the purchase. If, however, no great advance takes place, the owner is not pressed by a creditor for payment, and he merely holds his purchase; and while he seems to lose the interest upon his investment, the truth is, he keeps his principal and finds the interest, which he ultimately gets, at a higher or lower rate, but he gets it, in the reasonable if not great advance in value. But, as a rule, real estate does advance in value—the natural growth of all towns and cities does pay at least a moderate interest in the advance of the value of the real property, especially that not immediately in the centers of them, where as the towns and cities increase in size, the property changes from its acre value to the lot or foot value, while that centrally located has, during the time spoken of, been paying annually a revenue greater or less, according to circumstances. No rule can be given as to which is the better investment, inside or marginal property. Experience varies in individual cases, and hence opinions differ. Scarcely any better illustration can be given of the adage as to the payment of your money and the taking of your choice. * * * Who have left the colossal fortunes of the country, and in what are those fortunes generally invested? You will find that in all the large cities the heavy estates own the real property. I do not mean own equities or margins beyond mortgages, but own the property, free and clear, and realize upon it by sales or draw revenue from it. Some of it seems to pay a very small percentage upon its estimated value, but the principal is always there, and the owners hang on to it. Now, then, these general propositions being advanced, and, as we will claim, being correct, we will proceed to show, as we think we can, that of all growing points, of course, our own city, Chicago, has not only surpassed all other places as a point for profitable investments in real estate, but that to-day she presents inducements, based upon the promise of the immediate future, for cash investments such as no other place in the world can offer. We will first deal with the past; we will show how crazy the men of 1836 were, the prices they paid, and how property went down, down, down in value, until there seemed as little chance for a resurrection of it as there was for the horses and stage-coach. Which I saw stalled in the unfathomable mud in front of the Sherman House on the morning on which I first arrived in Chicago, nearly twenty-one years since. We will see the prices paid for certain localities on which some of our citizens boast of having at one time shot ducks; we will then name the low prices at which those same localities afterward sold; we will then show to what values those localities afterward rose, the prices at which they were sold; and, finally, we will show their value to-day. This will be inside central property. We will then give some specimen sales of property at the first regular Canal sales in 1848, just thirty years since. We will show how those lots were located, describe their appearance, then tell our citizens where they are now in streets and numbers. We will give the price per foot or per lot or per acre at that time; what they have been worth since; and what they are worth now. We will try to show what we deem to have been some of the causes of the growth of Chicago; why the Northwest had to have a great commercial and financial center; and why Chicago at first was, by the laws of trade, determined upon as that center; and why, having had millions expended in her behalf, in the way of railroads, all laid with reference to reaching her, in obedience to those laws of trade, she not only can not recede from her proud position, but, continuing to be operated upon by the same causes which have so far conspired to make her what she is, she must still continue to grow in all the material elements of prosperity, so that we dare not predict what will inevitably be the result of the next twenty-five years' existence of our city. Facts, startling in their unquestionable truth with reference to this wonderful place, will be given, and we will invite the world to test the correctness of the statements, or, admitting them, to concede to us the inevitable inference to be drawn, that a continuance of such growth must make investments in Chicago real estate good—not good to-morrow, or in a month, or in a year, but good when you have allowed them a fair time in which to develop and grow, solidly, really, but profitably, as you do your wine when you lock it up, and prove its age by the dust of time on the bottles. We will prove the correctness of the language of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, when she says of her loans in Chicago: 'No apprehension of loss is felt by those who comprehend the rare opportunity at present existing for profitable investment in so well chosen a field as this, the Emporium of the West, where the Connecticut Mutual Life—beyond any other corporation or individual—holds the largest chance for future gains.' Again, the same company wisely says, after speaking of the often possible depression in value of real property: 'On the other hand, no form of property has such inherent elasticity and strength, as it is the foundation and source of all other values, and in due time it rises to its proper place. This is the invariable, ever-repeated history of real property.' Again, in speaking of the recuperative power of real property, the company says: 'This must be true, unless real estate has generally and permanently lost its value; and that is impossible, except under such a condition of affairs as should result in the utter destruction of all values and all business. Nor is this mere theory. It is the simple statement of facts well known to all experienced observers.' Where the Uhlich Block now stands, on the southwest corner of Kinzie and Clark streets, the property, on June 20, 1836, sold for $8,290; on October 3, 1843, having been forfeited to the Canal, it was again sold for $6,635; and, having again been forfeited, was resold, October 11, 1845, for $1,400. Now, this is by no means the best instance for the illustration of the rule I have advanced; but those of us who can look back over the period I have named—to wit, thirty years—will remember that this lot, at first appropriately improved with very humble and plain buildings, and afterward with more elegant structures, and now with one approaching magnificence in its dimensions and style, has been paying fairly, if not handsomely, almost all the time, and now now to-day is worth, I think, beyond cavil, exclusive of the buildings, the round sum of one hundred thousand dollars. Now, put $1,400 at interest at any rate legally obtainable during this whole period of thirty-three years, compounding it, and even allowing that it would have been unceasingly invested all the time, and the interest not been spent, but promptly re-invested,—see how much money you would now have, and whether it would approach the present value of the lot in question. This lot will suffice to show the craziness of the people of 1836, when there was scarcely any Chicago here, and the great decline which took place in the values of property. I have often had my friends, some of whom are still living here, tell me of their having shot ducks where the Tremont House and Sherman House now stand. Now, let us follow by only two figures the value of those properties, the one fronting eighty feet on Lake and one hundred and eighty feet on Dearborn streets, and the other fronting one hundred and eighty feet on Clark and eighty feet on Randolph. The Tremont House lot was originally patented in the year 1831, with eight other lots in the neighborhood, the consideration for the whole nine lots being three hundred and forty-six (346) dollars. The original purchaser was John E. Beanben, one of the family of renowned memory here in Chicago, and a conspicuous member of which, it will be recollected, was accustomed to boast that he 'could keep tavern like ' that place, the name of which, once tabooed in polite circles, is recognized as that of the locality the existence of which Mr. Beecher has, satisfactorily to himself, proved a myth. The one lot has since been considered worth certainly two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and is now beyond question worth from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars. But Chicago has since grown from nothing to a population of five hundred thousand, and from a trade of naught to an aggregate of millions on millions of dollars. The Sherman-house lot, directly opposite the elegant structure now in process of erection for the purpose of the county court house and the city hall, fronts, as our readers know, one hundred and eighty feet on Clark Street and eighty feet on Randolph Street. This was purchased ten years after the Tremont-house lot, by Silas W. Sherman, for six thousand three hundred and fifty-three dollars. I suppose that no one will gainsay that this lot, exclusive of the splendid hotel now on it, is worth two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. Now, here again, this property, like all other central property, has been improved all the while—at first with what were then very fine buildings, and as time demanded more elegant ones they came, and that on it now bears testimony alike to the wisdom of the Sherman family and to the growth of Chicago; so that the property has been yielding a constant return, greater or less, while at the same time it has been growing in value until it has reached its present status. Now, then, charging it with its original cost, thirty-one years since, and interest and taxes all the while, and crediting it with the fair ground rental and its present value,—see how far the rise will outdistance the cost, interest, taxes, etc. No mere investment at interest could possibly equal this transaction. To show how estimates of value varied in 1841, the lot on the southwest corner of Washington and LaSalle streets was in that year purchased by P. F. W. Peck, for two thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars. It was the same size of that of the Sherman-house lot, fronting one hundred and eighty on LaSalle Street and eighty feet on Washington Street. It will be recognized as the property on the north end of which the Union National Bank now stands. The value of this property is too well known for me to venture my opinion, but I am very sure it would not take half an hour in which to find plenty of cash customers to buy it at the original cost, interest, taxes, etc., asking no deduction for the revenue bad from it. On July 17, 1841, Henry Loomis bought the lot on the southeast corner of Dearborn and Washington streets, on the north end of which now stands the Portland Block, in which the Merchants' Savings Loan and Trust Company has its banking office. The price of this was two thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars ($2,166). Now, apply the same test of interest, etc., and see how this transaction turns out. It may now be interesting to some of those who take the trouble to read this article, to learn of a few of the purchases which go toward making the foundation of the fortunes of one or two of our present solidly wealthy men. Our worthy fellow-citizen, E. H. Haddock, for instance, purchased, in 1853, the whole lot on the southwest corner of Madison Street and Fifth Avenue, eighty by one hundred and ninety feet, for one hundred and three dollars. The same gentleman, at the same time, purchased the whole lot on the northwest corner of Franklin and Monroe streets, for one hundred and five dollars. He also bought the whole of Block 134, School-section, in the city, having a frontage of four hundred and fifty feet on State Street, and, by the double front on Third Avenue, nine hundred feet on that street. This property, the value of which can scarcely be estimated, was purchased for one hundred and ninety-three dollars. Another one of our substantial men—Mr. Orasmus Morrison—purchased, at the original school sale, in 1853, Block 7, School-section Addition, for sixty-one dollars. This fronts four hundred feet on Halsted Street and four hundred and sixteen feet on Harrison Street. This large property, now subdivided into lots, has a value which, compared with the original cost to the owner, is simply fabulous and beyond estimate. Benjamin Jones, who, from his great wealth and the size and value of the estate which he left, was dignified with the sobriquet of 'Golden Jones,' purchased, in 1853, at the original sale of the lots and blocks in the School-section Addition to Chicago, the whole block on which the new palatial structure is now in course of erection by the United States for custom house, post-office, United States courts, etc., for the insignificant sum of five hundred and five dollars. This block was sold to the Government, immediately after the great fire of October, 1871, with nothing on it but the ruins of the Bigelow Hotel, for twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Instance after instance could be adduced, sustaining the theory that careful, cautious men buying and holding on to real estate get solidly rich. In illustration of the actual substantial rise in value of, and consequent profits on, the real estate purchased at the Canal sales of 1848, being the first sales made by the trustees of the Illinois & Michigan Canal under the re-organization of the Canal administration—the experience of Messrs. Macalester, Gilpin & Clarke, of Philadelphia, will be perhaps a fair sample. These gentlemen, contributing in certain proportions to a common fund, made a purchase in that year to the amount of about thirty-eight thousand dollars—the land lying mainly immediately south of Harrison and west of Halsted streets. As their agent, I began to make sales for them in 1853, and in the ensuing twenty years we had sold for them to the aggregate of upward of one million dollars, leaving at that time a handsome residue unsold. We will now give one or two examples of purchases at a later date. In 1854, four hundred feet on Indiana Avenue were bought from the Canal trustees, for a trifle less than eight hundred dollars—a fraction less than one dollar per foot. In 1877, at public auction, by order of court, in depressed times, fifty feet of the same property, being part of the Indiana Avenue front of it, and having its rear against the rear of Plymouth Church, sold, under the supervision of my office, for one hundred and twenty-five dollars per foot, and has changed hands since at one hundred and fifty dollars. During the times of inflation it had been considered worth two hundred, and even as high as two hundred and twenty-five dollars per foot front. In the matter of lands lying within the limits of the city of Chicago: Wolcott's addition, bounded on the east by State Street, and on the west by LaSalle, and extending from Kinzie Street to Chicago Avenue, sold, September 29, 1839, for $1.62 per acre, in all one hundred and thirty dollars, and the tract is now covered with elegant buildings, and is worth millions of dollars, exclusive of those buildings. Newberry's addition was among the first purchases of Mr. Walter L. Newberry, who, dying, was able to leave to the city of Chicago, for the purpose of founding a library, a sum surpassing, in its magnificence and munificence, even the gifts of royalty. This tract of land, as those who are acquainted with the geography of the city know, adjoins Wolcott's addition, and though not quite so desirable as Wolcott's addition, makes the original investment of one hundred and twenty-four dollars one which, like that of Wolcott's addition, scarcely holds any relation at all to the present absolute and unquestionable value of the tract. The whole of the foregoing touches the past of Chicago, and hence it is pertinent that we should ask, What has made Chicago real estate thus increase in value? to which we answer, The growth of Chicago. What, then, caused the growth of Chicago, and what conspired to make that growth continue? Of course, whatever conduced to the prosperity of our country generally, has had the same effect upon the Northwest. But this region, beyond all others, has been developing at a rate and pace which have surpassed all the most hopeful predictions. Chicago, from its infancy, has been the commercial, and, as far as there was any need for it, the financial, center of that Northwest. The whole products of that region were, to the full ability of whatever means we had for transportation, brought to Chicago—but not a mile of railroad was then laid in the Northwest. The first attempt at this means of reaching the region then, and now, so absolutely tributary to us, was that of the Galena & Chicago Union railway—now the Galena division of the North-Western. This was a strap, snake-head rail, laid on timbers. No regular railway communication to the East was established till 1852, so that, from not one mile of such highway at that time, Chicago has come to the anomalous condition of having more miles of railroad built, with reference to reaching her, than any other city in the world. A glance at the maps of Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and all the region west and northwest of this city, will show this to be the fact. Hence, by the laws of trade, based upon the convenience and profit of the region, the whole Northwest is buying and selling at Chicago; and to meet these features directly, A. T. Stewart & Co., and others, come here with their branches, and Hamburg, Bremen, Antwerp, London and other European cities, send their agents here to buy pork and beef. The statistics of the present trade and commerce of Chicago, gathered from the official records of the various departments of that trade and commerce, are simply incredible to those untaught in the facts. The grain, the lumber, the pork, the beef, the manufactures, the merchandising, the banking, the financial exchange, foreign and domestic, show figures and extent of which no one mind can take adequate cognizance. Gentlemen skilled in these various departments have gathered these figures. They appear elsewhere in this number of our paper, and I can only ask a careful perusal of them, in order to a fuller understanding of the matter. It is asserted, the truth of which can be tested very easily, that, in dollars, the aggregate of the domestic and foreign trade of Chicago, as the Emporium of the Northwest, is greater than that of the foreign trade, both import and export, of all the rest of the United States combined. Be that as it may, facts herein stated, and those elsewhere set forth, combined with countless ones not given, but ascertainable, all go to show that the position we have taken with regard to the past is perfectly tenable, and that, guided as Patrick Henry was, by the "lamp of experience," we can only state as a fair question: What will be the future of Chicago, if the causes which so far have conspired in their operation to make her what she is, shall continue to operate in that direction? In the region of country necessarily tributary to Chicago, there is to-day not one acre in fifty under culture. But if we make it one in five, in three, or even in two, apply your simple arithmetic, and you answer my query to my full satisfaction. Chicago, then, continuing to grow, her real estate must sympathize with that growth, and must steadily advance in value beyond its present intrinsic worth."

* This case shows the inflation—for those times—that real estate underwent in 1835-36, and its recession in after years.

Prior to giving further data of the real-estate market, it will be well to give a general review of its various conditions in the period embraced within the years treated in this volume.

In 1858, the purchases that were made in prior years under speculative influences were largely on time; trade and commerce flourished in Chicago, and there appeared no reasonable or valid objection to the purchase of property by the system of deferred payments; but the crash of 1857 lessened the possibility of making such payments, and, as a natural and inevitable result, worked financial tribulation to the owners. In consequence of this difficulty, the unpromising aspect of the future, and the depression in prices wrought since their purchase of the realty, the owners very generally relinquished their purchases and lost all payments made on account, thinking that even with this deprivation of the funds they were well out of an unfruitful investment, and very generally deeming that they had been the victims of speculative and unscrupulous managers of a real-estate boom. There were, however, numbers of old real-estate men who did not lose their faith in the ultimate value of their favorite investment, and they quietly invested in all they could carry, when it was unloaded by the chagrined investor. That they did not possess more real estate was simply because they were none too abundantly supplied with purchase-money; the stringency of the money-market tying up, alike, the coffers of purchaser and vendor, of agent and principal.

In 1859, real estate had a hard struggle to maintain any recognition from the public, except that it was a quicksand, wherein all money deposited would be only swallowed up without yielding any return; and the action of the real-estate men of that epoch of practicing what they preached, did more than any other one cause to prevent the market from utterly breaking down and to prevent the abandonment by individuals of speculations in real estate that have since proven some of the best attainable. The appreciation of price, however, from 1855 to 1859 was enormous. In 1860 and 1861, the same stagnation in transactions and depression in estimated values were characteristic of the market—the inauguration of the civil conflict tending still further to hamper any contemplating investor.

In 1862, the real estate of the city was redeemed from its ruling of panic prices, and the demand became active and constantly increasing. A large class of investments made were naturally those superinduced by the vast volume of money which was manufactured by the Government and poured upon the people, but there was also a large number of purchasers who bought for actual settlement—indicated by the prevalence of purchases made in the suburbs. In fact, 1862-63 may be deemed the years pregnant with fair prices in real estate—the first since the panic,—and as the years that inaugurated large investments in the suburbs.

In 1864, business property made an advance in value of about twenty per cent., while choice residence property augmented about fifteen per cent., and medium residence property ten per cent. In 1865, the prices were steady, although lots on LaSalle Street were unsalable at three hundred dollars a front foot, and this just south of the site of the Chamber of Commerce, which building was then nearly completed.*

In 1866 and 1867, prices steadily advanced, with a large increase in the number of purchasers, especially on the north side, in the immediate vicinity of Lincoln Park, and in the business district bounded by State and *Chicago and its Suburbs, by Everett Chamberlin. In this connection it is well to state that a large quantity of valuable matter presented herein is excerpted from this work, and that Mr. Chamberlin's book is one which every real-estate student should possess.

Harrison streets, the Lake and the main Branch, in which places real estate advanced from fifty to seventy-five per cent. Even with this augmentation, however, Potter Palmer purchased for less than $1.50 per square foot, ground that is now worth $15 a square foot, and that is comprehended within the present site of the Palmer House. It may be accepted as a general statement of fact that choice property advanced about one hundred per cent. during the five years terminating with 1867.

In 1868 and 1869, prices again received stimulus, the fashionable residence property on Michigan, Calumet, Prairie and Indiana avenues being favored and choice investments; property in the vicinity of the parks was also augmented in price while speculation ran riot in park and boulevard property. In 1868, business property in the center abutting on Washington, Madison and State streets received a most noticeable increase in prices, a lot at the southwest corner of State and Washington streets being sold to the First National Bank at a price that had never before been known in Chicago, $25 a square foot. Mr. Chamberlin in narrating the circumstances, states that this was not indicative of the prices that ruled in the vicinity. In 1869, especially, the prices on all kinds of property were very active, and seemed to be intelligently controlled by the financial laws which should always operate on them,—the value of the investment as a productive element.

On May 20, 1869, and for some days thereafter, there was an auction sale of real estate by Clarke, Layton & Co., which was advertised from Maine to California. Some of the prices at which parcels of land were sold at that time will serve as a fair index for bottom prices in that year, as the competition at the sale was not such as the opportunity justified, about three million dollars' worth of property going under the hammer.

On Cottage Grove Avenue, between Forty-third and Forty-fourth streets, lots 50 x 165 sold at from $40 to $60 a foot; on Forty-third Street, 25 x 285, between Cottage Grove Avenue and Drexel Boulevard, between Forty-third and Forty-fourth streets, lots 50 x 200, brought from $60 to $72.50 a foot, the highest prices quoted being in all cases, for lots nearest the city. Two lots, 50 x 165, corner of Egandale Avenue and Forty-third Street, brought $42.50 a foot and two of same size, next thereto on the avenue, brought $33.50 a foot. On Forty-fourth Street, between Drexel Boulevard and Cottage Grove Avenue, five lots, 25 x 285, brought $42 a foot.

The following table will exhibit some other sales made:

PURCHASER.	PROPERTY AND DESCRIPTION.	Price per Foot.
Geo. R. Clarke.	100x180, 47th St. and Hyde Park Av.	$70 00
Oswell & Bogue	100x180, next adjacent on 47th St. ....	60 00
Chas. M. Smith	97 x 180, next adjacent on 47th St. ....	57 50
Robert Doyle	65 x 180 on Hyde Park Av. near 47th St. ....	41 50
T. S. Tower	2 lots 50 x 188, Woodlawn Av. near 62d St.	15 00
T. S. Tower	2 lots 50 x 188, Woodlawn Av. near 62d St.	16 00
N. T. Holly	2 lots 50 x 188, Woodlawn Av. near 62d St.	16 50
F. A. Stevens	4 lots 50 x 165, 63d St. near Woodlawn Av.	24 50
S. A. Little	4 lots 50 x 165, 63d St. near Madison Av.	27 50
S. A. Little	5 lots 50 x 188, Madison Av. near 63d St.	27 00
F. A. Stevens.	3 lots 50 x 188, Madison Av. near 62d St.	25 00
Robt. Aillsworth	2 lots 50 x 188, Madison Av. near 62d St.	15 00
II. L. Slayton	1 lot 50 x 188, Madison Av. near 62d St.	14 50
James Carson	2 lots 50 x 188, Madison Av. near 61st St.	15 00

On Cottage Grove Avenue, between Fifty-first and Fifty-second streets, lots 50 x 180 sold at from $60 to $71 a foot. On Fifty-first Street, between Drexel Boulevard and Cottage Grove Avenue, lots 50 x 250 sold at $54 and $55 a foot, while shallower lots nearer the Boulevard sold at $60 a foot. On Drexel Boulevard near Fifty-second Street, lots 50 x 175 sold at from $41 to $45 a foot. On Cottage Grove Avenue, between Fifty-second and Fifty-third streets, lots 50 x 180 sold at $54 and $55 per foot; and on Egandale and Greenwood avenues, between Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth streets, lots 50 x 190 sold at $48 and $50 a foot. On Douglas Place (Thirty-first Street), between South Park and Calumet avenues, lots 25 x 160 brought from $115 to $166.50. On South Park Avenue, between Thirty-first and Thirty-second streets, lots 25 x 124 sold at from $93 to $98.50; and on Calumet Avenue, between the same streets, the same sized lots sold at from $65.50 to $65. On South Park Avenue, near Forty-fourth Street, one piece 97 x 180 sold at $63.50 to W. W. Kimball; the next, 100 x 180, at $62.50, to Judge Truesdell; and the lot on the corner of South Park Avenue and Forty-fourth Street, 100 x 180, to Judge Truesdell for $68.

In 1870, however, speculation again became excited by the commensurate values which obtained in real estate; and, under the influence of feverish purchasing, prices were raised to abnormal and unreasonable amounts. In the flood-tide of this land speculation, and during a period of commercial prosperity that seemed to warrant, in a measure, these inflated prices, the fire of October, 1871, swept over the city, and laid waste twenty-one hundred acres of her realty, under the appalling influence of which calamity, prices were utterly lost for the moment, and then recuperated, so that comparatively little property was slaughtered, despite the urgent need of funds and the desperate straits to which so many of our citizens were reduced.

As a valid reason for this may be adduced the fact that Chicago's creditors were lenient with her suffering people at the time of her need; and when creditors placed so much confidence in real estate and accepted so much incumbrance thereupon, the debtor felt reassured, seeing in his property a handsome return in the future, and, therefore, he placed a mortgage upon it, instead of selling it. The effect which this had, subsequently, will be narrated in the ensuing volume.

The amount of transfers during the period from August 20, 1868, to the time of the fire, is thus given in the Real Estate Journal, and this table is the only authentic information of the kind, all records having been destroyed, and the newspapers of those days did not make the feature they now do of real estate transfers:

NO. OF SALES. CONSIDERATION.
From August 20 to December 31, 1868,	5,307 .... $29,361,250
From August 20 to December 31, 1869,	13,904 .... 50,487,731
From August 20 to December 31, 1870,	11,446 .... 47,078,561
From January 1 to October 9, 1871,*	9,688 .... 40,999,545

The following table gives the valuation of real estate and personal property in the city, from 1858 to 1871, and for which data the compiler is indebted to James C. Beeks, real estate editor of The Chicago Times.

YEAR.	Real Estate.	Personal Property	Total.
1858 .....	$30,175,325	$5,814,607	$36,189,932
1859 .....	39,732,313	5,821,067	36,553,380
1860 .....	31,198,135	5,855,377	37,053,512
1861 .....	31,314,749	5,047,631	36,352,380
1862 .....	31,587,545	5,552,300	37,139,845
1863 .....	35,143,252	7,524,072	42,667,324
1864 .....	37,148,023	11,584,759	48,732,782
1865 .....	43,064,499	20,644,678	64,709,177
1866 .....	66,495,316	19,485,134	85,953,250
1867 .....	141,445,920	53,580,924	195,026,844
1868 .....	174,490,660	57,756,340	230,247,000
1869 .....	211,371,240	54,653,655	266,024,880
1870 .....	223,643,600	52,342,950	275,986,550
1871 .....	236,898,650	52,847,820	289,746,470

From this table, and that on page 183, volume 1, it will be seen how the assessed valuation of the city's real estate progressed from $236,842, at the date of its incorporation, to just one thousand times as much thirty-four years afterward. Necessarily, the accumulation of value depended upon cumulative area as well as augmented prices, and the various extensions of boundary lines of the city will be found under the Corporate History.

*The last document filed in the Recorder's office, and recorded, anterior to the fire, was numbered 116,440.

The following table will show the prices paid at various times during the year 1871 for parcels of land in different parts of the city :

DATE.	Where Situated.		Frontage.	No. of feet front.	Price per foot.
March 27.	Adams Street	east of Paulina.	north	125	$150
May 11.	Adams Street	sw. cor. Loomis.	---	50	177
February 3.	Ashland Avenue.	nw. cor. Adams.	---	100	225
August 1.	Ashland Avenue.	se. cor. Harrison.	---	135	150
August 3.	Ashland Avenue.	nw. cor. York.	---	100	145
Sept. 15.	Ashland Avenue.	ne. cor. Harrison.	---	188	85
March 1.	Calumet Avenue.	n. of Twenty-third	east	50	305
March 11.	Calumet Avenue.	n. of Twenty-third	east	30	350
March 11.	Calumet Avenue.	n. of Twenty-third	east	50	300
April 15.	Calumet Avenue.	n. of Twenty-third	west	50	260
January 17.	Clark Street.	n. of Harmon Ct.	east	50	444
April 13.	Clark Street.	se. cor. Twelfth.	---	176	340
April 29.	Clark Street.	sw. cor. Oak.	---	102	145
May 17.	Clark Street.	n. of Polk.	east	150	250
Nov. 1.	Clark Street.	s. of Monroe.	west	24	800
Dec. 20.	Clark Street.	s. of Van Buren.	east	25	550
March 29.	Dearborn Street.	se. cor. Maple.	---	103	125
March 30.	Dearborn Street.	se. cor. Superior.	---	80	150
Dec. 21.	Dearborn Street.	nw. cor. Burton Pl.	---	154	169
Nov. 16.	Halsted Street.	near Monroe.	---	25	180
March 27.	Indiana Avenue.	s. of Sixteenth	west	40	390
June 2.	Indiana Avenue.	bet. 23d and 24th	east	50	223
June 10.	Indiana Avenue.	s. of Eighteenth.	east	50	350
July 5.	Indiana Avenue.	s. of Thirty-ninth.	east	100	100
August 7.	Indiana Avenue.	ne. cor. Fifty-third	---	300	60
December 1.	Indiana Street.	se. cor. Oakley Av.	---	96	155
January 8.	Jackson Street.	w. of Wabash Av.	south	26	700
May 10.	Jackson Street.	e. of Throop.	south	50	220
June 1.	Lake Street.	e. of Paulina.	north	50	240
October 10.	Lake Street.	e. of Fifth Avenue	north	20	600
January 28.	LaSalle Street.	ne. cor. Monroe.	---	50	1487
October 28.	Madison Street.	e. of Market.	north	22	417
December 7.	Madison Street.	w. of LaSalle.	north	30	1040
December 7.	Madison Street.	se. cor. Peoria.	---	125	616
Dec 19.	Madison Street.	w. of Fifth Avenue	south	50	1000
February 1.	Michigan Avenue.	s. of Congress.	east	26	770
February 14.	Michigan Avenue.	s. of Fourteenth.	west	52	340
June 13.	Michigan Avenue.	sw. cor. Forty-sixth	---	341	100
July 25.	Michigan Avenue.	n. of Madison.	east	24	1166
October 6.	Michigan Avenue.	s. of Twenty-ninth	west	100	175
October 19.	Monroe Street.	e. of Market.	south	45	505
November 6.	Monroe Street.	e. of Market.	south	23	565
December 1.	Monroe Street.	e. of Market.	south	23	490
Dec. 29.	Monroe Street.	e. of Fifth Avenue	north	23	666
April 6.	Prairie Avenue.	s. of Eighteenth.	east	68	475
May 5.	Prairie Avenue.	s. of Twenty-fourth	---	50	250
January 9.	Randolph Street.	se. cor. Willard Pl.	---	100	160
December 1.	Randolph Street.	w. of Franklin	north	20	750
Dec. 13.	Randolph Street.	e. of LaSalle.	south	60	213
Dec. 22.	Randolph Street.	e. of State.	north	76	722
March 6.	State Street.	n. of Hubbard Ct.	west	20	650
June 11.	State Street.	n. of Jackson	west	20	700
August 22.	State Street.	n. of Monroe.	west	45	2000
March 20.	VanBuren Street.	e. of Fourth Av.	south	50	860
April 1.	Wabash Avenue.	s. of Twenty-ninth	east	100	160
April 12.	Wabash Avenue.	n. of Jackson.	east	60	500
April 27.	Wabash Avenue.	n. of Jackson.	east	70	107
August 1.	Wabash Avenue.	ne. cor. Washington	---	96	1650
October 27.	Wabash Avenue.	s. of Madison.	west	20	1509
October 30.	Wabash Avenue.	s. of Congress.	east	24	688
Nov. 13.	Wabash Avenue.	s. of Congress.	west	26	770
Nov. 17.	Wabash Avenue.	n. of Jackson.	west	27	1000
January 4.	Washington Street.	sw. cor. Desplaines	---	60	417
Nov. 10.	Washington Street.	sw. cor. Washburn	---	25	1600

It would be manifestly unjust to close this brief sketch without some reference to those who have had so much to do with the handling of the realty and the variations in prices that have obtained, for to the persistent, earnest faith of many of these gentlemen in real estate must much of its successful manipulation have depended.*

JOHN STEPHEN WRIGHT was born July 16, 1815, at Sheffield, Mass., the eldest son of John and Huldah (Dewey) Wright. His father was a descendant of a good New England family and his mother was "one of a band of sisters, distinguished no less for grace and loveliness of person than for rare endowments of mind and heart." He was a precocious child, and began the study of the Greek language when little more than three years of age. His father in 1815-16, traveling for his health, journeyed on horseback from Massachusetts, through Illinois and down to New Orleans, and even at that early date became much impressed by the possibilities of the Chicago of the future. In 1832, having met with business reserves, he determined to move to this section, and came West, arriving at Chicago, October 29, 1832, accompanied by his son John S. They opened a store, and commenced extensively dealing in real estate. John S. Wright, although a boy, was convinced of the enormous wealth that would be aggregated in this city in coming years, and wrote many letters to Eastern newspapers, as well as to private individuals, elaborating Chicago's advantages and the wealth that awaited judicious investors in real estate. Believing in practicing the theories he enunciated, he invested his own money in realty, his first purchase being Lot 4, Block 17, in the Original Town, for $3,500. His next purchase was 90 1/2 acres, 73 of which were on the North Branch of the Chicago River—the west half of the southwest quarter of Section 4—also paying therefor $3,500. He continued buying and selling real estate, and at the age of twenty-one, without other assistance than his own good judgment and commercial perspicacity, had acquired a property of a value of over $200,000, which the panic of 1837 swept away. In that year Mr. Wright erected, at his own expense—$507.93—the first public school building of the city, which was located on the First Presbyterian Church lot, at the southwest corner of Clark and Washington streets. In 1840, during the fall, he inaugurated the publication of The Prairie Farmer, seeing the importance of having an organ for the interchange of experience relative to prairie culture; and from the commencement of the paper it has been regarded as one of the most practical and reliable agricultural publications in the country. Traveling a great deal of the time from 1840 until 1845, in all parts of the West, for the purpose of interesting the farmers in the issue and support of this paper, he became well informed as to the resources of the country and the magnificence of its prospects. In 1845, he wrote fifteen or twenty articles for the Commercial Advertiser of New York, about the various agricultural and horticultural products of the West, the great advantages for manufactures, the Canal, the facilities for the construction of railroads, the imminent necessities which would cause their construction, etc., etc; generally elaborating, by statistical information and cogent reasoning, the resources, natural and adventitious, of Chicago and of Illinois. In the meantime he purchased more real estate, and from his transactions in that commodity again became wealthy. In 1852, he commenced the manufacture of Atkin's Self-raking Reaper and Mower. No other harvester ever had more flattering success at the start; forty were built in 1853, three hundred in 1854, twelve hundred in 1855, three thousand in 1856; but the bad crops of 1856 and the panic of 1857 so crippled the farmers that they were unable to pay their debts, and this, together with other losses, again caused Mr. Wright's failure in 1857. In 1861, he predicted that in 1886 Chicago would contain one million inhabitants! a statement then considered the height of absurdity by nearly all of its citizens; it might, however, have been fulfilled had it not been for the War. Mr. Wright took an active interest in the Illinois Central Railroad bill and, at his own expense, sent thousands of circulars, from Chicago to the Gulf, to various postmasters, requesting them to get signatures to a petition favoring the bill, and to forward the petition to Washington. He wrote extensively upon political matters, and, in 1870, published a valuable statistical work entitled "Chicago; Past, Present, Future." During the latter part of his life his mind became affected. He died in Philadelphia, Penna., September 26, 1874, and is buried at Roschill Cemetery, adjoining this city. In 1846, he married Catherine Blackburn, youngest child of Henry S. Turner, of Wheatland, Jefferson Co., Va., who still survives with three children.

WILLIAM JONES (deceased) was one of the oldest settlers of Chicago, coming to this place in 1831. He was born in Charlemont, * In 1856, a board of real estate and stock-brokers met at Samuel H. Kerfoot's office on the first and third Mondays in each month. The officers of the board were: James H. Rees, president; J. E. F. Russell, vice president; Samuel H. Kerfoot, secretary, and Thomas Webb, treasurer.

Franklin Co., Mass., on October 22, 1789. At nineteen he commenced to learn the trade of a millwright, but that not suiting his tastes, he gave it up and determined to go farther west. He went to Hanover, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., purchased land, and commenced farming. He so continued for five years, when, owing to failing health, he gave up the work. While in that county he was made constable, collector, and deputy sheriff, and was married to Miss Anna Gregory. He went to Buffalo in 1824, and opened a grocery store. That venture not proving successful, he accepted an appointment as light-house keeper at the head of Buffalo Creek. He remained in Buffalo until it became incorporated as a city, and was then made chief of police by the first mayor, Dr. Ebenezer Johnson. He was also the first collector of Buffalo, serving in that office three years. He also held the position of deputy superintendent when the construction of Buffalo Harbor was commenced. While engaged upon that work, in looking over a Asylum, and, for a number of years, was president of its board of trustees. He always had a warm interest in the public schools of this city, and did much in the pioneer work of this branch of public enterprise. He contributed one thousand dollars towards a fund for the furnishing of books, etc., for the public school which bears his name. The enterprise in which he took the greatest interest, however, was the University of Chicago, to which he subscribed forty thousand dollars, and, in his honor, the board of trustees of that institution named the south wing of the University building Jones Hall. He was always a member of the board of trustees of the University, and for many years president of the executive board. Mrs. Jones died February 15, 1854, and his death occurred on January 18, 1868. Their remains rest in Oakwood Cemetery. The surviving children are K. K. and Ferdinand Jones, both honorable and prominent men. Mr. Jones always bore the highest reputation for honesty, integrity, and ability; and his many benefactions, together with his unsullied character, will long be remembered by those who knew him.

HORATIO O. STONE (deceased), whose life-record shows the success which comes to a man by honesty, ability and industry, was born in Broughton Hill, Monroe Co., N. Y., January 2, 1811. His mother died when he was an infant, while his father, Ebenezer Stone, a veteran of the War of 1812, survived her for thirty-one years, passing away at the residence of his son in 1843. H. O. Stone started out in the world when he was only fourteen years of age, and spent the succeeding decade in a great variety of occupations. He passed three years as an apprentice to a shoemaker, tanner and currier; he peddled goods; he worked on the Lackawanna and Erie canals; he farmed in Washtenaw County; he was drafted for the Black Hawk War, but was not obliged to serve, and finally, after selling his farm and sending his family to Erie, Penn., he started westward, reaching Chicago on the 11th of January, 1835. Of course, he stopped with the jovial Mark Beaubien, and dropped into another institution of the swampy town, "Justice" J. D. Caton's court. Here he met Mr. Blanchard, who sold him a lot on Clinton Street for ninety dollars, which left him about one-third his former capital to continue his struggle in the new country. During the winter months, Mr. Stone chopped timber on the North Branch of the Chicago River, to be used in the building of the Government piers, and in the spring started out with a friend and an Indian guide to take up land in Wisconsin. After reaching Sheboygan he made a claim near the mouth of the river, and worked in a saw-mill until the following June, when he returned to Chicago, attended the first Government land sale, sold his map of the lakes, he made the remark that Chicago, owing to its situation at the head of Lake Michigan, would some day be a large city. He, therefore, determined to come hither. In the summer of 1831, he went, by steamboat, to Detroit, from thence to Ann Arbor by stage and to Kalamazoo by wagon. Then, with others, he took a skiff for the mouth of the St. Joseph. There, with a borrowed conveyance, he proceeded to Elkhart, and thence to Chicago, on horseback, arriving here on August 1, 1831. Mr. Jones went to Elkhart that winter, returning in February, 1832, and purchased two lots, located on South Water and Lake, midway between Clark and Dearborn streets. They were eighty by one hundred and fifty feet each, and the price paid was $200 for both. The value of those lots now is about three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. Jones was the first to come to Chicago for the sole purpose of investing in real estate, and may, therefore, be regarded as one of the founders of this far-famed city. Mr. Jones returned to Buffalo in 1832, where he remained till the spring of 1834; he then came back to Chicago, built a store, commenced business, and kept on investing his money in real estate. Mr. Jones lost heavily in the panic of 1836. But he soon regained his former position, and, as the town increased in size, so did his wealth accumulate. Mr. Jones engaged in the stove and hardware business in 1834, with Hyram King, under the firm name of Jones, King & Co. He was one of the first justices of the peace of the city, serving in that capacity for several years. He was afterward a member of the City Council from the Third Ward for two years. He was a member of the first board of school inspectors under the law which re-organized the school system in 1840, serving two years. He was president of the Board of Education from 1840 to 1843, 1845 to 1848, and 1851 and 1852. He was one of the volunteers of the Fire Department, being first assistant foreman of the "Fire King" Hook and Ladder Co., No. 1. In the second canvass for mayor of Chicago, Mr. Jones was the Democratic candidate, but his firm and bold position in favor of temperance and against the unrestricted commerce of alcoholic liquors was such that he was defeated. He was one of the founders of the Chicago Orphan

DRAKE BLOCK AND RUINS.

Clinton Street lot at a profit of nearly $260, and, with the proceeds, opened a grocery and provision store on North Water Street. He shipped the first load of wheat from Chicago, the seven hundred and eighty bushels being carried on board upon the backs of men.

For twenty-seven years Mr. Stone continued in active business, and during ten years of this period was a grain-dealer. Continuing to invest his spare earnings in real estate, in 1848 he concentrated his energies upon this one line of business, and became one of the most prominent dealers in Chicago. He remained thus engaged up to the time of his death, July 20, 1877. Mr. Stone left a widow and five children. His widow was formerly Miss Elizabeth Yager, and was for many years previous to his death a recognized leader in society—a lady of literary, musical and artistic tastes and acquisitions, which position she fills at the present time. To her interest and liberality in art matters many artists owe substantial recognition and assistance, and foremost in the social circles of Chicago appears the name of Mrs. H. O. Stone.

BAIRD & BRADLEY.—It is hard to designate those who are the most prominent in the real estate fraternity, without invidious distinction; but certainly no one will dispute the eminence of Messrs. Baird & Bradley. They are lineal descendants of the loan, insurance and real-estate house of L. D. Olmsted, who was in that business in 1857. In 1860, Lyman Baird became a partner of Mr. Olmsted, the firm name being changed to L. D. Olmsted & Co., which was retained, notwithstanding the death of Mr. Olmsted in 1862, until Francis Bradley became associated with Mr. Baird, in 1864, when the firm name was changed to Baird & Bradley. Silas M. Moore and John K. Stearns were connected with the firm, and, in 1864, purchased the insurance interest of Baird & Bradley. In addition to these celebrities of the insurance fraternity, two of the most prominent solicitors of the Equitable Life Insurance Company graduated from the office of L. D. Olmsted & Co., who were the first agents of that company in Chicago. After the sale of their insurance interests, they devoted their attention exclusively to the real-estate, renting and loan business. It is simply impossible to convey an idea of the magnitude of the operations of this house for the quarter of a century that it has existed. They have placed many millions of dollars in loans upon real estate, and were especially instrumental in this description of financial accommodation at the time of the architectural resurrection of Chicago after the great fire. They invested money for residents of all parts of the continent, but particularly for capitalists of New York and New England. Messrs. Baird & Bradley still continue that business, although at late years the sale and renting department has attained large prominence in addition to their financial investments. Both the members of the firm are quiet, keen, decided and conservative; and the care and fidelity they have exercised in the management of the interests intrusted to them have produced the inevitable result, a business reputation unexcelled in Chicago.

MEAD & COE.—In recapitulating the various gentlemen who have been prominently identified with the real estate interests of the city, and whose energy and foresight have made for them a successful and comprehensive business, the firm of Mead & Coe will recur to the mind of any one cognizant of the leading houses in this branch of our city's commercial factors. The firm comprises Aaron B. Mead and Albert L. Coe, and was organized on January 1, 1867. The New Year's call which these gentlemen then made on the real estate fraternity, has been a permanent and distinguished one. Their specialties are the real estate agency, mortgage loans and collections, and some of the largest buildings, and many of the most important interests in Chicago's realty, are managed by them. During their eighteen years of business experience, it may be easily conjectured what an enormous amount of financial values they have administered upon; to reduce such transactions to prosaic figures, would be a difficult task, and would only express a financial estimate without conveying the confidence that the public feel in Messrs. Mead & Coe, earned by their long career of business rectitude and the careful manner wherein they have watched the interests of their clients. Mr. Mead is a native of Franklinville, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., and has been identified with the real estate business since 1864. For four years he was with the well-known firm of Abner L. Ely, No. 22 Pine Street, New York City, one of the most influential agencies in the American metropolis. His present standing evinces the aptitude he possessed for acquiring knowledge during those years. Mr. Coe was born near Cleveland, Ohio, and came to Chicago in 1853. In 1854, he embarked in the coal business, under the firm name of Coe & Carpenter, continuing therein until the outbreak of the War, and also transacting considerable real estate business from 1856 to 1861, his partner being largely interested in Chicago real estate. In September, 1861, he enlisted in the 51st Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and was speedily promoted to the rank of second lieutenant of Co. "K," and afterward became first lieutenant in the same regiment. In September, 1862, he was appointed quartermaster, with the rank of captain, on the staff of General James D. Morgan, which position he retained until he was mustered out at the close of the War, in November, 1865. For several years he was on the staff of General Arthur C. Ducat, in the State service. His thirty years of active business life, have well prepared him for the responsibility entailed by the management of the large estates and business buildings now under his immediate supervision.

ALBERT J. AVERELL is one of the prominent real-estate dealers of Chicago, in which business he has been engaged since 1861; his first office having been in No. 7 Metropolitan Block. He was born in Alna, Lincoln Co., Maine, of Scotch parentage, and inherited the sturdy, Gallic character and the splendid physique of the men of Maine. At the age of fourteen he left the paternal roof, bent upon being a sailor and making his fortune. He crossed the Atlantic ocean twenty-eight times in six years, in furtherance of the first part of his plan, but without achieving the latter part. In 1843, he left the sea, and came to Chicago, and was appointed master of the propeller "Independence," in 1844, which he commanded four years. In 1848, he migrated to California, arriving at San Francisco three months after the day of his embarkation at New York, where he was immediately proffered the command of the clipper schooner "Eclipse," plying with the mail and passengers between San Francisco and Sacramento. He accepted the position, and remained therein until 1850, in the spring of which year he took command of the steamer "McKim," the first steambot that ran on the Sacramento River. In 1851, he was appointed commander of the fast steamer "New World," and remained her chief officer until the ensuing year, when he resigned and went to New England. During this visit, Captain Averell was married to Miss Anna B. Foote, youngest daughter of Hon. Erastus Foote, of Wiscasset, Maine. In September, 1852, he returned to California, and commanded the steamship "Senator," the largest at that time that had navigated the Sacramento. In 1854, he determined to return East to reside, and resigned his charge, and in 1855 settled in Chicago, where he engaged in the lumber business, and, for recreation, made a trip to Europe. Upon his return to this city, he engaged in the real-estate business, and, during twenty-three years, his transactions have amounted to nearly fifty million dollars. A prominent work thus speaks of him: "Captain Averell possesses a mind naturally clear and comprehensive, capable of grasping ideas and truths, as they are presented, with great exactness, and a wonderfully retentive memory, which has been strengthened by the habit of memorizing the incidents of life. He has a generous nature, always contributing liberally to religious and benevolent objects. His accurate judgment, combined with his great integrity and inflexible honor, make him a safe counselor; and these characteristic being universally acknowledged in the community, his opinions are sought in matters involving great interests. In real estate affairs his advice and opinion are highly appreciated." And the expression of his contemporaries but indorse the statement quoted.

KNIGHT & MARSHALL.—This firm comprises John B. Knight and James M. Marshall, and has carried on business in the same locality for thirty years, the present renting, loan and real-estate business being an outgrowth of that inaugurated by James M. Marshall, Sr., in 1854. Application, energy, and conservative investments have produced the customary results—a magnitude of business such as the founder would have deemed impossible. The business transactions of this firm are mainly in the interest of their regular clients, whose business the firm desires, and retains after it is acquired. The reputation of this firm during thirty years of active business, is the highest eulogium that can be given, and it is conceded to be merely the meed of success due to merit. James Monroe Marshall, the founder of the firm, was born in Logan County, Ky., October 1, 1834. At the age of fourteen he went to Paducah, Ky., and entered the dry goods store of his uncle, James Larmon, where he remained for three years. In 1852, he went to St. Louis, and entered the wholesale dry goods house of Pitman Brothers, but not being enamored of the dry goods method of obtaining wealth, and likewise being of a speculative disposition, he entered the firm of James Larmon & Co., which comprised James Larmon, three other uncles, and James M. Marshall. They traded extensively in sugar and molasses; Mr. Marshall going with one of his uncles to New Orleans, and the remainder of the firm establishing branches at St. Louis and Chicago. Thus, with representatives at these important points of shipment and distribution, the firm conducted a large and profitable business. In 1854, Mr. Marshall came to Chicago and established the real-estate business, where he attained wealth and won civic honors, having been a member of the Common Council in 1860-61. He was one of the most extensive dealers in real estate at that time, both in speculation and in supervising the interests of others. For a number of years he managed the extensive Malcolm McNeal estate, which remained with the firm until the death of the proprietor. Mr. Marshall was married on November 22, 1860, to Miss Susan C. Larmon, and died on July 1, 1880, leaving a family of five children, and bequeathing to his eldest son, James M. Marshall, his interest in the firm. It is the opinion of judges in the matter that the mantle of his father's ability also descended to his legatee in business.

WRIGHT & TYRRELL.—R. C. Wright and John A. Tyrell were both employes of R. K. Swift's bank, and occupied the position of managers for some years. Upon the failure of the bank they went into the real-estate and loan business, in the old bank premises, being the first white firm that occupied the old Metropolitan Bank Building. In 1858, they were established in the real-estate business, with which the firm has since been so intimately and prominently associated. R. C. Wright died in December, 1879, and R. C. Wright, Jr., succeeded to his interest, having been admitted to partnership about 1878. This gentleman went into business in 1853 as bookkeeper for Potter Palmer, and remained with him until 1865; he then was with Jonathan Young Scammon, keeping the individual books for the Mechanics' National Bank, until April 1, 1867, on which date he entered the office of Wright & Tyrell as clerk. Charles T. Tyrell was admitted as partner on January 1, 1881, and the firm now comprises R. C. Wright, Jr., J. A. Tyrell and Charles T. Tyrell, the onus of the work falling upon the younger men, while Mr. Tyrell, Sr., exercises the sound judgment and mature business experience in matters requiring his supervision or assistance.

Robert C. Wright, Sr., was born in London, England, December 12, 1813, and was educated at Rugby School. In 1835, he came to Chicago, and shortly afterward entered R. K. Swift's bank. He was induced to come to Chicago by the representations made by his relatives, Elijah and Joseph Peacock, who have been known in Chicago so many years in connection with the jewelry and lumber business. The success that attended Mr. Wright's efforts has justified the most glowing eulogies they could have written about the infant Chicago. In 1849, he was seized with the gold-fever, and went to California by the overland route, but finding that climate and method of making money unsuited to him, he returned to this city, and re-entered Mr. Swift's bank. The Tribune, of December 31, 1879, thus spoke of Mr. Wright: * * * "The many and varied interests confided to Mr. Wright and his partner naturally made the firm known to large numbers of persons in this city and abroad, by all of whom Mr. Wright was looked upon as a model of strict, unrelenting integrity. He was laughed at by some, occasionally, on account of his conservatism, but after the panic of 1873 the wisdom of his course was seen and admitted. During his long life, not a word was ever said regarding his private or business life reflecting in the slightest degree upon his honesty. Careful and accurate in all business matters, he accounted for every dollar that was ever intrusted to him, and never was known to give his note to any one. He was a member of the Church of Saints Peter and Paul, and was for years one of its prominent and most responsible members. In social life he won the love and respect of all who were brought in contact with him." Mr. Wright died, December 30, 1879, leaving a wife and three children—Mrs. H. H. Handy, Mrs. E. C. Cole and Robert C. Wright, Jr. The latter was born in London, England, May 31, 1841.

GEORGE BICKERDIKE was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1806, and emigrated to America in 1828, locating in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he worked for about two years as a carpenter, the trade learned in his native land. In 1831, he made the journey to Chicago on horseback, passing through Fort Wayne, Ind., and was unfortunate enough to lose his horse, which detained him for three days, but, recovering his horse, he resumed his journey. When he arrived in Chicago he sought shelter in old Fort Dearborn, where he remained for some time, doing guard duty at intervals, until the arrival of General Scott, who refused to allow civilians to remain in the fort. He realized the importance that would some time attach to Chicago, and began the location of property. He selected ten acres, and erected his carpenter shop upon the site where the present Tremont House is located, holding it until the increased value induced him to sell, and re-invest in Chicago land. He located eighty acres near Oak Park, on which he erected a saw-mill, which he finally traded for eighty-four acres now known as the Bickerdike Addition, bounded by Kinzie Street, Chicago Avenue, Elizabeth Street and Ashland Avenue. This he subdivided, and a large amount of it still remains the property of his heirs. He also took up forty acres in Lake View, now known as Steele & Bickerdike's Addition, and subdivided it. Being one of the oldest settlers, it might have been supposed that Mr. Bickerdike would have occupied a prominent position in public affairs, but he was a quiet, unassuming man, giving little attention to anything outside of his private business, taking little interest in politics, and seldom expressing himself in regard to them. His family are at present receiving the benefit of his keen business foresight and good judgment. In 1835, he married Miss Mary Noble, of Chicago, who was also born in Yorkshire, England, and who early came to this city with her parents. Her father, Mark Noble, was quite wealthy, and relieved the settlers here in 1833, who were bordering on starvation, by purchasing and distributing among them a cargo of flour, which he purchased from the first schooner that arrived in this port. Mr. Noble was considered a public benefactor, and the only person at that time in Chicago with sufficient means to make such a purchase. Of Mr. Bickerdike's family there are living, besides the mother, who has again taken up her residence in Yorkshire, England, three children—George N. Bickerdike, born in Chicago in 1836, a retired gentleman at present writing; Joseph K. Bickerdike, born in 1844, who has charge of the old Bickerdike farm on the North Branch; and Margaret J., the wife of Walter Lister, of Chicago. The father of this family died in Yorkshire, England, on November 4, 1880, being seventy-five years of age. He experienced the hardship common to all pioneers in new countries, and his life was a succession of struggles; notwithstanding which, like the senior Carlyle, he endeared himself to those with whom he came in contact, and was a man who commanded respect from all who knew him. While his efforts at seclusion were in some sense successful, as keeping his name from the earlier public records, it is impossible to prevent it from continually appearing upon the record of his good deeds and as an example of a faithful and upright life.

WALTER LISTER was born at Newcastle-on-the-Tyne, England, in 1832, and was educated partly in England, completing his studies in New York City, where he arrived with his parents at the age of eight. His father, Joseph Lister, was a button manufacturer, owning a factory in the historical "Sleepy Hollow," in Westchester County, N. Y., with him his son commenced to learn the button business. He remained thus engaged until 1855, when he came to Chicago and commenced the manufacture of glue; also, the manufacture of charcoal for purifying sugar, which he continued until 1873. In that year he commenced the real estate business, and since has spent the greater part of his time in the management of the estate in which he is personally interested. He was married, in Chicago, in 1860, to Miss Margaret J. Bickerdike, daughter of George Bickerdike, and has three children—Mary, Walter and Nellie.

HENRY C. MOREY was born on July 31, 1832, at Brockport, Monroe Co., N. Y., and accompanied his parents, in 1836, to Flint, Mich., at which place his father died in 1838. He received a common school education, his last teacher being Dr. Hosmer Allen Johnson, a celebrated physician of this city. At the age of fifteen he entered the store of J. B. Walker, and two years afterward, with his mother, emigrated to Illinois, journeying from Chicago to Tremont, Tazewell County, by the then popular line of Frink & Walker's stages. He secured a situation with Messrs. Pettengill & Babcock, merchants of Peoria, where he served one year; after which he returned to Tazewell County, and remained on a farm until 1852. To a letter of inquiry he received an answer from the late Colonel Josiah L. James of the firm of James & Hammond, lumber dealers, stating that, if he desired to come to Chicago, he would give him his board until he could do better. The offer was at once accepted, and the journey made by steamboat from Peoria to LaSalle, and thence to Chicago, by packet on the Illinois and Michigan Canal. He attended Bell's Commercial College the following winter, and Colonel James and George A. Springer having formed a co-partnership in the real estate business, he entered their service, they being among the first tenants of Metropolitan Block, corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets. He remained with this firm about twelve years, until its dissolution, when he entered into partnership with George A. Springer, under the firm name of Springer & Morey; subsequently with C. P. Manville; and afterward continued in business on his own account. Metropolitan Block at the time was occupied by many of the leading real estate firms of the city, such as Wright & Tyrrell, A. J. Averell, Snyder & Lee, W. H. Sampson, H. G. Young, Scoville & Harvey, N. P. Iglehart & Co., and others. Mr. Morey remained in the building until its destruction in 1871. He reached his office the night of the fire, while the Court House, opposite, was in flames; opening his safe he removed its contents of valuable abstracts of title, leases, books, etc., and, securing, in addition, his city and county maps and plats, conveyed them to what then seemed a place of safety on Lake Street. The fire, however, soon invaded this quarter, and the street being partly filled with the stock of a neighboring livery stable, he placed his property in a shaftless buggy, and, with the aid of a friendly hand, succeeded in running it across Lake Street bridge to a place of safety. His office was opened the next day on Canal Street, near Washington. He was one of the first real estate agents to return to the South Side, removing to the Superior Block, No. 77 Clark Street, and now occupies the main floor at No. 85 Washington Street, the site of the first building erected after the fire. Though actively engaged during these years in business, he devoted much of his time to temperance work, and became a member of Houston Lodge, No. 32, I. O. of Good Templars, in 1855, and, subsequently, he became one of the founders of Dashaway Lodge, No. 240, I. O. of G. T. He was one of the founders of the Washingtonian Home, which was established in 1863, and filled the position of secretary of that praiseworthy charity for sixteen years, and during this time was instrumental, with others, in obtaining a charter from the State, giving the Home ten per cent. of the receipts from saloon licenses in Cook County, toward defraying the expenses of the Institution, and from which the Home now enjoys an annual revenue of $20,000. The old Bull's Head hotel and lot, 104 x 180, corner of Madison Street and Ogden Avenue, was purchased for the Home in 1865, for the sum of $9,000, and, in 1876, the hotel was demolished, and the present elegant building erected. At the formation of the Real Estate Board, in 1883, Mr. Morey was elected president, and re-elected in 1884. He has always been recognized as a conservative member of the real-estate fraternity, and for many years has been largely engaged in making valuations of real estate for loans for foreign corporations and capitalists—his valuations of property in six years amounting to over $29,000,000. He also has charge of the large landed interests of the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Maine; Mercantile Trust Company, of New York, and other corporations and non-residents, and transacts a general real estate agency business.

SAMUEL GEHR was born at Smithsburg, Washington Co., Md., in 1829, and received his early education at the well-known school of George Pearson, and afterward graduated from Marshall College, Pennsylvania, in 1851. He then decided upon studying law, and read for two years in the office of Hon. Judge Weisel, at Hagerstown, Md. He came from Washington County, Md., to Chicago, in 1853, where he completed his forensic education, and was admitted to the Bar of this State. He then entered the real estate office of Rees & Kerfoot,—composed of James II. Rees and Samuel H. Kerfoot,—and remained with the firm as clerk until 1861, when he established himself in business in connection with Hon. Luther Haven, at Lake Street, opposite the Tremont House, under the firm name of Luther Haven & Co. The appointment, by Abraham Lincoln, of Mr. Haven as collector of customs for the port of Chicago, terminated their partnership; and since that date Mr. Gehr has conducted his business upon his own account, in which he has been very successful. His legal studies have been invaluable to him in settling questions of title, proprietorship, or conveyance. His early experience with Rees & Kerfoot gave him the requisite acquaintance with local business and values, while his judgment and integrity have made casual customers steady clients, and caused the name of Samuel Gehr to be classed with the real estate aristocracy of Chicago. In 1863, he moved his office to No. 114 Dearborn Street, a location which he has occupied ever since, except the interruption occasioned by the fire of 1871, making twenty-one years' occupancy of the same site. Until 1863, Mr. Gehr had only conducted a business comprehending the purchase and sale of real estate, but in that year he added the making of loans for Eastern capitalists, and the care and management of large estates, these branches now being the important feature of his business. As a trifling but demonstrative indication of the stability of his methods, it may be cited that, during his whole life in this city, his bank account has been solely with the old Merchants' Loan & Trust Company. Mr. Gehr was married, in 1857, to Miss Pheba Bostock, and has the following children living: S. Whipple, Arthur Cleveland, Herbert Bostock, Fannie, and Francis Syceat, all of whom are now residents of Chicago.

POLEMUS D. HAMILTON was born in Wales, Erie Co., N. Y., in 1813, and received the education the circumstances would permit a farmer boy at a country school. Leaving school quite young, he apprenticed himself to a carpenter, and thoroughly learned his trade. He is one of the early settlers of Chicago, having come here in 1834, and has a vivid recollection of the early scenes of the city, when it was hardly entitled to the name of hamlet, assuredly not to the name of village. It soon became, according to his ideas, a distributing center for the West, for people seemed to come and go, and few became permanent residents. He worked at his trade, assisting in erecting some of the first buildings, which were frame. In 1835, he took up a piece of land, one hundred and sixty acres, about five miles south of Lockport, costing him then $210; the same land is now worth $50 an acre. That part was known then as the Yankee Settlement. When he came to Chicago he was associated with his brother, Thomas E. Hamilton, and they took contracts and erected buildings of any kind demanded at that time; and he gives an experience that shows that the same spirit of energy and enterprise which now exists, was fully developed in the early Chicagoan. He says that he was "not acquainted with the term 'balloon' frame, when, one Monday morning, a man stepped into the shop and asked if they could put up a building for him, saying that he did not want to move in before Saturday following." Mr. Hamilton thought it impossible; but about that time his brother came in, and the case was laid before him, when it was determined to put up a "balloon frame," and on Saturday night the building was completed, the owner moving in when the workmen walked out with their tools. This building was on the northwest corner of Dearborn and Lake streets, and was a fair-looking structure. The first building he remembers having assisted in erecting in Chicago was a frame store on the corner of South Water and Wells streets, now Fifth Avenue. It was occupied by a James Woodruff. Mr. Hamilton worked at his trade up to within a few years, and has now given up active business and resides with his children at Hyde Park. In 1835, Mr. Hamilton was employed in building the sloop "Clarissa," the first vessel built in Chicago, and, in 1836, he purchased a one-half interest in her, his brother a one-fourth interest, and Nelson R. Horton the remaining one-fourth interest. He was married in Erie County, N. Y., in 1836, to Miss Cynthia Holmes, who died in 1872, leaving three children—David G., Mary J. (now Mrs. John R. Hoxie, of Hyde Park), and Maria E. (now Mrs. L. W. Stowell, of Chicago).

DAVID G. HAMILTON was born in Chicago January 10, 1842. His education commenced in the public schools, he graduated at the High School in 1862, and entered what was then Asbury University, now known as De Pauw University, where he graduated in 1865. After leaving college he returned to Chicago and, in 1866, entered the law school attached to Douglas University, from which he graduated in 1867. He at once entered upon the practice of his profession and, during 1868, became associated in business with R. K. Swift in mortgage and land titles, under the style of D. G.

Hamilton & Co., and remained with him until 1871, when they dissolved, and Mr. Hamilton has since carried on business alone, giving his attention to real estate investments and the examination of titles. His office, located at No. 126 Clark Street, in the heart of the city, stands on the very ground where he was born. He is the son of Polemus D. and Cynthia Hamilton, who were among the early settlers of Chicago. He was married on December 6, 1870, to Miss Mary J. Kendall, daughter of Lyman Kendall of this city, and has two children—Bruce P. and Adelaide.

ENOS AYRES, the well known capitalist and real estate dealer, has been a citizen of Illinois since 1834, and of Chicago since 1848. He is of Scotch descent, the son of Peter and Ann (Skelton) Ayres, and was born on a farm near New Brunswick, N. J., May 1, 1814. Although nearly seventy-one years old, he is still in active business, and exhibits all the energy and skill of his early manhood. His eye seems as bright, his step as elastic, his complexion as fresh, as a man of thirty-five or forty years of age, and his zeal in all matters seems quite unabated. Mr. Ayres began life as a clerk in his brother's dry goods store in New Brunswick, serving a long apprenticeship, from the age of fourteen to twenty, when he came West. He first settled in Alton in 1834, where he obtained temporary employment in the dry goods store of Riley & Hankinson. At the end of the five months he had sufficiently mastered the western situation to be able to manage an establishment for himself, and he opened a stock and general merchandise in Whitehall, Green Co., Ill., his brother Keuben furnishing the goods for the purpose. After about six years of varying success, he traded the whole establishment for farm lands in the vicinity, and began farming. In December, 1836, Mr. Ayres had married his third cousin, Miss Ann Ayres, the daughter of Rescarrick Ayres, who still survives, at the age of sixty-five years. While in trade Mr. Ayres had built several houses in Whitehall, among them a hotel, and after three years spent on his farm, the hotel being about to become vacant, he bought out his tenant, and conducted it himself until the spring of 1848. In April of that year, the Illinois and Michigan Canal was formally opened for traffic, and Mr. Ayres saw clearly the assured future of Chicago, and determined to make it his home. Selling his entire interests at Whitehall, he moved here with his family by boat, soon after the Canal was opened. He at first engaged in the lumber business, but shortly disposed of it, and in the spring of 1849 began to traffic in real estate. His entire capital at that time amounted to only $6,500, but his present financial standing shows how judiciously it was handled. At first, and largely until 1872, he did a general real estate and brokerage business, but since has principally devoted himself to the care of his own property. He was a sufferer by the great fire to the extent of about $30,000, but he never has permitted his credit to decline, and it stands second to none in the city. A good illustration of the esteem in which he is held in Chicago is found in the manner in which he came to be South Town collector in 1878. The story, in all its phases, is too long for this brief sketch; suffice it to say that in 1878 there were the back taxes of two years to collect, besides those of the current year, and a bond of $8,000,000 would be required. Some of the principal citizens, irrespective of party, decided upon Mr. Ayres as the fit man for the place, and, even against his most strenuous opposition, nominated and elected him and signed his bond without any solicitation on his part. The total amount of capital represented by his bondsmen was not less than $150,000,000. This action of his friends was certainly a most flattering testimonial to his worth. Mr. Ayres has proved a most capable man wherever he has been placed, by fortune, particularly in business affairs. In 1860, he became interested with a few others in some mining property in Gregory District, near Central City, Col. The management not proving successful, he bought out the plant of mines and mills and personally superintended the works from 1863 to 1864, when he decided to dispose of his interests, which he did to New York parties, at a profit of $50,000. Mr. Ayres is a member of the Citizens' Association, the Calumet Club, the Farragut Boating Club (in which he takes great delight), the Washington Park Driving Club, the Kenwood Club and the Presbyterian Union. Of his four children—Ellen, Mary, Henrietta and Peter—Henrietta alone survives. She is the wife of C. T. Bond.

WILLIAM D. KERFOOT has for many years been closely identified with the real estate interests of Chicago, and the mention of his name recalls to memory a small frame structure erected by him, amid the debris in the heart of the burned district, on Wednesday morning, after the great fire of 1871, then known as "Kerfoot's Block." It was the first movement toward the re-building of the city, and bore the inscription, rudely painted on a pine board, "All gone, but wife, children and energy," indicative of the perseverance and faith of the man, and pointing to that marvelous exhibition of nerve and industry on the part of the people of Chicago, the fruits of which are to-day, in the reconstruction of the city, the wonder of the world. A sketch of this building heads a list of views of noted structures of the New Chicago, contained in the third volume of this History. William D. Kerfoot was born at Lancaster City, Penn., April 16, 1837, and is the son of the late Dr. George B. Kerfoot, a physician of prominence in his day. The subject of this sketch came to Chicago in 1854, and entered the real estate office of James H. Rees, now deceased. In 1856, he returned to St. James College, Hagerstown, Md., to complete his education; and, in 1861, permanently located in Chicago, taking charge of the real estate department in the office of Thomas B. Bryan. The following year he undertook business on his own account, and opened an office at No. 59 Washington Street, in the immediate vicinity of which number he has remained for twenty years, conducting transactions, reaching far into the millions of dollars. His clients are composed chiefly of non-resident owners of Chicago property, among whom may be mentioned: James A. Hamilton, E. N. Taft, Estate of General John A. Dix, deceased, Henry Y. Attrill, John J. Cisco, J. S. Cram, J. T. Sherman, Frank O. Boyd, Rev. Morgan A. Dix and William M. Bliss, of New York City; P. K. Dederick & Co., Albany, N. Y.; James S. Farlow, and Jacob W. Pierce, of Boston, Mass.; J. A. Stone, of Cleveland, Ohio; J. W. Gaff, T. T. Gaff, Robert Mitchell, Henry Peachy, F. G. Huntington, Merchants' National Bank, James D. Lehmer, David Sinton, Commercial National Bank, J. M. W. Neff and S. S. Carpenter, of Cincinnati, Ohio; John M. Shreve, A. D. Hunt, D. P. Faulds, J. W. Henning & Son, Russell Houston, John G. Barrett, H. V. Loving and J. W. Cochran, of Louisville, Ky.; Hon. R. T. Merrick of Washington, D. C.; Frederick Deming, of Litchfield, Conn.; W. B. Scarth, of Toronto; W. H. Ridgely, of Springfield, Ill.; P. E. Hosmer, of Nashville, Ill.; Estate of James S. Waterman, deceased, late of Sycamore, Ill.; and many others. Among his city clients it was to be found the First National Bank, Merchants' Loan and Trust Company, John DeKoven, Frederick H. Winston, Mason Brothers, Burke, Walker & Co., Burley & Tyrrell and Larrabee & North. A standard work thus speaks of Mr. Kerfoot: "There is probably no man in Chicago who is a better or a safer judge of real estate valuation in this city, and its surroundings, than he is. He is frequently called upon by individuals and by the courts to give his opinion of values, and in individual cases in partition." Many buildings of note were erected under his supervision, such as: the Shreve Buildings on Washington Street, and on the northeast and northwest corners of Lake and Clark streets; the Henning and Speed Block, and the Gaff Building, are under his management. He is also the president of the Opera House Company, whose new building, on the corner of Washington and Clark streets, gives to Chicago an opera house second to none in the country. Mr. Kerfoot married, in 1865, Miss Susan B. Mooklar, of Mason County, Ky. In 1880, he associated with him in business, William A. Merigold and George Birkhoff, Jr., two gentlemen who had been his assistants for many years, under the firm name of William D. Kerfoot & Co.

GEORGE MARQUIS BOGUE, of the real-estate firm of Bogue & Hoyt, was born January 21, 1842, and is the son of Warren S. and Sally (Underwood) Bogue. His father was born in Georgia, Vermont, in the year 1800, and is a descendant of a Huguenot family of that name, long resident in Scotland. In 1834, the family went to Ionia, Mich., but returned to St. Lawrence County in 1839. At Norfolk, in that county, George Marquis Bogue was born, and he resided there until he was fourteen years old, leaving there in August, 1856, for Chicago, where he joined his brothers, Hamilton B. and S. Curtiss, who had preceded him a few years before. In 1857, George M. Bogue went to work in the freight office of the Merchants' Despatch, and continued there until April, 1859. He then went to the Cayuga Lake Academy, at Aurora, N. Y., where he received an academic education. He returned to Chicago, on July, 1861, and to the office wherein he was formerly employed. He was with the Merchants' Despatch until the spring of 1863. In June of that year, he entered the land department of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, continuing therein until October, 1867. Since then he has been in the real estate business. Mr. Bogue is at present the senior member of the firm of Bogue & Hoyt, which was established in January, 1882, as successor to George M. Bogue. The firm consists of George M. Bogue, Henry W. Hoyt and Hamilton B. Bogue. In 1858, Mr. Bogue took up his residence at Hyde Park, and in 1864, was elected town clerk. He held that position until he resigned, in 1867, and was elected treasurer in 1869, serving until 1872. He was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners of Cook County, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. Charles Hitchcock. Mr. Bogue filled out that term, which expired in December, 1874, serving as chairman of the Finance Committee, and also as a member of the Building Committee. During his term of office, the Criminal Court and County Jail Building, the County Hospital, and additions to the Insane Asylum were erected. At the general election, in November, 1874, he was elected a member of the lower house of the Illinois Legislature, from the Second Senatorial District, and served that session. In February, 1877, Mr. Bogue was appointed, by Governor Cullom, a member of the railroad and warehouse commission for the State of Illinois, which he held until he resigned, in March, 1883. He was then appointed arbitrator of the Western Railroad Pool of the Southwestern Railway Association. He is now permanent arbitrator of the North-Western Traffic Association and of the Central Iowa Traffic Association, which comprises the following railroads: Chicago & Alton, Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, Chicago & North-Western, Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha, Hannibal & St. Joseph, Kansas City, St. Joe & Council Bluffs, Minneapolis & St. Louis, Missouri Pacific, Rock Island & Peoria, and Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific. In discharging the responsible duties of his position as arbitrator, and in making his awards, which involve vast sums of money, Mr. Bogue has shown distinguished fitness for the position, and his connection with the real-estate trade of Chicago marks him as one of the most prominent and successful men in that line of business. Besides these interests, which have called him into active service, his position in the numerous offices of honor and trust have reflected the greatest credit upon himself and gave the fullest satisfaction to his constituency. His public career has been marked by a faithful and conscientious discharge of his duties. Mr. Bogue was married, on January 26, 1871, at Hyde Park, to Miss Catharine M. VanDoren, daughter of A. B. VanDoren. They have had four children, two of whom are dead—Gertrude, born in March, 1872, and George, born in October, 1874, died in infancy. The two children now living are Franklin Ackerman and Ruth VanDoren. Mr. Bogue is a member of the Hyde Park Presbyterian Church, and has been one of its trustees since 1864. He is a Republican in politics.

SAMUEL STRAUS (deceased) was an early and very popular German resident of Chicago. He was born in Kirchheimbolanden, Rheinpfalz, Bavaria, January 22, 1823, coming to Chicago, direct from his native town, in June, 1853. In 1854, he removed to Milwaukee, but returned within a year, and became a conveyancer in the office of Greenbaum Brothers, the bankers, who were also born in the Rheinpfalz. Mr. Straus, however was not content to work for others, and, therefore, in 1857, started out independently in the real-estate business and the practice of law. In this line he continued with decided success up to the time of his death, on July 8, 1878. Although influential in local politics, Mr. Straus never aspired to office himself, but whatever work of this nature was accomplished, he turned to the advantage of his friends. At the time of his death he had acquired a large and lucrative business, but left little property. A widow and six children mourn his decease. Sarah, the oldest, is the wife of Samuel Despres, the lawyer. Simeon Straus succeeded to his father's practice, and is able and prosperous. Emanuel, Joseph, Julia and Carrie are the remaining four children.

ELIAS GREENBAUM was born on June 24, 1832, at Epplesheim, in the Grand Duchy of Darmstadt, near Frankfurt-on-the-Main. He was educated in Rhenish Bavaria, leaving school at the age of sixteen. He first entered a dry goods establishment in his native place, as clerk, where he remained about two and a half years, and then entered his father's employment. In 1847, he landed in New York, and from thence he went to Stark County, Ohio, where he remained a few months, being employed as a clerk, and came to Chicago in 1848. From that year until 1854, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits, and his first earnings were invested in Chicago real estate, and continued thereafter to put all his savings into that investment. He was for a year bookkeeper in the bank of R. K. Swift. From May, 1856, to May, 1857, he was school agent for the City of Chicago, and rendered valuable services to the corporation in that capacity. In January, 1855, he went into the banking and real-estate loan business. In March, 1852, he was married to Miss Rosine Straus, by whom he has had four children—Henry Everett and Moses Ernst, who are how associated with him in business; Emma, who is now the wife of N. S. Gutman, a tobacconist of this city; and James E., the youngest, is in the scientific department of Yale College. Mr. Greenbaum belongs to the Congregation of Sinai, which he helped to found in 1861. He and his sons are members of the Citizens' Association, and of the Chicago Humane Society, in which Mr. Greenbaum takes great interest.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN JACOBS, one of our real-estate dealers, at No. 99 Washington Street, whose remarkable career as a Sunday-school worker has given him a world wide reputation, was born in Paterson, N. J., September 18, 1834, the son of Charles P. and Eliza (Pelton) Jacobs. After leaving school, he clerked in his father's store for some years, until October 21, 1853, when he came to Chicago, and began life for himself, clerking. In 1861, he began business on his own account in South Water Street, in the grocery, produce and commission business. He was successful and laid up money till the great fire, when everything was burned. His losses were very heavy, and in some particulars peculiarly aggravating. In 1869, he had begun to deal in real estate, educating his brothers meanwhile in the grocery and produce business, intending to put them into possession of it, and confine himself strictly to real estate. In common with other business men he pushed improvements of his real estate. The panic of 1873, found him deep in these plans, and busy improving vacant property, laying out new suburban towns, etc., with all the energy of his nature. These, reverses and decline in values carried away more than the fire had left. But with increased resolution he began again, and his success in many undertakings in his line prove his energy, unimpeachable integrity, and skill in business transactions. Mr. Jacobs is one of those men whose business career, although successful and honorable, is but a cypher when compared with their whole life's work. As one of the principal organizers and active members of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association his reputation stands high in this city, and, linked with that of D. L. Moody and others, has been carried to all parts of the world. As secretary of the Northwestern Branch of the U. S. Christian Commission his indefatigable labors have rendered his name honored wherever the noble work of that body is known. And as a tireless, original, and successful Sunday-school worker his reputation is not only national, but worldwide. His Sunday-school record begins with his connection with the First Baptist Church the first Sunday in October, 1851, one year after he came to Chicago, when twenty years of age. He remained connected with that Church until 1881, when he united with others to form Immanuel Baptist Church, of which Rev. Dr. Lorimer is pastor. After two years' service in the First Baptist Church-school as scholar and teacher he was chosen superintendent of the Mission School attached to the Church, September 29, 1856, the first Baptist Mission Sunday-school, and the third mission of any kind in the city. This he managed with extraordinary skill and success for eight years; at the end of which time he took charge of the Sunday school of the First Church, a school which became famous throughout this country. This school and Bible class became a training school for teachers and officers, and over fifty of its members went into the ministry. On the organization of the Immanuel Baptist Church in 1881, he took charge of its school, which office he still retains. Mr. Jacobs' exceptional skill in organizing and conducting Sunday schools, and his long experience in that field, prepared him to put in motion and push to final success the present uniform lesson system. It is impossible to recount here the unparalleled labors performed by Mr. Jacobs in bringing his thought to the practical acceptance of the religious world, nor the various steps even of its progress to its present complete triumph; but we must content ourselves with quoting the testimony of Dr. Eggleston (who was for a long time opposed to the idea) as to the real authorship of the plan: "For the sake of history, let us here record that our sanguine friend, Mr. B. F. Jacobs, who sells produce on South Water Street, who is superintendent of the First Baptist Sunday-school on Wabash Avenue, who is the originator and generalissimo of the United States Sunday-school Army, and who writes lessons for the Standard, makes fine Western speeches in Conventions, and does more besides than we can begin to recount, is the father of the idea of a national uniformity of lessons." After many delays and opposition, the plan was formally adopted at the National Sunday School Convention, held at Indianapolis, April 16-19, 1872, and a seven year series of national uniform lessons were sketched by a committee of five ministers and an equal number of laymen, and published to the world. At the International Sunday-school Convention of the United States and British America Provinces, held in Toronto, Ont., in 1881, he was elected chairman of the International Executive Committee, and at the Louisville Convention in 1884, was re-elected for three years. Mr. Jacobs' connection with the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago, and his position on its Army Committee, which became the Northwestern Branch of the United States Christian Commission during the War, prove him one of the most earnest and useful men in the city, and constitute one of the most important and interesting chapters of his life. There is no doubt that his earnest support of Mr. Moody and his plans, contributes much to the success of the Young Men's Christian Association in this city. During the darkest days of the War, from 1863 to 1864, he was president of the Association, and found ample field for the exercise of his unbounded energy and executive skill. He was at the same time secretary of its War Committee, and discharged the duties of both positions until compelled by the increasing labors of the latter position to surrender those of the former. Next to Mr. Moody and Mr. Farwell, the Association is indebted to the labors of Mr. Jacobs for the ownership of Farwell Hall. He was one of the original trustees of the property and secretary of the board. While Mr. Moody was president of the Association, Mr. Jacobs was, with Mr. Farwell, vice-president and a member of the finance committee, and, as such, was able to second Mr. Moody's energetic efforts, so that upon the occasion of its eighth anniversary, the committee was able to present a subscription to the building fund of the new Hall of $101,000. During the last of May 1861, D. L. Moody and B. F. Jacobs began a series of religious meetings with the soldiers at Camp Douglas. As a result, the Army Committee was formed by the addition of J. V. Farwell as chairman and Tuthill King, Mr. Jacobs becoming its secretary. He was also a most valuable member of the Northwestern Branch of the Christian Commission. Mr. Jacobs was married, April 16, 1854, to Miss Frances M., daughter of Dr. John Eddy, a prominent physician of Naperville, DuPage Co., Ill., but a native of Rochester, N. Y.

FRANKLIN HATHWAY was born at Rome, N. V., July 12, 1818. Joshua Hatheway, the uncle of Franklin, was one of the pioneers of Milwaukee. He went there, in 1834, when there were few others besides Solomon Juneau and George H. Walker. Franklin Hatheway was educated at the Classical School of Rome, where many other prominent men of Chicago and the West received their education. In the fall of 1835, Mr. Hatheway came West to assist his uncle, Joshua, in the survey of the extreme southeastern portion of the State of Wisconsin. Mr. Hatheway still has a map, partly made by himself, of that portion of the State lying south and east of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, before there were settlements or counties in the whole region, except at a few points, such as Milwaukee, Green Bay, etc. Early in the fall of 1836, he returned home and was engaged on the survey of the Genesee Valley Canal until winter, which he spent at home in charge of the post-office as deputy-postmaster. In the spring of 1837, he returned to Milwaukee, via Green Bay. While at the latter place he fell in with James Duane Doty, afterward governor of the State, and was engaged by him to survey the site for the capital. The first territorial Legislature of Wisconsin met at Dubuque in 1834-35, and had located the capital at Fourth Lake, naming it Madison. Two official county surveyors has successively tried to lay out the new city, but, owing to strong local attraction, produced by the presence of large quantities of bog-iron ore, had failed, and given it up. The job had been let, the ground selected for the capital, and contractors, men and material, were largely on the ground. With the confidence of youth Mr. Hatheway—only about nineteen—promised to do the job or ask no pay. His journey from Green Bay was begun on horseback, but on reaching the settlement of the Stockbridge Indians he found the animal disabled, and had to complete his journey on foot. Hiring a couple of young Indians to carry his baggage, he tramped the whole distance through an unbroken wilderness by way of Portage; the vast solitude being unbroken except by two white families, one at Wrightown and one on the site of the city of Fond du Lac. His efforts to lay out the city met with no better success than had those of his predecessors, and he was on the point of giving it up, when a hint from an unknown traveler, who stopped at the only hotel for the night, enabled him to overcome the difficulties of the situation, and he completed the work. On the return trip to Green Bay he was taken sick, and, declining an offer from Governor Doty to survey and plat some land for him across the lake from Madison, he returned to Rome. Recovering soon after, he joined a corps of engineers and helped to survey the Utica & Syracuse Railway—afterward a section of the New York Central—and rode into Syracuse on the first train after its completion, August 1, 1838. He then assisted in the survey of the Syracuse & Oswego Railroad through a heavily-timbered and wild country, making maps, plans, profiles and estimates of the route, completing the work in six weeks. This was considered at the time the most expeditious feat of engineering on record. About the middle of February, 1840, he joined a corps of engineers in charge of Charles B. Stuart—afterward surveyor-general of the State of New York—and went to work on the line of the New York & Erie Railway. They had the central division from Binghamton to Hornellsville, with headquarters at Owego. While on this work he got leave of absence, and, going to the city of Hudson, was married August 20, 1840, to Miss Sarah A. Gilbert, daughter of William S. Gilbert, with whom he had been acquainted from the age of fifteen. He met her at Rome when she was fourteen years old and he fifteen, and they had kept up an acquaintance and correspondence until they were married. She bore him three sons—William, George and Frank C. The latter is now engaged in the office of the Chicago Steel Works. After a wedding-trip home, the young couple settled in Owego, and Mr. Hatheway returned to his work. About this time the management began to run short of money, and, foreseeing the failure of the enterprise, he abandoned it in January, 1841, and again returned to Rome. As he anticipated, the enterprise lay dormant for some years. In the spring of 1843, by invitation of his uncle, Joshua he joined him in Milwaukee and became a partner in his real estate and agency business. In the fall of 1845, business getting dull, he went with his wife and child to Cleveland, Ohio, where he was bookkeeper for the Merchants' Bank of Cleveland, and for a few months, for Patrick Anderson—until the spring of 1847. He then received an invitation by letter from William B. Ogden, to enter his office as confidential clerk and cashier. He accepted the situation and came to Chicago May 1, 1847. He remained in the real-estate office of Ogden, Sheldon & Co. for the long period of twenty-two years, with the exception of one year spent at Green Bay, in 1859. In the spring of 1869, he closed his long connection with the firm and opened a real-estate office on his own account. In the spring of 1884, he became secretary and treasurer of the Mutual Trust Company. On December 24, 1879, his wife died, and on January 12, 1881, he was united in marriage to Miss Clara A. Graham, of Dixon, Ill. Mr. Hatheway is a prominent member of the Episcopal Church. He was for some years senior warden of the Church of our Savior. He was previously a member of St. James' Church, of which he was for a time a vestryman. He is an active temperance worker, and has helped to organize nearly all the earlier lodges and divisions of the Sons of Temperance. He was a charter member and presiding officer of the Mariners' Division of the Sons of Temperance; helped to organize the first lodge of Templars; was a charter member, presiding officer; and for some years deputy of the Radiant Temple of Honor, and a charter and life member of the Washington Home Association.

SYLVESTER LIND, one of the earliest settlers of Chicago, was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, on November 22, 1807. He began life as a carpenter in the employ of Lord Aberdeen, who was at one time Prime Minister of England, for whom he worked five years before coming to America. He had friends who came to Chicago in advance, and, inspired by their letters, he came to this city in June, 1837. The first work he found was naturally in the line of his trade; and for some years he was a carpenter and joiner, and did his part in building up the young city. About 1840, he began to handle lumber in a small way, his lumber-yard occupying the ground upon which he afterward erected the Lind Block, on the corner of Randolph and Market streets. He owned his own mills at Green Bay, Wis., and also two lumber vessels to transport his lumber to his yards in Chicago. While his business was small, Mr. Lind was for a few years in the employ of George Smith, the veteran banker, and for about three years acted as his bank messenger between Milwaukee, Chicago and Michigan City. He traveled on horseback, and carried bank bills—often to the amount of $50,000—padded in a corset which he wore under his clothing next to his body. After a time, however, he feared that some who noticed his intimacy at the bank might suspect the nature of his journeys; and lest his fortune might turn out ill, he decided to abandon it, and content himself with his lumber business. On November 6, 1846, Mr. Lind married Miss Eliza O. Thomas, a native of New York, and has had four children, of whom one daughter alone survives. When the War opened, it found Mr. Lind a man of large property, but its dark days closed down upon him like a pall. His money was all of the wild-cat order, for the country then had no other, and bank after bank failed; $30,000 in wild-cat money proved valueless on his hands, $16,000 in good, six per cent. Milwaukee bonds brought him only $160. His valuable Lind Block was sacrificed, and all the rest of his property went the same way. With just as much zeal and faith as at the first, Mr. Lind went about repairing his broken fortunes, and by the time of the great fire, he had gathered another fortune. The fire did not spare him, but took all he had. He was a director of one of our home fire insurance companies, and a heavy stockholder, and that was all wiped out with the company. His buildings were burned, and, directly and indirectly, nearly everything was sacrificed. He turned his attention entirely to the management and sale of real estate, and has diligently followed that business ever since. On first coming to Chicago, Mr. Lind united with the only Presbyterian Church in the city, and is still a member of the old First Presbyterian Church, on Indiana Avenue. He has often been put forward by his friends for various offices, but, except in few cases, has declined to serve. Besides holding other positions of trust, he was at one time Water Commissioner for the city. He resides in Lake Forest, and was mayor of that corporation for nine years, resigning in April, 1884.

COLONEL EDWARD HERRICK CASTLE was born August 5, 1811, in Amenia, Dutchess Co., N. Y., the son of William and Abigail (Hurd) Castle. He remained at home until he was about ten years old, and attended school in the vicinity. He entered Courtland Academy in 1826, and remained a student there two years, after which he entered the office of Samuel Perkins, a prominent lawyer of Courtland County, with whom he studied two years, at the end of which time he returned home and worked on his father's farm two or three years. He then engaged in business for himself, at Carbondale, Luzerne Co., Penn., where, in 1833, he formed a partnership with Stephen Clark, under the firm name of Clark & Castle, dealing in general merchandise, and very extensively in coal. After some time, Mr. Castle purchased his partner's interest, and conducted the business in his own name. In 1839, a fire destroyed his store and all its contents; but having, in 1838, sent a stock of goods to a brother in Joliet, Ill., and owning an interest in the business, he determined to try his fortunes in the West. He arrived in Chicago May 1, 1839, sold his interest in Joliet, with the proceeds of which he purchased a stock of goods and opened a store in this city. He occupied the first brick store built as far west as the corner of Lake and Wells streets. Besides doing a general merchandise business, Mr. Castle dealt largely in wheat, buying and shipping in one year one hundred thousand bushels. He was engaged for several years in steamboating on the Mississippi, at one time sailing the steamer "Alonzo Child." In 1849, influenced by the rumors of gold discoveries on the Pacific coast, he determined to see the country for himself. He made the voyage by way of Panama, from which port, upon the invitation of the sailing master, he commanded the "Unicorn" to San Francisco, arriving there in due season. Instead of going into the mines, as was his original design, he opened a hotel in San Francisco, naming it the Illinois Hotel, and a store in Sacramento. He also piloted a steamer, the "Eldorado," between these two cities, charging a fare of twenty dollars, and sometimes had two hundred passengers. In 1851, he disposed of his interests in California and returned to Chicago. Soon after reaching here, he was appointed general western agent for the New York & Erie Railroad, and served in that capacity about four years. During this time he assisted in establishing a line of propellers between Dunkirk and Chicago, and in building the first line of railroad into the city. He then formed a partnership with Lewis W. Clark, opened an office at No. 100 Randolph Street, and engaged in buying and selling real estate. After closing out this business, he went to Missouri and obtained the contract for building the Mississippi & Missouri Air Line, the price for building and equipping the road to be $7,000,000. After having built about forty-five miles of the road, the War of the Rebellion broke out. The rebels attacked his party, drove off his oxen and horses, and took possession of all kinds of supplies. He immediately went to St. Louis to see General Fremont, who, without any solicitation, appointed him on his staff with the rank of colonel, and placed him in charge of the railroads in the Northwest. In this position he proved himself very efficient, and by connecting the various railroads entering St. Louis, which were of the same gauge, enabled the Government to save largely in time and money in the transportation of troops and supplies. He also established what were known as the "Castle rates," for the transportation of forage and general government stores. At the siege of Vicksburg, he furnished General Grant with twenty-eight thousand tons of ice. He organized the famous Railroad Regiment of Missouri, for service on railroads, building bridges and making general repairs. He was transferred with General Fremont to Virginia, where his duties comprised the transportation and putting down of pontoon bridges, and on this account he soon became known among the soldiers as "Colonel Pontoon." After five years of faithful service in the Union army, he returned to the peaceful vocations of life, both houses of Congress joining in a letter of thanks for his valuable services in the War, his conduct while thus engaged having been also approved by Abraham Lincoln, who had already shown his appreciation of Colonel Castle by appointing him chief engineer of the Union Pacific Railroad. In 1865, he re-engaged in the real estate business in Chicago, and has met with steady prosperity ever since, his son, Charles W., being connected with him, in the firm of Edward H. Castle & Co., with office in Castle's Block. Colonel Castle has been a member of the Masonic fraternity for about forty years, and a Master Mason about thirty years, and has contributed liberally to the cause. He has been an Odd Fellow most of the time from 1835. He is a member of the Park Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church. He was married January 1, 1835, to Miss Caroline F. Johnson, who died in 1847, leaving three sons and a daughter—Charles W.; Louise, now the wife of Colonel A. J. Greenfield, mayor of Oil City, Penn.; Ephraim; and Edward M. Colonel Castle was married, in 1843, to Miss Emeline Bennett, a quaker lady of Pennsylvania, and an intimate friend of his former wife. By this wife he has two children—Emma and William.

ROYAL ALEXANDER BLAINE MILLS was one of Chicago's early settlers. He was born in the town of North East, Erie Co., Penn., October 7, 1821. The only educational advantages afforded him were those of the common school in his native county. At the age of twenty-one years, he determined to try his fortunes in the West, and selected Chicago as his starting point. Shortly after reaching here, in 1843, he had the opportunity to secure temporary employment in the service of the engineer department of the army, and was engaged for one year on the Government pier at Racine, Wis. Returning to Chicago in 1855, he began his mercantile career with Jones & Co., dealers in Yankee notions, and drove a peddling wagon for that concern through Illinois and the western part of Indiana. During the three years he was so occupied, he exhibited such energy and talent that, at the expiration of that period, he was taken into the firm as a partner. Their interests rapidly expanded, and, about 1850, the firm was re-organized under the name and style of John K. Mills & Co., the business being wholesale dry goods and notions. It is worthy of note that John K. Mills and his brothers, though bearing the same surname, were the subject of this sketch, were in no way related to him. The place of business was first on South Water Street, and, later, on the corner of Lake and Dearborn streets. In the panic of 1857, the house went under. After that time, and until his death, January 25, 1882, Mr. Mills was engaged in the real-estate business in Chicago, though, during the last eight years of his life, he was compelled to delegate matters to others about him, inasmuch as during all that trying period he was confined to his bed, a great sufferer. Mr. Mills was married, on November 23, 1852, to Miss Eliza Anne Neely, of Mooreheadville, Erie Co., Penn. His widow survives him, and still lives at No. 3152 Vernon Avenue. There are four children living—Frederick Neely, who is in the employ of the Hazard Powder Company and a member of the Board of Trade; James Marcellus, who is engaged at the Union National Bank; Jennie Matilda and Katharine Louise.

ADOLPH LOEB & BRO., real-estate and loan brokers, are of Israelitish extraction and of German birth and education. Adolph, the senior member of the firm, was born near the city of Worms, October 11, 1838. He is the eldest of the family, was educated at Heidelberg University, and came to Chicago in the summer of 1853. He was but a boy of fourteen, with not a relative in the city; yet he had the courage to become the pioneer of the family to the New World, and braved alone the perils of the long journey. His first employment was in a real-estate office, where he exhibited a natural aptitude for the business and rapidly acquired an understanding of its details and a skill in carrying it on, unusual in one so young, and which encouraged him, in 1857, to open an office for himself as a real-estate broker. After he had become fairly established, his parents, with the remaining members of the family, came over toward the close of the year following. He prospered from the start, took his brother, William, into his employment as soon as he was old enough to be useful, and, after he returned from the War, made him his partner in 1866. On June 20, 1869, he married Miss Johanna Mannheimer, daughter of the late Dr. Mannheimer, by whom he has had seven children—Esther, Bertha, Jacob, Leonore, Ludwig, Eva and Gertrude. In 1882, Mr. Loeb, for the sake of his health, found it necessary to take a rest from business, and spent four months in Europe, visiting the principal countries on the continent. He derived so much benefit from the change, that he repeated the trip in 1883, and has been able to devote himself, without relaxation, to business ever since. He is one of the earliest members of the Sinai Congregation of this city, and a most devout adherent of Reformed Judaism. He is a member of nearly every useful and benevolent association of the city, and contributes liberally to them all. He belongs to the Citizens' Association, Citizens' League, Relief and Aid Society, Illinois Humane Society, Charity Organization Society, and many others of like character.

JOHN GUNZENHAUSER, real-estate and loan agent, was born at Geislingen, a town of Wurtemberg, Germany, July 4, 1833, the son of David and Ursula (Spaeth) Gunzenhauser. In May, 1854, John Gunzenhauser emigrated from his native country to the United States, with the view of improving his worldly condition. He remained nearly a year in Troy, N. Y., and then came to Chicago in April, 1855, where he engaged in business as architect and builder, to which profession and trade he had been educated in his native country. In 1859, he entered the real-estate office of Sigmund Meyers, at No. 421 South Canal Street. Mr. Gunzenhauser worked for Mr. Meyers as clerk, and at the same time carried on his own profession of architect for some six months, changing his location when Mr. Meyers retired. Mr. Gunzenhauser then conducted the real-estate business on his own account, in connection with his profession, until 1860. Since that time he has been engaged alone in the business of real-estate, renting, and negotiating loans. Mr. Gunzenhauser became acquainted with the First Christian Church in 1869, and became a member in 1872. In 1877, he bought the church property at the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-fifth Street, since which time that society has enjoyed its use free of rent, and have a contract from Mr. Gunzenhauser, by which they can purchase it at any time. Mr. Gunzenhauser was married, the first time, in 1860, and on October 22, 1863, was married to Miss Magdalena Groll. By the first marriage, he has one child, Emma Ursula, and by the second, five children—John, Magdalena, William, Clara and George Washington, all of whom are living.

EDWARD MCCONNELL was one of Chicago's earliest real-estate investors, and one of the first among those who were real-estate holders at the time of the civic incorporation. He was born in Dublin, Ireland, on December 29, 1805, and landed in Montreal, Canada, in the summer of 1827. After traveling in Canada, and the Northern and Eastern States, he took passage from Detroit, Mich., on the "Marshall Ney," bound to Fort Dearborn, with provisions for the garrison. A compagnon de voyage with Mr. McConnell, was Gurdon Saltontail Hubbard, who came on board at Mackinac. In August, 1830 he reached Chicago, and put up at Miller's Tavern, in the forks of the Chicago River. After stopping in this city for a short time, he removed to Springfield, and became connected with the Land Office. He took part in the Black Hawk War. In 1836, he returned to Chicago, and became chief clerk for E. D. Taylor, receiver of the Chicago Land Office. From 1835 to 1856, he resided on the original homestead, on the corner of Twenty-second Street and the South Branch, and from 1856 to 1863, he resided on the West Side, in the vicinity of Monroe Street, subsequent to which he resided at Lake View. In 1844, he married Miss Charlotte McGlashan, a daughter of one of Chicago's early settlers. He was one of the earliest members of the St. James' Episcopal Church, and was a gentleman of good education, of retiring disposition, although abounding in the proverbial hospitality of an "old country squire"; upright in all his transactions, universally admired and honored. He died on May 11, 1878, leaving his wife and three sons surviving him—John McConnell, George McConnell and Benjamin F.

GEORGE MCCONNELL handles only his own property, and has been a member of the real-estate interests of Chicago, in this capacity, since 1875. During Mr. McConnell's tenancy of the Land Office, he purchased large quantities of property, and some of the original property that was purchased by his father in 1836, for ten shillings an acre on the South Branch, near Twenty-second-street bridge, is still owned by the McConnell brothers. In 1844, portions of the property were sold at $500 an acre; in 1863, about an acre sold for $10,000; between 1863 and 1867, it was subdivided, and portions were sold as lots (that were back-lots) at the rate of $6,000 an acre, and in July, 1884, a little less than an acre was sold for $46,000, or at the rate of about $50,000 an acre.

MCCONNELL BROTHERS.—This firm was established in 1881, and comprises J. and B. F. McConnell. They do a real-estate and loan business, and handle their own property, as well as that of their clients, and make a specialty of Lake View real-estate. In that suburb the firm has made three subdivisions, in one of which the original tract was purchased in 1881, at about $2,000 an acre, and lots in the subdivision sold, in 1884, for about $700; in another subdivision, the original tract of which cost only $2,500 an acre in 1881, lots will average $1,500 and $1,600 in 1884. John McConnell is a member of the Chicago Real Estate and Renting Association.

THOMAS & PUTNAM.—The real-estate firm of Thomas & Putnam comprises Benjamin W. Thomas and Joseph R. Putnam, and was the result of their union of business interests on January 1, 1881. Mr. Thomas has been prominently identified with the real-estate interests of the city, as owner and agent, since 1858; and Mr. Putnam has been therein since 1873. The firm do a general real-estate business, and make a specialty of South Side business and residence property. Mr. Thomas was born at Stafford, Genesee Co., N. Y., came to Chicago a young man in August, 1841, and engaged in the general merchandise business with Alexander Loyd, under the firm name of Loyd & Thomas, in which he continued for three years. The firm then closed out their business, and Mr. Thomas embarked in the lumber trade as B. W. Thomas & Co., in which he remained until 1858. Mr. Thomas, during his various business connections in this city, has rendered himself commercially conspicuous by two characteristics: his minute integrity—if such a term be permissible as descriptive of one who is just to the smallest particular—and his inflexible promptitude in business intrusted to his care. He is an active and influential member of the Chicago Academy of Sciences and of the State Microscopical Society, and is an ardent student of the science of microscopy, as well as of other sciences and arts. Mr. Thomas was married in Chicago, October 5, 1848, to Miss Augusta A. Wilcox, daughter of Rev. Jairus Wilcox, the first Bethel chaplain in this city.

ENOS SLOSSON, dealer in real estate and mortgages, was born in Newark Valley, Tioga Co., N. Y., in 1817. Having completed a course of law, he practiced his profession for a time, and then removed to Jones County, Iowa, in 1857, to take charge of real-estate interests belonging to his family in that State. In the year 1859, he came to Chicago, and engaged in mercantile pursuits, having connected himself with the firm of Sterns & Forsyth, wholesale grocers. He was subsequently, for a short time, agent for Howe's Scales, and in 1862, he began business in real-estate, as a general speculator. He was thus actively engaged until the year 1880, when he turned over his entire extensive business to his son-in-law, Frank A. Henshaw. Mr. Slosson is a member of the Masonic fraternity and the I. O. O. F. in this city. He was married to Miss Ellen Hoyt, of Kingston, Penn., a relative of ex-Governor Hoyt, and has had five children—Mary, the wife of Frank A. Henshaw; Sarah; Ella, wife of Dr. Willis, a practicing physician of this city; Carrie, deceased; and William Slosson, secretary of Hale's Elevator Company. The family of Mr. Slosson is among the oldest on the American continent. His grandfather, at the commencement of the American Revolution, enlisted as a private soldier, but his merit speedily met with recognition, and he was promoted to the rank of captain, and assigned to duty with his command under General George Washington, he being at one time a member of that general's body-guard. After the war, he removed to Tioga County, N. Y., where he established a settlement, and named it Berkshire, in honor of his old home in Massachusetts. The father of Mr. Slosson—Enos Slosson—was a colonel in the War of 1812, and, in 1818, founded the town of Lawrenceville, Penn. The patriotism of the family is perpetuated in the present Enos Slosson. At the outbreak of the War he subscribed for the very first issue of the bonds made by the United States, and retained them until they were called in.

HENRY H. WALKER.—Chicago has been very prolific in men whose speculative ability excited wondering comment and the projection of whose schemes seemed impracticable—men whose ideas seemed incapable of fruition simply from their magnitude. That was in years gone by; for in the present the mind has become so habituated to vast operations, and the discussion of interests involving millions, that a project looking to the acquisition of Canada and parceling it out into sub-divisions and additions, would only excite comment as to its financial aspect and its liberation toward profit or loss. Among those who in their day were the astonishment and censure of their contemporaries, Samuel J. Walker was a prominent man in the real-estate fraternity. Dealing in acres and sections, he inaugurated improvements that, to-day, are among the beauties of Chicago, to enhance the selling value of the property thus handled, and constantly transforming barren, undesirable property into eligible residence and business locations. Interested with his brother in many of his projects, although not in partnership with him, Henry H. Walker commenced the real-estate business in 1863; and since that date has been intimately identified with that branch of the city's interests, having not alone learned the value of certain investments, but, from some experiences of Samuel J. Walker's, also learned what investments to avoid. Pursuing thus the golden mean of investment, Henry H. Walker has been very successful, and is the proprietor of large and valuable tracts of property, both in his own fee and in trust for others. Among them are dock property, and the property of which Mr. Walker makes a specialty, namely, that suitable for manufacturing sites and for factories.

SAMUEL J. WALKER was born January 9, 1827, near Dayton, Campbell Co., Ky. Early in life he evinced a great aptitude for commercial transactions, and, when he was but seventeen years of age, his father started him in the wholesale and retail grocery business, at Covington, Ky., which he made a success, as he did of the wholesale and retail dry goods business, in which he embarked some years later. The Chicago Tribune thus recites his commercial and business career: "He abandoned the dry goods business to become the treasurer and bond agent of the Kentucky Central Railroad, and, as such, negotiated the bonds, and, he claimed, practically built the road, before he was twenty-five years old. He was a member of the City Council of Covington, by the time he was twenty-one years old. It was in Chicago, however, that he displayed the greatest ability and carried on the largest speculations. His business relations with this city date as far back as 1853; that is to say, he began about that time to visit it and make investments in real estate. After 1861, his business kept him here nearly all the time, and, in 1872, he removed his family to Chicago, and has made it his home ever since. He was constantly buying and selling, but the amount of real estate that he owned in 1873 was astonishing. It was said to be no less than fifteen hundred acres inside the city limits, and to comprise all of Canalport Avenue, and most of Ashland Avenue from Madison Street to Twelfth Street. It is supposed that if it had been sold just before Jay Cooke's failure, it would have brought $12,000,000 to $15,000,000." He projected a vast system of improvements, intended to connect all his property and greatly enhance its value. One of the boldest was the transformation of what is now Ashland Avenue, but was Reuben Street until he had the name changed. He widened it, made the lots two hundred feet deep, planted $30,000 worth of trees along the sidewalks, interspersed them with large rustic flower-vases, filled with choice flowers, and paved the roadway. His plans were boldly and wisely laid, but the panic slowly overthrew them, and his immense fortune disappeared like a vapor. The property was incumbered, and eventually sunk in value fifty per cent., and, after hopping against hope for five years, he was compelled, in 1878, to forego his scheme. Mr. Walker died on April 15, 1884. He was married on October 7, 1853, to Miss Amanda Morehead, daughter of Governor Charles S. Morehead, of Kentucky.

SOUTH BRANCH DOCK COMPANY.—Reference to Mr. Walker's investments brings to mind a company in which he was much interested—not financially, however—because its projects and the execution thereof excited his admiration; this is the South Branch Dock Company, an association of capitalists who purchased large tracts of land in the region now known as the lumber district, and, by making slips and docking the property, made a valuable and remunerative district of what had been simply property that might be valuable because of its river frontage. The company was incorporated on February 19, 1859, and has, since its organization, been the primal factor in the development and improvement of the lumber district; and the shareholders of the company, also, have been by no means dissatisfied with the results of their investments, since Hon. Roswell B. Mason has been the president, and to whose perspicacity and business acumen the company are largely indebted for their financial success.

JOSEPH H. ANDREWS was born in Milan, Erie Co., Ohio, and received his early education in the common schools of his native place. His father, Ebenezer Andrews, was a graduate of Yale College in the class of 1817, and in his later years held the position of probate judge of Erie County. At an early age, Mr. Andrews entered Yale, and graduated with the class of 1839, receiving in due course the titles of B.A. and M.A. Leaving Yale, he entered the Law School of the Cincinnati College, graduating from that institution in 1860, with the title of LL.B., and was admitted to the Ohio Bar. Leaving his native State, he went to New York City, and, entering the office of Speir & Nash, at No. 111 Broadway, remained nearly two years, during which time he was admitted to the Bar of New York by the Supreme Court of that State. In the latter part of 1862, Mr. Andrews came to Chicago, and, although educated for a professional career, has preferred to follow commercial business, in which line he has been successful, as buildings in Chicago bearing his name will testify. He has never sought publicity, and holds in highest esteem his Alma Mater, Yale College. Since his residence in Illinois, he has become a member of the State Bar and of the Chicago Board of Trade. Mr. Andrews is also a charter member of the Calumet Club of this city.

D. HENRY SHELDON was born on March 12, 1830, and is the youngest child of Caleb and Mary (Teff) Sheldon. He was early thrown upon his resources, as his father, by a distressing casualty, was somewhat incapacitated for business and the financial crisis of 1837 left him without means. At fifteen, D. Henry undertook to educate and support himself. He resided with his uncle, Dr. Corliss, collected his accounts, took care of his horses, at all hours of the day and night, and in other ways, provided for his boarding, clothing, tuition and books. While attending the academy at Union Village, one of his schoolmates was his pastor's son, Chester A. Arthur, ex-president of the United States. At seventeen, he became a clerk in a general store, but he threw up his situation at the end of his trial month, and embarked in business on his own account. In 1849, he commenced selecting and developing lands on the shores of Lake Michigan. On the death of his father, he turned over his accumulations for the use of others in the family, and started again empty-handed. He was married, March 12, 1854, to Miss Augusta Searle, daughter of Rev. David Searle, and granddaughter of Hon. James McCall, all of New York State. In a short time he passed an examination and entered the sophomore class of the University of Rochester, where he was brought under the influence of President M. B. Anderson, LL.D. He graduated from the University in 1857, with the degree of Bachelor of Science. Having prepared himself for civil engineering, he went upon the St. Paul, Minnesota & Pacific Railroad survey, under Colonel Dale, and soon rose to a position next to that of the Colonel's. The panic of 1857, stopped the work, and Mr. Sheldon retired to St. Louis, where he became a dealer in real estate. While in the University, he discovered the workings of, and the necessity for, the beneficiary system, whereby a timely loan would save many a promising young man. He therefore, having funds at his command, lent money on small interest, without security, to those whom it was believed would be thereby benefited. Most of the borrowers are now eminent, and not one dollar of either principal or interest has been lost. In 1859, he made a will, bequeathing $10,000 to a Baptist Theological Seminary for the Northwest, probably to be near Chicago, although he did not know that such an institution was yet contemplated here. In 1861, he removed to Chicago, and became one of the most efficient of the founders of the Baptist Theological Seminary, afterward at Morgan Park. He was sixteen years a member of the board of trustees and of the executive committee. Mr. Sheldon executed his own will, by paying over his bequest largely augmented, and also his loan fund, to this institution in its early days. In all his beneficent work he has been aided and inspired by his estimable wife. In 1867, he made his home in Kenwood, where he now resides, being still occupied in the care of his large and valuable real-estate interests. Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon's only child—Verna Evangeline—graduated with honor from Wellesley College in June, 1885.

JOSEPH E. OTIS was born in Erie County, Ohio, on April 30, 1830, the son of Joseph and Nancy (Billings) Otis. He received a thorough academic education at Milan and Norfolk, Ohio; and, in 1851, was appointed postmaster of his native town, a position he held four years. Mr. Otis then became cashier of the bank of Andrews & Otis, at Milan, and soon after partner with Judge Andrews in the business. The bank prospered; and it was there Mr. Otis gained that knowledge of the financial and commercial world, which proved so valuable to him in after life. In 1859, however, the vicissitudes of the banking transactions threw into the hands of the firm two large grain-carrying vessels, and, in order to control them to advantage, it became necessary to close up the business in Ohio, and remove to Chicago, which was done in 1860, the bank, established in 1855, being closed the same year. In 1861 the War commenced, and business was for a time seriously depressed, but even then Andrews & Otis, through their commercial tact, made money. In 1863, Mr. Andrews died, and, in the settlement of the firm's affairs, the vessels were sold, and Mr. Otis commenced to invest in Chicago real estate, generally purchasing vacant property and improving it, especially favoring transactions in central business property. In 1868, Mr. Otis, in connection with several prominent citizens of Chicago—among whom were Matthew Laflin, John V. Farwell, P. Willard and James Woodworth—organized the Chicago Fire Insurance Company, under the laws of the State of Illinois, with a paid up capital of $100,000. Mr. Otis was chosen president of the board of directors and of the institution, by a unanimous vote of the stockholders, and held that position with credit for three years. In the spring of 1870 he was elected a member of the Board of Aldermen for the Second Ward, and served on the Finance Committee and the Committee on Streets and Alleys in the South Division during his term of two years. In the fall of 1871, Mr. Otis visited the principal cities of the Pacific Coast, and made extended trips in Utah and California, visiting the Yosemite and other places of interest, returning to Chicago prior to the fire. In 1873, he made an extended tour through Cuba and thoroughly investigated the diversified industries of that famous island. In 1884, he visited the City of Mexico. During all these years of Mr. Otis's sojourn in this city, he was constantly investing in real estate, improving it, and selling or leasing it, as might be most expedient. These investments were very profitable, as a natural result of his correct estimate of present and prospective values, and he now stands among the most conservative and wealthy of Chicago's real-estate owners. In politics he is a Republican but is not partisan; he is liberal, although uncompromising, in his antagonism to ring-rule and trickery, and is therefore a very serviceable member of the Citizens' Association. On May 3, 1859, Mr. Otis was married to Miss Marie, the daughter of Judge S. F. Taylor, of Milan, Ohio, by whom he has five children living—Mary T., Joseph E., Jr., Ralph C., Florence and Pauline. In June, 1831, he took his wife and eldest daughter through the principal countries of Europe, visiting England, Ireland and Scotland, and, sailing up the Rhine, they made a tour through Switzerland. They then traversed the St. Gothard Pass and visited Paris, going thence to Italy and the cities of Milan, Venice and Florence. They returned via the Mont Cenis tunnel to Paris. In 1834, they made a more extended and unusual tour, passing from London to Paris and thence, by way of Lyons, Marseilles and Genoa, to Rome. After ten days in the Eternal City they visited Naples, and other places of interest in Italy, and thence to the Grecian Archipelago, spending some time in Athens and Corinth, and then up the Dardanelles to Constantinople, crossing into Asia Minor; thence by way of Varna, on the Black Sea, to Bucharest, where they visited the scenes of the struggle between the great contestants of the Russo-Turkish War; thence by steamer they proceeded up the Danube to Buda-Pesth, Vienna, Berlin, Amsterdam, London, reaching home in October. Mr. Otis was made a Master Mason in Ohio in 1856, and is also a member of the Calumet Club of this city.

F. A. BRAGG is a veteran in the real-estate business. From 1853 to 1859, he was superintendent of assessments, in which latter year the Board of Public Works was appointed, and to this body were delegated the duties formerly performed by him. He then engaged in the real-estate business, for which his duties as assessor had especially qualified him, remaining therein until the breaking out of the War, when he enlisted in the 6th Missouri Infantry Volunteers. He was commissioned first lieutenant in May, 1861, captain in August, 1861, and major in April, 1865. He was in command of the regiment during every fight it went into, and commanded a brigade during his service with the regiment on Sherman's march to the sea. He was mustered out in August, 1865. At the time of the breaking out of the War, he had the charge of the Fire Department of Chicago as first assistant marshal, under U. P. Harris. He was also foreman of "No. 1," for fourteen years, under the old volunteer organization. In 1865, Mr. Bragg re-entered the real-estate business in this city, with which he has been connected ever since that date. Mr. Bragg was born in Otsego County, N. Y., in 1829. He came to Chicago in July, 1851, and was deputy city clerk under H. W. Zimmerman. He has been for a long time prominently identified with the Masonic fraternity, and was one of the original members of the Chicago Real Estate Board, also one of the first members and promoters of the Chicago Stock Board. Mr. Bragg was likewise one of the first members of the Chicago Light Guard.

CAMPBELL BROS. & Co.—The real-estate firm of Campbell Bros. & Co. is composed of James L. Campbell, Frank W. Campbell and John W. Brooks. The firm was first established in 1866, by the two brothers now associated in the business, and continued until in January, 1884, when John W. Brooks was made a partner, and the present firm thus constituted. In the early existence of the firm, the efforts of the Campbell Brothers were extended toward an independent dealing in realty; from the outset until the present time they have handled only their own lands, their first transactions being the purchase and sale of acre property in subdivisions. So energetically did they push their business, that in early days they sold lots on unlimited time, requiring no payment prior to occupancy, allowing purchasers who would erect houses a liberal period in which to make their payments. In 1868, they began building two-story houses, and frugal clerks and mechanics availed themselves of their liberal terms of sale. The field of their operations lies toward the southwest part of the city, where an avenue bears their name, and many tasteful cottages and a number of fine residences testify to their public spirit and individual enterprise. Since being in business, the aggregate number of dwelling houses erected by them will closely approach five hundred, two hundred of which were built during the last three years.

James L. Campbell, the senior member of the firm of Campbell Bros. & Co., was born in Caledonia, N. Y., May 19, 1831, the son of William and Hannah (Ladd) Campbell. He received his early education in his native village, coming to Chicago in 1850. Later, he was employed on a farm near Elgin, Ill. In 1856, he went to Fayette County, Iowa, where he attended the Upper Iowa University for three years, and, during the following three years, taught school in that county. In the meantime, he had studied law, and was admitted to the Bar of Iowa, at West Union, in 1862. He subsequently returned to Chicago, and became a student at the Union College of Law, graduating from that institution in 1866. He established himself as a practicing attorney in this city, doing a limited real-estate business in connection with his law practice. His real-estate business, proving the most lucrative, he abandoned the law practice in 1868, and since that time has devoted himself exclusively to real estate transactions. He was married, July 19, 1859, to Miss Sophronia R. Crosby, daughter of Rev. J. W. Crosby, of Iowa. They have had one son, Frank F., who died January 5, 1883. Mr. Campbell is a member of Blair Lodge, No. 393, A. F. & A. M. In November, 1860, he was elected as a city councilman, on the Republican ticket, serving two years. In 1873, he was again accorded that honor, and, in 1884, was again elected to serve his third term, being at present (1885) an incumbent of that position. In 1870, he was elected to represent his district in the Legislature, serving as a member of the first session of that body under the new Constitution. While in the Legislature, he made his public service a matter of historic record, drawing and introducing the bill which gave to the city of Chicago the present highly satisfactory form of conducting the Bridewell, making that institution more than self-supporting, instead of being a burden to the city, as it had been under the previous management.

Frank W. Campbell, a member of the firm of Campbell Bros. & Co., was born at Scottsville, Monroe Co., N. Y., August 25, 1843, the son of William and Hannah (Ladd) Campbell. When but a child he went with his parents to Elgin, Ill., where he first attended school, remaining there until the age of fourteen, when he came to Chicago and entered the public schools as a pupil, subsequently graduating from Bryant & Stratton's College in 1863. Meanwhile, during his vacations, he had learned the jeweler's trade with his brother, Mark Campbell, who was established at No. 81 Clark Street. For three years after leaving college, he worked in his brother's jewelry establishment, after which he became a partner in the present existing firm. He was married, February 7, 1872, to Miss Laura F. Remington, of Chicago. They have three children—Frank O., Ellen D. and A. Blanche. Mr. Campbell is a member of William B. Warren Lodge, No. 209, A. F. & A. M.

John W. Brooks, the junior member of the real-estate firm of Campbell Bros. & Co., was born at Woodstock, Oxford Co., Maine, July 25, 1841. He is the son of William and Lydia M. (Russell) Brooks. He received his early education in the common schools of Oxford County, and, at the age of sixteen, entered the academy at Norway, Maine, graduating from that institution three years later. Soon after leaving school he entered into partnership with C. H.

Howe, and established a store at West Paris, Maine, carrying a general stock. After conducting his business successfully for three years, he sold his interest to his partner, and then went to Portland, Maine, where he engaged as a salesman in a wholesale notion house. In the great fire in Portland, in 1866, his employers were burnt out, and he was obliged to seek occupation elsewhere. He went to Boston, and engaged as a traveling salesman with Simpson & Cotter's wholesale notion house, where he remained two years, coming to Chicago at the expiration of that time. Arriving in this city in 1868, he was employed by several small firms dealing in notions until 1869, when he accepted a position with Field, Leiter & Co., remaining with that firm nine years, and was one of the first salesmen ever put on the road by that company, then in its infancy. Leaving the employ of Field, Leiter & Co., for the next five years he engaged as a traveling salesman for the Warner Brothers' corset house, of New York City, which position he filled with great satisfaction to his employers, making unprecedented sales, and disposing of the greatest amount of their goods ever sold by any one salesman in a single year. On January 1, 1884, he was admitted to partnership in the firm of Campbell, Bros. & Co., and is now associated with them in business. He was married, January 11, 1872, to Miss U. Blanche Peabody, of Winona, Minn., who died January 29, 1883.

WILLIAM M. HOYT is one of the primeval settlers of our city, having arrived here during 1836. He commenced to invest in real estate immediately upon his arrival, and still continues in the business, and, therefore, may justly lay claim to the title of one of the oldest real-estate men in Chicago. He established himself in business in 1854. Mr. Hoyt was associated with L. W. Stone, but this was only a brief episode in his forty-eight years of business experience. During 1867, Mr. Hoyt took his son, J. Q. Hoyt, into partnership with him, and since that date the responsibility of the active part of the work has devolved upon the younger member of the firm.

RUDOLPH WEHRLI, another early settler, was born within one-half mile of the city of Aran, in the Canton Aargau, Switzerland, on January 31, 1819. He went to New Orleans, La., in 1839. After remaining there six weeks and not finding the city to his liking, he moved to St. Louis, where he remained seventeen months. From there he came to Chicago, arriving here on August 3, 1841, and entered the employ of Clybourne & Hovey, who kept the Boston Market, on the corner of Lake and Wells streets. After remaining with them one year, he commenced business for himself—a meat and provision market—on the east side of LaSalle Street, and about eighty feet south of Lake, where he remained five years. During this period Mr. Wehrli, in 1845, purchased his first piece of real estate in Chicago, which he still owns, eighty feet on LaSalle Street, between Lake and Randolph streets, now numbered 46 and 48, for which he paid $400. He then, in 1848, went into the State-street market, between Randolph and Lake, and which had the old number 15 on State Street, where he remained ten years. He then moved his meat market to Nos. 60 and 62 Washington Street—which property he had purchased in 1850, and paid $2,150 for forty feet by one hundred and eighty feet, and which is now worth about $3,000 a foot—and here Mr. Wehrli stayed until the fire of 1871. After the fire, he opened a market on the north side of Hubbard Court, east of State Street, where he remained for about two years, and then sold out and retired from the active business life he had pursued for thirty-three years. Mr. Wehrli now enjoys his well-earned leisure at his beautiful home on Thirty-seventh Street, in the midst of his cultivated family. His interests comprise some of the choicest property in the city, and the attention Mr. Wehrli bestows upon them gives occupation necessary to a man of his active mind. Mr. Wehrli married, in 1846, Christiana Schneider, and has the following children: Emeline L., Mena C., Rudolph G., Albert C., Laura C. and Ada M. His family attend the Lutheran Church, of which they are influential and useful adherents. As will be perceived by reference to Vol. 1 of this work, pp. 284-85, Mr. Wehrli was a member, first of Swift's Hussars, as cornet, and subsequently of the 60th Regimental Staff, as adjutant. Mr. Wehrli recalls, with a great deal of amusement, an encounter he and "Long John" had. Mr. Wentworth's office and Mr. Wehrli's barn were adjoining one another, and, to reach his barn, Mr. Wehrli had to cross the sidewalk; this gave umbrage to Mr. Wentworth, who warned him to desist, but Mr. Wehrli did not. "Long John" had him arrested, and Mr. Wehrli was fined $1; after which vindication of the law affecting the sanctity of sidewalks, Mr. Wentworth was perfectly satisfied—and Mr. Wehrli rode over the sidewalk unmolested. This occurred at his first residence, near Jackson Hall.

F. B. PEABODY & Co.—There are many of Chicago's real-estate houses the mention of whose name suggests solidity, security and good faith, and prominent among such is that of Francis B. Peabody & Co. This house was established in 1866, as Gallup & Peabody, comprising Benjamin E. Gallup and Francis B. Peabody, and did a general business in real estate, loans and investments. In 1875, this firm was dissolved, and since that date the present house has had the title of Francis B. Peabody & Co., and has undertaken to do but very little real-estate business in the ordinary sense of buying and selling, being almost exclusively engaged in the mortgage-loaning branch of the business. The transactions of this firm have been very large, distinguished, however, not alone for volume, but also for their conservative character. Mr. Peabody was born at Milford, N. H., in 1827, and, after pursuing his English and classical studies for some time, graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., in 1848. He then determined on studying law, and commenced with Franklin Pierce—subsequently president of the United States—and his partner, Judge Josiah Minot, at Concord, N. H., in whose office he continued for over a year, and was for some time afterward at Hillsborough, N. H., where he completed his studies. He commenced practicing law at Hillsborough, in 1850, and continued until 1852. In the fall of 1852, he moved to Concord, N. H., and formed a co-partnership with Nathaniel B. Baker, afterward governor of New Hampshire, with whom he was associated until the year 1855, during which year he formed a co-partnership with William E. Chandler, afterward secretary of the navy, under the firm name of Peabody & Chandler. In the spring of 1857, this partnership was dissolved, and Mr. Peabody removed to Chicago in March of that year; after which he was severally associated with Judge Walter B. Scates—compiler of Treat, Scates & Blackwell's Statutes,—Judge William K. McAllister and John N. Jewett, in the practice of law, for about two years. He then formed a partnership with Judge Alfred W. Arrington, and practiced with him during 1859-60, dissolving that partnership in 1860. From that year until 1866, he was without any partner, when he became associated with Mr. Gallup. One interesting fact in connection with the firm of Gallup & Peabody is, that the demands made by their clients for loans and mortgage investments so exclusively occupied their time, that they were compelled to relinquish their law practice, which they did about 1870.

SCHRAEDER BROTHERS, the well known real-estate firm, have been associated in this business since 1865. By their long and varied experience they are peculiarly fitted for the position they maintain as reliable dealers in all descriptions of Chicago real estate. Their caution, integrity and foresight have brought them hosts of clients, and among them large numbers of thrifty Germans.

William L. Schraeder, the elder of the brothers, was born in the Province of Schaumburg Hllesen, Germany, in June, 1832. He was educated there for the civil service, but, after receiving his education, changed his plan of life, and emigrated to the United States in 1854. In October of that year, he located in Chicago, and was for some time engaged in the grocery trade. In 1855, he embarked in the real-estate business, and, in 1863, returned to Germany, where he was married to Miss Augusta Keysser. They have five children, all born in Chicago.

Frederick Schraeder was born in Germany, June 13, 1838, and after finishing his education, learned the business of an apothecary. He emigrated from his native country to Chicago, in October, 1854. For some time after arriving in Chicago, he was employed in the drug business, but, in 1865, became associated in the real-estate business with his brother, William L. He was married in Rochester, N. Y., in 1866, to Miss Mary Miller, by whom he has one daughter.

SCHUMACHER & LAUER.—The firm of Schumacher & Lauer comprises Charles F. Schumacher, Jr., and Nicholas A. Lauer, and was established in 1878. They conduct a real estate, loan and insurance agency, and, although established but six years, they have already secured a large proportion of the West Side patronage in these various branches. They are agents for the Agricultural Insurance Company, of Watertown, N. Y., and for the New Hampshire Insurance Company, of Manchester, N. H., and carry a large and constantly increasing line of prominent West Side risks.

Charles F. Schumacher, Jr., was born in Chicago, September, 1852, and is the son of Godfrey Schumacher, who settled here in that year. He has been engaged with Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co., for the past twenty-seven years. He was educated in the public schools of Chicago, and began his business career, shortly after the fire, in real estate, loans and insurance, being associated with his uncle, C. F. Schumacher, until in 1877.

Nicholas A. Lauer was born in the old Fort Dearborn, Chicago, on January 19, 1851, and is the son of Casper and Eva Lauer. His father was the first policeman in Chicago who lost his life in the discharge of his duty, September 18, 1854; and his mother is still living in the city. He was educated at the Jesuit school, since changed to St. Ignatius College, and completed his studies at St. Xavier's College, at Cincinnati. He commenced business with Chase Brothers, abstract makers, and afterward occupied the position of deputy record-writer in the Superior Court, for nine years, and, at the expiration of that time, in 1878, went into partnership with Charles F. Schumacher, Jr., in the real-estate, loan and insurance business. He was married, at Chicago, in 1874, to Miss Elizabeth P. Reis, daughter of Peter Reis, and has seven children—Eva, Lanra, Clara, Josie, Frederick, Grace and Florence. His parents, as well as his wife's, came to Chicago prior to 1835.

HENRY M. SHERWOOD has been a resident of Chicago since 1858, and is one of her best-known and thoroughly-respected citizens. He comes from Westport, Fairfield Co., Conn. His father was Charles E. Sherwood, and his mother Anna Beam. They had eight children, of whom Henry was the eldest, born on December 19, 1831. He spent his early life at school during winter and at work during the summer, and at eighteen began teaching in a district school. For about eight years he taught, attending the Normal School, at intervals, until he came West in April, 1858. Soon after reaching Chicago, he became a member of the Holbrook School Apparatus Manufacturing Company, chartered under the laws of Connecticut, and then having offices at New York and Chicago. He remained connected with this company until 1864, when he sold out his interest, and engaged, on his own account, in the school-furnishing business, which he prosecuted successfully until February, 1873, when he disposed of the same, and entered upon the real-estate business. In 1862, the Sherwood company was formed for the sale of school supplies. Of this company, H. M. Sherwood is president, and in it he holds an interest, yet takes no active part in the conduct of its affairs. Although a Republican, Mr. Sherwood has taken little active part in politics, except to do what he could to secure the nomination and election of good men, a much more inviting field presenting itself to him in other directions. He is a member of the First Presbyterian Church, and has, for many years, been active in advancing its interests, holding uninterruptedly for twelve years the offices of trustee and treasurer. As a member of the Citizens' Association and the Citizens' League, he has done much for the suppression of vice and the regulation and mitigation of evils not to be entirely eradicated this side the millennium. It is, however, in works of a benevolent character that Mr. Sherwood principally delights and is most active. That comparatively new, but most admirable, method of dealing with the needy—helping the helpless to help themselves—encouraging and aiding the worthy poor, and detecting and exposing the frauds, which, under the labors of Rev. S. Humphreys Gurteen, first took organized form and practical shape in this city, by the establishment of "The Charity Organization Society of Chicago," at once enlisted his hearty sympathy and warmest approval, as it did that of hundreds of others here. Mr. Sherwood has taken an active part in promoting its usefulness. He is also one of the directors of the News Boys' Home, and is one of the board of manager of the Presbyterian Hospital. He is connected with the Chicago Free Kindergarten Association, and, as a temperance man, takes an active interest in the Bands of Hope, Temperance Unions, and all similar societies that help to save the young from drunkenness, poverty and disgrace. Mr. Sherwood is a member of several other organizations, among them the Union League Club, the Presbyterian Social Union, and the Chicago Historical Society. He was united in marriage on September 14, 1859, to Miss Eliza H. Gray, of Westport, Conn., by whom he has had five children—only one, a daughter named Grace, surviving.

J. L. MCKEEVER, although a comparatively young man, is one who, by his enterprise and industry, has made a favorable and successful mark in real-estate annals. He was among the first real-estate dealers located after the great fire of 1871 in the burned district, having engaged an office in Dr. Boone's Block, No. 133 La-Salle Street, from the advance plans. This was the first large building fully occupied in the burned district. Mr. McKeever, after mature deliberation, located his home in the woods, now the corner of Forty-first Street and Langley Avenue, thus becoming the pioneer of that locality; and to his settlement and the impetus given to that section, by the improvements inaugurated and carried out by him, the early influx of residents into that locality is due. Mr. McKeever cut the trees down and opened Forty-first Street from Langley Avenue to Grand Boulevard, at his own expense, trusting to be repaid by the property owners benefited. He introduced water and gas on Forty-first Street and Bowen Avenue; and, in consequence of his efforts, the large nine-foot sewer was started on the former thoroughfare. In fact, to credit Mr. McKeever with being the nucleus around which clustered the pleasant, flourishing suburban residences of his vicinity, is only doing him simplest justice. When he went to the locality designated as his residence, he purchased two hundred feet on Forty-first Street, at $40 a foot, which, in a very brief time, advanced to $100 a foot, in consequence of the improvements made by him. Subsequent to the panic, the property depreciated sixty per cent., but it has again advanced, until it is now again worth $100 a foot. To his courage and confidence in the future is due the first brick improvements on Bowen Avenue, between Langley and Vincennes avenues, and also numerous similar improvements on Forty-first Street. At the time he built these houses, the street was not even grubbed, and consequently his friends derided his visionary provisions for residents who would never reside in that vicinity. Mr. McKeever also predicted, in the near future, the running of passenger trains on the Union Stock-Yards railroad track, and the erection of a station at Fortieth Street and Langley Avenue. He still continues the good work that he began thirteen years ago, and his faith in the advance of values and future improvements is shown by the substantial and elegant buildings that have been, and are still being erected in that neighborhood by him. Mr. McKeever, in November, 1871, married Miss Mary A. Buell, of Holley, N. Y., and his son, Buell McKeever, was the first child born on Forty-first Street.

J. C. MAGILL & Co. do a general real estate commission business, buying, selling, renting, collecting, paying taxes, negotiating loans, managing property for non-residents, etc. They have a large and increasing business in all lines, visiting all parts of the country in the interests of their clients. They make a specialty of local investments, renting business and residence property, buying and selling improved and unimproved Chicago realty, on commission, and building and selling flats and other houses. They are agents for many capitalists in Canada, Cincinnati, New York, Boston and elsewhere, and manage a large amount of realty for non-residents. Among other property in their charge are the following well-known flats: Montone, Calumet, Talbott, Hyde, Mara, Streeter, Tucker, etc. They also give special attention to making investments for non-residents, for which their knowledge and experience give them important advantages, both borrowers and capitalists finding most favorable opportunities through this house. They are noted for successfully conducting transactions of great magnitude, and for having placed some of the heaviest mortgage loans in the West. They handle a large amount of improved and unimproved farm lands, and the demand for their aid in real-estate negotiations extends into New England and Canada, where they have effected some important sales and purchases. The strict rule of this house is to secure the best investments, rents, etc., identifying their client's interests with their own, and attending to all business intrusted to them in a conscientious and thorough manner. Long experience, careful judgment and high standing, have given Messrs. Magill & Co. a commanding position among all interested in real-estate transactions, and their opinion is constantly solicited in all matters involving real-estate values, and they are constantly called upon to testify in legal proceedings affecting the most important real-estate interests.

Jacob C. Magill was born in Buffalo, N. Y., May 27, 1846. He came to Chicago with his father's family on July 3, 1854, and received his education in the public schools. On January 1, 1863, he entered the employ of Webster & Baxter, doing a commission business on the Board of Trade, and remained with them until after the great fire of 1871. In 1872, he began to put up houses for himself, and, in the following January, opened a real-estate office. During the summer, he entered into a co-partnership with H. C. Morey, which continued until 1875, when it was dissolved by mutual consent. In 1881, S. Wilder was admitted to the firm, having previously been connected with the house for several years, and having spent his business life in real-estate connections. In May, 1864, after being with Webster & Baxter a year, Mr. Magill enlisted in Co. "D," 134th Illinois Volunteer Infantry for a short term of service, and, after seeing some pretty active times in Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri—chasing Price in the latter State, or being chased by him—this regiment was mustered out and honorably discharged, in November, 1864. On April 29, 1873, soon after starting in the real-estate business, he was united in marriage to Miss Helen S. Stearns, a Chicago lady, but a native of Albany, N. Y., by whom he has had three children—George G., born February 18, 1874; Charles S., born April 10, 1875; and Helen S., born August 10, 1876.

JOSEPH SMITH REYNOLDS son of Isaac N. and Rue Ann (Holderman) Reynolds, was born in New Lenox, Will Co., Ill., December 3, 1839. Both his parents were natives of Ohio. Until he was seventeen years of age he attended the district school, coming to Chicago in September, 1856. Here he was educated at the public schools, graduating from the I. H. School in July, 1861. In August of that year, in company with Fred W. Matteson and Oliver H. Payne, he recruited for the Yates' Sharp-shooters, known in war annals as the 64th Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry. For three years and six months he served with the Army of the Tennessee, receiving, during that period, five promotions from the governor of his State and two from the War Department. He was with Sherman from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and to the sea; thence through the Carolinas to Washington, where he was present at the grand review. He was in command of the 64th Regiment from Atlanta through Georgia, having been promoted to a captaincy for gallantry at Corinth, Miss., where he was severely wounded. He was mustered out of the service in July, 1865, his rank of brigadier-general having been granted him for services in the field at the battle of Bentonville. After leaving the service, he commenced the study of law in the office of Scates, Bates & Towse, graduating from the law department of the Chicago University in July, 1866. He at once formed a partnership with S. D. Phelps, and the new firm commenced practice as Reynolds & Phelps. John C. Richberg became associated with him in 1869, but since 1874, he has been alone. Of late he has become interested in real-estate matters, being associated in a legal and business capacity with S. E. Gross. General Reynolds was elected a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1867, and re-elected in the fall of 1869. He was appointed a member of the Board of Education in May, 1870, and was sent to the Legislature again in the fall of 1872, as a Senator from the First Senatorial District. As the commissioner to the Vienna Exposition for the State of Illinois, he sailed for Europe in May, 1873, returning to this country in December. In July, 1875, he was appointed by the governor one of the board of commissioners to locate the State Institute for the Education of Feeble-Minded Children. General Reynolds became a member of the G. A. R. in 1867, and, at its grand encampment, held in Chicago, in May, 1875, was elected senior vice commander-in-chief of that order for the United States. In 1876, he was re-elected, and is at present, by virtue of his former positions, a life member of the National and Department Encampments, besides being connected with the Thomas Post, No. 7, of Chicago. Since 1872, he has been a member of the Knights of Pythias, being elected grand chancellor in 1876. General Reynolds was married January 31, 1877, to Mattie A. Carey, daughter of George W. Carey, of Chicago. They have one son, Joseph Sheridan, born January 23, 1878.

BENJAMIN LOVERING PEASE, eldest son of Noah and Betsey M. Pease, was born at Meredith, N. H., on November 4, 1834. After receiving such education as the common schools afforded, he completed his preparation for college at the New Hampton Institution, and then attended Dartmouth College, from which institution he graduated in the class of 1859. Immediately after his graduation, he was chosen principal of the Gilford Academy, N. H., and subsequently occupied the same position in the Academy of Wolfborough, N. H. During this period he commenced the study of the law, which he continued in the office of Daniel M. Christie, of Dover, N. H., and afterward with Eastman & Cross, at Manchester, N. H., being admitted to the Bar at the latter city, in February, 1864, directly after which he came to Chicago, and was admitted to the Illinois Bar in November, 1864, since which time he has resided in this city. In 1866, he commenced, as a specialty, the examination and the perfecting of titles to real estate, also of making loans on realty. His proficiency as a conveyancer, and his thorough knowledge of real estate law, gave him superior advantages for the safe and profitable investment of capital in Chicago, which were speedily recognized by the public. In this business, involving, as it does, shrewdness, legal acumen and integrity, he has been successful in an eminent degree. After a trial of eighteen years, through all the mutations of fire, panic and financial disaster and depression, his record stands unblemished, and his character as a fiduciary agent irrefragable, thus maintaining the high commercial and personal standard Mr. Pease has occupied since his advent into business circles. Amidst his numerous clients for whom he loans money are several savings institutions, and among those for whom he acts as financial agent, in the making of loans and in the purchase and sale of real estate, are numerous Eastern and Western capitalists who have thus sought, and found, a reliable and trustworthy means of profitably investing their surplus capital.

JOSEPH DONNERSBERGER was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1843, was educated and first went into business there. From 1864 to 1868, he was clerk in the office of Samuel A. Sargent & Co., real-estate dealers. In the latter year the firm went out of business, and Mr. Sargent went West. Mr. Donnersberger then conducted the business two years on his own account, becoming interested in lands on the Illinois Central Railroad. In the meantime he had formed the acquaintance of Adam Smith, and was by him persuaded to come to Chicago. Accordingly he moved to this city in 1870, and immediately established himself in the real-estate business in connection with Mr. Smith, who soon afterward began to build up Brighton Park, forming the Brighton Cotton Mill Company in 1871. The investors in this enterprise were Adam Smith, who contributed originally sixty acres of land valued at one thousand dollars an acre, and paid in $25,000 toward the building; Kay & Coates, $10,000; John McCaffery, $10,000; and Joseph Donnersberger, $5,000. A portion of the land was divided into lots, and sold by Mr. Donnersberger to those desiring to establish homes. In this way Mr. Smith was reimbursed for his investment of the land, and the residue of the land then became the property of the company. During the years 1874-75, Mr. Donnersberger and John McCaffery were partners in the real-estate business under the firm name of Donnersberger & Co. Since that time Mr. Donnersberger has been alone, and has sold land for the largest owners thereof in Brighton Park,—Nathan Corwith, Byron L. Smith, Charles Fargo and Thomas Rutter,—besides dealing extensively in lots lying generally in the South and West divisions of the city. Previous to the great fire Mr. Donnersberger's office was at No. 55 Dearborn Street. Immediately afterward it was at No. 55 South Jefferson Street, and as soon as the re-building of the city was sufficiently far advanced, it was removed to the First National Bank Building, then at the corner of State and Washington streets. In 1875 it was removed to its present location. Since 1873, Mr. Donnersberger has been honored by his fellow-citizens with political preferment. In that year he was elected collector for the town of Cicero, and in 1874 he was chosen assessor of the town. In 1876, he was elected a member of the Board of Trustees of Cicero for four years, and re-elected in 1880. During both his terms of membership he served as president of the board. In the fall of 1881, he was elected commissioner of Cook County from the Fourth Commissioner's District, and on December 3, 1883, was elected president of the Board of County Commissioners, which office he still holds.

THE ABSTRACT BUSINESS.

In intimate relation with the real-estate transactions of Chicago stands the abstract business, which has grown from an institution that was occasionally patronized, into an adjunct of the Recorder's office, and is a business whose existence is acknowledged to be indispensable. The existence of the firms of Chase Brothers, Shortall & Hoard and Jones & Sellers, and the preservation to each firm of some of their records, enabled them, by consolidating their interests and putting their books together, to form a complete chain of title to the lands of Chicago and Cook County, which were recognized as authority on titles by Eastern capitalists, and on which they relied for loaning the millions of money needed to re-build Chicago.

The business was inaugurated about the year 1849, by Edward A. Rucker, of Chicago, who conceived the idea of keeping the land records of Chicago and Cook County by a method of single-entry bookkeeping, rendered easy and practicable under the Government system of division of land, then comparatively recently adopted. By the new system, land was surveyed and mapped into sections, towns and ranges in the States and Territories west of the Ohio, thus avoiding the metes and bounds of the old method of describing land, a description by a single set of figures being substituted.

This first attempt of Mr. Rucker was made in company with James H. Rees, of Chicago, and the firm of Rees & Rucker was established. In the course of time a single set of indexes, less elaborate than those of a subsequent period, was completed, and the profession of making examinations of titles by their aid was fairly inaugurated in Chicago, for the first time in the country—indeed, in the world.

The office of this firm was in the basement of the old Court House, and one of their employés was Henry W. Zimmerman, who had charge of the abstract business. He was elected city clerk in the spring of 1851, and S. B. Chase took his position in the employ of Mr. Rees, taking entire management of the abstract department, and also making some important improvements in the industries and in the general manner of keeping the books.

SHORTALL & HOARD.—In the year 1852, J. Mason

Parker, formerly of Boston, commenced the preparation of a new set of indexes to Chicago and Cook County real estate, upon the basis of the Rucker principle. Mr. Parker gathered about him gentlemen of skill in the work, and with a large force continued the same, first at his office, then at No. 86 Lake Street; afterward in the Metropolitan Block, until the completion of the books in the year 1856. Mr. Shortall, later of the firm of Shortall & Hoard, joined Mr. Parker in 1854.

Soon after the completion of the indexes, Mr. Parker sold the same to Thomas B. Bryan, of Chicago, who disposed of a half interest therein to John Borden, and subsequently re-purchased the same. During Mr. Bryan's ownership, the indexes were leased to William Wilmer Page, John G. Shortall and Henry H. Handy. This was in 1856, and these gentlemen, under the firm name of Page, Shortall & Co., began the business of making abstracts of title under these indexes. The interest of Mr. Page and Mr. Handy was subsequently assigned to Mr. Shortall, who, thereafter, until 1858, conducted the business under his own name. In the year 1858, Mr. Bryan sold the indexes to Henry Greenebaum, who associated with him Mr. Raphael Guthmann, and continued the business under the firm name of Greenebaum & Guthmann, Mr. Shortall continuing in charge of the office.

In March, 1861, at the breaking out of the War, Mr. Shortall purchased the indexes from Mr. Greenebaum, and the firm of Greenebaum & Guthmann ceased. The business was then conducted by Mr. Shortall, under the firm name of John G. Shortall & Co., comprised, first, of Mr. Shortall and John N. Staples, and afterward, on the ceasing of Mr. Staples's interest, of Mr. Shortall and Henry Fuller.

In 1864, a half interest in the indexes and property was purchased by Louis D. Hoard, formerly clerk of the circuit court and recorder of Cook County, and the firm name was changed to that of Shortall & Hoard, Mr. Fuller's remaining interest being purchased by Mr. Shortall.

HENRY FULLER, above mentioned, was a most accomplished gentleman, and admirably adapted to the management of the business office of the concern, having taken charge of it for many years, both under the firm of Shortall & Hoard and of Handy, Simmons & Co., of which latter he was a member. He was a fine musician, and a supporter of all musical efforts in those days. He was for many years organist of Trinity Church in this city. He died in Chicago, in the year 1873.

The firm of Shortall & Hoard continued the business up to the 1st of September, 1871, about a month before the great fire, at which time they selected from their force Mr. Handy, above mentioned, Francis Pasdeloup, Mr. Fuller and Frederic H. Wait, four thoroughly competent gentlemen, educated in the profession under abstract books should, at such a critical period, be resumed by Shortall & Hoard, with whom the public were familiar, and that they should continue the business, at least until it should be proven, as it soon was, that the private records, saved by the different firms and afterward joined under one common ownership, were a sufficient basis to establish and protect the titles of the county.

JOHN G. SHORTALL, eldest son of John Shortall, of Thurles, and Charlotte Towson, of Kilmore, County of Dublin, was born in the City of Dublin, September 20, 1838. When about six years of age, his family removed to America, to join an elder branch of the family, long before settled in New York. After the death of his parents, the young lad was employed by the late Horace Greeley; and about three of the most impressionable years of his life were passed in the editorial rooms of the New York Tribune, in daily contact with men who moulded public opinion in those days—Horace Greeley, Dana, Bayard Taylor, Ripley, Snow, Cleveland and others. In 1854, by the advice of Mr. Greeley (between whom and his young employe the most cordial and friendly relations existed, and continued to the end of his great, useful life), young Shortall, like thousands of ambitious, energetic lads, followed the star that guided so many westward, and, after a brief residence in Galena, during which he was engaged upon the survey, construction and completion of that section of the Illinois Central Railroad between Scales's Mound and Galena, returned to, and settled in Chicago. After a few months of employment upon the Chicago Tribune, the late J. Mason Parker, then engaged in the preparation of his real-estate abstracts, offered Mr. Shortall a very favorable position upon that work, which he accepted, and immediately entered upon the study of his profession with Mr. Parker. Upon the completion of these records, in 1856, Mr. Shortall, under a lease of the books, commenced the business of making abstracts, or examinations of title to real estate, which was then beginning to assume great importance, and was among the first of our conveyancers to reduce the details of that business to the perfect system it now is, whereby security in the transferring of real estate could be guaranteed. In 1871, the great fire swept over Chicago, and the almost invaluable work of twenty years, the real estate records alluded to (then of Shortall & Hoard), upon which their examinations of title were based—the abstract books—were imperiled with the property they had so long protected from other assaults. Mr. Shortall was alert to the danger from the beginning, and, with the assistance of gentlemen connected with his office, and other friends, succeeded in rescuing these records, and removing them to a place of safety. (The story of that rescue is graphically told in a volume, entitled History of the Great Fire, published in 1872.) In August, 1872, Mr. Shortall retired from the abstract business, and has since devoted his time and energies chiefly to matters affecting the best interests of the city, believing that a man's duty to his fellow-citizens does not end with his retirement from active mercantile pursuits. His public gratuitous services have been numerous and continuous for twenty-five years. The Philharmonic Society of Chicago called him to its directory in the old days of trial and struggle of musical effort; he served many years as president of the Beethoven Society; and he has been a constant and interested patron of the fine arts. He is a writer of intelligence and force, and his taste and ability have found frequent expression in the literary columns of our newspapers and periodicals. In politics, conscientious and thoroughly independent, the Municipal Reform Club, that did such valuable service in its day, and the Citizens' Association, attest in their records the value of his services, his judgment and his energy. Free from all political aspirations, his acts are not the cause of suspicion, and his bold denunciation of public wrong and wrong-doers, his fearless championing of right and justice and of what he believes to be for the public good, would dispel from the mind of the most skeptical any doubt as to his meaning. And in this readiness to defend a principle, this purer patriotism, one recognizes the hereditary traits that developed the soldier in his only brother, Pierce, who, in the beginning of our Civil War, shouldered his musket and marched to the front, lay in the Chickahominy swamp and in the trenches, with McClellan, before Richmond, was among the first over the breastworks at Atlanta under Davis, marched with Sherman to the sea, and finally, in the retreat before Hood's advance in North Carolina, in the last fight of the War, after nearly four years of active service, laid down his life in the performance of what he believed to be his duty. Mr. Shortall is entitled to the distinction of being a man of the world, in the best sense. Broad and liberal naturally, those traits have been developed and emphasized by much travel and observation, in this and other countries. He has made tours of Europe three times, and has "many friends in many lands." In his posi-their own instruction, and committed the business and care of the indexes and property to their charge, under a lease, and commended them to the confidence of the public.

The new firm (Handy, Pasdeloup & Co.) had a brief existence, for the fire of 1871 terminated its career. It was then deemed expedient that the control of the tion as president of the Illinois Humane Society, which he has held for ten years, and still holds, Mr. Shortall has earned the recognition and gratitude of the benevolent of our City and State. Fifteen years ago, when the Society was organized, it was a small and feeble, but earnest, group of enthusiasts, among which he stood and served; now it is probably one of the strongest and most virile forces of our social system, everywhere feared by the brutal and blessed by the suffering. Some four years ago, Mr. Shortall urged strongly the addition of the protection of children to that of animals, which was adopted, after a spirited debate, and now the Society stands in the foremost rank of the benevolent and unselfish organizations of the country. Mr. Shortall was last year (1884) elected president of the American Humane Association, organized, in 1877, at Cleveland, Ohio, upon a call made by him, as president of the Illinois Society, for a union of the humane forces of the country. He is also an honorary member of the Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Mr. Shortall was married, on September 5, 1861, to Mary Dunham, eldest daughter of John N. Staples, of Chicago, who died in August, 1880, after nineteen years of unselfish devotion to her husband, her home, her child and her neighbors, beloved by all who knew her. She left one surviving son, John Louis, born in 1865, now finishing his education in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Boston. Mr. Shortall was called upon by the Board of Education, in 1880, to act as one of the board of appraisers of the real property belonging to the school fund of Chicago, and was afterward selected by Mayor Harrison to represent the city in the adjustment of the leases of that estate. He was also selected, in 1885, by the Board of Education, to perform the same duty, a high compliment to his knowledge, his impartiality and his integrity. In religion, Mr. Shortall is an Episcopalian, and much attached to his sectarian inheritance. He has been a member of Trinity and Grace churches, in which latter, he is a pew-owner. Admiring Professor Swing, the advanced liberal and eloquent pulpit orator, he was one of the original guarantors and supporters of the movement that resulted in the establishment of the Central Church, and upon the services of which he is a constant attendant. In conclusion, it may be justly said that in religion, in politics, in civil and social life, Mr. Shortall is one of the best representative men in the city he has made his home; and in comprehensive intellect, business ability, keen judgment, and in the best social qualities, he is the peer of any citizen of the great City of Chicago.

LOUIS DE VILLERS HOARD was born in Antwerp, Jefferson Co., N. Y., on April 10, 1824, the son of Silvius and Nancy Mary (de Villers) Hoar. He received his early education at Ogdensburg, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., and at Brandon, Vt., and in the spring of 1836, came to Chicago with the family of the late Honorable Samuel Hoard, arriving here on May 20. He then went to the farm of Samuel Hoard at Wheeling, on the Desplaines River, and lived there for some years. In October, 1843, Mr. Hoard was appointed deputy clerk of the Circuit Court of Cook County; and, in 1845, was appointed deputy clerk of the Cook County Court of Common Pleas, when that court was created. Upon the adoption of the amended Constitution, in 1848, he was elected, in August of that year, by the voters of Cook County, clerk of the Circuit Court of Cook County for four years, from the first Monday in December following; and was re-elected in November, 1852, and served until the first Monday in December, 1856, having declined the nomination for a third term, on account of the ill-health of his family. To obviate the deleterious effects of this climate, Mr. Hoard then removed east with his family, and resided in the city of Ogdensburg, N. Y., until October, 1864, when he returned to Chicago, and purchased a one-half interest in the abstract books then belonging to John G. Shortall and Henry Fuller. Mr. Hoard entered this business as a member of the firm of Shortall & Hoard (see History of the Abstract Business), and continued therein until after the great fire of 1871. In September, 1875, he again left Chicago, and resided in New Haven, Conn., where he remained until the graduation of his youngest son from the Sheffield Scientific Department of Yale College in June, 1879, when Mr. Hoard again removed to Ogdensburg, N. Y., where he has since remained. He was married on March 4, 1849, to Miss Margarette Annette Clark-son, of Chicago. They have two children—Francis de Villers Hoard, M.D., who is a practicing physician in Ogdensburg, and Charles de Villers Hoard, who is now with the abstract firm of Handy & Co., of this city.

JONES & SELLERS.—In 1854, Fernando Jones returned to Chicago from Rock Island, Ill., and in company with John D. Brown, of the latter city, opened a real-estate office. In that year, Mr. Jones began and completed a set of abstract books. Mr. Brown withdrew a short time thereafter, and Robert W. Smith became a partner, the name and style of the firm being Fernando Jones & Co. In 1862, Alfred H. Sellers was a clerk for the firm, and in the same year Mr. Smith retired therefrom. In 1865, the company of Fernando Jones & Co. represented a mythical personage, but in 1866 it represented Alfred H. Sellers. In 1867, the firm name was changed to Jones & Sellers, and so remained till the fire of 1871. After the advent of Mr. Sellers into the firm, new energy was observable in the preparation for, and transaction of, business; and it is simple justice to concede that to the energy, perseverance and good judgment of Alfred H. Sellers the success of the firm of Jones & Sellers in a large measure was due.

FERNANDO JONES was born at Forestville, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., on May 26, 1820. His parents were William and Anna (Gregory) Jones, who removed to the city of Buffalo, in 1824. Then the son attended the public schools, one of the teachers being Millard Fillmore, afterward President, and was also a student at Fredonia Academy. In 1832, his father's attention was attracted to Chicago, and he came West; three years later the family removed to Chicago, Fernando arriving in the city on his fifteenth birthday. He then assisted his father in his stove and hardware business, located on South Water Street. During the years of 1835-36, when the Indian payments were being made, Mr. Jones had learned enough of the language of the Pottawatomie and Chippewa tribes to be able to converse intelligently, and he aided the traders in their sales of goods and acted as clerk for the disbursing agent. In the latter part of 1836, he was a clerk in the United States Land office, under James M. Stodge, the register. In 1837, he went to Canandaigua (N. Y.) Academy, where he passed two years, completing a thorough academic course. On arriving there he was assigned to the room vacated the term before by Stephen A. Douglas, who was then reading law in Canandaigua, and with whom our subject formed an acquaintance and friendship that lasted till the noted statesman's death. Upon the conclusion of his studies, Mr. Jones returned to Chicago, and then became connected with the real-estate business of his father, attending to the matters of record, titles, conveyances, etc., with which business he has since always been more or less identified. Mr. Jones was of a family of ten brothers and sisters, all of whom are dead, mostly of consumption, except K. K. Jones, who now resides in Quincy. Shortly after his return home from New York, his health began to fail, and he went South, where he spent some years, returning sound in health. He then went to Jackson, Mich., where he resided two years, during which time he was engaged in the newspaper business. He edited temperance, educational and farmers' magazines, published monthly, the printing of which was done by Storey & Cheney, the former member of that firm being Wilbur F. Storey, late of the Chicago Times, and a life-long friend of Mr. Jones. After leaving Jackson he came to Chicago, remaining but a short time, and then went to Rock Island, Ill., where he resided for some time, managing his large real-estate interests. About 1853, Mr. Jones disposed of his property in Rock Island, and returned to Chicago, to make this city his home. While in Rock Island he became acquainted with John D. Brown, and persuaded that gentleman to come to Chicago and engage in the preparation of a set of abstract books. In 1854, Mr. Jones, assisted by Mr. Brown, began and completed a set of abstract books, following the original Chicago system adopted by Mr. Kucker, which, with the improvements made by Mr. Jones and his successors, became the abstract system used in Chicago to-day. Within a brief time, Mr. Brown withdrew from the business, and Robert W. Smith became the company of Fernando Jones & Co. In 1862, Alfred H. Sellers, a relative of Mr. Brown, was a clerk for this firm, and Robert W. Smith having withdrawn from the firm in that year, Mr. Jones admitted Mr. Sellers to an interest of the profits of the business, in return for his valued services as a competent, trustworthy clerk. In 1866, Mr. Sellers purchased an interest in the business itself, and the following year the firm name appeared as Jones & Sellers. This firm so continued until after the fire, when the consolidation of the abstract firms of the city occurred, and a lease of the business was made to Handy, Simmons & Co. After this disposition of his business, Mr. Jones practically retired from active work, although his long acquaintance with, and knowledge of, records and titles of Cook County real estate, makes his evidence much sought for in the courts, and he is constantly called upon to assist in straightening out suits under the Burnt-record act and in other real-estate litigation. Mr. Jones has been identified with many large real-estate interests and public enterprises, and during his long residence in this city has made an enviable reputation for public spirit and commercial integrity. Mr. Jones was elected Alderman from the Third Ward, in 1859, and served through the administrations of Mayors John C. Haines and

L. D. Hoards.

John Wentworth. He was supervisor of South Town during the War period; and when Camp Douglas was ordered established, it was under his civil authority, and his advice and direction in the arrangement of the same, were sought and heeded by the military officers. Mr. Jones has also served as trustee of the Jacksonville Hospital for the Insane, Chicago Orphan Asylum, and for a long time has been, and still is, a trustee of the Chicago University. Of late years he has resided in Europe with his family, mainly for the purpose of educating his two children. They resided one year each in Venice, Rome and Mentone, and three years at Florence, Italy, and the last two years in Paris. During his residence abroad he traveled extensively over the European continent, and wrote a series of entertaining descriptive letters to the Chicago Times. Mr. Jones was married, July 7, 1853, to Jane Grahame, of Henry County, Ill. She is well known as an energetic advocate of Female Suffrage, and of enlarging the scope of women's employment, professionally and otherwise, and providing facilities for her superior education, being long connected with the management of the Chicago Woman's Medical College and other kindred enterprises. The course of instruction in the Chicago University was successfully opened to women mainly by her efforts, seconded by other ladies, in co-operation with her husband and other liberal and public-spirited members of the board of trustees and faculty of the University. They have two children—Genevieve, the wife of George R. Grant, a lawyer of this city, and William Grahame Jones, seventeen years of age, who is still pursuing his studies.

ALFRED H. SELLERS was born in 1838, the son of Charles Sellers. In 1841, he came West with his parents to Cincinnati, and ten years later, also moved with his family to near Nashville, Tenn. He was afterward in Georgia for three years, and at Marietta, Ohio, for a similar period. In 1855, he came to Illinois, his father locating near Shawneetown, where he was engaged in the iron and coal interests. In 1856, young Sellers came to Chicago, and became employed in the abstract business, and in 1858, began and completed a set of abstract books of the land in McHenry County, engaging in the business at Woodstock. He shortly afterward became connected in the abstract business with Fernando Jones, with whom he was employed as a clerk till 1866, when he became partner of the firm of Jones & Sellers. On the first call for troops, at the outbreak of the War, Mr. Sellers entered the 36th Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and was made first lieutenant of Co. "H," resigning that position in October, 1862. He afterward took an active part in drilling the 95th Illinois Infantry Volunteers.

CHASE BROS. & CO.—In 1852, S. B. Chase and James H. Rees entered into partnership, each owning a one-half interest in the business, for the purpose of continuing the examination of titles, which had been inaugurated by Mr. Rees. In 1853, Mr. Rees and Samuel H. Kerfoot formed a partnership as real-estate brokers, the former continuing his individual interest in the abstract business. The office of James H. Rees & Co., where they made their examinations of title, was in the Kingsbury, now Ashland, Block. In 1860, John King bought Mr. Rees's interest, shortly afterward selling it to S. B. and Horace G. Chase, who became sole owners of the books, which remained in their possession until after the great fire of 1871—the locations of their office being on Randolph Street, opposite the Court House; then on the west side of LaSalle Street, just north of the alley between Randolph and Lake streets; and, at the time of the fire of 1871, in the Metropolitan Block, just south of the same alley. Mr. Chase remarks:

"That at the time of the fire there were in the employ of the three abstract firms, about one hundred men; and that it is a simple matter of justice, in any commentary upon the abstract business, that James H. Rees should be prominently mentioned as one of the originators of the abstract system in the West, and as the man who, more than any other individual, communicated to the methods of the abstract offices his own characteristics of accuracy, system and high integrity."

SAMUEL BLANCHARD CHASE was born at Hopkinton, N. H., October 1, 1823. He entered Dartmouth College at the age of fourteen and graduated in 1844. After leaving college, he studied law with Lewis Smith, at Fisherville, N. H., and, on being admitted to the Bar, became his partner. After a couple of years spent in vainly trying to build up a profitable practice among the law-abiding citizens of his native State, he gave up the effort and came to Chicago in 1850. He intended to enter upon the practice of his profession here, but finding a good opening with James H. Rees in the abstract business, he formed a partnership with him in 1852, in which occupation he continued for about twenty-one years. This partnership continued until 1860, when Mr. Rees sold out his interest to John E. King, who shortly afterward disposed of his interest to Mr. Chase and his brother, Horace G. Chase. With the growth of the city the business largely increased and became profitable, when the great fire of October, 1871, destroyed nearly the whole of the records of the county then in existence. In the meantime, two other sets of abstract books had been made, and after the fire it was found necessary to combine the fragments of all three sets into one. So the three firms became associated, and, after one year, leased their books to Handy, Simmons & Co., and Mr. Chase closed his active connection with the business. Mr. Chase is now over sixty-one years old, yet full of activity and energy, and thoroughly able to compete with much younger men in the struggle for life, if necessity required or he was so disposed. He has never taken any very active interest in political matters, and has neither sought nor accepted office, nor served the State in any official capacity, except as a member, for four years, of the State Board of Equalization, for which position his familiarity with titles and real-estate values seemed particularly to fit him. Mr. Chase was married, on June 1, 1853, to Miss Emma E. Thompson, of Amherst, Mass., by whom he has six children,—Mary E., Emma S. L., Horace B., Ruth G., Charles A., and Samuel T. It is a tradition in his family that all the New England Chases are of English origin, and descended from three brothers who came to this country among the Pilgrims.

CHARLES CARROLL CHASE is one of the oldest officials connected with the Board of Education of the City of Chicago, having been school agent for the past twenty years, and having, as chief clerk of the city comptroller, done the clerical work appertaining to the school fund for the three years previous. Mr. Chase was born in Hopkinton, Merrimack Co., N. H., September 18, 1829. He was educated in the district school and academy of that place, and came to Chicago in 1851, arriving here on May 12. The following day he commenced work as assistant to the city clerk, continuing in that office until September, 1852, when he resigned the position to accept an appointment of principal bookkeeper in the Exchange Bank of H. A. Tucker & Co. There he remained until August of the next year, relinquishing the position by reason of ill-health, and, in April, 1854, commenced a long term of service as secretary and treasurer of the Chicago Hide & Leather Company, of which W. S. Gurnee was president and principal owner. He resigned this position to accept that of chief clerk in the city comptroller's office July 1, 1862, where he remained until February 1, 1870. In February, 1865, an act of the Legislature was approved, providing for the appointment of the school agent, biennially, by the Board of Education, and on the sixteenth day of May following Mr. Chase was elected to the position, and has been honored with a re-election ever since. In 1870, he became one of the firm of Chase Bros., engaged in the abstract business and continued with said firm until its dissolution in 1872. From 1875 to 1881, he was a member of the firm of Chase & Adams in the business of real estate and loans, and since 1881 has continued that business alone. Mr. Chase is a member of the Masonic fraternity in good standing, being connected with Oriental Lodge No. 33, A.F. & A.M.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

MUSIC.

OPERA IN CHICAGO.—The first season of opera in this city was brief.* It lasted but one hour. The opera of "La Sonnambula" had just begun, when Rice's Theater, where the performance was being given, burned to the ground.

The second season† was opened at Rice's New Theater on the 27th of October, 1853, and lasted one week. This season was the first in Italian. The company included Madame De Vries, Madame Sidenbourg, and Signors Pozzolini, Taffenelli, Barrattini, Calletti, and Candi; Signor L'Arditi, director. "Lucia di Lammermoor" was the opening opera.

Third Season.—At McVicker's Theater, September 27, 1853; one week. English. Soprano, Rosalie Durand; alto, Miss King; tenor, Miss Georgia Hodson, who sustained all the tenor roles; bass, Frederick Lyster.

Fourth Season.—At McVicker's Theater, February 22, 1859; sixteen nights. Italian. Sopranos, Cora Wilhorst, Parodi, and Colson; alto, Amalia Patti; tenors, Brignoli and Squires; baritone, Amodio; bass, Junea.

Fifth Season.—At North's Theater, April 11, 1859; two weeks. English. Soprano, Anna Miller; alto, Miss Payne; tenor, Brookhouse Bowler; bass, Aynesley Cook.

Sixth Season.—At Metropolitan Hall, July 16, 1859. Same troupe as above.

Seventh Season.—At Metropolitan Hall, December 5, 1859; one week. Italian. Sopranos, Parodi and Hattie Brown; alto, Caroline Alaimo; tenor, Sbeiglia; bass, Barili. At McVicker's Theater, December 5, 1859; two weeks. English. Soprano, Lucy Escott; alto, Annie Kemp; tenor, Miranda; bass, Swan.

Eighth Season.—At McVicker's Theater, June 15, 1863; three weeks. Italian. Sopranos, Lorini and Cordier; alto, Morensi; tenors, Brignoli and Macaferri; baritone, Amodio (the younger); bass, Susini. (NOTE.—The Holman Opera Troupe gave four performances of "The Bohemian Girl" at Wood's Museum, beginning November 26, 1863. Names of singers not mentioned in any newspaper.)

Ninth Season.—At McVicker's Theater, February 1, 1864; two weeks. Italian, under the direction of Manrice Grau. Sopranos, Vera Lorini and Castri; alto, Morensi; tenors, Steffani and Tamaro; baritone, Morelli; bass, Coletti.

Tenth Season.—At McVicker's Theater, May 9, 1864; two weeks (twelve nights). Italian. Sopranos, Cordier, Castri, and Loeni; alto, Morensi; tenors, Steffani and Tamaro; baritones, Amodio (the younger) and Moretti; bassos, Formes and Coletti.

Eleventh Season.—At McVicker's Theater, July 6, 1864; two nights. Italian. Prima donna, Adelaide Phillips; tenor, Brignoli; baritone, Mancusi; bass, Susini.

Twelfth Season.—At McVicker's, January 2, 1865, the Leonard Grover Geruian Opera Company began a brilliant season, which lasted three weeks. The vocalists were Bertha Johanssen, Marie Frederici, Sophie Dzimba, Theodore Habelmann, Isadore Lehman, Karl Formes, and Edouard Haimer.

Thirteenth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, April 20, 1865; four weeks. Italian. Sopranos, Zucchi and Kellogg; altos, Morensi and Ortolani; tenors, Massimiliani and Lotto; baritone, Bellini; bass, Susini.

Fourteenth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, June 5, 1865; two weeks. Italian. By the same troupe as above, with addition of Mazzoleni to the tenors.

Fifteenth Season.—At the Academy of Music, September 25, 1865; three weeks. English. Soprano, Rosa Cooke; alto, Zeldia Harrison; tenor, Castle; baritones, Campbell and Seguin; bass, White.

Sixteenth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, November 8, 1865; three weeks. Italian. Sopranos, Gazzaniga, Guidi, Boschetti and Murio Celli; altos, Oigini and Cash Pollini; tenors, Musiani, Anastasi and Lotti; baritones, Brandini and Orlandinu; bassos, Milleri, Pollini and Coletti.

Seventeenth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, December 18, 1865; two weeks. German. Sopranos, Rotter and Johanssen; altos, Dzimba and DeGebele; tenors, Habelmann and Tamaro; bassos, Hermanns and Weinlich.

* See page 49, Vol. 1.

† The compiler is indebted to George P. Upton for important data used in this chapter.

Eighteenth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, January 16, 1866; one week. Italian. Troupe same as that of the sixteenth season.

Nineteenth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, May 3, 1866; one week. Italian. Sopranos, Ghioni and Canissa; alto, Amalia Patti Strakosch; tenors, Massimiliani and Errani; baritone, Marra; bass, Susini.

Twentieth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, December 24, 1866; three weeks. Italian. Troupe same as above, with addition of Ifrre to tenors. Italian opera was sung by the Max Maretzek company, Clara Louise Kellogg, Minnie Hauck, Mme. Poch, Mazzolini, and others, May 7, 1867, one week.

Twenty-first Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, May 20, 1867; one week. Italian. Soprano, Parepa-Rosa and Canissa; alto, Amalia Patti Strakosch; tenors, Brignoli and Massimiliani; baritone, Ferranti; bass, Susini.

Twenty-second Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, October 28, 1868; two weeks. Italian. Sopranos, Lagrange and McCulloch; alto, Adelaide Phillips; tenors, Brignoli and Massimiliani; baritone, Marta; bass, Coletti.

Twenty-third Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, February 3, 1868; one week. Italian and German. Sopranos, Kapp Young, Gazzaniga and Minnie Hauck; alto, Natalie Testa; tenors, Pancani, Baragli, Testa and Habelmann; baritone, Bellini; bassos, Antonucci and Hermanns.

Twenty-fourth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, March 9, 1868; two weeks. English. Soprano, Caroline Richings; alto, Zeldia Seguin; tenor, William Castle; baritone, S. C. Campbell; bass, Peakes.

Twenty-fifth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, April 13, 1868; three weeks. French, Opera bouffe. Soprano, Lambele; tenors, Decre and Goujon; bass, Chamounin. Mlle. Morlacchi, leader of the ballet which introduced the can-can.

Twenty-sixth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, September 14, 1868; two weeks. French. Sopranos, Tostee and Lambele; tenors, Decre and Leduc; bassos, Lagriffoul and Duchesne.

Twenty-seventh Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, September 28, 1868; three weeks. Italian and German. Sopranos, Agatha States, Rotter, McCulloch and Durand; altos, Cellini and Appel; tenors, Brignoli, Habelmann and Macaferri; baritones, Orlandini and Wilhelm Formes; bassos, Hermanns and Antonucci.

Twenty-eighth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, November 9, 1868; three weeks. English. With the troupe of the twenty-fourth season.

Twenty-ninth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, January 15, 1869; two nights. English. With the same troupe as before.

Thirtieth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, January 25, 1869; one week. English, Opera bouffe. Soprano, Sallie Holman; alto, Julia Holman; tenor, Chatterton; bassos, Crane and Kenny.

Thirty-first Season.—At McVicker's Theater, February 8, 1869; three weeks. English, Opera bouffe. Sopranos, Sophie and Irene Worrell; alto, Jennie Worrell; tenor, Villa; bassos, Morton and Lingard.

Thirty-second Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, March 15, 1869; two weeks. English, Opera bouffe. Soprano, Susan Galton; alto, Blanche Galton; tenor, Whiffen; bass, Dunn.

Thirty-third Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, April 26, 1869; two weeks. French. Sopranos, Rose Bell and Desclauxas; alto, Guerretti; tenor, Carrier; bassos, Beckers and Burgoin.

Thirty-fourth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, two nights, July 7 and 8, 1869. Italian. Soprano, Miss Durand; alto, Valletta; tenor, Brignoli; baritone, Petrelli; bass, Locatelli.

Thirty-fifth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, October 25, 1869; four weeks. English. Sopranos, Parepa-Rosa and Rose Hersee; alto, Mrs. Seguin; tenors, Castle and Nordblom; baritones, Lawrence and Hall; bass, Campbell.

Thirty-sixth Season.—At McVicker's Theater, January 3, 1870; three weeks. English. Sopranos, Mrs. Bernard and Miss Emma Howson; alto, Anna Kemp Bowler; tenors, Brookhouse Bowler and Pierre Bernard; baritone, Henry Drayton; bass, H. C. Peakes.

Thirty-seventh Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, April 18, 1870; one week. English. Sopranos, Parepa-Rosa and Rose Hersee; alto, Mrs. Seguin; tenors, Castle and Nordblom; baritones, Lawrence and Hall; bass, Campbell. They gave Marriage of Figaro, Oberon, Martha, Rose of Castile, Bohemian Girl (2) and Il Trovatore.

Thirty-eighth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, October 3, 1870; two weeks. English. Soprano, Mrs. Richings-Bernard; alto, Mrs. Seguin; tenors, Lawrence and Castle; bass, Campbell. They gave Il Trovatore, Maritana, Crown Diamonds, Fra Diavolo, The Huguenots (2), Bohemian Girl, Martha, Faust, La Traviata, Marriage of Figaro, Lurline, Postillion of Longjumeau and Rose of Castile.

Thirty-ninth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, February 6, 1871; two weeks. German. Sopranos, Louise Litchmay and Rosetti; supported by Carl and Wilhelm Formes, Habelmann, Steinecke, Lehman, Bertha Roemer, Laura Hoffner, and others. They gave Don Giovanni, Faust, Fidelio, Stradella, Jewess (2), Merry Wives of Windsor, Huguenots, Trovatore, William Tell (2) and Tannhäuser.

Fortieth Season.—At Crosby's Opera House, March 13, 1871; two weeks. English. The Richings-Bernard Company, as already given, in Huguenots, Bohemian Girl (2), Der Freischütz, Martha (2), Oberon, Maritana, Il Trovatore, Fidelio, Marriage of Figaro, acts of Somnambula and Dinorah, Fra Diavolo and Bristoni's opera of Kip Van Winkle.

MUSICAL SOCIETIES.—The musical growth of Chicago dates from about 1858. Before that time some seed had been sown, and something had been done to promote musical culture, but the efforts were spasmodic and not well sustained. In 1850, Julius Dyhrenfurth organized an orchestra, under the title of The Philharmonic Society, and gave a number of concerts, but he was not well supported by the public. In 1851, he gave another series of concerts, but the financial results were not encouraging. In 1852, a new philharmonic society was organized, and, on February 11, 1853, was duly incorporated by the Legislature of Illinois. This organization lasted until 1856, but the concerts it gave proved but indifferently successful. During the same period, the Germans had several societies: "The Manner Gesang Verein," organized in 1850; "The German Musical Union," organized in 1854, and others; but these did not seek the patronage of the general public.

About 1857, Henry Ahner, an accomplished musician, organized the first full orchestra, and, although he labored conscientiously, his toil was not rewarded. Julius Unger succeeded him in 1858, and gave concerts, assisted by Mrs. Emma Bostwick.

In 1858, The Musical Union for vocal and instrumental music was organized, with J. S. Platt, president; J. G. Lombard, vice-president; C. M. Cady, conductor; A. L. Coe, librarian; and D. A. Kimbark, secretary and treasurer. During its career, down to 1866, it gave an annual series of concerts, which met with measurable success. It produced the "Creation," "Messiah," "Elijah," and other oratorios, in addition to miscellaneous choral concerts and operettas. After its demise as the Musical Union, Hans Balatka re-organized the principal members of it under the name of the Oratorio Society, and gave oratorio concerts in the winters of 1868, 1869 and 1870. After the great fire, it was re-organized again, in the West Division, when, on the eve of a concert, in the winter of 1871, a fire consumed the building in which it had quarters, and from this blow it never recovered. The Mendelssohn Society, under the conductorship of A. W. Dahn, also dated its organization from 1858, and gave annual concerts down to 1866.

In October, 1860, Hans Balatka revived and re-organized the Philharmonic Society. Its officers and members were among the most prominent society and musical circles of the city. E. I. Tinkham was president the first three years, and he was succeeded by John V. LeMoyné, who was president for four years. Thomas B. Bryan, Julius Dyhrenfurth, John G. Short-all, Charles Larrabee, William H. Bradley, J. M. W. Jones, Otto Matz, and others, were all connected with it as officers and, did much to promote its success. As a society, it was entirely devoted to instrumental music, but at its concerts it gave vocal numbers by singers engaged for the occasion. In its first season, embracing the winter of 1860-61, it gave seven concerts, which were overwhelmingly successful. Madame Fabbrì, one of the most accomplished Italian artists of that period, sang at two of the concerts. The sixth concert was given on the night of the 13th of April, 1861, the day after the bombardment of Fort Sumter. The city was under great excitement, caused by the news from the South and the imminence of civil war. Nevertheless, a great audience assembled at Bryan Hall, at the concert. Near the close, Mr. Balatka took the audience by surprise by playing the Star Spangled Banner, which was not on the programme. As the first well-known notes of the National anthem struck on the ears, they touched a chord in each heart which all other music in the world would have failed to reach. The vast audience rose simultaneously, and the cheers for the time drowned the music. Again the orchestra repeated it, and a flag was unfurled from the stage. The tremendous ovation that followed clearly showed how deep was the patriotic and National feeling. At the next concert, given on May 14, following, Mrs. Cassie Matteson sang, flag in hand, the same song, amidst the greatest enthusiasm and applause.

For seven seasons, until the winter of 1867-68, the Society gave concerts to overflowing audiences of the élite and fashion of Chicago. During that time it gave the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth symphonies of Beethoven, the third of Mozart, the fifth and seventh of Gade, the B flat of Schumann, the Triumphal of Ulrich, and selections from all the great composers. All this excited an influence on the musical culture of the people, which could hardly be over-estimated. But fashions in music change. Crosby's Opera House was now built, and Italian opera was presented, from time to time, with a completeness never before known in Chicago. The desire to hear orchestral music died away, and the last concert of the "Philharmonic" was given in Metropolitan Hall, on the 3d of April, 1868, to but a meagre audience. The Society had lasted out its usefulness, and quietly gave up the ghost.

Such were the more prominent musical organizations from 1858 to 1868. It was not until some time after the great fire that home talent again received the encouragement it deserved, and new societies, under new names, were again organized.

COMPOSERS AND MUSICIANS.

JULIUS DYHRENFURTH.—Chicago owes a large portion of its musical culture to the influence and example of those, who, though not professional musicians, have possessed an extensive knowledge of music, with more than the ordinary amateur's enthusiasm for its cultivation. Among these, the name of Julius Dyhrenfurth will always have great prominence. Identified as he was with extensive financial and educational interests, he yet found the time to encourage musical talent and to promote the success of some of Chicago's earliest musical societies. He was born at Breslau, Prussia, on the 9th of April, 1811. After receiving a liberal education, he engaged in commercial pursuits, and became manager of his firm's trade with England, Spain and Algeria. In 1837, he made an extensive tour of the United States, and was so deeply impressed with the great commercial resources and prospects of the country, that he determined to make it his future home. In 1843, he married, in London, Miss Caroline Thomson, an accomplished English lady, and three years afterward removed to the United States, selecting Chicago as his future home. After a brief and unsatisfactory experience as a farmer, he settled back into financial and commercial pursuits, entering the banking house of R. K. Swift, where he remained for several years. The system of keeping banking accounts at that time was very defective, needlessly laborious, and, at the best, extremely inaccurate. He devised an accurate system of bookkeeping, never since improved upon, and which remains in use by all the banks of the city to this day. The financial crash of 1857 carried with it the fortune of Mr. Dyhrenfurth, and left him, with thousands of others, financially stranded; but with characteristic energy he cast about for a new opening in business, and, believing in his skill as an educator, resolved to open a commercial school. In 1858, he opened his school in Waukegan, but a year or two later removed it to Chicago, where he conducted it, with constantly increasing success for many years. He greatly enlarged his original plan, after a year or two's experience, and conducted a high school, a young ladies' seminary, and a commercial college; and his ability made them all of the highest character. Among other things, he perfected a new system of bookkeeping, which he published in 1869. It is a system so intelligible and admirable, that it has come into extensive use, not only in Chicago, but throughout the country. He suffered heavily by the great fire of 1871, which destroyed both his home and the buildings occupied by his school. During all the years he has resided in Chicago, he has given largely of his time and means to promote a general taste for music. One of his first efforts was to induce a number of musicians to leave the East, and settle in this city. With these he organized an orchestra, under his personal direction, giving concerts every winter for a number of years. These concerts were among the most fashionable entertainments of Chicago in early days. At the time of this writing (April, 1885), Mr. Dyhrenfurth and his estimable wife, though advanced in years, are still surviving. Twelve children have been born to them, seven of whom, all sons, are still living. They are all gentlemen of high business character and repute. Four of them are members of the legal profession, and the remaining three are engaged in commercial pursuits. Mr.

Dyhrenfurth has always been a man of deep religious convictions, and is an earnest follower of Swedenborg. Without ostentation, he has lived the life of a sincere and earnest man, and he will be long remembered by those who have felt his influence, and among whom the best years of his life have been passed.

DR. FLORENCE ZIEGFELD.—Among the foremost of those who have devoted their lives to musical art in Chicago, and have contributed to the development of the highest standard of culture and taste in music, stands Dr. Florence Ziegfeld, the founder of the largest musical conservatory in the United States, one that rivals, in all its departments, the best and largest of Europe. Doctor Ziegfeld has won this high position through the possession of two very dissimilar qualities of mind, not often united in the same person. A born artist, with natural genius for teaching music, he has also the ready aptitude of the thorough business man. This enables him to do what so many artists and excellent teachers find it impossible to do. He can descend from the high regions of the Muses, and give his ideas the practical expression necessary to make genius useful to the working-day world. Florence Ziegfeld is the youngest son of Florence and Louise (Kirchhoff) Ziegfeld, and was born on the 10th of June, 1841, in the town of Jever, near the sea-coast, in the grand duchy of Oldenburg, Germany. His father, who was an official in the court of the Grand Duke, was passionately fond of music, and the same passion early developed itself in young Florence. When but six years of age, he took his first piano lesson, thus rivaling some of the greatest masters in the early development of his genius. Under the instruction of the best teachers of the day, he arrived at a wonderful proficiency, and at the age of ten years, played at both public and private concerts. His health becoming undermined through excessive study, at the age of fifteen he made his first voyage across the Atlantic, to visit a brother in New York City. He remained in the United States two years, and in 1858, returned to Germany to finish his musical education, intending, as soon as that should be completed, to make America his future home. In Germany he attended, for several years, the conservatory at Leipzig, where he had for his teachers, Moschelles, Richter, Plaidy, Wenzel, David, Pappertz, and others. There he graduated in 1863, with honor, and November, 1863, found him settled in Chicago, where he at once entered upon a successful career as teacher of music. In 1865, he married Miss Rosalie Dehez, a native of France, but settled in this country from childhood, a niece of John B. Gerard, one of the most prominent of the early citizens of Chicago. Four children have blessed a very happy and congenial marriage. In 1867, under the name of the Chicago Academy of Music, he laid the foundation of the Musical College of Chicago. In 1868, he gave his first concert of pupils in Crosby's Opera House. In the fall of 1869, he gave another successful entertainment at Farwell Hall, at which he brought out Gade's great cantata of the Erl King's Daughter, with a large chorus and orchestra. From year to year the rapid growth of the conservatory demanded larger and larger quarters, until in the fall of 1871 it occupied the entire building, No. 253 Wabash Avenue. There it was destroyed in the October fire; but before snow fell that year, he had his school again open at No. 800 Wabash Avenue. Shortly after this, in conjunction with George F. Root, he established his school as the Chicago Musical College. Mr. Root was the first president, and Dr. Ziegfeld was the musical director. When the managers of the great Boston Peace Jubilee were looking for attractions that should make their concerts successful, they eagerly sought his influence in their behalf. Accordingly he undertook a mission to Europe, and procured the most famous list of attractions that ever appeared at one time in the United States. From London, he got the celebrated Godfrey's band, from Paris, the French Imperial band; from Berlin, the Grenadier gade band; and he brought back with him Strauss and Abt, and Peschka-Lentner, Franz Bendel, and Kaiser Wilhelm's Cornet Quartette. A greater array of talent were never before assembled together in the world. It is not too much to say that the success of the Jubilee was largely due to the untiring efforts of Dr. Ziegfeld. The success of the Chicago Musical College has been very great, and from year to year it has maintained a flourishing condition. In 1875, Mr. Root severed his connection with it, and since that time Dr. Ziegfeld has been president and director. He has a corps of twenty-three teachers in all the varied branches of the art, and is now adding (1885) a department of dramatic art. Since settling in Chicago, Dr. Ziegfeld has visited Europe eleven times, thus making twenty-three times he has crossed the Atlantic since he came as a boy of fifteen in 1856. Dr. Ziegfeld is still in the prime of life, and much as he has done to advance musical art in the West, he is ever studying to advance it still further. He has conferred an incalculable benefit upon his adopted country, and has the reward of knowing that his labors, his talents and his genius are impressed upon the culture and progress of a great people.

HANS BALATKA is a native of Moravia, Austria, and was born in a village called Hohnungsthal, on the 5th of March, 1827. In his eighteenth year he entered the University of Olmutz, where he commenced the study of law, continuing with ardor the study of music. During his residence at the University he became conductor of a musical society formed by the students, and held the position for two years, until his connection with the University ceased. He then removed to Vienna, where he became the pupil of Proch, the celebrated composer and conductor of the Imperial opera. But it was the day of revolution; Hungary under the leadership of Kossuth sought to throw off the Austrian domination, and many of the young men of the Austrian capital sympathized with the revolutionists. Young Balatka was among these, and united himself with an organization called the Academic Legion, a corps of six or seven thousand youths, the most of whom were students and artists. There was no active part taken in hostility to the government, but the government regarded the Legion with determined aversion, and a close surveillance was kept of the more active members. The revolution terminating unfortunately, Mr. Balatka determined to emigrate to America, and embarked for New York, where he arrived in June, 1849. After a short time spent in New York, Mr. Balatka saw a good prospect open before him in Milwaukee. He accordingly settled in that growing city, and at once entered upon a successful career. Early in 1850, he organized the Milwaukee Musical Society, which gave regular concerts the same year, and the next year, under his direction, gave the oratorio of "The Creation." In 1860, he was invited to come to Chicago, to conduct a performance of Mozart's "Requiem," which was to be performed by Chicago musicians. The performance proved a great success, and Mr. Balatka was induced to take up his residence in Chicago. The Philharmonic Society was organized, with him as musical director, and other societies also called upon him for assistance. In 1860, he organized the Oratorio Society, which likewise proved a great favorite with the public. This Society, with Parepa-Rosa and, subsequently, with Nilsson, gave the oratorios of "The Creation," "Messiah," and "Elijah," with great success. In 1870, he introduced, for the first time in Chicago, amateur opera on a large scale. He has also been the chosen leader of the Germania Mannerchor, the Sengerbund, and the Sengerbund Society of Chicago. In addition to his work in Chicago, he has been elected eight successive times to conduct the musical festivals of the North American Sengerbund at Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Detroit, and other places.

GEORGE F. ROOT is a native of Berkshire County, Massachusetts, where he was born in the year 1820. The son of a farmer, and brought up on a farm, he early learned the love of nature, and held communion with her visible forms. The passion for music was born in him, and all his surroundings tended to foster it, and at the age of eighteen he had made a considerable advance in the knowledge of music and become proficient on several musical instruments. With these acquirements he left home to seek his fortunes in Boston. There he speedily found employment as an instructor in the musical academy of A. N. Johnson, with whom, a few years later, he formed a partnership. After five years of agreeable and lucrative association with Mr. Johnson, Mr. Root was induced to go to New York, and there his success as a teacher of music was marked and rapid. Prosperity attended him. He married Miss Mary Olive Woodman, of Boston, and settled down to the steady pursuit of his profession. In 1850, he went to Europe for the purpose of pursuing his musical studies, and, after about a year of diligent application, he returned home. His thoughts had long been turned to the subject of song composing, and he now tried his poems. "Hazel Dell" was his first attempt, and so dubious was it of success, that he took the nom de plume of "George Wurzel,"—wurz being a German equivalent for root. It is needless to say the song proved a great success. The "Flower Queen," a cantata, followed—one of the most effective compositions of the kind ever written—and it was performed in nearly every city and town in the United States. He came at this time associated with Dr. Lowell Mason and William B. Bradbury, in the composition and publication of Church music, and his labors on these works showed him to be not unworthy to rank with those great masters in this department of the art. In 1860, he removed to Chicago, and became a partner in the musical publishing house of Root & Cady, the senior member of the firm being his brother, Ebenezer Towner Root. During these years he composed many songs—"Rosalie, the Prairie Flower," "The Old Folks are Gone," "A Hundred Years Ago," and others, as well as many Sunday-school airs, such as "Shining Shore." During the War of the Rebellion he wrote a number of War songs, which were very popular, such as the "Battle Cry of Freedom," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," and "Marching Through Georgia," full of stirring patriotism and tender feeling, which are all too well known to require extended comment. Mr. Root is also the author of several musical works, which have had an extensive circulation. Among these are "Sabbath Bell," "Diapason," "Silver Lute," "Bugle Call," and "Coronet." His most comprehensive work is the "Musical Curriculum," which contains an original method for the piano, voice and harmony. This work fully illustrates the genius of the author, and will be his best title to remembrance, when the songs he has written have passed into echoes only. His last work is the "Choir and Congregation," which has had an unparalleled circulation, and is considered the best of the many works of that kind written by this great composer. The great fire of 1871 swept away the splendid business of Root & Cady, and the result was a dissolution. A few years subsequently, a new firm was organized and afterward incorporated, under the name of "The Root & Sons' Music Co." Mr. Root is not now connected with the corporation, but is passing his declining years in the enjoyment of well merited comfort and repose.

HENRY CLAY WORK.—In 1861, a journeyman printer, in failing health and "out of sorts with fortune," entered the room of George F. Root in Chicago, and laid upon his desk the music and words of a War song. It was called "Brave Boys are They." Surprised that such a forlorn-looking person should have the thought of music in his soul, Mr. Root proceeded to examine the manuscript, and was still more surprised to find in it music that could stir the popular heart. Before the young man left the room, he was engaged to write exclusively for Messrs. Root & Cady for a term of five years. The engagement proved lucrative and pleasant to both parties. The forlorn printer was Henry C. Work. Henry C. Work was born in Connecticut October 1, 1832. His father was Alanson Work who, in 1841, while residing in Missouri, was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment in the penitentiary for the crime of assisting fugitive slaves to escape. He served three years of the penalty, and then received a pardon. When Henry was an infant, his father settled in Illinois, near Quincy, but some years afterward,—and after his experience in the Missouri State Penitentiary,—he returned again to Connecticut. At the age of fourteen Henry was apprenticed to learn the art of printing. His natural tastes led him to cultivate the art of music, and when he was still young he tried his hand at song writing. The result was a song entitled, "We are coming, Sister Mary," which he sent to E. F. Christy, then in the height of his fame as a negro minstrel. The song was accepted, and the writer received twenty-five dollars for it, remuneration sufficient to encourage him to further efforts. But nothing seemed to succeed afterward, and the ambitious song writer ceased for several years to woo the Muses. It was not until the year 1861, under the inspiration of the War, that he again made another venture of his genius. The result was "Brave Boys are They," and this was followed by as remarkable a series of War songs as were ever published: "Kingdom Coming," "Wake Nicodemus," "Grafted into the Army," "Babylon is fallen," "Song of a Thousand Years," "God save the Nation" and "Marching through Georgia," all of which had immense sales and were published by Root & Cady. Mr. Work also published a song called "Lost on the Lady Elgin," but it was too mournful to be popular. Many of the War songs had stirring melodies, and were sung wherever there was a patriotic household or the army marched. "Let me make the ballads of a nation, and I care not who makes the laws," said Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, two hundred years ago; and it may justly now be said, that the patriotic songs of Root, Work, and others, did more to arouse the popular heart and fix the determination of the people, during the darkest days of the War, than all the acts of Congress or proclamations of those in authority. In 1865, Mr. Work, now a successful song writer, made an extensive tour of Europe, and after his return settled in Vineland, N. J., where he bought a large quantity of land and attempted to establish a fruit farm. Like a vast number of other Vineland experiments, it proved an unprofitable investment, and swallowed up all his fortune. Before this time he had written the song "Come home, Father," which had a great popularity. It was not until 1876 that he commenced song writing again in New York, with C. M. Cady, formerly of the firm of Root & Cady, as his publisher. Many songs were now written and published by him, the greater part of which had extensive sales. The most popular of these was "My Grandfather's Clock." The entire list of his songs will reach nearly one hundred. His melodies are pleasing and natural, and never fail to stir the feelings. The source of his power over the heart lies in his simplicity of language and his freedom from extravagance in thought and melody. Many of his airs have almost become National, and will be sung as long as memories of the Civil War endure. For a few years prior to his death Mr. Work resided at Hartford, Conn., and died there June 8, 1884.

DUDLEY BUCK, one of the most gifted musicians this country has ever produced, was a resident of Chicago for several years prior to the great fire. During that period he was the organist of St. James' Episcopal Church. He was born at Hartford, Connecticut, on the 10th of March, 1839. His father, Dudley Buck, was a merchant, and his mother, the daughter of Judge Adams, a well known lawyer of his time. When but twelve years of age, young Dudley learned the notes of music by himself, obtained the first rudiments of thorough bass, and learned to play the flute. So rapidly did he gain a knowledge of music and the mastery of certain instruments, that the prejudices of his parents finally gave way, and, after obtaining what instruction he could in his native city, he was sent to Europe in the year 1855. In the great Conservatory of Leipzig, under Hauptmann and Richter, Keitz, Plaidy and Moschelles, he gained his first insight as to what music really was. There he remained a year and a half, enjoying private lessons as well as the Conservatory instruction. Another year and a half he passed at Dresden, where he took lessons on the organ from the celebrated Johann Schneider. After three years in Germany, he lived one year in Paris, where he passed his time in intercourse with the best musical circles. On his return home, he resided for a period in Hartford, and there he commenced to publish his first pieces. Within the next four years his parents both died, and he then turned westward and settled in Chicago, as his future home; and it was while he lived here that he began to be famous. He had a pleasant home on the North Side, which the fire of October 9, 1871, swept away. This decided him to return East, and he has since resided in Boston, New York and Brooklyn. While in Boston, he, at the solicitation of Theodore Thomas, removed to New York, and there conducted the Garden concerts, with Thomas, for one season. His compositions have been numerous and varied. He was selected to compose a Centennial Cantata—Wagner furnishing the Centennial March—for the celebration at Philadelphia, in 1876. Attendants at the Thomas concerts will remember how often that great conductor selects the compositions of Buck for his orchestra, showing that his works will bear comparison with the great composers of the day.

PHILIP PAUL BLISS.—This celebrated evangelist, the author of "Hold the Fort," "The Armor Bearer," and other well known and popular gospel hymns, commenced his career as a song writer, in Chicago, about the year 1864. He was born in Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, on July 9, 1838, the son of a farmer, and brought up to farm life and farm work. He had but meager opportunities for schooling, but his quickness of mind and industry, enabled him, after several seasons of attending school in winter, to fit himself for teaching the ordinary country district school when he was eighteen years of age. He early displayed a strong passion for music, and despite the limited opportunities at his command acquired knowledge enough of the art by the time he was twenty-one, to become also a singing teacher. During June, 1859, he married Miss Lucy J. Young, the daughter of a farmer. In the winter of 1860, he formally took up the business of professional music teacher, but in several succeeding years still worked on his father-in-law's farm in the summer. In 1864, his first song was published by Root & Cady, and from that time until his tragical death, in 1876, he continued song composition. From 1865, until he commenced his career as an evangelist, in 1873, he was engaged in musical composition, and in holding musical conventions throughout the Northwest. In 1873, at the instance and urgent request of Mr. Moody, he associated himself with Major D. W. Whittle as an evangelist, meeting with great and satisfactory success in that vocation. On December 28, 1876, after a short visit at his old home in Pennsylvania, he and his wife started to return to Chicago. If they could have come straight through they would have been safe, but by the breaking down of an engine their train lost three hours. Other delays were made, and they were thus necessitated to take the train from Buffalo that was wrecked at Ashtabula bridge. They left Buffalo, at two o'clock, Friday afternoon, December 29, and in running over the bridge at Ashtabula, about eight o'clock the same evening, the train broke through and was hurled seventy-five feet into the valley below. The cars took fire, and many passengers who were not mangled were burned to death. Mr. Bliss and his wife were in a forward car, and were never seen again alive. Nothing but blackened and charred remains of the many victims of the disaster were found. None could be recognized, nor was anything ever found, in any way possible of identification with Mr. and Mrs. Bliss. He was in his thirty-eighth year.

FRANK LUMBARD.—The subject of this sketch was born in New York, and came to Chicago in his young days, some time about the year 1852. From that period until his death in 1882, he was well known throughout the West for his genial good nature and his willingness to go anywhere to take part in political meetings as the "campaign singer." His power over his audiences lay in his rich, strong voice; and his songs, which were interspersed between the speeches, often had a greater effect on the voters than the addresses of the most distinguished speakers. Contrary to the general run of public singers, Frank Lumbard had strong political opinions on the Republican side, and his efforts were always on behalf of this great party. His musical tastes led him to the front among the pioneers of music in Chicago, and he was always a most active member of committees appointed to organize musical conventions or concerts. Many of the leading singers owe their introduction to Chicago to his untiring energy. He filled the position of the first teacher of music in the city schools, and laid the foundations of this branch of education on such a firm basis, that the best possible results have been the consequence. Many of the older citizens still cherish memories of the thorough training he gave them. At this time, too, he was in great demand to organize church choirs, many of which, under his charge, attained great proficiency. His first introduction to the public, as a campaign singer, was in 1857, when he sang for "Long John" Wentworth, who was running for mayor. As a slight acknowledgement of his services, he was made deputy sheriff under John L. Wilson. During the campaign of 1860, he sang nearly every day and night for "old Abe," as he fondly called the great President. His War songs were more potent in winning recruits than the offers of sergeants or the speeches of patriots; hence, he was ever in demand for this purpose. In 1863, during the siege of Vicksburg, he accompanied the Sanitary Commission on its errand of mercy, and he cheered the hearts of the soldiers by singing "Ole Shady," "John Brown's Body" and other patriotic songs. His charming voice gave to many of his auditors more real pleasure than the canned meats and bottled dainties brought by the Commission. His great heart and musical voice won him universal favor, and his negro and War songs were ever in demand at public meetings, in the concert room and the private parlor. For years he was known as "Ole Shady," in compliment to his touching song bearing this title, and although visitors to Chicago might return home without having seen half the sights, but seldom was one to be found who had not seen and conversed with "Ole Shady," if it were possible. The following are the words of this, his favorite, song:

OLE SHADY.

"Oh! yah; yah! darkees, laugh wid me!
For de white folks says ole Shady's free.
So don't you see dat de Jubilee
Is a comin', comin'—Hail mighty day!

Chorus—

"Den away, away, for I can't wait any longer;
Hooray, hooray, I'm going home!
Den away, away, for I can't wait any longer;
Hooray, hooray, I'm going home!

"Oh, Mass' got scared and so did his lady;
Dis chile breaks for ole Uncle Aby,
Open de gates, for here's ole Shady
A comin', comin'—Hail mighty day!

Chorus—

"Good-by, Mass' Jeff, good-by, Misses Stephens,
'Scuse dis niggar for takin' his leavin';
'Spect pretty soon you'll hear Uncle Abram's
Comin', comin'—Hail mighty day!

Chorus—

"Good-by, hard work, wid never any pay;
I'se a gwine up North where de good folks say
Dat white wheat bread and a dollar a day
Are comin', comin'—Hail mighty day!

Chorus—

"Oh, I've got a wife and I've got a baby
Livin' up yonder in Lower Canada;
Won't dey laugh when dey see ole Shady
A comin', comin'—Hail mighty day!

Chorus—

After the excitement of the War was over, Frank Lumbard ceased to be sought after as much as formerly, and he gradually sank into poverty and neglect, until the telegrams of December 10, 1882, carried the news of his death over the length and breadth of the land. The following is taken from the New York Graphic, of December 11: "Chicago, Dec. 10.—Frank Lumbard, for thirty years known throughout the West as a singer, died last night of starvation, his stomach refusing food, leaving his wife and daughter penniless." "Every one's friend but his own" is the crumb of cold comfort offered as an epitaph over his memory. The funeral services took place in Plymouth Church, where his remains were surrounded by masses of flowers, tokens of his innocent and kindly life. He was buried at Graceland Cemetery, on January 16, 1883. What could be done by his musical friends for his wife and daughter was done by the performance of the "Pirates of Penzance," by the Chicago Church Choir. The singer's voice is hushed, but the pleasure of listening to his songs lingers in the ears of those whom he delighted, and as his songs are sung, the gentle and sorrowful "Poor Frank Lumbard" is an almost involuntary tribute to his memory.

Other composers of the period, who achieved something more than mere local notoriety, were J. A. Butterfield, H. R. Palmer, J. P. Webster, Frank Howard, F. W. Root, and Silas G. Pratt, more extended notices of whom will appear in our third volume.

A popular singer of the time, also, was Louis A.

Dochez. He was a Belgian by birth, and had led something of a wandering life. He had sung in European cathedrals, had been in the English East India Service, then an attaché to the Belgian legation in one of the South American states, and finally reached the United States, accredited to the Belgian legation at Washington. Throwing up this service, he came to Chicago about the year 1857, and soon after made his appearance in concert, under the cognomen of DePassio. He sang at nearly all the famous Philharmonic concerts.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENT MANUFACTURERS.

As an appendix to the musical history, are appended sketches of some whose enterprise and skill have done so much toward making our city an entrepot for musical supplies.

JULIUS BAUER & Co.—Prominent among the representative Chicagoans who have recently passed away is Julius Bauer, a man who made music his life-study. Mr. Bauer established his business in this city in 1857, and was among the most successful business men of his time. He was born in the city of Berlin, Prussia, July 20, 1831. At an early age he showed decided talent for music, and, while he was a mere lad, constructed a viola that plainly evinced his natural ability for such work. He worked in the piano factories of Berlin for a number of years, and his progress was so rapid that he was soon competent to perform any work in the way of manufacturing instruments. This naturally created a desire to embark in business for himself. When he was eighteen years of age, the great revolution of 1848-49 occurred, and toward its close Mr. Bauer left his native land for America and arrived in New York City. There he opened an establishment of his own. He was very successful, and, at the end of eight years, found his business so augmented that he decided to open a branch in Chicago. He accordingly left his brother, John R. Bauer, in charge of the New York house, and came to Chicago in December, 1857. He first worked in the Larmon Block, and, later, took a store-room in the Crosby Opera House. After a short time he consolidated the stores into one at the Opera House building. At this time he took into partnership his brother Herman, who died some years ago. In the fire of 1871, Mr. Bauer lost all his magnificent stock of goods, but shortly after the conflagration he was doing business in Robert Laird Collier's church, where he remained a year and a half. Upon the completion of the Palmer House, he removed into the corner store, which was one of the finest locations in the city. Upon the death of John R. Bauer, the New York business was closed and exclusive attention devoted to the house in this city. Thus is briefly narrated the business career of Julius Bauer, who, while living, enjoyed, to the fullest degree, the confidence and esteem of the people of Chicago. For some years before his death he had been suffering with asthma, and, a few days prior to his final illness he contracted a severe cold, from the effects of which he died on December 23, 1884. On October 22, 1864, he was married to Miss Anna Marie Mueller, of this city. The widow and three sons—Julius, Richard and William—survived him. Mr. Bauer was a member of Accordia Lodge, No. 277, A. F. & A. M. Upon his death his eldest son, Julius, who was born here September 1, 1864, assumed charge of the estate and business, and directs its affairs at the present time. Although a young man, Mr. Bauer shows the characteristics of his late father in his careful and conservative business dealings and his personal popularity. It is safe to assert that the house of Julius Bauer & Co. will lose none of its deserved prestige under the able and efficient management of its young proprietor.

W. W. KIMBALL COMPANY.—Chicago has long held a prominent position in the manufacture of organs, and can lay claim to having the largest organ manufactory, without a single exception, on the earth. This house is that of the W. W. Kimball Company. In the fall of 1857, W. W. Kimball came to Chicago, and when he reached this city, trade was in a state of depression. He commenced reating pianos, and, in 1858, was located on Lake Street near Dearborn, with a small stock of music. Notwithstanding the dull times, his business prospered, and, in 1859, he removed to the Larmon Block. He subsequently went to No. 142 Lake Street, where he remained until the opening of the Crosby Opera House, where the fire destroyed his stock. Shortly after the great fire, he re-opened the business, selling goods at his private residence, and using his barn for the warehouse. He afterward removed to the corner of Wabash Avenue and Thirteenth Street, where he remained until 1873. In that year, the large and handsome building which the Kimball Company now occupies, was completed, and Mr. Kimball removed thereto. In 1880, Mr. Kimball commenced the manufacture of organs, and, from the first, success was assured, his long experience giving him a perfect knowledge of the demands of purchasers. The factory is located at the corner of Twenty-sixth and Rockwell streets, and is the largest in the United States. The business of the house so increased, that W. W. Kimball, who had always been the master-hand of every department, found it necessary to secure the aid, and co-partnership of others, to whom he could intrust a portion of the management. On July 1, 1882, the W. W. Kimball Company was organized and incorporated. The officers elected were W. W. Kimball, president; Albert G. Cone, treasurer; and E. S. Conway, secretary and general superintendent of works. The two latter named gentlemen had for years been associated with Mr. Kimball, and had thoroughly mastered the details of the manufacture and sale of organs, so that their addition to the management proved most valuable. The business, the increase of which has been sure and gradual, covers not only the United States, but extends to England, Scotland, Australia, New Zealand, Mexico and Canada. In pianos they have always done a very large business, and have recently commenced the manufacture of that instrument. The explanation of the remarkable growth of this house is easily found in the personal characteristics of Mr. Kimball and his co-partners. Enterprising, energetic and prompt, with natural capabilities for their business, they have found an admirable outlet in the prosecution of a work in which they have no superiors.

William Wallace Kimball was born in Oxford County, Maine, on March 22, 1828. There he was brought up on the farm, and received his early education at the country school. When he had obtained all the instruction that this primitive educational institution was capable of imparting, he commenced doing schoolmaster's duty, and two winters of his young manhood were spent in the teacher's chair. Then he clerked for a year in a country store, receiving the small salary of eight dollars and thirty-three cents a month. At the age of twenty-one, he left the old home for Boston, where he remained for some time. He then, in the fall of 1857, came to this city. Mr. Kimball has grown up with Chicago, and was the first man to do a wholesale business in musical instruments here. It was he who inaugurated the installment plan, which has enabled so many families, without perceptible outlay, to purchase musical instruments. Mr. Kimball was married, June 22, 1865, to Miss Eva M. Cone, of Chicago.

E. S. Conway, secretary and general superintendent of the W. W. Kimball Company, was born in Ontario, Canada, March 21, 1850. When a boy, his parents removed to Pepin County, Wis., and some time later he went to Lake City, Minn. In 1860, he first became associated with the leading spirit of the house of which he is now a partner, and two years later Mr. Kimball appointed him agent for the State of Minnesota, for the sale of his pianos and organs. In 1872, he also represented the same house as agent for Wisconsin. Mr. Kimball recognized the value of Mr. Conway as a business man, and he called him to Chicago, in 1875, to take charge of his wholesale department. On July 1, 1882, Mr. Kimball formed a stock company, Mr. Conway obtained an interest in the business, and was made secretary of the corporation. He is also president and general superintendent of the Newport Lumber Company, of Arkansas, which concern was organized in August, 1881. Mr. Conway has resided at Oak Park since 1875, and, in April, 1882, he was elected a member of the board of trustees of the township in which he resides, and in April, 1883, he was made president of the same board.

A. REED & SONS.—In keeping with the progress of modern art, and especially in those branches of artistic mechanism which require rare and peculiar ingenuity and adoption, Chicago is not at all behind the older cities of the East. In this connection we can refer to the firm of A. Reed & Sons, manufacturers and dealers in pianos, as being typical representatives of that branch of industry. The house is one of the oldest in the West, having been established in 1842, by the founder, Alanson Reed, opening a music store at the corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets. That quarter of the city was the fashionable promenade and retail center of trade, and Mr. Reed did a very prosperous business. In 1862, his sons, Alanson H. and J. Warner Reed, were admitted into partnership, and the name and style of the firm has ever since been A. Reed & Sons. At the breaking out of the War, the firm had established branch houses at St. Louis, Mo., and Nashville, Tenn. The former store was in charge of Alanson H. Reed, and the Nashville branch was managed by Marvin Reed, a brother of the senior Reed, and who died in 1834. The store at Nashville was confiscated, and the firm closed up their business at St. Louis, the son, A. H. Reed, coming to Chicago, where he has since been located. In the great fire of 1871, Messrs. Reed & Sons suffered the same loss that thousands of others did, but instantly resumed their business by opening a store over a livery stable in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street, near Michigan Avenue. The firm had adopted the title of Reed's Temple of Music for their house, and in 1872, they erected a building in conformity with the above name, at the corner of Van Buren and Dearborn streets, which they occupied until 1878, when they removed to State Street. They were located in the Palmer House until 1880, and then changed to their place of business, No. 136 State Street. The house is in its forty-third year, and its business has constantly grown, until they now average sales of one hundred and fifty instruments per month. The life-long experience of the firm of A. Reed & Sons gives them an advantage of knowing just what is needed in their business.

Alanson Reed, the head of the firm, was born at Warren, Mass., November 13, 1814, and is to-day perhaps the oldest representative of the piano trade in the country. During his boyhood, he spent but three months inside of a school-room, being necessitated from early youth to make his own way. He was early apprenticed to a trade, and at the age of sixteen was a cabinet-maker. He then went to work in the factory of Chickering & Co., piano-makers at Boston, and thoroughly mastered everything connected with the manufacture of a piano. He remained with them until 1837, when he abandoned work at the bench, and commenced as a dealer in instruments. His first venture was one piano shipped to Columbus, Ohio, then a little village. At that time, the attention of Eastern men had just commenced to turn toward the Western country, but the advantages of transportation were such as did not invite much trade with the new Territory. When Mr. Reed shipped his piano to Columbus, he was obliged to send it to Boston, and from there by vessel to New Orleans, thence up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers to Portsmouth, Ohio, and from thence to Columbus by canal. The freight was $37 and the insurance $16. At such a cost, and with the small population of Columbus and the surrounding country, he found he was unable to build up a trade that would result in anything like pecuniary gain. He returned to Boston, and, in 1842, again tried his fortune in selling pianos. He first shipped two instruments to Utica, N. Y., one to Syracuse, one to Rochester, one to Batavia, two to Cleveland, Ohio, two to Sandusky, three to Detroit, Mich., and three to Chicago. No railroad had then been built west of Boston further than Albany, N. Y., and the freights by rail to Albany were entirely too high to admit of sending goods in that way. So they were shipped by water from Boston to New York, thence by steamer up to Albany, thence by canal to Buffalo, and then by vessel to Cleveland and Chicago. Mr. Reed followed the pianos, as they reached their destinations, and after much labor, succeeded in disposing of them all, until he reached Chicago. The town had a population then (1842) of about six thousand inhabitants. Mr. Reed offered for sale the three pianos he had shipped here, but he was unable to get a bid. Parties offered to exchange town lots for them, but he refused, little dreaming he would live to see the village grown to over half a million in population and the town lots he refused bring hundreds of thousands of dollars in price. He could not sell the pianos here, at any price, for cash, and he was obliged to re-ship them to Detroit. His next venture was the shipment of twenty pianos to Columbus, Ohio, where he located. The people, however, were intent on making their fortunes, and felt too poor to expend their surplus money in such expensive luxuries as pianos. The prices for such instruments, were, of course, far greater then than now, and all agricultural productions were very low, so the people had cause to refrain from purchasing anything more than actual necessities. It appeared so unlikely that sale could be found for pianos, that he was the object of much well-meant commiseration, the wife of a prominent State official remarking, "Poor man, he has come here to starve; he will never earn his salt." The remark was an incentive to Mr. Reed to stay; and stay he did, remaining there until he built up a business that extended all through Central Ohio. He afterward removed to Chicago, in order to obtain a larger field for his operations. Mr. Reed was married to Miss Hannah B. Reed, of Cambridge, Vt., on January 28, 1839. They had two sons, who are now partners in the firm of A. Reed & Sons. Mrs. Alanson Reed died in this city February 2, 1877.

Alanson H. Reed, of the firm of A. Reed & Sons, was born in Boston, Mass., March 1, 1841. His father removed to Columbus, Ohio, in the year 1842, and young Reed was there brought up and attended the public schools. At the age of eighteen, he was admitted into partnership with his father, who had established a music-house in Chicago. In 1856, the firm opened a branch house at St. Louis, and the subject of this sketch went there to take charge. In 1861, on the breaking out of the War, the firm closed up their business in that city, and he came to Chicago. Upon his arrival here, Mr. Reed entered the Union College of Law, with the intention of pursuing a course of study and ultimately entering the profession of law. He remained there two years, and then returned to the firm of A. Reed & Sons. Mr. Reed has been identified with the piano and organ trade since that time, and has seen the insignificant trade of a few thousands a year, grow to a volume of hundreds of thousands per annum. Mr. Reed was married to Miss Flora Evelyn Lancaster, of this city, on December 1, 1869. On this date, also, occurred the wedding of his brother to a sister of Miss Lancaster. Mr. Reed is a member of Apollo Commandery, K. T., and has always been a staunch Republican in politics.

J. Warner Reed, of the firm of A. Reed & Sons, second son of Alanson Reed, was born in Boston, June 1, 1842. Soon after, his father moved to Columbus, Ohio. At the age of twelve he spent considerable of his time, when out of school, in the piano rooms. At sixteen years of age his entire attention was devoted to this trade. At eighteen he went East, and served some time in the piano factories, going through each separate department, till he had a thorough practical knowledge of the trade which he was to follow. In 1862, he, with his brother Alanson H., was admitted into a co-partnership with his father, who had established himself in Chicago, years before, in the piano business. He traveled over the Northwest for many years, selling pianos, going into sections of the country far removed from railroads, having hauled pianos in wagons over a hundred miles. From the age of sixteen to the present time, Mr. Reed has been constantly engaged in the piano trade, and if experience be of any value, his should be rated at par, and advancing. On December 1, 1869, he married Miss Mary Virginia Lancaster, of this city, he and his brother marrying sisters, and at the same ceremony. He has three children—Eva Virginia, J. Warner, Jr., and Alanson L. Mrs. Reed died on December 13, 1876. Mr. Reed has always been a Republican in politics. He resides at Hinsdale, one of Chicago's suburbs, where he has a few acres to tone up his system.

LYON & HEALY.—An account of this extensive and leading house will be given in the ensuing volume, which will embrace the epoch during which the vast increase of their business occurred.

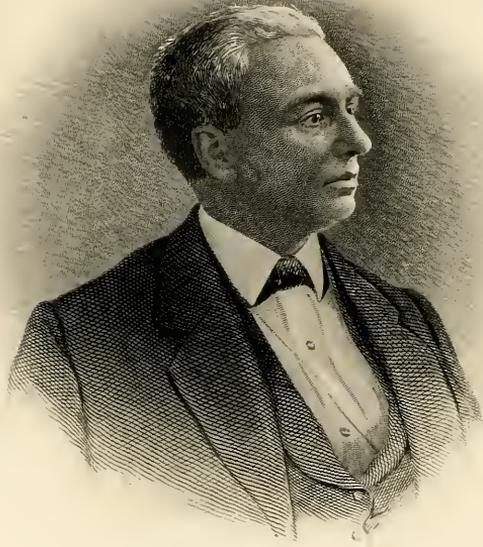

YOUNG AMERICA HOTEL AND RICE'S THEATER.

THE DRAMA.

RICE'S THEATER.—Until 1857, Rice's Theater was the attractive center of dramatic representation in Chicago. For ten years it had been the chief place of amusement in the city, and the popularity of Mr. and Mrs. Rice never waned for an instant. No man had done so much for the interest and amusement of the Chicago public as John B. Rice, and his constant increase in favor testified how deeply that public appreciated his labors. But in 1857, he and his wife determined to retire from the stage, and the theater passed under other management. It also encountered the competition of its new rival, just erected by J. H. Mc-

J. H. McVicker

Vicker, and its end was not long in coming. For several years it led a fitful and unpopular existence, until, in 1861, it became manifest to Mr. Rice that it could no longer maintain its place as a theater. He then had it torn down, and on its site erected a handsome business block.

JOHN BLAKE RICE, actor, theatrical manager, mayor, congressman, a man of broad heart and mind, able and determined, and cheerful through all adversities; was born in Easton, Talbot Co., Md., on May 28, 1809, when about twenty-one years of age made his debut as the Uncle, in "George Barnwell," appearing in the Boston Theater. Subsequently he went to the West Indies, where he joined a dramatic company which played in several of the leading cities. Mr. Rice rose so rapidly that his friends and admirers, a few years there-his prospects; but his was a spirit not to be even depressed by such a calamity, and it still remains in his wife's memory, as a pleasant recollection of his sturdy character, that upon the night of the fire, when she was well nigh crushed, he returned to his home, whistling cheerfully like a boy. He at once set about repairing his fortune, and a large brick building, completed in January, 1851, was the result. For a time after the opening of the new theater, in February, Mrs. Rice resumed her place upon the stage as leading lady. In October, 1857, Mr. Rice retired from theatrical pursuits, and, in 1861, erected a business block upon the site of his theater. He also purchased the property which afterward became the site of the Crosby Opera House, and in other real-estate transactions added to his competency. His character was above reproach; his influence for good, not only in his own profession but with all classes of people, had been great; he was warm-hearted, able, patriotic and popular; consequently, when the Union party of Chicago commenced to look around for a leader, they fixed upon John B. Rice and in April, 1865, he was almost unanimously elected to the mayoralty. Mr. and Mrs. Rice also gave their only son, William Henry, to their country's cause. He fell at Chickamauga on September 19, 1863, being at the time of his death captain of Co. "A," 89th Illinois Infantry. In 1867, Mr. Rice was again elected mayor, and in 1872 was elected to Congress from the first District of Illinois, but did not live to complete his term as congressman. He died in December, 1874, at a home he built in Norfolk, Va. He had been suffering for some time, but, believing a change of occupation and a prolonged rest at the conclusion of the session would restore him to health, he refused medical treatment. His case, however, became more alarming, and a removal to Norfolk was suggested; but he failed to rally, and his death occurred December 17, 1874. Mr. Rice left behind him, of his immediate relatives, his wife, still a resident of Chicago, and five daughters—Mrs. Kimball, widow of James Kimball, chief engineer in the navy; and Mesdames James W. Odell, William S. Smith, George L. Dunlap, and Orson Smith, all of Chicago.

McVICKER'S THEATER.—When McVicker's Theater was built in 1857, it marked one of the most important epochs in the history of the drama in Chicago. In fact, so great was the undertaking, it may also be said to denote a more comprehensive event, and indicate a grand step in the progress of dramatic art in the West.

James H. McVicker had long held a position of honor among the profession, and had achieved success as a manager. Personally, he was known as one of the most entertaining comedians on the American stage, but the enterprise planned by him was far beyond the limits of his previous efforts, and surpassed anything attempted by Western managers.

JAMES HUBERT McVICKER was born in the City of New York, on February 14, 1822. His parents, James and Nancy McVicker, were of Scotch-Irish ancestry. In 1822, when the son was born, his father died, leaving a widow and three children without provision for their future. James, therefore, had but few educational advantages, as he had to assist in the support of his mother. He became a printer's apprentice in 1832, and worked in mechanical capacities, at different places in New York, until October, 1837. He then entered as an apprentice in the office of the St. Louis Republican, and in 1840 became a journeyman. Dissatisfied, however, with the nature of his work, Mr. McVicker then determined to acquire scholastic knowledge, and, under the most trying circumstances, commenced his studies, and successfully prosecuted them, with that determined perseverance which has made his whole career successful. Mr. McVicker began his dramatic work in New Orleans, in 1840, commencing in the most subordinate capacities, and growing into favor by steady progress. He subsequently appeared at theaters in different parts of the country, and, during the latter part of April, 1848, arrived in Chicago. Rice's comedian was about leaving here, and the young actor was given an opportunity to test his ability to fill the place. On the evening of May 2, 1848, Mr. and Mrs. McVicker made their first appearance in this city—the former impersonating Mr. Smith, in the farce "My Neighbor's Wife," and the latter, Susan, in the comedy "Hue and Cry." In 1851, after the death of Dan Marble, he bought the right to use that eminent comedian's plays, and began a starring tour through the United States. In 1855, he went to England, where he was cordially received. For the first time in his life, he then experienced the comfortable sensations which are known only to the pecuniarily independent. In 1856, he undertook the management of the People's Theater at St. Louis, and met with good success. In March, 1857, he again came to Chicago, and established McVicker's Theater.

J. B. Rice

after, organized a stock company and built him a theater in Bangor, Maine. He and his company played in the principal cities of the country, and thus it was that he met Mary Ann Warren, the daughter of the celebrated William Warren, and sister of William Warren, Jr. Miss Warren was a young lady of rare accomplishments and ability as an actress, and, in December, 1837, was married, in Philadelphia, to the man of her choice. Mr. and Mrs. Rice acted together as stars, removing from New York to Buffalo in 1839, where the former managed the Buffalo and Albany museums. In the fall of 1846, Mr. Rice first came West for the purpose of selecting a location for a theater. At this time Milwaukee and Chicago were the competing points, and the former city threatened to carry the day, for he transformed an old military hall into a theater, organized a stock company in Shakesperian selections, put "Black Eyed Susan" on the stage, and gave that village its first real taste of drama. Subsequently he erected a brick building, on the site of the ill-fated Newhall House, which was burned, but not until Mr. Rice had determined, by a trial of about five years, that Milwaukee was not a paying town. In May, 1847, he had contracted for the erection of a frame building, on the south side of Randolph Street, afterward known as "Rice's Theater," and opened to the public on June 28. In the meantime, Mrs. Rice had come on from Buffalo, and appeared as a member of the company on the 12th of the next month. The burning of his theater in July, 1850, was a blow to

MC VICKER'S THEATER.

During 1857, the construction went on, until it was opened on November 5. When it is remembered that, up to that period, the best theater in Chicago* was, at its best, but a modest affair, involving an expenditure of but a few thousands, there is reason to believe the people were proud to see an edifice which cost $85,000, contributing to their delight in the perfect presentation of standard plays. It was the most substantial, convenient, safe and costly theater building then standing in the West, and had a seating capacity for two thousand five hundred persons. The acoustic properties were very good, and the stage had an area of eighty by fifty-three feet. The scenery and properties of the theater were the most extensive, and the finest in quality and finish, then seen at any Western place of amusement. The drop curtain was esteemed a work of art, and represented the cities of Rock Island and Davenport connected by the railroad bridge.

The theater was opened with a stock company consisting of David Hanchett, F. A. Munroe, F. S. Buxton, W. C. Forrester, A. J. Graver, J. B. Uhl, R. J. Allen, W. Gay, H. R. Jones, J. Taylor, W. S. Higgins, F. Harrington, Mr. Havelock, Mrs. E. DeClancey, Mrs. Lottie Hough, Mrs. Eliza Mann, Mrs. R. J. Allen, Mrs. W. C. Forrester, Mrs. W. Gay, Anna Martin, Alice Mann, Fanny Rich, Emma Logan, Nellie Gay, Jenny Seacore, Julia DeClancey, Mary Wright and J. Martin. The music was under the direction of Louis Chatel, and F. Harrington was assistant manager. Mr. McVicker took an active part in many of the plays presented during the early years, and retained occasional relations for a still longer period.

* See history of Rice's Theater, vol. 1.

The initial performance consisted of "The Honey-moon" and "Rough Diamond," in which pieces Mr. McVicker sustained the comedy element. The Tribune, of November 6, remarked:

"Last evening was an era in the dramatic history of our city. For the first time since Chicago took rank as one of the first cities of the Union, she has a theater worthy of her citizens who patronize the drama. Mr. McVicker has labored against a host of adverse circumstances. He has overcome a succession of obstacles which were sufficient to have overcome ordinary men, and last evening he opened to the public, if not one of the largest, certainly one of the finest and most comfortable theaters in the country. * * At an early hour the house was filled to its utmost capacity, the twenty-five hundred seats being occupied long before the curtain rose. The audience was in excellent humor, and evidently determined to be pleased. Indeed, it must have been hypercritical to have been otherwise. After the overture by the orchestra, Miss Alice Mann pronounced the opening address, written by Mr. B. F. Taylor,* of the Journal. She was warmly welcomed and heartily applauded. As Miss Mann retreated up the stage, the scene behind her was withdrawn, revealing the entire company. The 'Star Spangled Banner' was then sung, with fine effect, and rewarded with a perfect storm of applause. Obedient to the vociferous demand of the audience, Mr. McVicker came forward and delivered a happily-conceived address, which was frequently interrupted with rousing cheers."

It is recalled, as indicative of the city's transportation facilities at that time, that Parmelee's omnibuses were announced to leave McVicker's Theater, for Bull's Head and Cottage Grove, nightly, at the close of the performance.

James E. Murdoch appeared at McVicker's December 14, 1857, in the character of Hamlet, followed by a round of standard characters. Those who witnessed the finished action of this famous man bore the recollection ever afterward in mind. His perfect elocution, his precision of method, his virile intelligence, and his devotion to the artistic side of his profession, as well as the character of the man himself, won admiration from even those who looked with coldness on the drama. On January 4, 1858, Miss Charlotte Cushman began an engagement.

* This address is not obtainable, the contemporaneous newspapers having omitted to publish it, and no manuscript copy being extant.

Edwin Booth first appeared at McVicker's on May 31, 1858, in "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," followed by "Richelieu," "Brutus," and "Richard III." The press comments were flattering, and forecast the eminence which this great actor was destined to attain.

Miss Mary McVicker, then but a child, appeared at her father's theater August 22, 1859, in a play entitled "Gianetta," supported by Messrs. Tilton, Bradley, Myers, Leighton, Cline, Dillon and Uhl, and Mrs. Marble, Mrs. Hough and Miss Woodbury. The success of the young star was most pronounced. She won the hearts of her audiences, and gained warmest expressions of praise from the press. After this engagement Miss McVicker also played Little Nell, appearing in that character November 7, and soon became a reigning favorite with Chicago theater-goers.

MARY McVICKER BOOTH, or, as she was best known to her friends, Mary McVicker, was one of those striking characters occasionally met with in this world, whose career from her earliest childhood was redundant with exceeding promise. Her debut occurred in McVicker's Theater, on April 1, 1853. The incompetency of the child first cast to take the part of Marie in the "Sea of Ice," necessitated a substitution, which led to Mary's appearance, and which was a pronounced success, occurring when she was but ten years old. So marked and varied were her dramatic powers, that it was decided that she should appear as Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Such was her triumph in this character, that when an attraction was needed, Mary would appear in some new character, and her popularity did much to aid her father in those struggling days of the drama in Chicago from 1857 to 1861. Mrs. Thayer, of Chicago, wrote for Mary a temperance drama called "The Angel Child." Solomon A. Willson, a prominent lawyer, also wrote for her an original drama, entitled "Gianetta." Her fame, naturally, reached managers in other cities long before this, and her parents were persuaded to let her appear at the Boston Museum, where she at once became a favorite. She afterward appeared in several other large Eastern cities with marked success. Max Strakosch recognized her popularity and her vocal abilities, and requested that she might appear in a few concerts which he was giving in Chicago and vicinity, with Signor Brignoli, Gottschalk, the eminent pianist, and others. This was in April, 1862, and her success in concert was fully equal to that which she had already achieved on the dramatic stage. She afterward made a tour of the Southern cities, and gave a series of concerts with the noted tenor, Henry Squiers. Mary, however, had not reached her twelfth year, and her parents withdrew her entirely from public life, that she might acquire an education in keeping with her natural gifts. After the destruction of the Winter Garden Theater, in New York, in March, 1867, Mr. McVicker engaged Edwin Booth to fill an engagement at Chicago. Mary urgently solicited her parents that she might play Juliet to Mr. Booth's Romeo, and this request was urged by her with such pertinacity that, much against their wishes, they at last acceded. The first appearance of Mary McVicker since her childhood—now a woman, she was in her eighteenth year—in one of the most difficult characters known to the stage, was the means of crowding the theater to overflowing, and her appearance was greeted with a reception seldom accorded to any actor or actress even after fame has been won. The acting of Miss McVicker in a series of leading and exacting parts, without any special preparation, and with no stage experience except that acquired when she was a mere child, was naturally deemed a revelation of marvelous inherent ability. During the season of 1867-68, Mary, with her mother, accompanied Mr. Booth to New York, and appeared at his theatre, which was opened on February 4, 1869, with Romeo and Juliet. For twelve weeks the performance of this play was continued; other representations following which were equally as successful. The end of the season ended Mary's career as an actress, and, in June of the same year, at the summer residence of her parents, at Long Branch, her grandfather, Rev. B. F. Myers, united her in marriage to Edwin Booth, to whom the remainder of her life was entirely devoted. She bore him one child, which lived but a few hours. In 1880, Mary's health failed. The care of a house, devotion to her husband, and her unremitting attention to his daughter (Edwina) by his first wife—a child eight years old at the time of Mary's marriage to Mr. Booth—had so worn upon her frail and nervous system that a trip to Europe was undertaken on June 30, 1880. Anxiety and the fatigues of the journey were too much for Mrs. Booth's enervated constitution, and she became seriously ill. Her mother sailed for England in March, 1881, and her father followed during the ensuing month, and found her sick beyond hope of recovery. They deemed, however, that there was a possibility of prolonging her life by means of a sea voyage, and the whole party sailed for New York on June 18, 1881. She died in New York on November 13, 1881, aged thirty-three years. Funeral services were held in that city, Rev. Robert Collyer officiating. The remains were brought to Chicago, and interred in her father's burial lot at Rosehill, after appropriate and impressive services at St. Paul's Universalist Church, conducted by Dr. W. H. Ryder and Professor David Swing.

Adah Isaacs Menken* was the first "star" to appear in 1860, at this house, beginning her engagement January 2. Jane Coombs was introduced to Chicago on February 27, in "Jane Shore," "The Hunchback," and other plays.

The first notable event in 1861, was the arrival of E. A. Sothern. James E. Murdoch began a season on March 25, and Caroline Richings and her father, Peter Richings, appeared on May 15, in the drama, "Miriam, the Daughter of the State."

During the intervals between the appearance of the "stars," McVicker relied upon his stock company, for in those days the system now known as "combination" was unthought of. John Dillon was added to the comedy portion of the company; and when popular interest flagged, Mr. McVicker himself imparted vitality to the plays. The Webb sisters were engaged, from the beginning of the year, as dancers and protean artists. Ada and Emma Webb were successful stars in this country and in Europe, and after a most creditable career, they married and retired from the stage, which they had adorned with their pure characters and marked abilities.

J. Wilkes Booth assumed the role of Richard III, at McVicker's, January 20, 1862, on the occasion of his first appearance before a Chicago audience. The fame of his father, whose genius the son in no small degree inherited; the extraordinary ability displayed by the young actor; and the awful tragedy of his death, command for him a place in the history of the drama—a place which the obloquy occasioned by his moral turpitude can not deprive him. The engagement was one of the most brilliant played up to that date in the city.

An amusing burlesque called "Mazeppa, or the Untamed Rocking Horse," in which Samuel Myers impersonated the former half of the title, began March 27, and achieved a decided run. It was local in the substance of its humor, and is still recalled as a very laughable affair. L. M. Gottschalk, the famous pianist, assisted by Carlotta Patti, George Simpson and Signor Morino, gave two concerts at McVicker's April 17 and 18, 1862.

In June, 1862, J. Wilkes Booth played a second engagement at McVicker's, and was received by the public with flattering cordiality. At this time a charity fair was being held at one of the halls in this city. Booth attended, and was asked for his autograph by a young lady who was present. Booth declared that he regarded his signature as of no value, and disliked to bestow on his fair petitioner a worthless thing. But the lady assured him she could sell all he could write for twenty-five cents each, and he yielded to the temptation. Many of his autographs were put in circulation that night, and have since become objects of value to curiosity hunters.

* This celebrated actress obtained a divorce from John C. Heenan, "The Penicilia Boy," in March, 1862, in the Circuit Court at Woodstock, McHenry Co., Ill. The marriage had been persistently denied by the defendant, but was established in the divorce proceedings by indisputable evidence, and, good cause being proven, a divorce was decreed.

William Warren, the famous comedian, whose first acquaintance with Chicago dates from the remarkable season of 1839, under Jefferson's management, returned to receive the hearty welcome of old-time friends on July 13, 1863.

In September came J. H. Hackett, whose Falstaff will ever remain one of the firmest traditions of the American stage. In that character he stood unsurpassed, delighting all who saw him, as well by the humor of his conception as by his observance of art.

Daniel E. Bandmann, the German tragedian, first appeared in Chicago, at this theater, on November 30, 1863. The opening play was an English translation of Brachvogel's tragedy "Narcisse," founded on the story of Pompador's life in the court of Louis XV, and was given for the first time in this city. The edition differs from the version used by that eminent German, Ludwig Barnay, in its tragic element, as in this Narcisse slays his faithless wife. The press condemned the play, but warmly approved the actor, and the engagement was one approximating unto popular success.

In May, 1864, Mr. McVicker made his brother-in-law, Mr. Samuel Myers, stage manager, and gave him an interest in the business of the theater. On June 20, Matilda Heron gave "Camille," and on the 27th of that month brought out her dramatization of "The Scarlet Letter," for the first time on any stage. Despite the thrilling interest of the story, as told by Hawthorne, this play was not a success, although the role of Hester Prynne was admirably sustained. There was a vital lack of dramatic strength in this version, as in the one given some years later by Mrs. Lander. Neither succeeded.

William Warren commenced a series of comedy parts July 11, 1864, reviving interest in the choicest of the lighter dramas. As was customary in those days, a fancy dance was given between plays, every night, and the reigning favorite at that time was Mlle. Augusta.

Miss Lotta Crabtree was introduced to Chicago audiences August 1, 1864, by J. E. McDonough, and scored a remarkable hit in "The Seven Sisters." The first week's performances were witnessed by over twelve thousand persons. A season of three weeks was given.

Lawrence P. Barrett was first announced in Chicago October 10, 1864, on which occasion he gave Wallack's drama "Rosedale."

Olive Logan presented her own play, "Felon's Daughter," February 6, 1865, making her debut as an actress here on that date. The press spoke well of her personal appearance, but was not cordial in its comments on her histrionic ability. She remained two weeks, playing "The Hunchback," "Ingomar," "Lady of Lyons," and "The Stranger."

The assassination of President Lincoln, April 14, 1865, produced the most profound sorrow among the members of the dramatic profession, because of the fact that, in addition to the common grief of all men, they were forced to bear a peculiar phase of the National woe. The deed was done by one whose name was once eminent among rising actors. In consideration of this misfortune to the profession, and with an intent to promptly demonstrate their abhorrence of the act, the companies then playing at McVicker's and Wood's assembled at the parlors of the Sherman House, Monday, April 17, to take appropriate action expressive of their feelings. F. F. Mackay called the meeting to order, and F. a'Becket was chosen to preside. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the assembled company:

Whereas, The Supreme Power, in disposing of the events of our Nation, has been pleased to take from us, by violent death, our beloved and noble President, Abraham Lincoln; and,

Whereas, The fatal tragedy which terminated the earthly career of this great and good man transpired within the temple of the drama; and,

Whereas, The dark and bloody deed which has bereft a family of its father and protector, a people of their tried and trusted friend, the Nation of a just and humane leader, was perpetrated by one who was formerly a member of the dramatic profession; Therefore,

Resolved, That we, the members of the dramatic profession of Chicago, while recognizing the omniscience and bowing to the will of God in all things, can not but deeply feel and sincerely lament, in common with all our countrymen, this irreparable loss to our country; and we take this occasion, as a body, acting unanimously, to express our detestation and abhorrence of him who, by this cowardly and infamous assassination, has spread the sombre pall of sorrow over our land, so recently rejoicing over the achievements of the Illustrious Dead, to whom henceforth our country's history will accord a niche beside the immortal Washington.

Resolved, That the dramatic profession of Chicago, desirous of expressing their sincere and respectful sympathy with the bereaved family of the deceased, and of showing their love and veneration for the philanthropist, statesman, and martyr whom they mourn, would respectfully request the managers of theaters in this city to close their houses until the funeral services are performed, that no inharmonious demonstrations may disturb the impressiveness of this great and solemn occasion.

J. H. McVicker spoke feelingly, and declared that the resolutions expressed his sentiments, both for the character of the deed and his sympathy for those in affliction. J. Z. Little, A. D. Bradley, and other gentlemen also spoke upon the theme. It was resolved to wear badges of mourning for thirty days, and to close the several houses until the following Thursday.

The great event of the summer of 1865, was the engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, who, supported by Miss Chapman, Mr. Cathcart, Mr. Everett and the stock company of McVicker's, gave a season of six nights, from June 26, 1865. The repertory consisted of "Henry VIII," "Merchant of Venice," "Louis XI," "Hamlet" and "The Jealous Wife." Celeste made her first Chicago appearance November 8, in "The Woman in Red."

That eminent English tragedian Charles Dillon, made his first appearance in Chicago, at McVicker's, April 2, 1866. His introductory performance was in Virginie.

On the 5th of July "The Black Crook" was first produced in Chicago, at McVicker's, by C. M. Barras, under the personal supervision of J. E. McDonough. The piece attained an interrupted run of fifty-six nights, and called out renewed protests from one element of society and unparalleled patronage from all. This was the birth of the modern spectacular drama in Chicago.

Joseph Jefferson appeared as Rip Van Winkle on November 4, 1867.

Mrs. Scott Siddons appeared on January 25, 1869, for the first time in Chicago, and was kindly received by the press, and patronized by the public because of her famous name. Her success was not as pronounced as her friends had hoped it would be. Mrs. D. P. Bowers, supported by J. C. McCullom, first claimed the favor of a Chicago audience February 15, in Falconer's play called "Snare."

The season of 1869-70 opened August 23, 1869, with Joseph Wheelock and Mrs. Cowell at the head of the company. Edwin Adams, who had, meanwhile, achieved fame in the character of Enoch Arden, by a run of fifty nights in New York, first played that drama here August 30. He was hailed by immense houses.

The coincidence of three theaters running the same play is noted here. McVicker's, Crosby's and Wood's put on "Formosa," to large business during the summer of 1869.

Joseph K. Emmet first appeared in Chicago January 24, 1870, and made a decided "hit" in "Fritz."

Frank Mayo's first appearance in Chicago, as a star, was on March 14, in "Hamlet," "Richelieu," "Ingomar," "The Robbers" and "Macbeth."

John S. Clarke dates his arrival on the Chicago stage from August 22, 1870, at which time he gained great favor in "Toodles," "A Widow Hunt" and "The Militia Major."

Fannie Jausaschek, supported by Frederick Robinson, make her first appearance in English drama in Chicago at McVicker's Theater on February 6, 1871. The repertory consisted of "Deborah," "Fazio," "Mary Stuart" and "Macbeth." The success of this engagement was commensurate with the exalted genius of this gifted woman. Charles Fechter gave his initial performance before a Chicago audience February 27, 1871. Mr. Fechter was supported by Carlotta Leclercq, and enacted "Hamlet," "Don Caesar de Bazan," "Ruy Blas," and "The Lady of Lyons." He remained one week. Joseph Murphy, in "Help," made his first bid for popular applause in this city March 13, 1871.

The growing importance of Chicago as a commercial center increased the dramatic possibilities of the city, and afforded rare promise of success to those who were far-sighted enough to desecry the measure of public patronage. Mr. McVicker had seen the venturesome undertaking of 1857 become a substantial evidence of his sagacity, and, emboldened by that test of his power to discern the signs of the times, he determined to practically rebuild his theater. It was consequently altered so that nothing but the walls of the old theater remained, the remodeling having cost over $90,000. The opening took place August 29. The play selected for this occasion was "Extremes," a drama first given in Chicago, at Rice's Theater, in 1855, by Peter Richings, whose daughter Caroline (Mrs. Richings-Bernard of later years) took the part of Widow Crosby, and Mr. McVicker that of Higgins, a politician. The stock company was so large that a double cast was given almost entire to this comedy, and alternated night about during its run. On the opening night of his own house, Mr. McVicker assumed the role of Mark Mayberry, and was welcomed with enthusiasm by an audience which appreciated not merely the excellence of his acting, but also his enterprise as a manager.

C. Bronzon Howard's comedy, entitled "Saratoga," was produced September 11, 1871, and met with a reception which foretold the future prosperity of the author. It held the boards until the 30th of that month, and was then withdrawn to make room for Boucicault's play "Elfie," in which the stock company appeared. This drama was running at the time of the great fire, October 9.

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE.—The history of this famous temple of art is one without a parallel in the West. Its enormous cost, its elegance of design, its vicissitudes as a financial investment, its brief existence, and its devotion to grand operatic and dramatic uses, combine to furnish data for a sketch differing in nature from that of any other theater in Chicago or the West. Conceived by one who was unknown to the profession, so far as practical experience and education are concerned, the venture necessarily resulted in pecuniary disaster; for Mr. Crosby's ideas were based upon exalted theories, rather than upon a rational understanding of the demands of the place and time. Constructed during a period of extreme inflation of values, and elaborated with recklessness and lavish disregard of business principles, it courted ruin for the projector, and precipitated him into a gulf of embarrassment which more cautious men might have avoided.

URANUS H. CROSBY, the originator of the Opera House, was born in the town of Brewster, Barnstable Co. (Cape Cod), Mass., in 1830. He removed to Chicago when about twenty years of age, and was engaged in a distillery, on the North Branch, owned by a relative. This business he pursued with success, and the War period found him still interested in the production of spirits. When the Government imposed a tax upon liquors, those who were advised of the intention prior to its accomplishment, and were able to invest in such commodities, realized enormous fortunes by the augmentation in prices. Mr. Crosby's familiarity with the conditions of the trade, enabled him to take advantage of this opportunity, and by judicious management he experienced large benefits in a financial way. The enlargement of his resources gave wider scope to Mr. Crosby's more refined tastes, and added impetus to his projects for the display of a commendable ambition. It was his desire to foster a love of the higher ideals in art, in music, and in the drama. The purpose was a noble one, and had it been developed with a careful regard of inexorable laws, or had circumstances been kinder in their dealings with him, Mr. Crosby might to-day be rated among the prosperous men of Chicago. Be the causes what they may, calamity hovered over the undertaking from its inception, and settled forever on the ruins of the edifice in the fire of 1871. So far as this sketch has to deal with Mr. Crosby, all is told that need be said concerning his dealings with the drama here. His sojourn amid the profession was brief, brilliant and calamitous to himself, although his labors bore rich fruits in the general scheme of dramatic advancement in Chicago.

Actuated by a praiseworthy motive, Mr. Crosby determined to erect an edifice suitable to the production of grand opera, as well as the drama, in a style more gorgeous than had yet been done in the West. A gallery devoted to the fine arts was also a part of his plan, and a hall adapted to concerts and lectures was made a distinct feature of the building. The site chosen for this structure was on the north side of Washington Street, nearly midway between State and Dearborn.

Mr. Crosby, in company with W. W. Boyington, a well-known architect, of Chicago, visited the principal cities of the Union, with a view to gaining a practical knowledge of how to construct an opera house. The result of these and other studies was shown in Crosby's Opera House.

Those who were engaged in the construction of this temple, were—architect, W. W. Boyington; assistant architect, John W. Roberts; fresco painters, Jenve & Almini; painters, Heath & Milligan; scenic artist, William Voegtlin; stage carpenter and machinist, Wallace Hume; carpenter and mason, Wallbaum & Bauman; cut stone work, L. H. Bolderwick; heating apparatus, Murray & Winne; gas fixtures, H. M. Willmarth; plumbing, John Hughes; plastering, C. Kobolt; plate glass, John R. Platt.

Monroe Heath

In the spring of 1865, the immense structure was completed, at a total cost, it was asserted, of $600,000. The inevitable end came to Mr. Crosby's fortune before the house was done, and the announcement of a grand opening was made in the ears of a man who knew that the enterprise was accomplished only by the sacrifice of personal fortune. Still, there was no retreat, and with loud proclamation of the glory of the occasion, the 17th of April, 1865, was designated as the inaugural night. The house was not designed as a theater in the general acceptation of the term then applied, but as a place dependent upon traveling companies, mainly operatic, a stock company was not chosen. In accordance with this idea, and to sustain its name, Crosby's Opera House was opened to the public by a season of grand Italian opera, under the direction of J. Grau. The company was from the New York Academy of Music, and numbered among its members Clara Louise Kellogg, Carozzi, Zucchi, Morensi, Fischer, Zapucci, Massimiliani, Lotti, Lorini, Susini, Foriani, Colletti, Muller and Ximenes.

The opening performance, however, was destined not to take place as announced. The assassination of President Lincoln produced such wide-spread consternation among the people of Chicago that amusements were unthought of. Manager Grau and his company had arrived in Chicago, and were prepared to carry out the programme set for Monday evening, April 17. Mr. Grau promptly declared the presentation of opera, under circumstances so deplorable, an impossibility, and advertised a postponement of the inauguration. Mr. Grau expected to pay the salaries of his people, but in that he was agreeably disappointed; for no sooner was it made known to them, than the leading members released their manager from his obligation, and evinced their sympathy by issuing the following card, in Italian:

"The irreparable calamity which has so suddenly befallen the American Nation, in the terrible removal of one of its great glories, in the person of its second father (Pater Patria) Abraham Lincoln, is felt by us, the artists of the Italian Opera Company, as deeply as though it were our own; and, wishing to participate in the general mourning, we approve of the just decision of our manager, Mr. Grau, to postpone the inauguration of the opera season, and thus pay our tribute of sorrow and tears to the memory of the martyr to a divine cause, and the man whom the history of America and the book of humanity will make immortal.

"(Signed)

ZUCCHI,	LOTTI,
KELLOGG,	BERGMANN,
MORENSI,	DUBREUL,
MASSIMILIANI	LORINI,
BELLINI,	COLLETTI,
SUSINI,	FORIANI."

The time announced for the commencement of the season was Thursday, April 20, and on that evening a most brilliant audience assembled. The opera rendered was "Il Trovatore," and the manner of its production was grand enough to satisfy even a less cordially disposed audience than that which, filled every portion of the spacious house. The season continued four weeks, during which time were again given "Il Trovatore," "Lucia de Lammermoor," "Il Poliuto," "Martha," "Norma," "Faust," "Linda di Chamouni," "La Sonnambula," "I Puritani," "Un Ballo in Maschera," "Don Sebastian," "Lucretia Borgia," "Ernani" and "Fra Diavolo."

The Opera House was not continuously used, because, as has been stated, no regular company was employed. On May 25 and 26, concerts were given by Helene de Katow and James M. Welhi, and on the 29th, an amateur entertainment for the benefit of the Sanitary Fair was given by prominent society people. Three comedies were enacted, "Loan of a Lover," "Perfection" and "Poor Pillicoddy." The evening following that, "Macbeth" was produced by a company made up from the stocks at McVicker's and Wood's, the proceeds of which were also donated to the Sanitary Fair.

McVicker & Myers leased the Opera House July 8, 1865, and played a brief engagement with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, opening with "The Gamester." On the 10th, "Much Ado About Nothing" was given.

The system under which this theater was conducted necessarily produced a varied, and not always commendable, class of entertainments. Ostensibly devoted to the highest forms of art, serious lapses from that noble purpose must be noted. The combination system now in vogue was at that time but tentatively represented, and it was difficult to fill dates with the better and more famous actors, who did not travel then with supporting companies, as they now do.

Concerts were given in August by George W. Morgan, and in September by Karl Formes. Then came the Hanlon Brothers, six in number, famed as athletes, who displayed their remarkable skill in a comparatively untried field on September 15. A matinee performance was given by the Campbell & Castle English Opera Company October 12, they being then booked for regular nights at the Academy of Music on Dearborn Street. J. H. Hackett delivered a lecture, with illustrative readings, on the subject of Shakespeare's comedies, September 29; Bateman's concerts, at which Carl Rosa, the cornetist, appeared, began on October 23; and the third season of grand opera opened on November 8, under Grau's management, in a most encouraging manner.

The Music Hall was inaugurated November 29, 1865, by a concert company made up from Grau's Italian Opera Company. This room was designed for concerts and lectures only, and became a moderately popular audience room.

Edwin Forrest returned to the Chicago stage, from "the loophole of his retirement,"—which he sought June 23, 1848,—on the evening of January 22, 1866. The veteran showed traces of advancing years, in the declining of that giant-like physical strength which had borne him through many a mimic contest with the strongest men, but his mind was as active as of yore. The company was led by John McCullough, whose subsequent career demonstrated his right to claim legitimate succession to his master's robes, no less than to his rôles. Madame Ponisi and Miss Lillie sustained the first female parts in the plays presented. The opening night of this great dramatic event was devoted to the production of "Virginius," a play in which Mr. Forrest has never been surpassed.

James E. Murdoch gave a reading at Crosby's on Sunday evening, February 5, 1866, for charitable purposes. The event was a notable one, for the reason that the theaters were then but rarely opened Sunday night. A large audience greeted him, and those who listened to his "sermon in verse," "Enoch Arden," then fresh in the public mind, can never forget his rendering of it. Selections from Isaiah, Samuel, and other masterpieces of composition were also read.

In May, 1866, a stock company under the directorship of C. D. Hess and Leonard Grover, was organized for Crosby's Opera House, with the intention of filling time between the appearance of traveling parties. Among the people chosen were Mrs. Agnes Perry, Clara Walters, A. W. Fenno, Charles Pope, Frank Lawler, and J. E. Whiting.

The misfortune which, from the first, attended the Opera House, continued to increase as months rolled by. As a financial investment it was a failure. It soon became apparent that the property must change owners, but how to effect this change was a problem that perplexed those who were most concerned. On the 26th of May, 1866, public announcement was made of a scheme which promised to relieve Mr. Crosby, and at the same time place the property on a basis which would enable the new proprietor to convert it into a self-sustaining investment. It was proposed to organize a company, to be known as the Crosby Art Association, and dispose of the edifice by lottery. The art gallery located in the building contained a large number of paintings and pieces of sculpture, many of which were by recognized masters, and some of which were valued at high figures. A prospectus was issued by the Association June 18, 1866, offering an explanation of the plan. The scheme contained the elements of popularity. The universal desire to acquire sudden wealth without the hazard of any considerable sum was a potent factor in the success of this enterprise. The more conscientious devotees at this shrine of Chance soothed their troubled minds, and excused their purchase of a "share," by the thought that they received an equivalent for their $5 in the engraving donated with each ticket. Others satisfied punctuations of conscience with the specious argument that, by purchasing a copy of "The Little Wanderer," or any of the plates issued by the Association, they were assisting in the encouragement of artistic tastes. At all events, thousands of homes, and thousands of dark closets in other homes, were adorned with those well-remembered gems, while in every quarter of the land private pocket-books were lightened of greenbacks and weighted with the seductive bits of cardboard which suggested possible affluence. No scheme of this sort had ever aroused the degree of interest provoked by this gigantic venture.

It was announced that the drawing would take place on October 11, 1866, but no one was surprised at the postponement of that auspicious event, when the date arrived. The sale of lottery tickets at the host of branch-offices established throughout the country, went on apace. October came, and went. The thousands who expected to draw the capital prize strolled through the gallery and gazed at Cropsey's "Autumn" within and on Nature's autumn without. Meanwhile stern winter chilled the hearts of those made sick from hope deferred, and yet the sale went on. The holders of tickets procured admission to the house to hear Parepa-Kosa and Brignoli sing; and many a patron of Italian opera that held grand carnival for three weeks from December 24, glanced complacently about, between the acts, and viewed the noble edifice which soon might be his own.

At last the day was set—the plan of distribution given to a gaping world. Two wheels were ordered made, into the larger of which two hundred and ten thousand tickets, numbered from the first even unto the last, were to be thrown and mixed in dire confusion by an able-bodied man. Into the smaller wheel three hundred and two tickets, each bearing a number, were to be cast, as representatives of the prizes to be drawn. These wheels were then to be stationed in conspicuous manner on the stage of the theater, and turned until the cards were thoroughly intermixed. A trustworthy individual was to be stationed at each wheel, and simultaneously draw, blindfolded, a card from out each fateful cylinder. The premiums were arranged in schedule form, by title, and numbered, beginning with the Opera House, as No. 1, and ranging down in value to the poorest picture among the three hundred and two prizes. The award was determined by the correspondence of the tickets taken at the same moment from the separate wheels.

The sales of tickets went on rapidly, and the distribution was advertised to take place January 21, 1867. When that day arrived, all of the certificates except twenty-five thousand five hundred and ninety-three were disposed of, and these were retained by Mr. Crosby, who was willing to sacrifice much, rather than again to disappoint the public. So the drawing took place. The event was so humorously described in the columns of the Republican, the morning of January 22, that we quote from that paper as follows:

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE.

"When the dust of ages is recklessly scattered over this whole transaction, there will remain a dim, uncertain tradition to the effect that the Chicagoans had a god by the name of Crosby, and that on one occasion some grand religious ceremony took place in his temple. * * * With what impatience this day has been awaited, who can tell? Has there ever been one so 'big with fate,' since the pratorian guards put up the world's empire at auction?"

* * * It is quite unnecessary to enter into a description of the first steps taken in this important matter. * * * All the tickets (except 25,593, held by Mr. Crosby) having been disposed of, the drawing was fixed for the 21st—a day especially sacred to Saint Agnes, though what she can have to do with such affairs it is hard to say. All entreaties for delays—all appeals for the issue of more stock—were in vain. On Monday it must be, and on Monday it was. As all know, who know anything, this city presented, yesterday, and for two or three days previous, the most singular spectacle. It was a city taken by storm. It no longer belonged to itself. Every train from every point of the compass came heavily laden with strangers, who, being unprovided with certificates, rushed to purchase them, and re-appeared, after a time, furnished with engravings; or who, having been more provident, came to be present at the appointed time, in order to see that everything was fair. As a matter of fact, there were so many that it was utterly impossible to accommodate them. The hotels were filled. The Armory was filled. The saloons were filled. A proposal to erect a number of berths in the tunnel was made, but there was not time to put it into execution. * * * Not a few found their way to Kinsley's [a restaurant beneath the Opera House], and respectfully contemplated the wheels on exhibition there. They looked at them from a distance, with mouths agape, with the same reverence that an idolater would stare at his god. They walked around and around them; and finally, utterly carried away by their feelings, they broke out into idiotical chuckles, and poked themselves in the ribs, to show themselves that they saw the joke. *

* * * Where they all slept Sunday night—if they did sleep—who can say? Some roamed back and forth through the streets all night, stopping occasionally to take a little refreshment from the inevitable carpet-bag. Some sat on steps, and some on curbstones, and whistled. Some having insured warmth by a previous intoxication, laid themselves on the snow, and were still. But, when the morning came, all, with one accord, swarmed out from the nooks and crannies where they had stowed themselves, flocked to the Opera House, and stood patiently outside, beating their hands and stamping their feet. Not a word was spoken. No one looked at his neighbors. On the face of each one was a look of infinite peace—a look of possessorship. But the acts of the residents of the city were no less indicative of the importance of the day. There was no ringing of bells, no thunders of cannon and blare of trumpets. The occasion was too great to command it. But there was nothing done on 'Change. Pork and wheat were duller than the dullest. There was not a soul in the Court room, where the Stewart divorce case is in progress, except one judge, the counsel who spoke, and the jury-men—and the whole baker's dozen, would have willingly adjourned to the Opera House, had they dared. The shops were generally closed, and business was at an entire standstill. Nor was there much difference in other cities; for when there is nothing done here, there is nothing done anywhere else. As prize after prize was drawn from the wheel, an operator behind the scenes telegraphed the news North, South, East and West. Everywhere was excitement. * * * From Galveston to Calais, no talk of impeachment, reconstruction, or the tariff—whether gold was up or down. They only asked, 'Who will be the man?' and each one replied in his heart's heart, 'I guess it's me!' And thus they stared and waited until the doors were thrown open. Then came confusion, the most intense, and excitement unparalleled. The crowd flung itself into the broad passage, which was lined by Sergeant Jennings' squad, and became almost inextricably entangled. Carpet-bags were torn from clasp hands and trampled under foot. Pictures were dropped and crushed. Coats were rent. Toes were trodden on, and hats sunk in rise no more. Men screamed and women fainted. Policemen swore and sergeants scolded. At last the knot was untied, and the survivors, with wild and turbulent uproar, like dashing waves of stormy seas, swept up the stairs, leaving their dead behind them; leaving their baggage—though some still held the handle of a valise, or the rim of a hat—and boiled over into the Opera House, where they remained for a time expectant and quiescent. The first symptom of life was when three colored boys brought forward the wheels. The applause broke out with greater fervor when, after the lapse of a few minutes, the committeemen, with ticket-boxes under their arms, emerged from behind the scenes, and in solemn procession, wound their way to the front."

The committee who attended to the drawing was composed of W. F. Coolbaugh, J. C. Dore, James C. Fargo, I. Y. Munn, J. A. Ellis, Clinton Briggs, E. G. Hall, F. A. Hoffman, Amos T. Hall, Chauncey Bowen, of Chicago; David Pulsifer, of Boston; Charles P. Stickney, of Fall River, Mass.; Samuel Castner, R. M. Hedden, of New York; W. B. Thomas, C. H. Needles, Richard Smith, of Philadelphia; Walter Ingersoll, of Detroit; E. S. Rouse, of St. Louis, all representatives of heavy business houses in their respective cities. In the presence of the audience, the tickets were deposited in the wheels. A few of the pasteboards were spilt upon the floor, and the audience roared in agony and anger. Each feared that his ticket was thus irrevocably doomed to ignominious defeat. The large number of shares held by Mr. Crosby were represented in the wheel, and assurances were given by the committee that the full two hundred and ten thousand numbers were included in the list. When all was ready, amid breathless silence Peter Peterson turned the crank of one wheel, and Emile Riske manipulated the other. As fate would have it, twenty-six tickets were drawn before one of the nine great prizes was reached; the twenty-seventh drawing awarded Prize No. 5, Cropsey's "Woods in Autumn," valued at $5,000, to ticket No. 35,460, held by J. J. Taylor, of Springfield, Ill. Then came a list of petty premiums, until the sixty-first drawing gave ticket No. 56,960, held by E. P. Dwyer, of Chicago, Prize No. 8, "Alpine Scenery," by Gignoux, valued at $3,000. The eightieth drawing bestowed Prize No. 6, "Recognition," on the holder of ticket No. 21,996, presumably held by Mr. Crosby. The list ran on, amidst increasing excitement, as the three hundred and two chances were gradually narrowed by withdrawals, until, on the one hundred and thirteenth announcement the audience rose in wild confusion to hail the winner of the capital prize. Who held the fortunate ticket $8,600? Where was the man? Who was the man? Perhaps it was as well for him that he was not in the throng of wild-eyed, disappointed humanity. True it was, that no response came to the loud demands for his appearance. All was mystery. Some one called upon the committee to state who held ticket $8,600, but that august body of men proceeded calmly with the drawing, and left the audience to waste its fury in impotent lashings at Fate, and at strainings to catch a chance unfolding of the mystery. Again the wheels revolved, and at the 148th drawing, ticket No. 176,189, held by Mr. Crosby, received the third prize, "An American Autumn," valued at $6,000. The masterpiece, by Bierstadt, "The Yosemite Valley," held at $20,000, also fell to Mr. Crosby, on the 162d drawing; and the bust of Lincoln, by Volk, went into the same hands. The seventh prize, "Deer on the Prairie," by Beard, became the property of Daniel Russell, of Boston, who had purchased ticket No. 61,942. "Washington Irving and His Friends," by Darley, was included in the number of lucky tickets retained by the great projector of the scheme. There still remained some premiums to be disposed of, but with the awarding of the nine valuable lots, the audience lost especial interest, and gradually melted away.

The one absorbing theme was the solution of the mystery that surrounded the name of the man who had drawn the Opera House. The committee announced that the subscription books were sealed up, and no accurate information could be given until returns had been received from some branch-office. The action was, as might have been foreseen, the cause of great dissatisfaction. Had it been stated at once that A. H. Lee, of Prairie du Rocher, Ill., held the winning ticket, this enterprise would have gone down in history as a most satisfactory lottery. But the publication of the following letters should have set at rest all doubts concerning the fairness of the disposal of the capital prize, The St. Louis Republican of January 24, 1867, contained the subjoined communication from Mr. Lee, addressed privately to his brother-in-law, Daniel G. Taylor of that city :

" PRAIRIE DU ROCHER, ILL., January 23, 1867.

" Dear Daniel:—I was very much astonished, last evening, about seven o'clock, by the sudden appearance of two men in our bedroom, where I sat reading by the side of my wife's bed, with the announcement that I had drawn the Opera House, in Chicago. I don't think that I was at all excited by the report. I had a slight acquaintance with Mr. Burroughs, one of the men; the other, from Waterloo, was an entire stranger. The only document they brought was a copy of the Missouri Republican, of the 23d inst., which had so many accounts of the matter that I hardly dared believe any of them. However, I bore the congratulations of my new friends with commendable fortitude, and dismissed them with suitable acknowledgments. After the lapse of half an hour, I was the recipient of sundry calls from the neighbors and friends in the village, all highly excited. The report had flown like lightning, and the whole neighborhood was in an uproar. I bore a hand at receiving the company, answered their numerous questions with as much dignity as I could assume, and, in a state of semi-unconsciousness of what it all meant, started off to communicate with Frank on the curious appearance of things. I had been there but a few minutes when a 'halloo' was heard at the door for 'Mr. Lee! Is Mr. Lee here?' Well, I went to the door and acknowledged that I was that person, and went at him with the question, 'What do you want?' 'Why,' said the poor frozen fellow, 'I have a despatch for you from Belleville. You have drawn the Opera House.' I received the document and read as follows: 'A. H. LEE, Prairie du Rocher, Ill.

" Crosby's Opera House yours. Hold your ticket.
(Signed) J. B. CHAMBERLAIN."

" I mentally returned thanks to my new friend, Chamberlain, and went home considerably perplexed; not yet conscious of the reason for my being in the hands of so many new friends, who seemed to show so strong a desire to pay me attention. But a happy thought struck me. I will look at my ticket and see if there is anything in it. Well, Daniel, when I found it, there the figures stood, as plain as day—$8,600, and no mistake. Meanwhile, Joe and Ma had got hold of the matter, and to my unbounded astonishment, received it as a fact. I had undressed myself, as it was growing late, and was sitting in my long-tailed nightshirt, discussing the events of the evening, when a thundering knock at the door announced that all was not over yet. Ma went to the door, and quickly returned with the intelligence that 'a man' wanted to see me, and that he said I had drawn Crosby's Opera House. 'The devil!' said I, 'I wish they had to swallow the Opera House.' After dressing, I went down to receive the new messenger. He bowed to me, I thought, as though I were a man of property, and in suitable style delivered his credentials. I looked carefully over a very well written letter of six lines, and derived such information as induced me to believe that the lucky holder of $8,600 was about to become a man of property, sure enough; for this letter came from Messrs. Pettes & Leathe, sent, as they say, by instructions of Mr. Crosby himself. I found this last messenger pretty well informed, and, after seeing him eat a hearty supper and arrive at the condition wherein people, generally, are confidential and good-natured, I took him aside, and asked him if it were a fact, and no mistake. He gave the most solemn assurance, that there was no mistake about it. Very well, Daniel, as I am really the possessor of ticket No. 58,600, I suppose the Opera House belongs to me; and I just say to you that it is for sale. I suppose that somebody wants to buy it, and I have to ask you to sell it for me. It is impossible for me to leave my wife in her present condition, or I would go up to you at once. I must wait until she gets better, whether I secure the Opera House or not.

" Your friend and brother,
" A. H. LEE."

To Mr. Crosby he wrote :

" PRAIRIE DU ROCHER, ILL., January 23, 1867.

" A. H. CROSBY, Esq., Chicago, Ill.
" Dear Sir:—I received a dispatch last evening, via Belleville, and a note, by courier, from Messrs. Pettes & Leathe, of St. Louis, acquainting me with the very interesting fact that my ticket, No. 58,600, had drawn the Opera House. It would seem that a sight of the ticket is of some consequence, as several parties from St. Louis have already been here to have a look at it. I am sorry to say that I am unable to leave home just now, on account of the dangerous illness of my wife, which is a great drawback to the pleasure which I should enjoy at this marvellous piece of good fortune. I have written to my brother, Daniel G. Taylor, of St. Louis, to answer all questions for me concerning the business; until such time as I may be able to leave home. In the meantime, I remain your very much obliged and very humble servant,

" A. H. LEE.

" P. S. If you should desire to make a proposal for the Opera House, please correspond with Daniel G. Taylor,

" A. H. L."

On the 25th of January, Mr. Lee was enabled to visit Chicago. The card given below explains the result of his interview with Mr. Crosby :

" CHICAGO, January 26, 1867.

" To the Editor of the Chicago Republican:—I desire to publicly acknowledge the obligation I am under to U. H. Crosby, Esq., for the promptitude and courtesy with which he has dealt with me as the owner of the Opera House. As soon as the books were unsealed by the committee, and my name was discovered, a telegraphic message was sent by him to Pettes & Leathe, the agents of the Association at St. Louis, to 'put a faithful man on horseback and at once notify me of the fact.' This was done without expense to me. The illness of my wife has prevented me from coming to Chicago sooner. It was my wish and request that I might come here and transact my business with Mr. Crosby without becoming the object of unpleasant notoriety, and without having my name heralded in the newspapers; and I feel deeply indebted to him for the considerate manner in which the request has been observed, especially as it has cost him some embarrassment as well as occasioned invidious comment. Feeling that the Opera House should properly be owned by Mr. Crosby, I made him the offer to sell it to him for $200,000, and the offer was accepted in a spirit which was most gratifying, and the money promptly paid me. My connection with the Opera House having thus happily terminated,

" I am, very respectfully and sincerely yours,
" A. H. LEE."

Thus ended the greatest lottery venture ever undertaken in Chicago. The ruffled current of life flowed on, until, in the course of natural events, the keen edge of disappointment was dulled by time's corroding cares, and the animosities engendered were changed into topics of jest and idle sport.

Adelaide Ristori was announced to make her first appearance in Chicago, on the evening of January 21, 1867, the date made memorable by the distribution, but delayed trains prevented her arrival in time to fill the engagement. Madame Ristori's opening night was, therefore, January 22, on which occasion she presented Montanelli's version of Legouvé's tragedy "Medea." She received a well-deserved ovation.

An interesting engagement was that of J. W. Wallack and E. L. Davenport, who made their first appearance in Chicago September 16, 1867, the former actor playing Iago to the latter's Othello.

November 28, 1867, was a gala day in Chicago. In the first place it was Thanksgiving-day, and next, and most important, Weston, the pedestrian, was that morning to conclude his great walk from Portland, Maine, to Chicago, and to hold two receptions at Crosby's Opera House in the afternoon and evening.

Weston began his walk at noon of October 29, at Portland, and, on a wager of $10,000, agreed to walk to Chicago, a distance of 1,237¾ miles, in twenty-six secular days—thirty days in all. Great interest was manifested throughout the entire country in the performance of the feat, and large sums of money were wagered on the result. The Chicago papers were filled daily with full accounts of the progress of the pedestrian, and all along the route the people turned out to see him. He arrived at the Hyde Park Hotel, within his time, on the night of Wednesday, November 27, and prepared to make his triumphal entry into Chicago the next morning.

At 8:53 o'clock the next day he proceeded on the last stage of his journey. The whole city seemed to turn out to see and welcome him. Rumors had been spread abroad that he was not to be allowed to complete his walk, but that some act of violence would prevent him. As he entered the city, an escort of over eighty police, under Captain John Nelson, the chief, and Jacob Rehm, the superintendent, met him, and marched in a hollow square, with him in the center. Wabash Avenue, from Thirty-first Street to Monroe, the line of march, was bright with flags and banners, and the windows of the houses and the sidewalks were crowded with the thousands who desired to get a glimpse of the pedestrian, and witness the final stage of his walk. It required all the power of the police to keep the way clear for him. No conquering hero of war was ever received with greater plaudits, nor witnessed a greater triumph. At Monroe Street, the pedestrian turned toward the Post-office, which he reached at 10:36 o'clock. Thence he continued along Dearborn to Lake, on Lake to Clark, and then to the Sherman House, where the streets were completely blockaded by the people. He then showed himself from the Sherman House balcony, and, the police finally succeeding in making a way for him, the pedestrian continued his walk to the Opera House, where it was practically concluded. Amidst great congratulations and shaking of hands he passed up to the private office of U. H. Crosby, where he appeared for a few moments at the window, and then made his bow and passed from sight.

In the afternoon a public reception was held in the Opera Hall, but not more than half an audience assembled. James W. Sheahan introduced Mr. Weston, with the following remarks:

"Ladies and gentlemen: I beg leave to introduce to you Mr. Edward Payson Weston, the great American 'walkist.' Mr. Weston is known to you, and to the country generally, as an athlete in the particular line in which he has just finished his performance, but to his friends and acquaintances he is also known as a journalist and editor, and consequently as a gentleman of culture and respectability. Ladies and gentlemen, I have a large acquaintance with that profession, and I can say that Mr. Weston is the fastest journalist on record. He has walked from Portland to Chicago, 1,300 miles, which distance, if it were put into a straight line, would be nearly equal to half-way across this continent. And this he has performed in twenty-five days, averaging fifty-two miles per day, something not equaled by any other man. He has also walked in one day ninety-one miles; in another, eighty; and in another, seventy; and here he is to-day, as fresh, almost, as he was when he left Portland. That is the performance of Mr. Weston, 'walkist' and editor. Ladies and gentlemen, I introduce you to him."

Mr. Weston stepped forward amidst great applause, and gave some account of his walk and the circumstances that led to it. In the evening another reception was held at the same place, with not any better attendance, and with about the same line of remarks. On Wednesday evening, December 4, the citizens gave Weston a testimonial benefit at Farwell Hall, at which he illustrated his several styles of pedestrianism.

The spectacular drama resumed its clutch upon the popular taste December 3, 1867, at which time Jarrett & Palmer unfolded the sparkling beauties of "Undine."

Gilmore's concerts began January 20, 1868. The company contained Camilla Urso, Mr. Ar buckle, and Mrs. H. M. Smith.

Fanny Janauschek made her first appearance in Chicago February 18, 1868, as Medea. The triumph achieved by this eminent artist was equal to that won by Ristori. The engagement lasted two weeks, and the repertory consisted of "Adrienne Lecouvreur," "Mary Stuart," "Deborah," "Marianna," "Thunilda," "Emilia Galotti," and "Love and Intrigue." These were given wholly in the German language.

Edwin Forrest bade farewell to the people of Chicago in an engagement commencing March 23, 1868. J. Newton Gotthold, supported by Blanche De Bar, produced, for the first time on any stage, April 6, 1868, an English rendition of "Uriel Acosta," translated by Otto Peltzer, of Chicago.

"The White Fawn," under Jarrett & Palmer's management, began a run which continued from June 1 to July 18, 1868. They then presented the spectacular play "Undine," which retained a successful hold upon the public until August 8.

Early in 1869 "The Three Guardsmen" was given, with moderate success. A local comedy, called "Young Chicago," is also remembered, in which George D. Miles and a lady pupil introduced the novelty of velocipede riding on the stage.

The stock plan was then resorted to, with McKee Rankin and Emily Jordan in the company. Boucicault's successful play, "Formosa," which was running at McVicker's and Wood's, was brought out at Crosby's. Mr. Rankin appeared as Rip Van Winkle October 11.

Lydia Thompson introduced her blondes to Chicago people November 22, 1869, in musical burlesque, and played a return engagement February 14. On the 24th of that month Miss Thompson, with Pauline Markham, Mr. Henderson and a man named Gordon, performed an act not announced in her bills. Wilbur F. Storey, of the Chicago Times, saw fit to advert to the entertainments given by this troupe, in the columns of his journal, and used language by no means equivocal in classifying the woman who gave her name to the party. The offended women waited on Wabash Avenue, near Peck Court, for Mr. Storey's appearance, about 5 p. m. of the day last referred to, and there proceeded to chastise the editor. Several blows were inflicted upon him, by whips in the hands of Miss Thompson and her female friend. For this assault, Mr. Storey caused the arrest of the four persons concerned in it, and preferred a charge of assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to do bodily injury. The case was publicly tried and gained considerable notoriety.

The Concordia Mannerchor, a local German musical society, brought out the "Magic Flute" opera April 4, 1870, and gave three performances, on the 4th, 5th and 8th. The Germania Mannerchor produced "Stradella" May 10 and 14. Marie Seebach, the German tragedienne, made her appearance in this city November 21, and during the week gave "Mary Stuart," "Jane Eyre," and "Faust."

Christine Nilsson's acquaintance with Chicago audiences dates from December 21, 1870, on which occasion she sang in concert, assisted by Anna Louise Cary, Brignoli, Verger and Veuxtemps. Three concerts were given at Crosby's and two at Farwell Hall, the latter on Saturday, December 31, afternoon and evening.

The name of James Fisk, Jr., is incidentally associated with the Opera House, through his having leased it to produce a most wretched spectacle called "The Twelve Temptations." The play was given for more than a month, beginning December 28, 1870.

The refusal of Rev. Mr. Sabine to perform funeral rites over the body of George Holland, in New York, and his contemptuous reference to "the little church around the corner," provoked a feeling of profound indignation among the profession here. With the generosity which characterizes the dramatic world, a benefit was at once planned, by Joseph F. Wheelock, J. W. Blaisdell, J. W. Jennings, Owen Fawcett and others, in the interest of the "little church." The press contributed all advertising, and the public nobly responded. A grand entertainment was given at Crosby's February 16, 1871, by representatives of the several stock companies in the city, and nearly $2,000 were forwarded to Rev. Mr. Houghton, pastor of the now famous church, as a token of approval.

Charles Wyndham and his English Comedy Company opened at Crosby's, for the first time, March 27, 1871, and remained two weeks.

During the summer of 1871, Crosby's Opera House underwent material alterations. Some time prior to this, the proprietary interest passed into the hands of Mr. Albert Crosby, who evinced a no less enterprising spirit than that formerly shown by the founder. All that designers, decorators and upholsterers could devise was assented to by the owner of the house, and a most lavish expenditure of money was permitted, the cost of the improvements being stated at about $80,000.

After so elaborate an effort to please the public, and supply Chicago with a magnificent temple of art, expectations of a grand opening were justifiably indulged in. The management announced:

"The season at the Opera House will be inaugurated on Monday, October 9 [1871], by Theodore Thomas, with his concert organization of sixty performers, who will give a series of ten grand symphony and popular concerts. The following soloists will appear for the first time in this city: Miss Marie Krebs, pianist; Mr. Bernard Listemann, violinist; Mr. Louis Schreiber, cornet-a-piston; Signor Luigi Rocco, harp."

The Tribune of October 8, 1871, remarked:

"The decorators and upholsterers are still busy putting the finishing touches on the Opera House. * * * The house is virtually ready, with the exception of the locating of the large bronzes and a few other ornaments and the laying down of the carpets. Everything will be in readiness by Monday evening [the 9th] for the re-inauguration by Theodore Thomas, and we may look forward with certainty to an evening more memorable, both in sight and sound, than that evening, six years ago, when Zucchi, Kellogg, Morensi, Bellini, Susini and Mazzoleni sang, and Crosby's Opera House was first dedicated to art. The orchestra which has the pleasurable privilege of playing for the first time in the new auditorium holds even a higher place in music than that operatic organization, excellent as it was. * * * The programme for the opening concert, in deference to the conventionalities of opening nights, is a popular one, with the exception of one or two numbers. * * * The box-office sheets are crossed to an extent which indicates that the whole house, gallery and all, is nearly sold for the first night. Mr. Thomas will receive a royal welcome that will make compensation for the memories of a season or two ago, when a few hundred listeners coldly heard his matchless band."

The proposed programme is appended:

PART FIRST.

Overture .. Leonora, No. 3 ..... Beethoven.
 Scherzo .. Symphony No. 3, E flat, op. 97 ..... Schumann.
 Concerto .. No. 1, E flat ..... Liszt.
 Miss Krebs and Orchestra.
 Kaiser March .. New ..... Wagner.

PART SECOND.

Overture .. Der Freischütz ..... Weber.
 Theme and Variations, Quartet, D minor ..... Schubert.
 String Orchestra.
 Saltarello .. New ..... Gounod.
 Polonaise .. A flat, op. 53 ..... Chopin.
 Miss Marie Krebs.
 Overture .. Zampa ..... Herold.

Had the power of divination been possessed by the one who wrote the paragraph quoted from the Tribune, and an attempt been made to forecast the actual scene of October 9, many of the expressions used in the announcement would have found appropriate place in the prophesy. The night was "more memorable, both in sight and sound," than that on which the Opera House was dedicated to art; but the programme selected by Fate was not a popular one. The greeting of Mr. Thomas was "royal" in grandeur and of appalling warmth. On that night the books of the Opera House were forever closed. That night the Demon of Desolation shook his smoky wings above those noble walls, and blew the fiery breath of fell destruction through the lofty pile. Gigantic in its conception, magnificent in the execution of its plan, monumental in its achievement, blurred with financial losses, yet rallying from them by an effort consistent with its general magnitude, the ending was like unto the beginning. As it was the greatest of its kind while existing there, so it was in its destruction swept away by the greatest flood of fire. Its end was absolute, for among the institutions obliterated from the earth forever by the fire was Crosby's Opera House.

RUINS, CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE.

WOOD'S MUSEUM.—What a host of recollections come trooping up at the bare mention of that famous place of amusement. The interest centers in the cosy little theater, tucked away, regardless of the possibility of disaster, as though the thought of fire had never entered mortal mind. The evenings spent in that pleasant resort, where so many sterling plays were given by an excellent company, imparted a sense of satisfaction that survives the wearing processes of time and lives fresh in the memories of those who were numbered with the nightly auditors.

The inception of the Museum dates from the summer of 1863. The Tribune, of July 6, of that year, referred to the project thus:

"We make the announcement with pleasure that, through the liberality of two of our worthy and public-spirited citizens, the St. Louis Museum has been purchased, and will soon be removed to, and permanently located in, this city. This Museum is much the largest in the West, and in several of its features the choicest one in the United States."

The original collection was made by Edward Wyman, and consisted of such articles of interest as usually excite public curiosity while they are peacefully reposing under glass. Rooms were obtained at Nos. 111, 113, 115 and 117 Randolph Street, and there, on the 17th of August, 1863, doors were first opened, under the new management, to a Chicago audience. The corps of officials comprised the following: John O'Mellen, general manager; John M. Weston, manager of amusements; B. L. McVicker, treasurer; J. P. Bates, curator; John E. Seeger, superintendent of art gallery.

Among the natural history curiosities, and the object which claimed the largest share of notice in every sense, was the Zeuglodon, a fossil relic of prehistoric times, which extended its ninety-six feet of bony length to thousands of wondering eyes. On the upper floor was the "hall of paintings," where some really fine works of art were shown, although it is probable that a high standard of judgment was not always adhered to in the selection of the greater number. One of the larger paintings represented the murder of Jane McRae, which occurred near Fort Edward, N. Y., at an early day in the history of that section. The hapless maiden had been intrusted to the care of certain Indians, who were to convey her to a place of safety to meet her betrothed. The guides fell into dispute concerning the reward of their services, and settled the difficulty by slaying the girl. Commenting upon this picture, the Tribune expressed the opinion that the drawing and anatomy of some of the Indians was at fault, but it approved of the "marble and moonlight beauty of the slaughtered maiden."

An exhibition hall occupied a portion of the Museum rooms, at the rear, and therein was nightly unrolled a panorama of the City of London. Those patrons who were content to gaze at the curiosities alone, including the moonlight beauty and Zeuglodon, were taxed but twenty-five cents, while those who wished to view the wonders of the metropolis were obliged to contribute fifteen cents additional to the general fund. Six distinct departments were maintained.

It is stated that, so popular did the Museum at once become, fully ten thousand visitors were entertained during the first six weeks of its existence. The exhibition hall was fitted up for concerts, and during September, 1863, Madame Anna Bishop sang to appreciative audiences from that stage. The next attraction to appear was the "Ghost," which baffled detection, on the 20th of September. This mechanical delusion produced a marked sensation East and West, before the mystery of the method of its production was explained. The Museum reaped a handsome profit from its enterprise in first showing the public the clever trick. But the management was not satisfied with specialties, and on the 26th of November opened a season of opera, with the Holman Troupe, in "The Bohemian Girl." November 30, the Ravel Troupe of pantomimists played an engagement at this house.

The drama was inaugurated at the Museum, December 14, 1863, by J. W. Lanergan, with a stock company. The first play given was "The Lady of Lyons," and this was succeeded by "Still Waters Run Deep," "The Honeymoon," and other standard dramas. The season was not a financial success.

A change in the management took place January 25, 1864, at which time Colonel J. H. Wood became proprietor. Among the new attractions in the department of natural history was a sea lion from Barnum's collection, which excited popular interest and served to largely increase the daily attendance. Colonel Wood appreciated the importance of a dramatic adjunct to the Museum, and at once secured the services of a stock company. Arrangements were made whereby the audience rooms known as Kingsbury's Halls, both upper and lower, at the rear of the Museum rooms proper, were transformed into a neat and comfortable theater, with three tiers of seats, called, respectively, parquette, dress circle and gallery. Four small boxes were built at the sides of the stage, which were comfortable when once safely reached. The stage was thirty by sixty feet in size, and well provided with suitable scenery. The prevailing color was white, and the good taste of the designer was manifested by the absence of tawdry display. The ceiling was handsomely decorated, in simple and agreeable style. Patriotism was expressed by a spread eagle, in bright colors, surmounted by the national flag and the motto "E pluribus unum." The seating capacity of the house was about one thousand five hundred. On the evening of March 22, 1864, this cosy little temple was opened, by a stock company under the management of A. D. Bradley. The leading members were Frank E. Aiken, Mrs. L. B. Perrin (née Woodbury), Mr. and Mrs. John Dillon, Mr. Richards, Mr. Reed, Miss Anderson, and Miss Axtel. The orchestra was under the direction of Mr. Stevens. The initial play, as upon the former opening, was "The Lady of Lyons." It should be observed that the theater was called the Lecture Room. Appropriate exercises were added to the opening programme. Among other interesting features was the reading, by Mrs. Perrin, of a dedicatory prologue from the pen of the well-known journalist and critic, Henry Chisholm. One peculiar blemish marred the pleasure of attendance at Wood's, and that was the staring advertising curtain that dropped between the plays, recalling the audience from the illusions of the play to the realities of commercial life.

AIKEN'S MUSEUM AND RUINS.

Frank E. Aiken leased the Museum early in 1868, and devoted his best energies to the sustaining of the popularity he had achieved. He pursued the plan of presenting new English pieces, and, August 31, brought out Boucicault's dramatization of Reade's "Foul Play." Alice Holland joined the company, and a season of Irish drama was enjoyed about this time. Mr. Aiken retired from Wood's on January 16, 1869, to take the management of the Dearborn-street Theater, and was succeeded by John W. Blaisdell, in the spring of that year. The house was devoted to minstrelsy for a time, with Harry Macarthy and Sharpley's Minstrels in specialties and burlesque.

March 9, 1869, Wood's was re-opened, with a stock company including McKee Rankin, M. V. Lingham, J. W. Jennings, A. D. Bradley, J. D. Germon, May Howard, Katy Fletcher and Anna Marble, in Robertson's play, "School." In July a drama called "The Working-men of Chicago," introducing a steam engine and practical machinery on the stage, under the management of J. Z. Little, was presented. In September, Mr. Aiken returned to Wood's, announcing himself as proprietor and manager, and soon brought out Boucicault's drama "Formosa," then running at McVicker's and Crosby's Opera House. The name of Wood's was changed to Aiken's Museum, in November, and in January, 1870, Mr. Aiken appeared as Dan'l Peggoty, in the play "Little Em'ly."

Colonel Wood resumed management of the Museum, and Mr. Aiken retired in June, 1871. Wood's Museum once more became the name of the house.

Early in October, 1871, the play "Divorce" was running, and was billed for the week beginning the 9th. The great fire swept over Randolph Street, on that night, utterly obliterating Wood's Museum, and leaving only a tradition of the struggles, the vicissitudes, the triumphs and the heart-burnings which marked its career. Of the influence of this house upon the development of the drama much might be written, were this a polemic rather than an historic sketch. The general tone of the drama presented here was of a high order, and the art of acting found in the stock companies many a devoted, patient student and disciple. The benefit of Wood's Museum is felt to-day, and ever will remain a primary factor in the problem of lofty accomplishment in the field of dramatic effort.

KINGSBURY HALL.—This public hall, which was subsequently converted into Wood's Museum Lecture Room, was fitted up in the building on the north side of Randolph Street, between Clark and Dearborn. W. A. Christy and Byron Christy leased Kingsbury Hall, and named it Christy's Opera House, opening a season of minstrelsy therein April 23, 1862. Arlington, Kelly, Leon & Donniker's Minstrels occupied this house July 1, 1863.

BRYAN HALL.—In the summer of 1860, Honorable Thomas Barbour Bryan erected the building which bore his name, on Clark Street, between Washington and Randolph, where the Grand Opera House now stands. The auditorium was sixty-five feet by eighty feet in size, divided into parquette, dress circle and gallery. The hall was the third in seating capacity in the city, and contained one thousand one hundred comfortable seats. The stage was thirty-five feet in width by thirty in depth, on each side of which were two proscenium boxes. On the 17th of September, 1860, the hall was dedicated to music and the drama, by a grand concert under the direction of Hans Balatka. The exercises were begun by the reading of an ode, from the pen of B. F. Taylor. The musical programme comprised the overture to "Robespierre," a symphony by Mozart, and the finale to the opera "Euryanthe."

The hall was especially adapted to fairs, social entertainments, balls and concerts, and was supplied with ample kitchen facilities for the preparation of refreshments.

The Philharmonic Society gave its first concert in this hall, under the direction of Hans Balatka, November 19, 1860; and here also, on March 31, Hermann made his first appearance in this city.

HOOLEY'S THEATER.—R. M. Hooley became possessed of the Bryan Hall property in the fall or early winter of 1870. An extract from the Tribune of January 3, 1871, explains the object of that transfer, in a reminiscential vein, as follows:

"Old Bryan Hall, which years ago witnessed so many pleasant musical entertainments; where Frezzolini, Laborde, Lagrange, Cordier, and Colson once sung; where the Philharmonic concerts were born, and where they lived and died; where Mrs. Mozart and Mrs. Bostwick, and Cassie Matteson, and Jules Lumbard, and De Passes used to sing—old Bryan Hall, after undergoing metempsychosis into a carpet store, once more dons a new suit—this time of theatrical raiment,—and is introduced to the public as Hooley's Opera House. We need not say who Mr. Hooley is. He is, financially, the most successful man ever engaged in the minstrel business, and, by the aid of bones and tambourine, has played his way into a handsome fortune. His little opera house is a perfect bijou of a place, fitted up with remarkably good taste, and exceedingly well adapted to minstrel uses."

The house was opened January 2, 1871, by Hooley's Minstrels, to an immense audience. Minstrelsy held the boards until the summer of 1871. On the 5th of June, Katy Putnam began a two months' season, during which she achieved success in "Fanchon," "Sans Souci," "David Garrick," and other plays.

In August, Mr. Hooley associated himself with Frank E. Aiken, and engaged a regular dramatic stock company, comprising Frank E. Aiken, J. H. Fitzpatrick, Frank Lawler, M. C. Daly, J. R. Vincent, S. L. Knapp, George A. Archer, Harry Gilbert, David Osborne, J. C. Morrison, Augusta Dargon, Fanny Burt, Lizzie Herbert, Annie Champion, Mrs. M. C. Daly, Belle Remick, Lizzie Osborne, Kate and Annie Tyson. "The Two Thorns" was produced September 4, for the first time in this city.

The centennial anniversary of Sir Walter Scott's birth was widely celebrated by the profession in 1871, and was appropriately observed in this city, at Hooley's, August 14-16, by a special combination of the stock companies then playing here. On the 14th, "Rob Roy" was produced, in which the clansmen of the Caledonian Club appeared. The cast was:

Helen McGregor.....	Mrs. Anna Cowell.
Diana Vernon.....	Kitty Blanchard.
Rob Roy.....	McKee Rankin.
Major Galbraith.....	J. H. Mc Vickier.
Mr. Owen.....	John Dillon.

And other characters by members of the companies. On the 15th, "Guy Mannering" was given, with Mrs. Sarah G. Perrin as Meg Merrilies, and Kitty Blanchard, Annie Champion, Kate Waldron, Katie Mayhew, Joseph Wheelock, Con T. Murphy, and others in the cast. On the 16th, the play was "The Heart of Mid Lothian," in which Louise Hawthorne played the part of Jeannie Deans, and Mrs. E. T. Stetson that of Madge Wildfire. The proceeds of these performances were to be devoted to the erection of a memorial statue to Sir Walter Scott. The fire prevented the execution of this plan.

Miss Dargon made a great hit as "Camille," in September, at this house. On the 25th of that month, Mrs. Alice Oates began a season of comic opera. The fatal month of October opened at Hooley's with Bouicault's "Long Strike," which was billed for one week from the 2d.

The week beginning October 9 was announced to witness the production of Giacometti's tragedy "Elizabeth," with Mrs. Lander in the title rôle, supported by James H. Taylor as Essex, and the stock company in the cast. The bills also promised an early production of "Marie Antoinette" for the first time in the English tongue. But, alas! neither were destined to see the foot-lights. On the night of October 9, Hooley's Theater was a mass of smoking ruins.

R. M. HOOLEY.—The patriarch among Chicago managers, the benefactor of the indigent actor, and the friend of the entire profession, is R. M. Hooley, more widely known and affectionately referred to as "Uncle Dick." He is one of the few American managers who dates back away into the forties, with a reputation as a successful originator and promoter of amusements on two continents, and whose benign face is as marked in London, Paris and New York, as in Chicago, the city of his adoption and pride. Mr. Hooley is not one-sided or jealous in business, but recognizes the duties, rights and privileges of citizenship. His experience is varied, his judgment sound and his advice valuable. His opinion is always sought on matters pertaining to the advancement of our enterprises and the development and welfare of our city. Richard M. Hooley, the son of James and Ann Hooley, was born April 13, 1822, in Ballina, County Mayo, Ireland, but was brought up in Manchester, England, whither the family removed when he was ten months old. James Hooley, his father, was a well-to-do dry goods merchant, who intended that his son Richard should become a physician. Accordingly, he became a student at Hyde Academy, near Manchester, with the intention of fitting for the medical profession. A natural love for art, however, conquered paternal intentions and scientific possibilities. R. M. Hooley grew quickly to be a phenomenal master of the violin, and, in 1844, came to America on a pleasure trip. He remained in New York, where, his talent being heard and recognized, he was offered the musical leadership of E. P. Christy's Minstrels. Two years with Mr. Christy inspired him to become a manager himself, as his shrewd business instincts pointed out to him great opportunities in successfully governing men and for furnishing the public with a banquet of fun, for which they were confessedly hungry. In 1848, he took a company of his own to Europe, opening at Her Majesty's Concert Rooms, in Hanover Square, London. He played throughout England, Ireland and Scotland, and in Paris and Brussels, upon the Continent. He returned from his European success, in 1853, and for two years managed different traveling companies of his own. He went to California in 1855, and entered into partnership with "Tom" Maguire, managing Maguire's Opera House. He made eight trips East, by sea, three across the Isthmus of Nicaragua, and five by way of Panama, taking out Mr. and Mrs. James Wallack, Mr. and Mrs. John Wood, and other dramatic celebrities, introducing them for the first time on the Pacific Coast. He returned East, in 1858, playing in the different cities until 1859, when he opened at Niblo's with George Christy and a minstrel company that afterward became famous as Hooley & Campbell's Minstrels. After a nine months' season, the "Wide Awakes" and political excitement incident to Lincoln's election, drove them out of New York and on to the road.

The company disbanded in 1861, at the Walnut Street Theater, Philadelphia, and Mr. Hooley went back to New York. Like Micawber, he waited. "It turned up" in Brooklyn. He settled there, and established the first permanent place of amusement in that city, opening in September, 1862, with Hooley's Minstrels, running seven years, and clearing $300,000, the most emphatic, unlooked-for and unparalleled success recorded in the annals of negro minstrelsy. Richard M. Hooley came to Chicago in 1869, and built Hooley's Opera House, on Clark Street, on the present site of the Grand Opera House. It was a success, and when swept away by the fire, in 1871, was under the management of Frank E. Aiken and Frank Lawler, and was filled by a stock company. Mr. Hooley had only leased it to Frank Aiken a week or two before the fire, for a period of five years, and had retired, his income at that time being over $31,000 per annum. When the smoke cleared away, Mr. Hooley had lost $180,000, and was on his way back to Brooklyn—not, however, before he had exchanged the Opera House ground for the site on Randolph Street where now stands Hooley's Theater. During 1872, he returned to Chicago, and, in October, opened his new theater with Kiralfy's Company, in the "Black Crook." Hooley's Theater was better known in those days as "Hooley's Parlor Home of Comedy," as, before the opening attraction, he put in, and retained, for four years, the best local stock company Chicago ever had, and became noted for the mounting and elaborate setting of the popular comedies and reigning productions. He gave up the Brooklyn Theater in 1878. From grand opera to burlesque, Hooley's Theater has always been successful, especially so since the panic of 1873. The house was remodeled in 1883, and again in 1885. Mr. Hooley's peculiar ability in managing men and theaters is a natural gift, strengthened by experience possibly, but not in any sense acquired by imitation. In a brief biography like this, dealing only with facts, and omitting flattery and personal praise, we can not refer to the world of interesting incidents which crowd the history of his life. He has never rested. His active life, always theatrical, if dwelt upon at length, would be contemporaneous with the history of our amusements. His taste and original ideas are to be found in different theaters in other cities, which, at various times, have been under his management. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Chicago, New York, San Francisco and London, and many American cities and towns, Mr. Hooley's management has improved in beauty, convenience and reputation the leading amusement houses. It is said that he has built, remodeled and managed more theaters than any other manager now living. Mr. Hooley's word is always at a premium. It is with him both principle and pride to be fair, honest and truthful with his fellow-man. He married Miss Rosina Cramer, of New York City, in San Francisco, in 1856. They have had four children, three daughters and one son—Rosina, Grace, Mary and Richard, the eldest and youngest now being deceased.

NORTH'S AMPHITHEATER.—In April, 1855, Levi J. North brought his circus to Chicago, and began an extended season. Satisfied that the city was large enough to sustain a regular place of amusement, wherein performances of a mixed equestrian and semi-dramatic character should be given, Mr. North erected a spacious amphitheater, on the south side of Monroe Street, near Wells, and opened its doors August 4, 1855. The special attractions consisted of such as are usually seen in a circus arena. The next year, C. R. Thorne became manager, and changed the name to that of National Theater. A stock company was engaged, and the interior of the building was fitted up for legitimate dramatic work. Among the leading members of this company were Mrs. and Miss E. Thorne, L. Mestayer and W. F. Johnson. In 1857, the place was re-adapted to equestrian, spectacular and pantomime entertainments, at an expense of $20,000. One of the most elaborately presented plays was "Uncle Tom's Cabin." February 9, 1857, which achieved a long and profitable run. This was followed by "Dick Turpin," and that, in turn, by "Mazeppa," in both of which especial importance was attached to the equestrian features of the piece. In May of this year, Mr. North again transformed his house into a legitimate theater, and opened with J. H. Wallack, in "Othello," "Virginius," and standard plays. Dion Bouicault and Agnes Robertson came at the close of Mr. Wallack's time, in May. The principal members of the Chicago Theater were then secured, to strengthen the stock, and consecutive performances were given.

William E. Burton, the eminent comedian, made his last appearance in Chicago at this house, beginning July 7, 1857. His death occurred in New York City, in February, 1860.

The engagement of Maggie Mitchell, in September, 1857, and of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Drew, in May, 1858, were the important events at North's, during the next few months.

The management of the house passed to D. Hanchett, lessee, in the summer of 1858. In September following, Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne revived old times by here, producing "Ingomar" and other of her strong plays.

In April, 1859, Frank Drew leased the theater, and, on the 11th of that month, H. C. Cooper's English Opera Company dedicated the amphitheater to melody, by rendering "La Sonnambula." The season lasted two weeks, and several operas were given, with Anna Miller, Miss Payne, Brookhouse Bowler and Aynesley Cook in the casts.

The house ceased to be a profitable one in 1859, and, after a precarious existence, was sold. The building was permitted to fall into decay. In 1864, it was used as temporary quarters for soldiers who were waiting to be paid off, and, finally, the remains of the edifice were torn down.

VARIETIES.—Messrs. Van Fleet & Chadwick leased the hall in the building Nos. 115 and 117 Dearborn Street, in July, 1863, and introduced variety performances there. Dramatic work was done in September, at which time the play "Aurora Floyd" was popularly produced. Tony Pastor played here January 12, 1864. In 1865, the management came into the hands of C. M. Chadwick and T. L. Fitch.

In the summer of 1867, the name of this house was changed to Theater Comique, and on the 8th of July the spectacular play, "A Tale of Enchantment," was first brought out. The house did not prove a profitable venture.

AIKEN'S THEATER.—In the winter of 1867-68, Frank E. Aiken was instrumental in the renovation of the theater building Nos. 115 and 117 Dearborn Street, originally known as the Varieties, and on the 18th of January, 1869, threw open the doors to the public. The edifice had been transformed into a first-class place of amusement, and the manager had secured an excellent stock company, of which he was the head. The inauguration ceremonies consisted of an address by Hon. Geo. C. Bates, which was filled with humorous points, but which contained no very valuable allusions to the dramatic history of the city. The opening play was "Cyril's Success," rendered by the stock company. The new theater started out with fair promise of turning "Cyril's Success" into Aiken's success, but plans are frequently thwarted. Numerous changes of bills were made, and very commendable acting was done, but the financial portion of the undertaking was disastrous, and Mr Aiken retired about the 1st of July, 1869. The house then became known as the

DEARBORN THEATER, and began its new career in August, with Emerson & Manning's Minstrels on the stage, who continued to be the principal attraction. A two weeks' season of German opera bouffe began May 30, with Pauline Canissa, soprano; Claussen and Dziuba, alto; Habelmann, tenor; John Klein, bass. The character of the place was again changed June 5, 1871. The Wyndham Comedy Company appeared in "Caste," achieving a great success. This company played throughout the summer, giving "Caste," "A Happy Pair," "Ours," "A Serious Family," and standard comedies. The fall season was opened August 21, by the Dearborn Minstrels. On the night of October 9 the bill announced was a burlesque, and a sketch called "Love and War." The theater was entirely destroyed by the great fire.

DEARBORN THEATER.

SMITH & NIXON'S HALL.—This edifice was located on the southwest corner of Washington and Clark streets. The style of architecture was Florentine. Upon the ground floor were business apartments, the spacious corner store being occupied by the firm whose name the building bore as a musical salesroom. On the upper floor were some forty or fifty rooms devoted to office purposes. An entrance from Washington Street, twenty feet in width, led to the auditorium in the center of the building. Exits were provided on three sides. The floor was inclined, and the seats were arranged in the customary theatrical manner, affording view of the stage from all parts of the room. The novel feature of the auditorium was the absence of acute angles in ceiling and stage. All interior lines were curves, and the stage set in an arched alcove. The ventilating and the lighting of the room were carefully considered, being accomplished by devices in the ceiling. The acoustic properties of the hall were well nigh perfect. Colonel Otto H. Matz was the architect of the building. This unique hall was inaugurated December 12, 1864, by L. M. Gottschalk, assisted by Miss Lucy Simons, Sig. Morelli, Herr Doehler and Sig. Muzio, in a series of four concerts and a matinee. The place became a popular one for musical entertainments and lectures.

METROPOLITAN HALL.—Metropolitan Hall, the largest and most pretentious public-room in this city, at the time of its erection, was located on the northwest corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets. It was built by Jason Gurley in 1851. On August 20, 1856, Metropolitan Hall was re-opened, after being re-fitted and greatly improved. E. S. Wells was then the lessee and manager.

Frank Lumbard's Empire Minstrels performed here

January 29, 1858. Karl Formes and his company then reached the higher musical theme, by producing "The Creation," and conducting a series of grand musical entertainments, in October of that year.

George F. Root's cantata, "The Haymakers," was first presented at Metropolitan Hall January 10, 1860. The original cast was: Farmer, J. G. Lombard; Anna, Mrs. Matteson; Mary, Miss H. E. Smith; Katy, Mrs. Philleo; William, H. G. Bird; Simpkins, E. T. Root; pianist, Miss L. S. Tillingham.

The erection of Bryan Hall, during 1860, interfered materially with the occupancy of Metropolitan Hall by important combinations. Arlington, Kelly, Leon & Donniker's Minstrels occupied Metropolitan Hall in November, 1863; and until the destruction of the building, in the fire of 1871, this place was used for lectures, concerts, etc.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—This title was applied to Arlington, Kelly & Co's minstrel hall, located on the south side of Washington Street, between Clark and Dearborn streets. The house was opened December 1, 1863, and was fitted up with stage arrangements suited to light dramatic and minstrel performances. The seating capacity of the place was about one thousand. September 25, 1865, this house advanced to the dignity of English opera, upon the occasion of the appearance there of Campbell & Castle's English Opera Company, comprising Rosa Cooke, Zeldia Harrison, Mrs. M. E. Burrows, William Castle, Pierre Bernard, Edward Seguin, and others. The season lasted three weeks.

Arlington & Johnson were announced as proprietors of Arlington Minstrel Hall, No. 124 Washington Street, April 15, 1867.

THE FIRST OLYMPIC.—The Vaudeville Theater, managed by George W. Riddell, was located at the corner of Clark and Monroe streets, and first assumed the above name July 13, 1868. It was formerly a hall used by Arlington as a place of minstrelsy. J. H. Haverly played the Arlington Minstrels here September 7, 1868. The title of the place was changed to that of Sharpley's Hall, in 1868, and again to Theatre Comique, February 8, 1869. In 1871, this house was called the Olympic, and was running to "variety" at the time it was destroyed by the great fire.

STAATS THEATER.—In 1851, the Tabernacle Baptist Church, an offshoot of the First, was given a lot on Desplaines Street, between Washington and Madison streets, by Messrs. C. C. P. Holden, J. B. Bridges, J. M. Kennedy, and C. K. Anderson, who paid $800 for the land. An edifice was erected, at an expense of $5,000, and therein divine services were held by the society until 1866. The house then passed into the hands of a Hebrew society, and was called Zion Church. In 1869, this congregation removed to their synagogue, corner of Sangamon and Jackson streets, and the Desplaines property was purchased by the German Arbeiter Verein, an association of workmen numbering some three hundred members. The frame structure and lot were then valued at $15,000, and one-third of this sum was paid in cash, a mortgage for the balance being given. The workmen used the hall for meetings, balls, concerts and miscellaneous entertainments both for their own and other societies. The basement was rented to the Board of Education for a school-room. In the winter of 1869-70, it was decided to convert the hall into a theater, and additions were made to the auditorium, at a cost of over $4,000. When completed, the new stage furnished a very convenient place for the presentation of comedies and light operas. Three performances a week, including Sunday, were given by a very creditable company. The management was entrusted to Mr. Horwitz, who brought his wife here, from Milwaukee, as leading lady of the German Dramatic Company. But the life of the Staats Theater, as the place was then called, was destined to be short. At one o'clock on the morning of May 20, 1870, fire swept away the edifice and destroyed the properties of the company.

THE GLOBE THEATER.—In the summer of 1870, David R. Allen erected the Globe Theater on the site of the Staats Theater, on Desplaines Street. The auditorium had a seating capacity of 1,200, and the interior decorations were in good taste. A special room was fitted up for the use of newspaper men. The first performance was given November 21, 1870, by a stock company. The initial play was "The Rivals." According to the public announcements, the proprietorship of this house was vested in D. R. Allen and John T. Mullen, but financial difficulties (which form no part of this sketch) caused the temporary suspension of performances on January 4, 1871. On the 11th of that month, however, the doors were again opened, with John Dillon as the leading attraction. He was followed by Little Nell, and other stars. Oliver Doud Byron first presented his drama "Across the Continent" February 6, 1871. Kate Fisher, as Mazeppa, played here February 13. Robert McWade gave his version of "Rip Van Winkle" March 6. The Theater passed into the possession of the Workmen's Association, and, on the 27th of August, 1871, was offered for rent. The great fire destroyed all the theater buildings in Chicago except the Globe, which stood beyond the limits of the conflagration.

BILL-POSTING.—An important adjunct of the show-business is comprised in the displaying of the advertisements upon the bill-boards; and the following sketches of the two leading men in that business are here given:

MORRIS D. BROADWAY, senior member of the firm of Broadway & Treyser, bill-posters, was born in Utica, N. Y., May 27, 1832. In May, 1849, he passed through Chicago on his way to Elgin, Ill., where he remained six months, and then settled in Chicago in the spring of 1850. His first paying occupation in this city was as carrier on the Evening Journal, from its old quarters at No. 107 Lake Street. His route paid him $3 a week. In 1850, he posted his first bill in Chicago. It was one quarter of a twenty-four by thirty-six sheet, for John Devlin, the old horse-auctioneer. In the winter he worked in Rice's Theater, where J. H. McVicker was then playing, for $12 a week, and in good weather posted bills with his partner, John McNally, the box doortender. He went to Buffalo, in 1853, to publish a city directory. Returned to Chicago in August, 1854, and resumed bill-posting in partnership with his brother, J. H. Broadway, and began the publication of the "Switch," a Know-Nothing campaign paper. It ceased to exist July 17, 1855, and its demise was precipitated by the Germans and the "Lager-Bier War" of the Know-Nothing campaign. A combination was formed that winter by J. H. Broadway, Morris D. Broadway, M. Newton, Joseph Sells and Charles Beach Gonzales, who pooled issues on the co-operative plan, to secure all the bill-posting possible and divide the profits. This lasted through the Fremont campaign of 1856. In 1857, William Dockrill, Charles Pettit and the Broadway brothers constituted the firm and continued till 1862, when C. Pettit and J. H. Broadway went into the army, and, until 1865, the firm stood Broadway Bros. & Callahan. In 1866, W. H. Harris and J. H. Broadway started in opposition to M. D. Broadway and J. Callahan. These two combinations, practically, did the bill-posting up to 1870, when George A. Treyser, of Milwaukee, came to Chicago, and joined with the brothers, under the title of Broadway Bros. & Treyser. This firm, existed till 1875, all opposition gradually dying out and the business becoming somewhat systematized. In that year J. H. Broadway sold out his interest as a partner, and the firm became Broadway & Treyser. This was the firm name until January 1, 1884. Then a stock company was formed—a close corporation—all the stock being retained in the family of the two principals.

The business name now is The Broadway & Treysler Bill-Posting Company, and the nominal capital is $100,000. The history of this house is but another illustration of that spirit of progress and development characteristic of our civic existence. From posting bills on the ice, on dead horses lying in the street, on the backs of live cattle led through the city, and on burdens carried by the early delivery clerks, the business of displaying announcements of showmen, merchants and the city government, has grown from comparative impetuosity to one of respectable standing and large profit. It cost the first circus that put paper on the walls in this city,—Spaulding & Rogers, in 1854,—$25 to put up one hundred sheets of paper. The figures and facts of 1854 show the difference when it is stated that P. T. Barnum's expense in 1884, for bill-posting alone, was $2,150. In 1849, Rice's theater got out seventy-five one-sheet bills, posted eleven in front of the theater and tacked up the remainder. In 1885, there are twenty-three legitimate places of amusement, and the weekly bill-posting costs an average of $75 dollars each. In 1850, there were no stands where paper could be displayed, other than fences and dead-walls, the first big bill-board being erected only as recently as 1866. Morris D. Broadway, in 1855, married Miss Ellen Stanton, in Chicago. They have five children—Lucy A., Daniel H., Albert S., M. D., Jr. and Charles H. The firm of Broadway & Treysler have also become managers, having built, in 1833, a magnificent Dime Museum in Milwaukee, Wis., and in 1884 they built one at St. Louis, Mo., both being pronounced far superior to any similar houses in the country, and in both of which they have been very successful.

GEORGE A. TREYSLER, president of the International Bill Posters' Association of North America, and secretary and treasurer of the Broadway & Treysler Bill-Posting Company of Chicago, was born in Detroit, December 2, 1835. His father, Louis G. Treysler, was a hotel keeper in Milwaukee, and one of its earliest settlers. George Treysler's younger days were full of the various and notable instances of success common to young men of push and enterprise. In his father's hotel, and as a printer, he got quickly to the front. He started the bill-posting business, in Milwaukee, in 1864-65. His office was on East Water Street, between Mason and Wisconsin streets. Six years afterward he came to Chicago and joined with the Broadway brothers, who were already established with a small clientele of their own, and whose firm was the principal of half a dozen in the business. To put his vocation upon a thoroughly organized and systematic basis; to make it trustworthy, respectable, honest and self-sustaining in itself, and worthy of public confidence, Mr. Treysler labored earnestly, and it soon became known that Broadway & Treysler had the only good stands for bill-board display. Reliability having been established, and facilities increased, popularity grew, till it resulted in the swallowing up of all opposition. Mr. Treysler has been very prominent in the organization of the International Bill Posters' Association of North America—an association formed for the purpose of mutual protection of the members against imposition and to guarantee the public fair treatment. Mr. Treysler has been annually elected president since 1875. He married, in 1868, Miss Ann Perry, daughter of Edward Perry, a prominent farmer of Washington County, Wis. Mrs. Treysler died January 14, 1874, leaving three daughters—Clara Bell, Harriet E. and Georgiana. Mr. Treysler, in 1876, married Miss Harriet E. Lewis, of St. Louis.

ATHLETIC AMUSEMENTS.

Chicago has always maintained a reputation as a center for athletic amusements, and no species or variety of such recreation can be named in which, at some period of the city's history, Chicago has not been pre-eminent. A chronological table of the principal events which have occurred in this city is given below. Prior to 1857, such events were few and far between—so few and insignificant, in fact, that it was not thought worth while to make any extended mention of them in the first volume of this History. In the preparation of the following table, however, the aim has been to record, briefly, every important event which occurred in Chicago. Many events of minor importance, the memory of which is, no doubt, dear to many of the city's early settlers and old residents, have been omitted from the table, as not having engrossed enough public interest to justify their mention. In the preparation of the table, chronological order has been the main consideration, subsidiary to which a grouping of kindred amusements has been attempted.

1836—Opening of the first billiard hall (with two tables) on the second floor of Couch's Hotel.

1844—First race-course laid out by W. F. Myrick on the prairie, between Twenty-sixth and Thirty-first streets and Vincennes and Indiana avenues.

1845—J. Dickey's gymnasium opened in Harmon's Buildings. April, Launching of the "Rob Roy" (the first pleasure boat ever built in Chicago) by the ladies of the Lake House. July 17, Racing at the Chicago race-course, sweepstakes, two miles and repeat.

1846—Henry Green's private race-course opened.

1848—June 12, "Lady Jane" and "Jack Raster" trotted for $1,000 at the Chicago race-course. September 27-October 2, Fall meeting at the Chicago race-course.

1849—June 12, Pigeon-shooting match. Racing around the Public Square.

1850—September 19, Pigeon-shooting-match. October, Cricket-match between Kentish eleven, residing north of Washington Street, and All-Chicago eleven, residing south of Washington Street. At a subsequent match Milwaukee was defeated by Chicago. September, Yacht "Georgiana" launched. October 24, Excelsior Boat Club launched their first yacht. November 4-8, First meeting on Chicago Trotting Park; $400 in prizes awarded.

1852—Formation of the Audubon Club for the protection of game and the enforcement of the game laws.

1853—In August, Organization of Pioneer Boat Club, with boat-house on north side of river, where Rush-street bridge now stands. Race of the Pioneers against time over a four mile course on the lake, the club winning in spite a heavy sea, which necessitated constant bailing. Chicago Gymnasium opened on Randolph Street. September 14, Cricket-match between Chicago and Milwaukee is won by Chicago.

1854—Garden City course opened. September 25, Cricket-match at Union Park, between Chicago and Milwaukee clubs.

1855—February 25, Foot-race for silver cup at North's Amphitheater. May, Launching of the "Lone Star," a schooner-rigged pleasure yacht, the first boat, for hire, ever launched on Lake Michigan. June 5, Two-mile trotting match between "O'Brien's" and "Tom Hyer" at Garden City course. June 19-23, Five days racing at Brighton course. August 19, Sweepstakes, "Chicago Maid" and "Douglas." September 15, "Tony Parker" defeated "Columbus."

1856—May 12, Spring meeting at the Garden City course. October 8, Fall meeting began at same course. August 12, Union-Base Ball Club organized. September 1, Cricket-match between Norfolk County eleven and Chicago picked eleven. October 29, Cricket-match at Cutmore's, opposite Bull's Head Hotel; Joliet and Lockport against Chicago. April 14, In a foot-race at North's Amphitheater, John Tierney of Engine Company, No. 6, won a silver trumpet. August 28, Five-mile foot-race between Indian runners; winner's time, 28' 9." September 12, Race between Indians and horses at Garden City course. August 22, Race between bear and horse, and fight between bear and buffalo, at Brighton course. August, Daily rowing-matches in the basin, between the Pioneer, Wenona, Blue Belle and Lady Putnam clubs. June 25, Drumming match for $500.

1857—April 2, Organization of the Chicago Regatta Association. July 4, First regatta on Lake Michigan, open to all States bordering on the Lake. Prizes amounting to $600 awarded at the Tremont House. The race for four-oared gigs (four and a half miles) won by Lady Putnam club, which contested with the Pioneers and Wenonas. Double scull-race won by the "Maria" of Milwaukee. May 25, Chicago Cricket Club defeated the British consul's picked eleven. June 25, Same club defeated Captain Oldershaw's eleven. August 3, Same club defeated the Union Cricket Club on the latter's grounds. May 5-10, William H. Hughes walked during one hundred consecutive hours, at South Market Hall. December 30, Exhibition by twelve athletes at at Ottignow's gymnasium.

1858—August 30, Trotting-match for $1,000 between "Gipsy Queen" and "Ten Broeck" at Garden City course, won by the latter. October 7, "Flora Temple" trotted at the Garden City course against "Ike Cook." September 11, First sailing regatta in Chicago Harbor. October 15, Lady Putnam Rowing Club, of Chicago, defeated, at Detroit, by a Toronto Club in a match for the championship of the lakes, the Chicago boat being swamped. July 7, Match game between Union Base-Ball Club of Chicago, and the Downer's Grove Club, at the corner of Halsted and Harrison streets, resulting in Chicago's defeat. September 13, Match between the Union and Excelsior clubs on the Prairie Club's ground, near the Bull's Head, won by the Excelsiors. September 25, Prairie Cricket Club won the championship, in a game at the corner of West Madison and Loomis streets. Chicago Sportsmen's Club organized; consolidated with Audubon Gun Club March 11, under the name of the Chicago Audubon Gun Club. August 3, First annual match-hunt of latter club. August 4, First annual game-supper of the club at the Tremont House. September 7, John B. Drake's first annual dinner at the Tremont House. September 20, Scottish games and shooting-match at Cottage Grove, by Highland Guards. First billiard-match in Chicago, between the French expert Ubassey and Cyrus Coan, the former winning by a few points only. October, Charles Curtis, pedestrian, walked 1056 miles in as many consecutive half-hours, for a purse of $2,000. October 2, Charles Calla, of the old "Fire King" Engine Company, won a silver cup in a firemen's race of one mile, covering the distance in four minutes and forty-seven seconds.

1859—May, Atlantic and Columbia Base-Ball clubs organized. June 11, Excelsiors defeated Atlantics at the corner of Washington and Sheldon streets. August 16, Atlantics won the Chicago championship, defeating the Excelsiors. June 3, A picked eleven from the Chicago and Prairie Cricket clubs, defeated the Cincinnati. June 21-22, Same eleven won a game at Cleveland.

1860—"Ethan Allen" trotted on the Cottage-Grove track. June 9, Niagaras defeated Atlantic, Jr.s., at base ball. August 26, Atlantics again won the Chicago championship, defeating the Excelsiors on the Prairie Cricket-club grounds. July 21, At the Prairie Cricket-club grounds, a match between the married and single members of the club, resulted in a victory for the former. Chicago Curling Club organized at Tremont House. January, Initiatory steps taken by the Audubon Gun Club toward the formation of a National association and the securing of uniform game laws. June 16, Opening of the Metropolitan Gymnasium (then the largest and best equipped in Chicago) in third story of Kingsbury Block. December, Ogden and North Side Skating Clubs organized.

1861—August 27-28, A "free for all" running-match on Brighton course. September 26, Seventeen-mile trot on the Brighton track; time of winner, one hour and seventeen minutes. May 25, Married and single cricketers contested on grounds of the Prairie Club, the former winning. January 17, First match by members of the Chicago Curling Club.

1862—Chasing and lassoing buffalo at the "World's Horse Fair."

1863—August 25, Opening of the Chicago Driving Park Association. Officers: Daniel Thompson, president; Charles D. Bogardus, secretary; directors, D. A. Gage, W. F. Myrick, James Van Etta, U. H. Crosby, H. H. Yates and N. K. Fairbank. Four days' racing, the most successful meeting ever held in Chicago up to that time. September 2, Winners of the races of previous week contested for $150. August 23, Chicago base-ball championship won by the Garden City Club, who defeated the Osceolas. October 5, Chicago Cricket Club defeated by Milwaukee. October 17, Chicago defeated Milwaukee at that city. Chicago Gymnasium opened in the old Trinity Church building, on Madison Street, near Clark. Gymnastic training-schools opened for ladies, exclusively, by two female athletes, at No. 218 Wabash Avenue and at the corner of State and Randolph streets. April 10, First billiard tournament held in Chicago, being the second in the United States, the prize being a $500 billiard table. January, Skating carnival held.

1864—March 15, Annual meeting at the Chicago Driving Park. July 1-10, Trotting for stakes and purses estimated at $25,000. September 16, Fall meeting of the Chicago Driving Park Association. During the spring, Chicago Boat Club organized. May, Canada eleven defeated by Illinois eleven, at Union Park. Northwestern Institution for Physical Education opened at Nos. 116-18 Randolph Street, and incorporated on April 1. During the winter, masquerades on ice were popular and frequent.

1865—June and September, Summer and fall meetings of the Chicago Driving Park Association. October 24, "Cooley" defeated "Lady Sherman" and "Traveler," making a record of 2:36, and winning $1,000. Matches between Excelsior, Pioneer, Atlantic and Ogden Ball clubs; revival of interest in base-ball, which had flagged during the War. December 6, Convention of ball clubs of the Northwest, in Chicago; representatives present from four States and eleven cities; National Association of Base-Ball Players of the Northwest formed. Organization of Chicago Sharpshooters' Association. July 22, Foot-race between three Indian runners at Chicago Driving Park. June 14-21, Billiard tournament for State championship at Smith & Nixon's Hall. October 12, First billiard contest (after challenge) for State championship; won by Thomas Foley. Opening of the Wabash Rink, at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Jackson Street, containing 14,025 square feet of skating surface.

1866—June, Meeting of the Chicago Driving Park Association. July 14, Ten-mile race won by "Captain Barber," in 36 minutes, 20½ seconds. July 17, "Medoc" victorious over "Cooley," in 2:32, winning $1,000. September 3, Fall meeting; "Dexter" trotted for a purse of $5,000 in 2:24. George Trussell, half-owner of "Dexter," shot in a Randolph-street saloon. September 22, "Cooley" and "General Butler" trotted for $5,000. During the fifth heat McKeaver, owner of "General Butler," who had taken the sulky on the fourth heat, fell to the track, murdered by coming into violent contact with a rail, torn from the fence and held in unknown hands. July 4, R. Van Winkle, of Chicago, defeated M. K. Ritey, of Jersey City, in a race with single sculls, thirteen feet long, for $250. February 3, Game of base-ball played on the ice, on skates, between the Pioneers and Excelsiors, Jrs. Summer matches between the Stars, of Chicago, and the Favorites, of Evanston; the Eagles and the Monitors; the Pacifics and Atlantics; and the Excelsiors and Atlantics. June, Tournament of the American Sharpshooters' Association, at Lake View, fifty societies represented and $15,000 in prizes distributed. Formation of the Metropolitan Gymnasium Club. January, Washington Park skating tournament. August, Opening of the new West Side Rink. December 31, Opening of the Grand National Skating Park, covering fifteen acres of ice, at the corner of State and Twenty-third streets.

1867—August, Steeple chase, two and one-half miles over country, four entries. August 8, Ten-mile race between three trotters and an Indian foot-runner. September 3, Fall meeting, $16,500 in prizes; "Dexter," "Bashaw, Jr.," "Patchen, Jr.," "Magna Charta" and "General Butler" among the entries. On September 8, "Dexter" trotted his best public race, making a record of 2:17. June, Opening of Dexter Park ball-grounds. June 9, Match for championship of North West, the Rockfords defeating the Excelsiors. July, First great base-ball tournament held in Chicago, fifty-four clubs being represented. August 8, Ball game between editors' and printers' nines, won by the editorial nine, who made thirty-two runs in the last inning. May 24-25, Tournament of sharpshooters at Lake View, the home team bearing off most of the prizes. May, Organization of the Prairie Shooting Club. April 13, Organization of the Garden City Boat Club. June 17, Second billiard tournament for State championship, at Crosby's Music Hall. September 23-October 24, Billiard tournament for benefit of Soldiers' Relief Fund. Matches at quoits, between the Oakland and Chicago Quoiting clubs. January 17, Curling match at Washington Skating Park, Milwaukee defeating Chicago. Curling match between Chicago and Milwaukee, at Milwaukee, for possession of National Curling Club medal; won by Chicago. December 13, Burning of the Wabash-avenue Rink.

1868—June 4, "Bashaw, Jr." won a purse of $5,000, trotting against "Rockey;" but was defeated by the same horse five days later. October 20, Fall meeting at the Chicago Driving Park. June, Rockfords defeated the Excelsiors for the second time. June 17, Athletics defeat Excelsiors. November, Dissolution of the Excelsior Club. September 16, At Library Hall, John McDevitt, of Chicago, defeated Joseph Dun, of Montreal, in the 17th game for the billiard championship of the United States. December 23, John McDevitt defeated William Goldthwaite in a game for the billiard championship of the United States, at Metropolitan Hall. June 3, Quoiting match between Henry Henshaw and James A. Kenson, on grounds of Chicago Quoiting Club, for $200. July 24, Double quoiting match on same grounds, for $50. August 4, Quoiting match at State and Twenty-second streets, between Braidwood and Chicago Quoiting clubs, for $1,000 and the championship of the Northwest, Braidwood winning. Single game between champion of Chicago and New York, won by Alexander Ferguson, of Chicago. January 3, Opening of the new (re-built) Wabash-avenue Rink. March, At the West Side Rink, William Fraser skated one hundred miles inside of twenty-four hours, and another expert, named Riddle, skated one hundred miles in one hundred consecutive hours, at the same rink. September, Skating race of one hundred miles at Wabash-avenue Rink, for $1,000, between representatives of Chicago and La Crosse, won by the visitors.

1869—June, Racing "matinees" largely attended by the fashionable residents. July 4, Summer meeting at the Chicago Driving Park. July 31, Match between Cincinnati Red Stockings and Forest Citys, of Rockford, at Ogden Park. September 3, Forest Citys, of Rockford, defeated a picked nine at Ogden Park. October 1, A professional organization, known as the Chicago Base-Ball Club, formed, as the outgrowth of a public meeting held at the Briggs House; President, Potter Palmer; Vice-Presidents, W. F. Wentworth, General P. H. Sheridan, J. M. Richards, W. F. Coolbaugh, N. C. Wentworth, C. B. Farwell, F. E. Morse, S. J. Medill, F. B. Wilkie, J. M. Higgins, J. C. McMullen, W. C. Cleveland, J. W. Midgely, Robert Harris, O. M. Smith, George M. Pullman and W. Sprague; Treasurer, D. A. Gage; Recording Secretary, J. W. Butler; Corresponding Secretary, T. Z. Cowles. September, Organization of the Washington Yacht Club, and erection of a boat-house on lake front, south of Congress Street. September 25, First race of the Washington Yacht Club; two sloop yachts, twenty-one feet long, the "Lucy" and the "Violante" competed. August 8-11, Tournament on Dexter Park, under auspices of the Prairie Shooting Club. June 7, Professional billiard-players' tournament at Foley's rooms. Quoit match, with 9½ inch quoits, between Chicago's champion, Alexander Ferguson, and J. Smith, of Detroit for $500, and won by Ferguson. Opening of velocipede school. March 10, George Wilson, one of the "skips" of the Chicago Curling Club, won the cup offered by the Caledonia Club, in a single-handed match against eighteen competitors, at the Wabash-avenue Rink.

1870—June 25, John Faylor, of California, failed in an attempt to ride fifty miles in two hours, at the Driving Park. October 4, Trotting "matinee" for the benefit of the Home for the Friendless. April 9, New Chicago nine (afterward called the "White Stockings") played its first practice game against a picked nine of amateurs at Dexter Park, previous to starting on the season's tour. May 6, Chicago White Stockings defeat New Orleans club in that city, 57 to 0. May 13, Chicago White Stockings defeat Bluff City Club, at Memphis, by a score of 157 to 1. May 18, Illinois Base-Ball Association formed. June 15, White Stocking grounds opened at Dexter Park, the Chicago's beating the Forest Citys. August, Mutuals of New York defeated the White Stockings at Dexter Park by a score of 9 to 0. August 30, White Stockings defeat the Forest Citys, and the Atlantics, of New York. September, White Stockings, having defeated the Red Stockings, of Cincinnati, at that city, received an ovation from one hundred thousand people on their return home, and were tendered a banquet at the Briggs House. October 13, White Stockings again defeat the Cincinnati Reds at Dexter Park. January 22, Thirty-mile skating contest at West Side Skating Rink, between representatives of Chicago and Milwaukee clubs, won by Chicago. Caledonian medal won in single-handed curling-match by Archibald Henderson.

1871—May 24, Steeple-chase on the occasion of the celebration of the Queen's birthday, by English residents of Chicago. July 1, Race for $5,000 at Dexter Park, between "Chicago," formerly "Rockey," and "Lady Douglas," "Chicago" winning. July 18-24, Trotting races at Dexter Park. August, Formation and incorporation of the Dexter Driving Association, which leased Dexter Park from Tucker & Sherman for ten years for $35,000. Trustees, David A. Gage, C. B. Farwell, Ira Holmes, John B. Sherman, James Stevens, Peter Schuttler and Benjamin Campbell. August 23-26, First, and very successful, meeting of the newly incorporated association, at which $23,200 was distributed in premiums. "Goldsmith Maid" and "Lucy" appeared in Chicago for the first time. September 5, Colt race for the Sherman House stakes. May 24, Meeting at the Chicago Type Foundry, to consider the feasibility of forming Lacrosse Clubs. May-September, Organization and training (under professionals) of the Chicago Lacrosse Club on the West Side and the St. Regis Club on the South Side. October 7, First Lacrosse-match played in Chicago between above mentioned clubs, at corner of Van Buren and Laffin streets. January 24, Articles of incorporation of the Chicago Base-Ball Club were filed. March 6, Common Council granted ground at the Lake Park to the Chicago Base-Ball Club. March 26, Chicago Club opened its season in New Orleans, defeating the Lone Stars. May 19, Chicagos defeat the Olympics, of Washington, all Chicagos' runs having been made in the ninth inning. June 24, Chicagos defeated the Rockfords in this city. July 7, Chicagos defeated Cincinnati Reds. July 14, Chicagos defeated Athletics of Philadelphia. July 17, Chicagos defeated the Rockfords. September 29, Chicagos defeated the Bostons. October 7, Last game before the fire, played between the White Stockings and Amateur Athletics. Chicago Rowing Club began the erection of a $1,500 boat-house. January 11, Parker, champion of Illinois, defeated Rudolph, at Buffalo, winning the diamond cue and championship of the United States. February, Madame Garnier defeated Cyrille Dion, the first public game played in Chicago by a lady. April 26, Seventh game for the diamond cue and American championship, played in Chicago, Cyrille Dion defeating Frank Parker. May 27, First game for the three-ball billiard championship of the Northwest, won by Henry Rhines, at Crosby Music Hall. October 2, Albert Garnier, of Chicago, defeated Maurice Daly, at billiards, at Metropolitan Hall. May 24, Four of the best players in Chicago played a match at quits at No. 392 State Street, for $100. January, Bonspiel between members of the Chicago Curling Club, over and under forty years of age, won by the younger members. January 25, Match at curling between the residents of the North and South of Scotland at Lincoln Park, North Scotland winning. Winners presented with a gold medal by the president of the Grand National Curling Club. February 4, Milwaukee defeated Chicago in a match for medal offered by the Grand National Curling Club.

BANKING HISTORY.

The history of banking, up to the close of 1857, as given in the first volume of this work, shows that Chicago had an experience embracing nearly every system of finance that had hitherto been tried in this country. At that time banking was being conducted under the act of February 15, 1851, as amended February 10, 1853, and January 10, 1855.* The system had just passed, with varying success, through the severe ordeal of a widespread panic, which had tested its strength to the utmost, and while its endurance of the test had not been such as to justify the lavish encomiums of its friends, it had been accepted by the people as being perhaps as satisfactory as any that could be devised. The belief was general that, while far from perfect, it yet embodied more elements of safety and security than any before legalized by the State.

Among the banking institutions that passed, unscathed, through all the perils that beset the path of financiers in the early history of Chicago, was the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company.

On February 24, 1852, a lecture was delivered by William Bross, before the Chicago Mechanics' Institute, wherein, in relation to this company, then, and for many years, owned by George Smith, the lecturer said :

"Commencing by comparatively small beginnings, at a time when business west of the lakes, and, in fact, everywhere, was totally prostrated, the consummate prudence and great financial ability with which its business has been conducted, have won for it the respect and confidence of the whole community. A princely fortune has rewarded those who have conducted it ; but the benefit to the community has been equally great. By affording our business men of all classes facilities for making loans, and the means of carrying on their business, it has probably added more to the prosperity of our city than any other influence whatever, if we except the energy, industry, and business tact of our citizens. Thus much I may be permitted to say impartially, as I have never been introduced to or spoken to Mr. Smith, and I do not owe his bank a single dime."

GEORGE SMITH, now generally known as "George Smith, of Chicago," was born in the early part of the present century in the parish of Old Deer, Aberdeenshire, Scotland. When quite young, he attended the parish school at Strichen, was prepared for college at a private school at Udney, and then entered King's College, Aberdeen, where he remained for two years, with the intention of studying medicine. His eyes, however, being too weak to endure the severe strain consequent upon a course of study, he was compelled to give up all thoughts of following a profession, and, after attending lectures for a year at Edinboro', he rented a farm in the parish of Turriff, his neighbor being Patrick Strachan, afterward of the well known firm in Chicago, Strachan & Scott. Mr. Smith remained upon his farm three years, and did fairly well, but then hearing that a friend was going to Canada, he determined to accompany him on a tour of observation, and they sailed from Aberdeen for New York in 1833. Mr. Smith took out letters of introduction to the eminent banking firms, Messrs. Prime, Ward & King, Messrs. Boorman, Johnston & Co., and others in New York, but finding no inducements to remain there, he pushed on to Buffalo, where he spent the winter of 1833-34. Being eager to obtain information about the country, he questioned all those returning from the great, but then unknown, West, and as they were all loud in their prophecies of the coming greatness of a small village called Chicago, on the southwest shore of Lake Michigan, he determined, as soon as navigation opened in the spring of 1834, to investigate that village for himself. Boats then plied between Buffalo and Detroit; so Mr. Smith went by water to Detroit, and thence by stage, across Michigan, to Chicago. The mud village, which then had about four hundred inhabitants, so pleased him, that he wrote home to his friend Alexander—now Sir Alexander—Anderson, to sublet his farm and convert his goods and chattels into cash, which was done, and the proceeds were invested in city lots in Chicago and in wild lands where the city of Milwaukee now stands. So great became the speculation in land in 1835-36, that prices fairly jumped, and Mr. Smith, concluding that this state of things could not last,

* The amendment of 1855 provided for the winding up of insolvent banks, the provision of the act being that whenever any banking association, organized under authority of the banking law, should desire to close the business of "circulating bills," it should notify the auditor, and that, thereafter, no bills should be re-issued or paid out, but should be surrendered to the State auditor in sums of not less than one thousand dollars at one time; in return for which surrender the auditor was to deliver to the bank the securities deposited, in amount proportionate to the whole amount of securities deposited, and the pro rata amount of bills returned as against the full amount outstanding. Banks, after filing their notification with the State auditor, were forbidden to do any banking business whatever, further than might be required to collect and pay debts, and execute such other transactions as should be necessary to close up the business.

For the banking law of 1851, and the amendment of 1853, see first volume of this History.

Geo. Smith

sold out all he had in 1836 for one-quarter cash, taking notes for the balance, and returned to Scotland, thinking he had made a fortune. His success, which soon became known in his native shire, induced the Aberdonians to form several investment companies. Alexander Anderson started the Illinois Investment Company with a capital of £60,000, and Messrs. Patrick Strachan and W. D. Scott were sent out to Chicago to manage it. Patrick Strachan had a farm in the parish of Turriff, adjoining that of George Smith, and it was on the recommendation of the latter, who had great respect for Strachan's ability as a farmer, that Mr. Strachan was appointed manager of the Illinois Investment Company. W. D. Scott was much younger than Strachan, but he had some office training, and the original idea was that Scott should act as clerk for Strachan. Scott's sound judgment and general ability, however, soon gave him an equal standing with Strachan, who experienced considerable difficulty in adapting himself to the ways of the New World. Two other investment companies were started in Aberdeenshire about this time, and Messrs. Murray & Brand were sent out to manage one in Chicago, and Messrs. Milne & Keith went to Cincinnati to take charge of another. The object of these companies was to loan money on real estate, but, in addition, they generally transacted a sort of banking business. In 1837, came the financial crash which Mr. Smith had feared, and he was obliged to return to Chicago and take back all the land he had sold.

In 1839, Mr. Smith obtained from the Wisconsin Legislature a charter for the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company, which enabled him to receive deposits, and issue certificates therefor, to the extent of $1,500,000. Alexander Mitchell, who had just come from Aberdeen with the intention of joining Messrs. Strachan & Scott, was made secretary of the new company, with headquarters in Milwaukee. In the same year (1839), Mr. Smith started a banking house in Chicago, under the firm name of Geo. Smith & Co., and this was the first legitimately conducted bank ever established in Chicago.

As the country had no good currency, advantage was taken of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company's charter, and certificates of deposit were issued and circulated as currency. Besides Geo. Smith & Co., who, of course, used every effort to circulate the certificates, Messrs. Strachan & Scott and Murray & Brand, received them; and the canal contractors—George Barnett, George Armour, Robert Milne, George Steele, and others, all Scotchmen, who banked with Geo. Smith & Co.—took the certificates and paid them to their workmen, always agreeing to give other notes if it was found impossible at any time to pass them. In this way, the certificates of deposit of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company, which were additionally strengthened, in instances, by the written indorsement of Messrs. Strachan & Scott and George Barnett, got into circulation, and soon became the favorite currency in Illinois and Wisconsin. The decline in the price of land after the panic of 1837 was so great, that the managers of the investment companies considered themselves safe in lending freely on land at the reduced valuations. Instead, however, of advancing, the price of land continued to decline for the next three or four years, and, in consequence, the Investment Companies found themselves loaded with land, which it was difficult to sell. Messrs. Strachan & Scott advised their shareholders to wind up their affairs, and sent home a schedule valuation of their assets, which consisted principally of land. Mr. Smith being in Aberdeen at the time, the directors offered to sell him their land at Strachan & Scott's valuations, and he bought most of it. As the other investment companies in Chicago and Cincinnati were also compelled to wind up their affairs, the directors of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company—who, however, had been receiving dividends at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum—became nervous, and asked Mr. Smith if he would buy back their stock at par; and on his agreeing to do so, they issued a circular to the stockholders, submitting Smith's offer, and stating that they would not consider themselves responsible to those who declined to accept. In consequence thereof, all the shareholders accepted this ultimatum, and Mr. Smith thus became the sole owner of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company.

About 1840, James Carter, another genial and shrewd Aberdonian, joined Messrs. Strachan & Scott for a time, and went to Galena, where, in the hope of circulating his currency among the miners, George Smith established a branch bank under the firm name of Smith & Carter,* Corwith & Co., however, who had preceded them, supplied the miners with good coin, and thus prevented the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company's certificates of deposit from ever getting a foothold there. Hence, the partnership was soon dissolved and Mr. Carter established the house of James Carter & Co., Messrs. Strachan & Scott being the company. In spite of Smith's currency being somewhat irregular, and in spite of the bitter attacks made on it by the legally organized State banks, it grew in popular favor until the Wisconsin banking law of 1850 compelled them to cease issuing it. About 1853, Mr. Smith sold the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company to the able secretary and manager of the company, Alexander Mitchell, who had grown in experience and wealth as rapidly as the city of Milwaukee. Mr. Mitchell re-organized it under the general banking laws of the State as a legal bank, under the title of the Wisconsin Marine & Fire Insurance Co. bank, which is now so well and favorably known in the great West. So long as the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company's certificates were in circulation, it was the favorite amusement of Mr. Smith's less fortunate competitors to collect large quantities of the certificates and present them at Milwaukee for redemption, in the hope, of course, of inducing Mr. Mitchell unprepared with a sufficient supply of gold. This, however, never happened. One case in this connection occurred in Chicago. Mr. Scammon had been presenting some large sums in certificates—at inopportune times—at Geo. Smith's bank for redemption. Mr. Smith met Mr. Scammon one day and asked him what was the amount of circulating notes the Marine Bank had out. Mr. Scammon replied $175,000. Mr. Smith remarked that he knew where $125,000 of the Marine Bank's notes were, and that was in his vault, and that he was going to take them to the Marine Bank for redemption some day. This, was, naturally, unpleasant news to Mr. Scammon, as it would be to any banker; the prospect of being summarily called on to redeem two-thirds of the circulation would perturb most financial institutions. No more spasmodic efforts at hampering the circulating medium of Geo. Smith's bank resulted from the management of the Marine Bank, and Mr. Smith allowed the Marine Bank to be unpleasantly agitated for some six months—anticipating the sudden demand for $125,000 in cash, in return for that amount in bills. At the end of that time, Mr. Smith signed an agreement with Mr. Scammon, whereby each should exercise forbearance toward the other, and make no effort toward hampering their circulation or creating a "run" on their respective banks. Mr. Smith, however, received the cash for his Marine Bank notes, at various times, and from sundry sources. In 1852, Mr. Smith established the Bank of America, in Washington, D.C., his headquarters being in New York City. John R. Valentine* was his cashier, and so remained during the maintenance of the Bank of America. When the Insurance Company's certificates had to be given up, Mr. Smith determined to establish banks of issue where he would not easily be annoyed by raiders, and accordingly procured two bank charters in the State of Georgia, instituting the Atlanta Bank, at Atlanta, and placing John R. Valentine in charge of that bank, of which S. C. Higginson was president. At Griffin, forty miles south of Atlanta, another bank was located by Mr. Smith, named the Bank of the State of Georgia, and Peter Geddes was sent there to manage it. After it had been in operation for two years, Robert Reid, now cashier for the collector of customs, was sent there as cashier. These banks merely did business enough to pay expenses, and were used as banks of issue. Large amounts of notes were duly signed at the banks in Georgia, and then shipped to Geo. Smith & Co., in Chicago, where they were circulated. This Georgia currency was fairly well received, and, in consequence, excited the hostility of all the other Chicago bankers, who, combined together, collected as many bills as they could find, and then sent Elihu B. Washburne, afterward Minister to France, down to Georgia to break Smith's banks. Mr. Smith, however, had got wind of the intended raid, and was prepared to redeem all the notes Mr. Washburne presented. Of course, the cashiers were not particularly obliging to Mr. Washburne when they knew his errand; they took their time, paid out all the small coin they could, and obliged Mr. Washburne to return home heavily laden, and this, too, at a time when traveling was not quite so safe as at present. This raid conducted by Mr. Washburne, and others of less importance, induced Mr. Smith to dispose of his Georgia Banks, which he finally did in 1858, after redeeming all their bills both at their domiciles and in Chicago. In 1857, having made a handsome fortune, he determined to retire from business altogether. Of course, such a large and flourishing business as Geo. Smith & Co. were then doing could not be wound up in a day, and it was not until 1860 that Mr. Smith's career as the leading banker of the West came to an end. George Smith's success was mainly due to the soundness of his judgment, to his indomitable energy, and to his ability to select able and faithful agents. In the early days, Alexander Mitchell—who has since become noted as the most sagacious and successful financier in the Northwest—was of great service to him. Later, E. W. Willard was a most efficient manager of his Chicago house. When Mr. Smith finally retired from business in 1862, he invested largely in the first mortgage bonds of such railroads as the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, Chicago & Alton and Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, which, owing to the Civil War then raging, was selling at much below par. He left his Chicago real estate and other property to the care of Peter Geddes, who had been in his employ since 1854, and then sailed for England, where he has continued to reside ever since, with the exception of a visit made to this country in 1866, and occasional tours he makes upon the Continent.

* Mr. Valentine is still (1885) a resident of Chicago.

* Mr. Carter subsequently removed to St. Louis and joined the firm of Smith & Webster—George Smith and Thomas Webster. The latter was another Scot, and had the reputation of being a man of unusual ability.

During the panic not a few Illinois banks, including several Chicago institutions, had been forced to suspend, but, in the final winding up of their affairs, the bills were all redeemed at par, and in most instances the depositors suffered no serious loss. Still there had been grave doubts from the beginning, in the minds of leading bankers, as to its practical operation, based upon the method of procedure actually adopted in the organization of many banks under the law. A fundamental defect was, that a bank might be organized and currency obtained and put in circulation with little or no bona fide capital. The auditor declined to look beyond the bonds deposited for the security of the circulation, construing the law to mean that the deposit of the bonds was prima facie evidence of the capital of the bank. This opened the way to a most mischievous betrayal of public trust on the part of any persons who could borrow money enough temporarily to purchase the required bonds and get their currency therefor. Many banks were organized at inaccessible points and their bills put in circulation through brokers in western cities, most largely in Chicago. There was but very little specie reserved for the redemption of this class of bills, nor was there any place where they could be redeemed, except at the remote point where the banks were located. The Democrat of that day (whose sentiments upon all public questions may fairly be said to have been pronounced) in its issue of September 27, 1857, thus pointed out this defect:

"Turning to our own State, what do we see? A number of men get together (mostly old, broken down politicians). They want to build a railroad; they have no money—one would think a very serious objection. Not so, however, in these times, when it can be manufactured and to order by the wholesale. They employ John Thompson to purchase State bonds for them, and pay therefor, trusting them for his pay till the first batch of bank notes, founded on them, is issued. They issue their railroad bonds, hypothecate them in Wall Street, and pay John Thompson for the State stock. They are then ready with a State-stock secured circulation to commence the road. The only trouble is to keep the bills afloat. But this is managed very easily. The bank need only to locate where it will not pay for any one to run on it, e. g. either in Rhode Island or Maine or in some back county in this State. The people take the money as long as it goes, while the Chicago and other bankers (to whom exchange is at all times a prime necessity) are afraid to run upon it for fear of breaking it, and thus creating a panic. The owners of the bank in this way, trusting to luck or the progress of events, keep the institution going as long as they can; and when they can't do so any longer, let it break, almost invariably themselves taking care to be ready to 'stand from under' when the crash comes."

Still, while business was moving quietly, there being ostensible security for the ultimate redemption of the bills by the State, they passed from hand to hand, performing the essential functions of money as a circulating medium. So, despite the grave doubts of a few conservative far-seeing men, the system itself was popularly regarded as founded on a legitimate basis, only needing such amendments as experience from year to year might dictate for its perfection.

As to the "Wild Cat" or "Stump Tail" system itself, although it was undeniably utilized as a means of fraudulent and scandalous transactions, not alone at inaccessible points, but in Chicago, it may be questioned whether all the banks whose issues were unredeemed and whose projectors and sustainers were heartily execrated by the sufferers, were "conceived in iniquity." Had it not been for the Civil War, it is very doubtful but that large numbers of these banks would have redeemed their outstanding circulation, and the growth of the railroad system of the country have made the locale of the bank easily accessible. Every system has its defects, and the defective possibilities of the State Bank system were augmented by the National crisis, when, possibly, taking a leaf from the Wild Cat primer, the Government issued currency of the most ultra "Wild Cat" description.

It will be seen that the law, as constructed by the officials authorized to give it effect, afforded no real safeguard to the public against any losses which might arise from the dishonesty of bankers. It was intended to secure the redemption of the currency to the extent of the bonds deposited as a basis for its issue. The depositors were left at the mercy of the business capacity or probity of the bankers. That the securities themselves should ever depreciate in value, to such an extent as to jeopardize or bring into distrust the currency issued, was not believed. The banks that were forced into liquidation during the panic of 1857, had, with comparatively few exceptions, redeemed their bills, and, in most instances, the losses of depositors had not been serious, and could be traced to mismanagement, inefficiency, or dishonesty on the part of the bank officials, absolutely to guard against which no law had been or ever could be framed.

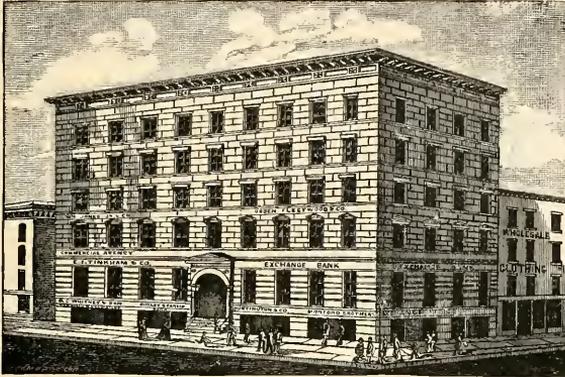

The defects of this currency became most clearly apparent when, under the pressure of financial distress, it was necessary to convert it into gold or exchange for the liquidation of Eastern indebtedness. For that purpose it was found to be imperfect money, since it was not possible to redeem it on demand in specie, or its equivalent. With perhaps two exceptions, there were no banks in Illinois, during the panic of 1857, able to keep their circulation at par with gold.

As soon as the currency was put to the test, the price of Eastern exchange showed that the Illinois bank bills no longer performed the functions of money. Exchange rapidly rose in price, reaching a premium of ten per cent. in October, 1857, and, in the early months of 1858, selling at as high a rate as fifteen per cent., showing that, in spite of the resolutions of Western Legislatures, bankers, Boards of Trade, and mercantile associations to the contrary, the money afloat was radically deficient in the requisites of a sound currency, inasmuch as it could not be immediately convertible into a debt-paying medium abroad as well as at home. The money, however, being the best to be obtained, continued to circulate throughout the West. The losses, through fluctuations in exchange, were a constant source of annoyance to business men, and became the leading question of discussion in business circles. The Chicago Democrat, in commenting on the financial troubles of the day, made the following editorial strictures on the management of the Chicago banks, under date of September 18, 1857:

"In our city we have a number of banks who, so far, have done nobly. They have sustained themselves, while the banks of other and older cities have succumbed. For this they deserve much credit. * * * No one of them, however, appears to have had the capital, the ability, the boldness, or all combined, to stand up in the midst of the pressure and stretch out a helping hand to the public."

In 1860, on the eve of Lincoln's election, the opinion in financial circles as to the value of the prevailing currency was divided. One class of capitalists favored the existing banking law, alleging that the banks organized under its provisions had withstood the brunt of a National financial panic, and had shown unexpected recuperative power after the financial storm. Another, and possibly more conservative, class maintained that from a poisoned fountain could proceed no pure water; that the prevalent system of banking had its origin in a mistaken conception of the fundamental principles of finance, and that the circulating medium lacked every essential element of a sound currency. The Press also, during this time, teemed with vituperation. The advocates of the system, however, urged that at the next session of the Legislature the banking law would be so amended as to force country banks to redeem their bills through agencies established in Chicago or Springfield, and thus render the bulk of Illinois currency more easily convertible into Eastern exchange when desired. With the proposed amendments to the law, the friends of the system claimed that it would approach absolute perfection. On the other hand, its opponents boldly alleged that the proposed amendment was merely designed as a convenient means of appeasing and obviating the justifiable opposition of the farmers to the law; that the advocates of the system were actuated by selfish motives; and that in proffering the proposed amendment, they were only throwing a sop to Cerberus.

EXCHANGE BANK BUILDING.

Chicago had little local interest in State banking, as there were but few banks of issue here; yet, considering the immense volume of currency required to carry on her constantly increasing business, it was all important that the State currency should be on a sound basis, wherever issued. Nothing occurred to derange the system, or bring it into further distrust, prior to the election of Lincoln, in November, 1860. Up to the time last mentioned the credit of the Southern States had been as a rule, unimpaired, and their bonds were almost invariably received on deposit, as security for the issues of bank bills. In the autumn of 1860, the business of the banks increased, and their circulation was inflated to an extent which was excusable only in times of prosperity and general confidence. With the first agitation of Secession, the securities of the States involved in the proposed movement suddenly depreciated in value, and, with the growing conviction, that civil war was inevitable, the quotations each day showed a further decline in the value of such securities. The banks of Illinois had an aggregate circulation of $12,320,694, secured by deposits of United States and State securities of the par value of $14,000,000, the bonds of the Southern States constituting more than two-thirds of the amount, viz., $9,527,500.

This unexpected emergency found the currency of the State banks expanded to an illegitimate degree, and the banks themselves unable to withdraw. Not only would such withdrawal have brought ruin on the banks of issue themselves, but the whole business community would have been called upon to sustain the shock. The Illinois currency in circulation had no uniform value; it had been transformed into a mass of bank debentures, the value of which could only be estimated by the value of the bonds deposited for its redemption.

The winter and spring of 1861 was a period of general financial disorder and uncertainty. Exchange on the East (always resting on a specie basis, rose rapidly, and varied in price, according to the value of the bills offered in payment therefor. Currency varied so wildly in value as to be of little practical use as money. The bills of such banks as had held Northern securities, or had made their deficits good, rapidly disappeared from circulation, while those of less fortunate or less wisely managed banks flooded the city, and were passed from hand to hand and bank to bank, with a nervous precipitancy, which showed the general distrust in their value. The Chicago bankers issued daily bulletins, giving the names of those banks whose bills were entirely discredited, such as would be received at a discount, and such as would be received at par. The valuation of the various bills in circulation varied from twenty per cent. to par. Railroads, lumbermen, merchants and the Board of Trade, each issued a list of the current value of bank bills, no two of which were alike, and none of which remained unchanged sufficiently long to be of any value. Matters at last fell into such confusion as to threaten an absolute paralysis of all trade. At this juncture, a conference of the various interests were brought about by the Board of Trade, which resulted in a general understanding as to what bills should pass as money and what bills should be discredited. A list was adopted of all bank bills which should be taken at par, and another list of such as should be taken as currency, as soon as the banks therein named should make their securities equal to ninety cents in United States stocks. Public confidence, however, had received too rude a shock to be readily restored. No holder of the bank bills knew from one day to another how much he was worth. The excitement ran high, and the public prints teemed with charges and counter-charges against the bank managers. The Democrat and the Tribune represented, respectively, the opponents and the supporters of the banks as then established.

On May 18, 1861, the Democrat published the following editorial article, which created great excitement, not only in financial circles, but throughout the city:

"No man is safe in sleeping over night with one dollar of Illinois currency in his pockets. * * * There is great danger of a mob in our city. The day laborers will never be content to work for 'wild cat' which is not worth thirty-three and one-third cents on the dollar, and should the 'Marine Bank' fail, there will be one of the most violent outbursts of the people ever known in our city. On Saturday night next, the laborers must have their wages.

They are entitled to their wages. The question arises, will the wild cats give them gold or silver or the Dunham Currency, or will they avail themselves of that opportunity to pay out their miserable wild cat? Laborers of Chicago, arouse! Will you any longer be the tools of knaves? Will you, on Saturday night next, have the Dunham or the Scammon currency? Do not let anyone talk to you about the iniquity of the Secessionists so long as the iniquity of the wild cat banks is transparent. Arouse, laborers, arouse! It is your sweat, it is your toil, that aggrandizes the wild cat aristocracy of Chicago. They are fattening upon your blood. The remedy is in your hands. Arouse! Arouse! A few days more and you will have to pay your taxes, or your property will be sold under the auctioneer's hammer. You ask to have these taxes postponed. The State does not need the money until January next. The taxes might well have been postponed until that time. But Scammon and the wild cat bankers in the Legislature, united with our Court Shoemakers? * * * Why does not the Board of Trade send over a committee to examine our articles, and not have them published until they are decidedly 'stump tail' and 'wild cat'? The evil consequences of our article referred to, in the last resolution, * * * relate to the fact that it may stop the sale of wheat in the country for wild cat, and we hope it will. * * * Our article of yesterday is but a transcript of articles that we have been writing all our life; and we mean to write more, just like it. We are not going to have them misrepresented, either. We are going to write them so plainly that he who runs may read."

Meanwhile, the finances of the city (always one of the heaviest depositors in banking institutions) had become involved, and the teachers in the public schools were threatened with either a total loss or a material reduction of the amount due them for salaries already earned. The Marine Bank was the depository of the city funds, and the bank officers declined to liquidate their indebtedness to the city in specie, or in currency which was of equivalent value. On July 5, 1861, at an adjourned meeting of the Board of Education, a proposition was submitted by the president of the Marine Bank that the city accept sixty-five cents on the dollar of the face of such deposit in full liquidation of the same. An amendment was offered by Mr. Wentworth to the effect that the president of the Board "be advised to co-operate with the city authorities in raising an amount sufficient to pay all the indebtedness of the Board to teachers and others." This amendment was lost by a tie vote. Mr. Wentworth then offered another amendment, in the form of a proviso, "That no settlement be made with any bank unless the officers of said bank previously furnish a statement of its condition, under oath, to be filed with the secretary of this Board." This amendment having also been lost, its supporters presented, and caused to be spread upon the record, a formal protest, signed by John Wentworth, J. C. Dore, H. T. Steele, L. B. Taft, Philo Carpenter, and James Ward. The action of the Board elicited the following comment from the Democrat:

UNION NATIONAL BANK BUILDING, CORNER OF LA SALLE AND WASHINGTON STREETS.

House clique, put out their bills at one price and want to buy them back at another. They want to fertilize their resources by grinding into the dust the widows and orphans of Chicago. Wild cat bankers are worse than Secessionists. What shall be done? We leave the question for you to answer. * * * The good currency is being hoarded by our banks, and there is danger that a mob will let it out. Why undertake any longer to palm off worthless currency on our people, when our banking institutions have a better in their vaults?"

The Board of Trade regarded the foregoing article as so inflammatory in its character, that it adopted the following resolutions of condemnation:

"Resolved, That we regard the leading editorial in this morning's Democrat, inciting the laboring classes of our city to mob violence, as subversive of the peace and quiet of our city, and that we unanimously and unqualifiedly denounce and condemn the spirit of the article, and the editor and proprietor of the said paper for prostituting his journal to so base a purpose.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board the article referred to will prove harmless in Chicago, but, where the character of the paper is not known, may be productive of evil consequences."

If the passage of these resolutions was intended to have a deterrent influence on the Democrat, the expectation was not realized. That paper published the resolutions, with two columns of editorial comment, of which the following are extracts:

"Who made the Board of Trade the censor of the Press any more than the Board of Blacksmiths, or Tailors, or Carpenters, or

"The statement, purporting to come from the Marine Bank, had the effect to alarm some of the best men on the Board of Education, who consented, reluctantly, to the proposition to compromise with that institution. * * * If this does not take all the amount in the bank, then the balance is to be acted upon hereafter. * * * This paper, purporting to come from the Marine Bank, is not officially signed. * * * Such a statement, we contend, should have been made to the bank, and filed in its archives, before the Board should have consented to throw away any portion of the money raised by our people from their hard earnings for school purposes."

The offer of the Marine Bank above mentioned was, however, confined to the school fund alone. In respect to other city funds, the proposition was not so favorable, as appears from the report of the comptroller, submitted on July 10, 1861:

"The Marine Bank and Chicago Marine and Fire Insurance Company have offered in payment of the city's balances on deposit, Illinois Bank notes at par worth, according to railroad list, so-called, averaging one-fifth each, 50, 60, 70, 80 and 90 cents on the dollar. Messrs. Hoffman and Gelpecke at present decline payment. A warrant on the treasurer for the balance on deposit there was presented June 18, and payment in Illinois Bank notes or anything else was declined."

The last named firm issued, about this time, through the public press, an announcement of their intention to pay all depositors in the Savings Department of their bank in full, on presentation of their claims, coupled with a request for indulgence on the part of their heavier depositors. The Democrat published the notice, with the following comments:

"When as unprincipled a set of scoundrels as ever disgraced any country in the universe were getting up the unmitigated fraud, known as a pledge to take wild-cat currency during the War, we took occasion to call upon members of this firm and tell them that the consequence would be to bankers like themselves if they signed the pledge. * * * All the embarrassments of this house have come about through the wild-cat system. Had it stood to the Long John, General Jackson and Tom Benton system of finance, it would have not been embarrassed in the least. The house was all right until a dishonest set of scoundrels got up that circular to take the money during the War. * * * The firm should never have offered their depositors a dollar of wild-cat, and no depositor of any self-respect, will take a dollar of wild-cat from any bank. A man who will compromise his account with a bank is guilty of a wrong. He is encouraging fraud."

Meanwhile, the Illinois banking system had collapsed, and may be said to have ceased to have a controlling power in Chicago's financial system by August, 1861. The official statement of the Illinois State Banks on November 30, 1860, contained the names of one hundred and ten solvent banks and eleven suspended banks, whose notes were redeemed at the State treasurer's office. The one hundred and ten solvent banks had an aggregate circulation of $12,320,694.00, based on the following securities, deposited with the State Treasurer:

SOUTHERN SECURITIES.		NORTHERN SECURITIES AND SPECIE.
Missouri 6's.....	$3,026,000	Ohio 6's.....	$ 284,854 96
Tennessee 6's.....	3,321,000	Iowa 7's.....	91,000 00
Virginia 6's.....	1,284,000	Michigan 6's.....	442,000 00
Louisiana 6's.....	507,500	Michigan 7's.....	50,000 00
North Carolina 6's.....	853,000	Minnesota 5's.....	140,000 00
South Carolina 6's.....	100,000	New York 6's.....	282,000 00
Georgia 6's.....	335,000	United States 5's.....	19,000 00
Kentucky 6's.....	66,000	Ill. & Mich. Canal.....	531,618 86
		Ill. New Internal Improvement Stock.....	323,238 27
		Illinois 6's.....	1,418,000 00
		Specie.....	42,861 00
	$9,527,500		$4,452,473 09

At the time of deposit the Southern States bonds were nearly all at par and considered reliable security.

Two years afterward, November, 1862, there were but twenty-two solvent banks reported, while ninety-three were reported as suspended, or in process of closing business.

Of the solvent banks the circulation had been reduced to $566,163, as against $12,320,694 two years before. The securities deposited by these banks to secure the redemption of their outstanding circulation were as follows:

Illinois 6's.....	$692,279 52
United States 5's.....	15,000 00
Ohio 6's.....	6,000 00
Missouri 6's.....	4,000 00
North Carolina 6's.....	2,000 00
	$719,000 00

The banks in liquidation were wound up, and had managed to pay on an average nearly sixty per cent. on their currency. The bills of the failed banks were redeemed as follows:

American Bank, Vienna.....	79½ per cent.
American Exchange Bank, Raleigh.....	51 "
Agricultural Bank, Marion.....	63½ "
Alisana Bank, Sullivan.....	55½ "
Bank of America, Mt. Carmel.....	93 "
Bank of Aledo, Aledo.....	67 "
Bank of Albion, Albion.....	68 "
Bank of Aurora, West Aurora.....	53 "
Bank of Benton, Benton.....	53 "

Bank of Brooklyn, Brooklyn.....	78½ per cent.
Bank of Carmi, Carmi.....	54½ "
Bank of Chester, Chester.....	54½ "
Bank of Commonwealth, Robinson.....	53 "
Bank of Commerce, Vienna.....	73½ "
Bank of Elgin, Elgin.....	66 "
Bank of Federal Union, Rock Island.....	63 "
Bank of Geneseo, Geneseo.....	68½ "
Bank of Indemnity, Gallatia.....	95 "
Bank of Jackson County, Carbondale.....	79 "
Bank of Metropolis, New Market.....	64 "
Bank of Naperville, Naperville.....	64 "
Bank of Northern Illinois, Waukegan.....	par
Bank of Peru, Peru.....	par
Bank of Pike County, Griggsville.....	63 per cent.
Bank of Quincy, Quincy.....	60 "
Bank of Raleigh, Raleigh.....	57 "
Bank of Republic, McLeansboro.....	55 "
Bank of Southern Illinois, Bolton.....	56 "
Belvedere Bank, Belvedere.....	52½ "
Bond County Bank, Greenville.....	73 "
Bull's Head Bank, Ste. Marie.....	70 "
Canal Bank, Thebes.....	58½ "
Central Bank, Peoria.....	75 "
Chicago Bank, Chicago.....	par
Citizen's Bank, Mt. Carmel.....	55 per cent.
Commercial Bank, Palestine.....	56 "
Commercial Bank of New Haven.....	54½ "
Continental Bank, Grandville.....	58 "
Corn Exchange, Fairfield.....	60 "
Corn Planter's Bank, Marshall.....	54 "
Columbian Bank, Elizabethtown.....	71 "
Douglas Bank, Metropolis.....	55 "
Eagle Bank of Illinois, Thebes.....	70 "
E. I. Tinkham & Co.'s Bank, McLeans- boro.....	par
Franklin Bank, Greenville.....	63½ per cent.
Farmers' Bank, New Canton.....	64½ "
Farmers' Bank of Illinois, Metropolis.....	61 "
Farmers' and Traders' Bank, Charleston.....	50 "
Frontier Bank, Benton.....	53 "
Fulton Bank, Vermont.....	80 "
Garden State Bank, Hutsonville.....	65½ "
Grand Prairie Bank, Urbana.....	55 "
Grayville Bank, Grayville.....	54 "
Hampden Bank, McLeansboro.....	58 "
Humboldt Bank, Naperville.....	56 "
Highland Bank, Pittsfield.....	85 "
International Bank, Raleigh.....	87 "
Illinois Central Bank, Newton.....	82 "
Illinois River Bank, Hardin.....	92 "
Illinois State Bank, New Haven.....	65½ "
Illinois Security Bank, New Haven.....	73 "
Jersey County Bank, Jerseyville.....	58½ "
Kaskaskia Bank, Sullivan.....	62 "
Kankakee Bank, Kankakee.....	72 "
Kane County Bank, Geneva.....	par
Lafayette Bank, Bloomington.....	57 per cent.
Lancaster Bank, Lancaster.....	55 "
Lake Michigan Bank, Harrisburg.....	70 "
Marshall County Bank, Lacon.....	86 "
Merchants' Bank, Carmi.....	81½ "
Merchants' and Drivers' Bank.....	61 "
Morgan County Bank, Jacksonville.....	52 "
Mississippi River Bank, Oxford.....	53 "
National Bank, Equality.....	60 "
Narragansett Bank, Vienna.....	49 "
New Market Bank, New Market.....	62 "
Ohio River Bank, Golconda.....	81½ "
Olympic Bank, Metropolis.....	71 "
Patriotic Bank, Hutsonville.....	86 "
Prairie State Bank, Washington.....	59 "
Pittsfield Bank, Pittsfield.....	81½ "
Plowman's Bank, Taylorville.....	53½ "
Railroad Bank, Decatur.....	55 "
Reed's Bank, Galesburg.....	65 "
Rock Island Bank, Rock Island.....	50 "
Shawanees Bank, Elizabethtown.....	63½ "
State Stock Bank, St. Johns.....	72 "
Southern Bank of Illinois, Grayville.....	56 "
Toulon Bank, Toulon.....	67 "
Union County Bank, Jonesboro.....	61 "
Warren County Bank, Moonmouth.....	70 "
Wheat Growers' Bank, Anna.....	70 "
Western Bank of Illinois, Savanna.....	62 "

Thus, in less than two years, the State currency of Illinois was virtually withdrawn, involving an apparent loss to the community which must have reached not less than three millions of dollars. It was the end of "wild cat" banking in Illinois. The final dissolution of the State system was attended with much business derangement which was concentrated and intensified in Chicago, at that time the great money center and business metropolis not only of the State, but of the great Northwest. The panic of 1857, as has been told, had sorely tried the banks and, under the stress of the storms, many weak banks had gone down. For two years thereafter there were few new banks established under the law, but under the stimulus of good crops and a prosperous business in 1859-60, new banks were called into existence and the volume of Illinois currency was increased nearly $3,000,000 in the latter year. Currency, such as it was, was never so plentiful in Chicago and banking never more profitable, than in November, 1860, at the time of Lincoln's election.

The destruction of the system, like that of slavery, seems to have been due to no human volition, but to have rather been forced upon the people through events over which men had no control. The first signs of trouble appeared in New York on the week following the November election. Immediately after Lincoln's election was assured, popular gatherings were held at all the chief cities of the South and the Rebellion was begun, and simultaneously the credit of all Southern banks became affected at New York, the great commercial center of Southern trade. Southern bonds depreciated enormously, the cotton trade was paralyzed, and enormous quantities of Southern bills of exchange, drawn on shipments of cotton, were returned dishonored by New York merchants. By the 20th of November, all financial confidence between the North and South was at an end; the Southern banks were suffering a most serious run at home, and the banks of New York were endeavoring to protect themselves by a wholesale contraction of loans, that threatened to bring the whole trade of the country to swift ruin. Nevertheless, there seemed to be comparatively little distrust of the system itself, although it was destined to complete destruction within a year, and was, within the short space of six months, to go out of existence as a recognized financial agency in legitimate trade. On November 14, 1860, the Chicago Tribune, which failed to foresee the impairment of securities which was so soon to come, editorially commended the "Stock-security system of banking;" and while deprecating the recent rapid increase in the number of banks, expressed its belief that the amendment to the existing law already noticed (requiring the banks to establish agencies for redemption at Chicago and Springfield) would relieve it of all objectionable features.

In the same issue, the Tribune showed how far the adherents of a "wild-cat" system were the victims of misplaced confidence in the ability of the West to weather the storm ("flurry"). The prophecy contained in the following editorial affords an illustration of the prevailing lack of understanding of the gravity of the financial crisis:

A SOLID FOUNDATION.—There is this much, at least, that is consolatory relative to the Secession movement and the financial flurry which has resulted. The North and West were never better prepared for it than now. The extraordinary bountiful crop which we have harvested the present season, the remunerative prices obtained for so much of it as has been disposed of, the close economy which has been everywhere practiced by our people, during the last three years, and their praiseworthy endeavors throughout that period to relieve themselves of indebtedness, have placed the country upon a solid basis, and it has but little to fear from even a protracted financial revulsion. There is no reason to believe that the panic which now prevails in the Southern cities, and to some extent in New York also, will extend to the Western States to a degree that will greatly affect our money market, or seriously depress the general business of the country. It is not probable that the excitement will continue much longer in New York City. Private advices last evening indicate the existence already of a better feeling, and we shall confidently look for an entire reaction within a few days. Let it be remembered that the flurry is the result of political causes, aggravated by the bad financial condition of the South alone. The commercial relations of the North and West are entirely healthy and on a solid foundation. If any one has entertained fears that disaster was about to overtake the business of the country, they may dismiss them at once. Our position is too strong to be greatly disturbed.

One week after the foregoing editorial was published, the storm had broken on the Illinois banking system, and the same paper, still reflecting the sentiment of the banks, gave a report of the situation. Under the heading, "The Illinois Banks," it said: "It is useless longer to ignore the fact, painfully evident to every man who is obliged to buy a draft on New York, or has occasion to use gold, that our Illinois currency is worth only from ninety-three to ninety-five cents on the dollar." With a self-gratulation somewhat remarkable under the circumstances, it added: "For this result we feel in no wise responsible. We have forewarned our readers again and again, and now that what we predicted is upon us, we have no other motive in what we write than to help the public out of their present financial difficulties, and to pave the way for the enactment of such amendments to our Banking law as will effectually protect the people in the future."

An examination, by the bank commissioners, of the securities in the hands of the auditor, had disclosed the fact that about one-fifth of the banks were short, and a call had been made on them to put up additional securities within thirty-five days, or to withdraw a corresponding amount of circulation. Yet a pledge was drawn up and put in circulation, binding banks and bankers to make no discrimination in Illinois currency, and the Tribune spoke hopefully of the prospect of its success, and added: "We see no cause, therefore, for any anxiety or alarm in regard to the currency of Illinois. The ultimate loss upon our currency must be small, and we advise all, therefore, to-bear calmly and patiently whatever losses they are forced to sustain by the high rates of exchange, in the assurance that the Legislature will provide effectually against the recurrence of such a swindle in the future."

The following is a list of the banks to which the aforementioned circular was addressed:

American Exchange Bank.....	$16,231
Bank of Aurora.....	32,485
Bank of Chester.....	6,466
Bank of Commonwealth.....	9,218
Bank of Naperville.....	2,500
Bank of Pike County.....	5,126
Bank of Quincy.....	24,582
Citizens' Bank.....	5,515
Corn Exchange Bank.....	25,602
Farmers' and Traders' Bank.....	7,607
Grand Prairie Bank.....	6,385
Grayville Bank.....	40,991
Lafayette Bank.....	4,944
Merchants' and Drovers' Bank.....	4,542
Morgan County Bank.....	5,743
National Bank.....	8,709
Prairie State Bank.....	2,043
Railroad Bank.....	5,057
Reed's Bank.....	3,666
Southern Bank of Illinois, Grayville.....	22,444
State Bank of Illinois.....	30,778

And a few days after, the banks and bankers of the city, believing that not all of them would respond to the call, agreed to throw out the notes of the following banks: American Exchange Bank, Bank of Aurora, Bank of the Commonwealth, Bank of Raleigh, Corn Exchange Bank, National Bank, State Bank of Illinois.

The Tribune, in noting this fact, said: "On the rejected notes, the people who hold them must charge the losses to that pestilent little State of South Carolina, whose threats of secession are at the bottom of all this trouble."

On the 30th of November, 1860, it became apparent that the utter collapse of the whole system of bond-security was inevitable. Wholesale business, and notably the packing trade, was virtually at a stand-still. Large amounts of currency accumulated in the banks, deposits having increased, and but few remittances being made, owing to the high price of exchange, which was selling at seven per cent. The monetary article of the Tribune of that date endeavored to maintain its hopeful tone, and contained the following paragraph:

ILLINOIS BANKS.—Nothing new has transpired in relation to the rejected Illinois Banks. Most persons are wisely holding what they have till after the thirty-five days allowed by the bank commissioners to put up margins shall expire, when we shall know more nearly what their bills are worth. They will doubtless be worth more than they are now, and most of them will probably be taken at par. They are now bought at 80 cents on the dollar.

From this time things grew rapidly worse; indeed there was no cessation in the decline of Southern stocks, and no surcease of excitement on the part of those holding Illinois bank bills based on them, until the last bill had been retired and the last bank put in liquidation. The result of the collapse has already been given.

The Legislature convened January 7, 1861, when banking matters were at their worst. Nearly half the bank issues of the State were discredited, and many banks were already in the hands of receivers or were being wound up under the provisions of the law. Even then there was, measurably, a popular sentiment of confidence in the system, if only amended to suit the new emergencies which had arisen.

To perfect the law a new act was passed, which was approved and went into force February 14, entitled "An Act to amend the General Banking Law, in such manner as to afford greater security to the public." It provided for the exchange of depreciated stocks deposited with the auditor, for such State or United States stocks as had ruled at par value, or above, for the past two years; and defined more specifically the process of winding-up without delay the banks unable to exchange or make good their securities. All new banks chartered were to bank on Illinois State bonds and no others. It was further made the duty of every State bank doing business or located elsewhere than in Springfield or Chicago, to appoint agents, in either of the two cities named, for the redemption of its circulating notes; and it was enacted that every bank whose agent should neglect or refuse to redeem its notes on demand, at a rate of discount not exceeding three-quarters of one per cent., until January 1, 1862, and not exceeding one-half per cent. thereafter, should pay to the person making such demand interest upon the notes so demanded at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum; and if such notes should not be redeemed within twenty days from the time when first demanded, the bank defaulting to be put in liquidation by the auditor. The law required a semi-annual statement of the financial standing of each bank, sworn to by its executive officers, to be filed with the State Auditor on the first Monday of July and January of each year. The circulation was restricted to three times the actual bona fide capital paid into the bank, and no bank thereafter could be organized nor more circulating notes be given to banks already organized, unless said bank should have a bona fide capital of twenty-five thousand dollars or more, actually paid in, in good faith, for the purpose of remaining in such bank as capital; and it was declared that the bonds deposited with the auditor for the redemption of bills, should not be considered as any evidence of the existence of capital in any such bank, nor any evidence of the amount or extent of such capital. Masters in chancery and judges were forbidden to grant injunctions to restrain the auditor from putting any bank in liquidation, or from selling their bonds for the redemption of their bills.

The further provisions of the amendment were believed by its friends to be such as to render the law as effective and safe as any that human ingenuity, prompted by the experience of the past, could devise. But, in spite of the law and the amendment, the basis of circulation was rapidly deteriorating, and, except as it provided more prompt and direct means of liquidation, the law was a dead letter from the time of its passage. Few new banks were organized under its provisions, although the few that survived exchanged their securities as required.

The following elected Chicago as their point of redemption, and appointed agents as below stated:

Union Bank, Boston—Ruxton & Co., Chicago, Agent.
 Treasury Bank, Griggsville—Western Marine & Fire Ins. Co., Chicago, Agent.
 Sycamore Bank, Sycamore—H. Doolittle, Chicago, Agent.
 Reapers' Bank, Fairfield—Merchants' Savings Loan & Trust Co., Chicago, Agent.
 Producers' Bank, M'Leansboro—H. Doolittle, Chicago, Agent.
 Grundy County Bank, Morris—H. Doolittle, Chicago, Agent.

The above list, with the Marine Bank, located in Chicago, comprised all that remained of the State Banks at the close of 1861, in which the city of Chicago had a direct local interest. Their circulation was as follows:

Union Bank.....	$39,000
Treasury Bank.....	22,495
Sycamore Bank.....	5,100
Reapers' Bank.....	56,645
Producers' Bank.....	6,800
Grundy County Bank.....	5,100
Marine Bank.....	11,933
Total.....	$147,073

There seemed to be, even among the legislators, a lurking suspicion that the old system had had its day. No National system had, as yet, been evolved. With a view to changing the system, or, of at least submitting the proposition of a change to the people, an act was passed during the same session, framed after the model of the Indiana and Ohio State bank laws, and providing for the establishment of a Union State Bank of Illinois, with branches throughout the State. The act was entitled "An act to establish a General System of Banking upon a Specie Basis, in the State of Illinois," and was to be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection at the next general election. Under the provisions of this act, the "Union Bank of Illinois" was to continue for the term of twenty-five years from the date of its organization, and for such longer period as might be necessary promptly to close its business under the provisions of its charter. S. Staats Taylor, Maurice B. Brown, James Mix, Thomas A. Marshall, J. Young Scammon, Robert Smith, Zadoc Casey, Francis A. Hoffman, Theron D. Brewster, William Brown, of Jacksonville, James W. Singleton, Lewis Howell and Thomas J. Turner were appointed commissioners, who were to "provide the act was ratified by the people) divide the State into not less than ten nor more than thirty bank districts, and locate one branch of said bank in each district. The bill was rejected at the polls by an overwhelming popular vote, and thenceforth, until the establishment of National banks, Chicago and Illinois depended almost entirely on outside State currency for its circulating medium.

The rejection of this bill by popular vote virtually closed the era of banking under the laws of the State, the few surviving banks still doing business under their old charters, having a circulation so small as to be unimportant as a factor in the enormous and constantly increasing business of the early years of the War. Thus the necessities of the time forced the bankers of the city to provide the currency from sources outside the State, consisting of United States demand notes (greenbacks) and notes of State banks, which after the suspension of specie payments (December 28, 1861) were increased in volume enormously and flooded the West, where their circulation proved a constant source of profit to the banks of issue and their allies, the Western banks whose business it was to put and keep them in circulation. Owing to the constant demand for money in the legitimate channels of trade which the war had stimulated, and the lack of ordinary business caution, which increased as the speculative mania rose higher, there was almost no limit to the amount of paper money which the West absorbed. Chicago became the great disbursing center from which the country was flooded with State bank bills, a large proportion of which were known to be as unsound as any ever in circulation, and none of which longer represented a specie basis. They gradually drove greenbacks,* virtually, out of circulation, and for nearly three years had full sway in Chicago and the tributary country. These bills were redeemable in legal tender notes at their various places of issue, many of them being entirely out of the paths of western trade, and the best of them (New York and Massachusetts State bills) being subject to a discount whenever it was desirable to convert them into a form to pay Eastern debts. The bankers of Chicago, however, not being responsible even for their pseudo-redemption were satisfied to deal in them so long as the people would borrow them at high rates of interest, and they were readily received on checks, and otherwise performed all the local functions of money; indeed, so largely extended had their business become on the inflated basis of this State money that to suddenly discredit it would have brought many of them to ruin.

The approval of the bill for the establishment of National banks, which occurred March 25, 1863, opened the way for a larger supply of reliable currency, and the establishment once more of local banks of issue in the West, the bills of which would be current in all parts of the country where the United States government was acknowledged. The great mass of State bank bills, then filling all the avenues of trade, stood as a serious obstacle in the way of the establishment of such banks, and the commercial public soon began to murmur against the further use of a wild-cat currency when a more stable form was within its reach.

In May, 1864, it seemed to have become determined throughout the West that the currency of all State banks should cease to circulate or be recognized as money, and that only greenbacks and National Bank bills, based entirely on the faith of the National Government, should be recognized as such. Nearly every country paper reported the sentiment of the people as favoring the movement. At Galesburg, on the 26th of April, the merchants of that city resolved "That on and after May 10, United States Treasury notes and National Bank notes should be the standard of currency and that in all money transactions those only, or their equivalents, should be received or paid out." The First National Bank of Galesburg indorsed the resolutions of the business men's meeting. At a convention held at Dixon, Lee County, the following was passed:

Resolved, That while we deplore the shameful negligence of Congress, we do most cheerfully indorse the bold and determined course of the Chicago Board of Trade, in its endeavors to rid the Northwest of a worthless currency that has been too long taken for money, and we pledge ourselves to assist in driving home the worthless trash, and substituting greenbacks and National Bank notes."

The papers throughout Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan gave like reports of the sentiment of the merchants, and indorsed them editorially.

The bankers of Chicago did not unanimously respond to the popular desire for an immediate change. Their interest and safety required delay for the adjustment of their affairs to the proposed new order of things. Many bankers had their entire capital invested in the currency which it was proposed to discredit, and they viewed with serious apprehension the results to themselves and the business interests of the city, which might follow so sudden and violent a contraction in the volume of the circulating medium. The trade, however, less timid, met the issue promptly, and, it is truth to say that the bankers followed its lead with becoming alacrity, and co-operated in a most creditable manner to avert the commercial disasters which they had feared.

The subject was discussed at large popular meetings held at the rooms of the Board of Trade and through the columns of the Press. The Board of Trade took action favoring the adoption of greenbacks and National Bank notes as the only currency to be recognized as current money in commercial transactions, and named May 15, 1864, as the time the rule should take effect. Consultations were had with the bankers, who objected most strenuously to the proposal, but, gradually yielding to the popular wish, fell into line and helped carry out the reform. On May 9, 1864, the following manifesto was published.

"We, the undersigned, members of the Board of Trade, agree, on and after the 15th, to base all transactions, either buying or selling, on legal tender treasury notes, or their equivalent:

Munn & Scott,	H. H. Harrison,
B. P. Hutchinson,	R. P. Whitney,
Tribune Company,	George M. How,
Culver & Co.,	Hobbs, Oliphant & Co.,
Armour, Dole & Co.,	J. Conway,
Cragin & Co.,	A. J. Hoagland,
J. H. Dole & Co.,	D. S. Mudge,
J. M. Williams,	Brayton & Young,
R. & S. P. Carter,	T. H. Seymour & Co.,
F. Edwards,	Richard S. Thomas & Co.,
Charles Sanford,	J. H. Hall & Co.,
Tomblin & Bro.,	Parker, Colton & Sprague,
A. C. Williams,	Graeff & Hendrix,
E. K. Hubbard,	Bevans & Co.,
Alfred Smith,	Rumsey Bro. & Co.,
Charles Randolph,	Munger, Wheeler & Co.,
J. J. Richards,	Albert Morse & Co.,
A. Eichhold,	Sam M. Nickerson & Co.,
Francis M. Mitchell,	E. W. Mitchell,
Gilbert, Uplike & Co.,	Van Wagenen & Co.,
Spruance, Preston & Co.,	C. S. Hutchens & Co.,
M. S. Garwood,	J. Brown,
Miller & Wilmarth,	O. W. Clapp,
W. T. Knight,	Hubbard & Hunt,

* A vast amount of the compound interest U. S. notes were absorbed and held as a profitable investment, these were therefore necessarily retired from circulation.

Germain, Gibbs & Co.,
 Lee & Aates,
 Hawkins & Chapman,
 M. S. Nichols & Co.,
 Phillips & Bro.,
 J. Maple & Co.,
 Lyon & Murray,
 Davis, Pope & Co.,
 Allen Howe,
 Irwin & Morey,
 A. Bloom,
 Kimball & Wolcott,
 Albert E. Neeley,
 Joseph McDonald & Co.,
 Charles G. Wicker,
 Hayt, Whaling & Co.,
 J. C. Dore,
 F. Drake,
 S. Gupton,
 D. R. Holt,
 E. K. Bruce,
 A. A. Rankin,
 J. W. Foss,
 S. S. Williamson & Co.,
 Tarbell, Emmons & Co.,
 Hamlin, Modler & Co.,
 C. J. Plate,
 A. T. Spencer,
 Richmond & Hancock,
 Joseph Dawe,
 G. D. Dickinson,
 Sherman, Hall & Pope,
 George R. Crittenden,
 George F. Williams,
 M. Gray & Co.,
 J. B. Thompson,
 G. T. Elliott,
 Walter S. Frazier,
 Linsley & Hanchett,
 W. D. Houghtaling,
 Joseph H. Tucker,
 Bensley & Shinn,
 G. P. Adams,
 Sam T. Atwater,
 George Ellison,
 Levi Higgins,
 Howe & Robbins,
 F. D. Oertel & Co.,
 Gibson & Chase,
 J. H. Gale & Co.,
 Julian Kune & Co.,
 G. & J. Watson,
 Maitland & Scranton,
 W. N. Braunard,
 W. Norton,
 C. H. Pendleton,
 Daniel Jenkins,
 Boynton, Webster & Co.,
 A. Salomon,
 C. A. Rogers,
 Bedford, Meredith & Co.,
 William Little & Co.,
 J. B. Taylor,
 Dickinson & Son,
 Murry Nelson & Co."

Three days later, the bankers manifested their intention to adopt the rule on the date named, as follows:

"The undersigned, banks and bankers of the city of Chicago, hereby agree that on and after Monday, May 16, 1864, we will receive on deposit, at par, and pay out at par, only Legal Tender notes, National Bank notes, and the notes of such other banks as redeem at par in the city of Chicago.

"It being understood that all the checks dated prior to May 16, may be paid in the present currency, and all balances due between banks and bankers, on Monday morning, are to be settled on the same basis.

"EDWARD I. TINKHAM, Cashier of the Second National Bank; E. E. BRAISTED, Cashier of the First National Bank; J. YOUNG SCAMMON, private banker; A. C. BADGER & CO.; W. H. WAITE, Secretary Western Marine and Fire Insurance Co.; S. A. SMITH, President Merchants' Saving Loan and Trust Company; J. M. ADSIT; J. G. CONRAD; PRESTON, WILLARD & KEAN; IRA HOLMES, Cashier of the Third National Bank; C. B. BLAIR; JOSIAH LOMBARD, President of the Fifth National Bank; SOLOMON STURGES & SONS; W. F. COOLBAUGH & CO., per CONNELL; ROBERT REID, Agent of the Bank of Montreal; H. DOOLITTLE; JAMES BOYD; TYLER, ULLMAN & CO.; S. A. BRIGGS, Cashier of the Fourth National Bank; C. C. PARKS & CO.; LEOPOLD MAYER & CO.; HENRY GREENEBAUM; GEORGE C. SMITH; RUTTER, ENDICOTT & CO.; N. B. KIDDER, Cashier of the State Savings Institution."

The disappearance of the State Bank bills from circulation was not followed by any serious disaster. National banks were rapidly organized, and, by the close of the year, business was being done, for the first time in the history of Chicago, with a currency having a uniform value in all parts of the country.

In the fall, a few banks and bankers that had been quite largely extended on the State Bank issue, had done a purely speculative business, or had been running with inadequate capital, were forced to stop business. On September 29, C. C. Parks & Co. failed; on September 30, J. G. Conrad failed; October 1, the Western Marine and Fire Insurance Company failed; and on October 11, even the reliable Merchants' Loan and Trust Company got into such difficulties, financially, as to compel it to a temporary suspension of active business. There was something of a panic for a week or two, but the financial ship suffered no damage in the slight but sudden storm which overtook it.

The Tribune, which had been a staunch champion of a National currency from the beginning, summarized the history and the situation at the close of the year as follows:

"At a meeting of bankers and others, on May 7th, a proposition to fix upon a greenback basis was voted down. A week later it was adopted, so rapid was the change in public sentiment when fairly directed to the subject. 'Rag money went down' and made no sign." None of the evil bodings of the timid or the interested came true. There was forthwith enough of the new and universal currency to take its place, and the result showed what we urged from the first, that we have the staples the country must have, and what will always bring money and the best money if we demand it. It is beyond our present purpose to dwell here upon the full benefits of the change in system, and it is unnecessary, since they have been brought home to every reader. In former years, in the best times, exchange on New York has ruled from 1 to 5 per cent., liable to be carried by the slightest panic to 18 or 20 per cent. This burden and this peril have been lifted from our trade. Exchange on New York throughout the year has averaged at par.

"So rapidly has the National Bank system grown, that we have now seven National Banks in prosperous operation, as follows:

BANKS	PRESIDENTS.
First National.....	E. Aiken.
Second National.....	J. A. Ellis.
Third National.....	J. H. Bowen.
Fourth National.....	B. Lombard.
Fifth National.....	Josiah Lombard.
Mechanics' National.....	J. V. Scammon.
Northwestern National.....	B. Sturgis.

"The Manufacturers' National Bank has just been organized, with a capital of $225,000. The directors are Hon. William H. Brown, L. B. Taft, D. J. Lake, William Bross, James Kelly, Charles F. Gray and J. H. Wicker. The directors subsequently elected Hon. William H. Brown president, and David J. Lake cashier. The bank has taken the office recently occupied by the Marine Bank, and will commence business early in January. This is the eighth National Bank established in this city, and there are three or four others nearly ready to go into operation under equally favorable auspices and associations. By the opening of the next business season, the amount of capital of National Banks in this city will exceed four millions of dollars, and will result in the transformation of most of our best and most solid institutions to the new system. The simple statement of such proof of indorsement of the National Bank system in an uniform National currency by our ablest and best established men is a significant fact that requires no stay by added comments of ours. To give an adequate idea of the extent of the banking interests of this city, we shall venture on only a few comparative general statements of facts well sustained and susceptible of careful proof. The banking transactions of Chicago are all for cash. It stands as the paymaster of the great Northwest, and disburses the millions in currency required to move its great food staples. Each year, by the opening of new channels and development of new currents of trade, has evidenced our legitimate and inevitable fall. The banking capital of Chicago, at the close of this year, has more than doubled in the past twelve months, and is three times as large as that of 1862. We are now in the packing season, a period of heavy disbursements, but then it must be remembered that there is a complete lull in the transactions in grain. For the last sixty days the amount handled by our bankers daily is ten millions of dollars.

"Within the past fortnight one of our leading banking houses in a single day shows transactions reaching two million and a half of dollars, and there are other instances almost equally striking. It must be remembered that this is currency, actually handled, counted, piled, and carried away. One million dollars a day goes into the country to the producer. Well may the bankers rejoice that the days of rag money are over."

From the close of 1864 to the time of the great fire, October 8, 1871, the National banks furnished (excepting greenbacks) abundant currency for the transaction of business. There was a season of unbroken prosperity, and the history of banking shows no features of interest further than an increase from year to year of banking facilities, as the increasing wants of trade demanded, by the chartering of new National banks and the increase of the capital and circulation of those already doing business.

At the time of the fire there were seventeen National banks and ten private banking institutions. The National Bank capital was $6,800,000, with an undivided surplus of capital amounting to $2,715,000. The total bank capital of the city was $12,250,000.

The individual history of some of the bankers and the banks which were in business existence during the period embraced in this volume are given in the following pages.

The banks and banking institutions in operation in 1860-61, as found in city and banking directories, annual reviews, and elsewhere, were as follows:

BANK OF AMERICA.—South Wells, between Lake and South Water streets. This is the last appearance of this bank. It was

R. Dickinson, cashier. Capital $250,000. In Special Directory of December 12, 1871, after the great fire, William Richardson appears as manager; office Madison Street, northwest corner Market.

The Bank of Montreal, with headquarters in Montreal, Canada, is one of the oldest and the largest banking institutions on this continent. It has ever had a prosperous career, having paid average dividends of over nine per cent. since its organization. In 1860, a branch office was opened in this city, under management of E. W. Willard, in the old Metropolitan Block, where it remained until 1867, it being under the management of E. W. Willard and others. In 1867, the bank closed its Chicago office, withdrawing from the business here until in the fall of 1871, immediately after the great fire, when a branch was again opened, taking temporary quarters in the old Union Block, on Madison Street, near the bridge. In 1872, a removal was made to the location so long occupied in the building at the southeast corner of LaSalle Street and Madison. In May, 1885, it removed to its present quarters, at No. 226 LaSalle Street, near the new Board of Trade building. William Munro, the present manager of the bank here, has been in Chicago since 1876, at which time he succeeded William Richardson. He first entered the employ of the home bank when but eighteen years of age, and went through, step by step, the various grades of promotion until he reached the position he now holds. Mr. Munro is a native of Canada, born in 1836. He first came to Chicago in 1865, as an accountant in the branch office of the bank here, but six months later was recalled to the home office, where he remained until ten years later, when he returned to this city, which has since been his home.

WESTERN FIRE & INSURANCE COMPANY.—No. 57 Dearborn Street. President, J. H. Woodworth; Secretary, W. H. Waite.

WESTERN MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE BANK.—Corner State and Randolph. Last noticed in 1862.

WESTERN WORLD INSURANCE AND TRUST COMPANY BANK.—No. 144 South Water Street. Chartered in 1853. Last appears in Directory of 1862.

ILLINOIS SAVING INSTITUTION.—No. 104-106 Washington Street. Organized in 1855-56. First President, John H. Kinzie. Last appears in 1862.

MERCHANTS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY.—In 1856, the views of Chicago's financiers on the question of banking might have been grouped under two categories. It is not too much to add, that the men who assumed to be financiers might also have been divided into two classes—those who had money to lend, and those who saw in the "wild-cat" banking system a method of borrowing money from the general public. Meetings of capitalists who failed to cherish the prevalent confidence in the wisdom and ultimate success of the theory on which most of the Illinois banks were founded and conducted, were frequently held. Among those who attended such meetings, and whose names afterward became identified with the city's financial prosperity, were Walter L. Newberry, John High, Jr., Henry Farnham, H. H. Magie, John H. Dunham, George Steele, John H. Foster, Jonathan Burr, Isaac N. Arnold, William B. Ogden, John Wentworth, A. H. Burley, Luther Haven, D. K. Holt, Mahlon D. Ogden, George Armour, F. B. Cooley, Grant Goodrich, William E. Doggett, E. K. Rogers, Edwin Blackman, Cyrus H. McCormick, Amzi Benedict, Asher Carter and Solomon A. Smith. These men deplored the return to his native land (Scotland) of the great capitalist and conservative banker, George Smith. They early foresaw the consequences which ultimately followed the almost unlimited expansion of the currency resulting from the "wild cat" and "stump-tail" heresies.

Strong efforts were put forth to secure a legislative delegation in favor of a uniform standard of value, and of protection for the business men and the laboring classes from the schemes of men who desired to become bankers without capital of their own. John H. Dunham (afterward the first president of the institution) and Isaac N. Arnold (one of its earliest trustees) were elected representatives. Through their efforts, a charter for the bank was obtained, although the friends of unlimited, worthless, paper money were said to have opposed the granting of a franchise, and to have employed a large and influential lobby to defeat it. The charter was approved on January 28, 1857, and has remained unchanged until chartered July 19, 1852, by George Smith and Elisha Willard (George Smith & Co.), with $1,000,000 capital.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK AND RUINS.

CHICAGO BANK OF I. H. BURCH & CO.—Lake, corner of LaSalle Street. Incorporated July, 1852, the firm being I. H. Burch and Samuel Howe.

MARINE BANK.—Lake, corner of LaSalle Street. Chartered January 13, 1852. President, J. Young Scammon; cashier, Edward I. Tinkham. Original capital $50,000; increased in May, 1852, to $500,000. Officers in 1859—President, J. Young Scammon; cashier and secretary, B. F. Carver. 1860—President, J. Young Scammon; cashier and secretary, Hamilton B. Dox. 1863—President, J. Young Scammon; cashier, J. W. Underwood; assistant cashier, Samuel S. Rogers. Re-organized in 1863 as Marine Company of Chicago.

MARINE COMPANY OF CHICAGO.—Re-organization, in 1863, of Marine Bank. Capital $500,000. President, J. Young Scammon; assistant secretary, Samuel S. Rogers; assistant treasurer, E. C. Long. 1866-69—President, J. Young Scammon; manager, Robert Reid. 1870-71—President, J. Young Scammon; manager, Robert Reid; secretary, Samuel S. Rogers; treasurer, Eugene C. Long.

F. GRANGER ADAMS organized his bank in 1852.

BANK OF MONTREAL.—No. 46 LaSalle; E. W. Willard, agent. In Directory of 1866-67 appears as Branch Bank of Montreal, Canada, No. 45 LaSalle. G. C. Smith and Bro., agents; J.

the present day. In the following March the institution was organized.

The following gentlemen constituted the first Board of Trustees: John H. Dunham, John H. Foster, William E. Doggett, Augustus H. Burley, Jonathan Burr, Henry Farnham, William H. Ogden, Walter L. Newberry, Isaac N. Arnold, F. B. Cooley, John High, Jr., George Steele and D. R. Holt. John H. Dunham was elected the first president, and so continued until compelled, by failing health, to seek relief in travel. He was succeeded by the late Henry Farnham, who served but a short time, when he removed to New Haven, Conn. Solomon A. Smith followed Mr. Farnham, and continued to fill the office until his death, November 25, 1879. Mr. Smith, by his long continued service, his fidelity, his foresight, and his uncompromising hostility to every scheme of dishonest banking, won a National reputation. There is no name associated with the history of Chicago banking more honored than his. To him the character and reputation of his institution was as sacred as his own, and he had no respect for the man who could draw a distinction between corporate and individual honor and honesty. John Tyrrell succeeded Mr. Smith, and served until 1884. He was unwilling to give up his private business, and would only consent to accept the office upon the condition that he might retire as soon as a satisfactory successor could be found. Such a successor was found in John W. Doane, the present incumbent, who is the fifth president in a period of twenty-eight years.

John High, Jr., was the first vice-president. He lost his life in a fire on Lake Street, in 1857, and Walter L. Newberry then succeeded him. He declined a re-election, and Jonathan Burr was chosen in his place, and served until his death. He was followed by H. H. Magie.

John High Jr.
(High & Magie)

The first cashier was A. J. Hammond. Being about to return to Hartford, Conn., he resigned the office, and was succeeded, temporarily, by M. B. Bartlett. D. R. Holt was elected his successor, and continued to serve until 1862, when he was followed by Lyman J. Gage.

There have been but few changes in the board of trustees, Mahlon D. Ogden succeeded his brother, William, in 1858. In 1859, Solomon A. Smith succeeded Isaac N. Arnold, on the latter's election to Congress. George Steele succeeded H. H. Magie.

The utmost harmony in policy has characterized the management of this institution from the beginning, there having been no changes of officers, except those resulting from death, voluntary resignation, or removal from the city.

The charter fixed the amount of capital stock at $500,000, with liberty to increase it to $2,000,000, and fixed the par value of the shares at $100 each. Subscriptions to the stock came in rapidly, and the shares soon appreciated in value. The first increase in the amount of stock was made in 1867, after which it was raised to $1,000,000. In 1873 it was raised to $1,500,000, and in 1882 to $2,000,000, the limit named in its charter.

The institution was first opened in Dickey's Building, where it remained until the fire. It is now in the Portland Block, at the corner of Washington and Dearborn streets.

JOHN H. DUNHAM, one of the prominent early settlers of Chicago, was born in Junius, Seneca Co., N. Y., in 1817. Until he was seventeen years of age he lived with his father on a farm, when he started out to make his own way in the world—and, it is needless to say, that he made it. Going to Waterloo, N. Y., he learned the hardware trade, and commenced business for himself in 1839. He thus continued until 1843, when he sold out, and in the spring of 1844 removed to Chicago. Here Mr. Dunham engaged in the wholesale grocery business, and in the spring of 1848, when the impurity of the water supply made it imperative that the old hydraulic works should "go," he was the power behind the throne which inspired the Press of the city—especially John L. Scripps—to cry aloud for new Water Works. He also was instrumental in framing the bill for the appointment of a board of water commissioners and the establishment of the new system. In 1856, he served a term in the State Legislature, and all his efforts as a legislator, supplemented by his labors as a merchant and a banker, were directed toward the expulsion of the foreign and local irredeemable paper currency then flooding the channels of trade. In 1857, he assisted in the organization of the Merchants' Saving Loan and Trust Company of Chicago, and was elected its first president, retaining this position until 1862, when he resigned, and resumed mercantile pursuits. During Mr. McCulloch's administration as secretary of the treasury, he was appointed bank-examiner of this State, and served some time. Mr. Dunham has also been identified with the Chicago Historical Society from the first, being one of its most trusted and prominent members. Although recognized as one of the city's most substantial residents, he has never sought public offices, and the positions of trust which have come to him have been solicited, and a tribute to his inherent worth.

EDWARD H. HADDUCK, one of Chicago's earliest and among its wealthiest settlers, was born in Franklin, New Hampshire, on April 2, 1811. His father was William Hadduck, a farmer, a merchant and a tanner of Franklin, who early in life married as his first wife, Daniel Webster's sister. His second wife was Lucretia Kimball, and the mother of Edward H. Hadduck. For many years after leaving school Mr. Hadduck worked upon his father's farm, a portion of which had been sold to Daniel Webster, and there was intimately associated with the great statesman. Mr. Hadduck came to Chicago in 1833, and as the United States Government was at that time supplying the Indians with provisions, he took the contract of supplying bread, and, after procuring a practical baker from Buffalo, established a bakery at this point. At the end of one year he sold his interest, and a short time afterward built a warehouse for the storage of grain at the corner of Wabash Avenue and South Water Street. During President Harrison's administration, Daniel Webster procured for him the appointment of Internal Revenue Collector for this district, which position he most acceptably filled. In 1835, he purchased a lot on Lake Street, between Dearborn and State streets, and erected thereon a dwelling house. About the same time, he bought the old Mansion House from Dexter Graves, but how long he continued in the possession of that hotel property can not be ascertained. He was one of Chicago's first aldermen, serving the city in that capacity when William B. Ogden was mayor. He was for many years connected with the Marine Bank as a stockholder, and also with the Loan and Trust Company, resigning his position a short time before his death, which occurred May 30, 1881. Mr. Hadduck was a man of exemplary habits, and was always known as a strong advocate of total abstinence and temperance in all things. The record of his life is one of honesty and integrity, and his death was a public loss. He was married in Chicago, in 1834, to Miss Louisa Graves. They had one daughter, Helen, now the wife of John DeKoven.

E. H. Hadduck

THE PRAIRIE STATE LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY.—Chartered in 1859. No. 95 West Randolph Street. Capital $100,000. President, B. Wheeler; vice-president, M. D. Buchanan; secretary, H. P. Churchill; cashier, C. B. Meyer; trustees, B. Wheeler, J. W. Scoville, O. Cronkhitte, H. P. Churchill, P. W. Gates, S. W. Rawson, T. Buchanan, C. B. Meyer, M. D. Buchanan. 1871—President, J. W. Scoville; cashier, C. B. Meyer.

The Prairie State Loan and Trust Company was organized and chartered, with banking privileges, under charter granted by special act of the Legislature on February 22, 1860. The place of business was then at No. 95 West Randolph Street, and the first officers were Bacon Wheeler, president; M. D. Buchanan, vice-president; and C. B. Meyer, cashier. In 1872, the company erected their present building at No. 110 West Washington Street, which was completed and occupied during that year. In 1871, Mr. Wheeler retired from the presidency, being succeeded by James W. Scoville, who was elected his successor on July 15 of that year. The present officers of the company are—James W. Scoville, president; Charles Burton Scoville, vice-president, elected in November, 1879; George Van Zandt, cashier, elected in September, 1876, vice Mr. Meyer, resigned; and George Woodland, assistant cashier, since January, 1881. In addition to a general banking business, the company have safety-deposit vaults, and a savings department. The capital of the company is $100,000, with a surplus fund of $45,000. It is a matter of justice to say that the affairs of this company have been, from the first, so managed as to gain the confidence of the business public, and that, owing to this safe and conservative policy, it has won the position it now holds as one of Chicago's soundest financial institutions.

JAMES W. SCOVILLE, president of the Prairie State Loan and Trust Company, was born in Pompey, Onondaga Co., N. Y., on October 14, 1822. There he was reared and educated, and, on attaining his majority, entered a business life. In 1856, he came West, and located in this city, which has since been his home, and where he took the position of cashier for the old firm of Gate, Warren, Chalmers & Fraser, and was later the assignee of that company, and subsequently, on winding up their affairs, helped to organize the Eagle Works Manufacturing Company, of which he was both secretary and treasurer for a number of years. In 1862, he severed his connection with that company, and engaged in the real-estate business until 1871, with the exception of three years, when he was appointed to the position of assistant county treasurer, during which time he was acting county treasurer. In 1869, he became one of the founders of the company with which he is still connected, and of which he has been the executive officer for the past fifteen years. Mr. Scoville is a man of acknowledged ability, and, as a financier, he ranks with the leading bankers of the West. He is cautious and conservative in his business policy, and prefers to make money slowly but surely, rather than enter into brilliant schemes, that, while they promise much, can not be depended upon to always yield fair returns. It is this characteristic of Mr. Scoville that has marked his success as a banker, and which has doubtless done so much to advance the institution, of which he is the head, to the position it now holds among the financial institutions, not only of Chicago, but of the West. Mr. Scoville married, in 1853, Miss Mary A. Huggins, daughter of Spencer C. Huggins, of Orleans County, N. Y. They have one son, Charles Burton, who is vice-president of the bank. Mr. Scoville is a resident of Oak Park, where his liberality and good judgment are visible in all its enterprises, his influence being felt in every interest of the village. His donations to church, school and library have exceeded, perhaps, those of any other citizen. Among his recent gifts may be mentioned that of $75,000 to the Oak Park Public Library Association, for the erection of a new library building, which will be one of the finest in the West. In addition to this munificent bequest, Mr. Scoville has also provided this institution with an endowment, amply sufficient for its maintenance, stipulating only that, when completed, the library shall be open to the public free of charge.

CHICAGO SAVINGS INSTITUTION AND TRUST COMPANY.—Chartered in 1857. Officers in 1871: President, B. W. Phillips; cashier, C. F. W. Jungé.

UNION INSURANCE AND TRUST COMPANY.—Chartered in 1857. Officers in 1871: President, S. W. Rawson, cashier, William B. Hoswell. Location, prior to the fire, at No. 133 Dearborn Street; branch, No. 336 Milwaukee Avenue. After the fire, No. 37 Madison Street.

RUTTER, ENDICOTT & Co.—Corner Lake and Clark streets. Joseph O. Rutter and William F. Endicott. Organized in 1860. Subsequently merged into the Traders' Bank and Trader's National Bank.

REAL ESTATE LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY.—Chartered in 1861. President, Benjamin Lombard. Location: Nos. 105-107 Monroe. Officers in 1871: President, Benjamin Lombard; vice-president, S. A. Briggs.

MERCHANTS', FARMERS' AND MECHANICS' SAVINGS BANK.—No. 52 Clark Street. Incorporated in 1861. President, S. H. Fleetwood; vice-presidents, Francis C. Sherman and P. R. Westfall; cashier, Sidney Myers. 1866-70—No. 13 Clark Street. Officers same as before. Special Directory of December 12, 1871: No. 61 South Halsted. President, P. R. Westfall; cashier, Sidney Myers.

THE STATE SAVINGS INSTITUTION OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO.—Incorporated February, 1861. No. 104-106 Washington Street. President, John C. Haines; vice-president, George Schneider; cashier, N. B. Kidder; assistant cashier, C. D. Bickford. 1866-67: No. 82 LaSalle Street. Same officers as above. 1868-69: No. 80-82 LaSalle Street. President, George Schneider; vice-president, L. B. Sidway; cashier, N. B. Kidder; assistant cashier, C. D. Bickford. 1870: President, John C. Dore; cashier, N. B. Kidder. Special Directory of December 12, 1871: South side of Madison, near Market Street. President, J. C. Haines; cashier, C. D. Bickford.

"BEE HIVE" BANK.

1863.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—First location, southwest corner of Lake and Clark Streets. Capital, $600,000. Officers: President, E. Aiken; cashier, E. E. Braisted; directors, E. Aiken, S. W. Allerton, S. G. D. Howard, B. P. Hutchinson, Samuel M. Nickerson, Tracy J. Bronson, John B. Sherman, Byron Rice, E. G. Hall.

The First National Bank was organized May 1, 1863, with a capital of $100,000. Its location was then on the southwest corner of Lake and Clark streets, and its officers as follows: President, E. Aiken; vice-president, Samuel M. Nickerson; cashier, E. E. Braisted; directors, E. Aiken, S. W. Allerton, S. G. D. Howard, B. P. Hutchinson, Samuel M. Nickerson, Tracy J. Bronson, John B. Sherman, Byron Rice and E. G. Hall. Mr. Aiken died in January, 1867, and Mr. Nickerson, the present incumbent, was elected to succeed him. In August, 1868, Lyman J. Gage was appointed cashier. The great fire partially destroyed the bank building, and after a temporary removal, on January 1, 1872, the management occupied their re-built structure, corner of Washington and State streets. The safes and vaults of the building had been quite unharmed; not a security or valuable was lost, and the business has proceeded uninterrupted after the week of the fire. The First National Bank passed successfully through the trials brought on by the fire of 1871 and the panic of 1873. From 1868 to 1882, its capital was $1,000,000, and upon the expiration of its charter, during the latter year, its reserve, or surplus fund over dividends, was found to be $1,800,000. In May, 1882, a new organization was effected under the same designation, with a cash capital of $3,000,000. Lyman J. Gage then became vice-president and general managing, or executive, officer. At this time, also, the magnificent new building, at the northwest corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets, was erected. From the last report of the bank, made March 10, 1885, it is seen that its capital is $3,000,000; surplus $500,000, and undivided profits $262,000. Its officers are as follows: President, Samuel M. Nickerson; vice-president, L. J. Gage; cashier, H. K. Symonds; assistant cashier, H. M. Kingman; and second assistant cashier, K. J. Street.

SAMUEL M. NICKERSON, president of the First National Bank of Chicago, is a man whose name is justly a synonym for financial stability and enterprise. He comes of old Puritan stock, being born in Chatham, Mass., June 14, 1830. In 1837, his parents removed to Boston, but, four years thereafter, returned to Chatham. It was in these two localities, therefore, that the son obtained his first and last schooling, spending a portion of his early years, also, on his father's farm near the latter town. In 1847, he removed to Apalachicola, Florida, where, for a number of years, he acted as a clerk in his brother's store. In 1851, he commenced business himself as a dealer in general merchandise and lumber, but, in the spring of 1857, all his property was destroyed. But Mr. Nickerson was far from being a ruined man. Although, for a time, he was compromised with his creditors, within five years he paid them in full, although not legally bound so to do. Removing to Chicago in 1858, with a small sum of money which was loaned to him by his friends, he bravely launched out again into the business world. As a distiller of alcohol and high-wines, he rapidly accumulated a fortune, and, in 1864, was able to retire from active business. During that year he became president and the controlling spirit in the Chicago City Horse Railroad Company, and brought it into the most prosperous condition. For seven years he remained at the head of affairs, and resigned in 1871 his banking interests having grown to such proportions as to require his entire attention. In 1863, he was elected first vice-president of the First National Bank, and continued this until 1868, when he became president. He erected the magnificent fire-proof bank building, at the corner of State and Washington streets, in 1867-68—one of the very few structures in the business district of the burned district whose walls withstood the fierce onslaught of the hurricane of flames on the memorable "eighth of October." Mr. Nickerson's elegant private residence on the North Side, however, did not escape their fury. Ten years thereafter, he built one of the most palatial residences in the city, situated on the corner of Cass and Erie streets. In 1881-82, he erected the grand structure, corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets, occupied by the First National Bank, which is another tribute to his business energy and enterprise. The quarters occupied by the bank are among the largest and most elegantly appointed of any similar institution in the country, there being in its employ about one hundred officials and clerks. Besides being at the head of this powerful financial institution, Mr. Nickerson is heavily interested in the Union Stock-Yards National Bank, which he himself organized in 1868. For two years he acted as its president, resigning in 1870, but still continuing on its board of directors. But Mr. Nickerson has not devoted himself to money-getting at the sacrifice of his love for the beautiful and appreciation of the enjoyment of all the luxuries of home life. His spacious residence is rich with foreign marbles, his bookcases lined with costly and rare volumes, and his walls hung with rich paintings—many of these treasures having been collected during the four seasons of European travel which he has enjoyed during the past decade.

LYMAN JUDSON GAGE, president of the American Bankers' Association, and vice-president of the First National Bank, was born June 28, 1836, in Madison County, N. V. Eli A. Gage, his father, was a hatter by trade, and one of the early settlers of that county. Young Gage, when only seventeen years of age, commenced his long and successful banking career, by entering the Oneida Central Bank, at Rome, N. Y. Two years later, in October, 1855, he came to Chicago and connected himself with the lumber and planing establishment of a Mr. Cobb, then situated on the corner of Adams and Canal streets, upon the present site of the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago depot. Mr. Gage was a man of all work, and has delivered many thousand feet of lumber at the Pittsburg depot. He, in fact, did every-honest thing which came to his hand, having a name and a fortune to make by his own exertions, without the aid of money, or even friends. In 1858, he became a bookkeeper of the Merchants' Loan and Trust Company, at a salary of $500 per annum. In 1863, he was promoted to the position of assistant cashier, and a few months later received the flattering offer of the position of cashier of the First National Bank. Here Mr. Gage found a board of directors capable, progressive, and at the same time wisely conservative, thus supplying all the conditions and elements necessary for the growth and development of his own abilities. The prosperity of the bank proved to be his own, and Mr. Gage has now come to be recognized as one of the most substantial and broad-minded bankers in the country. His abilities were recognized in 1883, at the annual convention of the American Bankers' Association, held in Louisville, by his election to the presidency of that organization. In August, 1884, the convention was held at Saratoga Springs, and Mr. Gage was re-elected.

RUINS, SECOND NATIONAL BANK

1864.

SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—Lake, northwest corner of Clark. President, J. A. Ellis; cashier, E. I. Tinkham. Special Directory, of December 12, 1871: Same officers as above. Office, No. 45 West Washington. About January 1, 1872, removed to 63 West Washington Street, and in the fall of 1872, to new rooms on the northwest corner of Madison and Clark streets; its officers then being J. A. Ellis, president, and John P. McGregor, cashier. Capital $1,000,000; surplus, $50,000.

THIRD NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 156 Lake Street. Capital, original and subscribed, $200,000. President, James H. Bowen; vice-president, Amos T. Hall; cashier, Ira Holmes. Directory of 1865-66: Capital $750,000.

FOURTH NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 4 Clark Street. Capital, $150,000. President Benjamin Lombard; cashier, S. A. Briggs; directors, H. E. Sargent, J. M. W. Jones, J. W. Sykes, Charles Tobey, Benjamin Lombard, Charles Comstock, Benjamin Lombard, Jr. Directory of 1865-66, gives as capital $500,000; authorized $1,000,000.

FIFTH NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 52 LaSalle Street (Metropolitan Block). Capital, $120,000. President Josiah Lombard; cashier, Isaac G. Lombard; directors, Josiah Lombard, Charles J. Gilbert, Thomas Sutton, Isaac G. Lombard, Marshall Ayres, Nelson Ludington, David McWilliams. Directory of 1865-66: Capital $200,000. Special directory of December 12, 1871: Bank corner of Madison Street and Fifth Avenue, late northeast corner Washington and Clark. President, C. B. Sawyer; vice-president, N. Ludington; cashier, Isaac G. Lombard; assistant cashier, E. B. Lathrop.

NATIONAL BANK OF AMERICA.—Prominent among Chicago's leading financial institutions is the National Bank of America, which was incorporated, under its present name, in January, 1883, being practically the successor of the old Fifth National, the charter of which expired about that date. The latter bank, which was controlled and officered by nearly the same men now associated with the National Bank of America, was chartered in February, 1864, being one of the early institutions operating under the National Banking Act, which had only been passed a year or two previously. Its first officers were Josiah Lombard president, and Isaac G. Lombard cashier; and the first place of business was in the old Metropolitan block, on the northwest corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets. In 1868, a removal was made to the northwest corner of Clark and Washington streets; and about that time Josiah Lombard resigned the presidency, being succeeded by Nelson Ludington. He returned to the East, where he had formerly lived and died there some years later. After the fire, and within seven days, the Fifth National Bank resumed business in a private house on Wabash Avenue, and a little later occupied quarters at the northwest corner of Madison Street and Fifth Avenue. They remained at this location until 1874, when they removed to the building at present occupied by the National Bank of America, at the northwest corner of LaSalle and Washington streets. In 1871, Mr. Ludington, desiring to travel for a time in foreign countries with a view of benefiting his health, resigned the presidency of the bank, and was succeeded by C. B. Sawyer, vice-president, who filled the position during the absence of Mr. Ludington, from 1871 until 1874. In 1874, after his return, the latter was again elected president, in which capacity he continued to serve until he died, January 15, 1883. The bank went into voluntary liquidation December 31, 1882. When the Fifth National Bank was first organized its paid-up capital was $120,000; but as the years went by, and its business became more and more prosperous, the capital stock was from time to time increased until it was $500,000, with a large surplus fund. This fact alone, without further comment, speaks much for the character and ability of those who directed its affairs, and who so successfully carried it through the financial perils incident to so long a career. The National Bank of America, as has already been stated, practically succeeded the Fifth National, and began business in January, 1883, with a paid-up capital of $1,000,000 and with as stable a footing as is enjoyed by any institution to-day in the West. Its officers, from the first, have been Isaac G. Lombard president, Byron P. Moulton vice-president, Edward B. Lathrop cashier and Charles A. Tinkham assistant-cashier.

ISAAC G. LOMBARD, president of the National Bank of America, is a native of Massachusetts, born in the town of Truro in 1835, the son of Lewis and Sarah Lombard. He was reared and educated at his birthplace. In the year 1850, he came to Chicago as general agent of the Union Savings and Trust Company, which corporation he continued to represent until 1864, when he severed his connection with it to become one of the founders of the old Fifth National Bank. Of this he was the cashier during the time of its existence, nearly twenty years, and during much of that period, was its acting and responsible manager. In 1883, he was the leading spirit in the organization of the National Bank of America, of which he was then made president, and which office he still holds. Mr. Lombard is regarded as an eminently successful financier, well deserving the position he holds to-day as one of the representative bankers of the West.

EDWARD B. LATHROP, cashier of the National Bank of America, is a native of Illinois, born in Jacksonville, Morgan Co., in 1845. He is the son of John W. and of Elizabeth K. Lathrop, who were among the early settlers of that country. He received his education in the schools of his native place, and, in 1868, came to this city, entering at once into the employ of the Fifth National Bank, first as assistant bookkeeper, and shortly afterward being made assistant cashier, which position he creditably filled until in 1883. On the organization of the National Bank of America, Mr. Lathrop was elected its cashier, an office he still holds.

MECHANICS' NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—Authorized capital, $1,000,000; paid-up capital, $250,000. President, J. Young Scammon; vice-president, Benjamin V. Page; cashier, C. F. W. Junge.

NORTHWESTERN NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 61 Dearborn Street. Capital, $500,000; authorized capital, $1,000,000. President, B. Sturges; vice-president, S. B. Sturges; cashier, George Sturges; directors, B. Sturges, S. B. Sturges, George Sturges, Shelton Sturges, E. Buckingham.

MANUFACTURERS' NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—First location, No. 154 Lake Street Organized December, 1864. Capital stock, $250,000. President, W. H. Brown, vice-president, Charles F. Grey; cashier, David J. Lake; directors, W. H. Brown, Charles F. Grey, David J. Lake, William Bross, Levi B. Taft, James Kelly, Joel H. Wicker. Before the fire, the bank had been for some time occupying a building on the northwest corner of Dearborn and Washington streets, where it was doing an immense business. The building was destroyed, but vault, papers, moneys, etc., were found in good condition.

RUINS, FIFTH NATIONAL BANK. COOLING-OFF A SAFE
TAKEN FROM THE RUINS.

1865-66.

UNION NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—Lake, northwest corner of LaSalle Street. Capital, $500,000; authorized, $1,000,000. President, W. F. Coolbaugh; cashier, C. J. Connell; directors, W. F. Coolbaugh, John V. Farwell, Wesley Munger, Daniel Thompson, Heman G. Powers, Clinton Briggs, C. T. Wheeler. Location before the fire of 1871, on southwest corner of LaSalle and Washington streets.

WILLIAM FINDLAY COOLBAUGH was born in Pike County, Pennsylvania, on July 1, 1821. The only educational advantages he received were those of a primitive village school. The last teacher he had, at the age of twelve years, was William Bross, the well-known editor, who was also lieutenant-governor of Illinois. When he was fifteen years of age, he went to Philadelphia, and there became assistant porter in a wholesale dry goods establishment, from which lowly position he worked himself up to that of confidential clerk, three years later, and afterward became manager of the firm's business in the western and southwestern country. In 1842, Mr. Coolbaugh determined to go into business for himself, and settled at Burlington, Iowa, where he became a merchant, and continued in the mercantile business for eight years. In 1850, he instituted the banking house of Coolbaugh & Brooks, and shortly thereafter his ability and integrity were recognized by his appointment as Loan Agent for the State of Iowa, in which capacity, he negotiated the first loan Iowa ever made, and issued the first bonds as evidence of that indebtedness. He remained at Burlington until 1862, when he moved to Chicago. At the outbreak of the Civil War, the State treasury being empty, Mr. Coolbaugh telegraphed the governor of Iowa that he could draw upon the bank for whatever money might be requisite to fit out that portion of the seventy-five thousand troops forming Iowa's quota. In many other ways he showed that, although a Douglas democrat, he was an American and a patriot to his heart's core. Upon his arrival in Chicago, he established the banking house of W. F. Coolbaugh & Co., at No. 154 Lake Street, the company comprising Francis W. Brooks, which represented the State Bank of Iowa until that bank ceased to transact business. In February, 1855, the bank of W. F. Coolbaugh & Co. was merged into the Union National Bank of Chicago, with a chartered capital of $500,000. William F. Coolbaugh was president. Charles J. Connell was cashier, and the directors were W. F. Coolbaugh, John V. Farwell, Wesley Munger, Daniel Thompson, Heman G. Powers, Clinton Briggs and Calvin T. Wheeler. Its habitat remained the same—the northwest corner of Lake and LaSalle streets. Mr. Coolbaugh speedily made his financial ability and judgment known and appreciated amid the monetary circles of Chicago, and was conceded to be one of the ablest gentlemen in that community. At the organization of the Chicago Clearing House, Mr. Coolbaugh was made its president, and upon the establishment of a National Banker's Association for the West and Southwest, he was, at the convention held in Chicago, in September, 1866, elected president thereof. It was also generally believed that if Samuel Jones Tilden had arrived at the presidential chair, in 1876, Mr. Coolbaugh would have been proffered the secretaryship of the treasury. He was twice married; the first time to a daughter of Judge Brown, of Kentucky, in 1844, and the second time to a daughter of C. F. V. Reeve, Esq., of Newburgh, New York. On the morning of November 14, 1877, the mortal remains of William F. Coolbaugh were found upon the steps of the Douglas Monument, close against the doors leading to the sarcophagus—the result of suicide during mental aberration. A meeting of the Board of the Good Samaritan Society was held, whereat Thomas Hoynes, Rev. Robert Collyer, Leonard Swett, A. L. Chetlain, Robert Hervey, William Vocke, Rev. H. W. Thomas and George S. Redfield passed resolutions eulogizing his broad and comprehensive charity, and deploring the death of William F. Coolbaugh, thus bearing its testimony to his "high moral character, unimpeachable integrity and great worth." The Chicago Board of Trade also passed resolutions of respect to the memory of the deceased; and, at the funeral, the following gentlemen officiated as pall bearers: Robert Law, M. C. Stearns, Solomon A. Smith, Nathan Corwith, Philip H. Sheridan, W. C. D. Grannis, Calvin T. Wheeler, Asa Dow, William Bross, Heman G. Powers, Jonathan Y. Scammon and J. W. Odell.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 36 Clark Street. Paid-up capital, $450,000. President, Chauncey B. Blair; cashier, Henry B. Symond; directors, C. B. Blair, Daniel A. Jones, John B. Turner and William Blair. At its last statement prior to the fire, its capital was $650,000; surplus, $300,000; deposits, $1,149,756. Officers: President, C. B. Blair; vice-president, J. K. Botsford; cashier, John DeKoven; assistant cashier, John C. Neely; directors, C. B. Blair, William Blair, Daniel A. Jones, C. J. Blair and J. K. Botsford.

J. K. BOTSFORD, one of Chicago's earliest hardware merchants, and, later, vice-president for a number of years of the Merchants' National Bank, was born in Newtown, Fairfield Co., Conn., on June 12, 1812, the son of M. K. Botsford. His boyhood was spent in his native State, where he received a good common school education. In 1831, Mr. Botsford entered upon a mercantile life in New York City, as clerk in a large wholesale dry goods house, where he remained ten years. About that time, however, he began to turn his attention to the West, where, with that foresight that has ever been marked in his character, he saw there were fields of enterprise far more inviting to a man of his temperament than existed in any of the States and cities of the East. In that year, accordingly, he arrived in Chicago, and began business operations by erecting the first store building ever put up on Lake Street. This was a frame structure, located at the northeast corner of that street and Dearborn, and its site is now known as Nos 92-94 Lake Street. Chicago is now one of the largest lumber markets in the world, but at that time, the lumber used in the construction of Mr. Botsford's first store was sawed at a little mill down in Indiana, on the Wabash River, and was transported from there to this city on wagons. His building completed, Mr. Botsford began in the stove and tinware trade, in 1833, and three years later took into partnership Cyrenus Beers, and the firm was then known as Botsford & Beers. At this time, too, they added to their business the manufacture of hard oil, the first firm to engage in that branch of manufacture in Chicago. The partnership thus formed lasted for ten years, when it was dissolved, Mr. Botsford continuing in the stove and tinware trade alone, and Mr. Beers still carrying on the manufacture of oil. In 1852, Mark Kimball took an interest in the business with Mr. Botsford, under the firm name of J. K. Botsford & Co. This connection lasted until 1865, when Mr. Kimball retired, and Mr. Botsford's two sons, John R. and Bennett B., were admitted to a partnership, the style of the business then becoming J. K. Botsford & Sons. This firm existed until the fire, when the business was discontinued. In that disastrous conflagration, Mr. Botsford's losses were very heavy, amounting to nearly $100,000 over and above his realizations on his insurance. At that time, too, he gave up active business, and has since practically lived in retirement at his home, No. 1704 Michigan Avenue. In the spring of 1859, he was elected alderman from the First Ward, and re-elected to the same position. It is almost needless to say that he made a faithful and efficient public officer. In 1833, Mr. Botsford was a witness to the treaty made with the Potawattemic Indians, by which they ceded to the Government a vast tract of territory in the Northwest, including, also, the country now immediately surrounding Chicago. And during a residence in Chicago of over fifty years, thirty-eight of which were spent in active business life, he has ever taken an active interest in all things tending to better the conditions of the city and its people. He is an earnest, yet unassuming, Christian gentleman, having been a valued member of the Clark Street Methodist Church since 1830. He has been one of the trustees of this organization since the date mentioned, and has for many years also held the position of treasurer. He has always, too, been a friend to education. He was one of the original projectors of the Northwestern University, at Evanston, and has, from the first, been one of its trustees and a member of its executive committee. In this, as in many other instances, he has contributed greatly to the moral and educational growth of our city, and by his whole life thus well and usefully spent, has endeared himself to all who know him as one of our oldest and most highly-esteemed citizens. Mr. Botsford married, on November 1, 1835, Miss Minerva Kimball, daughter of John P. Kimball, of Naperville, Ill. They have had three children; the two sons mentioned—the eldest of whom died in 1880—and Adelaide, the wife of Caryl Young, of this city.

COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 113 Clark Street. Capital, $200,000. President, P. R. Westfall; cashier, Charles Ennis; directors, N. O. Williams, W. H. Ennis, P. R. Westfall, M. S. Bacon, Charles Ennis.

CITY NATIONAL BANK.—Capital, $300,000. President, Asa D. Reed; vice president, Thomas J. Dobbins; cashier, James P. Taylor; directors, A. D. Reed, T. J. Dobbins, R. M. Hoogh, Thomas Harless, C. W. Cook, T. A. Shaw, A. B. Meeker, Winslow Bushnell, Richard Gregg. The City National Bank was organized February 1, 1865. At the meeting held that day, for the purpose of its organization, there were present A. D. Reed, the prime mover in the enterprise, Thomas Harless, Thomas S. Dobbins, C. W. Cook, T. A. Shaw, A. B. Meeker, Winslow Bushnell and Richard Gregg. A. D. Reed was elected president of the board and bank, Thomas S. Dobbins was elected vice-president, and A. C. Reed assistant cashier. On the 21st of the month, James P. Taylor was elected cashier. On the 16th of March, the president was instructed to engage three rooms in the new Board-of-Trade Building. On the 3d of April, the bank became a member of the Chicago Clearing-House Association. James P. Taylor resigned April 30, 1866, and was succeeded by W. A. Sutor. On the 13th of January, 1869, A. B. Miner was elected assistant cashier. On the 2d of August, 1870, the room formerly occupied by the Republic Insurance Company was rented, and, in May, 1871, the bank purchased lots Nos. 154, 156 and 158 Washington Street, paying therefor $110,000. On the 9th of January, 1871, Horatio Reed, brother of A. D. Reed, became vice-president of the bank, and A. B. Miner cashier. On the 9th of October 1871, the great fire destroyed the building of this bank, purchased the previous May. It was decided, on February 5, 1872, to re-build the structure, which was done at a cost of about $200,000. On the 27th of September it was voted to purchase A. D. Reed's undivided one-fourth interest in the building and lots on which it stood, and to pay therefor $50,000, the bank owning, at the time, one-half of the property. On June 25, 1874, A. D. Reed, on account of over-work in carrying the bank safely through the fire of 1871 and the panic of 1873, resigned the presidency, and his resignation was accepted, with regrets for its necessity and thanks for his valuable services to the bank during the two trying ordeals through which it had safely passed. Winslow Bushnell was then unanimously elected to the vacant presidency, and served until the bank went into voluntary liquidation, April 24, 1876. The depreciation of real estate, consequent upon the panic, of which the bank held large amounts, was the immediate cause of its failure. Its affairs were placed in the hands of N. H. Walworth, as receiver, who was succeeded by Augustus H. Burley, who made his final settlement with the Comptroller of the Currency in 1884.

TRADERS' NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.—No. 44 South Clark Street. President, Joseph O. Rutter; vice-president, F. Granger Adams; cashier, Thomas P. Tallman. The present Traders' Bank of Chicago, is the direct descendant of F. G. Adams' private banking institution, established in the spring of 1852, at No. 44 Clark Street. In 1863, Mr. Adams having moved to New York, the Traders' Bank was chartered under the State laws, with himself as president, and Thomas P. Tallman as cashier. After the consolidation with Joseph O. Rutter & Co.'s private bank, the officers remained the same. Soon afterward, the Traders' Bank, in common with most other "free institutions," was re-organized as the Traders' National Bank, and Mr. Rutter elected president, the new house occupying their quarters on Clark Street, and thus continuing until the great fire of 1871. During the interregnum occasioned by that calamity, the main office of the Traders' National Bank was at the residence of Mr. Rutter, on Wabash Avenue, with a branch at the sheriff's office, situated in the ruins of the old Court-house; and later in the Nixon Building, corner of LaSalle and Monroe streets; and in 1872, the business was concentrated in the Otis Building, corner of LaSalle and Madison streets. In 1878, the bank, being a close corporation, and having practically but two stockholders (Messrs. Rutter and Tallman), the National system was abandoned, and the management returned to a State charter, doing business thereafter under the name of the Traders' Bank of Chicago. Although for thirty-five years this institution has continued steadily to advance in business and in public confidence, its owners and officers never believed it to be for their interest to enlarge their sphere of operations by bringing into the organization a large number of shareholders. Although frequently solicited to enlarge their capital and to distribute the stock among the public, they have uniformly and persistently declined, preferring to keep the business of the bank within their own control, and thus avoid heavy taxation and large expenses.

JOSEPH O. RUTTER, president of the Traders' Bank, is the representative of the oldest and one of the most conservative and substantial financial institutions in Chicago. He is a native of Philadelphia, born November 2, 1836, and is the son of David and Esther (Ryerson) Rutter. On his father's side he is descended from the Rutters, who came to the State with William Penn, one of them, Thomas Rutter, being governor of Germantown. There and in that vicinity, for over two centuries, they have lived and died, engaging principally in the manufacture of iron. One of them opened the first iron mine in the State, establishing furnaces, etc. Others established furnaces and manufactories; and in that region a "Benjamin Franklin stove" is still in active use, which was turned out by Rutter & Potts (a son-in-law) some one hundred and twenty-five years ago. It is stated that Mr. Rutter is descended on his mother's side from Sara Kapalje, the first white child born in the province of New Netherlands. The silver tankard presented by the governor to that pioneer infant is now in the possession of Sara Kapalje Crandall, of Monticello, N. Y., a direct descendant of Sara Kapalje, the babe who, in 1625, obtained the prize. There is probably no older relic of provincial New York in existence. Coming down to more modern days, it is learned that David Rutter, the father of Joseph O., was a physician of many years' practice in Philadelphia. In 1849, when his son was only thirteen years of age, he removed his family to Chicago. Here the youth supplemented his primary education in the East by an attendance at various private schools in this city, until, in 1851, he obtained a situation as messenger-boy with George Smith & Co., bankers. After remaining for some years with that institution, and rapidly advancing his prospects in life he removed to Peru, Ill., and there connected himself with the banking-house of which Mr. Smith was a partner. He next settled at Galena, Ill., as confidential clerk and manager of the banking house of James Carter & Co. Returning to Chicago, he associated himself with the parent house, in a leading position, being paying teller. He remained with Smith & Co., until their final withdrawal from business. In 1863, F. G. Adams, who had been at the head of a private bank since 1852, removed to New York, and left T. I. Tallman to manage his affairs in Chicago. The charter of the Traders' Bank was then obtained. In 1864, Mr. Rutter, who, since the withdrawal of Smith & Co., had occupied a leading position as a banker, united his business with that of the Traders' Bank, and assumed the vice-presidency of the consolidated house, Mr. Adams remaining at its head. These continued the officers until the organization of the Traders' National Bank, when Mr. Rutter became its president. Mr. Rutter's career since then, with that of Mr. Tallman, is the history of the Traders' National Bank and the Traders' Bank. Before that time, Mr. Rutter was a member of the firm of Rutter, Endicott & Whitehouse, which occupied the banking room on the corner of Lake and Clark streets, formerly the place of business of H. A. Tucker & Co.

THOMAS P. TALLMAN, one of the oldest and most respected bankers in the city, has been a member of this profession for about thirty-three years, and associated with Mr. Rutter in the management of the Traders' Bank, for the past twenty-one. Mr. Tallman was born in Ontario County, N. Y., October 11, 1831, his parents being John and Carissa (Burt) Tallman. His father died when the son was eight, and his mother when he was fourteen years of age. After receiving his education, principally at the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y., in the fall of 1852, he came to Chicago. He was in the employ of Potter Palmer for one and one-half years, and finally in March, 1854, he entered the banking house of F. G. Adams, as his first clerk and man-of-all-work. The business of the concern was at first dealing in uncurrent money and land warrants, and Mr. Tallman's mercantile experience, added to his natural sagacity, made him peculiarly fitted to know the "false from the true." The brokerage business gradually developed into a general banking business. In 1863, Mr. Tallman had so advanced in his station and in the confidence of his employer, that he was left to manage his interests in Chicago. For about a year, Mr. Adams having removed to New York, the bank was conducted by Messrs. Adams & Tallman. Since 1864, as stated, Mr. Tallman has been associated with Mr. Rutter, as cashier, in the management of the Traders' Bank.

PRODUCER'S BANK.—No. 126 Lake Street. Capital, $200,000. President, H. Doolittle; cashier, L. S. Beardsley.

TREASURY BANK.—No. 68 Washington Street. President, James H. Woodworth; vice-president, B. F. Hadduck.

CHICAGO CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION.—Charter procured from the Legislature, and business commenced April 6, 1865. First officers: President, W. F. Coolbaugh; vice-president, Josiah Lombard. Clearing House committee: E. E. Braisted (chairman), E. I. Tinkham, Ira Holmes, A. C. Badger, L. J. Gage (manager), and George A. Ives. The total clearings and balances at the Clearing House from April 6, the date of establishment, until December 23, 1865, were—Clearings, $314,577,543; balances, $47,413,014. 1870—President, Sol. A. Smith; vice-president, J. O. Rutter; Clearing House committee: J. M. Adsit (chairman), E. I. Tinkham, L. J. Gage, M. D. Buchanan, John DeKoven (manager), and George A. Ives.

THE CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE was organized in January, 1865, by some twenty of the leading banking brokers and operators of the city. Business was commenced January 18, in a small room in H. H. Honoré's building, No. 53 Dearborn Street. The officers for 1865, were: President, John C. Hilton; vice-president, Calvin T. Wheeler; secretary, Solon McElroy; treasurer, W. H. Goodnow. Transactions at the Stock Exchange from January 18 to December 27, 1865, aggregated $53,045,875.

At the close of 1865, the total capital of incorporated banks was $6,820,000; estimated capital of private banks, $2,000,000; total, $8,820,000.

1866-67.

UNION STOCK-YARDS NATIONAL BANK.—Union Stock-Yards. Cashier, John DeKoven. 1871—President, William F. Tucker; vice-president, John R. Hoxie; cashier, Edward S. Stickney. Capital stock paid in, $100,000.

1868-69.

GERMANIA BANK.—Chartered in 1869. President, Charles Knobelsdorff; cashier, W. J. Haller.

NATIONAL LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY.—Corner Washington and LaSalle streets. President, George C. Smith; cashier, William A. Park; assistant cashier, J. J. McCarthy.

MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION SAVINGS BANK.—Corner Clark and South Water.

HIBERNIAN BANKING ASSOCIATION SAVINGS BANK.—Chartered, 1865. Corner Clark and Lake Streets. President, J. V. Clarke; first vice-president, R. Prindiville; second vice-president, Thomas H. Beebe; cashier, Hamilton B. Dox. 1870—Same as above.

CHICAGO BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION.—No. 125 Dearborn Street. Directors, B. H. Skinner, J. C. McMullen, S. E. Pinta, W. W. Boyington, Richard Edwards, G. C. Clarke, Oliver H. Horton. Secretary, George W. Sharpe.

GERMAN SAVINGS BANK.—Chartered in 1869. President, Henry Grenebaum; cashier, A. Wise.

REAL ESTATE LOAN & TRUST COMPANY.—No. 105-107 Monroe Street. President, Benjamin Lombard; cashier, M. D. Tiltonson.

SCANDINAVIAN BANK.—No. 2 Clark Street. President, Ferd. S. Winslow; cashier, William Winslow.

THE SWEDISH COMMERCIAL COMPANY SCANDINAVIAN BANK.—No. 149 LaSalle Street. President, C. P. J. Arion; manager, H. A. Burger; cashier, A. Foglesberg.

At the close of 1869, there were fourteen National banks in the city, with an aggregate capital stock of $5,900,000, and an available surplus of about $2,300,000. Private banks, aggregate capital about $3,000,000.

1870-71.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE.—No. 107 Dearborn Street. Organized in 1870. President, B. F. Hadduck; vice-president, P. C. Maynard; cashier, E. Maynard.

CORN EXCHANGE NATIONAL BANK.—Chamber of Commerce. President, Julian S. Rumsey; vice-president, S. A. Kent; cashier, Orson Smith. December 12, 1871, office No. 1, Lind's Block.

INTERNATIONAL MUTUAL TRUST COMPANY.—No. 51 LaSalle Street. President, Francis A. Hoffman; cashier, R. Schloesser. Capital, $100,000.

COMMERCIAL LOAN COMPANY.—No. 44 North Clark Street. President, J. T. Clarkson; cashier, Frank Mayer.

INTERNATIONAL MUTUAL TRUST COMPANY.—No. 147-149 Randolph Street. President, Berthold Lowenthal; vice-president, Julius Busch; cashier, Francis A. Hoffmann; assistant cashier, R. Schloesser.

The International Bank, formerly the International Mutual Trust Company, was incorporated under the latter name, by special act of the legislature, in 1867, and opened its doors for business in the spring of the following year. The location then was at No. 51 La Salle Street, and the first officers of the company were: F. A. Hoffman, president; Julius Rusch, vice-president, and Rudolph Schloesser, cashier. In 1870, the capital stock was increased from $100,000, the original amount, to $200,000. Under the reorganization effected at that time, B. Loewenthal became president, Julius Busch, vice-president; F. A. Hoffmann, cashier, and Rudolph Schloesser, assistant cashier. A removal was then made to the northeast corner of LaSalle and Madison streets, where it remained one year, when the location was again changed, this time to the site of the present Fidelity Trust Company's buildings, on Randolph Street, near La Salle. Here it was burned out in the great fire of 1871, being, however, so fortunate as to save all their papers, books, securities, money, etc., losing nothing except their office fixtures. Ten days following the fire they resumed business at No. 561 Wabash Avenue, remaining at that location until in May, 1872, when they removed to the old Boone Block, at No. 133 LaSalle Street. In the spring of the following year they took possession of the building they now occupy, at No. 108, on the same thoroughfare. In 1874, the capital stock of the bank was increased to $500,000, at which amount it still remains. The present officers are B. Loewenthal, president; H. A. Kohn, vice-president, and M. Schweisthal, cashier.

RUINS, MARINE BANK.

BERTHOLD LOEWENTHAL, the president of the bank, is a native of Germany, born in 1830. He is the son of Joseph and of Jetta (Ottelheimer) Loewenthal. His father was a merchant of Muhlengen, in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, and, aside from receiving an excellent education, Berthold was also given a thorough business training. In 1850, he concluded to try his fortunes in the New World, and accordingly, in that year, came to America, locating first in Cincinnati. In 1852, he removed to Rock Island, Ill., where he established himself in the mercantile line until 1867. In that year he came to Chicago, which has since been his home, engaging in merchandising until the fire of 1871. In 1870, however, as has already been told, he became identified with the International Mutual Trust Company, being elected its president, which executive office he held until its reorganization under its present form, when he was again elected to the same position. Mr. Loewenthal married, in 1861, Miss Nannie Kaufman, of Cincinnati, daughter of Wolf Kaufman, of Eberstadt, in Baden, Germany. They have had six children, three of whom are now living—Julia, Julius and Joseph. The latter is the eldest son, and is completing his education at the Polytechnic Institute of Boston, Mass.

FIDELITY SAVINGS BANK AND SAFE DEPOSITORY.

MERCHANTS' SAVINGS BANK, No. 155 and 157 LaSalle Street. President, Jacob R. Shipperd; treasurer, Charles B. Shedd. December 12, 1871: No. 164 Twenty-second Street.

UNION INSURANCE AND TRUST COMPANY, No. 37 West Madison Street. Branch, No. 336 Milwaukee Avenue. President, S. W. Rawson; cashier, W. B. Howells.

At the opening of 1871, there were sixteen National banks, having an aggregate capital stock of $6,550,000; surplus and other undivided profits, $3,041,359; deposits, $16,774,514; outstanding circulation, $4,906,424. Private banks had an aggregate capital of $3,000,000. The returns from the Clearing House, for 1870, were—Clearings, $810,676,036; balances, $80,910,416.

1871.

GERMAN NATIONAL BANK.—Organized in January, 1871. Capital, $250,000; authorized, $1,000,000. President, Henry Greenbaum; cashier, Herman Schaffner.

THE COOK COUNTY NATIONAL BANK.—Organized in August, 1871. D. D. Spencer, president. Capital, $300,000. This bank lost only its office furniture in the fire, its vaults remaining unharmed.

Some other bankers and private banking institutions, appearing in the various city and bankers' directories, are given below. The dates, however, are not to be accepted as authoritative, but as testimony of their existence during the year cited.

F. Granger Adams, No. 44 South Clark Street, 1852-63
 James F. Adams, No. 39 Clark Street, 1862.
 James M. Adsit, No. 39 Clark Street, 1852-1871.
 Aiken & Norton, No. 6 South Clark Street, Loomis Building, 1861; Room 1, Board of Trade Building, 1862.
 L. E. Alexander & Co., South Clark and Lake streets; Exchange Bank Building, 1860.
 B. F. Carver & Co., 1860.
 Benjamin F. Downing, No. 63 South Clark Street, 1860-1862.
 Albert S. Evans, No. 36 South Clark Street, 1860.
 Forrest Bros. & Co., No. 32 South Clark Street, 1860.
 Granger, Weldon & Co., Randolph, corner of South Market Street, 1860.
 Greenebaum Bros., No. 40 LaSalle Street and 156 Lake Street, 1854-62.
 Henry Greenebaum & Co., Nos. 156-58 Lake Street, 1862-71.
 Charles H. Ham & Co., No. 24 South Clark Street, 1860.
 Hoffman & Gelpecke, Nos. 44-46 South LaSalle Street, 1860.
 Jones & Patrick, No. 42 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 Lull & Mayer, South Clark corner Washington Street, 1860.
 Moreford Bros., No. 2 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 Albert C. Oertel, No. 75 South Dearborn Street, 1860-61.
 Lucius D. Olmsted, South LaSalle and Lake streets, 1860.
 Bezaleel W. Phillips, No. 8 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 Benjamin F. Quimby & Co., No. 54 South Dearborn Street, 1860-61.
 W. H. Rice & Co., No. 63 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 Charles F. Rockwell, No. 44 South LaSalle Street, 1860-61.
 A. T. Sherman & Co., No. 38 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 Lazarus Silverman, No. 50 LaSalle Street, 1860-60.
 Lazarus Silverman & Co., corner LaSalle and Randolph streets, 1870-71.
 After fire, temporary location at No. 562 Washab Avenue.
 Strong & Wiler Bros., No. 150 Randolph Street, 1860-61.
 (R. K.) Swift & (J. S.) Johnson, No. 60 LaSalle.
 F. G. Saltonstall & Co., No. 24 Clark Street, 1860.

Edward I. Tinkham & Co., No. 128 LaSalle. E. I. Tinkham banking since 1849 in Chicago. Firm of E. I. Tinkham & Co., 1855-63.

Hiram A. Tucker & Co., South Clark corner Lake Street, 1853.
 Ulrichs & Gendner, No. 6 Clark Street, 1860-61.
 White Bros., Randolph, corner South LaSalle Street, 1860-61.
 George C. Whitney, No. 38 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 E. K. Willard & Young, South Clark, corner of South Water Street, 1860-61.
 Wadsworth & Co., No. 66 South Clark Street, 1860-61.
 P. Woodward & Co., No. 80 South Dearborn Street, 1860-61.
 William P. Wright & Co., No. 34 Clark Street, 1860-61.
 Alpheus C. Badger & Co., Randolph, southeast corner of Dearborn, 1862-1871. A. C. & O. F. Badger, before the fire of 1871, No. 51 Dearborn Street. After the fire, No. 223 Michigan Avenue.
 C. B. Blair, Exchange Bank Building, 1862-63.
 James Boyd & Bro., No. 38 Clark Street, 1862-70.
 Brotherton & Nettleton, No. 47 Clark Street, 1862-63.
 Burkam & Sons, No. 17 Dearborn Street, 1862-63.
 Chapin, Wheeler & Co., Lake and LaSalle streets, 1862-63.
 Jacob G. Conrad, No. 63 Clark Street, 1862-63.
 Davenport, Ullman & Co., No. 32 Clark Street, 1862.
 Harvey Doolittle, No. 40 Clark Street, 1862-63.
 J. W. Drexel & Co., 1862-63.
 Solon McElroy, No. 38 Clark Street, 1862.
 Leopold Mayer, southeast corner of Clark and Washington streets, 1862-64.
 Leopold Mayer & Co., No. 63 Clark Street, 1864-67. Leopold Mayer & Steiner, No. 46 Clark; 1868-71. After the fire, No. 48 LaSalle.
 Meadowcroft Brothers, No. 22 Clark Street, 1862-69. No. 13 Clark Street, 1869-71.
 Benjamin P. Morris, No. 102 Washington Street, 1862.
 C. L. Niehoff & Co., No. 131 Randolph Street, 1862-63. No. 8 Clark Street, 1863-71.
 C. C. Parks & Co., southwest corner of Lake and Dearborn streets, 1862-63.
 William B. Rogers, No. 36 Dearborn Street, 1862-63.
 Kutter, Endicott & Whitehouse, Clark and Lake streets, 1860.
 Buxton & Co., northeast Clark and Lake streets, 1862-63.
 John B. Campbell, No. 55 Clark Street, 1862-63.
 J. Young Scammon, No. 156 Lake Street, 1862-68.
 Spydacker & Co., Nos. 60 and 57 LaSalle Street, 1862-71.
 Solomon Sturges & Sons, Nos. 15-17 Wells Street, 1862-63.
 Solomon Sturges' Sons, No. 1 Chamber of Commerce, 1864-67.
 S. Wadsworth & Co., No. 34 Clark Street, 1862-63.
 Wiley Brothers & Co., No. 157 Randolph Street, 1862-63.
 Willard & Kean, No. 1 Clark Street, 1862.
 Preston, Willard & Kean, 1863.
 Caryl Young, No. 24 1/2 Clark Street, 1862.
 Marc & Hectel, 1863.
 G. W. Woods & Co., 1863.
 Clausenius, Canda & Schnitzler, No. 4 South Clark Street.
 H. Clausenius & Co., successors, 1866-71.
 Cushman, Hardin & Bro., No. 37 Clark Street, and Cushman & Hardin, No. 87 Dearborn Street, 1866-71.
 Joseph M. Lyons & Co., No. 36 Clark Street, 1866-69.
 William H. Mallory, No. 34 South Clark Street, 1866-67.
 Scripps, Preston & Kean, No. 47 Clark Street, 1866-67; successors, Lunt, Preston & Kean, No. 47 Clark Street. Removed after the fire, to quarters in West Side Masonic Temple, corner of Randolph and Halsted streets.
 A. O. Slaughter, No. 36 Dearborn Street, 1866-71.
 George C. Smith & Bro., No. 42 South Clark Street, 1866-71; No. 92 LaSalle Street, 1871.
 Tyler, Ullman & Co., corner South Clark and Lake streets, 1866-68; successors, Wren, Ullman & Co., corner Dearborn and Lake streets, at time of fire.
 Winslow & Christiansen, No. 49 LaSalle Street.
 C. Follansbee & Sen, No. 50 Dearborn Street, 1866-71; corner Clark and Dearborn streets, October, 1871.
 Greenebaum & Foreman, No. 42 Clark Street, 1866-71.
 Granville C. Hammond, Dearborn and Clark streets, 1866-67.
 Collins & Ullman, No. 34 Clark Street, 1868-71.
 Ferdinand S. Winslow, No. 49 LaSalle Street, and No. 2 South Clark Street, 1868-71.
 Wilkins & Winslow, corner Clark and Lake streets, 1868-69.
 Ogden, Sheldon & Scudder, No. 162 Lake Street, 1871.
 Jacob R. Shipperd & Co., No. 155-157 LaSalle Street, 1869-71.
 Wilkins & Stone, No. 32 Clark Street, 1868-69.
 M. P. Stone & Co., corner Washington and Dearborn streets, 1870-71.
 Louis Sapieha, Union Building, No. 146 Washington Street, 1869-70.
 Charles Kozminski & Co., Marine Bank Building, Lake Street.

J. M. ADSIT, the oldest banker in this city, and vice-president of the Chicago National Bank, was born at Spencertown, Columbia Co., N. Y., in the year 1809. The date of his arrival in Chicago was April 2, 1838, and he first established a private bank at No. 37 Clark Street, in 1850. Although he continued to follow the career which he marked out so early, almost continuously for thirty-five years, he was active in many public enterprises. Among the institutions of former days in which he was much interested was the Mechanics' Institute, of which he was the first vice-president. In July, 1856, Mr. Adsit removed his bank to No. 39 Clark Street, where the great fire found him, and his early books and papers connected with its affairs were lost. After the fire, he went to No. 422 Wabash Avenue, and established his business successively on Wabash Avenue near Congress Street, and then in the Mason and Ogden Buildings. His success was continuous, and he is to-day among the substantial men of his profession in the city. In January, 1882, Mr. Adsit became vice-president of the Chicago National Bank, of which his son, J. M. Adsit, Jr., is the assistant cashier. His other son, Charles C. Adsit, is connected with the wholesale grocery establishment of Bannard, Lyman & Co.

CHANDLER & Co.—There has been established in Chicago for many years a special branch of banking that pertains exclusively to the buying and selling of real-estate mortgages, advancing money thereon, investing deposits therein, and loaning the banks capital on pledge of real estate only. The Mortgage Banking house of Chandler & Co. was originally started in 1858 by Peyton K. Chandler, the senior member of the present house, who removed that year from Vermont, where he had been engaged from early life in mercantile pursuits and in promoting and managing the railroads of the Connecticut Valley. His son Frank R. Chandler, now the other member of the firm, came to Chicago in 1860, after two years practical education in the Bank of Bellows Falls. He was for several years with the old Marine Bank, with E. I. Tinkham's clearing house for "Stump Tail" currency in War times, with Solomon Sturges & Sons' bank, and the Third National Bank, all institutions of this city long since defunct. The father was for many years president of the Union Stock-Yard and Transit Company, and director in the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company and in the Chamber of Commerce. The son was at one time secretary and treasurer of the Chicago Dock Company. Coming to Chicago after the crisis of 1857, at a time when everything was depressed, and after going through the greater crisis of 1873 unscathed, their views on real-estate values for money, loaning purposes have been eminently conservative. Their clientele is among the Savings Banks of New England and other wealthy corporations, including private investors who hail from New York, Boston, London and Paris. P. K. Chandler was born January 29, 1817, and F. R. Chandler on October 2, 1840. They belong to the Illinois Association of the Sons of Vermont. F. R. Chandler married on February 4, 1868, Anna S., daughter of Benjamin H. Buckingham, son of Alvah Buckingham, who built and owned the first grain elevator in Chicago. At this writing (1885) the latest generation of this Chandler family is represented by Alphonse Buckingham Chandler, born at Florence, Italy, February 23, 1878.

C. L. NIEHOFF & Co.—The private banking house now conducted under this name was established here in 1858, by C. L. Niehoff, its present sole proprietor. His first place of business was in the Metropolitan Block, corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets, where he was associated with Messrs. N. Eisendrath and G. Snyder. In 1860, he separated from this firm, and opened a banking office on his own account in the Sherman House, taking in as a partner his brother-in-law, Gustavus Troost. This partnership, under the firm name of C. L. Niehoff & Co., was continued for seventeen years, until broken by the death of Mr. Troost, which was in 1877. Shortly following this event, Adam Amberg became a partner in the firm, the name and style of which was then, as it now is, C. L. Niehoff & Co. Mr. Amberg remained a partner until 1884, when he retired from the business, which has since been carried on by Mr. Niehoff, as its sole proprietor. At the time of the great fire, Mr. Niehoff's office was in the building adjoining the old Marine Bank, where he was burned out, sustaining heavy losses. Within a fortnight, however, after that event, he resumed business on the West Side, in the loft of a brick building, situated on the corner of Lake and Clinton streets. He remained there one year, and then removed to Mungler's Building, corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets, and five years later to the corner of Washington Street and Fifth Avenue. In 1880, he moved to the Greenbaum Building, and in 1884, to No. 49 LaSalle Street. Mr. Niehoff is one of the oldest private bankers in Chicago, and also one of its highly esteemed citizens. He is a native of Prussia, being born in the town of Ochtrup, on March 24, 1824. His father, Bernard Niehoff, was a merchant, and owned considerable real estate. His son was given a liberal education, graduating, in 1842, from a seminary for public teachers, at Langenhorst, Westphalia, a province in Prussia. In 1845, having determined to try his fortunes in the New World, he came to America, and located in Ohio, near Cincinnati. There he followed school-teaching, until 1850, when he came to Chicago, which has since been his home. For two years he was engaged in teaching a parochial school in this city, after which he embarked in the wholesale and retail grocery trade, as a member of the firm of Niehoff Bros., doing business on the corner of North Clark Street, near Chicago Avenue. He was thus employed until 1858, when he founded the business of which he is still the head. He married, in 1860, Miss Catharine Jaeger, daughter of Joseph Jaeger, of this city.

SNYDACKER & Co.—In 1858, a banking and real-estate firm was established in Chicago, with the title of Eisendrath & Co., which comprised Nathan Eisendrath, Conrad L. Niehoff and Godfrey Snyder. In 1861, Messrs. Eisendrath and Niehoff retired from the firm, and Mr. Snyder took in his brother Moses as a partner, under the firm name of Snyder & Co. The firm continued until January, 1880, when Moses Snyder died, and his widow, Mrs. Bertha Snyder, became nominally a member of the firm, represented by her son, Alfred M. Snyder. The firm name has remained the same since 1861, and has been known throughout its long existence as one that has never had any financial difficulties; that has been conservative in its operations; and that has always stood upon so sound a financial basis as not to be obliged to ask any forbearance, and that acted so uprightly as never to require any pardon from a wronged client. Until 1878, or perhaps 1879, the house used to do a small banking business, but in that year it gave up the deposit transactions and gave its exclusive attention, in fiduciary matters, to mortgage banking. Snyder & Co. handle a great deal of suburban real estate, as well as a large quantity of their own property within the city limits. The firm do a large business in caring for the property and business interests of non-residents, and have a large number of clients in Europe, who justly repose the utmost confidence and trust in the discretion and care that Messrs. Snyder & Co. evince for their financial welfare.

Godfrey Snyder was born in Westphalia, Germany, on September 7, 1825, where he received his early education. After leaving school he followed the profession of teacher, soon occupying the position of preceptor in a prominent German institute. In 1853, he emigrated to New York, and two months later to Chicago, of which latter city he has been a resident since. He was preacher of the "Kehilath Anshe Maarab" (Congregation of the Men of the West), and was also teacher of a day school for three years in connection therewith, which was the oldest Hebrew congregation in Chicago. But, discerning that in a city having the vast promise of Chicago, commercial life was that in which large fortunes were to be made, he entered the grocery business with his brothers Moses and Louis Snyder, under the firm name of Snyder & Brothers. In 1858, the Sinai Congregation was formed, and he at once became a prominent member of the organization, subsequently being several times made its president. He has been a member of the Hebrew Relief Association for twenty-five years, and for many years was on its executive committee, and is also one of the trustees and secretary of the association for the rearing and educating of Jewish orphans. Mr. Snyder was also appointed German consul here in 1858, and filled that position for several years in the most satisfactory manner.

LEOPOLD MAYER.—The present banking house of Leopold Mayer was established in this city on October 15, 1855, by Leopold Mayer and O. R. W. Lull, a well-known attorney of this city, under the firm name of Lull & Mayer, with their place of business at No. 106 Randolph Street, up stairs. In 1858, they removed to rooms in the Methodist Church Block, and three years later the partnership was dissolved by Mr. Lull's retiring from the firm. The latter died, in 1871, being at that time a resident of Winnetka, Ill. He was a man of sterling worth and integrity, possessing fine abilities, and was universally esteemed. An idea of the mutual friendship and confidence existing between the partners, may be gleaned from the following facts. When the partnership was formed, Mr. Mayer was possessed of but little capital, and Mr. Lull furnished the funds, through his influence with prominent capitalists in the East, to whom he became personally responsible for their re-payment. On his retirement from the firm, he left this money in the hands of Mr. Mayer, taking and asking no other security than his personal note. It is almost needless to add, his confidence was not misplaced. Mr. Lull was an early settler of Chicago. As a lawyer, he was a useful and highly esteemed member of the profession. He was elected city attorney, in 1849, and, in 1855-56, was chosen as one of the permanent trustees of the Illinois Savings Institution, which was organized about that time. In 1861, Mr. Mayer formed a partnership with Raphael Guthman, under the firm name of Leopold Mayer & Co., which continued until April, 1865. He then carried on business alone for three years, when he formed a partnership with Henry Steiner, this connection lasting until the time of the great fire. When that catatrophe occurred Mr. Mayer was located at No. 46 LaSalle Street, and here he was burned out, losing almost every dollar he possessed in the world. All his books, papers and accounts were destroyed, besides $10,000 in legal tender currency, and a considerable amount in stocks, bonds and other securities. This was, of course, a terrible misfortune, but to a man of Mr. Mayer's energy, it was only a greater stimulus to renewed exertion. Accordingly, in March, 1872, he resumed business at No. 169 LaSalle Street, in the Nixon Block, and here, with his extended acquaintance and past record for fair and upright business dealings, he soon, in a measure, recovered from his losses, and entered fairly upon a prosperous financial career. In 1875, he removed to No. 169 Adams Street, to a building which he had himself erected, where he remained about five years. Finding, however, that this location was too far out of the business center of the city, in 1880, he removed to No. 73 LaSalle Street. He now has associated with him his son, Nathaniel A. Mayer, a young man reared and educated in this city, and possessing fine business qualifications.

Leopold Mayer is a native of Germany, born in Abenheim, near Worms, in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, March 3, 1827. He is the son of Aaron Mayer. He was given an excellent education at the Catholic Seminary in Bensheim, Hesse, fitting him for the profession of a teacher, which vocation he followed for four years in that country, after completing his collegiate course. In 1850, he came to this country, locating during the same year in Chicago, which has since been his home. His first work here was also as a teacher, giving private lessons in German and Hebrew, and in 1853, when the Garden City Institute was established, he became the professor of those languages in that institution, filling this position with marked ability until 1855, when he, in company with Mr. Lull, established himself in the banking business. Mr. Mayer married, in 1853, Miss Regina Schulz, daughter of Samuel Schulz, of Germany. They have seven children—Nancy, now the wife of Arnold Wolff, of this city; Nathaniel A., in business with his father; Rosa, married to Simon Klein; Grace Aguilar, married to Charles Yondorf; Amelia, Ida and Flora.

CHARLES KOZMINSKI & COMPANY started in the banking business in Chicago in 1870, Charles Kozminski and Herman Felsenthal comprising the firm, and with offices in the Marine Bank Building, on Lake Street. Having been burned out in the great fire, they re-established their business on Canal Street, then removed to West Washington Street, where Michael Felsenthal was taken into the partnership; and, in 1872, again removed to the Staats Zeitung Building, directly opposite their present office. In 1875, Michael Felsenthal retired from the firm, which dissolved nine years later. January 1, 1885, the firm name was changed to its present form, a real-estate and ocean steamship agency business being done by the members. Until 1884, the firm had the agency of the Hamburg-American Packet Company, but now it manages the direct Hamburg line and the Navigazione Generale Italiana with control of all agents from Chicago to the Pacific coast.

Charles Kozminski, the founder of the firm, was born near Breslau, Silesia, in 1837. He was educated in his native district, and, at the age of sixteen entered the employ of Goodman & Co., in the grain commission business, in the capacity of cashier. After following this vocation for two years, Mr. Kozminski came to America, engaging in Corning, N. Y., in the clothing line, and remaining there until 1856, in that and the general store business. In the latter year, he came to Chicago with his employer; afterward he started a grocery store at the corner of Wells and Monroe streets. In 1864, he transferred his capital to the dry-goods trade, abandoning mercantile pursuits five years later to organize the banking firm of Felsenthal & Kozminski, which was in existence until January 1, 1884, when the firm dissolved. Mr. Kozminski then organized the present business under the firm name of Charles Kozminski & Co. He occupies a high social position, and has filled numerous offices of honor and trust. He was the president of the first German Republican organization started in Chicago, called the Washington Club, and was elected president of the B'nai B'rith, an office controlling the lodges of Illinois and six other States. He is also Chicago trustee of the Cleveland Orphan Asylum. He was, also, president of the Relief Assembly. At the great fire, Mr. Kozminski worked in connection with Mr. Truesdale, the superintendent of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society. Mr. Kozminski has celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his marriage to Miss Bertha Bergman. They have had five children, all of whom are dead, except Maurice, now a member of the firm.

Maurice Kozminski, with the banking firm and steamship agency of Charles Kozminski & Co., was born in 1863, in Chicago, in the building at the corner of Wells and Monroe streets, where his father laid the foundation of a successful business career several years previously. He was educated in the public schools of this city, attending one of the oldest of these institutions, until he graduated to the High School. Being the only survivor of five children, the demands of his father's business required his services, and, at the age of sixteen, on June 16, 1879, he entered the offices of the firm, then located at 170 Washington Street. Shortly afterward, Mr. Kozminski made a trip to Europe, visiting his father's native town of Breslau, Silesia, and there met Mr. Goodman, a prominent operator on the Bourse, in whose employ his father acted as cashier in 1853. He then perfected his practical experience in the office by a thorough course in a first-class commercial college, and is now a valued and enterprising factor of one of the oldest steamship agency firms in Chicago.

INSURANCE.

With the exception of the commerce of this city, there is possibly no interest which has had so vital a connection with her welfare as insurance. Although it was many years before the practice of underwriting became general among the merchants, shippers and residents, yet the custom at last obtained a firm foothold, and, at the time of the conflagration of 1871, the residents of the city and those having destructible interests here, were very generally insured. And it was immediately subsequent to the fire of October 9, 1871, that the vitality of the insurance interests to those of the city was developed, not alone in the re-imbursment of the losses, but also in the leniency of some of the great Eastern companies who were heavy creditors of our scorched merchants.

Even as the payment of risks, matured and rendered payable by the fire, rejuvenated numbers of citizens who were losers by the fire, so the failure of other companies proved fatal to other sufferers by their insolvency. Hence it would seem, that of all places in the world where a "sick child" of an insurance company could exist, Chicago would be the poorest place. That this supposition is directly antagonized to the fact it is unnecessary to state.

The first company to establish an agency in this city was The Howard Insurance Company, of New York, which appointed Gurdon S. Hubbard its agent in September, 1836, and the first policy issued was one to Mr. Hubbard on his household goods.* In this year also The Chicago Marine and Fire Insurance Company was chartered, the date of the charter being January 13 (vide Vol. 1). Other early agents, the precise date of whose appointment is unknown, were David Hunter and Elijah K. Hubbard. In 1837, Julius Wadsworth was appointed agent of the Hartford Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., and that company has been continuously represented in this city since that date.

On March 2, 1839, the Illinois Insurance Company, of Chicago, was chartered, and on February 26, 1841, The Phoenix Insurance Company, of Chicago, received a charter. †

THEON PARDEE was born on July 15, 1817, in Herkimer County, N. Y., and came to Chicago in 1841, at the age of twenty-four years. From 1841 to 1852, he was engaged in the grain-trade, warehousing and shipping, and while so engaged built the first elevator in Chicago, which was operated by horse-power and a treadmill, and had a capacity of about forty thousand bushels. In 1842, also, he was appointed agent for the North-Western Insurance

* It is narrated that Mr. Hubbard was appointed agent for the Etna Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., in 1834, and in that year wrote the first policy in Chicago, or Cook County. If he was an agent at that time, he must have been a sub-agent to some agency elsewhere.
† It is necessary, and just, to acknowledge the valuable and voluminous data furnished by C. E. Rollins, personally and by his article on Insurance in The Argus for November, 1882.

Company, of Oswego, New York, for which company he wrote marine risks, thus being one of the earliest, if not the earliest, of Chicago's Marine Underwriters. Mr. Pardee does not remember having taken any life or fire risks during these days of primitive Chicago and primitive insurance—in which business he remained however for but a few years, retiring therefrom about 1850. When Mr. Pardee came to Chicago he came to act as agent for the line of Troy and Oswego propellers, and was thus the first propeller agent here. The "Vandalia" belonged to this line and was the first built on the Lakes. Mr. Pardee severed his connection with the propeller agency in 1849. In 1848 and 1849, he was desultorily engaged in the building of reapers, being then also one of the firm of McCormick, Ogden & Co. About 1853, he left Chicago and was engaged in banking at Bloomington, Illinois, being one of the stockholders and the cashier of the McLean County bank and, in 1864, returned to Chicago, where he has since resided, although he has not been actively engaged in business. He was married in Rock County, Wisconsin, in 1845, to Elizabeth Lupton, and has three sons—Rev. Luther Pardee, of Calvary Episcopal Church; Frank Pardee and Harry T. Pardee.

In 1842, R. C. Bristol became the agent of the Protection Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn.; which company subsequently appointed Gurdon S. Hubbard its agent. He took Charles H. Hunt, formerly his clerk, into partnership with him, under the firm name Hubbard & Hunt, in February, 1859. This firm existed until March, 1867, when it became Hunt & Goodwin (Jonathan), which was changed to Goodwin & Pasco (Henry L.) on July 1, 1879, Charles H. Hunt having died in that year, and thus dissolved the firm. In October, 1874, Jonathan Goodwin was the sole agent, and Mr. Pasco died in 1882.* An anecdote concerning this company may be inserted here:

On October 11, 1871, E. J. Bassett arrived in the city to adjust the losses of the company, and, with E. P. Dorr, went to the office of the Tribune to write an advertisement stating that the general agent of the company was here for that purpose. He wrote a lengthy screed on a pine shingle and handed it to Horace White, who asked; "What is all that advertisement about?" "The Aetna is going to pay dollar for dollar," replied Mr. Goodwin. "Well then say so," said Mr. White; and the periphrastic advertisement was condensed to that simple statement.

About 1842, George W. Dole also wrote policies for some companies unknown.

In 1844, as stated in the directory for that year, the insurance agents were Julius Wadsworth, R. C. Bristol, Theron Pardee (the representative of the first marine insurance company in this city, the North-western, of Oswego, New York†), George Smith & Co., Gurdon S. Hubbard, J. B. F. Russell, S. B. Collins & Co., Augustus Garrett, J. T. Whiting, Benjamin W. Raymond and M. M. Hayden. The last named gentleman was the agent of the Mississippi Marine & Fire Insurance Association, which is surmised to have been one of those institutions, under cover of whose charter as an insurance company, "wild-cat" banking was carried on.

In 1843, David Humphreys was appointed agent of the Buffalo Marine Insurance Company. As contemporaneous information of business done by insurance companies, the following extract from Mr. Rollin's article will be read with interest:

"In 1844, B. W. Raymond was appointed agent of the Contributionship, which company he represented till 1846; during that time the premiums received by the company amounted to $942. In September, 1846, Mr. Raymond was agent of the Howard of New York, continuing to represent it until 1859; the premiums taken in at that time amounted to $6,326. In the same year he was agent also of the Mutual safety, resigning in 1848. The receipts of this company for the two years amounted to $3,806. From 1846 to 1847, Mr. Raymond represented the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, of New Jersey. In 1849, he was also agent for the Lexington Fire, Life and Marine Insurance Company, of Lexington Ky., which had at that time a paid-up capital of $260,000. In 1850, Mr. Raymond retired from insurance to take charge of several railroad interests."

* The data relative to the Aetna was furnished by the home office.

† George Smith & Co. were, de facto, the Chicago agents of the Wisconsin Fire & Marine Insurance Company, a company erected upon the old charter of the Chicago Marine & Fire Insurance Company. See vol. 1, pp. 532-33.

In 1845, the list of agents given as of 1844 was augmented by I. H. Burch, Garrett & Seaman, and the firm of Wadsworth, Dyer & Chapin, comprising E. S. Wadsworth, Thomas Dyer* and John P. Chapin. The Mutual Life, of New York, was first represented by John C. Dodge in this year.

CHARLES H. FERGUSON, agent of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, has been connected with the agency in Chicago since June, 1876. In 1873, he was appointed general western agent for the Oswego and Onondaga Fire Insurance companies, prior to which he had been in the district agency of the Mutual Life, since 1867, with L. C. Mann & Co., at Auburn, N. Y. Prominent among the names of the trustees of the company Mr. Ferguson at present represents, was that of General Anson Stager of Chicago, and conspicuous among the names of the directors was that of F. S. Winston, who was president of the company from 1853, when it had but $2,000,000 of cash assets, until 1884, when its cash assets were over $100,000,000. The following exhibit of the risks paid by the Mutual Life in this city, during the past four years, sufficiently testifies to the stability of the company:

1880—Death losses .....	$214,032 58
Endowments .....	25,364 13
		$239,396 71
1881—Death losses .....	$159,452 94
Endowments .....	37,624 95
		197,077 89
1882—Death losses .....	$115,513 15
Endowments .....	45,916 65
		161,429 80
1883—Death losses .....	$78,434 32
Endowments .....	47,266 95
		125,701 27
Total .....		$723,605 67
Average per year .....		180,901 42

In 1846, the Mutual Benefit Life, of Newark, N. J., first appointed an agent (B. W. Raymond) in this city.

In December, 1847, the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., appointed its first agent in this city, S. N. Stebbins. The first policy issued, was on the life of Charles H. Quinlan, in that month and year.

In the directory for 1848, there only appear the names of the following agents: John C. Dodge, insurance and canal agent; Julius White, Zebina Eastman, J. B. F. Russell and T. S. Morgan.

JULIUS WHITE first came to Chicago in 1836, but did not do business here until 1848, when he engaged in the insurance business, and became very prominent in that fraternity, being president of the Chicago Board of Underwriters in 1854. In 1854, he compiled a system for estimating exterior fire-hazards, embodying diagrams and classifications of risks, that became to some extent a standard for reference by the guild. He was engaged in fire insurance from 1850 to 1861, and in the life and accident branch from 1864 to 1872, during which latter year, he discontinued insurance, and went into the real-estate business.

On February 12, 1849, the Chicago Savings and Insurance Company was chartered; presumably identical with the Chicago Temperance Saving Association, noticed in vol. 1, on page 535. During this year also the necessity for combined action relative to classification of risks, amount of insurance thereupon, and general business comity led to the establishment of a Board of Underwriters. The following is an excerpt from The Argus, to which paper it was furnished by Thomas Buckley, an old Chicago underwriter:

CHICAGO, 3d December, 1849

At a meeting of the Board of Underwriters of Chicago, it was Resolved, That the annexed Rules and Regulations be adopted, and that the General Rules laid down at the convention in New York, in September last, be acknowledged for their guidance.

GEO. W. DOLE, President.

JOHN C. DODGE, Secretary.

GENERAL RULES.

1. In all cases where the rates are not specific, where wooden buildings adjoin blank walls of brick buildings, ten cents additional to be charged on each wall so adjoined. When there are openings in the wall, such additional charge to be made as will equal the hazard therefrom.

2. Lease-hold interests shall not be covered to exceed three-fourths of their actual cash value, and a statement of the precise nature of such interest shall be required of applicants in all cases.

3. No agent shall surrender the regular fee for policies, nor offer any pecuniary inducement to obtain business, and the fee for the policies shall not be less than $1.

4. A meeting of the agents shall be held at least once a month for the purpose of consultation and agreement in the matters of the business of their respective agencies, of furnishing each to the other memoranda of the risks of each expiring within the month next ensuing, with the rate of premium now charged, as well as the rate proposed to be charged under the new tariff; to concert measures for the detection and conviction of incendiaries; and to do such other things as will add to the safety of their operation and secure harmonious action among themselves.

5. In all cases where the rates are not fixed by the following tariff, and one not provided for by agreement between the agents themselves, reference shall be had to the foregoing rules and to the tariff and regulations adopted by the convention held in the city of New York, in September, 1849; and in all cases where local rates have not been acted upon, it shall be the duty of agent to fix the same to correspond as nearly as may be to the following tariff.

Rates in all cases stated at the minimum and when risks are taken for less than a year, the tabular rates appended to be adopted.

The special tariff of rates ran from three-fourths of one per cent. to five per cent., and gave a particular rate for each on the streets embraced in the territory for which rates were made. This was the first effort to fix any definite standard whereby all agents should classify and write the risks taken.

In 1850, the following agents are specified in the directory for that year: (Philip) Thurber & (Paul B.) King, J. B. F. Russell, J. D. Woolley, J. F. Rogers, H. W. Clarke, O. R. Lull, Julius White, George W. Dole, C. N. Holden, R. C. Bristol, G. W. Gardner, Theron Pardee, Benjamin W. Raymond, John C. Dodge, T. W. Wadsworth, David Humphreys, Gurdon S. Hubbard, H. Wheeler, J. H. Reed, George Smith, J. Breck, Jr., and D. O. Bradley. The companies doing business in this city at that time were—Atlantic Mutual, Astor, Sun, New York, Mercantile, Mutual Life, Howard, Protection, North-Western, and Health, of New York; Merchants' Mutual and Wisconsin Marine and Fire, of Milwaukee; Chicago Marine and Fire, Illinois Mutual, and Jackson County Mutual, of Illinois; Ohio and Columbus, of Columbus, O.; Aetna, Protection, Hartford, and Connecticut Mutual Life, of Hartford, Conn.; New England Life and Union, of Boston, Mass.; Mutual Fire, of Trenton, N. J.; and Knox, of Vincennes, Ind.

On January 28, 1851, the Chicago Marine Insurance Company was incorporated, and W. B. Lounsbury entered the fraternity as agent for the Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, the first represented in this city.

In 1852, the Chicago Mutual Insurance Company was incorporated on June 19, and a local agency was established by the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company, with Harvey Danks as local agent.

THE MASSACHUSETTS MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, of Springfield, Mass., established their general agency in Chicago, on January 2, 1855, with J. P. Brooks as general agent, this company being the first to locate a general western agency in the State.

Some idea of the magnitude of its business and the successful administration of this company can be gleaned from the following financial exhibit:

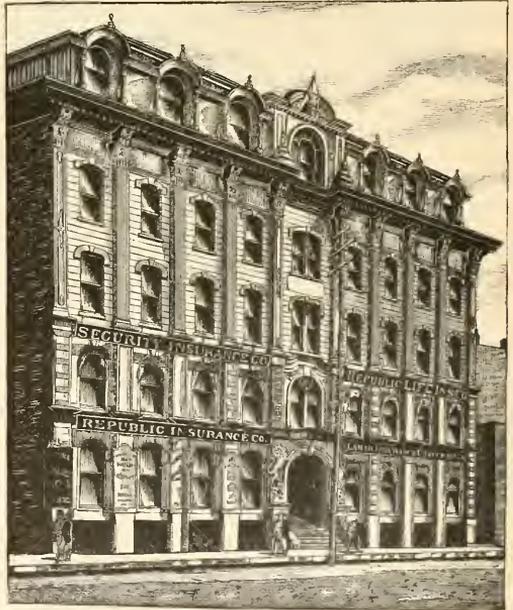

It has paid to policy-holders or their representatives:
Premiums received.....	$19,427,207
For death claims.....	6,139,179
For endowment claims.....	920,590
For dividends.....	3,343,496
For surrendered and canceled policies.....	2,562,380

Total.....	$13,015,945
And has on hand December 31, 1883, exclusive of premiums deferred and in course of collection, assets, the property of the policy-holders.....	7,451,407

Total.....	$20,467,352
Balance over premiums received.....	$ 1,040,145

That is to say, the interest earnings and profits, of the investments made with the policy-holders' money, have paid all the running expenses of the company and put more than a million dollars in its treasury besides. The assets of the company on January 1, 1884, were $7,588,727.32, and the surplus $813,342.92. Among the agents have been J. P. Brooks, Hon. R. W. Dunham, Hon. George K. Davis, E. P. Roberts and W. E. Poulson, general agents, and Percy W. Palmer, financial agent.

WILLIAM E. POULSON was born in Portsmouth, Va., on July 12, 1844, the son of George Oldham, and Martha A. (Spoonor) Poulson. He received his early education in the public schools of Washington, D. C., and therewith made such progress that, in 1855, he received a diploma from the Smithsonian Institute for proficiency in English studies, an honor which many older boys failed to attain. In 1856, he entered Virginia Collegiate Institute, and graduated therefrom in 1860. In 1862, he went to Charlotte, North

REPUBLIC LIFE INSURANCE BUILDING.

Carolina, in the Naval Engineer Department of the Confederate service, and, after remaining there for a few months, went to Richmond and was attached to the Ordnance Department of the Richmond Arsenal, where he spent two years, and, in 1864, was with "Wise's Legion"—composed of the brigade of Henry A. Wise—passing most of his time at Chapin's Farm, where the brigade was stationed. At the conclusion of the War he commenced the study of law at Norfolk, Va., remaining there until 1866, when he went to Baltimore, Md. In March, 1867, he moved to Cincinnati, Ohio, to accept a more remunerative position. In 1868, he went to Nashville, Tenn., and started in business on his own account, selling petroleum apparatus; but the venture not proving successful, in consequence of the monetary depression prevailing in that State, he sold out his interests and returned to Cincinnati. He remained there but a short time however, and, in October, 1868, migrated to

S.P.G.M. of Chicago Council Princes of Jerusalem in 1882-83, and has been Grand M. of C. of Oriental Consistory, S. P. R. S., 32°, in 1882-83-84; and on September 23, 1884, was created Sovereign Grand Inspector General, 33°, of the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States.

E. P. ROBERTS is a native of Addison County, Vermont, and has been engaged in life-insurance business since the year 1868. His primary association with the profession was with the Mutual Life, of New York, which company he represented as local agent for two years. In 1870, he was appointed general agent of the Equitable Life Association, for the State of Vermont and from 1871 to 1875, he was manager, for the same company, of the territory embracing Northern New York, Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine. From 1875 to 1877, he was manager for the State of Ohio of the affairs of the Equitable Life, but, in 1877, accepted the appointment of special traveling agent for the New York Life Insurance Company, with which company he remained until July 15, 1879, when he came to Chicago and accepted the position he at present occupies. The long experience of Mr. Roberts, his courtesy and affability, peculiarly qualified him for the position he occupies, and the increase of the business, year by year, since he has had the agency of the affairs, testifies to the success of his administration and the conservative character of his transactions—the key-note of success in the insurance business.

On April 9, 1852, Edwin C. Larned delivered a lecture on the subject of fire and life insurance before the Chicago Commercial College, and which was subsequently published in pamphlet form.

On February 10, 1853, the Western Marine and Fire Insurance Company, of Chicago, and the Mutual Security, of Chicago, were incorporated, and the Continental, and Home Insurance companies, of New York, were first represented here in that year—the former by C. N. Holden and the latter by H. B. Willmarth.

THE HOME INSURANCE COMPANY, OF NEW YORK, was organized in April, 1853. It commenced business April 13, 1853, and first established an agency in Chicago, in the same year, with H. B. Willmarth as agent. From the issue of the first policy, the company has had an increasing, first-class business, although the large augmentation in the company's business did not occur until General Arthur C. Ducat was appointed in 1866. From that date until the present, the record of the Home has been one of the most comprehensive success—success that was rendered greater by the losses the company incurred in the fire of 1871, which were on seven hundred and ten policies, $3,150,586.07, six hundred thousand dollars of which was covered by re-insurance in solvent companies. The amount of their loss was paid in full to the Chicago policy-holders, without a single note or mortgage of the company's assets being called in to furnish any funds to meet it. The cheerful alacrity displayed in the settlement of these claims, the patient and painstaking assistance rendered in their adjustment where policies had been destroyed by the fire, and the liberality of the adjusters, made a record that has been a source of continued revenue to the company since 1871. Of the steady and healthy growth of this company, it is only necessary to state that, in 1853, the capital was $500,000; receipts, $190,442.11; expenditures, $43,370.78; assets, $7,492,751.11; net surplus, $1,667,240.07; and the amount of premiums received in thirty years was $57,204,108.31, and the total of losses paid in the same period, $34,760,260.04. The local representation of the company at Chicago, since 1873, has been by the firm of Ducat & Lyon, comprising General Ducat* and George M. Lyon, who are also managers of the Western Department of the company, having jurisdiction over thirteen States and all Western Territories to the Rocky Mountains.

GEORGE M. LYON, of the insurance firm of Ducat & Lyon, managers of the Home Insurance Company of New York, was born in Bedford, Penn., May 18, 1841. In 1859, he took his first step of introduction to his long and successful insurance career, by going to New York and connecting himself with the home office as junior clerk. From this position he was promoted to be supply clerk, and later to one of the examiners of agency business. In 1867, he was appointed assistant secretary of the company, to succeed the present secretary, J. H. Washburn, his headquarters being still in New York. During the hard times occasioned by the Chicago and Boston fires, a great portion of the burden of the agency business fell upon his shoulders. In October, 1873, Mr. Lyon * See Military History.

RUINS, ENTRANCE OF REPUBLIC LIFE BUILDING.

Chicago. He intended upon his arrival in this city to practice law, but he changed his plans and embarked in the life insurance business with the Life Association of America, of St. Louis, and in 1860 he was employed for one year by that Association in establishing a Board of Trustees of the State of Illinois, comprising one hundred members at $70,000 per capita. In 1870, on the organization of the Republic Life of Chicago, he was appointed general agent of the Home Department. The United States Biographical Dictionary thus speaks of this epoch in Mr. Poulson's life: "There was a strong opposition, and it was with extreme difficulty and the exercise of his utmost energy that he succeeded in establishing the home business of the company. His work, however, proved unusually successful, and he did a large and satisfactory business, and affairs were most promising when the great fire of October 9, 1871, left him where he started, with but about ten dollars in his pocket, a single suit of clothes, and being engaged to be married on the 16th of the month. The misfortune would have disheartened many, but, undaunted, he pursued his purpose, and was married on the appointed day, in the midst of ruin, and with a brave heart began life again. Business was soon resumed, but little was accomplished until the following March, when the company's building was rebuilt and occupied. From this time his success has been uninterrupted, and, considering the unfavorable circumstances attending his beginning, we may say unprecedented. In 1873, the Republic, through its president, Mr. J. V. Farwell, presented him with a valuable hunting-case gold watch, for having done for the company the largest individual business of any agent in the United States." In 1874, he was appointed general agent of the National Life Insurance Company of the United States, and afterward was appointed agent of the Mutual Benefit, of New Jersey, and, in 1880, was appointed to his present position, as general agent of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company. William E. Poulson is also a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, belonging to Wauabansia Lodge, No. 166, A.F. & A.M.; LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, R.A.M., of which chapter he was High Priest in 1882-83; Palestine Council, No. 66, R. & S.M., of which he was T.I.M. in 1883-84, and in the Grand Council of the State he is Deputy Grand Master of Illinois and is also the deputy of the district; and a member of Apollo Commantery, No. 1, K.T. In the Scottish Rite he was removed to Chicago, and formed a partnership with Arthur C. Duca in the local insurance business and in the management of the Western Department of the Home Insurance Company. The firm is undoubtedly one of the strongest and most prosperous in the West.

THE LIVERPOOL AND LONDON AND GLOBE INSURANCE COMPANY first had an agency in Chicago in 1853, when John H. Kinzie was its agent. He was succeeded in 1861 by Higginson & James, who retained the agency for some time, under the New York directorship. In 1866, the Chicago office was made a general agency, and William Warren was appointed general agent. At the time of the Chicago fire, a telegram was received on Tuesday, October 11, from the main office: "Draw, at sight, and subscribe $10,000 to the sufferers." The losses, paid by this company, consequent upon the fire, were $3,270,000. In 1875, the Chicago office was made an independent center, and Mr. Warren was made resident secretary—the office and official having remained the same since that date. The income of the company, during 1883, was $3,605,840.98, and the Chicago directors are John Crerar, of Crerar, Adams & Co.; Levi Z. Leiter, late of Field, Leiter & Co.; and Ezra J. Warner, of Sprague, Warner & Co.

In the Directory for 1854, the following insurance agents are designated: John C. Dodge, J. Drake, E. P. Fisher, L. C. Hall, J. B. Henshaw, C. N. Holden, Hubbard & Hunt, J. S. Hulbert, Ring & Smith, Wadsworth & Lounsbury and Julius White; but this list is erroneous and imperfect. In 1854, a table of rates was formulated and published in book form, presumptively the first compilation of this nature promulgated in this manner. The schedules were acceded to by the following formula and signatures:

"CHICAGO, October 6, 1854.

"The undersigned do hereby assent to the foregoing tariff of rates, classification of hazards and general rules for the prosecution of the business of fire insurance in Chicago, and pledge themselves to abide by the same in all cases.

"JULIUS WHITE, for the Northwestern Insurance Company, T. W. WADSWORTH, for the Atlantic, Connecticut Fire and Washington Insurance companies. B. W. RAYMOND, for the Howard Insurance Company, New York. T. F. PHILLIPS, for the Howard Insurance Company, and LaFarge Company, New York. JOHN H. KINZIE, for Liverpool and London Fire and Life Insurance Company. L. C. HALL, for Equitable Insurance Company, of London; New York City and Granite Insurance companies, of New York; State Mutual Insurance Company, of Harrisburg, and Metropolitan Insurance Company, of New York. C. N. HOLDEN, for Continental Insurance Company, of New York; Monarch Insurance Company, of London and New York, and Star Fire and Marine Insurance Company, of Ogdensburg, New York. G. S. HUBBARD, Agent Etna Insurance Company, Hartford, Conn. HUBBARD & HUNT, Agents Provincial Insurance Company, and British American Assurance Company, of Toronto, Canada. H. B. WILLMARTH, Agent Home Insurance Company, of New York. C. RUNYON, Agent City Insurance Company, Cleveland. E. H. RING, Secretary Chicago Mutual Insurance Company. E. H. RING, Agent Lorillard and New Amsterdam Fire Insurance companies, New York City, and Roger Williams Insurance Company, Providence, R. I. W. B. LOUNSBURY, Agent Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, Springfield, Mass.; Western Massachusetts Insurance Company, Pittsfield, Mass.; Phenix Insurance Company, Hartford, Conn., and City Fire Insurance Company, Hartford, Conn. H. S. HUDSON, Agent Bridgeport Fire and Marine Insurance Company, Bridgeport, Conn. WILLIAM A. GROVES, Agent Albany Insurance Company, Albany, N. Y.; Atlantic Insurance Company, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Montgomery Insurance Company, Canajoharie, N. Y.; New York Indemnity Insurance Company, Broadalbin, N. Y., and North America Insurance Company, Brasher Falls, N. Y. BARR & EVANS, Agents North Western Insurance Company, of Philadelphia. CROW & SMITH, Agents Summit Insurance Company, of Akron, Ohio; Knickerbocker, Waterford, N. Y., and Rensselaer, of Lansingburg, N. Y. C. P. KELLOGG, Agent Farmer's Union Insurance Company, of Athens, Penn.

"JULIUS WHITE,

"President of the Chicago Board of Underwriters.

"W. B. LOUNSBURY, Secretary."

The following table gives the number of insurance agents doing business, and the number of insurance companies represented by them, in this city, during various years; the authority for such table being the directories for the years specified. This syllabus is not deemed statistically accurate, but will serve as an approximation of the actual figures:

1854-5—Insurance agents, 10, companies represented 42. 1855-6—Agents, 24, companies, 44. 1856-7—Agents, 31, companies, 46. 1858—Agents, 29, companies, not given. 1859—Agents, 28; companies, fire and marine, 74; life, 16. 1860—Agents, 27; companies, not given. 1861—Agents, 32; broker, 1; companies, fire and marine, 40; life, 7. 1862—Agents, 37, companies, fire and marine, 43; life, 10. 1863—Agents, 44; companies, fire and marine, 61; life, 16. 1864—Agents, 28; companies, fire and marine, 52; life, 7. 1865—Agents, 44, companies, fire and marine, 84; life, 28. 1866—Agents, 67; companies, accident, 8; fire and marine, 97; life, 40. 1867—Agents, 90; companies, accident, 10; fire and marine, 104; life, 54; live stock, 3. 1868—Agents, 93; companies, boiler, 1; fire and marine, 28; life, 52; live stock, 4; fire, 65. 1869—Agents, 64; companies, fire, 61; fire and marine, 16; life, 42; marine, 1. 1870—Agents, 100; brokers, 3; companies, fire, 70; fire and marine, 26; life, 71; boiler, 1; marine, 2; plate glass, 1; accident, 2. 1871—Agents, 102; brokers, 5; companies, fire, 80; fire and marine, 21; life, 66; boiler, 1; marine, 3; plate glass, 1; accident, 1.

THE UNITED STATES LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, of NEW YORK, was first represented by a Chicago agency in 1855. Since that initial representation its growth has been steady and progressive, but it was not until the appointment of the present manager, Thomas J. Finney, on January 1, 1883, that the enormous growth of this company's Chicago business commenced. That the company made a judicious selection of their choice of the gentleman who should conserve their interests, the following figures will testify: December 31, 1882—Policies written during the year, twenty-three, amounting to $71,000.* December 31, 1883—Policies written during the year, one hundred and ninety-one, amounting to $800,000. The augmentation of business one thousand per centum is certainly a flattering testimonial to the efficiency of the present manager. The company is an old and reliable one, and its general interests have not stood still while the manager of its Chicago department has been increasing the business of his office, as the following comparison of its business for two years will exhibit:

	1882.	1883.
New Insurance written.....	$2,800,000 00	$5,231,000 00
Assets.....	5,116,814 46	5,268,212 48
Payments to policy-holders....	459,679 46	475,923 98

On February 14, 1855, the Mercantile, Chicago City and Chicago Firemen's Insurance companies were incorporated, and, on February 14, the Garden City was chartered, all being home organizations. The Phenix Insurance Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., established an agency in this city during this year, and made L. C. Hall, agent.

THOMAS R. BURCH is general western agent for the Phenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, N. Y. His experience in the business commenced in the home office of that company, in New York in 1864, where he gained that experience of the general insurance business and that introspection into the details of the special business of the company that have fitted him for the responsible place he at present occupies. In 1874, he was appointed to the position of general agent for the West and South, and came to this city and established the office; since which time he has amply demonstrated the good judgment of the company in his selection, by the conservation of its business and the growth it has had under his management. The amount of losses paid by this company consequent upon the Chicago fire of 1871, were $417,759.59, and were paid in full, the first loss having been paid on October 12, 1871, which was the first that was paid in the city after the fire. The assets of the company on January 1, 1884, were $3,759,035.98, and its net surplus, $686,160.04. This agency does the largest western business of any company represented in the West.

In this year, also, the Phenix Mutual, of Hartford, Conn., established an agency in this city, with G. S. Hubbard as agent.

In 1856, the second local board of underwriters was constituted, of which Gurdon S. Hubbard was president, and J. Kearney Rodgers, secretary and surveyor. The members of the Board were G. S. Hubbard, J. K. Rodgers, H. B. Willmarth, T. L. Miller, T. W. Wadsworth, C. N. Holden, Julius White, W. B. Lounsbury, L. D. Olmsted, R. F. Mason, S. T. Atwater, John H.

*Of this amount actually $50,000 were taken by Mr. Finney just before assuming the management of the agency.

Kinzie and L. C. Hall. The following advertisement was inserted in the Directory for 1856 by this board :

CHICAGO BOARD OF UNDERWRITERS,
1856.

J. Kearney Rodgers, Secretary and Surveyor,
No. 1 Clark St., n. w. cor. S. Water St.

Tariff of rates for fire insurance periods of less than one year:

1	month	2-10ths	of annual rate.
2	months	3-10ths	" "
3	"	4-10ths	" "
4	"	5-10ths	" "
5	"	6-10ths	" "
6	"	7-10ths	" "
7	"	3-4ths	" "
8	"	5-10ths	" "
9	"	17-20ths	" "
10	"	9-10ths	" "
11	"	19-20ths	" "
			Periods of less than one month.
	5 days	1-3d	the rate of one month.
10	"	1-2	" " "
15	"	2-3ds	" " "
20	"	5-6ths	" " "

No risks taken less than one year, or otherwise than above.
Buffalo to Chicago, via Lake, May, June and July, 1 1-4 per cent.
" " " " August and September, 1 1-2 " "
" " " " October, 2 " "
" " " " balance of season, 3 1-2 " "
From New York or Boston, via Buffalo, add 1-4 per cent to the above rate; via Ogdensburg or Oswego, add 1-2 per cent.

In 1857, Wiley M. Egan commenced the insurance business, as did John Naghten.

JOHN NAGHTEN commenced his insurance experience as clerk in the insurance office of W. D. Smith, in 1857, and, in 1863, became associated with the Merchants' Insurance Company of Chicago, of which he was appointed assistant secretary in 1866. In 1873, he became associated with William E. Rollo, under the firm name of Rollo, Naghten & Co., and, in 1877, he was appointed general agent of the Commercial Insurance Company, of New York, which position he now retains. In 1880, he associated with him his son, M. J. Naghten, and his son-in-law, M. F. Scannell, the firm name becoming John Naghten & Co. They are agents for several insurance companies, in addition to the Commercial. Mr. Naghten, Sr., is one of the oldest insurance men in the city, having had a continuous experience of twenty-seven years, during which time he has not alone won the highest encomiums for his business ability and probity, but also for his personal rectitude. During his long commercial career, he has achieved a reputation that his descendants can point to with pride. He has been a resident of Chicago since 1856, and is a native of Ireland.

In February, 1857, the Western Valley Fire and Marine Insurance Company, the Northern Illinois Fire and Marine, and the Eureka Fire and Marine Insurance companies were chartered. On February 18, the North-Western Mutual Life was chartered. All these were Chicago companies. In this year, also, the Great Western Insurance Company of Chicago was incorporated, and General Arthur C. Ducat organized the first salvage corps in the city, the lowly predecessor of the Fire Insurance Patrol. He also became secretary of the local board of underwriters, and was the first gentleman occupying that position who gave his entire attention and time to the performance of his duties. The following minimum rates were adopted by the board during this year :

Buildings, Class A	50 cents.
Buildings, Class B	80 "
Buildings, Class C	30 "
Buildings, Class D	40 "
Buildings, Class E	40 and 45 cents.
Buildings, Class F	50 cents.
Buildings, Class G	100 "
Flouring Mills	225 "
Grain Elevators (brick)	155 "
Grain Elevators (frame)	255 "
Breweries	180 "
Lumber Yards	175 "
Steamboats	250 "
Tow Boats (steam)	200 "

Tobacco Factories	175 cents.
Distilleries	480 "
Packing and Picking Houses	575 " "

During 1857, the New York Life established an agency here, with Messrs. Olcott & Boyd as agents.

THE NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY has been in operation over thirty-nine years, and it has the stability which age and success bring. It has over sixty-nine thousand policies in force, covering nearly two hundred millions of insurance, and holds in trust over fifty-five million dollars. After providing for all its liabilities, its surplus is over ten million dollars by the standard of the State. It never had capital stock nor stockholders. It is owned by the insured themselves, and is managed by persons of their own selection and in their own interest. Profits are divided among policy-holders exclusively. During the ten years just ended, following the panic of 1873, the New York Life has more than doubled its assets, increased its insurance by sixty per cent, and paid policy-holders over forty-nine million dollars. During these ten years its interest income has exceeded its losses by death by over four million dollars, and its annual income has increased from eight to thirteen million dollars. The New York Life began business in Illinois in 1856, placing its agency in the hands of S. H. Kerfoot, who continued in the position about three years. Between 1859 and 1864, there were frequent changes in the agency. In 1864, O. P. Curran became general agent, and retained his connection with the company until 1880, with George W. Perkins as partner from 1872 to 1876. In 1881, Judah, Weil & Co succeeded to the agency, but the death of Mr. Judah having led to an ultimate dissolution of the firm in 1883, the company then consolidated the entire business of the State in the hands of E. F. Burlingham, as manager for Illinois, with offices at No. 107 Dearborn Street, in the Portland Block. Mr. Burlingham's extended experience with the New York Life, as their general agent for the State outside of Chicago, has enabled him to surround himself with a very efficient corps of solicitors, and the business of the company was never more prosperous in Illinois than at the present time. From 1857 to 1883, the New York Life collected $117,409,370 in premiums in Illinois, and during the same period paid to its policy-holders in this State, besides death claims, $45,537,020, the percentage of premiums thus returned in excess of death losses being 38.7 per cent. In 1883, the company wrote $3,521,585 of new business in Illinois, which was half a million in excess of the amount written by any other company, and was one-seventh of the entire business written in Illinois by thirty-two companies.

L. D. OLMSTED first entered into the real estate and insurance business in 1857. Mr. Olmsted died in 1862, in which year S. M. Moore was admitted as partner, the firm name being L. D. Olmsted & Co., and comprising Lyman Baird, Francis Bradley and S. M. Moore, the latter gentleman being a partner in, and attending to, the insurance department of the business. About 1864, two firms were made, Baird & Bradley and Moore & Stearns (John K.), the former firm retaining the real-estate interests, which business they are now in, and the latter retaining the insurance. In 1865, James H. Moore was admitted to partnership, and two firms were made—Moore & Stearns, who continued the agency of the Connecticut Mutual Life, and S. M. Moore & Co.—comprising S. M. and J. M. Moore—taking the fire business. In 1868, A. H. Van Buren—who died in 1869—and John J. James were admitted to partnership in the house of S. M. Moore & Co., the firm name remaining the same. It is an interesting historical reminiscence, in connection with the house of S. M. Moore & Co., that they paid about five million dollars in claims resultant upon the Chicago fire; that at that time they were agents for the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., and the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, of London, who were the first two companies to pay one hundred cents on the dollar on Chicago losses; the North British and Mercantile being one of the first companies to announce its intention to pay one hundred cents on the dollar, sending a telegram to that effect, and also for their agents to subscribe $5,000 for the relief of the Chicago sufferers. When this welcome intelligence was promulgated on the Board of Trade, a deafening howl of congratulation arose, and the holders of policies in that company felt themselves millionaires. In 1876, James H. Moore and John J. James bought out the other partners, and the firm became Moore & James, which co-partnership has continued until the present time. These gentlemen still represent the Hartford and the North British and Mercantile, as well as the German-American, of New York, and other companies. The aggregate amount of assets of the companies they represent is twenty-three million dollars.

SILAS MILTON MOORE was born in Windham, Rockingham
* From Ducat's Practice of Fire Underwriting. General Ducat was also the inaugurator of the present system of fire surveys, and the author of Ducat's Practice of Fire Underwriting, a book of reference among the fraternity of the present day.

Co., N. H., on December 15, 1830, the son of Silas and Hannah Moore. He obtained his early education at the common school while working on the farm, subsequently attending the old Pembroke Academy, engaging in the study of medicine in 1850 and 1851. In 1852, Mr. Moore determined upon relinquishing medical studies, and became principal of Chester (N. H.) Academy, which position he filled, with great satisfaction to his pupils and their parents, for three years. In 1856, he moved to LaSalle County, Ill., and engaged in the real-estate and insurance business, remaining there until 1860, in which year he came to Chicago. In March, 1861, he entered the house of L. D. Olmsted & Co., withdrawing therefrom in 1876. In that year he organized the firm of S. M. Moore & Co., continuing in the insurance business, but with companies different from those that had been theretofore represented by him. His partner in this new firm was Thomas H. Webster, at the same time, continuing in the firm of E. A. Cummings & Co., real-estate dealers. Both of these firms are doing a large and constantly increasing business, commensurate with the long and honorable connection of Mr. Moore with the mercantile interests of Chicago. Mr. Moore was married, in 1856, to Miss Elizabeth Davidson. He is a staunch member of the Congregational faith, having been for twenty years a member, and for many years a deacon, of the First Congregational Church.

JAMES H. MOORE was born in Windham, N. H., in 1840, and came with his parents to Illinois, in 1856, locating at Mendota, where he attended school. In 1859, he removed to Elgin, and entered the employment of the Elgin Bank, where he remained until he enlisted in July, 1861, in Co. "A," 36th Illinois Volunteer Infantry. In the spring of 1863, he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant and quartermaster of the 71st Illinois Volunteer Infantry, with which regiment he remained, until it was mustered out in the fall of 1863. He came to Chicago and entered the insurance agency of Moore & Stearns, subsequently becoming a partner in the firm of S. M. Moore & Co., the firm name being changed to Moore & Janes, in 1876.

JOHN J. JANES was born in Lansingburg, N. Y., in 1833, his ancestors having emigrated to New England from England some two hundred years since. He was educated in Troy, N. Y., and went to New York City, in 1849, where he secured employment as clerk in a commission house. In March, 1854, he came to Chicago and was employed by the old banking firm of H. A. Tucker & Co. for about one year, and was afterward first cashier of the Land Department of the Illinois Central Railroad for a period of eighteen months, when he resigned, and entered the employ of a large grain and commission house as confidential clerk, remaining there for several years. The Globe Insurance Company, of Chicago, was established in 1864, and he soon became its secretary, remaining with them until they closed out in 1866. Mr. Janes subsequently became associated with the insurance agency of I. F. Dobson & Co.; with whom he remained until he entered the firm of S. M. Moore & Co.

The Directory for 1857 gives the following data relative to Chicago companies:

Chicago City Insurance Company. Office 1 Masonic Temple. Capital $150,000. Edmund Canfield, president; Henry Chapman, treasurer; William S. Bates, secretary.

Chicago Marine & Fire Insurance Company. Lake, corner LaSalle Street. Capital $50,000. J. Young Scammon, president; B. F. Carver, cashier. Directors—Hugh T. Dickey, Mark Skinner, Benjamin W. Raymond, Buckner S. Morris, George W. Dole, Franklin Scammon, J. Y. Scammon, B. F. Carver.

Chicago Mutual Insurance Company. Office No. 140 South Water Street. George Steel, president; directors, C. T. Wheeler, L. P. Hilliard, John P. Chapin, R. S. King, E. H. Densmore, George Armour, Hiram Wheeler, C. H. Walker, M. C. Stearns, B. S. Shepard, Oramel S. Hough, Thomas H. Beebe.

Garden City Insurance Company. Office, Dole's Building, No. 148 South Water Street. Organized August 4, 1855. Capital $300,000. President, M. D. Gilman; vice-president, E. K. Rogers; secretary, Henry G. Foote; assistant secretary, Charles W. B. Bradbury; directors, M. D. Gilman, E. K. Rogers, T. J. S. Flint, Jonathan Burr, Hiram Wheeler, R. S. King, D. Kreigh, William Blair and Tartlon Jones.

Great Western Insurance Company. No. 160 South Water Street. Capital $500,000. President, James H. Rees; vice-president, Hart L. Stewart; actuary, Henry Brandt; secretary, H. W. Zimmerman; treasurer, H. A. Tucker; finance committee, Buckner S. Morris, Charles V. Dyer, Solomon M. Willson; directors, James H. Rees, Nicholas P. Iglehart, O. R. W. Lull, Charles V. Dyer, Thomas Lonergan, Samuel H. Kerfoot, Hart L. Stewart, Charles G. E. Prussing, Solomon M. Willson.

Phoenix Insurance Company. No. 62 Lake Street, corner State. Capital $500,000. President, A. Edwards; secretary, J. B. Ackley; directors, William Carr, A. Edwards, C. H. Spencer, Hiram B. Smith, William Colby.*

Wagona Fire and Marine Insurance Company. Lake street, corner State. Capital $200,000. William Cook, president; C. B. Rockwell, secretary; R. J. Morgan, general agent; directors, William Cook, H. Eugene Vogel, Ira W. Buel, Erastus Lewis, N. F. Webb, C. B. Rockwell, L. H. Davis, R. J. Morgan, D. S. Potter, Norman Wiard, L. C. Huntington, D. B. Moores, Sandford Williams, A. F. Rockwell, C. C. Cheney.

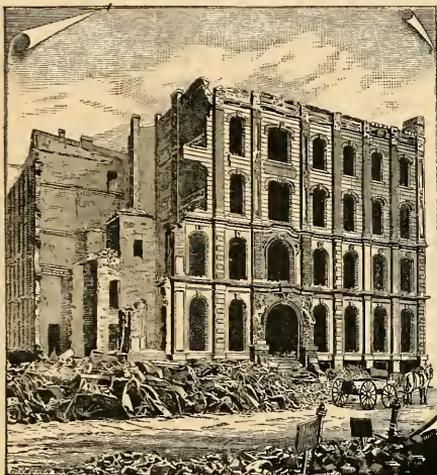

Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company. Capital $300,000. Organized March 28, 1855. Office, Hilliard's Block, northeast corner of South Water and Clark streets. Cyrenius Beers, president; James Peck, vice-president; Thomas Richmond, secretary; John C. Nyman, inspector and acting director.

Chicago Firemen's Insurance Company. Capital $200,000. Office northwest corner of Lake and Clark streets, up stairs. Organized 1855. President, Thomas Church; secretary, C. N. Holden; surveyor, Joseph E. Brown; directors, Thomas Church, B. W. Raymond, George W. Dole, E. H. Haddock, Jabez K. Botsford, Orrington Lunt, C. B. Farwell, W. M. Larrabee and J. T. Edwards.

THOMAS CHURCH, (deceased), one of the early business men of Chicago, was born November 8, 1801, in the town and county of Onondaga, N. Y. He was the oldest of a family of seven children, and in his infancy his step-father removed to Marcellus, in the same county, where he operated a small distillery. Afterward he settled, with his family, in Benton, Ontario County, and when Thomas was fourteen years of age, moved to the Holland Purchase, Genesee County. When Thomas Church had reached his majority, he left home to make his own way. First, as an employe of a grist mill, then as a farmer on a small scale, he continued to advance by sheer strength of will, industry and ability, until, by the fall of 1823, he had accumulated sufficient means to get married, remove to Buffalo, N. Y., build a house and store, and establish himself in business. Mr. Church's first wife was Rachel Wariner. It had been his original intention to continue farming, and, previous to going to Buffalo, he had built a log house on a piece of land in Chautauqua County, and there left his young bride. But having, with wise foresight, determined to adopt a business career, he established himself, as stated, in Buffalo, whither he and his wife removed in February, 1824. Here for ten years he steadfastly labored until, in the summer of 1834, he decided to come West. Reaching Chicago on June 2, of that year, he purchased a lot on Lake Street, and erected the first building which ever fronted on that thoroughfare. It was both dwelling and business house—the second story being rented to James Whitlock, United States registrar of the land office, and E. D. Taylor, the receiver. In the spring of 1835, Mr. Church returned to Buffalo, and purchased quite a stock of groceries for those days. Business increased so rapidly that an addition was soon made to the store, and for the succeeding four years it was one of the most prosperous establishments in the city. In 1839, however, after the occurrence of Chicago's first fire, which Mr. Church barely escaped, he determined "to build for the future," and accordingly erected two brick fireproof stores, four stories each. He also invested in real estate on Lake and South Water streets and Michigan Avenue. In 1840, M. L. Satterlee became his partner, and he greatly extended his business, carrying a large general stock. So successful was he, that, in April, 1843, he dissolved the partnership, virtually retired from active business, and invested his fortune in real estate. About this time he ran for mayor, but, as he afterward asserted, was "luckily" defeated. Mr. Church was subsequently appointed city assessor of the South

*In 1850, the president was John A. Nichols; secretary, E. C. Wilder; general agent, Curtis L. North; city surveyor, Lewis B. Rundell; managing directors, J. F. Aldrich, E. C. Wilder, John A. Nichols, A. Edwards, Hiram B. Smith; advisory directors, Watson Carr, C. N. Henderson, G. H. Hazelton, Adam Smith.

Division, a position for which he was peculiarly qualified, on account of his thorough knowledge of the value of property. He continued to hold this office for fourteen years, serving frequently on special committees to assess damages and benefits for street improvements. He was also appointed a commissioner for the partitioning of estates, and for the establishing of dock-lines. In common with many of Chicago's prominent citizens, Mr. Church was much interested in the Volunteer Fire Department, of which for ten years he was a member. The Chicago Firemen's Insurance Company was organized in 1855, and from that time up to the day of his death he was its president. In 1862, he was elected president of the Chicago Mutual Life Insurance Company, but declined favor of H. H. Magie, and was chosen vice-president, thus remaining as long as it continued in existence. The last twenty-three years of his life, Mr. Church spent in managing his property and in travel. He passed safely through the great panics, although for one hundred days succeeding the financial convulsion of 1857, his property is said to have depreciated at the rate of $1,000 a day; notwithstanding which, at the time of his death, he was a wealthy man, being the owner of seventeen brick stores, from which he derived a large income. Mr. Church's first wife, whom he married in 1823, died in April, 1839, leaving two children, now the wives of Dr. E. Ingalls and George A. Ingalls. On November 5, 1839, he married Mrs. Rebecca Pruyne, widow of Senator of Senator Pruyne, who had one daughter, now the wife of Seneca D. Kimbark. His second wife was the daughter of Silas W. Sherman, who came to Chicago in 1834, and was the second sheriff of Cook County. The widow and three married daughters of Mr. Church still survive the husband and father, whose death occurred June 25, 1871.

RUINS, REPUBLIC LIFE BUILDING.

The officers of the Board of Underwriters, in 1857, were John H. Kinzie, president; Arthur C. Ducat, secretary and surveyor; executive and fire committee, John H. Kinzie, chairman; A. H. Van Buren, John Rochester, H. B. Willmarth, W. B. Lounsbury and C. N. Holden. The office of the board was at 17 Dole's Building.

At the commencement of 1858, the directory gives the following as the list of agents: Samuel T. Atwater, Julius White, T. F. Phillips, W. D. Smith, A. H. Van Buren, R. C. Bristol, W. H. Warner, C. T. Hubbard, Thomas Richmond, Thomas Hale, H. Brandt, L. C. Hall, H. Wheeler, J. P. Brooks, J. C. Dodge, C. N. Holden, T. G. Van Buren, H. C. Panks, T. D. Hall, W. B. Lounsbury, Justin Parsons, C. S. Dyer, J. C. Nyman, G. S. Hubbard & Co., J. Kearney Rodgers, H.

B. Willmarth, E. Johnson, J. L. Jenkins, J. H. Kedzie, E. O. Goodwin and G. R. Hodges.

The Girard, of Philadelphia, was this year represented by L. C. Ellsworth.

GERMANIA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, OF NEW YORK, has been established in Chicago since 1858, and since that time has become a favorite company, not only with those to whose amor patriæ the name appeals, but to every citizen of whatever nationality. Its assets, as published on January 1, 1884, were $2,700,720.32; its net surplus $817,897.65; and the gentlemen who have charge of the general agency of the Western Department are E. G. Halle, manager, and R. H. Garrigue, assistant manager. They are both gentlemen of extensive experience in insurance matters, Mr. Halle having been in the business for fifteen years, and Mr. Garrigue for eleven years. The Germania, in addition to its enviable record during its twenty-six years of existence in this city, made a most favorable impression on the people at the time of the fire. On the 11th of October, 1871, the company had notices posted that it would pay all its losses in full, and every one connected with the company made munificent subscriptions to the assistance of those whom the fire had rendered homeless. The general agency was established in Chicago on January 1, 1884. As a matter of history connected with this company, it may be remarked that it was formerly one of those of which the New York Underwriters' Agency was composed, which combination was represented by Carl Huncke for about three years prior to the dissolution of the companies. On January 1, 1884, when that occurred, Mr. Huncke was made manager of the local agency for the Germania. Mr. Huncke is a native of Detmold, Germany, and came to Chicago in 1867, at the age of seventeen years. He then secured employment with Samuel S. Greeley, city and county surveyor, with whom he remained for some years. In 1875, he entered the office of the Traders' Insurance Company, of Chicago, and there remained until he was appointed local agent for the Germania and Hanover Fire Insurance companies, at that time combined under the title of the New York Underwriters' Agency, and severed his connection with the Hanover Company on January 1, 1884, when the combination lapsed. Mr. Huncke has been a member of the Chicago Turn-Gemeinde since 1871, and was secretary of the executive committee of the National Union of the Turner societies from 1872 to 1878.

In 1859, B. W. Phillips came to Chicago, and went into the agency business as the successor of R. F. Mason & Co. He was succeeded by Oscar W. Barrett.

OSCAR W. BARRETT was born in Bristol, Monroe Co., N. Y., on June 13, 1836, and shortly thereafter was taken by his parents to Rochester, N. Y. There he began to learn the jewelry business, and, in 1852, went to New York City, where he clerked in a jewelry store. He came to Chicago on August 9, 1856, and entered a jewelry store, remaining there until 1858, when he entered the office of the old Union Insurance Company; thus being among the oldest of the insurance men of this city. He remained there but for a short time, and then traveled for three years for a mercantile house, through Illinois, Northern Missouri, Iowa and Southern Wisconsin, settling their accounts. This being before the institution of the present extensive railroad facilities in those States, most of his traveling was done with a horse and buggy. In 1862, he went into the office of B. W. Phillips & Co., at the corner of Lake and Clark streets, and, in 1867, succeeded the firm, removing to an office at No. 120 LaSalle Street—the Oriental Building—where he remained until burned out by the fire of 1871. He is most prominently known among insurance men and to the public generally, and controls a business which is constantly increasing in volume and value. In 1876, he was elected a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of Chicago, and is still a member, and has been secretary of the same for the past eight years; and was for many years trustee of the Second Baptist Church. He is a member of Waubansia Lodge, No. 160, A. F. & A. M., having joined in 1860, and has sat in the south and west in that lodge; and is a member of LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, R. A. M., and of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; and in 1869, took the 32<sup>d</sup> in Oriental Consistory. He is at present president of the Board of Education of Highland Park. He was married on June 30, 1862, to Miss Genevieve, only daughter of Samuel Hoard, an early settler, and has seven living children.

EDWARD M. TEALL entered the insurance business at Chicago in 1859, as clerk for Messrs. Higginson & James, and upon the death of Mr. Higginson, in April, 1863, became the partner of the survivor, under the firm name of Alfred James & Co., retaining this position for some three or four years. He then entered into partnership with Fred. P. Fisher, the firm name being Teall & Fisher, which continued for ten years. Mr. Teall was then alone until 1882, when he took Cyrus A. Hardy, who had been with him for some fourteen or fifteen years, into partnership, under the firm name and style of Edward M. Teall & Co. The companies which Mr. Teall represented at the time of the fire paid about two and a half million dollars through his agency; and the companies he now represents aggregate a capital of about three million dollars. Mr. Teall was born in Albany, N. Y., in 1839, and came to Chicago on March 4, 1857. He was editor, merchant, civil engineer, and railroad builder, engaging in those professions until he entered the insurance business. He is also a member of the Underwriters' Exchange, and was president of that body in 1883 and 1884. The companies now represented by the firm of E. M. Teall & Co. are the Westchester Fire, of New York; Citizens', of St. Louis; Long Island, of New York; Montauk Fire, of New York; and Star Fire, of New York.

GEORGE W. MONTGOMERY came to Chicago in the fall of 1850, and commenced his business career in the ensuing year as bookkeeper in the wholesale drug-house of J. H. Reed & Co., with whom he remained for two years, after which he was with A. E. Kent & Co., packers. In 1862, he enlisted in the Chicago Mercantile Battery, and served therewith until during the siege of Vicksburg, when the exposure and hard usage at that memorable military event made him severely sick. From the effects of this sickness he was incapacitated for business for a year—having been discharged from the army by reason thereof, about six months after his enlistment. After recovering he was in the employment of George Schneider, collector of internal revenue, as cashier, where he remained for nine months. He then became identified with the dry goods firm of D. H. King & Co., as representative of A. E. Kent & Co., who were largely interested with the firm of King & Co. He remained with them until they closed out business in 1866-67. In 1868, he went into the insurance business in partnership with Oscar W. Barrett, under the firm name of O. W. Barrett & Co., which partnership continued until the commencement of 1873, when he went into partnership with A. Williams, under the firm name of Williams & Montgomery. This firm continued for about one year, after which Mr. Montgomery transacted business on his individual account. The present firm of George W. Montgomery & Co. was formed in 1881, by the admission of W. C. Magill to the business. This firm represent the American Insurance Company, of Newark, N. J., capital, $600,000; surplus, $1,433,406; assets, $1,663,840; the Exchange Fire Insurance Company, of New York, capital, $500,000; surplus, $1,231,092; assets, $1,383,228; the Sterling Fire Insurance Company, of New York, capital, $350,000; surplus, $374,624; assets, $446,431; the Germania Insurance Company, of Newark, capital, $200,000; surplus, $204,316; assets, $248,569; also the Lloyd's Plate Glass Insurance Company, of New York. The figures given are those of date, January 1, 1884. The American has been represented by Mr. Montgomery since 1873, and he was its first agent. Mr. Montgomery is a native of Genesee County, N. Y., and came to Chicago at the age of seventeen years.

On February 19, 1852, the American Insurance Company, of Freeport, now of Chicago—formerly the Putnam County Mutual—was chartered; and the American Exchange of New York, this year appointed Mills Olcott, its first representative here. Wiley M. Egan began his experience in marine underwriting in this year. The Citizens', of New York, also appointed its first agent here, H. B. Willmarth.

The officers of the Board of Underwriters for this year were Charles N. Holden, president; T. L. Miller, vice-president; Arthur C. Ducat, secretary and surveyor; and H. B. Willmarth, treasurer.

From a prospectus of the Western World Insurance & Trust Company, it appears that it was chartered in 1853, incorporated in 1859, and that its capital was $500,000. Its officers were: George H. Hazleton, president; Charles H. Abbott, treasurer; Alfred Edwards, secretary; O. Kendall, George H. Hazleton, Amzi Benedict, L. H. Church and Charles H. Abbott, directors.

WILLIAM E. ROLLO, the head of the insurance firm of William E. Rollo & Son, is one of the pioneer insurance men of Chicago, and a thorough representative of its unparalleled business men in every branch of trade. He is a native-born Yankee, but is descended from a Scotch family of excellent repute, who trace their lineage in a direct line, back through sundry great names, to that of William Rollo, better known, in early English history, as William the Conqueror, also "Lord Robert Rollo, the Pirate," who saddled himself and his heirs on the English peasantry in a very unpleasant way for some eighty-eight years. His energy, however, and his habit of success, seem to have survived in his descendants to the present day, whatever we may say of his piratical tendencies. The William Egbert Rollo of whom we write, was born in the Parish of Gilead, Town of Hebron, Tolland Co., Conn., January 3, 1821; was educated in East Windsor and East Hartford, same State; and entered upon the business of insurance in 1840—about the first business of any importance he ever did—and has stuck to it ever since. About 1852, he located in Columbus, Ohio, and superintending the interests of the Hartford Fire, the Springfield Fire and Marine, and other fire insurance companies, and also the Connecticut Mutual Life. About 1855, he became general agent for the Girard Fire and Marine Insurance Company, and, in 1859, established agencies for it in Chicago and other western cities. In 1861, he came here to reside permanently as the manager of its Western Department. In 1863, he organized the Merchants' Insurance Company of Chicago, whose day was remarkable in its brilliant morning, its successful noon and tragic night, ending its brief existence in the smoke and flame of the great fire. Besides its other successful achievements, it re-insured the risks of the Packers' and Provision-Dealers' Insurance Company and those of the Traders', and closed up the affairs of those companies most satisfactorily, paying back a profit to the stockholders. In May, 1872, Mr. Rollo resurrected the Traders', and put it on its feet, with a capital of half a million dollars, invested in registered Government bonds. In addition to his other onerous duties, he successfully managed its affairs for two years, when he passed it into other hands, on account of his failing health. He has, however, retained the management of the Girard and other companies, and is still in active business management of all his affairs. In October, 1845, Mr. Rollo married Miss Jane T. Fuller, daughter of General Asa Fuller, of Ellington, Conn., by whom he has had three children.—Jennie Sybil, Evelyn L. and William F. Rollo, now his partner in the business.

The Directory of 1860 designates the following as insurance agents: John P. Ackley & Co., S. T. Atwater, Cyrus Bentley, Thomas Buckley, H. A. Clark, John C. Dodge, L. C. Ellsworth, Gibson & Caryl, Hall & Rounds, S. C. Higginson, F. A. Hoffman, C. N. Holden, Hubbard & Hunt, Hunt & Higginson, O. B. Keith, John H. Kinzie, N. H. Knapp & Co., W. B. Lounsbury & Co., H. G. Litchfield, B. W. Phillips, T. L. Miller, L. D. Olmsted & Co., Phillips & Van Wagonen, Ernst Prussing, T. G. Van Buren, T. W. Wadsworth, O. Willard, Julius White, H. B. Willmarth, and J. A. Wright, adjuster.

THE HOME LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, OF NEW YORK, established its first agency in Chicago in 1860. It is now represented in this city by Edgar H. Kellogg, superintendent of agencies, who has been connected with this company for the past twenty-two years—ten years as agent, and twelve years in the position he now holds. The company is one of the most stable represented in this city, as manifested by their statement of May 1, 1884, which tabulated their assets at $5,476,795.76, and their surplus at $1,508,359.14. The experience and capability of the gentleman, who has been with this company so long, have had a marked influence, beneficially, upon the business of the company, for the efficiency of such representatives, the company is considerably indebted for its eminent success. Mr. Kellogg has always been an advocate of a large surplus, believing that strength is of paramount consideration; and this policy has been carried out by the Home, with which he has so long been connected, so that its rate of surplus is forty per cent., being the highest of any life insurance company in this country. Mr. Kellogg was born in New Hartford, Litchfield Co., Conn., April 11, 1833, and is the son of Seth H. and Electa S. (Washburn) Kellogg. In 1839, his father and mother, with a family of three children, accompanied by five brothers of his father and by grandparents of both his father and mother, moved into the wilds of Racine County, Wis., and all became farmers except one who went to Milwaukee, and spent many years in the employ of the first railroad built out of that city, and drove the piles for building the bridges over the lakes at Madison, Wis., where he caught cold and died from its effects.

His father was the youngest child of his father's family, and died at sixty-five years of age. The other five brothers lived to a ripe old age. Luman, the oldest brother, died in 1882, aged ninety-six; Chauncey, next to Luman, died at Neenah, Wis., the 1st of February, 1885, aged ninety-five, and was the last of the six brothers. His mother was the daughter of Rev. Ebenezer Washburn, who was for a long time pastor of the old John Street Methodist Church, the first Methodist Church founded in this country, and where the Wesleys preached on their visit to America. His mother inherited a literary and poetic talent from her father, and was the author of many pieces of poetry. The most celebrated of these was the one entitled "The Bible in Modern Languages," published in the Ladies Repository in 1868. His mother died at the age of sixty-three years, while her father, Rev. E. Washburn, died at his home in Racine County, Wis., in 1850, at eighty-four years of age. After Mr. Kellogg had finished his education at Janesville Academy, he was married, in Albion, Orleans Co., N. Y., to Caroline E. Bailey, in 1857, and then followed merchandizing in Kenosha, Wis., where he was burned out at the time of the great fire which consumed that city in 1860. Here the accumulations of the first three years of his business life were destroyed. He did not despair, but with manly courage determined to restore his lost fortune. The next day he went to Milwaukee, and visited his cousin, A. W. Kellogg, who, the year before, had organized the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, and was its secretary. In their conversation, his cousin made this remark, "You can sell goods equal to any man, and you can sell life insurance," and asked him what he would take for his time for a year. His reply was $1.50 per day and ten per cent commission. After a moment's consultation with S. S. Daggett, president of the company, his cousin replied, "You may consider yourself engaged." He went home to Kenosha, began canvassing in Racine and Kenosha counties, and in ten months he had sent to the company two hundred and fifty applications, upon which two hundred and thirty policies were issued and delivered. At the expiration of this engagement he went to New York City, and made a contract with the Home Life of that city for the general agency of the Northwestern States. This he continued for ten years, and by his personal solicitations built up a large business. He removed to Milwaukee in 1865, making his home there until 1874, when he came to Chicago. This was in consequence of the growing necessity for a man to control the interests of the "Home" in this city whose business ability and comprehensive knowledge of insurance would be sufficient to present that company here amid the vast commercial interests that are centered in Chicago; and to fill this need, Mr. Kellogg was sent and retained. At the close of the ten years he was promoted to the superintendency of agencies. He has two children—Edgar B., who is associated with him in business, and a daughter, Maybell. He is a member of the Masonic Fraternity, being connected with Kenosha (Wis.) Lodge, No. 47, A. F. & A. M.; Kenosha Chapter, No. 3, R. A. M.; and Oriental Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S. He is also a vestryman in Bishop Fallows' Church, the Bishop having officiated at the funeral of his father and mother and two of his children.

In 1861, the Chicago Mutual Life Insurance Company was organized, with a capital of $100,000, and its main office was established at Nos. 128 and 130 Lake Street.* The following were its officers: Haines H. Magie, president; Thomas Church, vice-president; L. C. Paine Freer, Nelson Tuttle, Orrington Lunt, Peter Page, Thomas Church, C. B. Hosmer, John V. Farwell, P. L. Yoe and Solomon A. Smith, directors. On February 22, 1861, the Home Mutual Fire Insurance Company was organized, with headquarters at the northeast corner of Dearborn and Madison streets. The officers were—James H. Woodworth, president; William W. Boyington, vice-president; Alonzo Cutter, secretary; Matthew Laffin, treasurer; A. H. Campbell, agent; and James H. Woodworth, E. W. Blatchford, John V. Farwell, Van H. Higgins, Matthew Laffin, E. G. Hall, Charles W. Cook, Alonzo Cutler, Thomas B. Bryan, William W. Boyington, Edward Hempstead, Charles Follansbee, directors. This company was subsequently the Chicago Fire Insurance Company. The Commercial Insurance Company was chartered this year, but was not organized until 1865. It then established its headquarters at No. 46 LaSalle Street, and had a capital of $300,000, with the following officers: J. C. Dore, president; I. R. Diller, vice-president; J. Farmer, secretary; and William V. Kay, Harmon Spruance, L. B. Sidway, D. S. Smith, E. F. Lawrence, S. S. Williamson, and T. H. Seymour, directors. The Merchants' Insurance Company was also chartered this year, and had the following officers: William E. Doggett, president; Solomon A. Smith, treasurer; William E. Rollo, secretary and George Armour, William E. Doggett, H. W. Hinsdale, William McKindley, Solomon A. Smith, H. A. Hurlburt, H. W. King, L. D. Norton and John Tyrrell, directors. There were also chartered the Equitable Fire, Fort Dearborn, Illinois Life and Inland Companies. The Union Insurance and Trust Company was organized in this year, and established an office at Room 2, Loomis Building, No. 48 Clark Street, with a capital of $200,000. Its officers were: Benjamin Lombard, president; Van H. Higgins, vice president; B. F. Johnson, secretary; Francis A. Hoffman, treasurer. The directors were—Benjamin Lombard, Matthew Bolles, Daniel Sharp, James W. Stone, Levi F. Stevens, Van H. Higgins, Francis A. Hoffman, George W. Gage, M. D. Gilman, John V. Farwell, Francis B. Peabody, Thomas Harless, J. Q. Hoyt, Isaac G. Lombard, D. L. Phillips, Elvis Harwood, Josiah Lombard, Charles Chandler, Oliver Whitaker and Marshall Ayres.

* The detailed history of these various home companies can not be given; the items are almost impossible of attainment, and the gentlemen who were connected with defunct companies appear to be believers in the maxim "Let the dead past bury its dead."

On February 22, 1861, an act was approved, whereby a body politic and corporate was created, having for its name "The Chicago Board of Underwriters," and such board was decreed to consist of "the following and their associates, now composing the Chicago Board of Underwriters: T. L. Miller, Julius White, H. B. Willmarth, C. N. Holden, S. T. Atwater, E. W. Phillips, S. C. Higginson, Alfred James."

This organization has since been continued; and although the Board occasionally ceased to exercise its supervisory and regulative prerogatives, the secretary exercised the functions devolving upon him and retained the corporate existence of the board. The first secretary was Arthur C. Ducat, and Alfred Wright was assistant secretary and surveyor. Mr. Wright succeeded to the secretaryship about 1864 or 1865,* and retained it until February 1, 1882, when Thomas A. Vowden succeeded him, having occupied the position of assistant secretary for twelve years.

HENRY H. BROWN came to Chicago in 1862. He was born in Bridgewater, Oneida Co., N. Y., in 1832, and his parents deciding to migrate to the West he came with them, in 1839, to Chicago, shortly thereafter settling in Peru, LaSalle Co., Ill. There he received his education, and acquired a knowledge of the science and practice of civil engineering so successfully, that he subsequently filled the positions of deputy county surveyor of LaSalle County and of city engineer of Peru, besides filling many positions upon various railroads. In 1855, he embarked in the insurance business, representing the Etna, Phoenix and North American companies of Hartford, Conn., also other companies. During the years 1857-58, Mr. Brown's talent for insurance received recognition by his receiving the appointment of special agent for the Etna. In 1862, Mr. Brown came to Chicago, and became connected with the insurance agency of L. D. Olmsted & Co., for about one year, after which he was secretary for four years. In 1866, he resigned his position with the Garden City, in order to establish an insurance agency of his own. This he did, representing the Commerce, of Albany, Hope, of Providence, and Buckeye, of Cleveland. At the time of the fire, his agency comprised the Phoenix, of Hartford, the Commerce, of Albany, the Sun, of Cleveland, and the Hope, of Providence, and paid through his agency about $1,800,000 of losses consequent upon the fire of 1871. He now represents the Northern, of Aberdeen and London, Glens Falls, of Glens Falls, N. Y., and California, of San Francisco, the aggregate assets of which companies are about nine million dollars. Mr. Brown, throughout his whole connection with the insurance business, has been distinguished by clear sighted decision, promptitude of action and strict integrity; hence it is no marvel that at every place he has instituted a business ness establishment and has rapidly built up a strong trade, and has always been associated with the strongest and most reliable companies. In person he is tall and imposing, in manner deliberate and decisive, and in business transactions his word is his bond.

* Thomas A. Vowden, the secretary of the Board, furnished these particulars.

Mr. Teall also opened a local office in 1862.

In 1863, the State Insurance Company, of Chicago, was incorporated, and Jefferson Farmer, S. F. Requa and George F. Bissell entered the insurance business in this city. In this year the Mutual Security Insurance Company had its office at Room 5, Marine Bank Building, with a capital of $300,000, and the following officers: Ezra B. McCagg, president; Benjamin W. Raymond, vice-president; Isaac Wells, secretary John Forsyth, treasurer. The directors were—Ezra B. McCagg, William H. Brown, Benjamin W. Page, Chauncey T. Bowen, John Sears, John Forsyth, Benjamin W. Raymond, Hugh T. Dickey, Mark Skinner, Alexander Officer, Amos T. Hall, D. J. Ely, Abraham Kohm, J. E. Morse, Mahlon D. Ogden, Isaac Wells, James Marks, Norman Williams, Jr., William H. Bradley, E. C. Larned, Mark Kimball, William Bross, J. M. Underwood, J. Y. Scammon and Gilbert Hubbard.

In this year the insurance business first gained prominence, as before this year the companies represented had been doing business in a quiet, serene manner, receiving premiums and liquidating policies, but making no special efforts to write risks.

THEO. B. WILCOX was born in May, 1836, in Chester, Mass., but was educated in Chicago, and in 1850 commenced his business experiences with the firm of L. D. Olmsted & Co., dry-goods merchants, with whom he remained for three years. He then went to Muskegon, Mich., as clerk in a dry-goods house, where he only remained for two months, and then followed various mercantile pursuits, among others being clerk for the lumber firm of T. Newell & Co. In 1860, he went to Colorado, where he remained four months. He returned to Muskegon, Mich., where he engaged in the lumber business, and, in 1864, established an insurance agency under the firm name of T. B. Wilcox & Co.,—the company being S. N. Wilcox—and which agency wrote fire, life and accident policies. In 1876, Mr. Wilcox came to Chicago and established the agency here where he now represents the Agricultural, of Watertown, N. Y., the New Hampshire, of Manchester, N. H., and the German Fire, of Peoria, Ill. Since 1872, Mr. Wilcox has been a member of the Chicago Board of Trade and engaged in the commission business; the commission firm being Wilcox & Farvid, and comprising T. B. Wilcox and J. A. Farvid.

THOMAS SEPTIMUS CHARD came to Chicago in 1864. He was born on August 15, 1844, in Buffalo, N. Y., the son of William and Mary Chard. While but ten years old, he lost his parents, and the deprivation caused him to seek comfort in literature, poetry and study. In 1855, he entered the High School in Canton, Ohio; in 1856 and 1857, he attended school at Buffalo, and in 1858-59, he was a pupil at a classical academy in Clarence, N. V., and at all these places his natural talents were aided and made fruitful by the love he bore for his studies. His health failing, however, he was compelled to forego the collegiate course he was so desirous of pursuing, and he consequently returned to Buffalo, N. Y., and sought commercial employment. This he pursued, in the banking and transportation business, until the spring of 1864, when he came to Chicago and entered the office of F. A. Howe, Jr., at the solicitation of that gentleman. For three years he filled miscellaneous clerical positions until 1867, when he entered the office of the Lumbermen's Insurance Company, remaining therewith until 1870, when he accepted the appointment of special agent for the Western States of the Firemen's Fund and Union Insurance companies, of California. In 1872, the Firemen's Fund established an independent western department, with headquarters in Chicago, and placed Mr. Chard as manager, in charge of that department, he then being only in his twenty-seventh year. In 1876, the Firemen's Fund closed its New York department, and placed all of its Eastern interests in the management of Mr. Chard. In September, 1880, he was made manager for the Union Insurance Company, and at present has the management of the two companies specified. In his appointment to these important positions, Mr. Chard has only received his due need of recognition; he is a thorough, practical and theoretical insurance man, and the problems and axioms of insurance are to him pleasurable studies. He has occupied important positions in the national councils of underwriters, and is constantly on the alert for the adoption of such measures as will dignify his profession. On October 7, 1871, Mr. Chard was in Louisville, and, hearing of the fire of that evening, he hastened to this city, only to learn of its semi-demolition. Knowing the companies that he represented, however, he assured the policy-holders that their losses would be paid in full without delay. This statement was subsequently corroborated by the action of those companies, which paid in full over a million dollars of fire losses consequent upon the Chicago fire. In 1875, Mr. Chard made the tour through the western country and the Yosemite. In 1876, he lost his first wife, the daughter of Cromwell Chase, of Galena, Ill. On October 4, 1877, he married Adeline Peabody Whitney, at Waltham, Mass. In 1880, he again visited California, and in 1882, accompanied by Mrs. Chard, he visited his ancestral home in England and made the tour of France, Switzerland and Germany. In addition to the reputation Mr. Chard has acquired in the prosecution of the insurance business, and the esteem wherein he is held by his hosts of social friends, he has graduated as a littérateur of no mean pretensions, having written two volumes of poems, one in 1860, and one in 1874, the latter being entitled "Across the Sea," both of which have received eulogiums for their poetic and intellectual merit.

W. G. FERGUSON also became a resident of Chicago in this year. He now is agent for the Lancashire Insurance Company, of Manchester, England, which was established in 1852, and has since done a large and successful business at home and abroad. This company ranks among the leading insurance companies of England, financially and otherwise. The assets in the United States are one million five hundred thousand dollars, of which one million three hundred and sixty thousand dollars are in United States bonds, and the annual receipts in the United States exceed one million per annum. The general manager in England is George Stewart. Edward Litchfield, New York, is United States manager; George Pritchard, sub-manager; and W. G. Ferguson, manager of the Western Department. W. G. Ferguson commenced his insurance career in Rockford, Winnebago Co., Ill., as local agent, in 1862, and two years later became special agent and adjuster for the Security, of New York, under J. R. Payson, retaining that position until the dissolution of the company after the great fire, when he devoted some time to closing up its affairs. In 1873, he was appointed special agent and adjuster for the Lancashire Insurance Company, his territory being the Western and Southern States; and, in 1877, he was assigned to the management of the Western Branch, which in that year was first established. His territory embraces the following States: Arkansas, Colorado, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and the Territories east of the Rocky Mountains.

In 1865, the agents appear to have been Samuel T. Atwater, George Baker & Co., Charles E. Brown, Henry H. Brown, A. H. Campbell, John Dorchester, F. P. Fisher, Robert Greer, L. C. Hall, F. A. Hoffman, C. N. Holden, Holmes Brothers, Hubbard & Hunt, Alfred James, R. H. Jordan & Co., E. J. Kelley, Julius Korschall, Miller & Willmarth, Moore & Stevens, J. K. Murphy, Mills Olcott, J. R. Payson, B. W. Phillips, T. F. Phillips, Robert Reid, E. E. Ryan, W. E. Rollo, E. M. Teall and R. D. VanWagenen. In this year George C. Clarke commenced his insurance experience.

The John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Boston, Mass., this year established an agency in Chicago, and since that date has been successfully represented here. Its present representative, and one who has held the position of general agent for the State of Illinois for a number of years, is General August L. Chetlain.

ROCKWOOD W. HOSMER is a native of Concord, Mass., and commenced his insurance experience in Boston, in 1861, and came from that city to Chicago in 1865, and entered into business with I. F. Dobson & Co., who, in that year, established an agency in Chicago, and from whose office some of the foremost insurance men of the city have graduated. In 1868, Mr. Hosmer was appointed agent of the City Fire Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., associating with him, in 1875, J. W. Hosmer, when the firm name became R. W. Hosmer & Co., and has remained the same since that date. The fire losses paid by Mr. Hosmer, consequent upon the fire of 1871, were about two million dollars. The firm at present represents the Norwich Union, of England, the Lion, of London, and the American and the Mercantile, of Boston. The assets of these companies, in the United States, aggregate $3,000,000, and the surplus over $2,000,000, as per statement of January 1, 1884. Mr. Hosmer was vice-president of the Chicago Board of Underwriters for the years 1882-83, and was elected president in January, 1884.

GEORGE C. CLARKE is one of the leading insurance men of

Chicago, and dates his experience of the business from 1865, when he was general agent for the National Life Insurance Company, of Vermont. Shortly afterward he entered the house of I. F. Dobson & Co.: this firm Mr. Clarke succeeded in 1869. The present firm of George C. Clarke & Co. comprises George C. Clarke, S. A. Harvey and Herbert Darlington. Mr. Clarke was born on September 26, 1838, in Boston, Mass. He received his early education at the common school, and entering Amherst College in 1854, at the age of sixteen, graduating therefrom, with good rank, in 1858, when not yet twenty years of age. After graduating he came to Chicago, where he taught in the high school for six years. He was elected to the Latin professorship in the University of Chicago in 1864, in September of which year he commenced the performance of the duties of the professorship. In 1864-65, he resigned his professorship, and accepted the appointment of general agent of the National Life Insurance Company, of Vermont. He built up a good business for that company, but, preferring the fire and marine branches of insurance, he resigned that position and entered the office of Messrs. Dobson & Co. He was elected president of the Chicago Board of Underwriters in 1872, retaining it until January, 1875, through the portion of the Board's career most flecked with mutation, the last year being the year wherein occurred the fire of July 14 and the notable "withdrawal of insurance companies" from Chicago. In 1866, the Common Council elected him a member of the Board of Education, wherein he served three years; during the first year he was chairman of the high school committees, the second year he was vice-president of the board. In 1870, the elegant school-building on Ashland Avenue was erected, and christened the Clarke School, in his honor. In 1869, Mr. Clarke was made a member of the civic Board of Education, which office he held for three years. In 1864, Mr. Clarke was married to Miss Hettie, only daughter of Dr. John W. Eldredge, who, at the time of his death, was one of the oldest of Chicago's physicians.

THE TRADERS' INSURANCE COMPANY was organized in 1865, with the following directors; Clinton Briggs, II. McLennan, H. W. Hinsdale, B. P. Hutchinson, David Kriegh, E. Hempstead, H. A. Hurlbut, John B. Lyon and James W. Odell. Its officers were Clinton Briggs, president; David Kriegh, vice-president; and Samuel T. Atwater, secretary. In 1870, the company retired from business, re-insuring its risks and re-paying its stockholders thirty-five per cent. In April, 1872, a number of the prominent business men of Chicago procured a charter and re-organized the company, since which time its growth has been steady and augmentative, as the following table will exhibit:

YEARS.	Net Surplus.	Gross Assets.
1872 -----	$ 4,438 59	$ 586,039 18
1873 -----	125,940 51	749,109 25
1874 -----	92,542 96	727,965 95
1875 -----	164,567 15	812,929 13
1876 -----	178,950 62	824,359 13
1877 -----	138,242 62	812,521 43
1878 -----	166,239 38	822,736 20
1879 -----	131,416 81	851,183 11
1880 -----	234,057 20	942,013 16
1881 -----	263,566 66	1,031,598 17
1882 -----	339,696 44	1,057,217 33
1883 -----	361,831 05	1,165,378 10

The board of directors is composed of the following gentlemen: Ebenezer Buckingham, S. H. McCrea, J. F. Gillette, William G. Hibbard, Elias T. Watkins, Ira S. Younglove, C. L. Hutchinson, C. Comstock and R. J. Smith. The officers are Ebenezer Buckingham, president; S. H. McCrea, vice-president; Robert J. Smith, secretary, and S. A. Rothemel, assistant secretary. The present secretary, R. J. Smith, was placed in charge of the business of the company in July, 1874; and, notwithstanding the company lost nearly $100,000 in the second great Chicago fire, during the same month, and had to encounter many other apparently insurmountable difficulties, which hovered around it to impede its progress, he has made such a record that he and his thousands of friends, in and out of the business, may well point to it with pride. It has taken hard, persistent and patient work, but Mr. Smith has had the advantage of twenty years' experience in the business, excellent physical health and able assistants.

ROBERT JORDAN SMITH was born July 12, 1836, near the city of Belleville, St. Clair Co., Ill. He was reared on a farm, and attended the common school until his fifteenth year, and then he entered Shurtleff College at Upper Alton, Ill., for one term. He was intensely desirous of pursuing his studies further, and taught school for the purpose of procuring means wherewith to gratify his educational ambition, but, his plans being frustrated, he entered a country store, and becoming intent upon business pursuits, rescinded his intention of taking a collegiate course. He then took an active part in local politics, and when quite young was elected town treasurer, justice of the peace, and subsequently was appointed postmaster. In 1860, he was given the agency of the Etina Insurance Company, of Hartford, a short time after receiving which he removed to Springfield, where he acted as State and local agent until 1867. During that year he accepted the general agency of the Putnam Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., and removed to Chicago. This position he retained until the fire of 1871, shortly after which he was appointed superintendent of agencies for the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, of England, for four Western states. He was next appointed general agent of the New Orleans Insurance Association, of New Orleans, for the Northwestern States, and still acts in that capacity. He was likewise supervisory agent of the National Board of Fire Underwriters, and, during 1873 and 1874, was president of the Northwestern Association of Underwriters, and, in July of the latter year, was elected to his present position, and in 1876 was president of the International Board of Marine Underwriters. In 1858, Mr. Smith married Miss Susan O. Barker, of Monroe County, Ill. They have the following children living—Bertha B. Smith, Robert Earl Smith and Irma Louis Smith. In conclusion, it may be remarked, that in Mr. Smith the young men of our city find an example of what may be achieved by steady industry and unswerving application to business. With no aid but his own energy, no sponsor but his own integrity and perseverance, he has arisen from a farmer's boy to the management of a prominent insurance company, and has achieved a reputation without a stain, though only forty-eight years of age. He is not alone a typical Chicagoan, but a typical specimen of the infallible result of perseverance, integrity, honesty and industry.

The Equitable Insurance Company had the following officers this year: John V. Farwell, president; George S. Bowen, vice-president; B. W. Phillips, secretary; William Phillips, assistant secretary; and its directors were E. G. Hall, W. G. Lewis, H. D. Colvin, I. Y. Munn, John B. Drake, George F. Rumsey and F. Crumbaugh. Its habitat was at the southwest corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets, and its capital is $200,000. The Lumbermen's Insurance Company was chartered in 1865, with an authorized capital of $1,000,000, a paid-up capital of $300,000. Its office was at No. 70 LaSalle Street. H. G. Powers was president; T. M. Avery, vice-president; Thomas Goodman, secretary; and its directors were H. Y. Powers, Thomas M. Avery, S. G. D. Howard, William T. Allen, Nathan Mears, Charles B. Sawyer, Nelson Ludington, Seneca D. Kimbark, Jesse Spalding, William B. Phillips and Martin Ryerson. The Packers' and Provision-Dealers' Insurance Company was also incorporated this year. Its main office was at No. 182 South Water Street, its capital $500,000, and its officers Daniel A. Jones, president; R. M. Hough, vice-president; V. A. Turpin, secretary; directors, Daniel A. Jones, R. M. Hough, V. A. Turpin, John L. Hancock, Hugh McLennan, P. L. Underwood, Gilbert Hubbard, R. S. King, and L. D. Norton. The Provident Life Insurance and Investment Company was incorporated in 1865, and established its office at No. 157 Randolph Street. Its capital was $1,000,000; its officers C. G. Hammond, president; Ira Y. Munn, vice-president; C. Holland, secretary; C. D. Palmer, general ticket agent; and its directors were C. G. Hammond, G. F. Harding, James C. Fargo, T. B. Blackstone, Perry H. Smith, Ira Y. Munn, Frederick H. Winston, H. E. Sargent, C. J. Gilbert, and John F. Tracey. The Travelers' Insurance Company, chartered this year, had an authorized capital of $500,000; a paid-up capital of $100,000; a main office at No. 94 Lake Street; and the following officers: John Tyrrell, president; Charles L. Currier, vice-president; Henry W. King, treasurer; and Orville Pace, secretary; Julius H. Currier, the general agent, and W. D. Richardson, the general ticket agent. The directors were John Tyrrell, William E. Doggett, Solomon A. Smith, H. W. King, H. A. Hurlbut, D. W. Page, Charles L. Currier, Julius H. Currier, and Orville Page. The Northwestern Mutual Life was also incorporated in 1865; its officers were Merrill Ladd, president; Ira Y. Munn, vice-president; P. H. Willard, treasurer, and W. F. Brewster, secretary. The executive committee were Merrill Ladd, C. C. P. Holden, Leonard Swett, Ira Y. Munn, P. H. Willard, C. H. Brower, and Isaac C. Day. The Globe Insurance Company was chartered this year, with an authorized capital of $1,000,000. Its cash capital was $200,000, and its office at Room 24 in Nixon's Exchange. Its officers were James H. Bowen, president; George M. Wheeler, vice-president; Ira Holmes, treasurer; John Janes, secretary. The directors were James H. Bowen, George M. Wheeler, J. Irving Pearce, C. M. Henderson, S. C. Griggs, Ira Holmes, and George M. Kimbark. The Republic Insurance Company was chartered in 1865. Its office was established at the corner of LaSalle and Randolph Streets; its capital was $100,000; and its officers Samuel Hoard, president; W. F. Coolbaugh, treasurer; Oscar W. Barrett, secretary. Its directors were Samuel Hoard, W. F. Coolbaugh, J. V. Farwell, B. W. Phillips, J. H. Ragatz, C. B. Farwell, C. F. W. Junge, William Phillips, and Oscar W. Barrett. The other companies chartered this year were—Ætna Fire, Citizens', Commonweal, Germania, Great Western Life, Howard, Knickerbocker, Lamar, Mercantile, Mutual Fire, National, National Travelers, Northwestern Protection, Northwestern Travelers, Safety, Stock and Mutual, Travelers' Security, United States, United States Travelers' and Western Phoenix. The companies represented here were—Ætna, of Hartford; Ætna, of New York; Albany City; American, of Providence; Astor, Atlantic, of Providence; Atlantic, of New York; Baltic; Beekman; Buffalo Mutual; City Fire, of Hartford; Charter Oak; Commerce; Connecticut; Corn Exchange; Exchange; Fulton; Goodhue; Girard; Hampden; Hartford; Home, of New York; Insurance Company of North America, of Philadelphia; International; Market; Massasoit; Mercantile; Merchants', of Hartford; Metropolitan; Morris; Narragansett; National, of Boston; New England; North American, of Hartford; Norwich; Park; Peoria; Phenix, of New York; Phoenix, of Hartford; Providence; Washington; Relief; Resolute; St. Nicholas; Security; Springfield; Standard, of New York; Thames; Underwriters' Agency, of New York; * Washington; and Yonkers.

WALLACE A. LOWELL also entered the insurance business at this time. He is one of the old insurance men of Chicago, and unites a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the business to indefatigable perseverance and untiring energy. He first established an agency in 1865, when he represented the following companies: German, of Cleveland; State, of Cleveland; Alemannia, of Cleveland; Merchants', of New York; Armenia, of Pittsburgh—being general agent in the West therefor. These, and other companies of which he was agent at the time of the fire, paid about $3,500,000 of losses resultant thereupon, besides which Mr. Lowell adjusted some twelve million dollars worth of losses in his office. He now represents the Commercial, of New York; Firemen's, of Chicago; Aurora, of Cincinnati; Fidelity and Casualty, of New York; Home Life, of New York; and Teutonia Fire, of Philadelphia, which companies represent in the aggregate $8,000,000 capital. Mr. Lowell was also one of the re-organizers of the Western Fire, Marine and Plate Glass Insurance Company, and occupied the position of secretary of that company for two years, until he relinquished it in 1884, to attend to his various agency interests. Mr. Lowell is a native of Warsaw, Wyoming Co., N. Y., and came West with his parents to Janesville, Wis., when he was some seven years old. In that city he received his education, and, when quite a youth, became employed in an insurance office, and also had an agency for a short time.

In 1866, agents commenced to pour into Chicago,

* This agency was composed of the Germania, Hanover, Republic and Niagara Insurance companies, and was so constructed until December, 1873, when the Republic and Niagara withdrew. The Germania and Hanover then constituted the agency until 1884, when they dissolved partnership, and the New York Underwriters' Agency ceased to exist.

and their particularization is needless, except in specific cases.

The firm of MILLER & DREW was inception in 1866, by James R. Miller and Charles W. Drew, but Mr. Miller dying in 1880, the firm name was changed to Charles W. Drew & Co., since which time the business has been maintained under that cognomen. Miller & Drew shared the fate of the majority of Chicago business men, and were burned out in the fire of 1871, losing both their offices and residences, but retaining their grit and energy. On the Thursday after that event they started at the house now numbered 1602 Indiana Avenue, and resumed the insurance business, their books, fortunately, being saved by the vault wherein they were placed. They shortly afterward moved to No. 472 Wabash Avenue, and rented the whole house, living up stairs, and holding their office in the basement. They remained in this state of combined domesticity and business until Bryan Block was completed, and were the first tenants of that block after its erection, being the first insurance men who occupied an office in a building erected after the conflagration. In this office, Charles W. Drew & Co. have built up a business that has surpassed their most sanguine expectations.

THE PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, OF PHILADELPHIA, is represented in this city by B. P. Hinman, Charles B. Soule and Calvin S. Smith, general agents for the State of Illinois, with State headquarters in Chicago. Many strong indorsements could be culled from the official reports of State commissioners bearing on the management of this company, but it is sufficient to say that, for over one-third of a century, it has justly taken a high rank among the leading companies of America. Its assets, consisting of well-secured mortgages, ground-rents, choice bonds of all descriptions, and real estate, all being securities of unquestionable character, and commanding high rates of interest, amount to nearly ten millions, with a reserve on hand of seven and a half millions. This company has been represented in Chicago since 1866, and has upon its books nearly all of the leading men who have been and are so closely identified with the progress and growth of the city. The growth of this company has been large, especially under its present management. Since its organization they have issued over one hundred and ten million dollars of insurance and have now forty-one million dollars' worth in force. Charles B. Soule has been a resident of Chicago since 1878, and the office under his direction ranks next to the New York and Philadelphia offices.

THE FIREMEN'S INSURANCE COMPANY, OF CHICAGO, was organized under the name of the Union Insurance Company, of Decatur, on February 21, 1867. The company was re-organized, and name changed to Firemen's Insurance Company of Chicago, and commenced business in Chicago on April 27, 1876. The company has been very successful since its establishment in this city. Its directors at present are George F. Harding, D. W. Eldred, A. V. Knickerbocker, E. R. Bowen and A. C. Harding; and its officers are George F. Harding, president; D. W. Eldred, vice-president; and John L. Skelton, secretary. The assets of the company on January 1, 1884, were $169,105.20, and its surplus was $146,315.05. It may be remarked that the business of this company has been steadily growing since 1876, and that, although it confines its business to Chicago, within that limit, its transactions are large, prosperous and favorable to both the company, and the policy-holders, equity and liberality characterizing its actions. John L. Skelton, the secretary of this company, came to Chicago in 1855, at the age of eleven years, and, in 1863, became an employe of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company as telegrapher and book-keeper, with which company he remained for some six years. Mr. Skelton then accepted a position with the Chicago Firemen's Insurance Company, which company was made utterly bankrupt by the Chicago fire of 1871. In 1876, Mr. Skelton was appointed secretary of the present company. He is a native of Halifax, Yorkshire, England. He is an active member of the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and a charter member of the State Natural History Society of Illinois.

In 1867, the following companies were chartered: Ætna, American Mutual Health, Burglary, German Mutual Life, Empire Mutual Life, Home, Shippers', Vesuvius and Western Railroad.

UNION CENTRAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, OF CINCINNATI, established its Chicago agency in 1867, with Solly McElroy as general agent. Upon his demise in 1881, R. H. Eldon came from Leavenworth, Kan. He has been superintendent of the company since 1877, which position his nineteen years of experience in the insurance business amply qualify him to fill; and his tact, courtesy and general business acumen have proven invaluable in the conduct of the office and the accretion of the company's business. Four years since (1880), this company stood at the bottom of the insurance list as regards the number of policies; last year (1883), it ranked fourth on the list, and the business for 1883 was twenty-five per cent. above that for 1882. The net assets on January 1, 1884, were $2,010,400.00, and the gross surplus as regards policy-holders on a four per cent. basis was $304,402.55.

W. B. CORNELL, superintendent of agencies and manager of the Western Department of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, began the business of insurance in Minneapolis, Minn., in 1859, leaving there in 1864, to enter the general agency of the Hartford, under the management of George F. Bissell, where he remained until 1868, when he was appointed special agent of the Aetna for Tennessee and other Southern States, and took up his residence at Nashville, Tenn. He remained there three years, when he became connected with the North British, and removed to Cincinnati, taking charge of their then Central Department. In 1875, their present Western Department, with headquarters at Chicago, was formed, and he became associate superintendent, remaining such until 1878, when he became sole superintendent, and has held that position ever since. In 1882, Mr. Cornell was elected president of the Fire Underwriters' Association of the Northwest.

WILLIAM J. HEMSTREET was born in Lyons, Wayne Co., N. Y., in 1833. At the age of sixteen, he became a sailor, and "ploughed the raging main" for two years, but finding no particular profit in this vocation, he abandoned it, and, when eighteen years of age, commenced to learn the trade of machinist, at Lockport. He served an apprenticeship of five years at this trade, completing it at Buffalo, N. Y. In 1857, he commenced farming in Genesee County, N. Y., and there remained until the outbreak of the War. When this occurred he was influential in enlisting some forty men in Co. "G," 104th New York Volunteer Infantry—he also enlisting in the same company—and, at the organization of the company, was elected and mustered in as second lieutenant. He remained therewith until 1862, when domestic afflictions necessitated his resignation. He resigned, sold out his farm and removed to Buffalo, N. Y., where he engaged in trade, until March, 1864, when he recruited a number of men, and was appointed first lieutenant of Co. "G," 179th New York Volunteer Infantry. He remained with this regiment until he was mustered out, in May, 1865, at the close of the War. In July, 1865, he came to Chicago, and was employed at his trade of machinist, but decided to go into the insurance business, and established himself as a broker in 1867, since which date he has been continuously in the business. He now represents, as local agent, the Agricultural, of Watertown, N. Y.; the German, of Peoria, Ill.; and the New Hampshire, of Manchester, N. H. Many of Mr. Hemstreet's customers, whom he procured on first going into business, he still retains—members of a business confidence engendered by seventeen years of association. Mr. Hemstreet is a member of the General George H. Thomas Post, No. 5, G. A. R., and of the Union Veteran Club. He was also made a Mason, in 1873, and is a member of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, A. F. & A. M.; Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.; Siloam Council, No. 53, R. & S. M.; Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T.; Van Rensselaer Lodge of Perfection, 14th; Chicago Council of Princes of Jerusalem, 16th; Gourgas Chapter, Knights of R. C. de H., 18th; and Oriental Sovereign Consistory, S. P. R. S., 32nd. He is also a member of the military order of the Loyal Legion and of the Builders' and Traders' Exchange.

In 1868, there appear to have been nineteen Chicago companies, of which fifteen were fire, three life and one accident and life. There were forty agents of fire companies, also a total of forty life insurance companies, two live-stock companies, one railroad accident, one steam-boiler and three general accident companies.

"Of the Chicago companies," says Mr. Colbert, "one dates from 1853, and was re-organized in 1864; four organized in 1855, one organized in 1859, one organized in 1861, three organized in 1863, four organized in 1865, four organized in 1866, and one organized in 1868; the aggregate capital is about $8,000,000 and the aggregate rate in fire is about 2 1/4 per cent."

The Directory of that year, however, gives twenty-one home companies, as follows: Chicago Firemen's, Commercial, Garden City, Germania, Home Mutual, Illinois Mutual, Home, International Life, Equitable, Lumbermen's, Mercantile Mutual, Merchants' Mutual, Security, Republic, Traders', National, State, Chicago Life, Provident Life and Investment, Stock and Mutual, Mutual Life.

On March 11, 1869, the insurance law was passed, making examinations of each company doing business in the State a part of the duty of the State auditor,* and since that date annual insurance reports have been compiled and published under the auspices of that official. In 1869, the following companies were chartered: Armour Life, Chicago Mutual Health and Life Association, Chicago and Veddo Insurance and Tea Company, Hibernian, Illinois Mutual Life, Laboring Man's Life, Mechanics', Mechanics' and Traders', Merchants' Union, North Western German Mutual Fire, Republic Life, Safety Deposit Life, Teutonia Life, Union Co-operative, Western Fire, Marine and Plate Glass, Western Metropolitan, Woolen Manufacturers' of Northwest, and Yokohama.

JUDGE WILLIAM J. WHALING was born in Stafford County, Virginia, in 1803, and there received his early education, after which he removed to New York City, and terminated his scholastic studies and also commenced the study of law. He speedily became one of the most proficient members of that profession, and became one of the associate justices of the State, in which capacity he served for six years, with marked ability. In 1848 he moved to Milwaukee, and there became president of the Board of Trade, and controlled large iron and lumber interests; he also became the manager for the Aetna and Hartford Insurance companies. In 1868 he removed to Chicago, and immediately became identified with the best interests of the city, and was particularly prominent in the insurance business here, representing the same companies that he had in Milwaukee. On October 8, 1871, he married Mrs. Julia Cone and the next day was a sufferer by the great fire to the extent of all his worldly possessions. His adverse fortune, however, did not deter him from efforts at its recovery, and he accepted the general agency for the South for the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, in which he was eminently successful. On January 9, 1885, he died at Eatonton, Ga., in the 82d year of his age. Of him, a contemporaneous journal thus wrote: "In this bustling and eager age, with its pursuit of the phantom, wealth, often reserve, the most charming of qualities, is denied us, and often, too, the best inspirations of the soul are trampled in the dust to achieve an ephemeral notoriety and success, among the cunning, the shrewd and unscrupulous. The successful career of this honorable and venerable man appeals to us—not in vain—for the exercise of the finer attributes of our nature, and proves that, in the long run, success, and lasting honor, and satisfaction are best secured when justice, equity and unswerving fidelity to truth and honor are the polar stars of our conduct in life. * * * We linger with regret over the memory of those noble qualities of head and heart, which, without the blazonry of titles and coronet, yet gave the assurance and title among men of the grand old name of gentleman.' The Southern Underwriters' Association passed resolutions expressive of their earnest appreciation of the nobility of character of Judge Whaling and their grief at his loss, and the widow received numberless similar expressions of condolence from the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, and from societies and individuals; among them being one from the Fifth Presbyterian Church of this city, wherein occurs the following just tribute to his memory: "In the death of our beloved brother we feel that our Church loses a faithful, consistent and spiritual father and elder, whom we shall sadly miss in his counsels and prayers. His very presence was a constant benediction. God bless his memory to us all. In him was realized the truth, 'The hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness.' His gentle courtesy was ever manifest to all with whom he came in contact. He was truly a Christian gentleman. * * * We tender to his wife, left desolate, our deepest sympathy. We bow our heads in submission to the Divine Will, knowing that the lengthening shadows of the evening of life have changed into the eternal morning of beauty and glory."

CHARLES F. SCHUMACHER established a real-estate, loan and insurance agency at No. 266 Blue Island Avenue in 1860, and, in 1881, associated with him his sons, John C. and Charles C., under the firm name of Charles F. Schumacher & Sons. This firm do a large business; and the prestige established at the time of the fire of 1871, by Mr. Schumacher, in the payment of all the insurance risks carried by his agency in full, has been maintained by the firm since, to the manifest increase of all classes of their business. They are the agents for the Milwaukee Mechanics' Mutual, and the German of Freeport, whose combined assets on January 1, 1881, were $2,500,000, and whose aggregate net surplus on the same date was $300,000. They are also agents for the New York Underwriters', the Scottish Union, the National, and the California, of San Francisco, insurance companies; and are agents for the following steamship lines: The Hamburg, the Bremen, the Inman, the Cunard, the White Star, the Red Star and the National. Charles F. Schumacher was born in the Dukedom of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, December 23, 1823, and received a good common-school education. In 1846, being an able seaman, he came from Antwerp to America, landing in New York, where, after a stay of two weeks, he sailed for Liverpool in the ship "Glasgow," with a cargo of flour and turpentine. He then shipped for Mobile, Ala., with salt, and loaded at that point with cotton for Havre de Grace, and from there loaded with passengers for New York City. He left the sea, and came to Chicago, in 1847, soon commencing to sail on the lakes in the summer, and in the winter time worked in the packing-houses, continuing these employments alternately for three years, when he received a severe wound in the hand that incapacitated him for his usual labors, and he then retired from sailing. He was employed in a hardware store for about three years, and then his services were engaged by F. P. Thayer, furniture manufacturer (now Tobey & Company), where he remained for five years. He then began driving an express wagon, and followed this business for three years, when the Pike's Peak excitement broke out, and he went to seek his fortune in the gold fields, and was satisfied with a short experience, and returned in the fall of the same year, again entering Mr. Thayer's employ. In the spring of 1860, he opened a grocery store, remaining in that business until 1860, when he commenced the real-estate, loan and insurance business, and associated his sons with him. He was married in Chicago in 1848, to Miss Catherine Lehn, who died in 1883, leaving six children, and, in 1884, he was married a second time in his native country, at Wisnar, to Miss Meta Lass.

* To Charles P. Swigert, State Auditor, the compiler is indebted for much valuable information.

THE WESTERN MANUFACTURERS' MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY was incorporated on March 30, 1860, with John Merkl, president; Fritz Karstens, vice-president; Louis Merkl, secretary; Ed. Albert, cashier; and Casper Hahn, Fritz Seller and August Heidsmith, taxators, as incorporators. This company transacted business until the time of the fire of 1871; subsequent to which, it took up all its policies, settled up all its claims, and was re-organized. Since October, 1880, its business has been strictly that which is implied by its name—Manufacturers' Mutual. Its directors are Jesse Spalding, William H. Turner, Clinton Briggs, P. A. Montgomery, J. S. Esterbrook, George E. Wasey and A. J. Ray; and its officers are Jesse Spalding, president; William H. Turner, vice-president; Clinton Briggs, treasurer; and P. A. Montgomery, secretary. Under the capable and economical management of these gentlemen, the dividends for a number of years past have averaged twenty per cent., and for the past three years, have been over twenty-five per cent. Mr. Montgomery, in addition to the supervision and management of the affairs of the main office of the Western Manufacturers' Mutual Insurance Company, of Chicago, is also general agent for the Western Department of the Mutual Underwriters' Union. P. A. Montgomery has been in the insurance business since 1868, at which time he was agent for the American Insurance Company, Chicago, in the southern part of the State of Wisconsin, for a few months. He was also, for about a year, district agent at Oshkosh, Wis., for the Continental Insurance Company, of New York, and for other companies as special agent. He came to Chicago in 1875, and carried on business as special adjuster until 1876, when he was appointed inspector for the Millers' National Insurance Company, with which he remained until February, 1880, when he was made secretary of the Western Manufacturers' Mutual Insurance Company.

GEORGE M. HARVEY & CO.—This agency comprises George M. Harvey and Byron D. West, and was established January 1, 1884, for the Hanover Insurance Company, of New York, and the Citizens' Insurance Company, of the same State. The Hanover has, for twenty years, constituted a part of the "New York Underwriters' Agency"—a strong fire insurance organization, known throughout the country, and established in 1863 by its present general agent, Alexander Stoddard, of New York. Both the Hanover and the Citizens' have been represented in Chicago for a number of years, and have been long and favorably known among the insuring population, their prompt and full payment of all their losses in the great fire of 1871 being in itself a strong, practical evidence of solidity and honest management. The Hanover had, upon January 1, 1884, $2,658,210.17 assets, and $777,258.13 net surplus, and the Citizens', organized in 1836, on the same date, had assets, $1,041,584.95, net surplus, $429,036.22. Messrs. Harvey & Co. also represent the Firemen's Insurance Company, of Dayton, Ohio, organized in 1866, which has assets of $436,112.00 and a net surplus of $52,474.00, and in which company the shareholders are liable, under the Ohio State constitution, for double the amount of their stock.

GEORGE M. HARVEY, well known as one of Chicago's business men and for over fifteen years identified here with the underwriting business, is a native of Canada, born in the town of Niagara in 1848. His father, James Harvey, was a leading chemist of that place. The son was given an excellent academic education at the Niagara Senior County Grammar School, which institution, however, he left when fourteen years of age, to engage for a time in mercantile life in Buffalo, N. Y. He remained one year with the firm of Peabody & Co., wholesale druggists, and then became identified with Rounds & Hall, underwriters, in fire and marine insurance; from this dates Mr. Harvey's connection with the business he is now engaged in. He remained five years, with the last mentioned firm, and in 1860 came to Chicago, which city has since been his home, and where he then connected himself with the firm of S. M. Moore & Co. In 1873, his health having failed him, he went to Europe. In 1874, he returned, and founded the insurance firm of Smith & Harvey, which partnership existed during that year. He then became connected with McCormick Bros. & Findlay, afterward W. G. McCormick & Co., remaining there until 1884, when he founded the present firm of George M. Harvey & Co. In closing this brief sketch, it is only just to say that Mr. Harvey has been, and is to-day one of the most successful underwriters and insurance agents in the country. He is untiring in his industry, prompt and honorable in all his business intercourse with his fellows, and a man whom to know is to respect. He is genial, courteous and hospitable, and to these traits of character, coupled with his integrity and industry, must be attributed the success he has achieved.

BYRON D. WEST was born in 1836, and is a native of Dutchess County, N. Y. He began his insurance experience in the Western Branch Office of the Aetna of Hartford, at Cincinnati, Ohio, in the year 1859. He continued with this company as clerk until the breaking out of the War, when he enlisted in the 6th Ohio Infantry. He remained with this regiment until April, 1862, when he was promoted to the rank of second lieutenant in the regular army, and then resigned. He subsequently engaged in the general commission and brokerage business in New Orleans and Cincinnati, wherein he continued until 1867. He was then appointed general Western manager for the Western Insurance Company, of Buffalo, N. Y., with headquarters at Cincinnati, Ohio, which position he held for about three years and until his appointment, in 1870, as assistant secretary of the Andes, of Cincinnati, a company of $1,000,000 cash capital, organized at that time, but which, two years later, was forced to retire after having fully and fairly met over $1,000,000 in losses by the great fire of 1871. During this period, Mr. West was also made secretary of both the Amazon Insurance Company and the Triumph Insurance Company of Cincinnati, each having a paid-up capital of $500,000; and his position as secretary of the Amazon he held exclusively until August, 1876, when he came to Chicago to take the position of general superintendent, for the United States, of La Caisse Générale, a large French fire insurance company, at the time under the management of McCormick Bros. & Findlay, afterward the firm of W. G. McCormick & Co. of this city, and with which insurance company he remained, for over six years, United States manager thereof, with headquarters in New York City during 1880-81 and the greater 1882. In September, 1882, he became connected with the New York Underwriters' Agency as special agent and adjuster, returning to his old field in the Western States and making Chicago his headquarters. As may readily be imagined from this recital of the varied and comprehensive experiences of Mr. West, he is an insurance man of ability and executive talent. He was the originator and one of the organizers of the Insurance Adjustment Company of Cincinnati, which was established on April 13, 1873, and has always since been honored with the position of president of that organization, whether residing in Cincinnati, New York, or Chicago.

In 1870, the Union Insurance and Trust Company relinquished its insurance interests, re-insured its risks, and engaged in the general banking business. The Stock and Mutual Insurance Company re-insured in the National Insurance Company, of Chicago, and retired from business; and, a short time subsequent thereto, the National also re-insured its risks in the State Insurance Company, of Chicago, and retired from the public arena; while the Great Western and Knickerbocker companies, of Chicago, commenced business.

In 1871, the Board of Trade Insurance Company took preliminary steps toward an organization, but they were never perfected. The last agency established here before the fire, according to C. E. Rollins, was that located by the Northwestern National Insurance Company, of Milwaukee, Wis.; the present agent, Mr. Cameron, stating that George C. Clarke was appointed the agent. The Lumbermen's, Garden City and Lamar Insurance companies re-insured prior to October, 1871, and retired from business.

Prior to summing up the insurance chapter by the conflagration, a syllabus of the business of insuring from its earliest establishment may be of interest. In the earlier days of its existence here, its transactions were hampered by swaddling clothes of credit; risks were written on a credit basis, some companies receiving notes exclusively for the premiums, while others, of sterner mould, insisted upon a payment of one-third cash and the remaining two-thirds might be guaranteed by a note. Other companies would not relax their rules of transacting business upon a purely cash basis, and hence were blessed with very little business; although as time rolled on the insurers found that they could purchase better rates for cash than they could for credit, and then the cash companies commenced to receive large patronage. But this was long after the primary introduction of insurance into Chicago. And in the early days, the silvery voice of the insurance solicitor was heard expatiating on the various benefits derivable from insuring on a cash or credit basis; for the desire for business by the various companies represented, and the newness of the enterprise in this city, made the agents exert themselves to insure the residents and property holders. Until 1863, the insurance business did not attain any special prominence in the city, but in that year it commenced to receive the attention and patronage it merits. In 1865, there were but few Chicago companies in existence when the year dawned, but about the middle of that year a multitude of energies which had, for four years, been absorbed in the maelstrom of civil war were, by its subsidence, thrown again into commercial and mercantile life. Whether impressed or not, by their military experience, with the mortality of persons and the inflammability of earthly possessions, it is certain that very many ex-soldiers who entered the field of commercial speculation engaged in the insurance business and very many citizens became promoters and sustainers of insurance companies, so that, by the end of the year one hundred and twenty-nine companies were located and represented here; eighty-one fire and marine, twenty-nine life, and two accident; and also fourteen fire and marine, one life, and two accident, of which Chicago citizens were the stockholders. Mr. Colbert says:

"The importance, and, in fact, the necessity, of uniformity in rates and good practice, in order to ensure success in the undertaking, gave rise to the local organization of a Board of Fire Underwriters, during the year 1855. This Board lasted until 1861, when the uniformity of rates was interfered with by the practice of participation which broke out among the companies, and ended in the dissolution of the Board.* During the months of May and June, 1866, an effort was made toward the re-organization of this local Board, the ruinously low rates, and the frequency of losses by fire, being the prominent cause of the inception of the movement. About one-half of the companies then represented in the city, joined the new organization. But an opposition, amounting, indeed, to an almost positive persecution of the undertaking, characterized the struggle for its permanent existence. The first binding tariff was introduced about September, 1866. This was a general classification of risks, to which those connected with the Board pledged themselves to abide. The opposition took shape among certain Eastern companies, and was termed the 'Quadrilateral.'

* The Board was not dissolved, for its functions were not exercised.

They represented that the Board possessed dangerous powers under its charter, both as to the limit of holding property, which has been nominally fixed at the limit of $200,000, and as to the fines and penalties, which were made a part of the by-laws governing the organization. During the period of nearly a year, the struggle between the Board and its opponents continued, until the former were compelled to invoke the power of the National Board, and its perpetuity was made the test of the permanency of the general organization. However, in January, 1867, the opposition came into the local Board, and, since that time, it has worked harmoniously to the benefit of all concerned, whose community of interest lies in the mutual protection of a fixed tariff of rates and rules of sound and healthy practice."

From 1868 to 1871, the field of insurance investment was replete with Chicago companies; and the act of 1869 was necessary to check and destroy a tendency upon the part of heedless speculators to operate in insurance, without regard to the interests of insurers or the reimbursement of losses. It weeded out shaky companies, and afforded a statistical test of those that were stable, by which contemplative insurers could select their companies. Patronage grew with every month, and Chicago was the domicile of some splendid companies, when the fire came and swept them out of existence, as it would have done any company whose business was mainly confined to this city. No calculation of risks, however liberal, could withstand such devastation as was caused by that event, and no financial stability could remain solvent under such overwhelming disaster. Before that occurrence, however, the insurance companies were flourishing; many of them had erected handsome buildings, and portents were for a flood-tide of prosperity but the Black Monday came, and, "Alas! alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness, for in one hour is she made desolate."

Edwards's Directory for 1871 gives the following as the local companies doing business in that year: American, Nos. 118 and 120 Monroe Street; Chicago Firemen's, No. 92 LaSalle; Commercial, 162 Washington; Chicago, 128 LaSalle; Germania, 90 La Salle; Great Western, 174 LaSalle; Globe, 126 Washington; Home, 139 Madison; Knickerbocker, southeast corner of La Salle and Madison; Merchants', northwest corner of LaSalle and Washington; Equitable, Oriental Building, 120 LaSalle; Mutual Security, 112 LaSalle; Republic, 159 and 161 LaSalle; State, 82 LaSalle—all these being fire companies. The home life companies are given as Chicago, 15 and 16 Union Building, LaSalle southwest corner of Washington; National, 109 Monroe; Teutonia, 160 LaSalle; Mutual, 79 and 81 Wells; Republic, 161 and 163 LaSalle; Protection, 122 Madison; and Safety Deposit, 168 Washington. Also one plate-glass, the Western Insurance Company. In this same Directory the insurance agents are given as follows: Affeld Brothers (Frank O. and Charles E., Jr.), Franklin Babcock, C. H. Baker, Banker Brothers & Greene (William S. and John W. Banker and Samuel Greene), O. W. Barrett & Co., Joseph E. Bates, J. L. Beckwith, Thomas W. Blayney, Daniel L. Boone, H. H. Brown, E. K. Bruce, J. R. Burt, Charles H. Case, L. W. Cass, A. B. Chladek, William Charles, H. Clafin, L. C. Clark, J. F. Clark, George C. Clarke & Co., S. Clary, J. A. Closser, J. G. Conrad, R. S. Critchell, O. Cronkhitte, John Culver, O. P. Curran, Ambrose D. Davis, Lewis H. Davis, J. R. Dewey, Arthur C. Ducat, J. & M. Early, Frank P. Fisher, S. French, A. Frisbie & Son, Thomas Goodman, Goodwin (Jonathan, Jr.) & Pasco (Henry L.), A. C. Greenebaum, F. M. Hawes, W. J. Hemstreet, Frank Hlawin, Charles B. Holmes, R. W. Hosmer, Gurdon S. Hubbard, Jr. Huston (William B.) & Wade (George W.), Alfred James & Co., Frederick T.

James, H. F. Jennison, Augustus Johnson, R. H. Jordan, H. H. Koor, J. C. Lambrite, Edwin C. Lewis, Lewis (L. J.) & Hathaway (John L.), S. T. Lockwood, Charles H. Low, James A. Marshall, J. G. McKindley, T. L. Miller & Co., Miller (James R.) & Drew (Charles W.), S. M. Moore & Co., Moore (S. M.) & Stearns (John K.), James Muithead, J. K. Murphy, A. J. Newby, J. H. Nolan, Francis Nourse, Ogden (Mahlon D.), Sheldon (Edwin H.) & Scudder (M. L., Jr.), William Olcott, H. D. Penfield, W. F. Peterson, Charles Pfeiffer, H. S. Prescott, Prindville (Redmond) & Morris (Isaac T.), C. W. Rhodes, Robinson, Prescott & Jenkins (Charles E.), W. E. Rollo, W. H. Rose, John Rosicky, J. L. Ross, David Runnion, E. E. Ryan & Co., J. P. Sealey, Shandrew (F. E.) & Dean (J. E.), Joseph Shugart, R. J. Smith, Alonzo Snider, Porter H. Snow, J. L. Stark, J. M. Stryker, J. A. Studwell, John W. Tappan, R. J. Taylor, Teall (Edward M.) & Fisher (Frederick P.), H. S. Tiffany & Co., Treadway (George P.) & Jewell (Edward W.), William Warren, E. W. Wells, W. H. Wells, M. Whitman, Whitman (N.), Lowell (Wallace A.) & Co., H. M. Wilcox, O. A. Willard, and Abram Williams. H. B. Willmarth is likewise designated as an adjuster; Simeon W. King is an examiner of insurance business; and W. S. Elliott, George T. Farmer, R. Greer, Charles B. Holmes and Hood (Thomas) & Higgin (J. L.) are brokers.

The foreign companies represented here, according to the same Directory, were

ACCIDENT: Travelers', of Hartford. FIRE: Ætna, of New York; Alemannia, of Cleveland; American Central, of St. Louis; American Exchange, of New York; American, of Providence; Atlantic, of New York; Atlantic F. & M., of Providence; Aurora, of Aurora; Beekman, of New York; Brewers', of Milwaukee; Capital City, of Albany; Charter Oak, of Hartford; Citizens', of New York; City, of Hartford; Cleveland, of Cleveland; Commerce, of Albany; Commerce, of New York; Connecticut, of Hartford; Continental, of New York; Detroit, of Detroit; Enterprise, of Philadelphia; Excelsior, of New York; Firemen's Fund, of San Francisco; Franklin, of Philadelphia; Fulton, of New York; German, of Cleveland; Hartford, of Hartford; Hibernia, of Cleveland; Hide & Leather, of Boston; Home, of Columbus; Home, of New York; Hope, of Providence; Howard, of New York; Illinois M. & F., of Alton; Independent, of Boston; International, of New York; Irving, of New York; Lamar, of New York; Liverpool & London & Globe; Lorillard, of New York; Lycoming, of Pennsylvania; Market, of New York; Mercantile, of New York; Merchants', of Hartford; Merchants' & Mechanics', of Baltimore; National, of Boston; New Amsterdam, of New York; North American, of New York; North British & Mercantile, of London; Norwich, of Norwich; Occidental, of San Francisco; Peoples', of San Francisco; Peoples', of Worcester, Mass; Phenix, of Brooklyn; Phœnix, of Hartford; Putnam, of Hartford; Reaper City, of Rockford; Security, of New York; Springfield F. & M., of Massachusetts; Sun, of Cleveland; Teutonia, of Cleveland; Union, of San Francisco; Yonkers & New York, of New York. FIRE & MARINE: Albany City, of New York; Alps, of Erie, Penn.; Andes, of Cincinnati; Buffalo City, of Buffalo; Buffalo, of Buffalo; Commercial Mutual, of Cleveland; Hibernia, of Cleveland; Manhattan, of New York; New England Mutual, of Boston; Pacific, of San Francisco; Phenix, of Brooklyn; Roger Williams, of Providence; Security, of New York; Washington, of New York; Western, of Buffalo. LIFE: Ætna, of Hartford; Amicable Mutual, of New York; Anchor, of New Jersey; Asbury, of New York; Atlantic Mutual, of Albany; Berkshire, of Massachusetts; Brooklyn, of New York; Charter Oak, of Massachusetts; Cincinnati Mutual, of Cincinnati; Commonwealth, of Boston; Connecticut Mutual, of Connecticut; Connecticut, of Hartford; Continental, of New York; Economical Mutual, of Providence; Empire Mutual, of New York; Equitable Life Association of the United States; Excelsior, of New York; Globe Mutual, of New York; Government Security, of New York; Hahnemann, of Cleveland; Hartford Life and Annuity, of Hartford; Hercules Mutual Life Association of the United States; Home, of New York; Home Mutual, of Cincinnati; Homœopathic Mutual, of New York; Hope Mutual, of New York; International, of New Jersey; John Hancock, of Boston; Knickerbocker, of New York; Life Association of America; Manhattan, of New York; Massachusetts Mutual; Merchants', of New York; Metropolitan, of New York; Missouri Mutual, of St. Louis; Mutual Benefit, of New Jersey; Mutual, of New York; New England Mutual, of Boston; New Jersey Mutual, of Newark; New York, of New York; North America, of New York; Pacific Mutual, of Sacramento; Penn Mutual, of Philadelphia; Phenix Mutual, of Hartford; Security, of New York; St. Louis Mutual, of St. Louis; the National, of New York; Travelers', of Hartford; Union Mutual, of Boston; United States, of New York City; Universal, of New York; Washington, of New York; World Mutual, of New York. MARINE: Albany City, of New York; Independent, of Boston; New England Mutual, of Boston. STEAM BOILER: Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Insurance Company.

RUINS, INSURANCE BUILDINGS.

THE NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, OF NEW YORK, was established in 1850, and was mulcted about $200,000 in consequence of the Chicago fire. Since its establishment it has paid losses amounting to nearly ten millions, and, on January 1, 1885, had assets amounting to $1,851,597, and a net surplus of $331,448. It is at present under the management of Mr. Blackwelder, who controls its Western department, he having, in April, 1881, become connected with it, and, since that date, has largely increased its Western business. As is well known the year 1884 was one of peculiar and unprecedented hardship to fire insurance companies; nevertheless, the Niagara, under specially careful and skillful management, is able to report—that very few companies can do—an increase of net surplus, and a very slight decrease of assets from the effect of shrinkage in market values. Moreover, the company's premium receipts were larger in 1884 than in 1883, while the reserve is larger by nearly $41,000 than a year ago. And, better than all, the Niagara, after so severe a year, is able to exhibit that, after paying fifty thousand dollars in dividends to stockholders, the entire disbursements of the year were kept down to a point considerably within the income. This statement is one which is greatly to the credit of the company.

J. S. BLACKWELDER, manager of the Western Department of the Niagara, is an insurance man of over twenty years' experience, and comes of an old German family which emigrated to America prior to the War of the Revolution. There were three brothers, all of whom were active in the little army of patriots under General Gates in the South. His father, Peter Blackwelder, married Miss Nellie Scherer—both natives of North Carolina—and moved into Montgomery County, Ill., in 1833. Mr. Blackwelder is a native of Illinois, born near Litchfield, Montgomery County, March 8, 1840. He was attending the academy at Hillsboro', the county seat, at the age of twenty-one, when he was nominated for the office of county clerk, and, upon his election, left school and filled that office for four years, from December, 1861, to December, 1865. He was urged to accept a re-nomination, but preferring a mercantile life, he declined, and went into business in Hillsboro'. After some experience as local agent, in January, 1863, he began to travel as special agent for the Etina Insurance Company, of Hartford, and continued to travel for that and other companies until the 1st of April, 1881, when he took charge of the Western Department of the Niagara. One week after the great fire, Mr. Blackwelder came to Chicago in the interests of the Franklin Fire Insurance Company, of Philadelphia, and assisted in adjusting the losses sustained by that company, and has made Chicago his home since that time. On April 5, 1877, he was married to Miss Alice Gertrude Boughton, the daughter of Rev. A. Boughton, a Baptist clergyman of Moravia, Cayuga Co., N. Y. The wedding took place at Lawrence, Kan., Chancellor Marvin, of the State University, officiating. Two children have been born to them—Paul on April 7, 1878, and Eliot, on June 4, 1880. Mr. Blackwelder, although not unsocial, is yet too domestic in his tastes and habits to care for club life; and though a member of the Union League and Indiana clubs, a Mason and a Knight Templar, yet he rarely attends, and is not at present in affiliation with the Masons. He is an attendant at Professor Swing's church.

THE GERMAN AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY is represented in Chicago by Judge Eugene Cary, manager, and J. S. Belden, associate manager. The Western Department was inaugurated on October 1, 1873, since which time the following have been the yearly exhibits of the company on January 1st of each of the years specified:

YEARS.	Assets.	Net Surplus.
1874	$1,672,362 59	$ 188,247 69
1875	1,867,131 83	322,558 41
1876	2,062,968 68	517,678 09
1877	2,226,552 97	651,837 53
1878	2,325,007 77	687,561 25
1879	2,471,780 73	815,048 54
1880	2,619,368 64	875,666 16
1881	3,094,620 59	1,112,090 66
1882	3,453,748 19	1,315,240 08
1883	3,794,274 73	1,419,578 18
1884	4,068,968 31	1,685,010 26

Both the gentlemen who are at the head of its western management are of long experience in the insurance business; Judge Eugene Cary having been therein about twenty-five years in various capacities. He came to Chicago in October, 1871, in the interest of the Imperial Insurance Company of London, and was manager of the Western Department of that company until called to his present position.

JUDGE CARY was born in the town of Boston, Erie Co., N. Y., and came West in 1854, and located in Sheboygan County, Wis. Before the War, he was county judge of that county, and at the outbreak of the War entered the service, as captain, with the 1st Wisconsin Regiment of Infantry Volunteers; subsequently serving in the capacity of judge-advocate of the First Division, 11th Army Corps, Army of the Cumberland. After the War, he settled at Nashville, Tenn., in which State he served one term as member of the State Senate and one term as judge of the Circuit Court of the First Judicial Circuit in that State. In Chicago, he served one term as member of the Common Council (known as the Reform Council), in the years of 1877 and 1878. He was the Republican and Peoples' candidate for mayor of Chicago in the spring of 1883, but was defeated by Carter H. Harrison, the Democratic nominee.

J. S. BELDEN came to Chicago in 1862, and first engaged in insurance in 1865, under J. R. Payson, general agent of the Security Insurance Company, and with his present company in November, 1872, for which he was assistant manager for seven years, and was then appointed associate manager, in 1881, which position he now occupies.

As a fitting addendum, the following table of losses of the insurance companies of New York and Hartford in this city, for the years specified, is given; and from it may be gathered the fact that, anterior to the fire of 1871, this city was ripe for conflagrations, and that they arrived with increasing frequency, until recklessness in building and utter carelessness as to fire limits culminated in the disaster of 1871:

YEAR.	Fires.	Losses.	Insurance.
1863	186	$355,660	$272,500
1864	193	651,798	485,300
1865	243	1,216,466	941,692
1866	315	2,487,973	1,646,445
1867	515	4,245,332	3,427,288
1868	468	3,138,617	1,956,851
1869	499	1,241,151	841,392
1870	700	2,305,595	2,052,971
Total	3,110	$15,612,592	$11,624,439

AMOUNT OF LOSS BY FIRE OF 1871.—The amount of loss entailed by the fire has been variously estimated. C. E. Lippincott, auditor of State, estimated the Value of property in the burned district to be..... $282,000,000

Deduct estimated value of land..... $94,000,000
Property not destroyed..... 35,000,000 $122,000,000

Total amount of loss..... $153,000,000
Total amount paid by insurance companies..... 50,178,925

Loss to property owners..... $102,821,075

In another estimate, Mr. Lippincott figures as follows: The amount at risk in burned district was $100,225,780. An estimate that the property actually insured was covered by risks, on an average, to the extent of two-thirds of its value, would make the amount of the insured property $150,338,670, or worth $50,112,890 over amount for which it was covered by insurance,

Making (exclusive of real estate)..... $200,451,560
Deduct as before for property not destroyed 35,000,000

Amount of loss..... $165,451,560
Amount paid by insurance companies..... 50,178,925

Loss to property owners..... $115,272,535

Mr. Colbert estimates the loss at $192,000,000, or $140,000,000 above insurance; while C. E. Rollins computes the loss at $185,510,000, or $135,331,075 net loss to property owners. A golden mean between the approximation of the auditor and these amounts would

STATES.	Number of companies.	Total amount of risks in the burned district.	Total loss.	Approximate amount paid.
Illinois.....	22	$34,426,474 49	$31,706,632 81	$6,320,000
Connecticut.....	11	12,229,625 00	12,229,625 00	8,140,830
California.....	5	4,604,530 00	4,604,530 00	2,477,590
Great Britain.....	6	6,409,781 71	6,409,781 71	6,046,438
Massachusetts.....	23	4,845,636 11	4,814,727 25	3,299,590
Missouri.....	6	410,825 00	400,825 00	390,440
Michigan.....	1	202,150 00	202,150 00	189,377
Maryland.....	7	415,975 00	415,975 00	332,575
Minnesota.....	1	146,200 00	146,200 00	137,806
Maine.....	3	87,500 00	87,500 00	51,875
New York.....	67	25,009,528 77	24,484,194 00	16,242,070
New Jersey.....	2	25,000 00	25,000 00	25,000
Ohio.....	5	5,709,588 88	5,611,943 52	2,799,520
Pennsylvania.....	29	2,517,346 70	2,492,413 03	2,030,830
Rhode Island.....	8	2,312,822 00	2,312,822 00	1,162,538
Wisconsin.....	1	748,932 01	520,518 29	498,433
West Virginia.....	2	33,883 33	33,883 33	33,133
Total.....	204	$100,225,779 90	$96,553,720 94	$50,178,925

The first loss paid was liquidated by the Phenix Insurance Company, to Hart, Asten & Co., a fac simile of the draft being given herewith.

The number of companies placed in liquidation is shown by the following table to be sixty-eight—the Chicago companies being of the number. The American, however, only had a loss of $972.90, and went on with its business uninjured by the conflagration that wound up the affairs of the rest, some of which, however, did not go into liquidation, but paid out all their money and retired from business.

COMPANIES.		Pad-up capital.	Net surplus.	Aggregate.
STATES	No.
New York.....	26	$8,904,222	$2,908,725 97	$11,812,947 97
Illinois.....	17	4,377,606	431,111 17	4,808,717 17
Connecticut.....	7	1,800,000	503,566 48	2,303,566 48
Ohio.....	5	1,215,610	106,319 54	1,321,929 54
Rhode Island.....	5	950,000	312,496 25	1,262,496 25
Massachusetts.....	3	800,000	271,347 69	1,071,347 69
California.....	3	1,500,000	430,807 05	1,930,807 05
Pennsylvania.....	1	200,000	22,505 38	222,505 38
Maryland.....	1	250,000	32,788 82	282,788 82
Total.....	68	$19,847,435	$5,019 671 32	$24,867,106 32

And pertinent to this table is the remark made by the Insurance Times:

"Azrael* came to some of our insurance companies, and carried away the ignominy, as well as the fruits, of low rates and bad management. To a few the Chicago fire was a god-send. It enabled them to fold the drapery of death around them and die with honor. Low rates, bad practices, and imbecility had been doing their slow but sure work, and failure sooner or later was inevitable."

The following companies, still in business, report, as below, the amount of their losses paid to the insurers on account of the Chicago Fire:

ILLINOIS.
American.....		$ 972 90
CALIFORNIA.
Firemen's Fund.....		529,364 92
Union.....		558,423 35
CONNECTICUT.
Etna.....		3,773,423 09
Connecticut.....		490,875 00
Hartford.....		1,812,000 00
Phoenix.....		936,579 23
MAINE.
Union.....		5,000 00

* Azrael is the angel of death in the Persian Theology.

STEPHEN CLOWELL
President.
PHILANDER SLIWAY
Secretary.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY
No. 173 BROADWAY, CHICAGO, ILL.

Chicago, Oct. 12, 1891.
Dear Sir,
I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your check for $100,000.00, being in full of all claims and demands against this Company for loss and damage by fire on the property of the Chicago Fire Insurance Company, No. 271st St. Chicago, Ill. 1891, respectfully.

To the Phenix Insurance Co.
No. 173 Broadway, New York.

J. P. Currier

about convey a fair idea of the amount destroyed and the loss suffered by the owners.

The precise amount of risks written at the time of the fire, in the burned district, was $100,225,779.90, distributed among companies as follows:

MARYLAND.
Maryland Ins. and Sec. ....	18,000 00
National .....	35,000 00
Peabody .....	10,000 00
Peoples' .....	17,000 00
Potomac .....	10,000 00
MASSACHUSETTS.
Boylston .....	13,000 00
Eliot .....	12,500 00
Franklin .....	59,250 00
Firemen's .....	35,000 00
First National .....	2,500 00
Manufacturers' .....	115,949 39
Neptune .....	60,000 00
North American .....	10,000 00
Springfield .....	526,360 31
Shoe and Leather .....	24,708 34
Washington .....	25,000 00
MISSOURI.
American Central .....	277,406 17
Citizens' .....	25,000 00
MICHIGAN.
Detroit .....	189,377 35
MINNESOTA.
St. Paul .....	137,806 34
NEW JERSEY.
Firemen's .....	10,000 00
Merchants' .....	15,000 00
NEW YORK.
American Exchange .....	58,000 00
American .....	36,765 40
Buffalo German .....	5,000 00
Citizens' .....	62,100 00
Commercial .....	4,145 19
Commerce, of Albany .....	395,983 00
Continental .....	1,550,187 80
Exchange .....	2,437 50
Firemen's .....	74,952 00
Firemen's Trust .....	4,953 33
Germania .....	276,861 19
Glen's Falls .....	7,826 69
Greenwich .....	9,086 86
Guardian .....	58,077 42
Hanover .....	276,861 19
Home .....	3,071,390 01
Howard .....	473,160 00
Importers' and Traders' .....	22,500 00

Jefferson .....	36,830 36
Kings' County .....	42,500 00
LaFayette .....	7,354 17
Lorillard .....	1,400,000 00
Mercantile .....	107,925 66
Mechanics' and Traders' .....	35,895 21
Mechanics' .....	24,154 09
Merchants' .....	9,600 00
National .....	40,988 62
New York .....	14,632 94
Niagara .....	276,861 19
Pacific .....	12,100 00
Phenix .....	425,925 59
Sterling .....	7,457 23
Tradesmen's .....	30,160 06
Williamsburg City .....	61,710 00

OHIO.
Aurora .....	6,975 00
Cincinnati .....	48,170 64
Commercial .....	13,000 00
Farmers' .....	5,000 00
Firemen's .....	3,500 00
Germania .....	3,500 00
Globe .....	38,365 89
Merchants' and Manufacturers' .....	14,500 00
Miami Valley .....	20,000 00
National .....	3,600 00
Union .....	25,000 00
Washington .....	21,000 00
Western .....	35,474 76

PENNSYLVANIA.
Franklin .....	636,905 22
Girard .....	12,136 40
North America .....	623,545 31
State of Pennsylvania .....	24 437 40

RHODE ISLAND.
Atlantic .....	226,319 00
Merchants' .....	5,000 00
Providence-Washington .....	496,179 00

WISCONSIN.
Northwestern National .....	250,766 88

GREAT BRITAIN.
Commercial Union .....	65,000 00
Imperial .....	217,589 91
Liverpool and London and Globe .....	3,299,779 63
North British and Mercantile .....	2,328,380 42
Royal .....	96,893 27

MASONIC HISTORY.

The period treated of in this volume, 1858-71, was one of increasing prosperity and augmentation of numbers. In 1863, an edict was issued from the Grand Lodge, at Freeport, Ill., directing that all mnemonics, cyphers, notes, keys, characters, and excerpts should be destroyed, and that if this edict were not instantly obeyed, those transgressing the law should be subjected to Masonic discipline by the preferring of charges and proceedings subsequent thereto. In order to perpetuate the unwritten work, twenty-two grand lecturers were appointed, whose duty it was to visit the lodges and illuminate those who were not thoroughly conversant with the work; among them were J. Herman Bird, of Lafayette Lodge, No. 18, and Frank G. Green, of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, of Chicago. In 1863, also, an attempt was made to constitute a quasi-Board of Conservators of the Grand Lodge by legislative enactment, such board to be composed of certain past grand masters; but the attempted arrogation of authority was vigorously resisted by the subordinate lodges of the State. The Grand Lodge also refused to any one adhering to said "Conservators' Association" any Masonic recognition, and generally excommunicated its inceptors or supporters. In consequence, that Association demised after a brief existence.

A. F. & A. M.

LAFAYETTE LODGE, No. 18.—The Masters of this lodge were W. H. Dobson, 1857; W. W. Jackson, 1858-59; A. W. Hitchcock, 1861; Edward Robbins, 1862; A. W. Hitchcock, 1863; Charles Cohen, 1864. In 1864 the lodge surrendered its charter, and its members were re-invested with charters as Chicago Lodge, No. 437, and H. W. Bigelow Lodge, No. 438.

JAMES AUGUSTUS MARSHALL was born in London, England, on June 9, 1809. His father was an officer of the British army, who came to Perth, Canada, to take command of troops there, while James was an infant. James graduated at the University of Maryland; was married, in 1836, to Miss Andalusia Shattuck, who died shortly after her marriage. In 1838, Mr. Marshall married Rosanna M. Shattuck. They have the following children—James Frederick, Emma Catharine, Osborne Hanford and Cornelia Rosanna. Mr. Marshall was initiated as an entered apprentice in Lafayette Lodge, No. 18, A. F. & A. M., and then took the subsequent degrees in LaFayette Chapter, in Council No. 4, and Apollo Encampment, No. 1, also taking the 32°. He left LaFayette Lodge with Apollo Lodge, and upon the surrender of its charter by the latter body, re-united with LaFayette, in preference to joining the newer and more popular lodge.

ORIENTAL LODGE, No. 33.—The officers of Oriental Lodge occupying the East since its organization, have been W. F. Walker, 1845; J. V. Z. Blaney, 1846-47; George Davis, 1848-49; J. Herman Bird, 1850; Carlton Drake, 1851; Thomas Shirley, 1852-53; William B. Herrick, 1854; Enoch B. Stevens, 1855; George W. Deering, 1856; William C. Hunt, 1857-58; James E. Dalliba, 1859; George F. Haines, 1860-61; Benjamin F. Patrick, 1862; K. W. Dunham, 1863-64; Joseph A. Bunce, 1865; William A. Thrall, 1866; John W. Clyde, 1867; William G. Swan, 1868; Edwin Powell, 1869-71. After the erection of Oriental Hall, at No. 122 LaSalle Street, the vested interests of the brethren required administration, and to meet this necessity A. G. Burley, Mark Kimball and Samuel Brown were appointed as trustees, and held such office from 1867 until 1872, the lodge having been incorporated by act of the Legislature, February 28, 1867, and thereby become empowered to hold real estate, etc.

The dedication of Oriental Hall occurred July 25, 1867, and is thus described in the Chicago Tribune of the ensuing day:

"The Oriental Building, on LaSalle Street, opposite the Chamber of Commerce, is in itself one of the finest specimens of street architecture to be found in the city, and, for a business building, is the most complete and substantial of any yet finished. The offices are all large and well lighted, and the stairways and halls spacious, light and airy. The building is complete, with all modern conveniences.

"In this splendid building is located the hall, or lodge room, of the Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M., which has just been finished in the Oriental style of architecture, and a degree of success has been attained, in the peculiar fitness and harmony of its combinations, seldom realized before."

The cost of the hall was about $35,000, and the loss entailed by its destruction, in the fire of 1871, was about $30,000.

GARDEN CITY LODGE, NO. 141.—This lodge has had some of the celebrities in the fraternity among its members, the earliest one being Carding Jackson. And in the present roster of members appears Carter H. Harrison, as a perfect ashlar. The Masters of the lodge, from 1857, have been Francis Hudson, 1857; Peter C. Lusk, 1858; Eben C. Hurd, 1859-60; H. M. Wilcox, 1861; W. B. Bateham, 1862; John W. Norris, 1863; W. B. Bateham, 1864-65; Edward Addy, 1866; Gil. W. Barnard,* 1867-68; H. F. Holcomb, 1869-70; George R. McClellan, 1871. This lodge, suffered from the fire to the amount of about $5,000, meeting, until that time, in Oriental Hall.

GILBERT WORDSWORTH BARNARD was born on June 1, 1834, in Palmyra, Wayne Co., N. Y., the son of George Washington Barnard and Sabrina (Deming) Barnard. He came to Michigan when an infant, with his mother, where he lived until he was fifteen years old, when he came to Chicago. He then worked for John C. Williams, in his general store, and subsequently was in the book and stationery business, and was then in the general commercial business, until recently. He was an active member of the Volunteer Fire Department, from 1849 to 1858. He was made a Master Mason, on December 7, 1864, by Garden City Lodge, No. 141; took the Royal Arch Degree, on October 2, 1866, in Corinthian Chapter, No. 69; took the Council degrees, in Siloam Council, No. 53, on March 25, 1871; and the Knight Templar degree, on May 13, 1870 in St. Bernard Commandery, No. 35. He took the 32<sup>d</sup> on April 25, 1868, and the 33<sup>d</sup> on November 13, 1873. He was a member of the first Board of Grand Examiners of the Grand Lodge, for five years, and has been secretary or recorder of nearly all the side issues that were termed Masonic, and has received over three hundred degrees that were known as Masonic. He was the Master of Garden City Lodge, the High Priest of Corinthian Chapter, the Eminent Commander of St. Bernard Commandery, and Commander-in-Chief of Oriental Consistory. He was also D. D. G. M. of the Grand Lodge for the First District, and is Grand Secretary of the Grand Chapter, Grand Recorder of the Grand Council and Grand Commandery, and Grand Secretary of the Council of Deliberation, S. P. R. S., of Illinois. It is a work of supererogation to pen any words of eulogy upon the courtesy, kindness and industry of this exemplary Mason. He still lives among us, and each new acquaintance he makes is another friend added to the long list of those who delight to honor him.

WAUBANSIA LODGE, NO. 160.—In 1853, the meetings of this body were held at Oriental Hall, on LaSalle Street, and about the same time the charter was surrendered. On October 3, 1860, a new charter was granted to J. E. Church, Myron C. Parsons, Samuel E. Underhill, "and several other brethren, for a lodge, to be termed Waubansia Lodge, No. 160." "After the re-organization," says the hand-book of this lodge, "the meetings were held for a time in Blinney Hall, corner Randolph and LaSalle streets; then, for a while, in the hall occupied by Blair Lodge, and then, again, in Oriental Hall until 1871." In the fire it lost all its paraphernalia, valued at about $1,000, and also $4,000 in bonds which had not been registered. It had no insurance. Under this blow the lodge staggered, and, with many of its members, was almost bankrupt. But it was then demonstrated that Chicago contained many pucky men, and, fortunately, some of them were members of Waubansia Lodge, and to this circumstance may be attributed its existence to-day. While gifts and donations from all over the world were pouring in, to relieve the sufferers from the fire, Masons in different parts of the country were not unmindful of their duty and privilege toward unfortunate brethren and lodges. Waubansia Lodge, at a most timely moment, was the recipient of an appropriate gift of a new set of solid silver official jewels, from Mount Vernon Lodge, No. 3, Albany, N. Y. After the fire, the meetings of the lodge were held in Pleiades Hall, on Twelfth Street. The Masters of the lodge have been: J. E. Church, 1860-63; Gardner S. Barstow, 1864-65; R. Stone, 1866; G. S. Barstow, 1867; George McLewain, 1868-70; J. E. Church, 1871.

* To the courtesy and kindness of this eminent Mason, the collaborator is indebted, not alone for these data, but also for other information relative to Masonry.

GERMANIA LODGE, NO. 182.—The Masters of this lodge were Francis Schoeneveld, 1858; Samuel Mohr, 1859; Lucas Buhler, 1862; Bernard Reiser, 1863; H. M. Peters, 1864; J. Ulrich, 1865; M. Schmitz, 1866; J. Ulrich, 1867; H. M. Peters, 1868-69. This lodge was burned out in 1871, and three months after the fire built the Germania Hall, at the corner of Clark and Michigan streets, at a cost of $6,000.

WILLIAM B. WARREN LODGE, NO. 209.—The Masters of this lodge, from the date of its organization until the year 1854, have been: William T. Raefsnieder, Charles Tunnickiff, Ira S. Younglove, Andrew B. Mason, George W. Pettee, Samuel C. Smith, David H. Kilmore, Charles H. Shattuck, Edward Bornemann, Albert Jack, George M. Aykroyd, Eugene F. Deluce and Cass F. Maurer. The communications of this lodge at the time of the fire were held in Oriental Hall, and there its regalia, etc., were destroyed. After the fire the lodge met at the Masonic Temple, corner of Halsted and Randolph streets.

CLEVELAND LODGE, NO. 211.—On June 3, 1858, this lodge moved to its new hall in Blatchford's Building, on the southwest corner of Clinton and Fulton streets. This building was destroyed by a fire on the evening of September 15, 1859, the lodge being at the time of the fire in stated communication. Wiley M. Egan was Master at the time, and by his promptitude the most valuable of the lodge furniture was saved. During its salvage, brothers George H. Gibson, Thomas Chron and Ira Goddard remained until the stairway was burned, and narrowly escaped by a cord from the fifth-story window. The lodge then found a resting place in the hall of Accordia Lodge, No. 277, on the corner of Randolph and Clinton streets, and there remained until the new hall at Nos. 80-82 West Randolph Street was fitted up. In the summer of 1870, the lodge leased the lodge room in the new Masonic Temple on the West Side. There Cleveland Lodge remained; and when the "sound of mourning was heard in the land," in October, 1871, she threw open the doors between the two columns, and welcomed Masons of every degree to her hospitable halls, and there an asylum was afforded for whole or partial working of twelve Blue Lodges, two Chapters, two Councils, two Commanderies and Oriental Sovereign Consistory; while upon the upper floor were dispensed the money and supplies of the Masonic Board of Relief, among whose members were Wiley M. Egan, Theodore F. Gurney, George K. Hazlitt and Edward J. Hill. The Masters of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, have been as follows: Reuben Cleveland, 1856-58; Wiley M. Egan, 1859-60; Nathan

W. M. Egan

W. Huntley, 1861-63; George H. Gibson, 1864; Asa E. Cutler, 1865-66; Theodore F. Gurney, 1867; Reuben Cleveland, 1868; Arthur R. H. Atkins, 1869; John McLaren, 1870-71.

BLANEY LODGE, NO. 271.—This body received its name in honor of James Van Zandt Blaney, and was authorized to convene by virtue of a dispensation from the Grand Lodge of Illinois, dated March 22, 1858. On October 6, 1855, the charter was issued, with the No. 271, and the following as charter members: George Cowper, Joshua Howell Gest, Matthew Taylor, Gilbert Richard Smith, William Train Muir, Hiram Calvin Wells Cowdry, Hiram Henry Scoville, Jr., Russell Smith, William Alexander Hendrie, Charles Biggs, Edwin Bean, Daniel Cameron, Jr., Joseph Arend Gray, John Larglands and George Lincoln Dunlap. On October 13, 1858, the lodge was duly constituted and the officers installed. The first officers were George Cowper, W. M.; J. H. Gest, S. W.; M. Taylor, J. W.; W. T. Muir, treasurer; G. K. Smith, secretary; H. C. W. Cowdery, S. D.; H. H. Scoville, Jr., J. D.; Russell Smith, S. S.; W. A. Hendrie, J. S.; and Thomas J. Sherwood, tyler.* The Masters, since the organization of the lodge, have been—George Cowper, 1858; Joshua Howell Gest, 1859; Gilbert Richard Smith, 1860-63; DeWitt Clinton Cregier, 1864-67; George Benjamin Carpenter, 1868; Edward Cook, 1869-70; G. B. Carpenter, 1871. The communications of the lodge were first held in Temperance Hall, on the corner of West Randolph and Clinton streets, until June 3, 1858, when the lodge was removed to the hall of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, in the fifth story of the brick building at the southwest corner of Clinton and Fulton streets. On September 15, 1859, this building was burned, and Blaney Lodge lost everything but a silver trowel and its funds. It then determined on having a hall of its own, in the meantime occupying a hall on the northeast corner of Kinzie and North Wells streets. On February 10, 1860, Blaney Hall was dedicated, situated in the third story of the Metropolitan Block. On June 7, 1866, the lodge was again destroyed by fire, with the north end of Metropolitan Block, and again lost all its large property. The jewels and the silver trowel were afterward recovered from the ruins. The lodge then met in Masonic Temple, on Dearborn Street. On June 11, 1867, Blaney Hall, Nos. 53 and 55 Dearborn Street, was publicly dedicated by Grand Master J. V. Z. Blaney, and the first meeting of the lodge was held therein on June 12, 1867. The Chicago Times, of June 12, 1867, said: "To obtain a just and accurate idea of the beauty of this paragon of halls, it must be seen. No mere written description can convey a just impression of its marvelous perfection of detail, or its beauty as a whole. Let it be known that the mere interior of this Temple of Masonry has cost about twenty thousand dollars." The last stated communication was held September 27, 1871, in Blaney Hall; on October 9, 1871, esteemed the wealthiest in Chicago before the fire; $13,012.50 was subsequently recovered from insurance.

ACCORDIA LODGE, No. 277.—This lodge received its dispensation in 1858, and was chartered on October 6, 1858. Its first officers were Gustav H. Baumer, W. M.; Charles Kauffeld, S. W.; F. Holbeck, J. W.; J. William Eschenburg, secretary; A. Ort-mayer, treasurer; E. Jaeger, S. D.; Charles Weisswange, J. D., and A. B. C. Hanemann, tyler. The Masters, so far as could be found from the Directories, were J. W. Eschenburg, 1862-65; F. Guedtner, 1866-67; H. Vogler, 1869. This lodge was burned out in the fire, at the southwest corner of Lake and Clark streets. These particulars are brief, for the reason that no responses were received from the numerous applications to the secretary.

ASHLAR LODGE, No. 308.—On March 24, 1859, a meeting of Masons was held at the Richmond House, Chicago, where a petition for a dispensation was preferred to M. W. Grand Master Ira A. W. Buck, and by him granted. The first meeting held by the lodge was at Accordia Lodge room, at the corner of Randolph and Clinton streets, on April 7, 1859. Thereat Allyn Weston was worshipful master; M. D. Hennessy, senior warden; John G. Shortall, junior warden; Samuel Hawk, as treasurer; Josiah S. Colgate, as secretary; Charles A. Gregory, as senior deacon; Alfred H. Pitkin, as junior deacon; I. P. Hatfield, as tyler. Two members were present—James L. Gates and Belden F. Culver, who were appointed stewards, and two visitors honored the occasion, W. A. Burdock and Andrew Ortmayer. Petitions for the degrees were received from D. B. Fisk and J. U. Borden. The meetings of the lodge were held in Accordia lodge-room for some little time and then in the room of Blaney Lodge; after that in Blair Hall, and then once more in Blaney Hall, on February 1, 1870, where the fire destroyed all their paraphernalia and regalia. Immediately after the fire, the lodge met at Owsley's Hall, at the corner of Robey and West Madison streets, and from there removed to the parlor of the West Side Masonic Temple. The first initiate of the lodge was D. B. Fisk, on July 7, 1859; the first fellowcraft was James U. Borden, passed on August 16, 1859, and the first master mason was also Brother Borden, who was made on September 11, 1859. The charter was granted on October 5, 1869, with the following charter members: Allyn Weston, Michael A. Gregory, E. M. Dewey, Alfred H. Pitkin, Samuel Hawk, James L. Gates and Josiah S. Colgate. On November 11, 1862, the lodge was constituted and the officers installed by the Grand Lodge, M. W. G. M. F. M. Blair, presiding; assisted by D. G. M. H. A. Johnson, G. S. W. H. N. Hurlbut; G. J. W. G. K. Smith; and the other members of the grand body. The following officers were installed: George W. Deering, W. M.; Samuel S. Greeley, proxy for M. D. Hennessy, S. W.; John G. Shortall, J. W.; James U. Borden, proxy for Philip Wadsworth, treasurer; E. W. Jones, proxy for secretary; Charles A. Gregory, S. D.; W. N. Dunham, J. D.; and I. P. Hatfield, tyler. The Masters of this lodge have been Allyn Weston, 1859-61 (appointed); G. W. Deering, 1862 (appointed that year and elected December 13, 1862); G. W. Deering, 1863; Nicholas Francis Cooke, 1864-65; W. B. Young, 1866-68; William Borner, 1869-70; U. W. Weston, 1871.

DEARBORN LODGE, No. 310.—This lodge was granted its dispensation on December 24, 1853, and organized thereunder on June 5, 1859. It first met in the old Orphan Asylum building, on the corner of Twenty-second Street (Ringgold Place) and Michigan Avenue. On October 2, 1859, it received its charter—the charter members being Eliphaz W. Jones, Horatio Nelson Hurlbut, Joel Gurley, Nathaniel Gould,* William Colby, Henry R. Caberey, William B. Bateham, Lucius Bolles Boomer, C. P. Albee, John W. Goodwin, John Chimes and William H. Reid. The first officers were Eliphaz W. Jones, W. M.; Horatio N. Hurlbut, S. W.; and Joel Gurley, J. W.; William Colby, treasurer; H. R. Caberey, secretary; W. B. Bateham, S. D.; N. Gould, J. D., and C. P. Albee, L. B. Boomer and J. W. Goodwin, members. The lodge continued to meet at the Orphan Asylum building for some time, and then moved into the old McVicker Theater building, and after that into Blaney Hall, where it was burned out on October 9, 1871. The loss to the lodge by the fire was about $3,000, and immediately thereafter the lodge re-organized at the lodge-room on the corner of Robey and West Madison streets. The Masters of this lodge have been Eliphaz W. Jones, 1859-60; Horatio N. Hurlbut, 1861-62; E. W. Jones, 1863; W. H. Reid, 1864-65; E. M. Nor-

* This is the only charter member who is still a member of the lodge.

BLANEY HALL.

it was destroyed. The silver trowel was recovered in a distorted shape, and two jewels were found uninjured, except from discoloration. The loss is impossible to state, the lodge being ton, 1866; W. H. Keid, 1867; G. N. Houghton, 1868; John Sutton, 1869; L. D. Berry, 1870; John Sutton, 1871.

* For the particulars presented above, the compiler is indebted to the courtesy of G. A. M. Liljencrantz; they are collated from the printed history of the lodge, which is the most thorough and complete of any in the city.

KILWINNING LODGE, No. 311.—This lodge was organized on March 2, 1859, under dispensation dated February 11, 1859, and was chartered on October 5, 1859, the following being the charter members: William T. Muir, Frank G. Green, Henry Burwell, Charles Harding, J. C. Burchett, A. M. Wood, Charles P. Wentworth, P. M. Almini, C. S. Bixby, Charles Cohen, Frederick F. Engstrom and John S. Gould. The first officers were William T. Muir, W. M.; Frank G. Green, S. W.; Henry Burwell, J. W.; Charles Harding, treasurer; Charles J. Stolbrand, secretary; A. W. Wood, S. D.; John C. Burchett, J. D.; William H. Dobson, T. T. Gurney, John Voice, C. P. Wentworth, John S. Gould, Dugald Stewart, C. B. Marsh, B. Merrill, C. S. Engle, L. K. Osborne, Horatio G. Sinclair, William H. Rand and William Ferrill, members. The lodge met at first at the hall of Accordia Lodge, corner of West Randolph and Clinton streets, and then at the corner of Kinzie and LaSalle streets. The lodge was burned out on North Dearborn Street, between Water and Kinzie, where it had fitted up an elegant hall—the only thing that was saved being the key. The Masters, for the periods given, were William T. Muir, 1859-60; F. G. Green, 1862-64; G. W. Wood, 1865; F. M. Green, 1866; Eli Wood, 1867; R. G. Lucas, 1868; A. M. Thompson, 1869.

BLAIR LODGE, No. 393.—This lodge was constituted by dispensation on September 16, 1863, and received its charter on October 8, 1863; it being named Blair in honor of F. M. Blair, who, in that year, was grand master of the State of Illinois, and one of the charter members of the lodge. The following list comprises such charter members: W. W. Winter, S. J. Hayes, W. A. Stevens, W. H. Purdy, S. Diven, T. J. Elson, J. B. Austin, P. Devine, G. C. Marshall, F. M. Blair and W. T. Morrow. The first officers were W. W. Winter, W. M.; S. J. Hayes, S. W.; W. A. Stevens, J. W.; W. H. Purdy, treasurer; Wallace Barry, secretary; T. J. Elson, S. D.; George C. Marshall, J. D.; and P. Devine, tyler. The Masters have been as follows: W. W. Winter, 1863-64; S. J. Hayes, 1865; W. A. Stevens, 1866-67; S. Quinlan, 1868-69; S. F. White, 1870; J. O'Neill, 1871. Blair Lodge room in McVicker's Theater building was destroyed at the time of the fire, and the lodge lost everything; at that time the treasury was accounted the wealthiest in Chicago, with one exception.

THOMAS J. TURNER LODGE, No. 409.—This lodge was organized January 28, 1864, chartered October 5, 1864, and burned out in 1871, in Blaney Hall. Its first officers were—J. W. Norris, W. M.; D. A. Cashman, S. W.; Thomas Hingley, J. W.; H. Olcott, treasurer; F. W. Cole, secretary; G. C. Smith, S. D.; F. W. Fraunberg, J. D.; H. B. Pinkham, S. S.; F. P. Mulvey, J. S.; and Isaac P. Hatfield, tyler. The Masters since organization have been—J. W. Norris, 1864-65; D. A. Cashman, 1866-69; G. C. Smith, 1870-71; C. E. Leonard, 1871.

SMITHA LODGE, No. 410.—This lodge was chartered on October 5, 1864, and works in the German language. It lost its hall, at 115 Wells Street, in the fire of 1871.

HESPERIA LODGE, No. 411.—This lodge, on October 5, 1864, was chartered with the following charter members: Nathan W. Huntley, Ammi Merchant Bennett, Henry Sweet, William Stewart, George G. Sinclair, William Cravens, William Hiram, Jr., J. H. Bruce, W. Padelford, Jr., John H. Richardson, William P. White, George Miller, H. G. Carey, George H. Gale, J. Jennersheets, Joseph P. Wills, A. M. Whitney, Joseph K. Tyler, John F. Colby, Robert A. Mills, Insley D. Johnson, Isaac N. Mabeth, John M. Adams and Robert A. Addison. The first officers were Nathan W. Huntley, W. M.; A. N. Bennett, S. W., and Henry Sweet, J. W. It met at the West Side Masonic Temple at the time of the fire and opened its hall to the burned-out lodges, and did its utmost to assist brethren who were less fortunate than its members.

LANDMARK LODGE, No. 422.—In 1863, a dispensation was granted to a lodge that met in Hyde Park, of which the officers were Nicholas Francis Cooke, W. M.; Homer Nash Hibbard, S. W.; William K. Ackerman, J. W.; Edwin Oscar Newberry, treasurer; John Trimble, Jr., secretary; W. C. Lewis, S. D.; George Washington Waite, J. D.; Fergus M. Blair, tyler. This lodge was chartered as Hyde Park Lodge, No. 422, on October 5, 1864, with the following charter members: H. N. Hibbard, James Wadsworth, Daniel Tyler Waite, Samuel Hopkins Drake, E. O. Newberry, John Middleton, G. W. Waite, Carlton Drake, Charles Sunter, Jonathan Asa Kennicott and Thomas Leeds Morgan. On July 19, 1870, the lodge removed from Hyde Park to Chicago. On December 20, 1870, the new lodge hall was dedicated, at No. 727 Cottage Grove Avenue. On October 4, 1871, by the consent and procedure of the grand lodge, the name was changed from Hyde Park Lodge, No. 422, to Landmark Lodge, No. 422, although, strange to say, the name was not changed upon the charter until 1884. The Masters of this lodge have been: Nicholas Francis Cooke, 1865; Homer Nash Hibbard, 1864-65; George Washington Waite, 1866; John Middleton, 1867-68; Pennoyer Levi Sherman, 1869; Horace Aemon Harvey, 1870; Thomas Cordis Clarke, 1871.

CHICAGO LODGE, No. 437.—This body received its dispensation on October 16, 1864, and its charter on October 4, 1865, the following being the charter members: Charles Cohen, Moses Shields, Theo. Marcus, S. Alshuler, A. Barnett, Emanuel Brunswick, James Byron, Henry Cole, M. Daniels, Benjamin Engel, Jacob Frost, S. M. Fleishman, M. M. Gerstley, Michael Greenbaum, Henry Greenbaum, Tobias Goldschmidt, Solomon Harris, Ignatz Herzog, J. H. Henoch, Abraham Hart, Anton Herzog, Lazarus Higer, Louis Holberg, M. Israel, Abraham Kohn, Morris Kohn, Charles Kozminski, Nathan Kramer, Henry Leopold Isaac Liebenstein, Abraham Louis, N. Levy, A. Liberman, Jonas Moore, M. Morris, Leon Mandel, James McWilliams, A. Marcus, Isaac Marks, Nelson Morris, George H. Mueller, John Pfund and M. Pfaum. This lodge is essentially German, and has a flourishing and influential membership. Its past masters have been: Charles Cohen, Louis Vampold, Joseph Spiegel, Henry A. Kaufman, Adolph Shire, Moses Joseph, Nathan Hefter and Edward Kubowitz. This lodge was burned out by the fire, its lodge room being in Oriental Hall.

H. W. BIGELOW LODGE, No. 438.—This lodge received its dispensation dated October 5, 1864, and its charter dated October 4, 1865, being, with the Chicago Lodge, an outgrowth of Lakayette Lodge, No. 18. Its first officers were: A. W. Hitchcock, W. M.; E. Robbins, S. W.; E. J. Ives, J. W.; J. Whitl, S. D.; E. L. Wood, J. D.; Ed. Goodale, secretary; W. H. Dobson, treasurer; John S. Russell, tyler. Its Masters were: A. W. Hitchcock, 1865-66; William Lapham, 1867; W. H. Dobson, 1868; William Lapham, 1869; George Tapper, 1870-71. The lodge had one hundred and eleven members in 1871, and was burned out in Oriental Hall.

PLIEADES LODGE, No. 478.—This lodge was organized on January 1, 1866, and chartered on October 3, 1866.

HOME LODGE, No. 508.—This lodge was organized April 6, 1866, and chartered on October 26, 1866. Its place of meeting being on Twenty-second Street, it was not destroyed by the great fire.

COVENANT LODGE, No. 526.—On October 5, 1866, a meeting was held at the office of Charles H. Falch, whereto were present Thomas E. Miller, Joseph T. Moulton, J. S. McIntyre, Isaac S. Roseberry, E. R. Warner, Henry Turner, Charles H. Falch, John A. Crawford, J. F. Haley, N. J. Livingston, William Erby, Edward Callow, Charles E. Hyde, Edward N. Edwards and W. D. Smith. These Masons resolved to petition for the institution of a lodge to be called Unity Lodge, and the three principal officers elected for the inchoate lodge were—Edward N. Edwards, master; Charles E. Hyde, senior warden, and J. F. Haley, junior warden. A dispensation was granted on October 26, and on November 2, 1866, the first regular meeting of the new lodge was held in their hall, No. 55 North Clark Street. The name of Unity having been chosen by Unity Lodge, No. 48, the Grand Master desired that another name be chosen, and Covenant was adopted by vote of the members. On October 1, 1867, the lodge was chartered as Covenant Lodge, No. 526, with the following charter members: Martin Blackburn, Justin Bowman, J. S. Barnes, Peter Cochran, Edward Callow, John A. Crawford, Edward N. Edwards, William Erby, Charles H. Falch, J. H. Green, Charles E. Hyde, J. F. Haley, George W. Hale, Thomas K. Holden, D. H. Lincoln, Thomas E. Miller, William M. Miller, Joseph T. Moulton, Charles C. Phillips, E. M. Portch, William Pingree, Isaac S. Roseberry, W. D. Smith, Henry Turner, Andrew M. Wood, G. G. Wade and E. R. Warner. On October 15, 1867, the lodge was duly constituted, and its officers installed by Wiley M. Egan, acting grand master; the officers being Edward N. Edwards, W. M.; C. E. Hyde, S. W.; William Pingree, J. W.; T. E. Miller, treasurer; S. G. Pitkin, secretary; A. Hilsen, S. D.; W. E. Best, J. D.; J. Myers, S. S.; J. W. Lawrence, J. S., and J. A. Crawford, tyler. The lodge continued to meet at No. 55 North Clark Street, with a flourishing membership, and amid the most pleasant experiences, until September 1, 1871, when it moved to more commodious quarters, near the corner of Dearborn and Kinzie streets—the hall of Kilwinning Lodge, No. 311. It continued to meet there until the fire of 1871, which destroyed all its jewels, paraphernalia, etc., and entailed a loss upon the lodge of about $4,000. But one book of records escaped the general destruction. After the fire it met at the hall of the Union Park Lodge, No. 610, at No. 679 West Lake Street. The Masters of this lodge have been: E. N. Edwards, 1866-68; C. E. Hyde, 1869; William Pingree, 1870; S. G. Pitkin, 1871.

LESSING LODGE, No. 557.—This lodge was organized June 4, 1867, and chartered October 1, 1867. It was burned out on October 9, 1871, at Lessing Hall, No. 12 North Clinton Street.

NATIONAL LODGE, No. 506.—This lodge was organized February 19, 1868, chartered on October 6, 1868, and burned out on October 9, 1871.

UNION PARK LODGE, No. 610. was organized December 19, 1868, and chartered October 5, 1869.

LINCOLN PARK LODGE, No. 611.—In December, 1868, a notice was published in the daily papers, asking all those interested in the formation of a new lodge in the vicinity of Lincoln Park, to meet at the drug store on the corner of Centre and Sedgwick streets. At that meeting, H. E. Hamilton was elected master, L. A. Beebe, senior warden, and J. A. Smith, junior warden of the embryonic lodge. On January 18, 1869, a dispensation was granted to Lincoln Park Lodge, and shortly afterward the new lodge was assembled and opened in the building at the corner of Lincoln Avenue and Centre Street, with eighteen members. The hall was fitted up at an expense of $2,000. On October 5, 1869, a charter was granted, with the number 611, to the following brethren: H. E. Hamilton, L. A. Beebe, J. A. Smith, T. Cromlish, A. McNally, J. F. Williams, J. H. Clybourn, D. Long, G. Macaulay, G. McBean, C. McBean, C. C. Meserve, L. D. Owen, J. C. Rhodes, W. R. Walpole, L. Schaffner, Shubael D. Childs, S. D. Childs, Jr., J. Costello, F. J. Burdett, S. Daniels, P. G. Gardner, J. G. Holt, T. Stone, F. Wells, E. Cheetham, H. J. Howland, G. W. Fuller, J. E. Gamble, J. C. Salisbury, C. A. Schmidt, J. H. Friedrich, J. H. Kroger, C. Laus, Jr., J. S. Watson, O. W. Crocker, J. Brooks, M. Buschwah, A. J. Dox, D. R. Hale, A. Patch, S. L. Moore, W. Whitney, E. F. C. Klokke and I. W. Blood. On the evening of Friday, October 14, 1869, the new lodge was duly constituted, its hall dedicated, and its officers installed by R. W. DeWitt C. Cregier, as proxy for the M. W. Grand Master. The fire of October 9, 1871, destroyed all the property of the lodge. Its lodge room was at the corner of Centre and Lincoln streets. The first stage communication after the fire was held at the store of L. A. Beebe, No. 418 Centre Street, on the evening of November 3, 1871. The Masters of this lodge, until that time, were H. E. Hamilton, 1869-70; L. A. Beebe, 1871.

KEYSTONE LODGE, No. 639.—This lodge was organized under dispensation dated April 22, 1869, and received its charter on October 6, 1869, the following being the charter members: Eli Wood, Moses Shields, Lucas Buerhle, H. M. Peters, Louis Roman, Louis Marcus, Samuel Engel, John Shank, Samuel Ellis, Isidor Rosenthal, Henry A. Kaufman, Samuel Glickauf, A. Barnett, K. D. Kaufman, Leo Canman, Herman Hirschberg, Joseph Lederer, Simon Munchrodt, Samuel Mayer, O. C. Ludwig, Wells Sherman, George Kuhnen, William Sanderson, Niles Noburg, W. H. Balshan, John S. Quinn, William Voce, F. C. Gerbing, F. Metzke, Maurice Pfauam, Samuel McKay, Philip Lipman, Morris Roman, N. C. Kelley, Haver Rielzniger and Niels Rasmussen. The first officers were Moses Shields, W. M.; H. A. Kaufman, S. W.; Samuel Ellis, J. W.; Frederick Metzke, treasurer; Leo Canman, secretary; Eli Wood, S. D.; Samuel Engel, J. D.; and K. D. Kaufman, tyler. The lodge met in the building on the southwest corner of Michigan and North Clark streets, and there lost its furniture, paraphernalia, etc., in the fire of 1871.

APOLLO LODGE, No. 642.—On October 8, 1869, a dispensation was issued by Harman G. Reynolds, M. W. G. M., to form Apollo Lodge. The officers under this dispensation were George N. Houghton, W. M.; M. A. Thayer, S. W.; George Howison, J. W.; L. K. Aarhaus, treasurer; W. C. Dodge, Jr., secretary; William McGregor, S. D.; William Freeman, J. D.; Hugh Robertson, tyler. The charter was issued, with the number 642, on October 4, 1870, to the following charter members: Moses A. Thayer, George Howison, William McGregor, George N. Houghton, Hugh Robertson, Edwin Greene, William B. Nelson, Calvin S. Hartley, A. W. Blakely, Urias R. Riggie, Simon Livingston, William Freeman, William Warren, William Porter, Malcolm McLaren, John Smith, William Jenkinson, Joseph L. Kern, Lewis K. Aarhaus, John Holm, William Harvey, Duncan Ferguson, Robert Robertson, James Kennedy, Henry Plattner, Leopold Marquis, Charles E. Everts, William Fitchell, Frederick Gorason, Peter A. Goody, James Winship, T. W. Adams, Charles H. Fitch, Samuel Wiley, H. R. Cabery, Henry P. George, Willard Pearce, P. S. Crockett, James Reid, James Thompson, Thomas J. Suddard, David Johnston, Roderick Fraser, Charles E. B. Peterson, Patrick T. Rogers, James Demers, Augustus Rose, Charles T. Poinier, William C. Dodge, Jr., William H. Elliott, Charles W. Chaffee, Orville A. Taylor, Shaw Stewart, J. N. Bowers, E. W. Dorsey, J. A. Wooster, George W. Hotaling and William Malley. The first officers under the charter were Moses A. Thayer, W. M.; George Howison, S. W.; William McGregor, J. W.; L. K. Aarhaus, treasurer; Edwin Greene, secretary; T. J. Suddard, S. D.; William Freeman, J. D.; Orville A. Taylor, S. S.; William B. Nelson, J. S.; Hugh Robertson, tyler. The lodge, being situated at Twenty-eighth and State streets, was not injured by the fire, and the Masters mentioned above were those who occupied the chair until that time, Moses A. Thayer serving two terms of office.

D. C. CREGIER LODGE, No. 643, was organized in 1869, chartered in October, 1870, and was named in honor of Dewitt Clinton Cregier, whilom Grand Master of the State, HERDER LODGE, No. 669.—On November 19, 1870, a dispensation was granted to this lodge, and pursuant thereto a meeting was held at No. 505 South Union Street on November 22, 1870, and the following officers were appointed; E. K. Lott, W. M.; B. L. Roos, S. W.; Jacob Hammel, J. W.; William Daniels, treasurer; George M. Miller, secretary; Charles Busack, S. D.; Ernest Kretschmer, J. D.; Frederick Sump, S. S.; J. J. Maypole, J. S. and Nicholas Roehl, tyler. On October 3, 1871, a charter was issued to this lodge, with the number of 660, the following being the charter members: E. R. Lott, of Lessing Lodge, No. 557; B. L. Roos of the same lodge; Jacob Hummel, of Germania, No. 182; Frederick Sump, of Pleiades, No. 478; Charles Busack, of Germania; William Metzger, Nicholas Roehl, William Daniels and George M. Miller, all of Pleiades; J. J. Maypole, of Germania; Ernst Kretschmer, of Kilwinning, No. 311, and David Kahn, of Garden City, No. 141.

VALDEK LODGE No. 674, was granted a dispensation February 13, 1871, and received its charter on October 3, 1871, the charter members being Frederick Lehrkamp, Robert Beiersdorf, August Binz, Theo. Klingner, Max Warschauer, Alex. Weinberg, Otto A. Schultz, John Mueller, Liborius Gollhardt, Bernhard Wolf, E. D. Keiners, Leopold Hill, Anton Schultz, Fred. Appell, Wilhelm H. Feindt, Louis Kalisch, Gabriel Wolf and Adolph Berg. The first officers were: Fred Lehrkamp, W. M.; Robert Beiersdorf, S. W.; A. Binz, J. W.; M. Warschauer, S. D.; J. Mueller, J. D.; A. Weinberg, secretary; Theo. Klingner, treasurer; C. Schulz and G. Holz, stewards, and G. Straus, tyler. This lodge works in German.

WEST SIDE MASONIC TEMPLE.—On February 14, 1866, a meeting was held for the purpose of deliberating as to the expediency of purchasing a lot and erecting a Masonic Temple; and there were then represented, Cleveland Lodge, No. 211; Hesperia Lodge, No. 411; and Washington Chapter, No. 43. At this meeting, it was decided that a building association be organized, to be entitled the "West Chicago Benevolent Association," and that selections be made by such association of a site suitable for the building contemplated. On February 28, 1866, the representatives of the bodies previously mentioned convened, with the addition of representatives from Chicago Commandery, No. 19, and the report was received that the lot on the southwest corner of Halsted and Randolph streets had been selected.

A certificate of organization was then made and signed, on March 1, 1866, by Asa E. Cutler, George H. Gibson, Wiley Michael Egan, Nathan W. Huntley, D. A. Cashman, Ammi Merchant Bennett, George Himrod, Charles Shumway, Ira Harriman and William Stewart. The capital stock of the association was fixed at $100,000 in shares of $50 each, and the association was at once incorporated under provisions of the act cited, and a charter obtained from the State, dated March 1, 1866. The lot was then purchased and the stock actively placed; Cleveland Lodge alone taking $12,000 and her members likewise subscribing liberally. During the summer of 1869, the building was commenced and the corner stone laid with the customary ceremonies of the order on October 12, 1869. Then difficulty was experienced from the fact that but $56,000 of the capital stock had been subscribed for, in lieu of the whole amount of $100,000, and it was necessary to borrow $35,000 on January 27, 1870, from the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Milwaukee, with which the building was completed, during the summer of 1870, at a cost of $88,472 for the lot and edifice. The Masonic portion of it was then leased for a term of five years to Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, with the understanding that other Masonic bodies could sub-rent the hall upon reasonable terms. Cleveland Lodge then furnished and decorated the rooms at a cost of $12,000, and on December 22, 1870, the hall was formally dedicated to the uses of the order by M. W. Dewitt C. Cregier, Grand Master of Masons of Illinois.

THE FIRE.—The following list comprises the Masonic bodies that were rendered homeless by the fire of October 9, 1871 :

Lodges that lost their halls : Oriental, No. 33 ; Blaney, No. 271 ; Kilwinning, No. 311 ; Blair, No. 393 ; Mithra, No. 410 ; Covenant, No. 526 ; Lincoln Park, No. 611.

Lodges whose places of meeting were destroyed : Garden City, No. 141 ; Waubansia, No. 160 ; Germania, No. 182 ; Wm. B. Warren, No. 209 ; Accordia, No. 277 ; Ashlar, No. 308 ; Dearborn, No. 310 ; Thomas J. Turner, No. 409 ; Chicago, No. 437 ; H. W. Bigelow, No. 438 ; Keystone, No. 639.

LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, and Corinthian Chapter, No. 60, Royal Arch Masons ; Chicago Council, No. 4, Royal and Select Masters, and the Grand Council of K. and S. M., all lost their places of convocation. Apollo Commandery, No 1, Knights Templar, lost its hall ; and St. Bernard Commandery, No. 35, Knights Templar, lost its place of meeting ; as did the following bodies of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite : Van Rensselaer Grand Lodge of Perfection, Chicago Council of Princes of Jerusalem, Gourgas Chapter of Rose Croix de H—R—M, and Oriental Sovereign Consistory, 32°, S.P.R.S. The entire contents of the M. W. Grand Master's office were also destroyed.

On October 12, 1871, a few brethren met at the West Side Masonic Temple, and organized as a committee to relieve the "poor, distressed worthy brethren, their widows and orphans," who were thus suffering because of the fire. This temporary organization did excellent service, and was relieved, in its duties, on the 14th, by the organization of the Masonic Board of Relief. The officers of this body were :

DeWitt C. Cregier, Blaney Lodge, No. 271, president ; H. F. Holcomb, Garden City, No. 141, vice-president ; Wiley M. Egan, Cleveland, No. 211, treasurer ; George K. Hazlitt, Cleveland, No. 211, recording secretary ; Edward J. Hill, Cleveland, No. 211, corresponding secretary. Its members were—George R. McClellan, Garden City, No. 141 ; D. J. Avery, Hesperia, No. 411 ; T. T. Gurney, Cleveland, No. 211 ; C. H. Brennan, Hesperia, No. 411 ; Walter A. Stevens, Blair, No. 393 ; G. C. Smith, Wm. B. Warren, No. 209 ; and C. J. Franks, Mithra, No. 410. The master and wardens of each lodge in the city were also appointed special committees, to ascertain and report the condition and necessities of their needy members. On October 24, 1871, the officers and members were changed, as follows : DeWitt C. Cregier, president ; H. F. Holcomb, vice-president ; Wiley M. Egan, treasurer ; Harry Duvall, Blaney, No. 271, recording secretary ; Edward J. Hill, corresponding secretary ; James Morrison, Garden City, No. 141, superintendent. The members were : T. T. Gurney, Cleveland, No. 211 ; D. J. Avery, Hesperia, No. 411 ; John Feldkamp, Lessing, No. 557 ; Edwin Powell, Oriental, No. 33 ; D. H. Kilmore, William B. Warren, No. 209 ; A. M. Thomson, Kilwinning, No. 311 ; E. Ronayne, Keystone, No. 639 ; George R. McClellan, Garden City, No. 141 ; C. J. Franks, Mithra, No. 410 ; James H. Miles, Cleveland, No. 211 ; John Sutton, Dearborn, No. 310 ; J. E. Church, Waubansia, No. 160, and I. W. Congdon, Covenant, No. 526.

The Board of Masonic Relief, as thus constituted, served until the termination of its duties, on June 24, 1872, at which date the final meeting of the board was held, and its report submitted. Thereby the receipts were shown to be as follows :

Maine .....	$ 450 00
New Hampshire .....	200 00
Massachusetts .....	7,402 71
Rhode Island .....	100 00
Connecticut .....	2,387 12
New York .....	18,636 28
New Jersey .....	4,441 20
Pennsylvania .....	9,607 15
Maryland .....	86 50
Virginia .....	117 00
District of Columbia .....	3,022 39
South Carolina .....	25 00
Louisiana .....	400 00
Ohio .....	609 00
Indiana .....	1,069 00
Illinois .....	15,897 55
Kentucky .....	5,729 47
Michigan .....	26 25
Minnesota .....	75 00
Iowa .....	1,609 50
Missouri .....	1,450 00
Kansas .....	759 59

Nebraska .....	$ 680 90
Nevada .....	555 00
California .....	7,501 78
Oregon .....	100 00
Colorado Territory .....	42 00
Idaho Territory .....	111 00
Dakota Territory .....	60 50
Utah Territory .....	230 00
New Mexico .....	100 00
Dominion of Canada .....	5,120 22
Central America .....	584 85
England .....	394 63
British India .....	26 65
Cash received .....	$82,244 92
Interest on deposits .....	844 14
Amount goods donated .....	7,545 44
Aggregate received .....	$90,634 50
Disbursed by Board .....	$68,808 61
Returned to donors .....	21,825 89
Aggregate disposed of .....	$90,634 50

All the accounts, vouchers, records, etc., of the Masonic Board of Relief were audited by a commission of Grand Masters, invited for the purpose from abroad, consisting of Samuel C. Perkins, Grand Master of Pennsylvania ; Charles F. Stansbury, Grand Master of the District of Columbia ; and Ozias P. Waters, Grand Master of Iowa. This commission convened on September 18, 1872, with Charles H. Kingston, private secretary to the Grand Master of Pennsylvania, as secretary. This commission submitted, as a result of its painstaking examination, in a report highly eulogistic of the Masonic Board of Relief, the following balance sheet :

The entire amount of cash donations received .....	$83,089 06
In addition to which supplies of goods were sent valued, at .....	7,545 44
Making a total of .....	$90,634 50
Of this amount there has been disbursed, in the relief of applicants, allotments to Chicago lodges, the expenses of the Board, and a donation to Chicago Masonic Board of Relief, as set forth in detail, in the report which is to be printed .....	$67,414 04
There has been returned to the donors a surplus of .....	21,825 89
And there has been retained to meet the expenses of printing of the report, and this commission .....	1,394 57
	$90,634 50

Sam C. Perkins
Grand Master of Pennsylvania.

Chas. F. Stansbury
Grand Master of District of Columbia.

O. P. Waters,
Grand Master of Masons in Iowa.

Chas. H. Kingston
Secretary.

There was likewise a special fund remitted for the relief of Royal Arch Companions, and for its disbursement Companions Wiley M. Egan, James H. Miles, and Robert H. Foss were appointed a committee. Companion E. N. Tucker was their assistant, and acted as their agent. And under the auspices of these Royal Arch Masons there were received $3,404.30 and disbursed $1,132.18, the remainder, $2,272.12 being invested in bonds and deposited with the Grand Treasurer.

The same committee and agent that disbursed the contribution for the R. A. M., also received and disbursed the special fund for the Knights Templar, as follows:

Amount received.....	$2,322 10
Cr.
By half of expense account, the amount being divided between the R. A. M. and K. T.....	$307 18
By amount of disbursements, as per statement.....	$1,077 53	$1,384 71
Balance on hand.....		937 39
		<hr/>
		$2,322 10

Until 1875, there was an additional amount of $280 disbursed, and subsequently the committee returned the balance, $657.39, pro rata to the respective donors.

R. A. M.

CAPITULAR MASONRY.—The governing power of the Chapters in this State was first formed by a convocation at Springfield, Ill., April 9, 1850, pursuant to a call from William B. Warren, of Jacksonville Chapter, No. 3, under authority of M. E. C. Willis Stewart, G. G. K. of the General Grand Chapter of the United States,* and wherat said Warren was chairman, and E. P. Roe, of Jacksonville, No. 3, was chosen secretary. The following chapters were represented: Springfield, No. 1; Lafayette, No. 2; Jacksonville, No. 3; Horeb, No. 4; Quincy, No. 5; and Peoria, No. 7. The election for grand officers resulted: W. B. Warren, of Jacksonville, grand high priest; J. H. Holton, of Quincy, deputy grand high priest; J. V. Z. Blaney, of Chicago, grand king; Peter Sweat, of Peoria, grand scribe, Mason Brayman, of Springfield, grand secretary; Thomas H. Campbell, grand treasurer; W. S. Hurst, of Jacksonville, G. M. In 1851, James V. Z. Blaney was elected grand high priest; in 1864, Wiley Michael Egan was elected to the same office; as was James Hoge Miles in 1868. In the following sketches of the chapters paying allegiance to this Grand Chapter, the facts presented have been taken from the best attainable sources.

LAFAYETTE CHAPTER, No. 2, R. A. M.—The presiding officers of this Chapter, from 1853 to 1871, so far as can be ascertained, were—George Waite Deering, high priest, 1853; Hosmer Allen Johnson, 1859; Enoch Bunker Stevens, 1862; James Hoge Miles, 1863-68; Alfred Wells Hitchcock, 1869; Samuel Brown, 1870-71. This chapter was burned out in the fire of 1871, meeting at that time at the Temple, No. 85 Dearborn Street. The building caught fire between one and two o'clock of the morning of October 10, and caused a loss of $2,070 in United States bonds, which were in the treasurer's safe, and about $1,500 in cost of regalia, furniture, etc. The first meeting after the fire was held at the hall of D. A. Cashman Lodge, at the corner of Robey and West Madison streets.

WASHINGTON CHAPTER, No. 43.—On the second Friday of January, 1853, A. I. 2358, pursuant to the adjournment described in volume 1, page 513, the following companions assembled at the hall on the southwest corner of Clinton and Fulton streets: Lucian Prentiss Cheney, Isaac Petner Hatfield, Joshua Howell Gest, Theodore Tuthill Gurney, George Cowper, Joseph Porter Lowe, Reuben Cleveland, Wiley Michael Egan, Gilbert Richard Smith,

* The General Grand Chapter of the United States held its session at Chicago on September 13, 1859.

James B. Eason, Hiram Calvin Wells Cowdery, J. E. Church, William Henry Bowden Warren, John Kniffin Russell, Orson Brooks, George Waite Deering, William Wallace Mitchell, William B. Milne and J. T. Holt. The meeting was called to order by Companion Reuben Tayler, and J. H. Gest was appointed secretary. The dispensation from Most Excellent Deputy Grand High Priest, Companion Nelson D. Elwood, dated January 5, 1858, was then read and accepted, and Washington Chapter, U. D., was opened with Companion Mitchell as M. E. H. P., pro tempore. Permanent organization was then effected, with the following officers: Reuben Tayler, M. E. H. P.; Reuben Cleveland, E. K.; D. F. Wilson, E. S.; W. M. Egan, C. of H.; T. T. Gurney, P. S.; George Cowper, R. A. C.; L. P. Cheney, treasurer; G. R. Smith, secretary; J. T. Holt, G. M. 3d V.; E. B. Stevens, G. M. 2d V.; J. E. Church, G. M. 1st V.; and I. P. Hatfield, tyler. The last meeting of the Chapter, U. D., was held September 10, 1858.

Reuben Tayler

On October 1, 1858, the charter was issued to Washington Chapter, with the number 43, and on October 22, 1858, the chapter was duly constituted by the Grand Royal Arch Chapter, with the following officers and members: *Reuben Tayler, H. P.; Reuben Cleveland, K.; Doctor Franklin Wilson, S.; W. M. Egan, C. of H.; T. T. Gurney, P. S.; George Cowper, R. A. C.; W. H. B. Warren, M. 3d V.; E. B. Stevens, M. 2d V.; ———, M. 1st V.; J. H. Gest, secretary; Lucian P. Cheney, treasurer; I. P. Hatfield, tyler. Members: John T. Holt, John K. Russell, W. B. Milne, W. T. Muir, Samuel W. Yawkey, Adolphus Baedecker, James B. Eason, Joseph Porter Lowe, William P. Wright, Henry Curtis, William Henry Lyon Willer, John E. Clague, Ira Goddard, A. J. Bird, Charles Tunnlicliffe, J. S. Chamberlain, J. M. Chamberlain, H. T. Porter, John Adams, Nathan Ward Huntley, John H. Dart, W. H. Pomeroy and B. F. Robbins. The charter members were Reuben Tayler, Reuben Cleveland, Doctor F. Wilson, Wiley M. Egan, T. T. Gurney, J. E. Church, Lucian P. Cheney, William B. Milne, John T. Holt, Samuel W. Yawkey, Adolphus Baedecker, J. K. Russell and Enoch B. Stevens. The High Priests have been as follows since the institution of the Chapter: Reuben Tayler, 1858-59; Reuben Cleveland, 1860; Wiley Michael Egan, 1861-63; Nathan Ward Huntley, 1864; George Henry Gibson, 1865-67; Ammi Merchant Bennett, 1868; Peter Button, 1869; Arthur Rollin Heber Atkins, 1870-71. The first petition received was that of A. H. Heald; the first Mark was conferred on Friday evening, January 22, 1858; the first Passing of the Chair done on Friday evening, February 19, 1858; the first Most Excellent Master's degree conferred on Friday evening, April 9, 1850, and the first team that received the Royal Arch was composed of Charles E. Tunnlicliffe, A. J. Bird and J. M. Chamberlain. The first death of a companion is registered as that of Ira S. Chamberlain on January 1, 1862. This chapter met at the West Side Masonic Temple, at the time of the fire, and suffered no loss thereby.

REUBEN TAYLER was born at Alburg, Grand Isle Co., Vt., on May 3, 1798. About the year 1820, he removed across the line into Canada, where he married Miss Paulina Eddy. In 1838, he came to Chicago, and immediately entered a small piece of land in what is now the vicinity of Ashland Avenue and West Madison Street. Ashland Avenue was first called Reuben Street, after Mr. Tayler's Christian name, and the changing thereof to Ashland Avenue was the great grievance of the old gentleman's sincere, honest, earnest, yet simple life. For several years he farmed his plot of ground; but perceiving the future of Chicago, he went into the real-estate business, and remained therein until about 1875, when he retired from active business. He was the prime cause of the laying out of Union Park, and was in all matters pertaining to the good of the city, an indefatigable worker. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and was for thirty years warden of the Church of the Atonement, which subsequently became a part of St. Andrew's Church; of this latter congregation he was a member at the time of his death. He was an active man, had a happy and kindly disposition, was a general favorite, and loved Freemasonry with all the fervor of a true, single, pure-hearted man. At his request, however, there was no display at his funeral; unostentatious to the last, the oldest Mason in Chicago was laid to rest without the ceremonies which the fraternity would so gladly have paid to his remains, as a tribute of their honor and affection. He left a wife and four children—Mrs. Dr. W. R. Griswold and Mrs. M. Griswold of Chicago, Mrs. E. L. Haning, of Wisconsin, and C. M. Taylor, of Colorado. Of him, Gilbert W. Barnard thus wrote: "Died, in Chicago, May 7, 1852." Thus is written the alpha and omega of one who for many years was among the most active workers in the Masonic field in this Valley. He was made a Master Mason in Nelson's Lodge, No. 14, Lower Canada, on April 18, 1820, of which lodge he was Master for several years. In the same town he received the degrees of Capitular and Cryptic Masonry. He was a charter member of LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, R. A. M., and the first high priest under the charter of Washington Chapter, No. 43, in Chicago. He was created a Knight Templar in Apollo Encampment, No. 1, on July 25, 1845, and of this body was commander in 1853. At the organization of the Grand Commandery of Illinois in 1857, he was selected to fill the office of grand prelate. The grades and orders of the Ancient Accepted Rite were conferred upon him September 2, 1856, he being among the first who were advanced to that high grade in this State. As captain in the militia in Canada for many years, and filling the office of trustee of schools, as well as minor offices in the church and parish, Reuben Taylor obtained the confidence and high regard of all who knew him. This confidence and esteem was fully retained in this city, so long his home, where his duties as an officer under the City, State and General Government were ever discharged with the strict integrity of an honest, faithful and painstaking official. For more than thirty-two years he had held the office of senior warden in the Episcopal Church, and to him the office was no sinecure—full well did he discharge the duties of a consistent, Christian, God-fearing man. After eighty-six years of useful life he has gone Home, and the respect of honest citizens, the love of fraternal brethren, and the prayers of his fellow-Christians do follow him.

* Proceedings Grand Arch Chapter of State of Illinois, Alton, Ill.; printed by Companions Bailhache & Dolbee, 1864. Chicago Historical Society. † The hand-book of the chapter cites J. E. Church as G. M. 1st Vail.

CORINTHIAN CHAPTER, No. 69.—On December 14, 1863,* a dispensation was granted to this chapter, naming Frank G. Greene as high priest, George W. Wood as king, and Henry Turner as scribe. On October 7, 1864, a charter was issued to Corinthian Chapter, No. 69, and on October 12, 1864, the following officers were installed: Frank G. Greene, high priest; George W. Wood, king; Henry Turner, scribe; C. R. P. Wentworth, treasurer; E. N. Edwards, secretary; C. W. Wentworth, captain of the host; S. S. Greer, principal sojourner; Eli Wood, royal arch captain; George M. Ingersoll, master 3d V.; H. J. Gilmore, 2d V.; W. H. Tunnicliff, 1st V.; J. C. Borchert, tyler. Members: W. W. Armstrong, John Anderson, P. M. Almiati, J. B. Beecher, J. B. Bent, Morris A. Baxter, John H. Cloydron, Peter Cochrane, J. B. Doggett, S. H. Donaldson, Robert Donaldson, J. B. Donniker, F. T. Engstrom, Edward N. Edwards, R. F. Farr, W. O. Frazer, Frank G. Greene, Hugh J. Gilmore, S. S. Green, John H. Green, George M. Ingersoll, N. P. Loberg, George S. Lee, J. McMorrine, Timothy Mahoney, Thomas E. Miller, Jesse Minot, Joseph T. Moulton, W. T. Potter, Thomas D. Randall, A. H. Robinson, S. H. Smith, W. D. Smith, Moses Shield, W. C. Spaulding, Charles Stephens, Henry Turner, W. H. Tunnicliff, C. R. P. Wentworth, Thomas Willis, C. L. Woodman and W. C. Hunt. Corinthian Chapter was burned out in 1871, and occupied the hall of Washington Chapter, No. 43.

WILEY M. EGAN CHAPTER, No. 126.—This chapter was named in honor of the celebrated Mason, Wiley Michael Egan, and received its dispensation of date January 20, 1868. The three principal officers were—J. E. Church, high priest; D. A. Starrett, king; T. C. Hatch, scribe. Its rooms were at the corner of Twelfth and Clinton streets. On October 9, 1868, a charter was issued to this chapter, and on October 16, 1868, the following officers were duly installed: J. E. Church, high priest; D. A. Starrett, king; T. C. Hatch, scribe; J. H. Paddock, captain of the host; C. Mahoney, principal sojourner; J. Evans, royal arch captain; W. B. Ryan, master 3d V.; A. J. Bird, master 2d V.; O. L. Parker, master 1st V.; John Wallwork, treasurer; W. S. Powell, secretary; John Link and William Godman, stewards; E. Stevens, tyler. Members: A. J. Bird, R. J. Colburn, J. Corcoran, J. E. Church, Thomas Darby, H. C. Dewey, John Evans, John V. Gray, J. F. Gregory, William Godman, T. C. Hatch, William Heardon, J. M. Hildreth, J. K. Hogan, O. E. Kimball, James M. Lincoln, John Link, C. Mahoney, James H. Paddock, O. L. Parker, Eli Payne, Thomas W. Perry, Addison Phillo, William S. Powell, William B. Ryas, George A. Ross, D. A. Star-

* On July 1, 1865, Asboth Military Chapter received a dispensation from the Grand Chapter of Illinois this chapter being connected with the Second Regiment of Artillery. The first officers were—S. O. Vaughtan, H. P. A. A. Clark, K. L. J. W. Underhill, S.; P. W. T. Vaughan, P. S.; and members C. S. Becker, C. W. Brooks, A. Cunningham, R. Crawford, E. E. Colwell, A. Hathaway, T. H. Hyde, R. M. Henderson, J. G. Hobert, P. McAndrus, J. McBerney, J. H. McNew, J. E. New, A. M. Rutledge, J. M. Sprout, John Saylor, C. B. Throop and J. H. Williams.

† This year the Grand Chapter decreed that no more Chicago chapters would be allowed without the consent of the three chapters then in the city.

rett, Edward Stevens, Charles Van Campen, John G. Vibert, John Wallwork, W. W. Washburn, J. D. Wilson, George H. Young.

WILEY M. EGAN commenced the insurance business in 1857, in connection with his vessel agency, and represented—during those early years—many marine insurance companies, among them the Corn Exchange, Mercantile Mutual, of New York, and Pacific Mutual, of New York, and has made that branch of the business a specialty since that date. He now represents the Boston Marine, Detroit, Mercantile, of Cleveland, and Buffalo, of Buffalo, the aggregate assets of which companies amount to two and one-half millions. Necessarily during his twenty-seven years of experience as insurance and vessel agent, Mr. Egan has become widely known among the commercial circles of the city, but he is even more extensively recognized as one of Chicago's most prominent Masons, having taken the various degrees specified, as follows: Master Mason, in Garden City Lodge, No. 141, on September 7, 1855; the Royal Arch, on February 23, 1857; Royal and Select Master, on July 16, 1861; Knight Templar, on October 27, 1857; 32° on April 22, 1864; and the honorary 33° in the Supreme Council for the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States, on June 18, 1870. He was master of Cleveland Lodge, king and high priest of Washington Chapter, No. 43, grand high priest of the Grand Chapter, commander of Chicago Commandery, and grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar of Illinois. He was also a member of the Masonic Relief Committee, after the fire of 1871, and has been elected grand treasurer of the Grand Lodge and Grand Chapter of Illinois, for four successive years. He was born in Ballston, N. Y., on August 1, 1827, and came to Chicago on October 9, 1836, with his parents. He was married, on November 28, 1849, to Mary P. Helm, who was born in the town of Essex, N. Y., on January 10, 1828. They have had the following children: William Everett, died October 28, 1853; Marian Louisa, Helm Isabel, George Clarence, and Charles Wiley. Mr. Egan was president of the Board of Trade, from 1867 to 1868. He was a member of the General Assembly of Illinois, from the Ninety-fifth District, or West Chicago, commencing January 1, 1871, and ending December 31, 1872. This Assembly was the first to enact laws under the State Constitution adopted in 1870. He has been identified with the commerce of the lakes, as sailor and master, from 1842 until 1853, and as the owner of sail and steam vessels since 1853. During this period he has built and owned some of the finest and best vessels on the lake. In connection with his business as commission merchant he, for several years, shipped over five million bushels of grain per year. His notes have never been discounted, and his bills are always promptly paid—commercial integrity having been his invariable characteristic. He has been, for many years, an attendant, with his family, at the Union Park Congregational Church, and has been intimately identified with its success.

CHICAGO CHAPTER, No. 127.—On February 16, 1868, a dispensation was issued to Home Chapter to hold meetings at the corner of Cottage Grove Avenue and Twenty-third Street, and to have, for its principal officers, Enoch B. Stevens, H. P.; Moore Conger, K.; and Gardner S. Barstow, S. On October 9, 1868, a charter was issued to this chapter, with the number 127, and the name was changed, pursuant to petition of its members, to Chicago Chapter. The charter members were Enoch B. Stevens, Moore Conger, Gardner S. Barstow, W. E. Wheeler, H. N. Hurlbut, B. B. W. Locke, George T. Williams, John Start, Thomas Nichols, John H. Bowers, Isaac Eldridge, Thomas W. Anderson, William T. Baker, T. H. Patterson, W. H. Warren, Isaac Parker, Frank B. Tucker, R. H. Bingham, W. H. Jenkins, D. F. Crilly, E. M. Horton, Jacob Richman, J. R. Hoxie, A. M. Hogle, J. W. Mills, S. C. Mix, L. A. Pierce, D. R. Crego, George T. Cooke, William Aldrich, D. W. Sutherland, S. L. Rodgers, Hugh Logan, H. F. Holcomb, E. J. Whitehead, W. O. Wirt, George Wirt, Sanford Green, J. G. Wustum, W. H. Boomer, M. A. Thayer, George M. Houghton, George McElwain, and Julius Wooster. The first officers under the charter were installed on October 17, 1868, by the M. E. G. H. P., and were—Enoch B. Stevens, H. P.; Moore Conger, K.; Gardner S. Barstow, S.; William E. Wheeler, G. H.; H. N. Hurlbut, P. S.; Jacob Richman, R. A. C.; G. T. Williams, M. 3rd V.; C. M. Bostwick, M. 2d V.; S. L. Rodgers, M. 1st V.; T. W. Anderson, treasurer; B. B. W. Locke, secretary; N. H. Warren and Thomas Nichols, stewards; and Isaac Parker, tyler. The high priests prior to 1872 were Enoch B. Stevens, 1868; G. S. Barstow, 1869–70; William Aldrich, 1871.

YORK CHAPTER, No. 148.—Union Park Chapter was constituted by dispensation from A. A. Murray, grand high priest, on November 22, 1870, and, on October 6, 1871, it received its charter, with the number 148, and its name was changed to York Chapter. The officers under dispensation were George F. Letz, M. E. H. P.; W. U. Thwing, E. K.; K. A. Hunton, E. S.; William Kerr, C. H.; William Law, Jr., P. S.; John Whiteley, secretary; G. P. Randall, treasurer; William R. White, R. A. C.; John S.

White, G. M. 3d Vail; J. H. Pflowman, G. M. 2d Vail; J. H. Windsor, G. M. 1st Vail; and C. F. Decatur, tyler. The charter members were G. F. Letz, William U. Thwing, K. A. Hunton, J. R. Wilkins, S. G. Wilkins, A. D'Anguera, G. P. Randall, William R. White, John S. White, J. S. McFarland, Ludwig Wolff and Abraham Knisely. The charter was in the hands of the grand secretary at the time of the fire of 1871, and was destroyed. Upon the re-issue of the charter, in lieu of the one destroyed, the name of Abram Knisely was, through some inadvertence, omitted, and to, so far as possible, atone therefor, Companion Knisely was made an honorary life-member. On the organization under the charter, the following officers were elected: George F. Letz, M. E. H. P.; W. U. Thwing, E. K.; K. A. Hunton, E. S.; William R. White, C. H.; J. R. Wilkins, P. S.; Charles Perkins, secretary; Daniel Barclay, treasurer; J. S. White, R. A. C.; J. C. Chuetz, G. M. 3d Vail; W. M. Wright, G. M. 2d Vail; E. M. Jarrett, G. M. 1st Vail; William Coe, tyler. This chapter did not suffer directly by the fire of 1871, in any loss of property, but the loss of the records in that fire entailed a diminution of their recorded membership, as, in 1871, there were fifty-three members, and the ensuing year but forty-five, notwithstanding which, three had been exalted during the interval, making the membership of 1871, actually fifty-six. To make their discrepancy tally with the actual membership that appeared after the fire, eleven were classified as demitted, and the Grand Chapter adopted forty-five as the number of members of York Chapter, No. 148.

R. & S. M.

CRYPTIC MASONRY.

CHICAGO COUNCIL, No. 4, R. & S. M.*—The principal officers of this body have been: Homer A. Johnson, T. I. G. M., 1853; George W. Deering, 1859; Henry C. Ranney, 1861; Sidney E. Locke, 1862; E. W. Jones, 1863; James H. Miles, 1864-71. This council met at the Masonic Temple on Dearborn street, and was there burned out in 1871.

K. T.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR.—Some interest attaches to the proceedings of the Grand Commandery, other than the edicts that are promulgated for the government of subordinate commanderies, and that is in the list of the grand officers, on account of the number of Chicago Masons who have held position therein. The limits of this topic preclude any list save that of the grand commanders, since the organization of the grand body. These have been James Van Zandt Blaney, 1857-58; Josiah Hunt, 1859; Hosmer Allen Johnson, 1860-61; George W. Deering, 1862; William H. Turner, 1863; Nathan F. Prentice, 1864; Henry C. Ranney, 1865; George C. Lanphere, 1866; Vincent L. Hurlbut, 1867; Jerome R. Gorin, 1868; Charles E. Munger, 1869; John M. Pearson, 1870; Wiley M. Egan, 1871.

The Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment of the United States was held for the first time in Chicago on September 13, 1859. William Blackstone Hubbard, of Columbus, Ohio, Grand Master, arrived in the city on September 12, and was honored by a special escort of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, from the depot to the Tremont House. The guests at the Conclave were under the charge of State Grand Commander James V. Z. Blaney; and right worthily he dispensed his chivalric hospitality. A banquet at the Tremont House was one of the features of the occasion. Fuller details of this Conclave are almost impossible of attainment; copies of the proceedings of the Conclave are very rare, and the newspapers of that period are filled to repletion with the proceedings of the National Fair, held at that time, and give the Conclave only cursory mention.

APOLLO COMMANDERY, No. 1.—The Eminent Commanders from 1833 to 1871 were—William Wallace Mitchell, 1858-59; George Waite Deering, 1860-61; Henry Collins Ranney, 1862; Vincent Lombard Hurlbut, 1863-64; Benjamin Franklin Patrick, 1865-66; Vincent Lombard Hurlbut, 1867; Theodore Tutthill Gurney, 1868-69; Charles Homan Brower, 1870; Eugene Burritt Myers,

* The Grand Council R. & S. M. convened at Chicago on October 5, 1871.

1871. The commandery was destroyed at the time of the fire, and out of $12,000 insurance recovered $250. The first place of meeting after the fire was at the West Side Masonic Temple. The first annual festival and banquet of Apollo Commandery was held at the Briggs House, on February 9, 1864, of which the following eminent Masons formed the committee of arrangements: Vincent Lombard Hurlbut, Wiley Michael Egan, James Smith, Benjamin Franklin Patrick, Joseph Addison Montgomery, Ammi Merchant Bennett and George Warren Pettee. The banquet was a prominent success, and was the inaugural ceremony that has ushered into the experiences of the commandery a long line of such occurrences.

CHARLES ROBERT STARKWEATHER.—The proceedings of the Supreme Council, 1868, Northern Jurisdiction, contain an eulogy delivered by Ill. Bro. Vincent L. Hurlbut, on Ill. Bro. Charles Robert Starkweather, who died August 27, 1867, from which the following is taken: "Bro. Starkweather was born in Fabius, N. Y., May 8, 1816. Of his early life, I have no knowledge, but, as the child is father to the man, we may safely believe it to have been singularly pure and upright. In 1838, he selected Chicago as his home, and thenceforward his life and enterprises were blended with the growth of the most wonderful product of our Western civilization. Soon after his removal to Chicago (the precise date I have not been able to learn),* he was made a Master Mason. In 1841, he married Miss Mary Eager, of Massachusetts. I find upon our records that he received the Order of the Temple, in Apollo Commandery, No. 1, Chicago, June 13, 1845. He received the Ineffable degrees in New York, and when the several bodies were organized in Chicago, he was placed at their head. He took the 33<sup>d</sup>, May 15th, 1857, in Boston, and in May, 1860, was elected to the office of Grand Minister of State, and appointed Deputy for the States of Illinois and Wisconsin. It is the highest praise we can give to him to say, that in all the Masonic positions he occupied, from the lowest to the highest, he acquitted himself with rare discrimination, wisdom and fidelity. To him Masonry was a sacred and invaluable treasure, a divine force and providence among men, and it formed a prominent part of his life and religion. No man ever came with purer heart or cleaner hands to lay upon its sacred altars the offerings of manly, Christian conviction and obligation. In hours of conflict and peril, now happily ended, he was forbearing and generous, always ready to give wise and prudent counsel, desirous that all unhappy differences might cease, that we might, with one heart and one mind, pursue our calling and purpose. In hours of private grief, when the clouds of bereavement gathered over his heart and home, and he walked through the bitter baptism of tears, the tenets of our sacred Rite were a balm to his afflicted spirit. In the closing days of his life, when disease was doing its fatal work, he was cheerful and resigned, for he had, years before, chosen God for his refuge and guide, and he gathered new joy from the spirit and companionship of our sacred Rite. To those of us who knew the peculiar private trials which beset his Masonic career, his steadfastness and devotion were above all praise. These trials and obstacles, which charity would gladly hide, prevented us from giving to him, in his last days, that watchful care and attention it would have been a pleasure for us to bestow, but we did all that we could to soften his dying pillow and discharge our solemn duty at his grave. * * Since his departure, new beauties of his life and character have been daily unfolded to our views, as the widow, the fatherless and the unprotected, whose lives he blessed, into whose lonely heart and lot he bore the cheerful courage of his manly aid and sympathy, have come with trembling lip and tearful eye to bear testimony to his goodness, and lay their humble tribute of grateful love upon his grave. * * One of his latest deeds was in beautiful harmony with his whole life, as he bequeathed one-fourth of his large estate to charitable purposes." A Lodge of Sorrow was held at Irving Hall, N. Y., commemorative of the decease of Bro. Starkweather and two other deceased brethren. Mr. Starkweather, at his decease, left the following children: Ralph Edward Starkweather, of Chicago; Julia Maria Starkweather (Mrs. Edward G. Mason); Charles Huntington Starkweather, of Chicago; Chauncey Clarke Starkweather, of New York City; and Frank Henry Starkweather, of Beloit, Wis.

NORMAN THEODORE GASSETTE was born in Townsend, Vt., on April 21, 1839, and with his parents, Silas B. and Susanna P. (Martin) Gassette, came to Chicago from Springfield, Mass., in December, 1849. Here he attended the Garden City Institute under Professors H. H. Lee and Snow, and subsequently was a pupil in Professor Hathaway's academy. He afterward received private instructions from Professor Alonzo J. Sawyer, and thus continued his studies up to his seventeenth year, when he entered Shurtleff College, Alton, Ill., and one year later the Atwater Institute, Rochester, N. Y., under Professors Benedict Dexter, Satterlee and Kendrick, finally completing his education by taking the entire curriculum of Harvard University, under private tutors. At the breaking out of the Rebellion, Mr. Gassette responded with patriotic promptness to his country's first call. On June 17, 1861, * December 2, 1841, vide volume I, page 508.

he was mustered into service as a private of Co. "A," 19th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and left with his regiment for the field in July following, the first assignment near the enemy's line being in Missouri. It is unnecessary to give a detailed account of his personal services and experiences. Throughout the term of his enlistment, he bore himself with that unflinching bravery and fortitude which mark the true soldier. In 1862, he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and to the position of aide-de-camp. For gallantry in action at Chickamauga, he was recommended for the brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel, by his brigade, division and corps commanders. He was mustered out of the service in October, 1864. In 1866, having completed a course of legal study in the law department of the University of Chicago (now the Union College of Law), he was admitted to the practice of his chosen profession. He was soon after appointed deputy county clerk, under General Edward S. Salomon, which position he held from 1866 to 1868. During this period of his service, he had charge of the court records. In the fall of 1868, he was nominated by the Republican County Convention for election to the office of clerk of the Circuit Court and, ex officio, recorder of deeds, being elected by an overwhelming majority. This was a "fee office" at the time, and very remunerative. Immediately after his retirement, in December, 1872, the duties of the clerk and recorder were separated and two offices created. During Mr. Gassette's term of service, and up to 1873, he was active in politics, being one of the most efficient workers in the Republican party. He was chairman of seven campaign committees, and held the same position on the C. B. Farwell campaign committee during the exciting Farwell-Wentworth contest in the first congressional district. Since 1873, he has not actively participated in politics. Mr. Gassette was made a Master Mason in 1864, in Blair Lodge, No. 303; from which he received a demit, and then affiliated with Home Lodge, No. 508, of which he is still a member. He became an ardent worker, and, inspired by the beauty and strength of the very threshold of the great moral temple, sought, with as little delay as possible, to penetrate the hidden mysteries within. He is at present a member of LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, R.A.M., Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K.T., and of Oriental Consistory, 32<sup>d</sup>, S.P.R.S. His most arduous Masonic work has been done as a Knight Templar, in and through the Apollo Commandery, of which he became a life-member on June 15, 1869. He has, since that time, been more highly honored in the bestowment of positions of trust and authority than any other Sir Knight during the forty years embraced in the annals of the Commandery. He was elected prelate in June, 1874, serving two terms. In December, 1875, he was chosen generalissimo, and, in December, 1876, was first elected eminent commander. He was re-elected to this office in 1877-78-79-80, and again, in December 1881, and December, 1882, serving six years as the eminent commander of what became, under his administration, the largest Masonic Templar body in the world; and is now grand senior warden of the Grand Commandery of Illinois. Space will not admit even an imperfect sketch of the work performed by Mr. Gassette. The history belongs especially to the Commandery, and, as recorded, constitutes its brightest annals of progress—from poverty to solvency, from weakness to strength, from diversity in council to unity in fraternal thought and knightly fellowship. In 1880, the Twenty-first Triennial Conclave of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar was held in Chicago, which occasion was made memorable by the largest gathering of Knights ever witnessed on this continent. The burden of entertaining the vast concourse, gathered from every State in the Union, fell upon the Apollo, Chicago, and St. Bernard Commanderies of the city. Mr. Gassette, then being eminent commander of Apollo Commandery, was also chairman of the joint committee of management, chosen by the representatives of the three commanderies, and also the Grand Commandery of Illinois; and in this capacity, became the controlling and directing power in devising and executing the vast plans necessary to render the immense Conclave a success. He thus bore the greater burden of responsibility, and, with the honor thus thrust upon him, came, in like measure, the brunt of inevitable captious abuse. That his efforts were crowned with full success, was evinced in the innumerable letters of thanks and other testimonials received by him from the returned guests and commanderies, from all parts of the country, as well as by the expressions of approbation given him by his co-workers on the managing committee, and by the resolutions adopted by Apollo Commandery, and the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar of the State of Illinois. In 1883, Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K.T., having received from the Right Eminent Grand Commander of Illinois a dispensation to leave his grand jurisdiction, and one from the Grand Commander of New York, permitting Apollo Commandery, K.T., to invade the grand jurisdiction of New York, for the purpose of embarkation, and a dispensation from the Most Eminent Grand Master of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar of the United States of America, permitting the Commandery to visit foreign countries, in July, it sailed on the City of Rome, with one hundred and forty Templars under its beausant, and about twenty ladies, for this notable foreign tour. This was the largest Masonic body that ever crossed the ocean, and Mr. Gassette was in command. They were most royally received in London, Liverpool, York, and other large cities, and returned with the pleasures of their long fraternal tour unalloyed by accident or loss, reaching Chicago September 17, 1883. Mr. Gassette has achieved a national reputation among American Masons of high degree. His Masonic record is the peculiar property of the order, and by its members it will be kept untarnished long after he shall have joined the Celestial Lodge of the Grand Master above. The surviving members of Mr. Gassette's family are, his wife and two children—one son, Wirt Knickerbocker; and one daughter, Grace. To summarize the life of Mr. Gassette, it may be said that he is a man of excellent moral, social and commercial standing, of keen literary tastes and comprehensive literary talents; and in the many of the offices which he has filled, he has demonstrated inflexible rectitude of character, honesty of purpose, and perfect capacity.

CHICAGO COMMANDERY, No. 19.—This commandery was organized under a dispensation from R. E. Sir Henry C. Ranney, Grand Commander of Illinois, dated January 18, 1866; and was chartered October 23, 1866, with the following charter members: Arthur Kollin Heber Atkins, Ammi Merchant Bennett, Charles Carroll Bonney, Frederic Augustus Bryan, Charles Ellery Chase, Edgar Mantlebury Doolittle, Wiley Michael Egan, John Chapman Fuller, George Gardner, George Henry Gibson, James Henneshees, Edward Clarence Hubbard, Nathan Ward Huntley, James H. Johnson, George Frederick Letz, Charles McFarland, Joseph C. Perrett, Ambrose Plamondon, Moses W. Powell, Edmund Richard Pitman Shurley, John Spry and Truman Warren Steele. The commandery was constituted as Chicago Commandery, No. 19, Knights Templar, by Past Grand Commander H. C. Ranney, as proxy for R. E. G. C., on November 5, 1866, Anno Ordinis, 748, the following being the first officers: Wiley M. Egan, eminent commander; George Gardner, generalissimo; Ammi Merchant Bennett, captain-general; John Chapman Fuller, prelate; George Frederick Letz, senior warden; Charles McFarland, junior warden; George Henry Gibson, treasurer; John Whitley, recorder; Arthur Kollin Heber Atkins, standard bearer; James Henneshees, sword bearer; Edward Clarence Hubbard, warden; and Moses Gray, captain of the guard. The Eminent Commanders have been, up to 1872, Wiley Michael Egan, 1866-67; George Gardner, 1868; Ammi Merchant Bennett, 1869; George Henry Gibson, 1870; Charles McFarland, 1871. This commandery met at the West Side Masonic Temple, at the time of the fire, and no loss was entailed upon its members by the conflagration, the only charge being on its hospitality, which was unstintingly exercised.

ST. BERNARD COMMANDERY, No. 35.—This commandery was organized under dispensation dated February 10, 1870, and received its charter under date of October 26, 1870. The following were the first officers of the commandery: Edward Nelson Edwards, commander; Francis Asbury Hayden, generalissimo; Louis Schaffner, captain-general; Gilbert Wadsworth Barnard, prelate; Thomas Eaton Miller, treasurer; John Oscar Dickerson, recorder; Horace King Beecham, senior warden; William Radcliffe Melville, junior warden; Dennis Ward, sword bearer; John Woodman, standard bearer; Henry Turner, warden; John Porter Ferns, captain of the guard. The commandery had but just thoroughly organized and had entered upon a career of greatest promise, when the fire of 1871 burned up its asylum, records and paraphernalia.

HIRAM FRANCIS HOLCOMB, one of the early citizens of Chicago, is the son of Hiram and Marcia Holcomb, of Windsor, Conn., was born December 11, 1834. Until he was fourteen years of age, he attended the public schools of his native town, and then entered the employ of Rogers & Brothers, the original silver-platers of this country, with whom he remained two years. At the expiration of that time, he went to Philadelphia, and was connected with Filley & Mead three years, also with Bailey & Kitchen and Bancroft, Redfield & Rice, of the same line of business, until 1857, when he came to this city. At that time, the only establishment in Chicago engaged in silver-plating was that of L. A. Hamblin, Nos. 47-49 State Street. He was engaged by Mr. Hamblin, and remained with him four years, during which time some of the first burnished work produced in this city was turned out of the establishment. After a short residence in Chippewa Valley, Wis., he returned and entered the employ of Jessup, Kennedy & Co., then occupying quarters at the corner of South Water Street and Fifth Avenue, and, in 1864, began business for himself at No. 160 Clark Street, continuing there until the close of the war. Upon disposing of his business to Jones, Pickand & Co., he was connected with the Chicago Nickel Works until 1882, and, while with them, introduced the art of nickel-plating, and produced the first work made in Chicago. He then organized the Holcomb Manufacturing and Silver Plating Company, and began business at No 211 Randolph Street, moving to his present location in the spring of 1855. Mr. Holcomb was married to Miss Ellen Peterson, of Chicago, December 11, 1861, and has one daughter, Nellie H. In closing this brief sketch, mention should be made of the fact that Mr. Holcomb has always taken a prominent social as well as business position in Chicago; he has been actively and prominently connected with the Masonic and Odd Fellows fraternities for many years, and is to-day an honored and esteemed member of both these orders. He was raised in Garden City Lodge, No. 141, in 1864; two years later was elected its senior warden, and, in 1868, became its W. M., serving as such two years. From 1869 to 1872, he was grand secretary; in 1871, was D. D. G. M., 1st district; and, in 1874, was elected W. M., and served three years. He took the degrees in Washington Chapter, No. 43; is a member of St. Bernard Commandery, also of Oriental Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S.; and, in 1869, was elected and served as M. W. P. M. of Rose Croix Chapter, for three years. In the order of Odd Fellows, he is no less prominent; was made an Odd Fellow in Elizabethport Lodge, No. 116, Elizabeth, N. J., in 1859, and passed the chairs in Old Union, No. 9, of this city. He is now a member of Home Lodge, No. 416, and of Chicago Encampment, No. 10. He has also represented Union and Home lodges in the Grand Lodge of the State for the past ten years, and is one of the charter members of the latter named subordinate lodge.

A. & A. S. R.

Like all contemporaneous history covering the epoch treated of in this volume, the narrative of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite is one of progress and healthy growth. From the report of the Supreme Councils for various years, the following figures are collected; they are insufficient and few, but, during the period of internecine strife, reports appear to have been lacking, or, if they were rendered, were lost amid the bickerings then prevailing. In 1857, Van Rensselaer Grand Lodge of Perfection had sixteen members, and Illinois Council Princes of Jerusalem, Gourgas Chapter of Rose Croix and Occidental Sovereign Consistory, eleven members in each body. In 1858, Van Rensselaer had twenty-eight, Princes of Jerusalem, twenty-three, Rose Croix twenty-two, and the Consistory twenty-three members. In 1860, the Lodge of Perfection and the Consistory reported the same numbers of members, and that no work had been performed by them; the Council reported twenty-four members, no report being made by the Chapter. In 1861, the Grand Lodge had twenty-members, and the Council and Consistory had twenty-four each. In 1862, the Council alone reports twenty-five members, and the Supreme Council report states that "the principal officers and active members of the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Chicago bodies, being engaged in patriotic duties, have made no returns." Subsequent to 1862, no reports of the number of members are promulgated.* The figures given, however, will exhibit that in those years "the day of small things" was at its acme in the Valley of Chicago.

In 1861, the number of active 33° in the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States was increased from nine to thirty-three, and of this number Illinois received three. In this year also originated the schism in the members of the Supreme Council, whereby one Grand East was established at Boston and the other at New York. Of these troubles it is unnecessary to speak, as time has healed the dissensions and obliterated the scars. On November 10, 1866, however, Chicago Lodge of Perfection, was organized under a dispensation from Walter Augustus Stevens, and, subsequently, Chicago Council Princes of Jerusalem, Cœur de Lion Chapter of Rose Croix, and Chicago Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S., were formed. This Consistory was the first in the northern jurisdiction of the United States to fully equip with the regalia of the 32°. Thus there were two Consistories, Chapters, Councils and Grand Lodges of Perfection in the Ancient and Accepted Rite,—until March 23, 1871, when a consolidation was made—Van Rensselaer and Chicago Grand Lodges of Perfection being united under the name of Van Rensselaer; Illinois and Chicago Councils Princes of Jerusalem, being united under the name of Chicago; Gourgas and Cœur de Lion Chapters of Rose Croix de H-R-D-M, being united under the name of Gourgas; and Occidental and Chicago Consistories being united under the name of Oriental.

The new bodies occupied apartments in the old Masonic Temple, on Dearborn Street, until the fire destroyed their regalia and paraphernalia, valued at about $10,000. Immediately after the fire, the various bodies met at the corner of Cottage Grove Avenue and Twenty-third Street, and subsequently in the West Side Masonic Temple.* From the annual report of Deputy Vincent L. Hurlbut the following excerpts are taken:

CHICAGO, Nov. 11, 1871.

To the SUPREME COUNCIL of Sovereign Grand Inspectors-General of the Thirty-third Degree of the A. & A. Rite, Northern Masonic Jurisdiction, U. S. A.

Standing amid the ashes of desolation and the ruins of all the accumulated treasures of the Masonic bodies of this city, with letters, manuscripts, and everything destroyed (except a few copies of the printed proceedings of our Council of Deliberation, herewith submitted as a part of this report) which could aid me in the discharge of the official duty I owe to the Supreme Council, you will generously receive this partial and meager report of the Rite in the District under my jurisdiction. In obedience to the recommendation of the Supreme Council, I have done all in my power to effect a consolidation of the various bodies of the Rite in this District, and am happy to be able to report progress. In this city (Chicago) the effort for consolidation has been crowned with the most gratifying and complete success. In securing this result, we have been zealously assisted by the following illustrious brethren, without whose aid we should have failed: Hosmer A. Johnson, 33°; Henry C. Ranney, 33°; Gilbert R. Smith, 33°; Eugene B. Myers, 33°; Charles H. Brower, 33°; T. T. Gurney, 32°; Gilbert W. Barnard, 32°; J. H. McVicker, 32°; Hiram F. Holcomb, 32°; Fred. A. Wheeler, 32°; R. Cleveland, 32°.

The presiding officers of the four bodies that were originated at the period of the conflict of jurisdiction, appear to have been

Chicago Consistory, No. 1: John D. M. Carr, 1865-70. Chicago Council, No. 1: A. C. Millard, 1865-69; S. A. McWilliams, 1870. Cœur de Lion Chapter: H. C. Berry, 1865-67; J. Ward Ellis, 1868-69; H. F. Holcomb, 1870. Chicago Lodge of Perfection: W. E. Wheeler, 1865-67; Walter A. Stevens, 1868; Henry A. Austin, 1869; Reuben Cleveland, 1870.

The following gives the presiding officers of the other four bodies:

Occidental Consistory: Charles R. Starkweather, 1858-62; Hosmer A. Johnson, 1863-67; Benjamin F. Patrick, 1868; Vincent L. Hurlbut, 1869-70; Henry C. Ranney, 1871. Gourgas Chapter: Charles R. Starkweather, 1858-63; Henry C. Ranney, 1870; H. F. Holcomb, 1871. Van Rensselaer Grand Lodge: C. R. Starkweather, 1858; Hosmer A. Johnson, 1859-61; George W. Deering, 1862-63; Gilbert R. Smith, 1864-70; Gil. W. Barnard, 1871. Illinois Grand Council: C. R. Starkweather, 1858; William M. Mitchell, 1859-67; Charles E. Leonard, 1868; William H. Gale, 1869; Ammi M. Bennett, 1870; James H. Paddock, 1871.

For the relief of Consistory Masons the total amount received was $3,577.13, and was distributed by the following committee: V. L. Hurlbut, 33°; George R. Chittenden, 33°; Eugene B. Myers, 33°; Gilbert R. Smith, 33°; Henry C. Ranney, 33°; Wiley M. Egan, 33°; and James H. Miles, 32°.

THEODORE TUTHILL GURNEY was born in Ogdensburg, N. Y., on September 4, 1820, and received his education at Ferry's Academy of that place. He came West in 1838, and located in

*For these, and numerous other facts, the compiler is indebted to the courtesy of Gil. W. Barnard, 33°.

*In 1871 the Consistory had 482 members, the Chapter 481 and the Council 474.

Sturgis, St. Joseph Co., Mich., and in December, 1848, he joined the Masonic fraternity, as a member of Union Lodge, Union City, Mich. He was also justice of the peace at Constantine, Mich., about 1850. In 1853, he returned to New York; was deputy-collector of customs at Sackett's Harbor, from 1853 to 1856, and then joined Sackett's Chapter about the year 1854. In April, 1856, he came to Chicago and entered the employ of Munger & Armour, elevator and warehouse men, becoming bookkeeper and, subsequently, manager of the firm. Remaining with them five years, he was appointed chief grain inspector in 1861. He held this position for three years and then engaged in the commission business. In 1876, Mr. Gurney was elected supervisor of the West Town, and in May, 1879, to the office he has since held, that of city comptroller. He here joined the Council, Commandery and Consistory, and now belongs to Cleveland Lodge, Washington Chapter, Chicago Council, Apollo Commandery and Oriental Consistory, and received the 33<sup>d</sup>, as an honorary member of the Supreme Council of the N. M. J. of the U. S., in November, 1871. The following are the offices held by this distinguished citizen and Mason in the fraternity: Master of Siloam Lodge, Michigan; Sackett's Harbor Lodge, N. Y., and Cleveland Lodge, Chicago; high priest of Sackett's Harbor Chapter; commander of Apollo Commandery, No. 1; commander-in-chief of Oriental Consistory; Grand Master of Illinois, 1879-80, and grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Illinois, 1875. He was married, in May, 1848, to Miss Eunice Smith of Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., and has the following children—Chester S., a member of St. Bernard Commandery, K. T., of this city, and Theodore E., a minor.

HENRY COLLINGS RANNEY was born in Exeter, England, on July 22, 1831, and received, while a youth, an academic education, and learned the business of a druggist and pharmacist. In 1849, he emigrated to America, first landing in New York. He subsequently went to Cleveland, Ohio, where, in 1850, he entered the employ of Patrick Anderson, an extensive grain and commission merchant. In 1857, Mr. Anderson removed to Chicago, with Mr. Ranney as bookkeeper and confidential manager, which position he held until 1861, at which time he succeeded to the business. On January 1, 1862, he formed a co-partnership, under the firm name of Ranney & Inglis. The business was conducted under this name until January, 1878, since which time Mr. Ranney has continued the business under the firm name of Ranney & Co. Mr. Ranney was a member of the Board of Directors 1866-67, and served as a member of the Committees on Arbitration and Appeals one term each. He is at present a shipping commission merchant and dealer in options on 'Change. He became a Master Mason on November 14, 1853, at which time he was raised in Iris Lodge, No. 229, at Cleveland, Ohio. He was Master of the lodge in 1856 and 1857. On April 6, 1854, he became a Royal Arch Mason and a member of Webb Chapter, Cleveland, and January 3, 1855, became a member of Oriental Commandery, No. 12, of Knights Templar, and was the secretary and recorder respectively of these three organizations during a period of two years. In Chicago, he affiliated with Oriental Lodge, No. 33, and in 1872 became a charter member of St. Andrews Lodge, No. 704, with which he is still affiliated. He has filled every office in this lodge up to, and including, that of Worshipful Master. In 1857, he united with LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, of which he was high priest in 1860. In 1857, he also became a member of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., and was eminent commander thereof in 1861. He severed his connection with this Commandery in 1880, and became a charter member of Chevalier Bayard Commandery, No. 52, and was its recorder for three years. About 1858, he became a member of the Council of Royal and Select Masters, and in 1860, was grand master of the Council. In 1857, he took all the Masonic degrees, up to, and including the 32<sup>d</sup>, of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and in 1866, received the honorary degree of Sovereign Grand Inspector General, the 33<sup>d</sup> and last degree of that rite. Mr. Ranney was grand recorder of the Grand Commandery of Illinois from 1861 to 1864; and grand commander of the Knights Templar in Illinois in 1865. He was also junior grand warden of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar U. S. A., from 1865 to 1868. He was Master of Rose Croix Chapter, A. & A. S. Rite, nine years, and commander-in-chief of Oriental Consistory, S. P. R. S., 32<sup>d</sup>, from 1871 to 1873. He has been an active member of the Episcopal Church since his arrival in Chicago in 1857; was a member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Illinois, and is now a member of Grace Episcopal Church.

VINCENT LOMBARD HURLBUT was born in West Mendon, Monroe Co., N. Y., June 28, 1829, son of Dr. Horatio N. and Sabina (Lombard) Hurlbut. His primary education was obtained at the common schools of his native town. His father removed to Crawford County, Ohio, while he was of an early age, and here he obtained a further education. Shortly afterward the family again removed to Jefferson, Ashtabula Co., Ohio, where he pursued his education as far as the classics. Being then seventeen years of age, he determined upon taking up medical studies, and placed himself under the tutelage of his father and Professor Horace A. Ackley, at the medical college at Cleveland. Here he read and attended lectures during the regular term of 1849 and 1850, and removed with his father to Chicago in July, 1851. He entered Rush Medical College, and attended the classes of 1851-52, graduating therefrom in the latter year. During the same year he commenced practice, and has since continued it with unflagging assiduity, he never having married, but has been, and is, wedded to his profession. In this he has attained great success—the usual reward of persistent study and intelligent practice. He is a member of the American Medical Association, of the State Medical Society, was vice-president of the Cook County Medical Society, and was assistant surgeon of the Woman's Hospital, of the State of Illinois, for a number of years. In another phase of existence, Dr. Hurlbut has attained equal prominence—in his connection with the Masonic fraternity. He was first made a Mason in Wauhansia Lodge in 1860, and the same year became a Royal Arch Companion in Washington Chapter, No. 43. He also became a Knight Templar in Apollo Commandery, No. 1. He took the degrees in the Scottish Rite in Occidental Consistory to the 32<sup>d</sup>, taking the 33<sup>d</sup> in Boston, Mass., in 1864, and in 1868 was made an active member of the Supreme Council for the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States of America. In 1863-64-65, he was commander of Apollo Commandery, Knights Templar, and commander-in-chief of Occidental Sovereign Consistory of Chicago. In 1867, he was grand commander of Illinois, holding the office one year, and was illustrious deputy of Supreme Council for the District of Illinois for years, commencing in 1870. In 1871, at the regular session of the Grand Encampment in Baltimore, he was elected to the office of grand generalissimo. In 1874, at the session in New Orleans, he was elected to the office of deputy grand master, and on August 30, 1877, was elected to the highest office in the gift of the fraternity, being, on that date, elected grand master at the twentieth triennial convocation at Cleveland. But despite his honors and renown, Dr. Hurlbut is unostentatious, and practices that kindly and comprehensive charity that his order teaches, to the alleviation of great suffering and much unhappiness.

JOHN PORTER FERNS — The Committee of Necrology of the Illinois Council of Deliberation of the 32<sup>d</sup>, A. & A. S. R., thus epitomised his Masonic history:

Brother John Porter Ferns was born in Glasgow, Scotland, May 1, 1815. He came to Chicago April 27, 1840. Our deceased brother received the degrees of Ancient Craft Masonry in Patrick and St. Mary Lodge, No. 115, Glasgow, Scotland, February 15, A. D. 1837, and was Master of Glasgow Star Lodge in 1839. At Patrick, Scotland, he passed the Chair, Ark, Marks and Link, and was admitted into the Encampment of Excellent, Super-Excellent, Arch and Royal Masons; also at Patrick, November 11, 1839, he was dubbed a Knight Templar, Knight of Malta, Knight of the Mediterranean Pass, Knight of the Blue, Knight of the Red Cross, and Knight of that most venerable order of Ne Plus Ultra. He was a charter member of LaFayette Lodge, No. 18, A. F. & A. M., the first lodge working under our Grand Lodge in this city. After the dissolution of this lodge, he became a member of H. W. Bigelow Lodge, No. 438, and subsequently of Ashlar Lodge, No. 308, and remained a member until his death. He was elected grand tiler of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, in October, 1866, which office he held ever since. Brother Ferns was also a member of Corinthian Chapter No. 69, R. A. M., St. Bernard Commandery, No. 35, K. T., and Siloam Council, No. 53, R. & S. M. In the Grand Commandery of Illinois he held the office of grand captain of the guard. Was grand steward of the M. E. Grand Chapter and of the Grand Council. Our deceased brother was the respected tiler of a number of constituent lodges, holding their meetings in this and other buildings in the city, but he has been called from his varied labors on earth to everlasting refreshment in the Grand Lodge above. Brother Ferns died March 5, 1884, and was buried by Ashlar Lodge, No. 308, M. W. Brother D. M. Browning, grand master, F. & A. M., State of Illinois, officiating, assisted by the members of a number of Craft Lodges, escorted by St. Bernard and Apollo commanderies, and Oriental Consistory of the A. A. Rite." In his childhood Brother Ferns was fond of a sailor's life, and at an early age he embarked as a cabin-boy, and made the voyage to the West Indies. He followed the life of a sailor until he was twenty-five, when he came to New York, and from thence came to Chicago. His old love for the water then asserted itself, and he became engaged on the lakes, and soon had command of a vessel. He stayed in this position for twenty years, and then accepted a position in J. V. Germain's warehouse. He was a member of the old Volunteer Fire Department, and was nearly the oldest voter in the precinct of the Eighteenth Ward, where he lived. In 1883, he was the victim of a night attack, when he was knocked down and robbed and the injuries received then superinduced his death. The Masonic ceremonies at his funeral were conducted by G. M. Daniel

M. Browning, Rev. H. M. Perry, as grand orator, and DeWitt C. Cregier, as acting grand marshal. Brother Ferns was also a member of St. Andrew's Society.

RITE OF MEMPHIS.

In 1868, the following bodies were instituted :

ELUSINIAN CHAPTER, No. 8. A. & P. RITE OF MEMPHIS.—D. A. Cashman, M.W.; G. W. Barnard, S.K.W.; H. F. Holcomb, J.K.W.; W. N. Sheridan, K. orator; W. J. Washburn, K. conductor; William Lapham, K. treasurer; C. H. Smith, K. archivist; Robert Hall, K. organist; G. R. McClellan, K. guard of the tower; G. E. Ahearn, K. captain of the guard; J. N. Bowers, K. sentinel.

TRISMEGISTIAN SENATE, No. 4. A. & P. RITE OF MEMPHIS.—G. W. Barnard, S.G.C.; J. I. Spafford, S.K.W.; Robert Hall, J.K.W.; William Lapham, K. of finance; T. W. Wilmarth, recorder; H. Guerdon, orator; Geo. R. McClellan, marshal; J. E. Pettibone, archivist.

In 1869, H. F. Holcomb was M.W. of Elusinian Chapter, and A. D. Bascomb, S.G.C. of Trismegistian Senate.

About June 1, 1869, both bodies were closed.

ADOPTIVE MASONRY.

MIRIAM CHAPTER, No. 1, O. E. S., was chartered March 1, 1869, being the first chartered in the State. It had, however, worked under the name of Miriam Family* for some time antecedent to that date. The charter members were—Mrs. Joseph Butler, Mrs. A. B. Height, Mrs. Sarah Tarrant, Mrs. Charles T. Wilt, Mrs. John C. Howell, Mrs. A. Wright, Mrs. Joseph Gallagher, Mrs. Mary Jane Ogden and Dr. S. A. McWilliams. The first officers were Mrs. Elizabeth Butler, W.M.; Dr. S. A. McWilliams, W. P.; Mrs. Charles T. Wilt, A.M. Mrs. Butler was W.M. during 1869-70, and was succeeded by Mrs. L. V. Crocker in 1871. The chapter was burned out by the fire of 1871.

* To Alice L. Foksett the compiler is indebted for these data.

ODD FELLOWS.

LODGES.

MEETING OF GRAND LODGE.—The Grand Lodge of the United States met at Chicago, at 8:30 a. m., on September 18, 1871, at Excelsior Hall, and, at 10 a. m., formed in procession, and marched to the Sherman House, where the Grand Lodge was formed in order by Grand Marshal Stuart W. Cayce, and thence escorted to the Metropolitan Hall, where the session was held. John G. Rogers, P.G.M. and P.G.R., on behalf of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, delivered the address of welcome, and Fred. D. Stuart, Most Worthy Grand Sire, responded. On September 19, there was a public procession, wherein about five thousand Odd Fellows, in regalia, marched in the ranks.

EXCELSIOR LODGE, No. 22.—The following were presiding officers of this lodge for the years mentioned: 1858, James Finerty, C. L. Jenks; 1859, C. L. Jenks, John G. Rogers; 1860, J. O. Perry, J. Ward Ellis; 1861, H. D. French, D. A. Foot; 1862, Thomas Chalmers, William B. H. Snow; 1863, Ives Scoville, J. W. Secor; 1864, S. B. Walker, J. L. Gerber; 1865, E. L. Comley, James Kirkley; 1866, Thomas Carbine, J. A. Bartlett; 1867, R. H. Andrews, Robert Hunter; 1868, George W. Carson, George B. Parkins; 1869, F. W. Phillips, J. H. Young; 1870, W. C. Wilson, C. E. Minor; 1871, Lewis Dodge, J. H. Kellogg.

FORT DEARBORN LODGE, No. 214.—From 1858 to 1871, the membership of this lodge increased from ninety-one to one hundred and sixty-two. The presiding officers during those years were as follows: 1858, J. K. Thompson, Isaac Preston; 1859, James A. Collins, Frank J. Ryan; 1860, George Sitts, M. C. Eames; 1861, B. F. Sitts, Elijah Shaw; 1862, Andrew G. Bowker; 1863, William Sharp, Alexander Hepburn; 1864, Walter Tett, F. H. Sleeper; 1865, William Smale, John Wilson; 1866, R. H. Jordan, John Campbell; 1867, Dr T. D. Fitch, Andrew T. Sherman; 1868, Oliver E. Eames, W. L. Tidd; 1869, E. B. Sherman, J. K. Thompson; 1870, F. W. Mattern, Henry H. Coats; 1871, W. H. Crocker, J. W. Newbern.

GOETHE LODGE, No. 329.—This is a German lodge, and was instituted on March 23, 1866. Since it was organized it has had a membership of nearly two hundred, and the following have been its officers: J. Buehler, A. Böttiger, C. Bachmann, H. H. Besenberg, I. Degen, A. Dethmann, F. Fischer, H. Frahm, W. Gastfield, A. Hartmeyer, H. C. W. Holzapfel, C. Halix, E. Heiland, M. Kuhn, J. Lochner, C. Meister, C. Neumeister, J. Ott, W. Ohlmeyer, J. Pagus, J. H. Rapp, L. Schultz, J. M. Schroeder, A. Schippel, L. Schwank, W. M. Stanley, C. H. Sigmund, P. T. Tiedermann and E. Wilken.

RAINBOW LODGE, No. 400, was instituted October 2, 1869, with twenty-four charter members. It occupies a hall at No. 679 West Lake Street. The following were presiding officers from its institution down to the close of 1871: William Fielding, Thomas D. Clancy, Dr. J. R. Wilkins and John Niven.

HOME LODGE, No. 416, was formed by forty members of Union Lodge, No. 9, who desired the greater dissemination of the principles of the Order. The lodge was instituted on March 7, 1870, with the following officers: C. W. Lounsbury, noble grand; William Williams, vice-grand; A. L. Flood, recording secretary; W. A. Hendrie, permanent secretary; W. W. Bates, treasurer; H. F. Holcomb, C. J. Burroughs, E. Jones, H. C. Parsons and W. M. Graham, trustees. The lodge continued to prosper until the great fire, when its entire property was destroyed, and thirty-four of its one hundred members sustained a loss of everything they possessed. Not daunted by this calamity, before the ashes of its records and paraphernalia were yet cold, the lodge was opened in regular form on the evening of October 14, in the hall of Fort Dearborn Lodge, Thomas Öckerby, P. G., in the chair. Immediate steps were taken for the relief of the sufferers by the fire.

Of the following named lodges, the dates of institution are the only facts which could be ascertained, the secretaries having failed to furnish more particular information concerning them:

NORTH CHICAGO LODGE, No. 330, German, instituted April 19, 1866.

HOFFUNG LODGE, No. 353, German, instituted September 6, 1867.

NORTHWESTERN LODGE, No. 388, German, instituted May 7, 1869.

GARDEN CITY LODGE, No. 389, German, instituted May 8, 1869.

HUTTEN LODGE, No. 398, German, instituted July 3, 1869.

ECLIPSE LODGE, No. 404, instituted September 1, 1869.

LILY OF THE WEST LODGE, No. 407, German, instituted September, 1869.

DOUGLAS LODGE, No. 432, German, instituted August 4, 1870.

LINCOLN PARK LODGE, No. 437, German, instituted October, 1870.

TEMPLAR LODGE, No. 440. No date of institution is given in report; probably in winter of 1870.

ELLIS LODGE, No. 447, instituted February 15, 1871.

SYRIA LODGE, No. 451, German, instituted March 16, 1871.

ENCAMPMENTS.

The first dispensation for an encampment was granted to B. W. Thomas, Anthony Johnston, A. D. Boyce, Sylvester Marsh, N. Sherman, Jr., P. D. Cummings and S. N. Davis, to form Illinois Encampment, No. 3. The dispensation was issued at the City of Baltimore, on December 26, 1844.

In 1871, the following encampments were in successful operation: Chicago, No. 10; Germania, No. 40; Humboldt, No. 101; Adriel, No. 106; Excelsior, No. 108; Herman, No. 110; and Teutonia, No. 114.

ORDER OF REBEKAH.

This ally of Odd Fellowship, composed of ladies, had four lodges in the city at the close of the year 1871, as follows :

- IVY LODGE, No. 14, instituted April 9, 1870.
  - EVERGREEN LODGE, No. 24, instituted July 5, 1870.
  - GERMANIA LODGE, No. 45, instituted March 28, 1871.
  - THUSNELDA LODGE, No. 43, instituted April 13, 1871.
- The two last named lodges are German.

RELIEF MEASURES.

The amount of money received and retained by the Chicago Relief Committee of the I.O.O.F., consisting of J. Ward Ellis, John G. Rogers and E. B. Sherman, was $107,025.84, and was contributed from the following localities :

Alabama.....	$ 10 00	Indiana.....	$4,868 39
Arkansas.....	202 00	Iowa.....	3,288 13
California.....	14,469 90	Kansas.....	1,163 50
Colorado.....	175 00	Kentucky.....	835 88
Connecticut.....	2,341 36	Louisiana.....	200 00
Delaware.....	1,196 25	Lower Provinces of
District of Columbia	885 00	British North
Georgia.....	252 00	America.....	155 36
Illinois.....	17,882 80	Maine.....	1,050 00

Maryland.....	$1,842 50	Pennsylvania.....	$23,495 30
Massachusetts.....	3,290 48	Rhode Island.....	1,405 00
Michigan.....	196 50	South Carolina.....	10 00
Minnesota.....	611 15	Tennessee.....	954 20
Missouri.....	2,405 00	Texas.....	27 50
Nebraska.....	105 00	Vermont.....	27 50
New Hampshire.....	700 00	Virginia.....	494 65
New Jersey.....	2,131 50	West Virginia.....	1,018 75
New York.....	10,625 71	Wisconsin.....	306 00
Nevada.....	1,625 75	Europe.....	238 41
North Carolina.....	50 00	New Mexico.....	90 00
Ohio.....	2,333 00	Unknown.....	56 00
Ontario.....	1,965 96
Oregon.....	1,781 91	Total.....	$107,025 84

There were also cash donations received by the committee, and returned to the donors, amounting to $6,644.79. J. C. Smith, G. M., then designated a committee to audit the accounts of the Relief Committee. The Auditing Committee assembled, and having examined the vouchers, found that the

Total receipts were.....	$123,724 53
Total disbursements were.....	113,554 39

And the balance was.....$10,170 14 which was subsequently transferred as a special relief fund, and the committee relieved from the onerous duties it had so diligently and conscientiously performed.

BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.—The organization and establishment of this order in this city dates from May 4, 1869, when Welcome Lodge, No. 1, was instituted.

The following table gives the lodges, the dates of institution, and their places of meeting at the time of the fire:

Welcome, No. 1, May 4, 1869, Grand Lodge Hall, Nos. 151-153 Monroe Street; Humboldt, No. 2, October 25, 1869, northeast corner of Clark and Michigan streets; Excelsior, No. 3, November 8, 1869, No. 54 West Lake Street; Board of Trade, No. 4, November 30, 1869, Grand Lodge Hall; Cosmopolitan, No. 6, February 23, 1870, Grand Lodge Hall; Hoffnung (Hope), No. 7, January 14, 1870, corner of Mitchell and Union streets; Lake View, No. 8, March 26, 1870, Lake View; Ivanhoe, No. 9, June 10, 1870, Grand Lodge Hall; Crusader, No. 11, July 14, 1870, corner of Halsted and Madison streets; Tancred, No. 12, July 9, 1870, Nos. 151-153 Monroe; DeMolay, No. 13, August 2, 1870, corner Twenty-seventh Street and Cottage Grove Avenue; Schiller, No. 15, October 1, 1870, southwest corner Sedgwick and Sigel streets; Alenannia, No. 16, February 4, 1871, Lake View; Dionysius, No. 20, May 25, 1871, northwest corner of LaSalle and Adams streets; St. John, No. 21, May 18, 1871, No. 55 North Clark Street.

The amount of money received and disbursed on account of relief for the Knights of Pythias is not published in the reports of the fraternity; but there is a statement that such accounts were audited by the Grand Lodge and found correct, and that the residue was to be devoted to the erection of a hall, from the rental of which a permanent income for charitable purposes and the prosperity of the order might be derived.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF SONS OF MALTA.—This order—whose mention recalls imaginings of initiations wherein the candidate was divested of all but breath, and not much left of that, and then shot through pneumatic tubes, sizzled on gridirons, boiled in bath-tubs, and generally flayed, excoriated and decorticated—was perhaps the most unselfishly charitable order that ever existed. As to its ritual and work, that was the business of those who belonged to it; but its generosity was a by-word. The widows and orphans whose hearts have been gladdened by unknown beneficiaries, the distress that has been quietly and unostentatiously alleviated, have been the occasion of many heartfelt prayers for the benefactors, who were simply members of the Sons of Malta. The organization was established in Chicago on September 1, 1856, and the hall in which the lodge met was at the corner of State and Washington streets. In 1857, the number of members was about two hundred, and three thousand dollars were expended for the benefit of persons not connected with the association.

In 1858, the officers of Palestine Lodge were J. J. Clarkson, grand commander; D. W. Boss, vice-grand commander; J. H. Williams, grand chancellor; E. W. Spear, secretary; C. P. Bradley, treasurer. In 1859, the officers were H. D. Laffin, grand commander; A. M. Hyde, vice-grand commander; J. G. Day, grand chancellor; J. H. Kelly, grand conductor; L. Laffin, secretary, and C. H. Miller, treasurer. The lodge then met at the corner of South Water and Wells streets.

In May, 1859, the Grand Commandery met at Chicago, and elected the following officers: Isaiah H. Williams, supreme grand commander; Daniel W. Boss, supreme vice-grand commander; Philip A. Hoyle, lord high chancellor; William W. Peck, supreme grand secretary; Samuel B. H. Higgins, supreme grand recorder; Cyrus P. Bradley, supreme grand treasurer; Howard Jenks, supreme grand conductor; James W. Musson, supreme grand sergeant; J. A. Hahn, supreme grand surgeon; J. M. Mozart, supreme grand musician; George W. Gage, supreme grand almoner; Charles W. Barker, grand master of the horse; Joshua L. Marsh, grand admiral; Henry G. Williams, grand tyler; James J. Clarkson, grand lecturer; David Stuart, judge advocate.

The Grand Commandery was located at Chicago, and its jurisdiction extended over Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Nebraska. The organization was only maintained for a short time, and gradually fell to pieces.

UNITED ORDER OF RED MEN.—This organization is also termed the Independent Order of Red Men, and had the following lodges meeting in this city at the time of the fire:

Grand Tribe met at Red Men's Hall, No. 54 West Lake Street; Tecumseh Tribe, No. 109, met corner of North Avenue and Larabee Street; Calumet Tribe, No. 110, met at No. 630 South Canal Street; Chippewa Tribe, No. 127, met at No. 54 West Lake Street; Pocahontas Tribe, No. 138, met at No. 54 West Lake Street.

I. O. of G. T.—The following lodges were holding meetings in this city during the year 1871:

Union Degree Temple, No. 1, at No. 168 South Clark Street; Rolling Mill Degree Temple, on the North Branch; Star of Hope Lodge, No. 15, at Caledonian Hall; Houston Lodge, No. 32, at the corner of Halsted and Randolph streets; Star in the North Lodge, No. 100, at Nos. 37-39 Michigan Street; Washingtonian Lodge, No. 188, at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Twenty-second Street; Cleveland Lodge, No. 404, at Bridgeport; Warren Lodge, No. 496, at corner of Randolph and Halsted streets; Home Lodge, No. 607, at No. 572 West Madison Street; Lincoln Lodge, No. 618, at No. 17 Milwaukee Avenue; Truesdell Lodge, at Masonic Hall, corner of Centre and Sedgwick streets; Aqua Pura Lodge, No. 670, at Methodist Mission Church; Rolling Mill Lodge, No. 919, near Ward's Rolling Mill; Life Boat Lodge, No. 1000, at No. 168 South Clark Street.

TEMPLES OF HONOR.—Of these, two were extant in 1871. Radiant Temple met at No. 168 South Clark Street and Metropolitan Temple met at McCormick's Building, southeast corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets.

SONS OF TEMPERANCE.—The following bodies belonging to this order were holding sessions during the year 1871:

Garden City Division, No. 422,—organized August 4, 1854—met at corner of Clinton and West Randolph streets; Tabernacle Division, No. 597, met at Washingtonian Home; Excelsior Division, No. 606, met at southwest corner of State and Twenty-third streets; B. S. Goodhue Division, No. 697, met at the corner of Fulton and Davis streets; Sheet Anchor Division, No. 842, met at corner of Michigan and North Market streets; Hyde Park Division, No. 843, met at the Presbyterian Church, corner of Oak Street and Hyde Park Avenue; Crystal Wave Division, No. 911, met at southwest corner Randolph and Halsted streets.

AMERICAN PROTESTANT ASSOCIATION.—In 1864, the following lodges met in this city:

Washington, No. 1; Lincoln, No. 2; Luther, No. 3; Liberty, No. 4; Harmony, No. 5; and in 1870 the Grand Lodge appears to have been located here. In 1871, but three lodges are designated as meeting here: Washington, No. 1; Harmony, No. 5, both convening at American Protestant Association Hall, corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets; and Star of the West, No. 3, convening at the northeast corner of Randolph and Clinton streets.

U. D. O. HARUGARI.—In 1864, the following lodges met in Chicago:

Cherusker, No. 45, at Teutonia Hall; Teutonia, No. 47, at Teutonia Hall; Germania, No. 56, at Druid's Hall; and, in 1865, Harmonia, No. 61, met at Nibbe's Hall, corner of Vedder and Pleasant streets. In 1866, the Walhalla Mannie, or Walhalla Encampment, No. 9, met at Odd Fellow's Hall. In 1871, the following lodges, in addition to those specified, were holding sessions: Helvetia, No. 133, at Helvetia Hall, No. 630 South Canal Street; Chicago, No. 153, at Harugari Hall, No. 46 South Clark Street; Columbia, No. 178, at the corner of Randolph and Clinton streets; Beckman, No. 188, at Harugari Hall on Archer Avenue; William Tell, No. 194, at Harugari Hall, South Clark Street.

STRONG BAND.—During the War was instituted a loyal and patriotic Union Association, in which were united Republicans and Democrats, without distinction of party. The only condition of membership was "loyalty to the government of the time being, and union against internal traitors and external foes." The object sought was a union of hearts, and a recognition of each other by military signs. Every separate local association was called an Encampment and the members were Comrades-at-arms. It was not a secret society, only so far as to the signs of recognition. The headquarters of this association were in McCormick's Building, corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets. The following were the permanent officers:

John Wilson, commander-in-chief, Chicago; Edward A. Guilbert, major-general, Iowa, Dubuque; Rufus B. Clarke, major-general, Wisconsin, Racine; Charles E. Blumenthal, major-general, New York, New York; John Trimble, Jr., general secretary, Chicago; John C. W. Bailey, president Board of Control, Chicago; J. Asa Kennicot, secretary Board of Control, Chicago; Cyrus J. Ward, treasurer Board of Control, Chicago; Robert Morris, L.L.D., aide-de-camp to General Wilson, and traveling agent of Board of Control. In 1864, the Board of Control consisted of Peter Daggv, commander-in-chief and president, Chicago; Winston P. Noble, vice-president, Indianapolis; A. J. Galloway, treasurer, Chicago; S. K. Reed, secretary, Chicago. Executive Committee comprised the president, secretary, and L. L. Bond, J. C. W. Bailey, and C. J. Ward. City Camp officers: Captain, John W. Dean; First Lieutenant, E. T. Orme; Second Lieutenant, T. W. Fay; Third Lieutenant, G. H. Turner.

ORDER OF UNITED AMERICANS.—Of this organization, two chapters existed in Chicago, and were extant about 1855-56—Washington Chapter, No. 1, of which Charles Harpel was grand master, and Bunker Hill Chapter, No. 2, of which David M. Ford was grand master.

ANCIENT ORDER OF GOOD FELLOWS.—Two lodges of this order existed in Chicago—Germania, which met at No. 376 West Twelfth Street, and Washington, which met at No. 54 West Lake Street.

U. A. O. D.—The following Groves, or Heins, met in the old Board of Trade rooms, corner of South Water and Wells streets, in 1871:

Schiller, No. 4; Columbia, No. 5; Goethe, No. 9; Humboldt, No. 12; Garden City, No. 13; Concordia, No. 15; Uhland, No. 16; and West Chicago, No. 18, met in Buehler's Hall, No. 358 Milwaukee Avenue. Harmony, No. 20, met at No. 376 West Twelfth Street; North Chicago, No. 23, on North Side; and Union, No. 24, at the corner of Union and Mitchell streets. Apollo Grand Chapter, No. 1, met in old Board of Trade rooms.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF CHALDEANS.—This order appears to have been introduced to Chicago about 1858, Myron Lodge, No. 1, being the first instituted, at Apollo Hall, corner of Lake and South Water streets.

In 1871, the following lodges met: Myron, No. 1; Aurora, No. 2; Thusnela, No. 3; Achmet, No. 4; Modera, No. 5; Kabbala, No. 6; Chaldea, No. 7; and Algebra Degree Lodge. The Gegenseitig Unterstuetzungs Gesellschaft, A.U.O.C., also met in 1871.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF SONS OF HERMANN.—Of this organization, the following bodies met in Chicago, in 1871:

Grand Lodge, No. 1, of Chicago, at Nos. 16-18 LaSalle Street. Chicago Lodge, No. 1; Thomas Paine, No. 2; Freie Muenner Lodge, No. 3; Sigel, No. 4; Washington, No. 5, all met at 16-18 LaSalle Street. Cottage Hill Lodge, No. 6, met at Cottage Hill. Schiller Lodge, No. 7, met at Nos. 16-18 LaSalle Street; Alexander, No. 8, on Blue Island Avenue; Lincoln, No. 10, Nibbe's Hall; Koerner, No. 11, Buehler's Hall; Germania, No. 12, Buehler's Hall; Eintracht, No. 13, corner of Wentworth and Archer avenues; Encampment, S. of H., Nos. 16-18 LaSalle Street.

LABOR SOCIETIES.—The following are mentioned as being possessed of active membership in 1871:

Bricklayers' Protective Union, Candy-makers' Union, Chicago Iron Moulders' Union, Chicago Steam Boiler Makers' Protective Benevolent Society, Chicago Typographical Union, No. 16, Cigar Makers' Protective Union of Chicago Carriers' Union, Firemen's Union, No. 16, Journeymen Stone-cutters' Association of Chicago, Tailors' Fraternal Union of Chicago, United Association of Marble-cutters.

THE CHICAGO MUTUAL IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION was organized on November 30, 1855, at No. 170 South Clark Street, with forty-three members.

Its officers were—H. M. McCann, president; F. A. Meredith, vice-president; George Gurney, treasurer; L. F. Hubbard, secretary; S. M. Kennedy and Charles E. Freeman, tellers.

THE EARLY CLOSING ASSOCIATION was organized on December 8, 1855, with one hundred and fifty members. Its place of meeting was Sawyer's Seminary, on Clark Street, and its officers were J. P. Samuels, president; J. B. Sutton, vice-president; and A. G. Inness, secretary.

GERMAN SOCIETIES.—As early as 1857, the following societies with German membership existed:

Mænnergessang Verein, which society also maintained a German Theater; Freie Sængerbund; Social Demokrat Turnverein; Wagner Verein (Coachmakers' Association); Schreiner Verein (Carpenters' Association); Schneider Verein (Tailors' Association); Junge Mænnen; Verbruederung, A. R. O. No. 2; Association for Arts and Sciences; Chicago Lodge, No. 27, D. O. D. H. S.; Chicago Arbeiter Verein, organized November 22, 1857; German Inmigrant Society, organized 1854, and which is still in existence. In 1871, the following were specified in the Directory: Chicago Turn Gemeinde, German House Association of Chicago, Germania Braederbund, Germania Mænncheror, Gesangverein Orpheus, Northwest Chicago Arbeiter Unterstuetzungs Verein, No. 4, Social Arbeiter Verein of the West Side.

SUNDRY SOCIETIES.—Among these may be cited

The Chicago Chess Club, Chicago Library Association, Chicago Photographic Association, Douglas Monument Association, Franklin Society, Hand-in-Hand Mutual Benefit Society, Pork Packers' Association, Sharpshooters' Association, Prairie Shooting Club; Svea Society, of Chicago, organized in 1857; Slovanska Lipa Benevolent Society, organized in 1863; Logicians' Literary Society; Societ  Francaise de Bienfaisance de l' Illinois; Societ  Francaise de Secours Mutual; Total Abstinence and Benevolent Society of Father Matthew, organized February 5, 1865; Holland and Belgian Association; Norwegian Literary Society Nord, organized July 15, 1860; Seaman's Mutual Benevolent Society, organized September 10, 1860, incorporated February 22, 1861. United Sons of Erin Benevolent Society, organized in 1860, incorporated in 1863, and of which John Comiskey was president; Patrick Rafferty, first vice-president; James Moran second vice-president; James McGrath, secretary; M. D. O'Donohue, assistant secretary; L. H. O'Connor, corresponding secretary; Thomas McEnery, treasurer. The Fenian Brotherhood; St. Michael's Benevolent Society, organized in 1864, connected with St. Michael's Church; St. Patrick's Benevolent Society, connected with St. Patrick's Church; St. Vincent's House of Providence, conducted by the Sisters of Charity, No. 301 Huron Street; and the Union Benevolent Society of Italians.

THE ST. GEORGE'S BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The St. George's Benevolent Association, of Chicago, was organized in February, 1860. The main objects of the Association were to give advice to English immigrants; to provide for the social intercourse and mutual improvement of its members; to visit the sick, bury the dead, assist widows and orphans of deceased members; and in its discretion to grant relief to any person of English parentage, not members of the Association. The membership was confined to Englishmen and the sons of Englishmen. The term Englishman was construed to mean a man born of English parents, or in any part of Great Britain south of the Tweed.

Their first annual festival was held on St. George's day, April 23, 1860, and the first officers were Francis Hudson, president; William Holdsworth, first vice-president; William Baragwanath, second vice-president; James Turner, treasurer; Elias Cooke and T. E. Poulsen, secretaries.

The second festival was advertised to take place on St. George's day, 1861. It was at the breaking out of the Civil War, and the city was ablaze with excitement. Owing to these circumstances, the festival was postponed until the 1st of May, and the proceeds were appropriated to the fund which was then being raised for the benefit of families of volunteers. The following persons have been presidents of the Association:

1860, Francis Hudson; 1861, William Wayman; 1862, William Baragwanath; 1863, William Holdsmith; 1864, William Baragwanath; 1865, William Wayman; 1866-68, Alfred Booth; 1869, J. C. W. Bailey, 1870-71, James John.

Other prominent members, during this period, were Rev. G. C. Street, Elias Cooke, Dr. William B. Slayton, William P. Chadwick and Edwin Walker.

THE ILLINOIS ST. ANDREW'S SOCIETY.—The early

Scottish residents of Chicago were among the first to form a society commemorative of their native land. A call to meet and celebrate the anniversary of St. Andrew, in 1845, was heartily responded to by the resident Scotchmen of Chicago. Among those who attended this first meeting, which was held at the Lake House, were Captain, afterward General, George B. McClellan, then the engineer in charge of the harbor works, and General J. A. McDougal. The result of this meeting was, that the Illinois St. Andrew's Society was organized; and ever since that date the members and friends have held an annual festival on St. Andrew's day. They commenced with some twenty-four members in 1846, and in 1871 the membership was about three hundred. In 1853, a charter was obtained from the Legislature of Illinois, which enabled the Society to greatly enlarge its means for doing good. In 1858, it purchased ground in Rosehill Cemetery, and expended a large amount of money in curbing and ornamenting it. This is set apart for the burial-place of poor and friendless Scots.

Among those who have been noted especially for their activity in promoting the objects of the Society, may be mentioned George Anderson, Patrick Ballingall, Alexander Brand, Daniel E. and John S. Ross, John H. Kedzie, John Stewart, William M. Dale, Robert Hervey, George Kennedy, Hugh Ritchie, John Rankin and General John McArthur.

Of the original members who celebrated the anniversary of 1846, George Anderson is the only one now (1885) living.

The following named gentlemen were presidents of the Society for the years embraced in this volume of the History:

1858, Robert Hervey; 1859, Andrew Harvie; 1860, John R. Valentine; 1861, Dugald Stewart; 1862, Robert Hervey; 1863, General Daniel Cameron; 1864, William James; 1865, Robert Hervey; 1866, William Stewart; 1867, Hugh Macalister; 1868, Dr. John Macalister; 1869, Robert Hervey; 1870-71, John McArthur.

ST. PATRICK'S SOCIETY.—This association was first formally organized in 1865, by a number of the leading representative Irish-American citizens of Chicago. The Society celebrated St. Patrick's day by a grand banquet, at the Tremont House, Monday evening, March 20, the anniversary that year having fallen on the Friday previous. The officers of the Society the first year were as follows:

William J. Onahan, president; Charles McDonnell, vice-president; James P. Byrne, secretary; Edward Hayden, treasurer. The succeeding years, the presidents following Mr Onahan were—1866-67, James W. Sheahan; 1867-68, Roger J. Brass; 1868-69, John J. W. O'Donoghue; 1870-71, Bernard G. Caulfield.

During these years, the Society took a leading part in all affairs of interest, in which the Irish-American portion of the community were especially concerned. The project of a Hibernian bank first had its origin in the Society, and the principal members became shareholders in the institution bearing that name, which has since continued in successful operation. The most important, and certainly the most useful, work in which the Society engaged, was the effort to promote Irish colonization.

The St. Patrick's Society maintained its organization intact up to the period of the fire of 1871, from which time it was allowed to lapse for several years.

THE GERMAN SOCIETY.—This Society was established in 1854, and was then known as the Society for the Protection and Aid of German Immigrants. As that name indicates, the object of the Society was to advise and protect Germans who had come to this country, ignorant of its language and customs. The Society also rendered aid to the sick and needy of that nationality. During the first year, its president was George Bormann; secretary, George Hillgaertner; and the number of members two hundred and fifty. Since that year, the presiding officers have been Albert Borchardt, G. H. Claussenius, Charles Rietz, George Schneider and Adolph Schoeninger.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH.—This society was organized, during the year 1843 in the city of New York, and has grown into an organization numbering its lodges and members in every important city and town in the United States, and, of late, also in Germany. The directing and legislative power is vested in the Constitutional Grand Lodge, which meets once in five years, and the several District Grand Lodges, which meet annually. This society has upward of three hundred and sixty lodges, with a membership exceeding twenty-five thousand, and is divided into eight Districts, seven of which embrace the entire territory of the United States.

District No. 6, with its head-center at Chicago, embraces the States of Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and Kansas. Its Grand Lodge was instituted on September 20, 1868, at which date it consisted of eight lodges and a membership of five hundred and eighty-four, while at present the District numbers forty-two lodges and two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven contributing members.

The object of the society is expressed in the preamble to the constitution of the order, in the following language:

"The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has taken upon itself the mission of uniting Israelites in the work of promoting their highest interests and those of humanity; of developing, elevating, and defending the mental and moral character of our race; of inculcating the purest science and art; alleviating the wants of the poor and needy; visiting and attending the sick; coming to the rescue of victims of persecution; providing for, protecting and assisting the widow and orphan on the broadest principles of humanity."

Imbued with these principles, the B'nai B'rith pursue their labor of love without ostentation or display, and crown their secret work by the erection of proud and lasting monuments. With a view of systematizing charity, District Grand Lodge, No. 6, in 1870, enacted an endowment law, by the provisions of which, at the death of a brother, every member, without distinction as to age or condition, pays fifty cents into the exchequer of the Grand Lodge, and the widow or the children of the deceased receive an endowment of $1,000. The surplus collection is paid into the sinking fund. Since the adoption of this measure, widows and orphans have been endowed in one hundred and ninety-four cases. This city has eleven lodges and a membership of one thousand and eighty-eight.

CHICAGO RELIEF AND AID SOCIETY.—In February, 1857, this Society was incorporated by Edwin C. Larned, Mark Skinner, Edward I. Tinkham, Joseph D. Webster, Joseph T. Ryerson, Isaac N. Arnold, Norman B. Judd, John H. Dunham, A. H. Mueller, Samuel S. Greeley, B. F. Cook, N. S. Davis, George W. Dole, George M. Higginson, John H. Kinzie, John Woodbridge, Jr., Erastus S. Williams, Philo Carpenter, George W. Gage, S. S. Hayes, Henry Farnham, William H. Brown, Philip J. Wardner and others. In the autumn of 1857, an organization was effected, a board of management was elected, and the constitution, general rules and by-laws were adopted. At first, voluntary visitors were engaged to examine into the wants and worthiness of applicants, but this was soon found to be an unreliable method, and paid visitors were employed by the Society. It also had its general superintendent, and persons who were employed to take charge of its wood-yard and lodging-house.

TRINITY EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Although the Society was incorporated in 1857, it was one of several organizations engaged in the same work, and consequently its activities were not marked until a consolidation of the different associations was effected under the old name. O. C. Gibbs was the first superintendent, and so acted up to the time of the fire. In November, 1867, a call was issued by Wirt Dexter, president of the Christian Union, J. L. Reynolds, president of the Citizens' Relief, and D. L. Moody, president of the Young Men's Christian Association, for a meeting to be held at the Tremont House for the purpose of consolidating with the Chicago Relief and Aid Society and organizing for general work. The Society was to be an independent organization, disconnected from all sectarian or religious work. At that time E. C. Larned was president of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, but from 1871 date the only records now in existence.

As giving an idea of the different classes of men who then united to work for the general relief of the needy, the following names are given of those who formed themselves into the reorganized society:

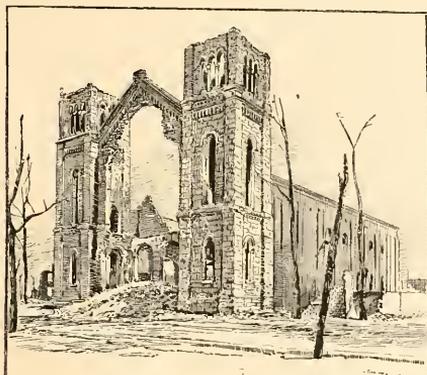

Martin R. M. Wallace, Wirt Dexter, D. L. Moody, E. C. Larned, Rev. Clinton Locke, Rev. J. H. Rylance, Henry Fuller, John V. Farwell, Henry W. King, Julius Kosenthal, George E. Purington, O. H. Horton, J. W. Nealy, Joseph T. Ryerson, Samuel S. Greeley, John C. Haines, Elias Greenebaum, Murry Nelson, Samuel A. Kean, W. E. Doggett, Gilbert Hubbard, J. McGregor Adams, S. H. Gray, Rev. J. M. Humphrey, Rev. Robert Laird Collier, John K. Stearns, O. C. Gibbs, Daniel Shepard, F. M. Cokwell, C. M. Goodsell, Rev. Robert Collyer, T. M. Avery, C. H. S. Winter, Guy C. Sampson, Rev. William H. Ryder, Rev. David Swing, Rev. R. M. Harfield, N. K. Fairbank, H. A. Johnson, T. W. Harvey, George M. Pallman, John Mason Loomis, E. B. McCagg, R. B. Mason, N. S. Bouton, William H. Bradley, O. W. Potter, R. T. Crane, A. A. Sprague, and D. V. Purington.

Wirt Dexter was president from 1868 to 1870, and was succeeded by Henry W. King, who held the position at the time of the great fire. From year to year the city was divided into districts, and persons of well known character and influence were designated and requested to canvass for money subscriptions and other donations. At the time of the great fire the territory of the city had been divided into fourteen districts. In addition, there were soliciting committees of various classes of business men. The Society previous to the fire carried on its work modestly but efficiently, during the latter portion of this period furnishing relief to about two thousand families. The great value of the organization was evinced, however, after the fire, when it distributed the immense fund raised to alleviate the sufferings of the thousands of homeless and disconsolate, then thrown upon our public charity. This period of its most noble work will therefore be treated in the succeeding volume of this History.

CHICAGO HOME FOR THE FRIENDLESS.—Early in 1858, a few noble women of this city, realizing that there was great need of some charitable public institution, which should have for its special object the caring for and providing of suitable homes for friendless children and women, met to devise some plan for accomplishing their purpose. As a result, a public meeting was called. It was so well attended and such substantial encouragement was there given, that, on August 19, a Home was formally opened in a house, temporarily obtained for the purpose, on the West Side. The following February a charter was granted by the Legislature, which provided that Martha A. Wilson, Adaline R. Judd, Julia Dole; Julia A. Warner, Anna M. Gibbs, Margaretta Varian, Jane C. Hoge, Margaret M. Gilman, Lavinia Morris, Emily S. Roy, Adaline C. Morgan, Maria Excern, Minerva Botsford, Emma F. Haines, and their associates, should constitute a body corporate and politic to be known as the Chicago Home for the Friendless. The object of the Home was to be the relieving, aiding, and providing homes for friendless and indigent women and children.

The ladies spared neither time nor effort to secure the necessary funds for building a permanent Home, and saw the accomplishment of their hopes in the donation by Jonathan Burr, in March, 1858, of a lot on Wabash Avenue, between Old and Commerce streets, the only condition being that measures should immediately be taken to erect a suitable building thereon. With such zeal did the ladies enter into the work of collecting the amount necessary for this purpose, that, within a little more than a year, a commodious building was ready for occupancy. It is impossible to give all the names of the donors and amounts of their gifts, since, from the very beginning, generous friends have enabled the board of managers to keep pace with the growth of this city and perform the full measure of their usefulness.

RUINS, TRINITY EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Mention must, however, in justice to the memory of a good and noble man, be made of the gifts of Jonathan Burr, who, in addition to his donation of the lot, gave $5,000 toward erecting the building, and was a constant and generous contributor toward the current expenses. In 1865, Mr. Burr added to his former gifts a lot north of the Home, and $1,000 toward the cost of erecting an addition to that building. Again, during 1867, Mr. Burr came to the assistance of the cause he had so much at heart, and gave, in trust, a lot on Third Avenue near Fourteenth Street, upon which was a building, for the purpose of establishing an Industrial School and general mission to be managed by the Home. There a day and Sabbath school was at once started and largely attended. And when, in 1869, Mr. Burr died, it was discovered that he had, by his will, left to the Home, in trust, two stores on Randolph Street, the net proceeds of which, as well as two-elevenths of his other property should be used in perpetuity for the benefit of the Home and school. In 1864, George Smith donated a lot adjoining the Home; and in 1865, its power for usefulness was greatly enhanced by the munificence of Flavel Moseley, who, in his will, presented it with $10,000.

In 1869, the old building was found to be too small, and so it was thoroughly reconstructed and enlarged. Besides feeding, clothing and providing homes for the women and children brought within its doors, the institution has managed the Burr Industrial School and Mission, maintained a permanent school, trained its inmates to the useful employment of their hands as well as their heads, and since 1860 it has published a paper called the Home Visitor.

Up to 1864, six years from the opening, one thousand two hundred and thirty-five individuals, principally children, had been cared for and provided with homes. From 1864 to 1871, eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-one poor people found shelter and assistance at the Home, of whom three thousand nine hundred and fifty-one were children and four thousand eight hundred and forty were women.

At the commencement of the year 1871, there were seventy-seven inmates and the whole number admitted was one thousand and eight women and five hundred and seventy-four children. The average attendance for the year at the school was forty-eight.

The following is a list of its officers:

1860: Mark Skinner, president; D. J. Lake, vice-president; Rev. E. F. Dickinson, secretary; I. H. Burch, treasurer. 1861-62: Jonathan Burr, president; William Blair, vice-president; L. B. Wight, secretary; N. B. Kidder, treasurer; Mrs. F. D. Gray, corresponding secretary; Rev. E. M. Boring, financial secretary. 1865: Jonathan Burr, president; F. D. Gray, vice-president; L. B. Wight, corresponding secretary; Rev. E. M. Boring, financial secretary; N. B. Kidder, treasurer. 1866-68: Jonathan Burr, president; F. D. Gray, vice-president; Rev. E. M. Boring, secretary; Mrs. F. D. Gray, recording secretary; N. B. Kidder, treasurer. 1869-70: F. D. Gray, president; Rev. E. M. Boring, secretary; Mrs. F. D. Gray, recording secretary; N. B. Kidder, treasurer. 1871: F. D. Gray, president; Mancel Talcott, vice-president; Rev. E. M. Boring, secretary; Mrs. F. D. Gray, recording secretary; N. B. Kidder, treasurer.

THE OLD LADIES' HOME.—In November, 1861, the society was organized, and a temporary home secured by renting a three-story brick building at No. 157 Fourth Avenue, which, in the following April, was occupied by Miss Caroline Smith (the projector of the institution) as matron, and three inmates. Rev. James Pratt, D.D., was the first president and was assisted by a board of forty managers. Miss Smith soon retired as matron, and upon her death bequeathed to the society $1,000 and two lots on Wabash Avenue near Thirty-fifth Street. The terms upon which an inmate was admitted by the first constitution were that she should be fifty years of age or over, should pay $50, furnish her room, if able, and give a bond making over such furniture to the society, and appointing the president her attorney to dispose of such estate as she possessed or might acquire, the amount covering the sum expended for her support going to the society, and the balance to be accounted for to her.

In May, 1863, the Home was removed to temporary quarters at No. 98 Third Avenue, and in May of the following year the society purchased, as a permanent home, a lot and building upon the east side of Indiana Avenue, near Twenty-seventh Street, paying therefor $5,000. This amount, and that expended for current expenses during those years, was raised by subscription and admission fees.

The payment of $100 constituted the donor a patron of the society; of $50, a benefactor; of $25, a life-member; and of $5, an annual member.

The society was incorporated in February, 1865, Benjamin W. Raymond, O. H. Tiffany, George D. Cummings, W. W. Everts, F. W. Fisk, William H. Ryder, Robert Collyer, J. Y. Scammon, Mark Kimball and S. P. Farrington being the charter members. At that time the required age for admission was advanced to sixty years, and the fee increased to $100. The number of inmates varied from time to time, owing to new admissions, deaths and removals. In 1871, they numbered thirteen, and $2,000 was expended in their support.

CHICAGO NURSERY AND HALF-ORPHAN ASYLUM — In the latter part of 1859, Mrs. Samuel Howe and a few other ladies undertook the task of maintaining a day school for little ones whose mothers were unable to care for them during the working hours. A room was secured in a house on Illinois Street, near State, a woman was hired as attendant, the ladies acting as teachers and providing, from their own homes, food for the children, who were surrendered to their mothers as they returned from work at nightfall. Early in 1860, other ladies becoming interested in the work, a society was organized upon a permanent basis and its scope enlarged. The constitution adopted explained the objects of the institution to be "the care and maintenance of children of poor women, for the purpose of enabling them to find employment; also the care and maintenance of such children as are deprived, by death or other cause, of either parent." In the autumn of 1860, the number of children cared for having increased from six—the original number—to twenty-five, a house was rented on Market Street.

In the spring of 1861, having outgrown this building, a larger one, on Ohio Street, was obtained, and in the following year another change was found necessary, to a still larger building on the corner of Michigan and Pine streets, which was occupied until 1865; when the lack of a play-ground induced the managers to rent a place on the corner of Wisconsin and Franklin streets. In that year, the society was incorporated by act of the Legislature. In 1869, having come into possession of $17,000 under the will of Jonathan Burr, steps were taken to secure a permanent home. Through the generosity of William B. Ogden and a few others, a large lot, fronting on North Halsted and Burling streets, near Centre Street, was donated to the society, and Mrs. Mancel Talcott having added $5,000 to the Burr bequest, work upon the new building was at once commenced. But, having planned beyond their resources, the walls were barely up before their funds were exhausted and work was necessarily suspended. In the summer of 1871, a few gentlemen, giving each $1,000, together with other subscriptions, enabled work to be resumed, and contracts were let for completing the building. When the great fire occurred it was not quite completed. It was without doors, only partially plastered, and with no heating facilities.

During the time of the fire the children were removed to it for safety, but were again moved when, towards evening of the 9th of October, the destruction of the building seemed imminent. The fire, however, was stayed two blocks south of the asylum, and the next day the children were brought back to it. Notwithstanding the incompleteness of the building the regular inmates were properly cared for, and, during the succeeding fortnight, more than fifty children, who had become lost in the frenzy and confusion of the fire, were sheltered and fed, and finally restored to their friends. Transient adults were also fed daily for a considerable period after the fire, and some were furnished with clothing and bedding.

MRS. EDWARD H. HADDUCK, formerly Miss Louisa Graves, was born in Norwich, Chenango Co., N. Y. Her father, Dexter Graves, moved to Ashtabula County, Ohio, when she was a child, and she accompanied him when he came to Chicago in 1831. There is probably no lady in this city whose life has been so identified with Chicago as has that of Mrs. Haddock. Being a daughter of one of the earliest pioneers and the wife of another, it is not possible to mention the early records of the city without associating her name with them. She married Edward H. Haddock in 1834, and for nearly fifty years they passed their married life together. Taking all in all the combined circumstances, there is perhaps no more remarkable incident of early family history in this city. After an active life, Mrs. Haddock passes her declining years in quiet retirement at her beautiful home on one of Chicago's South Side avenues, happy in the prosperity of the city whose welfare she has done so much to further, and still happier in the honor and affection wherein she is held by its citizens.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

In this volume, the various industries composing the trade and manufactures of Chicago can receive but cursory mention, as the space at command precludes the various extended reviews which are necessary to a comprehensive treatment. It has consequently been deemed expedient to give only a few statements relative to representative individuals and businesses—a full and elaborate recital of the progress and attainments in the commercial province, being reserved for the third volume of this History.

THE COAL SUPPLY.

An indispensable adjunct to the manipulation of iron ore is fuel, and the coke obtained from bituminous coal was early recognized as a valuable substitute for charcoal; thus as the iron industries of Chicago gradually grew, the demand for coal constantly increased. The annual consumption of coal in this city, for manufacturing purposes alone, is enormous, and the transactions in this species of fuel form a considerable item in the annual volume of business. The first shipment of coal consigned to Chicago dealers was received by Newberry & Dole. (See history of Rumsey Brothers & Co., in the history of the Board of Trade.)

The following table affords a view of the growth of the coal trade for the twenty years preceding the fire:

	1832.	1833.	1834.	1835.	1836.	1837.	1838.	1839.	1860.	1861.
Receipts -----	46,233	38,548	56,775	109,576	93,020	171,350	87,240	131,204	131,080	184,089
Shipments -----	1,441	2,988	5,068	12,153	10,761	23,942	15,641	16,886	20,364	20,093

	1862.	1863.	1864.	1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.	1871.
Receipts -----	218,423	284,196	323,275	344,854	496,193	546,208	658,234	799,000	887,474	1,081,472
Shipments -----	12,917	15,245	16,779	24,190	34,066	69,170	83,399	95,620	110,467	96,833

E. K. ROGERS & Co.—The business of this firm was established by E. K. Rogers, Sr.,—the father of the senior member of the present firm,—who was the son of Nathaniel Rogers, and a descendant of Rev. John Rogers, a noted English divine and reformer, who, with all his family, was forced to leave England at an early day, for conscience' sake. E. K. Rogers, Sr., was born at Ipswich, England, in 1812. He received his mercantile training in Boston, where, in 1837, he married Miss Mary B. Curtis. He came to Chicago in 1835, and for some years was engaged in general mercantile business on River Street. He first embarked in the coal business in 1837,* and about 1842 entered the firm of H. Norton & Co. Since that date the firm has undergone several mutations in both membership and style. In 1855, the name became Walter & Rogers; in 1863, Rogers & Co., which is the present (1885) firm style, the members being E. K. Rogers, Jr., and Robert G. Waggener. Mr. Rogers, Sr., retired from the firm in 1871, and died on May 2, 1873.

Edward K. Rogers, Jr., was born in Chicago in 1840, and was educated in the public schools. He has been in the coal business all his life, and is well versed in all of its details. He was married on October 8, 1874, to Miss Annie P. Trimble; they have three children—Annie T., Mary B., and Edith P.

Robert G. Waggener has been connected with the firm of E. K. Rogers & Co., in different capacities, for thirteen years, and was made a partner in June, 1884. He was born in Bloomington, Ill.,

*It is authoritatively stated that Mr. Rogers was the first merchant who received and handled pig iron in Chicago.

on April 4, 1847, the son of Major Thomas T. and Susan (Gunnell) Waggener. His father was quartermaster in the army during the late War. He was well known and highly respected in Bloomington, where he carried on a grain and commission business many years, and where he died from the effects of a poisonous vaccination received while in the United States service. R. G. Waggener enlisted in the summer of 1864, in Co. "F," 3d New York Artillery, as a private, and, for brave and gallant conduct in the battle of Hatches Run, was promoted Lieutenant. He was taken prisoner at Farmville, Va., and was with General Lee's army at its surrender at Appomattox Court House. Mr. Waggener was married in April, 1881, to Miss Hattie A. Thomas. They have one son, Robert G.

MEEKER, HEDSTROM & Co.—This firm is composed of A. B. Meeker, E. L. Hedstrom and George W. Meeker, and is the oldest firm in the coal trade, with one exception, in Chicago. The senior member, Arthur B. Meeker, was the first to fully comprehend that Chicago would be the manufacturing center of the Northwest, and therefore a natural center for both coal and iron. In May, 1857, he came to this city, and his dock and yard were at No. 7 North Market Street, about seven years, his first year's business amounting to about $50,000, while in subsequent years it aggregated, including the iron which he handled, $10,000,000. Mr. Meeker first became interested in the Wilmington mines. He has long been engaged in the anthracite coal trade, in company with the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, and with Judge Asa Packer, of Pennsylvania, president of the road. When Mr. Meeker began in the business of mining bituminous coal, that industry was in its infancy; but he has done more than any other man to render coal so very cheap in Chicago that manufacturers would see in this city peculiarly strong attractions. The firm name was originally Bellamy, Meeker & Co.; in 1858, it was changed to A. B. Meeker & Co.; then to E. L. Hedstrom & Co.; and, in 1881, it became as it now stands. Mr. Hedstrom is a resident of Buffalo, N. Y., and the business in this city is under the immediate control of A. B. Meeker and his eldest son, George W. Meeker, who was graduated from Yale Scientific School in the class of 1879.

ARTHUR BURE MEEKER was born on July 20, 1835, in Utica, N. Y., the son of Moses Taylor Meeker, who resided twenty years in that city, where he was engaged in the coal trade. His mother's maiden name was Margaret Beckman, formerly of Albany, N. Y., a descendant of one of the oldest and most highly respected Dutch families in that part of the State. A. B. Meeker attended Hamilton College, but, desiring a more active life, at eighteen he left that institution, and then engaged in business with his father. The first cargo of Scotch iron ever shipped from Glasgow to Chicago, without breaking bulk, was brought here by A. B. Meeker & Co., in 1859. The only United States bonded yard in Chicago is devoted exclusively to the storage, in bond, of the imports of this firm; they have also an immense trade in domestic iron. Mr. Meeker is president of the Menomonee Iron Company, and by his efforts the productions of the Lake Superior iron mines have been enlarged and their sales extended among the manufacturers of the West. Coming to Chicago by water and rail, it is distributed in every direction over the railroads, and principally through the agency of the firm of Meeker, Hedstrom & Co. Mr. Meeker has done much toward building up the iron works in this vicinity; he erected the first blast furnace ever put up in Chicago, locating it in that part of Chicago called Bridgeport. He was the projector and, for several years, the president, of the Joliet Iron and Steel Works, which opened in 1869, costing $2,500,000. He was also quite extensively interested in the iron interests that center in and about St. Louis, Mo., up to 1875. It is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Meeker stands in the front rank among the master spirits of enterprise and business in the West. He was married on September 24, 1856, in Chicago, to Miss Maria Louisa Griggs. They have four children—George W., Louise, Arthur and Margaret.

THE IRON INDUSTRY.

In 1857, the manufacture of iron in this city was insignificant. No iron ore is found adjacent to Chicago, and coal, suitable for manufacturing purposes, is only mined at some distance. Hence, until the improvement of the natural water-ways and the construction of the vast railroad system, this city was deterred from proonly $25,000 in the single furnace of which Illinois could boast. Of the 456,127 tons of crude ore utilized in these furnaces, that in Illinois used only 4,000 tons, or eight-tenths of one per cent. The number of hands employed was thirty, who received $10,800 wages; only 1,500 tons of pig-iron was produced, of the aggregate value of $37,500.

No iron blooms were made in Illinois in 1860, eighty-one of the entire ninety-seven establishments existing and their manufacture being located in Pennsylvania and New York. The census report of the same year shows that mills for the manufacture of bar, railroad and sheet-iron were in operation in six Western States, only one, however, being located in Illinois. The following tables show, at a glance, how trivial was the manufacture in this State:

COMPARATIVE TABLE OF THE MANUFACTURE OF BAR, SHEET AND RAILROAD IRON.

	No. of establishments.	Capital invested.	Number of employes.	Cost of labor.	Tons of pig iron, blooms, etc., used.	PRODUCT.—Tons.
						Bar iron.	Rail.	Plate iron.	Sheet iron.	Total weight.
Six Western States.....	24	$3,370,300	2,504	$1,097,166	113,371	44,973	40,000	2,100	1,200	85,273
Illinois (Chicago).....	1	200,000	165	96,000	14,000	.....	12,000	.....	.....	12,000
Percent. of Chicago manufacture	4.2	5.9	5.8	8.8	12.3	.....	30.	.....	.....	10.4

curing the crude material necessary for production. But when this locality became accessible, the iron manufacturers arose from zero, in 1860, to the rank of fifteenth, as by the census of 1870, and to the fourth, in the census of 1880.

This was the result of the city's geographical position between the ore-beds of Northern Michigan and the coal-fields of Pennsylvania, and Illinois, such localities being placed in easy reach of the manufacturers by the canal and the railroads. These natural and artificial adjuncts have combined to render Chicago a center from whence can be supplied the needs of the people now settled, and to settle, in the great Northwest; and the possibilities of this manufacture are simply co-ordinate with the capacity of that vast domain. Producers of pig-metal can hardly desire better ore than that furnished by the mines of Michigan; and ages will elapse ere the bituminous coal of Illinois, from which coke is manufactured, becomes exhausted. Coal and coke are also supplied to this city from the mines of West Virginia and Pennsylvania, over many competing trunk lines and intersecting railroads.

It will therefore be readily comprehended how the facilities for procuring the raw material were apprehended by Chicago manufacturers, and the rest was merely a question of money and commercial enterprise. These latter qualities being utilized, they resulted in advancing the scale of this branch of business to its present prominence.

No furnace worthy of notice was in operation in the entire State of Illinois from 1860 to 1868. Yet the iron industry in this city properly dates from 1857, when Captain Eber B. Ward, of Detroit, built the Chicago Rolling-Mill on the North Branch of Chicago River. This mill, originally built for the purpose of re-rolling rails, formed the nucleus of the present very extensive works of the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company.

In 1860, in seven Western States—Ohio, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, Wisconsin, Indiana and Illinois—there were seventy-six furnaces manufacturing pig-iron. The aggregate capital was $6,223,000, of which amount $5,174,000 was invested in Ohio and Kentucky, and NORTH CHICAGO ROLLING-MILL Co.—The works out of which the present plant of the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company has grown, were established in 1857, as a private enterprise of Captain Eber B. Ward, of Detroit, Mich., in which he associated with himself two or three capitalists living in Boston, Mass. The amount of money invested was $225,000, and the original capacity of the works was about one hundred tons a day of iron rails, employing about two hundred men. In 1864, an additional mill was built, practically doubling the capacity of the works to keep pace with the demands made by the growth of the railway system centering in Chicago. A puddling department had also been added to the original mill. In 1864, the Chicago Rolling-Mill Company was formed, with a capital stock of $500,000, and the private enterprise of Captain Ward was merged into this company. During 1866, the mill was destroyed by fire, but was at once re-built, adding considerably to its original capacity. In 1869, in order to extend the manufacture of iron and steel, and to secure other properties, not to be obtained under the general laws of Illinois, a special charter was granted to the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, which was then organized with a capital stock of $1,000,000, and the works of the Chicago Rolling-Mill Company became merged into this company. In 1870, two blast furnaces were added, at a cost of $250,000, for the purpose of supplying the works with pig metal, which, up to that time, had been purchased in Pittsburgh. In 1872, a Bessemer-steel plant was added, at a cost of $350,000, for the purpose of making Bessemer-steel rails. The first steel rail ever rolled in America, was rolled at the works of this company on May 24, 1865, from steel blooms made by Captain Ward, at his works in Wyandotte, Mich., and made entirely from Lake Superior iron ore. In 1878, the works of the Milwaukee Iron Company, then engaged in the manufacture of pig metal, iron rails and merchant sizes of bar iron, at Day View, Wis., were purchased by the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company; and, during 1882, a further addition was made at South Chicago, Ill., by the building of four blast furnaces and a Bessemer-steel department and a steel rail-mill, at a cost of $3,000,000, the capital stock of the company being increased to $5,000,000, so as to include the purchase of the works at Milwaukee, the original works on the North Branch of the Chicago River, and those at South Chicago.

The following tables are self-explanatory:

Materials received at the works of the Chicago Rolling-Mill Company during the year ending July 1, 1884.

Iron Ores.....	301,882 tons.
Coke.....	276,792 "
Bituminous Coal.....	176,763 "
Limestone.....	119,633 "
Old Iron Rails.....	23,467 "
Spiegeleisen.....	15,792 "
Scrap Iron.....	12,142 "

Total..... 926,471 tons.

Product of the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company's works for the year ending July 1, 1884.

Pig Iron .....	187,833 tons.
Steel Ingots .....	108,107 "
Steel Rails .....	170,733 "
Muck Bar .....	10,067 "
Angle and Splice Bars .....	11,107 "
Merchant Iron .....	31,599 "
73,240 kegs of Nails .....	3,712 "
Total .....	612,768 tons.

The number of men employed by the company at their several works, during the year ending July 1, 1884, was five thousand eight hundred, and the pay-roll aggregated $250,000 a month. Upon the organization of the Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, in 1864, S. Clement was elected president, E. B. Ward, treasurer, and O. W. Potter secretary and general superintendent, and it was so continued. Upon the re-organization into the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, in 1869, the same parties were elected officers of the new corporation. In 1871, S. Clement retired from the presidency, and O. W. Potter was elected president, Eber B. Ward treasurer, and Richard C. Hannah, secretary. Upon the death of Captain E. B. Ward, in 1875, S. Clement became treasurer. The officers elected at the annual meeting held July 25, 1884, were O. W. Potter, president, Chicago; N. Thayer, vice-president, Boston, Mass.; S. Clement, treasurer, Milwaukee; and Richard C. Hannah, secretary, Chicago. W. L. Potter is superintendent of the Chicago works, which consist of two blast furnaces, one sextuple and eight quadruple puddling furnaces, twenty-three heating furnaces, ten trains of rolls, and one five-ton steam hammer; Bessemer-steel works, having two six-ton converters and all the appliances for making iron and steel rails. The annual capacity of this plant is 55,000 tons pig iron, 120,000 tons steel rails and 60,000 tons iron rails. The South Chicago Works, Edward C. Potter, superintendent, have four blast furnaces, three ten-ton Bessemer converters, four Siemens heating furnaces, and one two-high reversing, finishing, train of rolls, and their estimated capacity is 224,000 tons of pig metal, 200,000 tons of steel rails. The Milwaukee Works, William B. Parks, superintendent, have two blast furnaces, seven quadruple and two double puddling furnaces, twenty-one coal and five Siemens heating furnaces, seven trains of rolls and one hammer. Their annual capacity is 55,000 tons of pig iron, 60,000 tons of iron rails, 40,000 tons of merchant bar iron, 20,000 tons of fish-plates. A new nail-mill has also just been added to this plant, with a capacity of 1,000 kegs of nails a day.

CAPTAIN EBER B. WARD was born in New Flamborough, Upper Canada, December 25, 1811. His parents, Eber and Sallie (Potter) Ward, were residents of Vermont, but, in 1810, had started to come to the West, stopping for a brief season in Canada, where their son Eber was born. Early in 1812, the family located at Newport, now Marine City, Mich., where they settled on a farm. There Eber passed his boyhood, helping his father clear and work his land, varying this with trapping and fishing, also in attending school, on an average, perhaps, three months of the year. To these limited educational facilities in the schools was added a careful training by his worthy parents, not only in book-learning, but in the inculcation of those excellent principles which in later years marked the character of the son whose life we now write. In 1834, Eber went to work with his uncle, Samuel Ward, on St. Clair River, near Newport, and who, besides employing quite a number of men in getting out ship timber, conducted a farm and kept a store and the post-office in the village already mentioned. The duties of young Ward were varied—now superintending a gang of men in the woods, then directing the labor on the farm, with occasional service as clerk and salesman in his uncle's store. Thus two years passed, and he was induced to take an interest in a small schooner which his uncle owned; and so was formed a partnership which existed until broken, many years later, by the death of the senior member of the firm. In 1840, the partners built their first steamer for river service. They soon after engaged in building steam vessels, and at one time owned and operated a line of twenty boats on the rivers of Michigan and also upon lakes Erie, Huron, Michigan and Superior. During 1845, when the Michigan Central Railroad was only completed to Marshall, Mich., a line of communication from that point to St. Joseph, by stage, was opened, and thence to Chicago by two steamers, which were owned and managed by Captain Ward, the first he operated as passenger boats on Lake Michigan. In 1846, the railroad was finished to St. Joseph, and the stages were abandoned, his vessels making connections with the trains of that place for Chicago. When the road was completed to New Buffalo, Mich., Captain Ward's vessel ran from there to Chicago and Milwaukee, and so continued until 1852, when the Michigan Central Railway entered Chicago. The present line of Goodrich steamers had its origin in the line of vessels owned and operated by Captain Ward forty years ago. In the early days of his career as a lake navigator, Captain Ward was wrecked in a small schooner (his only vessel) off the shore of what is now South Chicago, and near the site of the South Chicago Rolling-Mills. On this occasion, Captain Ward lost everything he possessed in the way of worldly goods, besides narrowly escaping with his life. He related the incident years afterward, and said, when he reached shore he was the fortunate possessor of a pair of pants and a shirt, the only articles of clothing with which he had been able to leave his ill-fated vessel. In 1855, foreseeing that the era of railroads had reached the West, and that the time was at hand when the ship-carrying trade would be seriously affected, he began decreasing his interests in this direction. At the same time, with commendable foresight, he made heavy purchases of pine lands in Michigan, and also in iron mines in the Lake Superior region. In that year, he established his rolling-mills at Wyandotte, Mich., a few miles below Detroit. In 1857, he founded the works in this city, out of which have grown the present North Chicago Rolling-Mills Company. Of the subsequent development of Captain Ward's enterprise the reader is familiar, and so can form some idea of the man's business tact and of his ability to successfully carry on great undertakings. His treatment of his men was such that he invariably commanded their respect, and always held their confidence that he would do all in his power for their best interests. On one occasion, four hundred employes in his mills at Wyandotte struck, and sent a committee to him to ask for higher pay. He received the committee in the most friendly manner, and, after listening courteously to their story, thus addressed them: "You remember that not long ago your wages were raised a little. I claim no credit for it, but the market was upward and I thought it fair and safe to do it. Now, you want higher wages when prices are falling. That is impossible. Here is the price-current, and you will see by it that I am right. Go home, and tell the men that I always try to do the best I can, in justice to myself and the other owners and to them, but this I can not and shall not do." This was said kindly, but with a firmness not to be misunderstood. The next day the men returned contentedly to their work. A leading object of his life was to help the people who worked for him to homes of their own. He believed in charity, and was a liberal giver to religious and educational institutions; but so far as individuals were concerned, he adopted the principle that to give a man work was to bestow the best charity. The distressed he was always ready to help. One year, one of his vessels, a steam barge, towing two boats loaded with ore, sank, and every man on board perished. Captain Ward made investigations, and found the crew had all been unmarried men, except the captain, who had left a wife and children, living in Detroit. He sent his sister Emily to inquire into their condition; she did so, and reported that with the exception of a mortgage of five hundred dollars on their little home, the family would be able to get along quite comfortably. Captain Ward immediately drew his check for six hundred dollars and gave it to his sister, who took it, and paying off the mortgage gave the balance to the widow. Another incident illustrating his charitable inclinations, is related by O. W. Potter, who was for so many years intimately associated with Captain Ward. One evening, in 1866, a number of persons had gathered at Mr. Potter's home, Captain Ward being of the party, to discuss ways and means of raising funds with which to build a certain church-edifice. Captain Ward had intimated that he would help in the enterprise. While in the midst of their deliberations, it was discovered that the North Chicago Rolling Mills were in flames. Every member of that meeting felt that, in view of the misfortune which had befallen Captain Ward, they had no right to expect him to give much, if anything, to their church. On the following morning, several members of the evening party were at the scene of the previous night's fire, and there met Captain Ward. While viewing the outlook, one of his friends remarked to him, that while they all regretted the loss which had befallen him, they were doubly sorry, as it would seriously interfere with their plans of building the church. Captain Ward asked the speaker how much they had expected him to give. The gentleman named a sum. With a good-humored chuckle, the Captain turned to Mr. Potter, and said: "Put me down for just double that amount, and then you fellows go ahead and see if you can get that church done by the time I get these mills re-built." It is almost needless to add the church was speedily built. At the time of the fire of 1871, Captain Ward was among the first to visit Chicago and to identify himself with the Relief and Aid Committee. Nearly five hundred families of his employes in the rolling-mills found themselves homeless and also penniless. To these Mr. Ward gave his personal attention, and for nearly a month saw that they were fed and cared for. In his home, Captain Ward was the soul of hospitality, and his highest enjoyment was when he laid aside the cares of business and devoted himself to the entertainment of his family and friends; among the latter he counted many who stood high in public esteem. On one occasion he attended a reception held in Washington, at the home of Schuyler Colfax, then speaker of the House. Among the notable personages, it was a matter of general comment that the two plainest dressed men attracted the most attention, and these were Ben. F. Wade, the well-known statesman, and Captain E. B. Ward. Captain Ward when young had only limited educational advantages, but such were the natural powers of his mind, that in later years he not only kept himself informed on all important questions of the times, but cultivated books and authors to that extent that few men possessed a wider range of knowledge on the best literature of the world than he. He wrote several articles on the trade and industries of this country, as affected by free trade and protection. These were published in pamphlet form and were widely read. As a speaker, he always expressed himself with an energy and earnestness that carried conviction to those who heard him. In 1868, he delivered an address at the Wisconsin State Fair, at Madison, the closing words of which show the character of the man. He said: "I do not feel a stranger among you. Coming to this country forty years ago, in my boyhood and youth I shared the toils and privations of our pioneer life. I have rolled and burned logs, and ploughed and planted and harvested amidst stumps and girdled trees, with the forest all around the little clearing. I have sailed along the wild shores of your then new territory, landing at Milwaukee when a few poor cabins were the pitiful beginning of what is now a large and beautiful city. I landed flour in a small boat lying off the mouth of the Chicago River, when there were only a few houses, a ruinous warehouse, an old fort and a miserable, so called, hotel on the open prairie, where now stands another great city. * * * My efforts have been with yours in this great western field. Much has been done, and much remains to be done. Let us go on and build up a future in your State and in our country, in which labor shall be free and respected, genius and skill find scope in many ways, and farmers and manufacturers work out in fraternal spirit the great problem of industrial independence." Captain Ward was twice married; first, in 1837, to Miss Mary McQueen, of Newport, Michigan. They had seven children, five of whom were living at the time of his death. His second marriage was in 1869, to Miss Catherine Lyon, of Conneaut, Ohio. By this union there were two children, who are still living. While in the street, and apparently in the most robust health, Captain Ward was stricken with apoplexy, and died almost immediately, on January 2, 1874, at Detroit, Mich.

ORKIN W. POTTER was born in Rochester, N. Y., December 25, 1836. His father was Abel Potter, by occupation a farmer; his mother was Cynthia Lathrop, and a most estimable woman. Orrin was given such educational advantages as were afforded by the common schools. At an early age he developed a fondness for mathematics and civil engineering, and when fifteen years old he joined a surveying party, with which he traveled over portions of his native State, afterward extending their operations into Canada. In 1856, he came West, and entered the employ of Captain E. B. Ward as a clerk in his rolling-mill office at Wyandotte, Mich. In May, 1857, when Captain Ward established his works in Chicago, Mr. Potter came to this city, and became bookkeeper and paymaster in the rolling-mills. Upon the organization of the Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, in 1864, he was chosen its secretary, and was also made general superintendent of the works. In 1871, on the retirement of Captain Clement from the presidency, Mr. Potter was chosen to that position, which he has since filled. It is said, in no commendatory spirit, but as a matter of simple justice, that it is due to Mr. Potter's wise and conservative management, that the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company has been safely tided through the many panics and depressions attendant upon the iron interests of this country during the past thirty years. His wide knowledge of the business, and his long experience in its practical workings, peculiarly qualify him for the position he has held so long; while natural executive ability has enabled him to place at the head of the different departments of the mills men of the highest practical worth. Having begun as a clerk at a salary of $300 per annum, and steadily advanced, until he has reached his present position, he knows the value of experience and long training in any calling, and that steady and well-directed industry is apt to achieve more than is usually accomplished by an inconstant genius, however brilliant. Mr. Potter married, in 1858, Miss Ellen Owen, daughter of Benjamin F. Owen, of Newport, Mich. They have had four children, one son and three daughters—Edward C., who attended the School of Technology at Boston, and graduated at Harvard College, and is now superintendent of the South Chicago Mills; Agnes Lyon, wife of James C. Hutchins, of this city, of the law department of the Chicago & Rock Island Railway; Gertrude Whiting, and Margaret Horton.

NATHANIEL THAYER, vice-president of the North Chicago Rolling-Mills Company, dates his connection with this corporation only since his father's death, which occurred a few years ago. Nathaniel Thayer, Sr., was, even in early days, a prominent capitalist of Boston, and, in company with John W. Braggs, Sidney Bartlett, John M. Forbes, W. J. Roach and Edward Mandel, projected and mainly built the Michigan Central Railroad. In 1856, these gentlemen suggested to Captain Ward the propriety of establishing rolling-mills at Chicago, in addition to those he was already operating in Wyandotte, Mich., and offered to furnish what capital Captain Ward lacked, to aid the enterprise. It was thus that Mr. Thayer became associated with Captain Ward in the North Chicago Rolling-Mills, retaining his interest in the plant, through its various changes, until his death. Nathaniel Thayer succeeded to his father's interest, which he has since held, as he has also his present position as the vice-president of the company. Mr. Thayer resides in Boston, has large amounts of money invested in Western enterprises, being, in addition to his interests in the North Chicago Rolling-Mills Company, a large stockholder in the Union Stock-Yards and Transit Company of this city, of which he is also an officer.

JOHN C. PARKES, general manager of the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, was born in England on July 27, 1831. His parents came to America when he was a child and located in New York State. His education was received at the common schools, and when he finished his studies he became identified with the iron business, with which he has since been connected the greater part of his life. His father was in the iron trade at Troy, N. Y., and later, at Wheeling, W. Va. During the gold excitement in California in 1851-52, Mr. Parkes was among those who went to the New El Dorado, in the hope of amassing a fortune. He remained a number of years, but his health began to fail him, and he abandoned that work and was connected with a newspaper called the Dutch Flat Inquirer. This journal, of which Mr. Parkes was publisher, was among the first to advocate the route for the Central Pacific Railway, which it ultimately adopted. In 1863, Mr. Parkes came to Chicago to make his permanent home. He obtained a position as traveling representative of the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, and was afterward made foreman of the works, when they comprised but one building on the North Branch. He has seen their interests develop till it is now one of the greatest concerns of the kind in this country. In 1878, when the company took possession of the works formerly operated by the Milwaukee Iron Company at Milwaukee, Mr. Parkes, as superintendent, went there and assumed charge of the works. He remained there three years, and, upon his return to Chicago, was made general manager of the entire business. Mr. Parkes was married July 25, 1866, to Miss Mary V. Clybourn, youngest daughter of Mrs. Archibald Clybourn, one of the oldest living residents of Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Parkes have six children—Mamie C., Henry C., John C., Percy, Belle Blanche, and Ella. Their youngest daughter, Jessie, died in April, 1885. Mr. Parkes belongs to the Union League and Washington Park clubs, and is a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M.

CAPTAIN STEPHEN CLEMENT, treasurer of the North Chicago Rolling Mill Company, and who has been connected with these mills since 1857, is one of the pioneer settlers of the West, and as such has contributed his share toward building up its splendid civilization of to-day. He was born in Erie, Penn., June 25, 1813, the son of Richard and Chloe (Hinchey) Clement. In his early life his educational advantages were limited to what instruction was given him in the common branches by his parents; but as he grew older, he supplemented this by reading and study of whatever books fell in his way, until he became a well informed man. At fourteen years of age he became a clerk in a general store in Erie, where he remained until 1834, when he came West, stopping at that time for a brief period in Chicago, finally locating in Indiana. In the spring of 1837, he returned to this city as master of the schooner "Philadelphia," which he continued to sail between Chicago, Buffalo, and other ports until 1842. In the spring of that year, he began sailing, for Captain Ward, the schooner "General Howard," and in the fall took charge of a small side-wheel steamer "Huron," also owned by Captain Ward, and which then made regular trips carrying both passengers and freight between this city and St. Joseph, Mich. In 1852, and when the Michigan Central and the Michigan Southern Railroads were completed to Chicago, Captain Clement began operating a line of steamers under his own name, which plied on the west shore of Lake Michigan, and was known as the Clement Steamboat Company. In 1856, when Captain Ward disposed of his shipping interests, he sold most of his vessels to a syndicate composed, as Captain Clement says, "of the boys who were, or had been, in his employ"; and for a time the captain retained his interest in the property. In the following year, Captain Ward having decided to establish mills in this city, their erection was begun under the immediate supervision of Captain Clement, and, on being started up, were managed by himself and Mr. Potter. In 1864, on the organization of the Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, Captain Clement was chosen its president. He held this position five years, and, in 1869, when the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company was formed, was again elected to the same office.

In 1871, he retired from the presidency, and, for a time, severed his official connection with the company, save as one of its leading stockholders, until, in 1875, when, on the death of Captain Ward, Mr. Clement was chosen treasurer, which position he has since filled. Captain Clement's home is in Milwaukee, where he has resided since 1878, and where he has supervisory charge of the company's branch works at that place. As treasurer of the company, he has had its financial affairs in charge, and these have always been ably administered at his hands. Of his personal character we would like to speak, were we not fully aware of his decided aversion to having anything concerning himself appear in print. It was only after some difficulty that the few facts of his life and career were obtained, to complete the sketch of the mills, toward the success of which he has done so much.

RICHARD C. HANNAH was born in LaPorte, Ind., in 1838, the son of William C., and Sarah (Clement) Hannah. His father was a lawyer of marked ability, and a man who figured prominently in the political history of his State. The son was given excellent educational advantages, but before quite completing his collegiate course, he, at the age of twenty-one, quitted his studies for a period of travel in foreign countries. He remained abroad five years, four of which were spent in the service of his Government, as consul at Santander, Spain, having been nominated for that position by President Lincoln, almost immediately following his assuming the executive chair. Mr. Hannah returned home in 1866, and soon joined a surveying party engaged in laying out the lines of certain proposed railroads, running through the States of Indiana and Illinois. In 1867, he came to this city, and entered the service of the North Chicago Rolling-Mill Company, as an assistant in the paymaster's office. He was chosen secretary of the company in 1871, a position he has most creditably filled to the present time.

UNION STEEL COMPANY.—In March, 1862, Andros B. Stone purchased a quantity of land on the south fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River, near Thirty-fifth Street and Ashland Avenue. This purchase was made for the firm of Stone, Chisholm & Jones of Cleveland, Ohio, the object being to erect a mill thereon for the purpose of re-rolling old rails. This was immediately done, and the mill with a capacity of fifty tons of rails a day, was put into operation on July 4, of that year. In 1863, the company was incorporated as the Union Rolling-Mill Company, distinct from the Cleveland Rolling-Mill Company, which institution was incorporated about the same time. The capital stock of the Union Rolling-Mill Company was originally $75,000; and its first officers were Andros B. Stone, president; and William Chisholm, secretary. In 1871, Mr. Chisholm was made vice-president and J. B. Stubbs secretary. In 1872, the company commenced rolling steel rails, and, until 1879, rolled rails of both iron and steel, gradually increasing the number of the latter, and decreasing that of the former, until, in that year, they ceased altogether to roll iron rails. During 1879, the name of the company was changed to the Union Iron and Steel Company, and J. B. Stubbs became vice-president and W. C. Runyan secretary. In 1880, A. L. Griffin became vice-president, Lucius S. Boomer secretary, and William Watson general superintendent. In 1883, owing to the dull state of the iron trade, the works suspended operations, and in the spring of 1884 the property was sold to a new company organized under the name of The Union Steel Company. The officers of this organization, in 1884, were—H. H. Porter, president; R. R. Jones, superintendent; M. A. Farr, secretary; and C. W. Hillard, treasurer. The capital stock of the company is now $4,600,000, and the capacity of the work equal to five hundred tons of steel rails and seventy tons of other merchantable steel a day. Those connected with this enterprise are representative Chicago men, the majority of them having been identified for years in its commercial and industrial interests. H. H. Porter, president of the company, is well known as having been for twenty-five years past, connected with some of the leading railroads of the country; beginning as a clerk in 1853 in the offices of the old Galena Railway, finally filling the position of general manager of the Chicago & North-Western, and later president of the St. Paul & Omaha line. A brief sketch of Mr. Porter's life appears in connection with the history of the Chicago & North-Western Railroad. The present officers of the company are—H. H. Porter, president; J. C. Morse, vice-president; R. Forsyth, general superintendent; and C. W. Hillard, secretary and treasurer.

M. A. FARR, ex-secretary of the Union Steel Company, is a native of Essex County, N. Y., born August 9, 1853. He attended school at Cleveland, Ohio, and afterward entered Carroll College at Waukesha, Wis., from which institution he graduated in 1872. The following year, he came to this city, which has since been his home, and engaged in the real estate and lumber trade. On the organization of the Union Steel Company, he became a director of that corporation and was at the same time chosen its secretary.

CHARLES W. HILLARD, secretary and treasurer of the Union Steel Company, was born in Komford, Essex, England, and is the son of Rev. Charles and Sarah (West) Hillard. After leaving college, he entered the service of the Great Western Railway, in England, with which corporation he served in various capacities in their locomotive and car-works until 1874. In that year, he moved to Canada, and became the secretary of the Royal Canadian Bank, which position he filled for nearly two years. The next became connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, as secretary to its general manager, Mr. Hicks. He remained in that capacity two years, when he came to Chicago, as secretary to H. H. Porter, who was at that time, president of the Chicago, St. Paul & Minnesota Railway. A little later, Mr. Hillard was made secretary of that corporation, and, besides being now the treasurer of the Union Steel Company, he is also connected officially with several prominent industrial enterprises.

R. R. JONES, ex-superintendent of the Union Steel Company, is a native of New Jersey, born on July 16, 1850, the son of Rev. S. B. Jones, a prominent Presbyterian clergyman, and Sarah Chester Jones. He was given a thorough academic education, after which he entered the Worcester (Mass.), Institute of Technology, finally completing his studies at the Cooper Institute, New York. In 1867, he became connected with the Cumberland Nail and Iron Works, at Bridgeton, N. J., and in the following year with the Novelty Iron Works of New York City. He remained there until 1869, when he went into the locomotive department of the Worcester & Nashua Railway shops. During 1873, he became connected with the well-known firm of Snell & Gregerson, civil engineers of Boston. In 1875, he entered the service of the Government as a United States engineer, being engaged on the public improvement of the Mississippi River at the rapids near Des Moines, Iowa. He was thus employed until January, 1882, when he became superintendent of the Union Iron and Steel Company, and when that corporation was merged into the present one, he was continued in the same office. Mr. Jones is a member of the Institute of Mining Engineers, of the Association of American Mechanical Engineers, of the Western Society of Engineers, of the Mechanics' Association of Worcester, Mass., and of the Academy of Sciences of this city. Mr. Jones married, on January 7, 1879, Miss Sierra Nevada Ivins, daughter of William Ivins, of Keokuk, Iowa. They have but one child, Bessie E.

FOUNDRIES.—As specified in the preceding volume, the firm of William H. Stow & Co. erected the first foundry in this city—the firm comprising the senior member and Jones, King & Co. The foundry was situated on Polk Street, west of the South Branch, and covered nearly a block of land, which cost $15,000. It was there that the first steam-engines were made in Chicago, William Avery, who had come from Syracuse, N. Y., for that purpose, superintending their construction. The machinery in the foundry and machine-shop was propelled by one of the Avery rotary engines, which he had made in Syracuse, and brought to Chicago with considerable machinery, all of which was set up in the works of William H. Stow & Co. Mr. Avery brought out from Syracuse with him, as foreman, Silas Ayres. These first engines, of which there were two, were low-pressure, horizontal ones, had a seven-foot stroke, and a diameter of about thirty-eight inches, and were placed in the side-wheel steamer, "James Allen," for which they were made. With a pressure of forty pounds, and thirty revolutions a minute, they were rated at about ninety horse-power. Mr. Avery, after placing these engines in the steambot, "Allen," built to ply between Chicago and St. Joseph, Mich., took a contract on the Illinois & Michigan Canal. The foundry in which these engines were made, was moved, in 1847, to the corner of Randolph and Canal streets, by H. M. Stow, a brother of William M. Stow; and, in 1848, the machinery was shipped by him to California, through the Welland Canal, and round Cape Horn, in a vessel owned by R. K. Swift. During the continuance of this foundry, which was abandoned in 1849, a number of the Avery rotary engines were manufactured, but few, if any, of them exceeded twenty-five horse-power. The steamer, "G. W. Dole," which was built in 1838, up the South Branch, just above the Polk-street bridge, was supplied with an engine raised from the sunken steamer, "Detroit."

The following table* shows the extent of manufacture of castings in Cook County during 1860:

DESCRIPTION OF CASTINGS.	No. of Establishments	Capital Invested.	Raw Material used (Cost.)	No. of Employees.	Wages Paid.	Value of Manufactured Product.
Car Wheels. . . . .	1	$ 10,000	$ 3,200	8	$ 2,150	$ 56,000
Iron railings . . . . .	1	200,000	415,000	185	96,000	660,000
Ornamental iron work . . . . .	1	2,000	1,950	10	3,600	6,000
Castings not specified . . . . .	6	129,000	82,675	96	30,180	221,000
Agricultural implements—
Mowers and Reapers. . . . .	1	500,000	96,200	200	54,986	414,000
Threshers and horse-power . . . . .	2	137,000	15,800	67	26,160	80,000
Miscellaneous . . . . .	1	25,000	6,000	27	10,680	25,000
Machinery†. . . . .	16	346,000	249,034	597	234,120	582,500

SCOVILLE IRON WORKS.—The business now conducted by H. H. Scoville, under this name, was originally founded by Hiram Scoville, Sr. He came to Chicago in 1837, and, in 1842, in company with P. W. Gates, his son-in-law, started a foundry and machine-shop at the corner of Washington and West Water streets. In 1848, Mr. Scoville withdrew from the firm, and, with his three eldest sons, started in business under the name of H. H. Scoville & Sons. A lot was purchased, at the corner of Canal and Adams streets, of William B. Ogden, and to this was moved a frame building that had formerly stood on the corner of Randolph and Clinton streets. The business prospered from the start, and shortly afterward they erected a brick building, about fifty by eighty-five feet in size; and afterward covered the entire lot with buildings. There they commenced building freight and flat cars for the Galena & Chicago Union Railway Company. John B. Turner, president of the road, shipped on a schooner from Michigan a car as a sample for them to pattern after. The cars made by this company were the first freight and flat cars to run out of and into Chicago. After this the company began to build passenger cars, and ultimately to build locomotives. Upon the completion of three of these locomotives, certain individuals became ambitious to organize a large stock company, believing that a much more extensive and prosperous business could be carried on. Accordingly, the company was incorporated under the name of The Chicago Locomotive Company, with an authorized capital of $250,000. Quite a large number of the leading citizens of Chicago became stockholders, among them William B. Ogden, William H. Scoville, E. H. Hadduck, D. R. Frazer, Robert H. Foss, E. W. Willard, H. H. Scoville, Thomas Dyer, B. W. Raymond, W. H. Brown, Sholto Douglas and Charles Reissig. The first officers were W. H. Brown, president; Sholto Douglas, secretary; William H. Scoville, superintendent; and D. R. Frazer, assistant superintendent. Members of the Scoville family subscribed about $50,000, and paid for their stock; others, whose names were secured principally for the influence they would carry with them, subscribed much smaller sums, therefore a considerable amount of the subscribed stock was not paid for. For this reason, the working capital of the company was much smaller than the authorized capital, and hence the credit of the company was not as high as had been that of H. H. Scoville & Sons. The corporation was therefore embarrassed from the first; and although it completed seven other locomotives, making ten in all, the business of the company amounted to but very little after about 1855 or 1856. Previous to this time certain members of the company became anxious to control its affairs, and, in order to do this, purchased most of the stock. At length there were left but three members, E. H. Hadduck, Robert H. Foss and E. W. Willard. Mr. Hadduck, having purchased most of the stock, held most of the offices. Mr. Hadduck then bought all the stock, and became the sole owner of the company's property, which he afterward sold to the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway Company. In 1859, H. H. Scoville, Jr., in company with Charles Reissig, built the three tanks, one in each division of the city, used as reservoirs for the city water supply. In 1860, he sold his interest in the business they had established to Mr. Reissig, then went to Colorado, and started a shop at Denver, where he remained seven years. In 1867, he returned to Chicago, and, in 1868, established himself in business in company with E. C. Preble, under the firm name of E. C. Preble & Co. Some time during that year, Mr. Preble withdrew, and since that time Mr. Scoville has been sole proprietor of the works, to which he then gave the name of the Scoville Iron Works. They were at first located at the corner of Quincy and Clinton streets, where they remained five years. They were then moved to Nos. 17-21 Clinton Street, remaining there until 1879, when they were moved to their present location, where Mr. Scoville manufactures steam engines, conestone-crushers, stamp-mills, and every variety of mining machinery, and where, in 1884, he commenced the manufacture of machinery which bids fair to revolutionize the method of treating ores. This machine was invented, developed and perfected by William A. Koneman and Mr. Scoville, and by its use a much larger percentage of mineral is extracted from the ore or quartz than by any method heretofore pursued. A plant of this machinery has been completed, and shipped to the mining districts, where it is now in practical operation.

* The figures given are for Cook County, but it may be fairly assumed that they, as now, Chicago contained almost all the iron manufactures of the county. So, as these figures appear, when contrasted with the immense amount of similar manufacturing at present carried on in this city, it must be borne in mind that they represent an increase in output over 1850 of ninety per cent., and the amount of wages was doubled.

† Including engine and boilers.

HIRAM H. SCOVILLE was born in Litchfield County, Conn., January 3, 1795. In his infancy, his parents removed to Onondaga County, N. Y., and there his boyhood was passed on his father's farm, his educational advantages being only such as were afforded by the common schools. On attaining his majority, Hiram determined to learn mechanical engineering, and accordingly entered a foundry and machine shop at Syracuse, N. Y., where, having developed unusual talent in his chosen calling, he mastered thoroughly its details. In 1832, he, with two other young men, built a small steamboat, which was put into practical operation on Cazenovia Lake; subsequently this vessel was placed on the Erie Canal, which had but then been recently completed. In 1837, Mr. Scoville came to Chicago to superintend the construction of a marine engine for a magnificent lake steamer, which was then about to be built here. Owing to the financial depression of that year, this vessel was never completed, but a smaller one, the "James Allen," was afterward built under his supervision. His next venture was as a contractor on the old Illinois & Michigan Canal, he having for a partner the well-known Captain William H. Avery. In 1843, owing to the deplorable condition of the State finances, work was entirely suspended on the canal, and Mr. Scoville withdrew from his partnership with Captain Avery, to engage in the iron business, with which he was identified to the time of his death, over thirty-five years later. In 1855, Mr. Scoville retired from an active business life, leaving his son, Hiram, Jr., to continue the business. Mr. Scoville died on March 28, 1879, honored and esteemed by all who knew him. As a mechanic, he had not his equal in the West, and it was his practical brain and untiring industry that contributed so largely to the success of every undertaking in which he had any management or control. To him, also, belongs the credit of originating many useful inventions, among which may be mentioned the cam-motion for self-raking reapers; of this the Patent Office records show his patents to have been the first filed for this device in that office. Mr. Scoville married, on March 23, 1810, Miss Betsey Elvira Sherman, daughter of Deacon Samuel Sherman, of Manlius, Onondaga Co., N. Y. They had nine children, five of whom survive.

HIRAM H. SCOVILLE is the son of Hiram H. and Betsey Elvira (Sherman) Scoville. He was born at Syracuse, N. Y., February 19, 1833. When he was but four years of age his parents located in Chicago, where he has since lived, with the exception of from 1860 to 1866, when he resided in Denver, Col. His education was obtained in the excellent schools of this city, and this fact, in addition to his inherited taste for mechanical pursuits, has had everything to do with the success he has achieved in his business life. At an early age Mr. Scoville entered upon a regular apprenticeship under his father's personal supervision, and during that period he became a thoroughly practical mechanic. On attaining his majority, he was associated with his father and an older brother, under the firm name of H. H. Scoville & Sons, in the manufacture of steam engines and general machinery; and in 1853, when his father retired from active business, he became the sole proprietor of the Scoville Iron Works, the reputation of which he has since fully maintained, and which justifies their classification among the foremost industrial institutions of the country. Mr. Scoville married, in 1859, Miss Eliza M. Barnes, the daughter of Hamilton Barnes, of this city. They have four children—Belle, Jessie, Anna and Edna.

CHARLES REISSIG.—On May 26, 1845, when Charles Reissig arrived in Chicago, and went to work in the machine-shops of I. B. Andrews & Co., he was the only boiler-maker in the city. The firm were at that time engaged in the manufacture of engines, and had, in connection with their machine-shops, a blacksmith-shop, and a few tools that could be utilized in the repair of boilers, but of no practical utility for the building of new work. The first job Mr. Keissig did, was to repair the boiler in his employer's works; and the first new boiler he built was in Woodward's Hydraulic Mill, at the foot of Lake Street, which supplied the city with water, and the next was for the propeller "Rossetter," early in the following year. In 1843, Hiram P. Moses purchased the engine-works from Andrews & Co., and rented the boiler-shop to Mr. Keissig, who conducted it nearly a year, when he leased a lot at the southwest corner of Jackson and Canal streets, and building a shop on it, began business on his own account. In 1851, he purchased ground at the foot of Jackson Street and erected thereon a commodious brick building, which was then the largest boiler-shop west of New York. In 1854, he built the first reservoir for the city water-works. In 1853, he constructed two additional reservoirs. He also laid the pipe across the river at the Rush-street bridge, the pipe across State Street, the piping across Franklin Street for the gas-works, and did the iron-work on the old water-tower on Chicago Avenue. In 1854, Mr. Keissig went to New York and purchased machinery for the manufacture of boilers by steam. This included steam riveting and punching machines, rollers, shears, and all the improved appliances then in use. While in New York City, however, he received a telegram from Chicago, announcing that his works had been burned to the ground. He started that night for home, and by ten o'clock of the day of his arrival in Chicago, he had closed the contract for the re-building of his works on an enlarged scale. The next day he started out through Southern Illinois on a collecting tour; and although money was offered him without interest by friends here, he declined their proffered kindness, and soon had enough funds of his own for his purpose. From 1853 to 1857, he did a business ranging from $250,000 to $300,000 per annum, and turned out, on an average, five boilers a week. Mr. Keissig is also the oldest florist in the city. In 1843, he purchased four acres of ground, where what is now West Sixteenth Street and Center Avenue, and built his first green-houses. At that time, his engaging in the business was for pleasure rather than profit, as he gave to his gardener the proceeds from the sale of flowers. In the year following the panic of 1857, he found himself obliged to sell this piece of ground to meet pressing debts, and his obligations were paid in full. It is worthy of note that, in those troublesome days, there were but few men in the iron trade in Chicago who thus paid their indebtedness in full. Mr. Keissig being one of them. In 1863, Mr. Keissig moved to the corner of VanBuren and Clinton streets, where he continued until 1869, when he concluded to devote his entire attention to floriculture. He accordingly sold his boiler-works, and at once engaged in the florist's business, in which he is still employed. He was born in Hamburg, Germany, on August 20, 1818. At sixteen years of age he was apprenticed to learn the trade of boiler-maker, but before he was eighteen, he became dissatisfied with his employer, and, running away, went to South America, where he entered the employ of the Brazilian Government, working on a line of packet sail-vessels which plied on the Amazon. He thus spent two years, during which time he traversed that noted stream from almost its source to its mouth. He then went to Rio Janeiro, working two years in the Government navy-yard, as a boiler-maker, and five years in the employ of the Brazilian Steam Packet Company. On February 13, 1845, he sailed for New York, where he landed April 26, and in one month later, came to Chicago. In 1866, Mr. Keissig built a beautiful country seat in the charming suburb of Riverside, where he now resides, and where he has the finest green-houses to be found anywhere in the West. He was married, in 1840, to Miss Christina Pfommer, who died in 1862; he was married a second time, in 1872, to Miss Mary Full, of this city. By his second marriage he has had five children—one son and four daughters.

FREDERICK LETZ, one of the earliest machinists of Chicago, having conducted a machine shop and foundry here for nearly forty years, was born in Pfaffenhofen, Alsace-Lorraine, in 1810. At an early age he was apprenticed to learn the trade of a machinist. In 1832, he came to this country and located in Baltimore, where he remained four years, two of which were spent in working as a journeyman, and the remaining two in business on his own account, as a member of the firm of Letz & Morgan. In 1836, he came to Chicago, and almost immediately bought a farm in the southern part of Cook County, which he worked until 1843, when he established the Chicago Iron Works, in a small shop on LaSalle, between Randolph and Washington streets. In 1847, he built a shop on Fifth Avenue, between Randolph and Lake streets, and there he carried on the manufacture of all kinds of iron work for buildings, such as railings, shutters, iron-fronts, etc. In 1855, needing a foreman for his works, he went to Cincinnati in search of one, and there engaged W. H. Chenoweth, who was his foreman until January, 1857, in which year Mr. Letz sold his works to a firm composed of his brother, Jacob Letz, and W. H. Chenoweth. In 1857, Jacob Letz died, and his interest in the business was purchased by J. M. Johnson, and, under the firm name of Letz & Co., the works were conducted until 1860. In that year Mr. Chenoweth retired from the firm, and the business was then carried on by Messrs. Letz & Johnson. In 1864, Frederick Letz purchased the works and continued to operate them alone until 1867, when he took his son, George F. Letz, into partnership, and three years afterward sold his interest to Mr. Chenoweth and August Gabriel; the three gentlemen last mentioned continuing the business, under the old firm name of Letz & Co., until after the great fire of 1871. After that event, Mr. Chenoweth and Mr. Gabriel established what is still known as the Industrial Iron Works. Frederick Letz, after his sale of the Chicago Iron Works in 1870, remained out of business until 1877, when he started a machine shop at No. 476 South Canal Street. This he carried on until June, 1882, and then, feeling the weight of years coming upon him, he disposed of his plant, and retired permanently from active business life. Mr. Letz was married, on January 28, 1834, to Miss Kathrina Kiehl, from Alsace. They have four children—Kathrina, now Mrs. J. K. Harmon; Mary, now Mrs. Busse; Sallie, now Mrs. Sweet; and Lena, now Mrs. Gerst. In 1861, Mr. Letz was elected a member of the Board of Public Works, and held that office until 1867.

ANDREW BOLTER has been identified with iron manufacturing for nearly thirty years. He came to Chicago during 1856, and for six months worked in the employ of Mr. Letz; at the end of that time, he started in business for himself, in a small shop on Market Street. At that date, there was not much demand for iron work for buildings, so he followed his vocation as a locksmith, and took such jobs as came along in the first mentioned line. Mr. Bolter relates that the first large contract that he got was for the McIlroy Block, on the corner of Dearborn and Randolph streets. In 1858, his business having considerably increased, he removed to West Washington, near Clinton Street, and about the same time formed a partnership with W. H. Chenoweth, which lasted over a year. Four years later, he made his third and last change, moving to the southwest corner of VanBuren Street and Fifth Avenue. There he was burned out in the great fire, and his accumulations, amounting to nearly $40,000, were swept away. A portion of his losses were almost of an irreparable character, as he had just returned from Europe with large quantities of patterns which he had imported, and on which the duties alone amounted to nearly $1,000. Far from disheartened, Mr. Bolter went to work at one to re-build—removing from the ruins of his works nearly one hundred tons of iron before it was fairly cooled, and, in just twenty-nine days from the date of the fire, had his new building completed, his engine and machinery all in place, and a full force of men at work getting out material for contracts he had already on hand. Not a small portion of his losses came from the filling of these contracts, for, owing to the fire, material and labor both advanced greatly, so that, instead of realizing a profit on any of them, he was compelled to carry them out in nearly every case, at a heavy loss. Among the prominent buildings now standing as memorials of his work may be mentioned the County Court House, the Bemis & McAvoy Co.'s new brewery, the works of the Chicago Gas Light & Coke Company, the St. Luke Hospital, the First National Bank Building, the Staats-Zeitung Building, Bryan Block, Schloesser's Block, McCord Block, and the Ontario Flats. Andrew Bolter is a native of Germany, being born in Hohenzollern, now Prussia, May 15, 1820, the son of Thomas and Josephine (Seefos) Bolter. When only thirteen years of age, he was apprenticed to learn the trade of a locksmith, which occupation he followed until coming to this country in 1854. He located first in New York, remaining there until the spring of 1856, when he came to Chicago. Mr. Bolter married, in 1846, Miss Josephine Brandhuber, the daughter of Wendelin Brandhuber, of Sigmaringen, a town of considerable importance in Hohenzollern, Prussia. Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Bolter have had five children—Joseph, Edward, Aggie, Annie and Carrie. Mr. Bolter is the possessor of one of the finest entomological collections in the West, and is an entomologist of extensive reputation.

COLLINS & BURGIE.—In the first volume of this work mention has been made of the first stove-foundry established in this city, in 1846, by C. R. Vandercook. It was known as the Phoenix foundry, and was located on the north side of the river, just east of the present site of Kirk's soap works. For several years Joshua K. Shedd was associated with Mr. Vandercook, who is authority for the statement that during the time he was connected with the works, they employed two hundred men, and turned out fifty stoves a day. In 1852, the ownership of the foundry passed into the hands of Howard Sherman, Joshua K. Shedd and Dr. John H. Foster, who, under the firm name of Sherman, Shedd & Foster, conducted the business until 1857, when James L. Collins, and Henry C. Burgie became the proprietors, and have so continued to the present time. In 1854, the foundry had been moved from its location on the North Pier to the southwest corner of Van Buren and Jefferson streets. The accompanying illustration, engraved from a print furnished by the present proprietors, shows the works as they appeared in 1857. These buildings were erected by Sherman, Shedd & Foster in 1854, when the removal already mentioned was made. There Collins & Burgie employed in the early part of their history about seventy-five men, and melted about twelve hundred tons of iron annually. As the business grew, they enlarged their works, and in 1872 erected their present foundry and warehouse, covering an area of nearly two acres. They now employ three hundred men, and manufacture three thousand tons of stoves annually. During 1883, they made fifteen thousand stoves, varying in weight from fifty to seven hundred pounds. Up to 1873, they did other iron casting, but since then stoves, including heating and cooking ranges, have been their exclusive line of manufacture. A hay-burning stove is also manufactured by this firm, and is one of the very few of this kind that have been successfully made. It was patented in 1878 by M. L. Wood, and has since been much improved.

COLLINS & BURGIE'S FOUNDRY IN 1857.

JAMES L. COLLINS was born in Ithaca, N. Y., in 1820, the son of William R. and Eliza (Southworth) Collins. He was given a fair education, and after leaving school worked for a number of years in the county clerk's office in Ithaca. During 1842, he came West, and resided for a short time in Marshall, Mich.; then went to Cincinnati, where he resided a few years, and, in 1849, was married to Miss Harriet A. Jeremiah, daughter of John Jeremiah of that city. Mrs. Collins died in Chicago on March 21, 1835. She was well-known for her interest in various benevolent objects and one of the earliest friends of the Chicago Protestant Orphan Asylum, of which she was for a number of years a director. Mr. and Mrs. Collins had five children—Nellie, wife of Charles L. Page of this city, who died in 1884; William R.; Ida L., who died in 1866; George S., and Harrie B. Mr. Collins first visited Chicago in 1849, and in 1852 removed with his family to this city. Here he entered the service of the old firm of Sherman, Shedd & Foster with whom, and their successors, he remained until 1857, when, in company with Mr. Burgie, he purchased the old foundry and established his present business.

WILLIAM R. COLLINS, who is now associated with his father's firm, was educated in the schools of this city and completed his course at the Chicago University. After leaving that institution, he entered the law office of C. C. Bonney, and subsequently was admitted to the bar, but, instead of entering upon the practice of his profession, adopted a mercantile life. He was married June 30, 1885, to Miss Harriet Hinman, daughter of John F. and Harriet E. Hinman, of Battle Creek, Mich.

HENRY C. BURGIE was born in Wilmington, Del., in 1831, the son of John and Catharine Burgie. After leaving school, he apprenticed himself to learn the trade of wood pattern-making, the details of which he thoroughly mastered. In 1853, he located in Milwaukee, where he remained nearly a year. He then came to Chicago, where he obtained employment with the old firm of Sherman, Shedd & Foster, remaining in that foundry until 1857, when, in company with Mr. Collins, he purchased the business. Mr. Burgie was married, in 1859, to Miss Annie M. Moore, daughter of Robert and Julia Moore, of Wilmington, Del. Mr. and Mrs. Burgie have had two children, one of whom—Harry N.—is now living. Both Mr. and Mrs. Burgie are largely interested in philanthropic enterprises, and are liberal givers to all worthy objects of charity. Mrs. Burgie is an earnest worker in behalf of the Chicago Protestant Orphan Asylum, and has for years been one of its board of directors.

CRIBBEN, SEXTON & Co.—The business of this firm was established in 1867, by J. A.* and T. S. Sexton, at No. 178 Lake Street. It consisted then of the hardware and stove business. It was a moderate business at first, but grew to such an extent by the time of the fire that, by that calamity, about $60,000 was lost, very little of the insurance being collected. On the 1st of January, 1872, the business was revived by J. A. Sexton and Henry Crib-ben, for the Rochester Co-operative Foundry Company. On January 1, 1873, Mr. Cribben bought out the interest of the mentioned company, and with Mr. Sexton established the present house at No. 157 East Kinzie Street, where they remained until May, 1874, when they moved to Nos. 75-77 Lake Street. In 1878, they commenced the manufacture of stoves and ranges at the foundry they erected at Nos. 70-80 Erie Street and Nos. 57-67 Ontario Street, their business increasing so that, in 1881, they enlarged their foundry and storehouse, taking in the lots numbered 52 to 58, and which occupy about one and a half blocks of ground. The total number of stoves and ranges made and sold by this company annually now amounts to about forty thousand, and the number of men employed ranges from three hundred and fifty to four hundred. W. H. Cribben was admitted to partnership January 1, 1879, and C. T. Boal, January 1, 1880.

HENRY CRIBBEN was born on the Isle of Man on September 19, 1834. When he was three years of age, his parents, Thomas and Jane (Carran) Cribben, came to America, and settled in Rochester, N. Y., where they both died. At the age of eighteen, young Cribben learned the trade of iron-moulding, in Rochester, working at it up to 1862. In 1862, he enlisted in Co. "F," 140th New York Volunteer Infantry, as sergeant. He was then promoted 2d Lieutenant of Co. "H," and afterward captain of Co. "I." He was brevetted major for meritorious services at the battle of Bethesda Church, Virginia. He was there taken prisoner, but managed to escape from the prison at Charlotte, N. C., and again joined his regiment at Knoxville, Tenn., and served with it until the close of the War. He returned to Rochester, and, in 1867, organized the Co-operative Foundry Company, whose credit stands high in commercial circles, and of which he was president for six years. In 1872, he came to Chicago, and, during 1873, with Mr. Sexton, organized the firm of Cribben & Sexton. Mr. Cribben married Maria Robinson, daughter of Robert Robinson, of Rochester, N. Y. They have had four children—William H., Rebecca J., Mabel and Edward W. Mr. Cribben was a member of the New York Legislature in 1866.

W. H. CRIBBEN, son of the senior member of above firm, was born in Rochester, N. Y., in 1855. At the age of sixteen years, he went into the employ of the Co-operative Foundry Company, at Rochester, remaining with them up to 1872, when he came to Chicago, and became connected with the present firm of Cribben & Sexton, being admitted as a partner in 1879.

CRANE BROTHERS' MANUFACTURING COMPANY.—The originator of this company was Richard T. Crane, now its president. Mr. Crane was born in Paterson, N. J., in 1832. At an early age, being obliged to seek self-support, he learned various branches of mechanical work. In 1847, an uncle procured for him a situation in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he remained until 1851, by which time he had acquired the trade of a brass and iron worker. He moved to New York, where he found employment with several prominent firms, among them that of R. Hoe & Co. In 1855, he came to Chicago, where his uncle, Martin Ryerson, was engaged in the lumber business. Mr. Ryerson assisted his nephew with the means, and granted him the privilege of erecting a small brass foundry in one corner of his lumber yard. A few months' later, his brother, Charles S. Crane, came to the city, and entered into partnership with him, the firm name being R. T. Crane & Bro. They began the manufacture of finished brass goods, in a small way. Finding it necessary soon to enlarge their manufacturing facilities, they rented rooms on the North Side. In the following year, they leased a lot and erected a building at No. 102 Lake Street, where they put in their own power and consolidated the two branches of their business. In 1859, the firm began the manufacture of steam-heating apparatus (which they discontinued in 1877), and, in 1860, they established an iron foundry. Business was prosperous during the early part of the War, and another building, adjoining that already occupied, was erected. During 1864, they established a wrought-iron pipe mill, at the corner of Fulton and Desplaines streets. In 1865, they built their present works, and added three new branches to their business—a malleable iron foundry, the manufacture of malleable and cast-iron fittings, and a general machine shop, in which, later, steam engines were made. Their business soon doubled, and a charter was obtained from the Legislature, incorporating the concern, under the name of the North-Western Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, of which only $15,000 was issued. R. T. Crane was the first president and Charles S. Crane the first vice-president. At this time, the amount of business annually transacted was $500,000, and the number of employes about two hundred. The higher classes of employes were given an interest in the company's business. In August, 1872, the corporate name was changed to its present style, owing to the adoption by other parties of the word North-Western and the consequent danger of confusion. In 1870, more room was required, and a four-story building was erected on Desplaines Street, adjoining that on * A sketch of Mr. Sexton appears in the Military History.

Jefferson Street; and, during 1871, a four-story wing was added, Charles S. Crane retired from the company at this time, and the business has since then been conducted by K. T. Crane. Previous to this time, the company had commenced building steam freight and passenger elevators, of which but few were then in use in Chicago, none having been, up to that time, constructed in the West. The company's first passenger elevator was placed in a hotel on the corner of Michigan Avenue and Congress Street. In 1874, the manufacture of hydraulic elevators was undertaken, and has since grown steadily. No accident has been known to ever occur with the Crane machines. During 1880, the company established agencies in other States, and they have been especially successful in New York City, despite the disadvantages always attending competition in a distant and thoroughly occupied field. Shortly after the building of steam elevators had been commenced, an accidental discovery showed that the machine was adapted to the hoisting of material for blast furnaces. The company at once set to work to design an apparatus still better suited for this class of work; the result was a great improvement on everything theretofore built. In 1880, the pipe manufacture had entirely outgrown the capacity of the mill erected in 1864, and a new mill was erected, on the corner of Canal and Judd streets. The company employs more than eleven hundred men. The capital invested is about $1,300,000, and the value of the manufactured product—in a comparatively dull season—aggregates $2,000,000. The officers of the company are now as follows: Richard T. Crane, president; C. R. Crane, vice-president; Edward Worcester, secretary; and William Kerr, treasurer.

N. S. BOUTON came to Chicago in 1846, but at that time did not remain. In 1852, he came to stay; and, in company with George W. Sizer, of Cleveland, Ohio, and A. L. Mowry, of Cincinnati, established an iron foundry on Clark Street, near Fifteenth. The style of the firm was then George W. Sizer & Co. The foundry was, in one sense, connected with the Union Car Works of Stone, Boomer & Co., as there the casting was done for the latter institution. In September, 1855, Stone, Boomer & Co., were burned out, and Mr. Bouton then purchased for them the American Bridge Company's Works, which were at that time lying idle on the lake shore. Shortly afterward, Mr. Bouton became a member of the firm, which then changed to Stone, Boomer & Bouton. With their works, which, in 1857-58, were sold to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, was connected an iron foundry, where the iron-work for cars, bridges, turntables, etc., were manufactured. The works were then known as the Union Car and Bridge Works. Previous to the sale mentioned, however, Mr. Bouton purchased from Frederick Letz his architectural cast-iron business, which he removed to the old foundry first mentioned, and which was not destroyed in the Stone & Boomer fire. In 1858, he purchased from this firm their interest in the burned premises of the old Union Car Works, and there continued business until 1862, when he took into partnership Christopher B. Bouton and Edwin F. Hurlbut, the firm name and style thereupon changing to N. S. Bouton & Co. During 1871, the company was incorporated as the Union Foundry Works, with the following officers: N. S. Bouton, president; Edwin F. Hurlbut, vice-president and superintendent; and Christopher B. Bouton, secretary and treasurer. In 1878, Edward F. Cushing became secretary and treasurer. In 1881, the company finding it desirable to seek a more available location, selected Pullman; at the same time a re-organization in the company was effected, and the name changed to the Union Foundry and Pullman Car-Wheel Works. Buildings were at once erected commensurate with the increased demand of the business, and now consist of the following departments: Car wheel, car casting, architectural jobbing, dry sand and loam. The foundries have a capacity for melting one hundred and sixty tons of iron daily. These works supply all the wheels and car castings for the Pullman Palace Car Company. The different buildings occupy twelve acres of ground. This company has left its impress upon numerous large buildings in this city, among the number, the Palmer House, the Grand Pacific Hotel, the Tremont House, the Sherman House, the Custom House and others. The skill displayed in the manufacture of heavy machinery is shown in the immense grain elevators of this and other cities. In 1833, they manufactured the Shay improved locomotive. These works employ about six hundred men, with a monthly pay-roll of about $30,000, and the annual product of their work is from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000. The officers of the company are N. S. Bouton, president, and Charles S. Cushing, secretary and treasurer.

Nathaniel S. Bouton was born in Concord, N. H., in 1823. His father was Rev. Dr. Nathaniel Bouton, and his mother was Harriet Sherman Bouton, a granddaughter of Roger Sherman, the famous statesman and philanthropist. Mr. Bouton left home at the age of fourteen to work on a farm in Connecticut. Two years later he taught school in the same State, and in 1846 made a tour of this Western country, returning to the East in the course of the following year. He then went into the employment of Fairbanks Bros., the well-known scale men, as a traveling salesman, traveling mostly on horseback, but sometimes by stage, over Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Virginia. In 1852, he came to Chicago, and became a member of the firm of George W. Sizer & Co. The firm at that time operated three works—one at Cleveland, superintended by Mr. Sizer, one at Cincinnati, under the direction of Mr. Mowry, and the one here, managed by Mr. Bouton. In 1857, Mr. Bouton was appointed superintendent of public works of Chicago, under Mayors Wentworth and Haines, a position he creditably filled for three years. He, with E. S. Chesbrough and S. S. Greeley, constituted the committee to establish the present grade of Chicago, and it was during his administration that the first paving of the streets was done. In 1862, he became quartermaster of the 88th Illinois Infantry, a position he held until after the battle of Chickamauga, when he resigned, and came home in order to give personal attention to his rapidly increasing business. Mr. Bouton has been twice married—first, in 1857, to Emily L. Bissell, daughter of Dr. Bissell, of Suffield, Conn. This lady died one year after their marriage. His second marriage was with Mrs. Ellen Shumway, of this city, daughter of Judge Gould, of Essex, N. Y.

COLLINS & BURGIE'S STOVE WORKS IN 1885.

Of the subordinate branches of the iron industry in 1860, the following table will give an adequate comprehension:

MANUFACTURES.	No. of establishments.	Capital invested.	Value of raw material.	Hands employed.	Wages.	Value of manufactured product.
Blacksmithing	9	$18,050	$33,750	27	$10,848	$30,150
Gas fixtures	1	7,000	2,000	13	4,800	15,000
Hardware, files	1	2,000	1,062	3	1,350	4,720
Scales	1	5,500	945	10	4,500	10,000
Sewing machines	2	2,500	450	4	1,080	3,000
Stoves	1	5,500	14,000	12	3,600	32,500
Tin, copper and sheet-iron ware	10	20,150	22,002	28	10,440	37,983
Allied to the foregoing	10	54,000	51,400	95	31,820	136,000

Some of the oldest houses engaged in these branches are represented in the sketches which follow:

WILLIAM BLAIR & Co.—This is the oldest wholesale hardware house in Chicago, and, with very few exceptions, the oldest business house of any kind in the city. During August, 1842, William Blair, the senior member of the firm, came to Chicago, and opened a hardware store in the frame building at the southeast corner of Dearborn and South Water streets. Mr. Blair continued the business in his own name, as both wholesale and retail, until 1844. In the spring of that year, his brother, Chauncey B. Blair, then residing at Michigan City, Ind., became a partner in the business, and added considerable capital, but took no part in the management. The increase of business and the addition of a stock of bar iron and steel required larger premises, and the firm removed the same year (1844) to the frame building at No. 75 Lake Street. During 1846, William Blair purchased his brother's interest, and associated with himself his brother-in-law, William E. Stinson, under the firm name of Blair & Stinson. A few years later, Mr. Stinson's health failed, forcing him to retire from business. The growth of the business requiring more room, the firm, in the spring of 1847, removed to No. 103 Lake Street; and in the following year Mr. Blair purchased the lot at No. 176 Lake, the site of his present store, and erected thereon a spacious building. After the decease of Mr. Stinson, in December, 1850, the business was conducted by Mr. Blair until 1853. In the spring of that year, C. B. Nelson was admitted to a partnership, and the business has since then been conducted under the firm name of William Blair & Co. The opening of the canal in 1848 made large accessions to the wholesale trade of the city from the Illinois River section, which was still further increased by the opening of a portion of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad a little later. The firm thereupon largely increased its stock, and shortly after discontinued its retail business, and became the first exclusively wholesale hardware house in the city, and the first to open up a sample-room, with goods sampled on cards for the personal inspection of customers. In the spring of 1853, Mr. Blair associated with him Elbridge G. Hall, for the establishment of a wholesale iron store on South Water Street, under the firm name of E. G. Hall & Co. The firm did a large business, and was one of the most prominent in that line in the West. In 1860, Mr. Blair withdrew from this firm, transferring his interest to Mr. Hall. In 1856, Oliver W. Belden, who had been for some years an employé in the house, was admitted into the partnership, which continued until the year 1870. It was found that still more room was required to meet the wants of their rapidly increasing business, and Mr. Blair re-built the marble-front stores, Nos. 179-81 Randolph Street, into which the firm removed in the autumn of that year. In October, 1871, this building, which contained the immense stock of the firm (together with several other valuable buildings owned by Mr. Blair) was destroyed by the great fire. Although the firm was fortunate in securing commodious quarters at Nos. 30-32 South Canal Street immediately after the fire, and in a few days were in successful operation, Mr. Blair decided to re-build at once upon the old location, and within thirty days had purchased additional ground for that purpose. The plans were so prepared as to combine every modern convenience for the use of the firm, and be suitable for the increasing wants of the trade. The result was a five story and basement building, which was completed and occupied by the firm in October, 1872. In 1871, James M. Horton, who had been for some years connected with the house, was admitted as a partner, and two years later Augustus O. Hall was also admitted, and continued his connection with the firm until 1881. In the autumn of 1865, Mr. Blair, while in England, made extensive arrangements for goods for the house, from the manufacturers in Sheffield and Birmingham. During January, 1882, C. B. Nelson, who had been for more than thirty years connected with the house, retired from the firm, and Edward T. Blair, son of the senior member, was admitted a partner. Albert E. Roof, who had been connected with the house for sixteen years, was also admitted to a partnership in January, 1884.

WILLIAM BLAIR was born in Homer, Cortland Co., N. Y., on May 20, 1818. His father, Samuel Blair, and his mother, Hannah, were both natives of Blandford, Mass., his mother being the youngest daughter of Jonathan Frary, whose ancestors were of English origin. On the paternal side, Mr. Blair is of Scottish descent. At the age of fourteen he entered the employ and became a member of the family of Oren North, a hardware merchant of Cortland. In 1836, Mr. North decided upon removing his business to Joliet, Ill., and, in July of that year, he sent young Blair forward to that place, giving him letters of introduction to Martin H. Demmond, and others. The financial troubles of 1837, however, deterred Mr. North from coming West himself, as had been his original intention, and, accordingly, he determined to close out his Western branch. Mr. Blair, aided by his two brothers, Chauncey and Lyman, then located at Michigan City, Ind., bought the stock of Mr. North, and continued the business at Joliet, until, in August, 1842, he came to Chicago and established the house here. Mr. Blair was married on June 21, 1854, to Miss Sarah M. Seymour, daughter of John Seymour, of Lyme, Ohio, a lady of most estimable character and of fine literary taste. They have had two children. The eldest, Willie Seymour Blair, a bright, promising boy, died in December, 1861, not quite six years of age; the younger, Edward Tyler Blair, graduated at Yale College in 1879, and is now a valued and trusted member of his father's firm.

JAMES M. HORTON was born in Columbia County, N. Y., in 1826. His ancestors were Hollanders, originally of English extraction, who settled at an early day in New York State. His father, George P. Horton, was born in 1798, and is still living. His mother, Margaret (Miller) Horton, died ten years since. James M. graduated from Claverack Academy, Columbia County, N. Y. Having decided to follow a mercantile life, at the age of seventeen he went to Albany, N. Y., and served an apprenticeship in the house of Pruyn, Wilson & Vosburgh, wholesale and retail dealers and importers of hardware. He subsequently became connected with the house of Erastus Corning & Co., with whom he remained a number of years; and, in 1866, he came to Chicago and became connected with the firm of William Blair & Co. In 1871, upon the retirement of Mr. Belden, Mr. Horton became a member of the firm. Before removing to the West, he married Miss Matilda McPherson, daughter of George McPherson, of Albany, N. Y. They have had four children, two of whom are living—Lillie and Leonora.

EDWARD T. BLAIR has been a resident of Chicago since his birth. He graduated from Yale College in 1879, and spent a portion of the two following years in travel, then entered the house of William Blair & Co. He married, in 1882, Miss Ruby McCormick, daughter of the late William S. McCormick, the reaper manufacturer, and has two children—William McCormick and Edith.

ALBERT E. ROOF was born in Savanna, Ill., in 1845. At the age of seventeen he commenced clerking in a general merchandise store in Savanna, and one year afterward (1862) came to Chicago, and went into the employ of Burnham & Smith, afterward Smith, Cutler & Co., wholesale druggists, with whom he remained until they sold out in 1868, when he became connected with the firm of William Blair & Co., as cashier and bookkeeper. This position he filled up to 1881, when he became a member of the firm, and has ever since had charge of the financial and credit business of the house. In 1866, he was married to Miss Catharine Milan, of Oswego, N. Y.

LARRABEE & NORTH.—This house was established in 1844 by William F. Dominick, then doing business at No. 134 Lake Street. In 1851, Charles R. Larrabee became a partner, the firm name and style then becoming William F. Dominick & Co. In 1846, however, a removal had been made to No. 174 Lake Street, which was the firm's location until 1857. In that year Mr. Dominick sold his interest to Robert L. North, and the firm name then assumed its present form. The new firm continued business at the same place until the fire, by which they were sufferers to the amount of $30,000. Within two days they resumed their business at No. 48 West Lake Street, where they remained, until in February, 1872, when they removed to the corner of West Lake and Clinton streets. Their next removal was in the spring of 1873, to No. 163 Lake Street, where they remained until, in 1878, they removed to their present location. The firm of Larrabee & North has enjoyed the reputation of being one of the soundest and safest houses in this city, and its members are highly respected as men and as citizens.

CHARLES R. LARRABEE, the senior member of the house, was born in Ticonderoga, N. Y., February 17, 1825, the son of Lucius C. and Calista (Bugbee) Larrabee. When only nineteen years of age, young Larrabee came to Chicago, and for a time was in the employ of the firm of Woodworth & Long, then proprietors of the old Hydraulic Mills. In 1844, he engaged as a clerk with, and in 1851 formed the partnership with, Mr. Dominick, and has since been connected with the house. Mr. Larrabee was married, in 1851, to Mary A. Wood, daughter of Peter Wood, a prominent lumber merchant of this city. They have eight children—Edward A., Annie D., Eleanor L., Mary C., Emily W., Rosalind C., Rollin N. and Caroline.

ROBERT L. NORTH was born in the city of New York, September 15, 1829. His parents were Robert F. and Lydia (Guion) North. The son was early given a business training, and in 1845 became a clerk in the firm of W. N. Seymour & Co., wholesale hardware merchants in New York, and was admitted to partnership in 1853. In 1857, he came to Chicago, and purchased Mr. Dominick's interest in the house of W. F. Dominick & Co., and in connection with Mr. Larrabee founded the house of which he is still a member. Mr. North was married, in 1860, to Elizabeth C. Larrabee, daughter of William M. Larrabee, of this city. They have had three children—Robert L., Jr., Guion L. and Carrie L.; the two latter are deceased.

James Smith
D. J. Spencer

SENECA D. KIMBARK.—The house of S. D. Kimbark was established in this city in 1853, by E. G. Hall & Co., of which firm Mr. Kimbark was a junior member. In 1860, the firm name was changed to Hall, Kimbark & Co., and in 1873 to Kimbark Bros., & Co. In 1876, S. D. Kimbark became sole proprietor. Had there been such a factor as chance in the founding of a legitimate mercantile business, the fire of 1871 would have wiped out many of the leading houses in Chicago. The losses of many of them were, directly or indirectly, very large, and the house of S. D. Kimbark was one of that number. And of those who survived that terrible calamity, it may be said, that it possessed that intelligence, industry and business integrity which insures success and at the same time commands the respect and confidence of all classes. These were the stepping-stones for S. D. Kimbark, and which have led him to his present position, that of controlling the largest establishment of its kind in Chicago; a position gained by his own efforts, enterprise and ability. During all the years which this house has been in existence, and the changes and fluctuations of business incident to its long career, it has maintained its commercial integrity and its standing as one of the soundest houses in the country. Increasing capital and enlarged facilities have of course prompted Mr. Kimbark to greater efforts, and some years ago he established in Michigan a factory for wagon-wood material, which is now thoroughly equipped with the best designed labor-saving machinery. A large number of hands are employed, most of whom are expert mechanics. As showing in a single statement its growth since its founding and to the present time, it may be noted that during 1853 its business approximated $250,000, and in 1883 it exceeded $1,500,000. Seneca D. Kimbark was born in Venice, Cayuga County, N. Y., on March 4, 1832, and received his education in that State, commencing with the common or district schools. He afterward attended for a few terms the academies at Geneseo and Canandaigua, where he paid the cost of his tuition by teaching school in the districts adjacent to his residence, which was, at that time, Livingston County, N. Y. To that county his parents had moved, in the year 1840. From that time he was twelve years old until he was twenty-one he worked on his father's farm, and during those years did fully a man's work at any species of labor he performed, and at the age of twenty-one came to Chicago and engaged in the iron business. In his career since that time Mr. Kimbark has been so thoroughly identified with the history of the city, that he is as well known personally and commercially as any resident here. In his political opinions, during his earlier years, he was a Democrat and an enthusiast on all political questions, being a strenuous advocate of the annexation of Texas, the War with Mexico, the Missouri Compromise, etc. The repeal of the Missouri Compromise made Mr. Kimbark an Abolitionist and, after the organization of the Republican party, he became a fervent supporter of its tenets and an uncompromising advocate of the War. He has never been a politician and, desiring no office, always kept aloof from political discussions and declined every nomination tendered him. He was married, on September 25, 1856, to Miss Elizabeth Pruyne, daughter of Peter Pruyne, who was State senator of Illinois and a colleague of Stephen A. Douglas. Mrs. Kimbark's mother is the widow of Thomas Church, formerly an old resident of Chicago. They have had four children; the eldest, Charles A., is now the financial manager of his father's business.

HIBBARD, SPENCER & Co.—Among the very oldest hardware houses in Chicago, running without cessation or failure, is the firm of Hibbard, Spencer & Co. In March, 1855, Tuttle, Hibbard & Co. founded a hardware and metal trade on South Water Street, five doors east from Dearborn. Their premises and stock were destroyed by fire in March, 1857. They began again as soon as possible, temporarily occupying a store at No. 32 Lake Street, where they remained nearly three years. In 1862, the business location was changed to the southeast corner of Lake and State streets, where the firm remained as long as they existed. On the 1st of January, 1864, F. F. Spencer and William G. Hibbard bought out the goods and business of Tuttle, Hibbard & Co., located at No. 62 Lake Street. There they were known for two years or more as Hibbard & Spencer, and afterward, as Hibbard, Spencer & Co., the company being some employes who were given an interest in the profits. As the store on State and Lake was getting too small for the rapidly extending interests of the house, about the close of 1867 a move was made to Nos. 92-94 Michigan Avenue, between Lake and Randolph. Their loss in the October fire, 1871, was very large. After being burned out, a complete and new stock was, as quickly as practicable, put into a temporary structure on the Lake Front. These quarters were kept until June, 1872, at which time the permanent buildings on Lake Street were ready for occupancy. They first used Nos. 30-32, and, as fast as room was demanded and could be secured, they have added to them, until Nos. 22-32, or six stores in the block,—each 25 x 142 feet and five stories and basement in height—are under their proprietorship. Besides, they have on the North Side a brick warehouse, into which they run cars for loading and unloading their heaviest line of goods, such as iron plate and nails. The trade of this great house extends from British Columbia to Old Mexico, and west to the Golden Gate. The first year Messrs. Hibbard & Spencer were together their total sales footed up over $500,000. Last year it ran into the millions. In January 1881, a family compact in fact, and a business agreement in general, was entered into, and an incorporation was formed, named and known as Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co. The officers were William G. Hibbard, president; Franklin F. Spencer, vice-president; A. C. Bartlett, secretary; Charles H. Conover and James W. Nye, directors. Of the old firm of Tuttle, Hibbard & Co., Frederick Tuttle has retired, Nelson Tuttle is deceased, and George M. Gray is with Pullman's Palace Car Company.

WILLIAM G. HIBBARD came to Chicago from Cortland, Cortland Co., N. Y., in 1849, and entered the employ of William Blair, his first and only engagement, until he established the firm of Tuttle, Hibbard & Co., in March, 1855. He married, in December, 1855, Miss Lydia B. VanSchaack, daughter of Henry C. VanSchaack, of Manlius, N. Y. They have had six children—two sons and four daughters.

F. F. SPENCER was born at Gewarda, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., October 13, 1817. His father, Phineas Spencer, kept a general store. F. F. was chief clerk, salesman and cashier. He came to Chicago in 1838, but was called back in the following year, by the death of his father, to settle the family estate. In 1840, F. F. Spencer married Miss Rachael G. Macomber, at New Bedford, Mass. The affairs of the estate required nearly six years of his time, so that he did not return to Chicago until the spring of 1855. He first opened the stove salesroom of Jewett & Root on South Water Street, adjoining the store of Tuttle, Hibbard & Co. In January, 1864, Mr. Spencer joined Mr. Hibbard in the purchase of the stock and fixtures of Tuttle, Hibbard & Co. Of Mr. Spencer's family two daughters are living, and one daughter and two sons deceased.

SEEBERGER, BREAKEY & Co.—The hardware firm of Seeburger, Breakey & Co. was established in 1864, by Anthony F. Seeburger and Benjamin A. Breakey, under the firm name of Seeburger & Breakey, at No. 143 Lake Street. Two years later, a removal was made to the corner of Lake and State streets, where they continued until burned out in the fire of October, 1871. In that fire their gross losses aggregated two hundred thousand dollars, saving nothing but their books, which Mr. Seeburger succeeded in getting out of the building. Immediately after the fire, they resumed business at Nos. 10 and 12 West Randolph Street, where they remained until, in August of 1872, they moved to their present quarters. In 1880, Charles D. Seeburger, son of the senior member of the firm, was admitted as a partner, the firm then assuming its present title. During 1864, their sales were only $175,000, while now they amount to $1,500,000 per annum, and are still increasing.

ANTHONY F. SEEBERGER was born in Wetzlar, Prussia, August 24, 1829, the son of John David and Dorothea (Goethe) Seeburger. The family came to America in 1837 and, after spending one year in New York City, moved to Newark, N. J., and from there to Holmes County, Ohio, where his father commenced the life of a farmer. At the age of fifteen, Anthony F. Seeburger went to Wooster, Wayne Co., Ohio, and entered the dry goods house of E. S. Johnson, remaining with him four years; he then was employed in the dry goods house of N. & J. B. Power, and, after serving a clerkship of four years, was, in 1852, admitted as a partner. In 1856, Mr. Seeburger removed to Oskaloosa, Iowa, where he opened a retail hardware store, which was the first house exclusively in that business west of the Mississippi-river towns of Iowa. He continued there up to January, 1864, when he removed to Chicago, and organized the firm of Seeburger & Breakey. In September, 1885, Mr. Seeburger's business ability received recognition from President Cleveland in his appointment to the collectorship of the Port. Mr. Seeburger was married, August 26, 1856, to Jennie L. Cooper, daughter of Charles Cooper, a prominent manufacturer of machinery in Mt. Vernon, Ohio. They have three children—Charles D., Louis A. and Dora A.

BENJAMIN A. BREAKEY was born in December, 1833, in Greenbush, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., the son of Isaiah and Harriet (Akin) Breakey. Having lost both parents before he was fourteen years of age, Mr. Breakey chose the calling of a merchant. At the age of fifteen, he was employed in a store at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he remained until in 1854. Then he came to Chicago, and was employed with the house of E. D. Ely & Co., in the wholesale iron trade. A year later, he entered the employ of William Blair, and continued with him until in 1864, when, in company with Mr. Seeberger, he started in business on his own account. Mr. Breakey was married, in August, 1864, to Marcia Crapo, daughter of Seth Crapo, of Albany, N. Y. They have two children—Benjamin A. and Charlotte Crapo.

CHARLES D. SEEBERGER was born in Oskaloosa, Iowa, May 12, 1857. At the age of six, he came with his parents to Chicago, where he was educated and prepared for college, entering the scientific school at Yale College, from which institution he graduated in 1876. He then entered the employ of his father's firm, with whose business he has since been connected, and was admitted as a partner in 1880. Mr. Seeberger married, October 15, 1879, Emma B. Bridge, daughter of L. K. Bridge, of New York City, upon whose death the daughter went to live with her grandfather, Hon. Henry B. Curtis, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio, at which place they were married. They have one child—Lucia.

The surprising growth of the iron industry in Chicago, from 1860 to 1870, will appear from a comparison of the preceding tables with the following, which has been compiled from the census report of the latter year. Not only had eight new branches of manufactures sprung up, but the number of establishments had increased 183 per cent.; the capital invested represented $6,293,000, as against $1,106,000 in 1860; while more than four times as many hands were employed.

A TABLE SHOWING THE STATISTICS OF THE IRON MANUFACTURES OF CHICAGO IN 1870.

MANUFACTURES.	No. of establishments.	Capital invested.	No. of employes.	Wages.	Value of raw material.	Value of manufactured product.
Agricultural implements.....	4	$855,000	734	$ 5,000	$ 2,000	$ 11,000
Hardware.....	4	96,000	132	56,652	120,345	951,269
Heating apparatus.....	2	40,000	46	30,000	39,000	90,000
Iron, forged and rolled.....	6	2,069,000	1,462	868,082	1,250,922	2,564,496
Anchor and cable chains.....	1	25,000	50	6,000	12,000	20,000
Nails and spikes.....	2	60,000	48	38,785	124,310	245,744
Pipe, wrought.....	1	50,000	30	15,000	85,000	101,000
Railing, wrought.....	3	41,000	23	13,082	28,800	50,379
Castings, not specified.....	22	789,000	833	470,316	1,021,321	1,707,848
Castings, stoves, heaters, etc.....	3	150,000	94	61,200	66,150	170,800
Machinery, not specified.....	23	807,000	633	360,750	564,952	1,143,614
Engines and boilers.....	4	610,000	596	309,322	397,822	912,430
Pumps.....	4	58,000	32	15,749	26,823	75,669
Safes, doors and vaults.....	2	95,000	58	31,795	28,200	110,030
Saws.....	2	95,000	14	8,600	2,802	22,860
Scales and balances.....	2	40,000	27	16,600	21,400	87,000
Sewing-machine fixtures.....	2	6,000	32	12,400	3,065	20,000
Steel springs.....	1	15,000	9	5,304	15,100	21,000
Tin, copper and sheet-iron ware.....	49	374,000	433	216,803	386,527	803,976
Wire work.....	3	18,000	26	8,630	47,500	63,700

THE McCORMICK REAPING MACHINE.—Chicago may justly lay claim to being the home of the reaping machine which has done more for the enlargement and development of agriculture than any other single instrumentality that can be named. The invention of the reaping machine revealed a method never before dreamed of, whereby the farmer could cultivate a thousand acres and secure his crop as easily as on a ten-acre patch by the old method. The idea of gathering grain by some sort of a machine is not a recent conception, as history recites, as far back as the beginning of the Christian era, that crude efforts were made to cut grain with a machine propelled by oxen; and though these efforts failed, generation after generation continued the attempt, making, however, little progress toward success. The records of the patent offices in this country and in Europe reveal many strange contrivances, invented to accomplish the end in view, but, after having had their brief day, nothing survived that even implied success. Among those who tried their inventive skill in this direction, was Robert McCormick, the father of Cyrus H. McCormick, a native of Rockbridge County, Va. He constructed a reaper according to his ideas, but like all his predecessors, after the most persistent efforts, he abandoned it as impracticable.

Cyrus Hall McCormick, his son, then twenty-two years old, took hold of the discarded machine, and, after careful study, with his own hands constructed a reaper on a wholly different plan, which he tested publicly at Steele's Tavern, Va., in the harvest of 1831, and demonstrated that it was a success. The machine was at first named the Virginia Reaper, in honor of the inventor's native State; but after coming into general use its name was changed to the American Reaper, which name was eventually discarded as not being sufficiently explicit in its expression of its cosmopolitan use. In 1834, his first patent was secured, and soon after he began the manufacture of the machine on a very limited scale, while engaged in other pursuits. Serious financial losses in his other business compelled him to concentrate his energies on the reaping machine, and in 1845 its manufacture was commenced in Cincinnati, Ohio, and the same year another patent was granted him for important improvements. In 1846-47-48, it was also manufactured, under a royalty, in Brockport, N. Y., and additional patents issued in 1847-48 for further improvements. During 1847, Mr. McCormick moved to Chicago, and, associating with him Charles M. Gray,* under the firm name of McCormick & Gray, commenced the manufacture of the machine in the West, and in 1848, in a limited partnership, under the firm name of McCormick, Ogden & Co., he began the construction of the improved machine in such numbers as the public demand warranted. After the Chicago works were completed, the building of seven hundred machines was ventured on for 1848, which appeared a most hazardous venture to some people, because of the scarcity of capital. But, about this time, Mr. McCormick began to fully realize the value of his machine to the farming community and the consequent immense possibilities to the manufacturer. These machines were all sold, and the enterprise was thereafter an assured success. The partnership with William B. Ogden having expired by limitation in 1850, the late O. M. Dorman, of Chicago, took a year's interest, under the firm name of C. H. McCormick & Co., when the manufacture was increased to one thousand six hundred machines.

At the end of the year, Mr. McCormick conducted the business in his own name, which was retained until 1860, when he associated with him his brothers, William S. and Leander J. McCormick, under the firm name of C. H. McCormick & Bros., which continued until the death of William S. in 1865, when the firm became C. H. McCormick & Bro., and subsequently C. H. & L. J. McCormick. In 1880, the members of this firm organized under the State laws of Illinois as a joint-stock company, with a paid-up capital of $2,500,000. The shares were almost exclusively in the hands of the president, C. H. McCormick, and the vice-president, L. J. McCormick, the former holding a three-fourths interest in the stock.

The cut of the original machine displays that it was a very plain-looking affair, and remarkable for its simplicity. The operator followed the machine on foot, raking off the sheaves when sufficient grain had gathered on the platform. This original machine, however, did its work as efficiently as the more ornate machines of the present day, while it contained all the essential features of all reaping machines, such as the combination of the side-delivery platform, the revolving reel, the divider and the reciprocating knife in projecting fingers, all deriving action from the forward motion of the machine. It is recognized as the type and pattern after which every reaping machine of the present day is modeled, and it is a notable fact that no inventor, so far, has been able to devise any successful method of harvesting grain which could dispense with the essential features above specified.

* Now—1885—Assistant General Freight Agent L. S. & M. S. R. R.

Spain, France and Great Britain. Recently, in a single season, one hundred and twelve car-loads were shipped to New York, en route for New Zealand, to fill a single order. The McCormick machine has been exhibited at every World's Fair or International Field Trial possible; and since the first in London, in 1851, to the last at Louisville, Ky., in 1884, in competition with the world's reaping machines, it has invariably carried off the highest honors.

THE ORIGINAL MCCORMICK REAPER, INVENTED IN 1831

The first important improvement was made in 1847, by adding a seat for the driver, and adjusting the machine so that there was place thereon where the operator could rake. These added advantages at once made it exceedingly popular. In 1851, the straight-edge sickle was superseded by a knife made in sectional plates, which presented such an angled cutting-edge to the projecting fingers as enabled the machine to mow grass as successfully as it cut grain. The next important step was the invention of the raking apparatus, which dispensed with the labor of one man on the machine. This was achieved at the outbreak of the Civil War, when the need of able-bodied men in the army rendered this labor-saving device an incalculable boon to the farmers.

The next marked advance was in 1875, when the automatic wire-binder was brought into use, which was perhaps the greatest improvement made since the invention of the original machine, and which was still further improved by the substitution of twine for wire.

The machine, as now perfected, is capable of cutting and binding in sheaves at the rate of two acres an hour, under the sole management of any boy or girl having skill enough to drive the span of horses attached to it.

The following table shows the increase in sales in periods of ten years:

Built and sold during year 1848, 700 machines.

Built and sold during year 1858, 5,000 machines, an increase of 600 per cent.

Built and sold during year 1868, 10,000 machines, an increase of 100 per cent.

Built and sold during year 1878, 18,000 machines, an increase of 80 per cent.

Built and sold during year 1884, 54,841 machines, an increase of 200 per cent.

This marvellous increase in demand, since the full value of the twine-binder has been appreciated, is as great abroad as at home. Extensive shipments are made every season to New Zealand, Australia, Africa, South America, and to Russia, Germany, Italy,

Grand Prize, Bronze Medal—World's Fair, London, England, 1851.
 Highest Prize, Grand Gold Medal—Universal Exposition, Paris, France, 1855.
 Grand Prize, Bronze Medal—International Exhibition, London, England, 1862.
 Grand Gold Medal—International Exposition, Hamburg, Germany, 1863.
 Grand Prize, Gold Medal—Universal Exposition, Paris, France, 1867.

Cross of the Legion of Honor—Universal Exposition, Paris, France, 1867.

Two Grand Gold Medals—Universal Exposition, Vienna, Austria, 1873.

Two Bronze Medals—Centennial Exposition, U. S., 1876.

Grand Prize, Gold Medal—Universal Exposition, Paris, France, 1878.

Special Gold Medal—French Minister of Agriculture, Universal Exposition, Paris, France, 1878.

Object of Art—Society of Agriculture, International Exhibition, Paris, France, 1878.

Decoration of Officer of the Legion of Honor—Universal Exposition, Paris, France, 1878.

Gold Medal—Royal Agricultural Society, England—Best Wire Sheaf-Binder, 1878.

Gold Medal—International Exposition, Melbourne, Victoria, 1880.

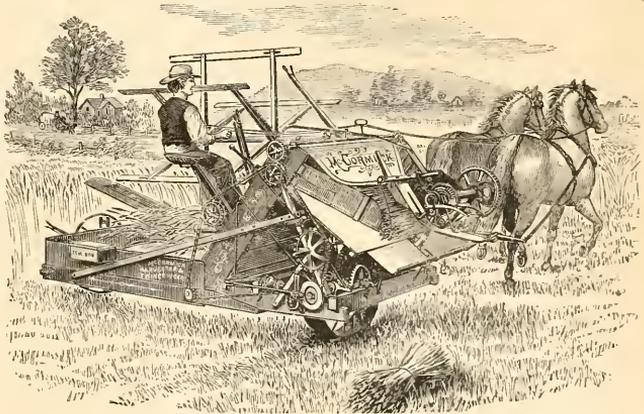

Gold Medal—Royal Agricultural Society, England—Best Twine Sheaf-Binder, 1881.

Gold Medal—New Zealand International Exhibition, Christchurch, 1882.

Gold Medal and $200 Prize—Grosseto International Field Trial, near Rome, Italy, 1883.

Medals—Southern Exposition, Louisville, Ky., 1883 and 1884.

The McCormick machines are only built at Chicago, and the works are of imposing dimensions. They were originally located near the mouth of the Chicago River, on North Water Street, between Pine and Sand streets, but, after they were destroyed by the fire of 1871, the location was changed to a tract of twenty-four acres at the intersection of Blue Island and Western avenues.

NEW STEEL HARVESTER AND BINDER.

CYRUS HALL MCCORMICK was the eldest son of Robert and Mary Ann (Hall) McCormick, whose immediate ancestors had emigrated from the North of Ireland and settled in Virginia. Like most of the Scotch-Irish race, they were a thrifty, God-fearing couple, who trained their children after the strictest custom of the Presbyterianism of those days. In his boyhood, Cyrus showed a genius for mechanical pursuits, and spent much of his leisure in tinkering with tools. In this respect he had more than ordinary advantages, for his father, who was an extensive Southern planter, owned, also, several saw and grist mills, and kept a carpenter and blacksmith shop, in which were made and repaired many of the tools used on the farm. During these years, young Cyrus was improving his time in the study of machinery and the use of tools, while assisting his father in various ways. By the time he was fifteen years old, he had constructed a grain-cradle for his own use in the harvest field, being ambitious of doing his share of the harvest work, which he could not accomplish with the cumbersome cradle then in use. A few years later he invented a hill-side plow, which was the first self-sharpening plow ever invented. Inspired with his success in making such an improvement in the grain-cradle, he turned his thoughts to his father's abandoned reaper. His father was opposed to his spending any time on what to him was a hopeless enterprise, but the more the young man studied the subject, the more sanguine he became that he could finally solve the problem. At length he gained his father's consent, and engaged all the power of his mind in the enterprise. Carefully avoiding the errors that had proved fatal to others, he mapped out an original plan. He finally became convinced that grain standing in the field could only be successfully cut by operating on it in a body, and that the cutting must be done by an edged instrument having a reciprocating motion as it advanced. Slowly the features of the machine projected themselves upon his mind; first, the reel to gather and hold up the grain in a body; second, the sickle with its fast reciprocating and slow advancing motions; and, third, the receiving platform on which the grain could fall and be cared for. These salient points being decided on, it remained to make them co-operating parts of one machine. This he achieved, and then mounted it on wheels, which, by intermediate gearing, conveyed the required motion to the cutting; sickle and gathering reel. In 1831, the reaper was publicly tested in the presence of many of Virginia's best farmers, and triumphed in the harvesting of several acres of oats. The following year it cut fifty acres of wheat. Though his invention was a success, Mr. McCormick became convinced that such a machine was in advance of the requirements of the times, so he turned his attention to the iron smelting business for a time, as it promised more immediate and smelter returns. The financial panic of 1837 came, and, in the midst of it, his partner, becoming alarmed, mortgaged his private property to his friends and left the iron business and Mr. McCormick to their fate. This catastrophe, however, only brought into clearer outline the true character of the man. Girding himself with unbending courage, patience, economy and perseverance, he entered upon the work of extricating himself; and, having the unquestioned confidence of the entire community in his favor, he finally succeeded in liquidating every claim, though at the sacrifice of everything but honor and integrity. Thus stripped of all entanglements, he turned his whole time and attention to the improvement and introduction of his reaper into general use. Being without means, he was compelled to contract with other parties to build them, and then devote a large share of his time canvassing among the farmers for their sale. In 1845, he removed to Cincinnati, where he had contracted for building a supply of machines for introduction in the West; but not being satisfied with his business arrangements there, he removed to Chicago in 1847, and, by the erection of his own reaper works, placed the manufacture of the reaper, for the first time, upon a firm and permanent basis. As showing the difficulties the young inventor encountered, in his efforts to improve, manufacture and introduce to public notice his reaper, some extracts from a statement made to the Commissioner of Patents on January 1, 1848, are appended, the original being on file in the patent office. It shows that Mr. McCormick's pathway to fame and fortune was not strewn with roses, but, on the contrary, every step of advance for many years was fought for, inch by inch, and that only by the force of his indomitable will was he enabled to win the victory at last.

"From the experiment of 1831 until the harvest of 1840, I did not sell a single reaper, except one, which I afterwards took back, although during that time I had made many exhibitions of it, and received favorable notices of those exhibitions; but experience proved to me that it was best for the public, as well as myself, that no sales were made, as defects presented themselves which would have rendered the reaper unprofitable in other hands. From time to time a great many improvements were found necessary, requiring a great deal of thought and study, sometimes flattered, at others discouraged, and at all times deeming it best not to attempt sales either of machines or rights to manufacture, until satisfied that the reaper would succeed well; and the great variety of situations in which it was necessary to operate, in relation to the condition of the grain and ground, together with the short time in each year for experimenting, and also the failure of some crops, added much to the difficulty and delay in introducing and completing the reaper. I was not sufficiently satisfied of its being a 'useful' machine, to patent the reaper until the year 1834, its construction and proportions having been imperfect, requiring much effort to make them, whilst light, yet simple, strong and durable. In 1839, I worked a reaper in my father's harvest, having then added improvements on the fingers, with great success, which reaper, after giving public notice, I exhibited about the close of harvest, in cutting oats for Mr. Joseph Smith, of Augusta County, to the delight of a large number of farmers present. But one farmer (Mr. Abraham Smith) of those present ordered a reaper for the next harvest, as I did not then feel that it was safe to warrant its performance, but I published in a Richmond paper the account given of that exhibition by the spectators, which induced two farmers from James River to call on me, who unconditionally applied for two reapers, but I finally concluded to send but one (they being neighbors), which one, and the one engaged at the exhibition, were the only reapers disposed of for the harvest of 1840—and they failed to operate well. These gentlemen could, of course, say nothing in favor of the reaper that year, and all I could do was to correct the defects in these two machines for 1841. I put a new sickle into Mr. Smith's machine, having the angle of the teeth reversed on the edge, every one and a half inches alternately, so as to cut equally in both directions; and the machine then performed so satisfactorily, that, in addition to Mr. Smith's certificate, I warranted the performance of the reaper in every respect, and, from that account, upon those terms, sold, for the harvest of 1842, seven reapers, and they all gave satisfaction, allowance being made for defects, which I had afterwards to correct. From the certificates given of the operation of the reapers used in the harvest of 1842, twenty-nine were sold for 1843, considerably improved, having a fly-wheel attached to the crank, and some further additions, which gave general satisfaction. But twenty-eight of them were ultimately paid for. Subsequent to the harvest of 1843, I sold to Mr. James M. Hite, of Clark County, Va., the right to supply with the reaper, until the expiration of the original patent, eight counties around him, for $1,333, and I sold to Colonel M. Tutwiler, of Fluvanna County, Virginia, the right to supply with the reaper, for the same time, that part of Virginia situated south of James River and of the Blue Ridge, for $2,500. I sold to I. Parker, of Richmond, Virginia, a machine manufacturer, the right to supply with the reaper, for the same time, five counties, for which I was to receive $500, but at his death, at the request of his executor, I cancelled the contract. I also sold, for the same time, the right to supply with the reaper the County of Washington, Ind., and a county in Michigan, for $200 each. For the harvest of 1844, fifty reapers were sold, eight of which were sent from the Virginia manufactory to other States, one to New York, one to Wisconsin, one to Missouri, one to Iowa, one to Ohio, one to Illinois, and two to Tennessee—but four of which reached their destination in time for harvest, though six of them were ultimately paid for at reduced prices. During the harvest of 1844, after attending to the harvest in Virginia, I went to Western New York, Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri and Ohio, to attend to the introduction of the reaper. At Brockport, N. Y., I sold two county rights to manufacture, for $100 each, to Backus, Fitch & Co., and contracted with them to manufacture forty reapers for the harvest of 1845; but they failed to manufacture any reapers under this contract, nor did they give me notice of the failure, until I arrived there in the harvest of 1845, with an improved reaper, taken from Cincinnati, which did not do more than pay expenses. I sold to Mr. McCoy, of Southport (now Kenosha), Wis., the right to supply with the same, until expiration of the original patent, four counties, for $1,000, on time, but which contract he never complied with, and which was afterwards cancelled, without my receiving anything as indemnity. The reaper sent to Missouri performed well on trial, and I contracted with Henry Bear, of Cooper County, to manufacture and pay my fees of sale of $20 each. Under this contract he built twenty reapers—badly, I suppose; and stated that he had received unfavorable reports of their operations, except four. I have not yet received anything for any of them, and doubt whether I ever shall. At Cincinnati, I contracted with Mr. A. C. Brown for the manufacture of two hundred reapers for harvest of 1845, provided orders could be obtained in time for that number. In consequence of experimenting against my advice in the manufacturing, and bad management in other respects, he did not get them completed in time, failed to give the necessary attention to them, and, on the whole, failed to do well, though, admitted by himself, to be his own fault. For the harvest of 1845, I had also constructed, at Cincinnati, the first reaper, substantially on the plan as patented on 23d October last, which was taken to New York; and I then further contracted with A. Fitch & Co., to manufacture one hundred reapers for Western New York, for the harvest of 1846, and with Seymour, Morgan & Co., of the same place (Brockport), for one hundred for the prairie country. Of the one hundred reapers built by Fitch & Co., of Brockport, for the harvest of 1846, only about thirty were finally sold that year, in consequence of the harvest being in a very unfavorable state, together with prejudices, want of experience, some bad sickles, etc. From that contract I have realized nothing, and doubt whether I shall, except that I sold twenty-three of the machines in Iowa, last harvest, with some profit. Seymour & Morgan of Brockport, manufactured two hundred and twelve reapers for 1847, and disposed of them on orders from the prairie country. One hundred reapers were also disposed of by Messrs. Gray & Warner, of Chicago, Ill., and forty by D. I. Townsend, of Kendall County, Ill. For the next harvest I have contracted for the manufacture of about nine hundred reapers—one hundred by D. I. Townsend, five hundred by McCormick & Gray (myself and C. M. Gray), at Chicago, and three hundred by the Brockport companies. The foregoing embraces, as nearly as I can give it, a full and complete account of my operations with the reaper, to the present time, and in it no allowance whatever is made for my time and expenses, which latter have been very heavy during the whole time. In relation to the "ascertained value" of this machine, I may just say that a great many farmers have certified that it will pay for itself in a single harvest, and I have no doubt that such is the fact estimating its saving of grain as well as of labor. This, it will readily be observed, must be the case, if the warranty be fulfilled, and the low price at which it is sold, together with the great saving realized from its operation, places it within the reach of every farmer who would need it. Moreover, I would not be willing to, nor have I found any manufacturer who does, sell any threshing machine in the country, at the common price of the same, warranted as I warrant this machine, and I have never yet sued a man for the price of a reaper. By consolidating the manufacturing as much as possible, and thus taking the better care to have well executed workmanship, as will be the case by my arrangements at Chicago, where expensive machinery has been erected for the business, I believe the interests of the manufacturer and purchaser may be mutually promoted.

Cyrus H. McCormick

MCCORMICK REAPER WORKS.

Very Respectfully,

C. H. McCORMICK.

"To Hon. EDMUND BURKE,
"Commissioner of Patents."

After the success of the machine was made an assured fact, Mr. McCormick spent much of his time abroad, in bringing his machine to the notice of European agriculturists. In 1851, he, in person, attended the World's Fair in London, with his machine. During the early weeks of the exhibition, it was the subject of much ridicule on the part of those who knew nothing of its character or work. Even the London Times, in an article casting contempt on the poor show made in the American Department, characterized the reaper as a monstrosity, something like a "cross between an Astley chariot, a wheelbarrow and a flying-machine." But a few weeks later, when this machine was put at work in the English harvest fields, ridicule was turned into admiration; and when, subsequently, after prolonged tests, the Grand Council Medal was awarded to its inventor on the ground of the originality and value of his American Reaper, the same paper said that it was equal in value to the cost of the entire exhibition. The public press throughout Christendom rang with his praises, and Mr. McCormick suddenly found himself the lion of the day, and was cheered, fêted and toasted wherever he went through the kingdom.

The following is a specimen of the enthusiasm with which the press everywhere noted the great event:

Correspondence of the Journal of Commerce.

LONDON, August 20, 1851.

"Among all the agricultural implements exhibited in the Great Exhibition—and their number and variety are very great—the Great Medal has been awarded to one, and that of American invention—it is Mr. McCormick's Virginia Reaper. At an early period after the opening of the Exhibition, it was made an especial subject of sneers in the newspapers, as one of the awkward and outlandish traps from the United States. It has been thoroughly tested on different farms, and now attracts perhaps more attention than any other object in the Exhibition. The Koh-i-noor is voted below contempt by the side of the Virginia Reaper. You doubtless have seen the hearty commendation of it in the Times. Some English gentlemen of great mark have expressed to me the opinion that it is the most valuable and important contribution made to England by the Exhibition."

At subsequent International Expositions, he was equally successful, as the table heretofore given shows. In addition to these honors, Mr. McCormick was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor, at Paris in 1867, and, at the succeeding Exposition of 1873, further honored with the decoration of Officer of the Legion of Honor, and was elected a member of the Academy of Science, in the Department of Rural Economy, as "having done more for the cause of agriculture than any other living man." Unlike most inventors, Mr. McCormick has been noted for the energy and shrewdness of an eminently successful business man, having had in himself the rare combination of ingenuity to invent, skill to manufacture, and tact to manage a business that has been extended all over the world. In 1838, Mr. McCormick married a daughter of the late Melzar Fowler, a niece of Judge E. G. Merick, of Detroit—a lady whose gentleness, charity and good deeds adorn the position she occupies. This happy union was blessed with a family of three daughters and four sons. Two of the children died in infancy. Mr. McCormick was a Presbyterian, and his Christianity took a very practical turn during his life, he being noted for his comprehensive and unostentatious benevolence. He bestowed of his abundance to all the interests of the Presbyterian Church, and, by giving during his lifetime, he was afforded the satisfaction of seeing the full accomplishment of his purpose. He was the founder of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago, and, in 1850, donated $100,000 to endow a professorship in that Institution; and during the years of its early struggles, and before its ultimate success and permanency were secured, his purse was ever open to replenish its empty treasury, until the amount of his original donation was increased nearly fourfold. He made Chicago his home for thirty-seven years past, and his name therefore is intimately connected with its growth and prosperity in a great variety of ways. He was the owner of some of the most extensive and costly business blocks in the city, and was among the very first to commence building after the great fire of 1871. While in Paris, in 1878, Mr. McCormick had a severe attack of a malignant carbuncle on his neck, and submitted to a painful operation in its removal without the use of anesthetics. The shock to his system was great, and it was many months before he recovered sufficient strength to undertake the voyage homeward. By careful nursing at his summer retreat at Richfield Springs, he was much benefited, and his friends, for a time, believed he would rapidly regain all his lost vigor; but rheumatic affections began to interfere with his accustomed horseback riding, and, as a consequence, his general health became impaired. Visits to the Hot Springs for a time seemed to benefit him but he was compelled to remain for the greater part of the time at home. This confinement, for one who had been all his lifetime so actively employed, was a sore burden; nevertheless, he bore it with remarkable patience and fortitude. It was not a little remarkable that, notwithstanding his bodily infirmities, his mind and memory were as clear as in his best days, and he was able to grapple with any business problem brought before him, and give his conclusions and orders with the utmost exactness. Indeed, up to his final illness, he insisted on being consulted, and engaged in all the perplexing questions of the immense business he controlled. When expostulated with by his friends about not retiring from business, he at one time replied: "I know of no better place for a man to die than in the harness."

On May 13, 1884, Mr. McCormick passed peacefully away. He had amassed a large fortune as the result of his great invention. Since his decease, the stockholders elected his eldest son, C. H. McCormick, Jr., to the office of president, a position for which his father had been training him for several years past, and which he always held during his life.

CYRUS H. McCORMICK, JR., is twenty-six years of age. He is a graduate of the Chicago High School and of Princeton College. Being executor of his father's estate (jointly with his mother), as well as president of the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company, he occupies a place of great responsibility, and seems to appreciate the full weight of the burdens laid so early on his shoulders, of which he fain would have escaped the responsibility. He seems desirous of walking in the footsteps of his illustrious father, and in every way shows himself capable of managing, with due discretion, the interests confided to his care. In addition to his official duties, he manages to devote some time to the interests of the Young Men's Christian Association, of which he is vice-president. He is also a director in one of our largest city banks, and, like his father, is a devout Presbyterian. As might be expected, he takes a deep interest in the work of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the Northwest, which his father founded and so lavishly fostered during his lifetime. The best evidence of this abiding interest in his father's work, and of his own generous nature, is a donation of $100,000 made by himself and his mother at the late annual meeting of the directors and trustees of that institution. This gift has paid every dollar of debt of the seminary, increased its endowment fund, and placed it in the first rank of such Christian institutions.

C. H. McCormick, Jr.

CHARLES A. SPRING, JR., the general superintendent of the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company, has been connected with the works since August, 1858. He was born in Boston, Mass., on August 25, 1826. His parents removed to New York during his early childhood, and, in the fall of 1837, came to Illinois and located at Rock Island, where he received his education. He came to Chicago in August, 1851, and engaged in the boot and shoe business at No. 179 Lake Street. He sold out his interest in that business in October, 1857, and the following year entered the employment of Cyrus H. McCormick. In September, 1865, upon the death of William S. McCormick, he succeeded him as manager of the business, and held that position until October, 1873, when, on account of ill health, he resigned his engagement with Mr. McCormick; but in December, 1874, at Mr. McCormick's urgent solicitations, he returned to that company and took the management of Mr. McCormick's real estate interests, holding that position until the present Harvesting Machine Company was formed, when he was elected general superintendent, which office he has since retained. Mr. Spring was married in the fall of 1853, to Miss Ellen M. Spring, of East Hartford, Conn.; she died in January, 1860, leaving one daughter, who died in 1881, leaving two children. In February, 1866, Mr. Spring married Miss Eugenia B. Keith, of Oxford, Maine.

THE LUMBER INTEREST.

Reference to the prefatory matter of this volume will enable the reader to comprehend the necessity for curtailment of much historic narration that might advantageously have been presented in this work. Among other subjects, the lumber interests have compulsorily been abridged, not because of the lack of potency in their factorship as a portion of Chicago's commercial greatness, or for want of historical interest, for in both these subjects is the lumber history replete. But from the facts here given sufficient data can be derived, whereby the full history in the ensuing volume can be intelligently comprehended.

EARLY TRANSACTIONS.—By reference to the first volume of this History, the extent of the lumber business from 1833 to 1857 inclusive, may be learned. Therein, on page 558, are shown the receipts of lumber in various forms from 1847 to 1857. It is there stated that David Carver was the first lumber merchant in Chicago, owning a schooner named after himself, and shipping from St. Joseph, Mich., in the summer of 1833, the first cargo of lumber to Chicago. This lumber, which was whitewood and pine, was unloaded from his vessel on scows, and unloaded from the scows on the south bank of the river between Dearborn and State streets, and used in erecting St. Mary's church-building. In 1833, E. B. Williams erected a small frame grocery on South Water Street, but where the lumber came from no one now remembers. In the same year, or possibly the year before, John Mann, who resided on the Calumet River, near the site of South Chicago, had a raft of square building-timber made, that he poled from the mouth of the Calumet to the mouth of the Chicago River, but for which, for some time, he could find no sale. At length, Joseph Adams, partly from friendship for John Mann, bought the timber, and subsequently sold it to Nelson R. Norton, a builder, for $100. With this timber Mr. Norton built the Dearborn-street bridge, the first bridge across the main-river. About this time, supposing the raft to have come in 1833, a small schooner, named the "General Harrison," brought in a cargo of whitewood lumber from some point in Michigan, which had to be unloaded from the vessel on flatboats and scows; but when the "General Harrison" arrived with her second cargo, the pier had been completed by Lieutenant Allen, and the spring freshet of 1834 had washed away a portion of the sand-bar at the mouth of the river, consequently the schooner found her way, without difficulty, into the river. Lorin P. Hilliard—1849—was one of the early lumber dealers in Chicago, as was Newton Rossiter—1844. In 1834, George Smith, the banker, owning a vessel plying between Buffalo and Chicago, picked up a cargo of fifty thousand feet of lumber on his way back from the former to the latter place. This lumber was sold to Thomas Cook, and unloaded on the river bank, between Randolph and Washington streets.

EARLY SAW-MILLS.—In this connection it is proper to mention one or two of the first saw-mills in the vicinity of Chicago. One of these was the pit-mill of Mr. Cammack, which was located near the present Kinzie-street bridge, the exact spot being that now occupied by the Fulton elevator. Mr. Cammack was the top-sawyer, and his son John worked in the pit. Another of those who served the cause of lumber manufacture was William Lester, of whom it is recorded, in the files of the Northwestern Lumberman,* that having failed to put in successful operation his perpetual motion machine, he applied his talents to the construction of a wind saw-mill, which was also located near the Kinzie-street bridge. In 1836, a small "pocket" saw-mill was built on the North Branch, about where Chicago Avenue crosses it; which was esteemed wonderful in its day, and was visited on Sundays by numerous people. The material, which it was used to manufacture was obtained from the elm, oak and whitewood trees which then covered the North Side.

EARLY DEALERS.—Returning to the lumber dealers, it may be stated that in 1833, Kinzie (John H.) & Hunter (David)—afterward Major-General, had a warehouse on the north side of the river, east of the present Rush-street bridge; and Captain Carver's lumber yard was a short distance west of the present State-street bridge, where was built a light dock—Newberry & Dole's—upon which vessels unloaded their cargoes of lumber. Mr. Carver sold out in 1839, to George W. Snow, who occupied the same ground for a number of years. The earliest lumber shipped to Chicago came from St. Joseph, Mich.; but in 1844, a Mr. Conroe built a mill at Manitowoc, Wisconsin, and shipped from this mill lumber to Taylor (Augustin Deodat) & Spalding (F. S.), a lumber firm who handled it on commission. Among other early lumber dealers the following are given: Charles E. Avery, who commenced business in Chicago in 1837, at the corner of LaSalle and South Water streets, obtaining his lumber from Singapore, near the Kalamazoo River. He continued in business a short time and left the city before 1844.

Augustin D. Taylor, of the firm of Taylor & Spalding, opened a yard on South Water Street east of State, and for a number of years bought lumber by the cargo which he brought to Chicago in a vessel named the "Commerce." This vessel he purchased of Oliver Newberry in 1836, and, after owning it about a year, re-built it almost entirely, and then changed its name to "Hiram Pearsons." He afterward sold this vessel to Mr. Hurlbut, who sold it to Mr. Conroe. The schooner "Hiram Pearsons" was a vessel of about one hundred tons burden; and after Mr. Taylor sold it, he gradually disposed of his lumber and went out of the business.

Another early firm of lumber manufacturers † and dealers were Jabez Barber and Richard Mason, who were steam-engine builders of Montreal. They went to Spring Lake, near Grand Haven, Mich., to work at their trade, but neither the year nor their employers can be discovered. Before their first engine was completed, their employers failed, and they themselves completed the engine and set it to work sawing lumber; and as they had no team, they hired a man and his wife to roll the saw-logs into the mill. After getting the mill into operation, Mr. Barber came to Chicago and established himself in the lumber business in 1837, the firm name being Barber & Mason, Mr. Mason remaining in Michigan to attend to the business there. Mr. Barber's lumber yard was located originally on Market Street, near Randolph; in 1848, it was on Canal Street, between Madison and Monroe; in 1852 he had, in addition to this yard, another one located between Charles and Van Buren streets, having leased this lot of Mary C. Taylor, mother of A. D. Taylor. The latter location appears to have been abandoned during 1854, and his business continued at the former place until 1856.

* By George W. Hotchkiss, at present secretary of the Lumbermen's Exchange.

† On account of the limited space in this volume, the publication of a large number of individual notices and historical matter is unavoidably deferred until the ensuing volume.

Mr. Barber was a manufacturer of, and dealer in, lumber, shingles and lath, and amassed a very large fortune in his business. In 1855, he, with his wife and one child, went to Europe, embarking on the return voyage at Liverpool, England, January 23, 1856, on the ill-fated Collins steamer "Pacific," which was never afterward heard from. Mr. Barber, in his will, inventoried his estate at over a quarter of a million of dollars, and therein Sylvester Lind and Samuel Slater were made executors, with power to carry on the lumber business. This they did for some three or four years; but the immense property of Mr. Barber, from commercial reversions, losses and other causes, was so reduced by April, 1866, that there were left only the homestead and the Duncan's Addition property—the latter being worth at the time about twenty thousand dollars, which, on a contest of the will decided by Judge John M. Wilson, passed to Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Wilde, parents of Mrs. Jabez Barber.

Willis King was one of the early lumber merchants in Chicago, having established himself at the Randolph-street bridge in 1837. In 1839, he is mentioned in the Directory for that year as a lumber merchant. In 1844, he was a "lumberer" at George W. Snow's. In 1845, he was a member of the firm of King & Tinkham, a lumber firm, with their office at No. 199 South Water Street. In 1851, this firm ceased to exist, and Mr. King disappeared from the city.

The firm of Milne & Morrison, composed of Robert Milne and Alexander Morrison, was established in 1836, having their lumber yard on South Water Street, near Franklin. The firm ceased to exist in 1842, and both members of it left the city in 1843.

Sylvester Lind came to Chicago in 1837, and followed the business of house carpenter and builder until 1849, in company with Hugh Dunlop, the firm name being Lind & Dunlop. To this they added the lumber business, of which Mr. Lind had special charge. As an item of historic information it may be stated that, as builders, Lind & Dunlop, during their first season put up for George Smith, a banker, at the corner of Dearborn and South Water streets, the first building that was erected on spiles in the city. This building was occupied by James Peck & Co. Mr. Lind in after years, erected the Lind Block, at the corner of Randolph and Market streets. Mr. Lind's lumber yard was established in 1842, with four hundred thousand feet of lumber—a large stock for those days. The lumber came from Kalamazoo and St. Joseph, Mich., and was stored on his yard at the corner of Randolph and Market streets. In 1844, Mr. Lind purchased the lumber interests of Wadsworth, Dyer & Chapin, whose yard extended along Randolph Street, from the river to Clinton Street; and in 1847 he bought John M. Underwood's business, which was located at the corner of Lake and Canal streets. Mr. Lind continued in the business eighteen years. Among the incidents connected with the lumber trade, Mr. Lind mentions the following: In 1842, Artemus Carter brought to Chicago a cargo of twenty-foot whitewood joists, which for some time he found no purchaser. At length he himself bought the joists, paying $5 a thousand, and utilized a part of them in enlarging the First Presbyterian church-building in that year, Rev. Flavel Bascom being at the time pastor of the Church. At the time of Mr. Lind's arrival in Chicago, Horace Norton & Co. were conducting the heaviest lumber business here, their location being contiguous to Fort Dearborn.

The firm of George W. Snow & Co. was composed of George W. Snow and John M. Underwood, and was established in 1838. The partners continued the business of lumber merchants until 1842, procuring their lumber from Green Bay, where it was then thought the best pine, for lumber, grew; when Mr. Underwood retired, leaving Mr. Snow alone in the business. His lumber yard was on South Water Street, east of Clark, where it remained until 1847, when it was removed to Market Street. Mr. Snow disposed of his interest in 1850, and afterward acquired a fortune in the real-estate business. He died in 1874.

Alexander N. Fullerton embarked in the lumber trade in Chicago in 1838, having his yard on North Water Street, but continued it only a few years.

MR. FULLERTON was born in Chester, Vermont, in September, 1804, the son of Nathaniel Fullerton, who was president of the Bank of Bellows Falls about forty years. Alexander graduated at Middlebury College, also at the celebrated Litchfield Law School, and subsequently practiced law at Troy, N. Y., as partner of Judge Buell. Upon coming to Chicago, he entered into a law partnership with Hon. Grant Goodrich, and also became connected with the lumber business, in connection with an interest which he owned in a lumber mill in Michigan. He also had large real-estate possessions in Chicago and in Milwaukee, besides owning a quantity of farming land in the Northwest. Fullerton Avenue passes through a large tract of land formerly owned by him; and Fullerton Block, at the northwest corner of Dearborn and Washington streets, was erected by him in 1872. He was married to Julia Ann Hubbell, a daughter of Judge Silas Hubbell, a prominent lawyer of Clinton County, N. Y., and had three children, only one of whom, C. W. Fullerton, is now living.

James P. Allen established himself in the lumber business in 1838, at the corner of South Water and Franklin streets. In 1844, his business had been transferred to Canal Street, in the Third Ward, the firm, at that time, being J. P. Allen & Co. In 1852, the business was removed to South Water Street, between Lake and Market streets. Mr. Allen retired from the partnership and disappeared from the city in 1857. He was one of the first lumber inspectors appointed in the city, and, in 1849, inspected two cargoes of lumber for George M. Higginson, which were among the first cargoes subjected to that process in Chicago.

ERASTUS WILCOX, one of the early settlers of Chicago, was born in Stockbridge, Mass., on July 24, 1798, and is still hale and hearty, residing with his daughter at Highland Park, Lake Co., Ill. He married, January 1, 1825, Miss Jane Newell, of Bristol, Conn., who died August 9, 1852. In 1837, he moved to Muskegon, Michigan, with his brother Horace and his brother-in-law Theodore Newell, with both of whom he engaged in manufacturing lumber; erecting at that place the second steam saw mill that was built there. The frame of this is still standing, and is known as the Upper Ryerson, Hills & Co.'s Mill. In the fall of 1839, he came to Chicago, and has remained here most of the time since, chiefly devoting his time to lumber interests, until he retired from mercantile pursuits altogether. His sons, Sextus N., Theodore B., Herbert E., and George G. have been more or less prominently connected with the lumber trade of the Northwest for many years, having been extensive pine-land owners, lumber manufacturers and dealers. Sextus N. Wilcox, the eldest son, was drowned in Lake Superior in June, 1881, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. The next oldest son, Franklin, died in 1849, at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., in the service of the United States. Theodore B. Wilcox has been a resident of Chicago most of the time since 1839, and has been chiefly identified with the lumber business, and is still quite largely interested in pine-lands in connection with his brothers and other parties. In the meantime he has been identified with the fire insurance companies at Muskegon and Chicago, and is also actively engaged in grain commission. He is a member of the Chicago Board of Trade and of the Chicago Stock Exchange.

George M. Higginson was also one of the early lumber dealers of Chicago, having, in 1843, bought an interest in the firm of Norton & Tuckerman. This firm maintained a general store and lumber yard; and after Mr. Higginson's purchase the firm name became Tuckerman & Higginson. Mr. Higginson received his lumber from Hall & Jerome, of Menominee, Mich., from Elisha Bailey, of Peshtigo, Wis., and from a Mr. Fisk, of De Pere. During 1845, he had a contract with W. M. Ferry, of Grand Haven, Mich., for one million feet of lumber; and supplies also came from Kalamazoo, St. Joseph and Muskegon. In 1844, Mr. Higginson bought a cargo of first-class lumber of a Mr. Rose, of Muskegon, running one-third to upper grades, paying for it $5.75 a thousand. The first cargo of Saginaw lumber was brought to Chicago by James Frazer, in 1847 or 1848, who built a mill at Kawkawlin [Coquelin], in later years known as the Ballou mills. This cargo attracted a great deal of attention, as it was the first cargo of circular-sawed lumber ever brought to the city. It was sold, for $8 a thousand feet, to Hugh Dunlop. The average wholesale price of lumber, at that time, was from $6 to $7 a thousand feet; the retail price through the summer was $8 a thousand, and during the winter it was $9 a thousand feet.

In 1843, the lumber trade of the city was estimated at 12,000,000 feet per year, but no records of its extent are extant prior to 1847; from the latter year, however, statistical tables may be compiled that are tolerably complete and satisfactory in their showing. The year 1847 is also memorable from the fact of its being that of numerous incendiary fires in lumber yards. Apparently, if not really, it was the determination of incendiaries to drive lumber dealers out of the city—the actual motive, however, being undeterminable. The firms in whose yards lumber was destroyed, were the following: Foss & Brothers (J. P., R. H., S. J., and William H.), whose planing-mill on West Monroe Street was also burned. Price's yard and planing-mill were consumed, as were A. G. Throop's, George R. Roberts's and several others. Mr. Higginson's yard was set on fire, but not wholly destroyed. It is worthy of note that very few except incendiary fires originated in lumber yards. In 1850, Mr. Higginson moved to Kinzie-street bridge; and he also took a yard on Canal Street, near Van Buren Street, which was afterward occupied by Sheppard & Sheriffe. Mr. Higginson retired from business in 1857.

C. N. Holden came to Chicago in 1837, and entered the employment of the New York and Lake Michigan Lumber Company, taking an interest in their yard in 1838. In 1838, Russell Green, who was employed at the mill of this company, located at Grandville, Mich., and afterward became a member of the firm of Green & Holden (A. H.). During 1839, in consequence of the suspension of the Illinois State Bank, the lumber company also suspended, it being largely indebted to the bank. John M. Underwood, who was then carrying on the lumber business at the west end of Lake-street bridge, bought the property of this company, including a large quantity of pine lands in Michigan, assumed its indebtedness to the bank, promising to pay in the currency issued by the bank, which had agreed to receive it at its par value. Mr. Underwood received the bills at fifty per cent. of their face value, and paid them to the bank at their par value, thus realizing a considerable profit; in addition to which he made a handsome profit by the sale of the Michigan pine lands. In 1847, he sold his business to Sylvester Lind, and retired, a wealthy man for those times, being worth, it is said by those most familiar with his circumstances, about $40,000. It is also said that he was the only man in Chicago, up to that time, who had made a fortune in the lumber business.

Green & Holden, already referred to, worked for Mr. Underwood until 1847, when they formed a partnership, and went into the lumber business on Market Street, on the second lot south of Madison Street. At this time their capital was $2,000, of which they had borrowed $1,200 from Mr. Underwood. They remained on Market Street three years, at the end of which time they purchased a lot on the West Side, now occupied by the Union Depot. At that time Randolph-street bridge was the only one across the South Branch, the others not having been re-built after the flood of 1849, and they at first thought that to go so far south from the main avenues of travel was to invite defeat; but after considerable hesitation, they decided to purchase and to put drummers on the street. The lot was 118x400 feet, and cost $6,500. One-half of the same lot was sold, in 1880, for $40,000. Green & Holden went out of business in 1862, and Mr. Green died at Geneva Lake, Wis., in 1880. At the time of the dissolution of the firm, Mr. Holden retired from business, but, in 1869, he became engaged in the manufacture of paints, in which business he continues at the present time. At first he was alone, but some time afterward the firm became Holden, Tascott & Co., then Holden & Tascott, and, finally, in 1876, A. H. Holden & Co.

D. R. Holt came to Chicago in 1847, and bought out George R. Roberts, who was located on the north-west corner of Market and Madison streets. Mr. Holt has been continuously in business ever since, the firm having been, at different times, Holt & Mason, Holt & Calkins, and Holt & Balcom, the present firm. They now manufacture their lumber at Oconto, Wis. When the Illinois & Michigan Canal was opened, Mr. Holt made the first shipment of lumber from Chicago to St. Louis.

Having given a brief sketch of the lumber dealers in Chicago in 1839, it may be interesting to enumerate those in business here in 1849, and to append a brief sketch of the most important of these. Following is a list of the lumber dealers in Chicago in 1849: James P. Allen, C. K. Anderson, James Andrews, J. Beidler, Bentley, Orr & Warnock, Butler & Norton, George C. Morton & Co. (who had a mill at Grand Haven), Campbell & Throop, Carter & Stockbridge, Chapin & Marsh, Darius Clark, Peter Crawford, James Dalton, Hugh Dunlop, J. P. Emerson, W. M. Ferry, Foster & Holt, Green & Holden, G. M. Higginson, James & Hammond, Tarleton Jones, Sylvester Lind & Smith, James Leonard, McCagg & Reed, Barber & Mason, A. & G. L. Norton, T. L. Parker, William T. Potter, George R. Roberts, Sutherland & Co., Turner & Hilliard, Throop, Wait & Co., Timothy Wright, Cobb, Hall & Spades, Alexander Officer, and Charles Mears.

N. & C. H. MEARS.—This firm originated, in 1844, with Charles Mears, who established himself as a lumber merchant on West Water Street, corner of Washington. In 1850, Nathan Mears was taken into partnership and the firm became C. Mears & Co., the principal yard being at No. 1 Kinzie Street. In 1857, this firm established another lumber yard at the corner of Lumber and Maxwell streets. In 1853, Eli Bates became a member of the firm, and, in 1859, Charles Mears became associated with John Baldwin, this company having their yard at the foot of Michigan Street, on the North Pier. In 1862, Charles Mears retired from the firm, leaving it composed of Nathan Mears and Eli Bates, and their second yard was located at Beach Street, south of Polk. At this time the firm name was changed to Mears & Bates, Charles Mears retaining his membership with John Baldwin as the firm of Baldwin & Co. These firms were reported as handling for a number of years, more lumber than any house in the country. In 1865, James C. Brooks, who, in 1861, became a clerk for the firm, was admitted into partnership, and, in 1865, G. H. Ambrose, who became a clerk for the firm in 1862, was also admitted, the firm name becoming, in 1867, Mears, Bates & Co. G. H. Ambrose retired from the firm in 1875, and, in 1879, James C. Brooks gave place to Charles H. Mears. The firm remained as thus constituted until the death of Eli Bates, which occurred during June, 1831, leaving Nathan and Charles H. Mears sole members of the firm. They are interested in the mills at Oconto, Wis., and at Bay de Noquet, Mich., which produce forty million feet a year. Besides selling largely in Chicago, they have, for the last fifteen years, shipped to Missouri, Nebraska and Kansas, as well as to New York and Pennsylvania.

Charles Mears was born in North Billerica, Middlesex County, Mass., March 16, 1814. He received a commercial education at the academies of Billerica and Westford, Mass., and Hopkinton, N. H. His parents were Nathan and Lucy (Livingston) Mears. His father kept store during the construction of the canal between the Merrimac River and Boston—probably the first canal in the Union. He built a saw mill, kept a public house, and cultivated several farms in connection with his mercantile business. He died in June, 1828, sixteen months after the death of his wife. They had five children—Edwin, Charles, Nathan, Lucy Ann and Albert. Charles taught school in Henniker, N. H., and Billerica, Mass., and during 1835-36 was in the lumber and provision business in Lowell, Mass. In the fall of 1836, together with his brothers, Edwin and Nathan, he bought a large and general stock of goods and shipped them to Paw Paw, VanBuren Co., Mich., and there established the house of E. & C. Mears & Co. This was one of the few western firms which weathered the financial storm of 1837. Mr. Mears then took up a claim at the mouth of a small creek, emptying into White Lake, where, after returning from the East with mechanics and machinery in the fall of 1837, he built a dam and erected his first mill. In 1838, he shipped his first cargo of lumber to Chicago. In 1850, he removed to Lincoln, in Mason County, where he built a mill, kept a general store, and resided until 1875, when he moved to Chicago with his family. Up to that time he had located about 40,000 acres of land, built fifteen mills in the counties of Muskegon, Oceana and Mason, and built five harbors in which registered vessels have traded. He kept a lumber yard in Milwaukee several years, with the assistance of Eli Bates, who was then keeper of the Government light-house. In 1843, he sold out and opened a yard in Chicago, at the corner of West Water and Washington streets. He built several steamers and vessels, and owned, at various times, the sloop "Ranger"; schooners "Ironsides," "Eliza Ward," "John Lily," "Black Hawk," "Pine Forest," "J. M. Hughes," "Japan," "Vincennes," "Echo," "Sea Star," "Monsoon," "Live Oak," "E. M. Peck," "G. Ellen Coral," "A. J. Mowery," and several others; tugs "Albion," "Bell Chase," "Merchant," "Ben Butler," and yacht "Jerome"; and steamers, "C. Mears," "Mary Stuart" and "Annie Laurie." In November, 1849, Eli Bates again applied for a clerkship, and was gladly accepted. In 1850, Nathan Mears was taken into partnership, and, in 1853, Eli Bates became a member of the firm. In addition to the lumber from the mills of C. Mears, at Duck Lake, Pentwater, Lincoln and Hamlin, Mich., the company bought lumber from other mills and dressed lumber from Oswego, Buffalo, Cleveland and Detroit. Their principal office and yard was at No. 1 Kinzie Street, on the North Branch. They occupied dock room sufficient to discharge nine vessels at one time, and, as reported, handled more lumber, shingles, lath, etc., than any firm in the country. Charles Mears continued in the business with various partners and agents until April, 1883, when he sold out and retired from the lumber business. In 1879, under contract with the Calumet, Chicago Canal and Dock Company, he dammed the Calumet river and opened the new harbor channel, making eight feet of water that season, and established a lumber yard on the beach north of the harbor, floating the lumber ashore from his vessels. In 1872, not feeling satisfied with the progress of the work or the Government improvement of the harbor, he sold out to the company, and retired from the enterprise.

Nathan Mears was born in North Billerica, Mass., in 1815, the son of Nathan and Lucy (Livingston) Mears. His father died when this son was thirteen years of age, sixteen months after the death of his wife. His early education was received in Billerica and Westford, Mass. In 1834, he went to Boston, where he was employed as a clerk until 1836, when he went to Paw Paw, Mich., and engaged in the mercantile business. He remained there until the spring of 1850, when he came to Chicago and entered into partnership with his brother Charles. Mr. Mears married Elizabeth A. Gilbert, daughter of Josiah Gilbert of Salem, Westchester Co., N. Y. They have two daughters—Lucy A., now wife of Jonathan Slade of Chicago; Sarah E., now wife of James R. McKay of Chicago; and one son living, Charles H., connected with the above firm. A son, Nathan, died in 1859.

C. MEARS & CO.—This is one of the oldest lumber firms in the city. In 1859, Charles Mears became associated with John Baldwin, Jr. (still maintaining his membership with C. Mears & Co.), and this firm conducted their business under the name of Baldwin & Co. At this time their lumber yard was started at the North Pier. In 1860, John A. Baldwin was admitted into the firm, but, retiring from it in 1863, established himself in business on his own account, and subsequently took H. T. Porter into partnership with him. Charles Mears, in 1864, retired from the firm of Baldwin & Co.—John Baldwin, Jr., taking into partnership Herbert L. Baldwin. In 1865, Charles Mears took into partnership E. H. Denison, and opened an office at No. 241 South Water Street, under the old firm name of C. Mears & Co. In 1867, one of their lumber yards was moved to the northwest corner of Morgan and Twenty-second streets, and in 1868 their other yard was established at the northeast corner of St. Clair and Morgan streets. In 1869, in addition to these two yards, this company had one at the corner of Lake and Jefferson streets, and another at the corner of Lake and Market streets. In 1870, Mr. Denison retired from this firm, and became secretary for N. Ludington & Co., Mr. Mears taking into partnership Jonathan Slade, who continued a member of the firm until 1877, when he retired, leaving Mr. Mears the only member of the company. The mills of this company were at Duck Lake, Pentwater, Lincoln, and Hamlin, Mich.

B. W. THOMAS is one of the oldest lumbermen, still living, in the city. He opened a lumber-yard, in 1843, on Market Street, near Washington, purchasing the business of Sylvester Lind. After conducting the business alone for some years, he associated with him Alexander Loyd, under the firm name of Thomas & Loyd. This firm was dissolved after a few years, and Mr. Thomas was alone until he formed a partnership with T. Newell & Co., of Kenosha, Wis. This firm being dissolved, Mr. Thomas, after again conducting the business alone for a short time, formed a copartnership with Selah Reeve, under the name of Thomas & Reeve. Mr. Thomas's next partnership was with Edward P. and Albert B. Wilcox, which lasted from 1864 to 1871, in the spring of which year he sold his interests in the lumber business to his partners, who, after a few years, moved West, and now have their headquarters at Yankton, Dakota.

MAJOR JAMES F. LORD established himself in business in this city in 1847. Previous to that time, for about fifteen years, he had been employed as superintendent of a steam saw-mill at St. Joseph, Mich., which had been hauled from Cleveland, Ohio, in the fall of 1833, and erected in the following winter by McKellop & Deacon. Mr. McKellop was from Maryland, and Mr. Deacon was a son of Commodore Deacon, of Philadelphia. This was a steam saw-mill, with an upright-frame saw, and was the first erected anywhere in the West. Mr. Lord went to St. Joseph in 1831, and was superintendent of the McKellop & Deacon mill from the time of its erection to 1837. In 1847, he came to Chicago, and went into the lumber business on the corner of LaSalle and North Water streets, with S. F. Sutherland, Mr. Sutherland's name being, however, the only one used. He remained with Mr. Sutherland until 1860, when he bought his partner's interest, and continued the business alone until 1870, when he sold out to Colonel W. S. Babcock, the firm being Babcock Brothers. Colonel W. S. Babcock still continues the business in company with George H. Park, under the firm name of Babcock & Park. Mr. Sutherland built the schooner "Ocean," at or near Detroit, in 1834, and sailed this vessel around the lakes the same year. She was afterward used in shipping lumber and other freight on Lake Michigan, until lost in 1836. Major Lord was born in Holloway, Me., in 1804. His parents were Ephraim and Sarah (Dennis) Lord, natives of Ipswich, Mass. Mr. Lord, when twenty years of age, went to Boston, and, for one season, engaged in the carpenter's trade, going then to New York City, where, for four years, he worked at the same trade. In 1829, he settled at Birdseye Prairie, ten miles from Niles, Mich.; and in 1830, moved into Niles, where he assisted in building the first flour mill upon the Dowagiac River, at that point. In 1832, he went to St. Joseph, Mich. Mr. Lord married Miss Marcia Pepper, of Windsor, Mass. They have two children living—Edgar A., of the Lord & Bushnell Co., and Helen A.; four deceased—George H., William J., Caroline E. and Sarah M.

The lumber trade of Chicago grew gradually until 1855, when an immense advance was made. In 1854, the receipts of timber, boards, planks, etc., amounted to 228,336,783 feet; of shingles, 28,061,250; and of lath, 32,431,550; while, in 1855, the receipts of timber, etc., were 306,553,467 feet, an increase of 78,216,684 feet; of shingles, the receipts in 1855 were 158,770,684, an increase over those of 1854 of 130,709,610; of lath, the increase over 1854 was a little over 14,000,000. The year 1856, however, established Chicago as the great lumber market of the country, upward of 456,000,000 feet being received, as shown by the records, and it is asserted that fully 20,000,000 feet evaded the vigilance of the custom-house officials. With reference to the next year (1857), Mr. Bross, in summing up the traffic, said:

"Its rise and progress are only equalled by the rapid development of the city and the territory west of the great lakes; and in importance this branch of our commerce is second to no other. Even to our own citizens, who have seen it from day to day as it grew up, it is wonderful; and to walk along the branches of the river, and see the banks lined for miles and miles with the immense piles of lumber which are shipped to this port from the pineries of Michigan, Wisconsin and Canada, is perhaps the best criterion that can be adopted to comprehend the magnitude of the trade. The capital invested in the lumber business is immense, not to speak of the property owned by our merchants in mills and woodlands. The wealth which is invested in stock, in docks, and in real estate in this city can not be less than ten or a dozen million dollars, and the number of hands employed in the business, one way and another, can not fall short of ten thousand."

In January, 1857, there were left in stock 130,000,000 feet of the lumber of the preceding year. This stock by the time navigation opened was considerably reduced, but, as the winter and spring had been extremely favorable for cutting and running logs to the mills, an immense amount of lumber was ready for the market. The result was, a few more million feet were received than in 1856, the figures being as follows: Lumber 459,639,178; lath, 131,832,250; shingles, 80,130,000. In that year the hardwood lumber trade began to assume considerable importance. Large amounts of black walnut, cherry, ash, oak, whitewood, maple, sycamore, birch, elm, hickory, etc., now came into use by the manufacturers, and in this year several yards in the city were devoted solely to this class of lumber. The returns made at the close of the season showed that over 10,000,000 feet were received during the year, coming from the States of Michigan and Indiana. The prices ranged from $12 to $20 a thousand. Among the leading lumber dealers at this time were James P. Allen, who, it will be remembered, was engaged in the trade as early as 1845, and who was the first lumber inspector in the city; Steers & Co., with yards on the west side of the South Branch between Taylor and Twelfth streets; John McKay, with two yards, one at Randolph and Market, the other at Van Buren and Canal streets; Fraser & Gillette, on Sherman Street; Philander Jones, on Clark Street near Liberty; Lind & Slater, on Canal Street, between Madison and Monroe streets; Loomis & Ludington, at the corner of Canal and Twelfth streets; Lull, Eastman & Co., on West Water and Lake streets; C. R. Merrill & Co., at the east end of Kinzie-street bridge; Wood & Best, on the corner of Lumber and Maxwell streets; Morton & Brother, on the corner of Lake and West Water streets; S. F. Sutherland, on Market Street, between Jackson and Van Buren streets; Trowbridge, Wing & Swan, at No. 116 Market Street; J. M. Turner, at the corner of Ellsworth and Mather streets; Tuttle, Green & Co., at the corner of Market and Van Buren streets; E. W. Whipple & Co., at the corner of Grove and Cross streets; and Wilcox, Lyon & Co., on Franklin Street, near the bridge.

At the time of the great fire of October 9, 1871, there were about one hundred and twenty lumber yards in Chicago, thirteen of which were destroyed by that conflagration, involving a loss of sixty million feet of lumber.

A more diffuse notice of this vast interest will be given in the ensuing volume. The following tables will give a statistical view of the progress of the lumber trade:

Receipts of Lumber, Shingles and Lath, from 1858 to 1871, inclusive.

YEAR.	Lumber.	Shingles.	Lath.
1858.....	278,943,000	127,565,000	44,517,000
1859.....	302,845,207	165,927,000	49,548,710
1860.....	262,494,626	127,804,000	30,509,000
1861.....	249,308,705	79,356,000	32,677,000
1862.....	305,674,045	131,255,000	23,880,000
1863.....	413,301,818	172,304,875	41,665,000
1864.....	501,592,406	190,109,750	63,805,000
1865.....	647,145,734	310,897,350	62,555,000
1866.....	730,057,168	400,125,250	66,075,100
1867.....	832,661,770	447,039,275	123,092,400
1868.....	1,028,494,789	514,434,100	146,346,280
1869.....	997,736,042	673,166,000	145,362,500
1870.....	1,018,998,685	652,001,000	103,822,000
1871.....	1,039,328,375	647,595,000	102,487,000

No effort seems to have been made, prior to 1870, to take any account of the amount of stock on hand; but, on the 1st of January of that year, there were on hand 282,560,526 feet, and on the 1st of January, 1871, 298,752,968 feet.

Shipments of Lumber, Shingles and Lath for the years from 1852 to 1871, inclusive.

YEAR.	Lumber in feet.	Shingles, number.	Lath, number.
1852.....	70,740,271	55,851,038
1853.....	88,909,348	71,442,350
1854.....	133,131,872	92,506,301
1855.....	215,585,354	134,793,250
1856.....	243,387,732	115,863,250
1857.....	311,608,793	154,827,750
1858.....	242,793,268	150,129,250
1859.....	226,120,389	195,117,700
1860.....	225,372,340	168,302,525	28,236,585
1861.....	189,379,445	94,421,186	32,170,420
1862.....	189,277,079	55,761,630	31,282,725
1863.....	221,709,330	102,634,447	16,966,000
1864.....	260,406,879	138,497,256	30,293,207
1865.....	385,353,678	258,351,450	36,212,010
1866.....	422,313,266	422,339,715	61,516,895
1867.....	518,073,354	480,030,500	74,265,405
1868.....	551,080,806	537,497,074	70,587,104
1869.....	581,533,480	638,317,840	69,026,149
1870.....	583,499,634	666,247,775	56,977,370
1871.....	541,222,543	558,395,350	39,313,820

Highest Prices per thousand for Lumber, Lath and Shingles, for the Years named—Years ending March 30

YEAR.	Lumber.		Shingles.	Lath.	Flooring.	Common Boards.
	Mixed Cargo.	Cle r Yard.
1859 ..	$10 50	$30 00	$3 00	$1 50	$22 00	$10 00
1860 ..	12 00	28 00	3 50	2 75	22 00	12 00
1861 ..	7 50	28 00	3 50	2 50	20 00	12 00
1862 ..	*	27 00	3 25	3 00	24 00	13 00
1863 ..	*	39 00	4 25	4 00	30 00	17 00
1864 ..	17 00	45 00	4 50	5 00	37 00	18 00
1865 ..	23 00	60 00	6 00	5 00	*	28 00
1866 ..	20 00	*	7 00	4 00	28 00	20 00
1867 ..	24 00	*	6 50	5 00	23 00	23 00
1868 ..	22 50	*	4 87½	4 50	23 00	22 00
1869 ..	19 00	*	4 10	3 00	*	*
1870 ..	17 00	*	3 50	2 25	*	*
1871 ..	22 00	55 00	4 00	*	38 00	*

* Not reported.

+ " Fencing."

DRY GOODS MERCHANTS.

JOHN V. FARWELL & Co.—This firm is undoubtedly the oldest in Chicago, the business having been established by its predecessors in 1847. From its inception, the business has progressed, and to its present senior member is due the honor of advancing the house to the high reputation it bears. The first wholesale dry-goods house in Chicago was started in 1845, by Hamlin & Day. In 1847, Wadsworth & Phelps commenced wholesaling. The firm shortly afterward became Cooley, Wadsworth & Phelps. Mr. Phelps withdrew from the firm a few months later, and, in 1850, the style of the firm was Cooley, Wadsworth & Co., the company being represented by John V. Farwell, who was admitted to partnership in that year. The firm so remained until January 1, 1864, when Messrs. Cooley and Wadsworth retired, and Marshall Field, Levi Z. Leiter and S. N. Kellogg became members of the firm, the title of the concern reading Farwell, Field & Co. Messrs. Field and Leiter withdrew at the end of a year, and the firm then consisted of John V. Farwell, Charles B. Farwell, S. N. Kellogg, William D. Farwell, and John K. Harmon. The style of the firm was then changed to John V. Farwell & Co., and has so remained since. In 1867, Mr. Kellogg retired. In 1870, Simeon Farwell was admitted to the firm, but withdrew on January 1, 1883, owing to failing health. On January 1, 1884, John V. Farwell, Jr., and John T. Chumaseo were made members of the firm. William D. Farwell, who represented the company in New York City for many years, has withdrawn from active association, although retaining his financial interest in the business. The head of the house, Hon. John V. Farwell, has also withdrawn from active management, and the carrying on of the immense business of this house devolves upon Charles B. Farwell, John K. Harmon, and the recently admitted younger members. Prior to the great fire of 1871, the firm was situated at Nos. 112-116 Wabash Avenue, and when that building was swept away, Messrs. Farwell erected a mammoth structure on the northwest corner of Monroe and Franklin streets. They remained there until the completion of their premises, at the corner of Market and Monroe streets, January 1, 1883. The dimensions of the building are 280 x 100 feet, and there are eight floors, including basement and sub-basement, that respectively have the benefit of street and river front. In addition to this space, the firm has immense storage-rooms under Market Street. The building cost over $1,000,000, and the ground brings the total valuation of the property to about $2,000,000. The house carries a stock of goods of the value of $5,000,000, and over six hundred employes are required in the business. The sales aggregate about $20,000,000 per annum.

JOHN V. FARWELL is the third son of Henry and Nancy Farwell, and was born on a farm in Steuben County, N. Y., on July 29, 1825. His boyhood, until thirteen years of age, was passed upon his father's farm, and while there he attended the winter terms of school. In 1838, the family removed to Ogle County, Ill., and, three years later, Mr. Farwell entered the Mt. Morris Seminary and completed his education. While there he bent his energies toward obtaining as complete a business education as possible, and paid particular attention to the studies of bookkeeping and mathematics, he then having decided to enter upon a mercantile business life. In the spring of 1845, he came to Chicago. All his earnings had been paid out in getting his education, and he had but little money to commence life with. He worked his passage to this city upon a load of wheat, and when he arrived had but three dollars and seventy-five cents. He soon obtained employment in the county clerk's office, and received a salary of twelve dollars a month. He reported the proceedings of the City Council, but while doing so he, too, particularly described the meetings, and so offended the City Fathers that he was deposed from his office. Previous to this he had engaged himself as bookkeeper for Hamilton & White, dry goods merchants, and remained with them one year, receiving but eight dollars a month salary. At the expiration of his contract with them, he went with Hamlin & Day, who were in the same line of business. He afterward engaged with the dry goods house of Wadsworth & Phelps, at a salary of six hundred dollars a year. In 1850, he became a partner in the firm, and in 1864 Mr. Farwell was at the head of the house of Farwell, Field & Co., and later of John V. Farwell & Co. From early boyhood he displayed his aptness for business, and, from his first step into the commercial world, his progress has been onward and upward. At the age of fourteen, he became a member of the Methodist Church, and though he was always desirous of amassing a fortune, his liberality and benevolence towards all institutions of worship have been notable. In 1856, he started the Illinois-street Mission, an institution designed especially to reach the boys in the streets and outcast children. From feeble beginnings it has grown until it has become a large Church and Sunday-school. For ten years Mr. Farwell was the superintendent of the Mission, and has always taken an active interest in its progress and welfare. During the War, Mr. Farwell's philanthropy and patriotic zeal were conspicuous and telling. He helped raise the First Board-of-Trade Regiment, and the forty thousand dollars for its equipment. In all matters, pertaining to the War, he was foremost in aiding those who participated in the struggle for the preservation of the Union. To Mr. Farwell, more than to any other man, is due the present prosperous and promising condition of the Young Men's Christian Association.

HON. CHARLES B. FARWELL was born near Painted Post, Steuben Co., N. Y., on July 1, 1823. The first fifteen years of his life were passed at his native place, and during that time he attended the Elmira (N. Y.) Academy, where he took a course of study, paying particular attention to surveying. In 1838, he came to Illinois with his father, who located upon a farm in Ogle County. Young Farwell farmed and surveyed alternately, for several years, and, from this out-door life during his youth, he acquired a robust constitution, which has never failed him in the arduous labors of his latter life. On January 10, 1844, he came to Chicago, and some time afterward obtained a position as deputy clerk with George Davis, clerk of Cook County. Almost the first day that he entered upon his duties his chief was taken sick, and upon the new deputy devolved the task of opening the County Commissioner's Court. Although totally unfamiliar with the duties of the clerk, by the aid of members of the court, Mr. Farwell was enabled to learn the work required, and he filled the responsible office with universal satisfaction. He was thus occupied for four months, when his chief returned, and he resumed his duties as deputy clerk and took a night situation with Briggs & Green, auctioneers, at a salary of twenty-five cents a night. In November, 1845, he bought his first real estate, paying for the same out of the savings from his meager salary. This was a piece of land 77 x 150 feet, situated where the Crane Bros.' manufacturing establishment now stands. The price was $500, of which Mr. Farwell paid $100 cash. The property in question is to-day valued at $25,000. Mr. Farwell remained in the office with Mr. Davis until the spring of 1846, receiving $200 a year and board for his last twelve months' service. Captain J. B. F. Russell then offered him a clerkship in his real estate office, at a salary of $300 per annum, which he accepted; the second and third years he received $500 a year. By investing his earnings in Mexican War land-warrants, he made some money, which gave him a start in life a few years later. In 1849, he took the position of corresponding clerk in the banking house of George Smith, and was afterward promoted to the position of teller. He remained there until December, 1853. In September of that year, he entered the political arena as a candidate for county clerk, and was elected by a large majority over his opponent, Dr. E. S. Kimberly. He held the office for four years, and so satisfactory were his services that the people re-elected him in 1857. In 1861, he retired from the office, and passed the following three years in the management of his property and in matters pertaining to the War. In 1864, he purchased an interest in the business of the present house of John V. Farwell & Co. Upon his entry into this concern, his brother, John V., retired from active participation in the business, and he at once took the management of affairs, directing its multitudinous details and supervising its most extensive operations with the same ease that he had exhibited in the humbler positions of his earlier years. In 1867, Mr. Farwell was elected to the Board of County Supervisors, and became chairman of that body. It was during his term of office that the new part of the Court House on Clark Street was erected and completed, but which stood only a short time before the great fire. In 1870, he was nominated by the Republicans of Cook County to represent them in Congress. He was elected by a handsome majority, although the campaign was hardly fought by his opponent, Hon. John Wentworth. In 1872, he was re-elected, the opposing candidate being Hon. John V. LeMoyné. These two gentlemen again crossed swords, in 1874, for the same office, and Mr. Farwell was the victor. In 1880, he again ran for Congress against Perry H. Smith, Jr., and was elected by a large majority. He was a member of the first State board for the equalization of taxes, being appointed by Governor Oglesby in 1866. Mr. Farwell was identified with one of the greatest works of the age, the Washington-street tunnel. The original contractors of this work were obliged to relinquish it, leaving it a perfect wreck. Although others were dismayed at the undertaking, Mr. Farwell took it in hand, became pecuniarily responsible for its building, furnished the capital, and it was finished. Mr. Farwell was married October 11, 1852, to Miss Mary E. Smith, of South Williamstown, Mass. They have four children—the eldest daughter, Anna, being the wife of Reginald DeCoven, of Chicago. The other children are Walter, Grace, and Rose. Mr. Farwell was one of the founders of the Chicago Club, one of the oldest clubs in the city. He is also a member of the Union League, and Commercial and Bankers' clubs.

MARSHALL FIELD & Co.—The wholesale dry goods firm of Marshall Field & Co. is a descendant, through a long line of changes of the house of Cooley, Wadsworth & Co., which, in 1856, was doing business on South Water Street. A year later the firm removed to Wabash Avenue and began doing an exclusive wholesale trade, and, at the same time, the firm name was changed to that of Cooley, Farwell & Co. In January, 1860, Mr. Field was admitted as a partner, and four years later, Mr. Cooley retiring, the firm became Farwell, Field & Co., Mr. Leiter being also admitted as a partner in the house at that time. In January, 1865, Messrs. Field and Leiter retired, and, forming the firm of Field, Palmer & Leiter, bought out Potter Palmer, at Nos. 110-112 Lake Street, the business thus purchased having been established by Mr. Palmer in 1852. In January, 1867, Mr. Palmer retired, and the firm then became Field, Leiter & Co., and in the autumn of the following year they occupied, for the first time, the present site on the northeast corner of State and Washington streets, where they remained until the fire of October, 1871, in which they sustained losses amounting to nearly $3,500,000, insurance being recovered to the amount of $250,000. Immediately after the fire they resumed business in the old horse-railway barn, at the corner of State and Twentieth streets. At the same time, or, as soon as circumstances would permit, they began re-building, both at State and Washington and at Madison and Market streets, to which latter place they removed their wholesale house in March, 1872. In 1873 they occupied their old quarters at the first mentioned location for their retail business. It is the largest, as well as the most complete retail establishment west of New York. In January, 1881, Mr. Leiter retired from the business and the firm became Marshall Field & Co. It is an acknowledged fact that the house of Marshall Field & Co. has steadily grown, keeping pace with the marvellous development of Chicago's commercial interests, and that to-day its greatness is only a satisfactory realization of possibilities which have taken years to achieve. That this is true, may be seen from the fact that in 1865 the sales of this firm approximated $8,000,000; in 1883, they amounted to $30,000,000, being an increase of nearly fourfold in less than twenty years. Marshall Field, one of the merchant princes of the American Continent, began his business career in this city in 1856, as a clerk in the house of Cooley, Wadsworth & Co. Of Mr. Field, much might be written that would be of interest to those who are curious to know the history of men whose success in any walk of life has been such as to give them deserved prominence among their fellows. But few facts, however, can authentically be stated relative to Mr. Field—that he is a native of Massachusetts, born in 1835, and when only twenty years of age, he came to Chicago and began his business career as a clerk. Since that time he has been thoroughly and intimately identified with this city and its best interests, of which he has been an indefatigable promoter. He is reticent, quiet and reserved in his demeanor, but one of the most thoroughly philanthropic and public-spirited citizens of Chicago.

Marshall Field

H. N. HIGGINBOTHAM was born at Joliet, Ill., on October 10, 1838, where he received such education as the common schools of that period afforded. During 1857, he began his business career as clerk in the Will County Bank, of Joliet, and subsequently was in the employ of the Joliet City Bank up to 1859, and left this latter position to fill that of assistant cashier with the Bank of Oconto, Wis., where he remained up to 1861. In the month of April, 1861, he came to Chicago, to accept the position of entry clerk and assistant bookkeeper for the firm of Cooley, Farwell & Co., which he retained until August, 1862. He then enlisted for the war, in the Mercantile Battery; but, previous to the battery entering active service, he was transferred and ordered to Western Virginia, as chief clerk in the quartermaster's department, which position he held up to December, 1864. During January, 1865, he returned to Chicago, and was employed by Field, Palmer & Leiter,—first, as bookkeeper, afterward being advanced to different positions of trust and importance, until 1878, when he was made a partner in the firm. Mr. Higginbotham married, in 1866, Miss Rachel D. Davison, of Joliet, Ill. They have four children—Harlow D., Harry M., Florence and Alice.

JOHN G. McWILLIAMS was born on June 15, 1839, at Peterboro', Madison Co., N. Y., and received his education at the Peterboro' Academy. In the fall of 1855, he began his business career as a clerk in a dry-goods store at Peterboro', where he remained until February, 1857, when he came to Chicago, entering the retail dry-goods house of W. R. Wood & Co., as a salesman. He remained in their employ until September, 1861, when he entered the 51st Illinois Infantry as captain, afterward being promoted to major in March, 1864, and serving until March, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. He then returned to Chicago, and entered the employ of Field, Palmer & Leiter, as a salesman, which position he held until he attained his present one of partner, in January, 1883. Mr. McWilliams was married, in 1867, to Miss K. M. Willard, of Chicago, who died in November, 1884, leaving one child, Roy.

D. B. FISK & Co.—Standing prominently at the head of its department of trade, and indisputably the largest house of its class on this continent, is the firm of D. B. Fisk & Co., wholesale millinery. Its history from its founding here, a little over thirty years ago, to the present time, forms not only a forcible illustration of that growth and development which has characterized the trade and commerce of Chicago from then until now, but it shows how much can be accomplished by intelligent, persistent and well-directed effort. When D. B. Fisk came to Chicago in 1853 and established, in March of that year, the first wholesale millinery house west of the Alleghanies, his ambition did not reach, nor did his business sagacity comprehend, the magnitude of the commercial structure of which he was only laying the foundations. He first established himself on Wells Street (now Fifth Avenue) between South Water and Lake streets where he remained one year. In the spring of 1854, he removed to No. 124 Lake Street, and a little later to the rooms over Gossage's old store on the same street, and finally, in 1857, to Nos. 53-55 Lake Street, the Iron Block which had just been erected by Thomas Church. In this building, Mr. Fisk continued until burned out on the 9th of October, 1871, at which time his gross losses were nearly $300,000. In a week following the fire, he had resumed business at Nos. 53-55 West Washington Street, and at the same time began the erection of a small brick building at Nos. 27-29 Clinton Street. Into this he removed, and remained until the spring of 1873, when he occupied the building at the southwest corner of Wabash Avenue and Washington Street. In this building (which is universally conceded to be the finest, and best adapted to its trade of any house in the city), the firm of D. B. Fisk & Co., now occupies six large floors, the aggregate area of which is 135,000 square feet. Their volume of business, which in 1854 could be readily handled by perhaps half a score of employes, now requires hundreds to transact the trade, which, if allowed to accumulate for a single day, would throw its affairs into an almost inextinguishable confusion. But such is the system adopted here, that notwithstanding the magnitude of their business, every detail, from the large manufacturing rooms in the topmost story to the packing and shipping quarters in the basement, moves with the precision of the clock work.

The growth of this house is perhaps best told in the brief statement that, in 1853, its sales did not exceed fifty thousand dollars, while in 1883 they amounted to two millions. There are doubtless many, who if told that the house of D. B. Fisk & Co. was not only the largest wholesale millinery house in America but the largest anywhere in the world, would be inclined to take the statement with much allowance. It is however literally and indisputably true; mercantile men in this and other cities, who have been abroad and visited the largest establishments in the leading cities of the old world admit it, and further concede that Chicago, situated as it is, with so vast a territory contributory to its greatness, is bound to become the greatest commercial center on the globe.

EDSON KEITH & Co.—The history of this house dates back to 1858; when Osborn R. Keith and Albert E. Faxon, under the firm name of Keith & Faxon, started a wholesale millinery house at No. 49 Lake Street. In 1860, Edson Keith became a partner in the house, and added to the stock a department of hats, caps, furs and straw goods. At that time, too, the firm name was changed to Keith, Faxon & Co., and a removal made to Nos. 45-47 Lake Street. In 1865, Mr. Faxon retiring, Eldridge G. Keith was admitted as a member of the firm, which then became Keith Bros., and was composed of Osborn R., Edson and F. G. Keith. Two years later J. G. Woodward was admitted as a partner, having been previously for some time connected with the house as a bookkeeper. The year preceding this event, however, they had removed to Nos. 68-70 Wabash Avenue, just opposite old Dearborn Park. They remained there until burned out in the fire of October, 1871, in which their total losses exceeded $250,000. They, however, succeeded in saving a considerable portion of their stock, and, with characteristic energy, the second day following the fire, resumed business at the stables of Edson Keith and F. G. Keith on Prairie Avenue. As soon as possible, they began the erection of a temporary brick building, at the corner of Dearborn Park and Michigan Avenue, which was pushed with such vigor that, in two weeks from the day it was begun, it was completed and occupied. Incidentally it should be noted, especially as it shows that the firm of Keith Bros. did at once resume, that in the two weeks from the time of the fire, until their temporary building was ready for occupancy, they sold $60,000 worth of goods from the stables, where, during this brief period, their stock had been stored. Shortly following the completion of their temporary building, they secured a lease of the lot at what would now be called Nos. 246 to 252 Madison Street, and on which they began the erection of a large double store, and into this they removed in October, 1872. Having once more settled down in their handsome and commodious quarters, the house of Keith Bros. soon fully recovered what they had lost in the fire, and began making rapid strides toward the position that it to-day holds—that of one of the largest establishments of its kind, not only in Chicago, but anywhere in the West. Seven years passed away—years which witnessed an increasing volume of trade and brought to this house enlarged power and influence in the commercial world. At the end of that time, in 1879, O. R. Keith withdrew from the firm of Keith Bros., taking with him the departments of notions, millinery and white goods, and, in company with A. B. Adam and Albert E. Faxon (the latter gentleman having been associated with him in 1858), organized the firm of O. R. Keith & Co. This firm opened a wholesale store in the lines already mentioned, at the building, corner of Wabash Avenue and Monroe Street. In the meantime Edson Keith, Elbridge G. Keith, and James L. Woodward, under the firm name of Keith Bros., continued the business of wholesale hats, caps, furs and men's furnishing goods at Nos. 246 to 252 Madison Street, until January 1, 1884, when the two houses consolidated their interests under one roof, under the firm name and style of Edson Keith & Co. The firm, as it now stands, is composed of Edson Keith, A. B. Adam and A. E. Faxon, as general partners, and O. R. Keith as special partner. The firm of Edson Keith & Co. now carries all the lines formerly handled by both the houses before the consolidation was effected, and in the amount of business done stands second to none of its kind in the city. They also employ over three hundred persons in their various departments, and occupy six large floors, the combined area of which is equal to one hundred and twenty thousand square feet. In 1855, their sales did not exceed $75,000; in 1853, they amounted to $4,500,000, while the territory covered by their trade to-day, extends throughout the Western and Northwestern States and Territories.

EDSON KEITH is a native of Barre, Vt., where he was born in 1833. He came, with his brother, to Chicago in 1854. He first engaged as a clerk with J. D. Sherman, who was then the keeper of a retail dry goods store, and with whom he remained until 1856. In that year he formed a connection with the wholesale hat and cap house of Benedict, Mallory & Farnham, then doing business at No. 190 South Water Street. He remained with that house until 1860, when he retired to form the partnership with his brother in the firm of Keith & Faxon, and which, at that time, became Keith, Faxon & Co.

A. S. GAGE & CO.—It will perhaps be conceded that New York is the heaviest importing city on this continent, and is therefore the leading market for the sale of all classes of foreign goods in importers' packages. Especially is this true of millinery and milliners' stock. But to Chicago justly belongs the credit of being the largest jobbing market of any city in the United States, for the same line of goods, and in the size and elegance of its wholesale establishments, devoted to this line of trade, none finer can be found in any city. One of these, and ranking foremost among the oldest and most stable of Chicago's commercial institutions is the house of A. S. Gage & Co., which was established here in 1857, under the firm name of Webster & Gage. They first started as a wholesale and retail establishment on Lake Street, between Clark and Dearborn streets. In 1860, they gave up the retail trade, and began wholesaling—a business which has been continued to the present time. In 1870, the firm name was changed to Gage Bros. & Co., Mr. Webster retiring, and being succeeded by Seth Gage, who, at that time, had come from the East, to make his home in Chicago. In that year the firm was located at No. 78 Lake Street, where they were still doing business up to October 9, 1871. They, of course, burned out in the great fire, suffering a total loss of stock, but were fortunate enough to save from destruction their books, accounts, and many valuable papers. They, however, resumed business within a week following the fire, at the private residence of A. S. Gage, No. 961 Indiana Avenue. They commenced, as soon as possible, the erection of a temporary frame-building on the lake front, which was completed and occupied by February of 1872. They remained there until the 20th of April, the same year, when they removed to Nos. 227-29 Wabash Avenue. In the fall of 1875, another removal was made to the corner of Wabash Avenue and Madison Street. They remained at the last mentioned place until January 1, 1883, when they removed to the corner of Wabash Avenue and Adams Street. Here, as on previous occasions, they occupied a building erected expressly for their business, by Martin Ryerson. At the same time the style of the firm became as it now is, A. S. Gage & Co., being composed of A. S. and E. B. Gage, general partners, and Martin Ryerson, as special partner. In 1863, the firm employed less than ten people, while now (1885) there are six hundred on the pay-roll. As showing the remarkable growth attending the business of this house, the following figures are given. In 1857 the sales amounted to $30,000, in 1862 to $125,000, in 1878 to about $1,000,000, and in 1883 they had reached $3,500,000. Albert S. Gage, the present head of the house, came to Chicago in 1860, and entered the employ of Webster & Gage as a clerk. From that humble occupation, he has worked his way up to his present position. Every advancement which has come to him has been brought about by his own unaided efforts. In 1867, he was admitted to the house as a partner. The last member of the original firm retired in 1875 since which time the business has increased the most rapidly. Both A. S. and E. B. Gage are New England men.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

It would, perhaps, be conceded without argument that Chicago to-day ranks second to no city in the Union as a producing and distributing center for boots and shoes. Everything, from the finest shoes for ladies to the coarsest brogans for the ranchman on the plains or the plow-boy of the prairies, is manufactured here; in fact, over all the West and South, goods bearing the brand of some Chicago firm, are best known and the most sought after by the retail trade.

THE DOGGETT, BASSETT & HILLS CO.—Prominent among Chicago houses, and, doubtless, best known because of its being the oldest jobbing boot and shoe house in the city, is this company. Briefly given, its history is as follows: It was founded in 1846 by William E. Doggett and George L. Ward, who, under the firm name of Ward & Doggett, established themselves in the wholesale boot and shoe trade at No. 172 Lake Street. In 1850, D. Hobart Hills, who had been connected with the house from the first as a salesman, was admitted as a partner, and at the same time Henry D. Bassett, who was then engaged in manufacturing in the East, also became a member of the firm, the style of which was changed to Ward, Doggett & Co. Two or three years later, a removal was made to No. 133 South Water Street, and in 1856, Mr. Ward having died, the firm name was changed to Doggett, Bassett & Hills, being composed of W. E. Doggett, Henry D. Bassett and D. Hobart Hills. Mr. Ward, it should be explained, was a non-resident partner in the house, and, although entitled to the credit of being one of its founders, yet, as he never lived in Chicago (his death occurring at about the time it began to assume some importance among the commercial institutions of the city), to Mr. Doggett more properly belongs the honor of having been the father of the jobbing trade in this line in Chicago. In 1859, another removal was made to No. 32 Lake Street, the site now occupied by Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co., and two years later to the opposite side of the street, at the corner of Wabash Avenue. Shortly after taking possession of this building, they added two more stories, and continued to occupy it until October, 1871. In the great fire they were burned out, sustaining a total loss on stock and building of over $150,000. The second day after the fire, however, they opened an office in a dwelling at the southeast corner of Wabash Avenue and Harmon Court. There they resumed business, and were soon filling their orders as though no fire had ever occurred. Early in the spring of 1872, they removed to a store which had been erected by J. V. Scammon, on Michigan Avenue, near VanBuren Street. In the meantime, however, they had begun to re-build on their old site, at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Lake Street, which they completed and occupied in August, 1872. Having thus again fairly established themselves in their old quarters, things ran along as smoothly and prosperously as could have been desired, until, in April, 1876, a serious calamity befel them, in the death of Mr. Doggett. Not that this occurrence in any way affected the standing of the firm, or diminished the number of its patrons, but all of its members deeply felt the loss of the man who had founded the house and who had so long controlled and directed its affairs. Following the death of Mr. Doggett, the surviving partners, including C. H. Cram, who was at that time admitted to a membership in the firm, continued the business without change until 1878; at that time, a joint-stock company was formed under the corporate title of the Doggett, Bassett & Hills Co. Its first officers were D. Hobart Hills, president, C. H. Cram, secretary; and William Wheeler, of Boston (whose connection with the house dated from this time), treasurer. They remained at the old premises on Lake Street until in January, 1879, and then removed to Nos 212-11 Monroe Street. In March, 1881, Mr. Cram died; and two years later, death again invaded the firm, taking this time Mr. Wheeler, whose interest in the house was subsequently purchased by Hon. A. P. Martin, the present mayor of Boston. Mr. Martin is the present treasurer of the company. Mr.

Hills served both as president and secretary since the death of Mr. Cram. This house has been engaged in manufacturing since 1853, at which time they employed between forty and fifty workmen. They now employ from one hundred to one hundred and fifty hands, besides doing an extensive jobbing business. In 1846, their total sales were only $11,000, and, as Mr. Hills says, they thought it a pretty big business for those days. Now, their sales amount to over a million dollars per annum, and they are only one among several other houses here in the same line, whose total volume of trade equals these figures. Mr. Hills, in relating some of his reminiscences of early days in mercantile life in Chicago, says that before any railroads were built here, merchants received all their goods, bought in the East, by water. It happened then that during the winter months, and when navigation was closed, that their stock ran exceedingly low, and they were sorely pressed to fill their orders to the retail trade. One winter in particular, Mr. Hills relates that, the spring being very backward, his firm conceived the idea of shipping goods from New York via New Orleans, from thence up the Mississippi River to the Illinois and Michigan Canal, to this city. They finally received their goods, but, as Mr. Hills laughingly asserts, they did not deem it expedient to repeat the experiment. The house of Ward & Doggett began doing a jobbing business in a small way in 1846. Mr. Hills says that he remembers the first bill of goods they jobbed was sold either to C. A. Brooks or R. I. Thomas, both of whom were then merchants doing business in St. Charles. The amount of the bill was only $120, but, after it was sold, the members of the house felt like congratulating themselves on having obtained so good a customer. Coming, as it has, unscathed through all the perils incident to so long a career, the record of this house is one peculiarly honorable, and speaks well of the skill and sagacity with which its affairs have been managed. Of the founder of the house, we have already spoken; it only remains now to add that, as a man and a citizen, he was highly esteemed by all who knew him. The following brief facts concerning his life have been furnished by his sister, Miss Eunice Doggett, now of this city.

WILLIAM E. DOGGETT was born in the village of Acushnet, Freetown Township, Bristol Co., Mass., November 20, 1820. His father, Elkanah Doggett, was a merchant and manufacturer of iron, and descended from a long line of intelligent farmers. His mother, Eunice Baker, was a daughter of Rev. Joseph Baker, of Middleborough, Mass. As parents, they trained their children to "fear the Lord and work righteousness," and skillfully guided their hours of study and recreation. The educational facilities of the village, in both private and district schools, were of a high order, and in these he received his first lessons in English knowledge. Latin he pursued for several months, and continued it, with Greek, mathematics and higher branches of English, at Pierce Academy, Middleborough, Mass. At sixteen, he left school and entered mercantile life as a clerk in a country store in Middleborough. He remained there two years. Thence he went to Mount Savage Iron Works, Frostburg, Md., where he was seven years, and then to Chicago, where, with an old school friend, George Ward, he established the boot and shoe house of Ward & Doggett, afterward known as Doggett, Bassett & Hills. Mr. Doggett was married to Mrs. Kate Newell on February 22, 1857. Their only child, George Newell Doggett, resides in Chicago. Mrs. Doggett, well known as a woman of gifted literary attainments, died in March, 1834. As has already been told, Mr. Doggett's death occurred in April, 1876.

D. HOBART HILLS, who has been for so long at the head of this house, was born in Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., October 27, 1826. His parents were David O. and Harriet (Bowen) Hills—the father being engaged in general merchandising in Sackett's Harbor. His death occurred when Hobart was quite young; leaving him to become the main support of his widowed mother. In 1845, he came to Chicago, and in the following year took service as a clerk in the house of Doggett & Ward. A few years later he was admitted as a junior partner. Mr. Hills was married, in 1859, to Harriet R. Merrill, daughter of Hiram A. Merrill of Watertown, N. Y. They have four children, Caro M., Mary, William Doggett and Emily.

H. D. BASSETT, whose connection with the house dates since 1850, came to Chicago in 1853, but, six years later, it being thought desirable to have a resident partner in the East, Mr. Bassett removed to Boston, where he has since resided.

C. H. FARGO & CO.—In the winter of 1855, Charles H. Fargo, a native of Massachusetts, landed in Chicago, and in the spring of the following year, in company with W. A. Bill and A. W. Kellogg, established a wholesale boot and shoe house at No. 47 South Water Street, under the firm name of Bill, Fargo & Kellogg. In the following year a removal was made to No. 43 Lake Street and, at the same time, the firm name was changed to Fargo & Bill. In 1864, they removed to No. 48-50 Wabash Avenue, and H. D. Fales becoming a member, the style of the firm was again changed to that of Fargo, Fales & Co. They remained on Wabash Avenue until, in 1869, they removed to No. 44-46 Randolph Street, at which number they were still doing business at the time of the fire of October, 1871. In that fire, notwithstanding their losses aggregated $165,000, they were fortunate enough to save some fifteen thousand dollars' worth of stock, which was removed to the stable of Mr. Fargo, at No. 613 Wabash Avenue, and where, on the day following, they resumed business. A few weeks later they removed to No. 575 State Street, where they remained until, in May, 1872, they removed to the corner of Madison and Market streets, continuing there until, in April, 1883, they located in their present quarters at Nos. 116-20 Market Street. On the reorganization of the firm under its present style in 1871, its members then were C. H., C. E., and S. M. Fargo and John Benham. In January, 1883, Mr. Benham withdrew, and Frank M. Fargo, a son of the senior member, entered the firm. As is now well known, this house does an immense manufacturing business, and is, in this branch of the trade, one of the oldest as well as one of the largest houses in Chicago. Mr. Fargo, with his characteristic energy and enterprise, began manufacturing boots and shoes of the heavier grades in 1859. His new departure in this direction at once brought him into competition with Eastern manufacturers, but the good quality of his work soon created a demand greater than he could fill, and stimulated his fellow-merchants in this and other Western cities to follow his example. Thus it may be truthfully said, that to this house is due the credit of having inaugurated the business of manufacturing boots and shoes in Chicago, and of really laying the foundation of what is to-day one of her most important industries. The first year his house was established here, it did a business of nearly $70,000, while the entire jobbing trade in boots and shoes in Chicago, did not exceed $500,000. It may now safely be estimated at not less than $20,000,000. In 1853, the sales made by C. H. Fargo & Co. amounted to over $1,250,000. A glance at the above figures shows not only the growth of this house, but also the relative development of the entire trade in this branch in the city. The success which has attended this firm from the first to the present time is doubtless due to the fact, that though full of enterprise it has always been conservative in its dealings, and that the men who directed its affairs never ventured into any outside enterprises, but steadily persisted in building up and carrying to its fullest development this one line of business. And of C. H. Fargo, who has so long been its managing head, it may be stated that the one great work of his life has been to carry forward this enterprise and in laying broad and wide the foundations of its present commercial strength and greatness.

CHARLES H. FARGO was born at Tyringham, Berkshire Co., Mass., November 9, 1824, the son of Samuel and Eliza (Buel) Fargo. From the time Charles was twelve years old until he was eighteen, he was almost constantly in the store, barring his attendance at intervals at the district school of his native town. At the latter age, however, he entered Westfield Academy, intending to fit himself for a physician. He remained there but six months, when he was called home to take full charge of the store, while his father turned his attention to farming. He continued to manage the store for his father until, on attaining his majority, he was made a partner. Two years later, young Fargo having decided to go into business for himself, and desiring to enlarge his field of operations, moved to Great Barrington, a town of some importance in the same county, and where, in company with a partner, he began business on a larger scale. It was not long until his firm became the leading one in the place. In 1855, Mr. Fargo decided to come West and carry out a long cherished desire, to establish a certain branch of business and, making that a specialty, push it to the highest attainable success. As has already been told, he in that year arrived in Chicago, and shortly afterward established the house of which he is still the head. Mr. Fargo was married on September 5, 1848, to Miss Evelyn M. Sweet, daughter of J. W. Sweet of Tyringham, Mass. During their married life, four children were born to them—Fred, L. (who died when but four years of age), Charles E., Frank M., and Edward A. Fargo—two of whom are now young men of fine business qualities and partners in the house their father established nearly thirty years ago; the youngest is at school in Massachusetts. Mrs. Fargo died in August, 1871.

GREENSFELDER, ROSENTHAL & CO.—This firm manufactures and wholesales boots and shoes, and is the largest house in its line in this city. It was established here in 1856 by Isaac Greensfelder and Rudolph Rosenthal, as retailers. Ten years later Siegmund Florsheim was made a member of the firm, which then started in the wholesale trade in January, 1866, on Lake Street. After the fire of 1871, in which it suffered heavy losses, the firm removed to the northwest corner of Lake Street and Wabash Avenue. In January, 1873, it removed to Nos. 105-107 Wabash Avenue, where it remained until January, 1883, and then moved to Nos. 251-57 Monroe Street. Since starting in the wholesale business the firm has ever enjoyed a large and constantly increasing trade, their sales for 1883 amounting to nearly $1,500,000. Mr. Greensfelder came here in 1854, and was engaged in the retail trade at the time the business connection between himself and Mr. Rosenthal was formed. Mr. Florsheim, the junior partner, joined in 1866.

ISAAC GREENSFELDER was born in Bavaria in the year 1827. He learned the trade of a shoemaker at the age of thirteen, and followed that occupation until 1848, when he came to America and started a retail boot and shoe store on Gaenck Street, New York City. He carried on that business until 1854, when he came to Chicago. Mr. Greensfelder married Sarah Woolf, of Bavaria, who died in Chicago in 1864. He afterward married Amelia Blum, daughter of David Blum of Frankfort-on-the-Main. They have seven children—Nathan, in business with his father; Lois who is studying medicine; Adolph and Julius; and three daughters, Thekla, Kosalia and Bella.

SUNDRY INDUSTRIES.

NEWELL MATSON, the well-known jeweler, and senior member of the firm of N. Matson & Co., was born in Simsbury, Hartford Co., Conn., where he was educated and made his entry into business life. His first enterprise was a general country store, which he conducted until 1845, when he removed to Owego, N. Y., where he opened a dry goods and notion store. One of his departments comprised jewelry, his trade in that line growing so rapidly that he relinquished the other branches of his business and devoted his time exclusively to the manufacture and sale of all kinds of jewelry, silverware, etc. The extent of Mr. Matson's trade during his residence in Owego may be imagined, when it is stated that he employed fifty-six salesmen. In the course of several years he established a branch store at Danville, N. Y., which was then a central point for the distribution of goods, and more convenient for a number of his traveling salesmen. Two years later, Mr. Matson sold his Danville store to one of his employes, and located another branch at Painesville, Ohio. In 1857, he closed out his interests in the East, and went to Milwaukee, Wis., where he established his business. Later on, seeing that it was necessary to have a branch house in Chicago, if he desired to retain and extend his trade, he opened a store at No. 117 Lake Street, where the business grew so rapidly that, a short time prior to the great fire of 1871, he gave up his Milwaukee interests, and concentrated his trade in the Chicago house. The fire came, and Mr. Matson was one of the many sufferers, his stock being completely destroyed; but with the energy for which he is noted, he soon found quarters in a dwelling on Wabash Avenue, where he remained for one year, when he removed to the elegant building, erected for him, at the southwest corner of Monroe and State streets, his present location. Mr. Matson's career demonstrates what energy, pluck and uncompromising honesty will do, the position which he holds in business and social life amplifying the adage that "honesty is the best policy." Mr. Matson has had many interesting experiences, during which time he had several partners connected with him. His present partner is L. J. Norton, who has been with him for many years. Mr. Matson was married to Miss Flora M. Case, of Simsbury, Hartford Co., Conn. in 1840. Has five children living—Flora P., now wife of Thomas S. Hayden, of Denver, Col.; Anna C.; Ella C., now wife of A. H. Andrews, of Chicago; Rollin N., engaged with his father; and Lottie, now wife of S. M. Perry, of Chicago.

HENRY HORNER & Co.—The house of Henry Horner & Co., wholesale grocers and flour dealers, is one of the oldest in the city, having been established in 1842 by Henry Horner, the father of the present proprietor. It was inaugurated at the corner of Randolph and Canal streets as a wholesale and retail house, and there remained until 1859, when Mr. Horner built the large store at Nos. 78, 80 and 82 West Randolph Street. There Mr. Horner remained until 1864, when he removed his business to South Water Street, and there was burned out by the fire of 1871. This necessitated his return to his own store, which the present firm still occupies. In 1875, the retail department was abandoned, and in the same year Henry Horner died, the business being continued by his widow and son, Isaac H. Horner. Subsequently, Angel, Charles, and Maurice Horner, brothers of Isaac, also entered into the business, the firm name remaining the same—Henry Horner & Co. Henry Horner (deceased) was born in Seyn, Bohemia, in 1817; he came to America in 1840, and located in Chicago, and engaged as a clerk for a clothing house, where he remained until he began business for himself in 1842, which he continued until the time of his death, which occurred February 12, 1878. In 1869, he engaged in the banking business in company with Lazarus Silverman; they continued the business until the fire of 1871, when the firm dissolved. In 1848, he married Hannah, daughter of Simon and Minna (Solomon) Dernberg, natives of Darmstadt, Germany. Mr. and Mrs. Horner had eleven children—Delia, wife of S. A. Levy, of this city; Joseph, of firm of Shoyer & Horner, married to a daughter of H. A. Kohn; Isaac H., Angel; Minnie, wife of S. Yondorf, of the firm of Strauss, Goodman & Yondorf; Charles, Maurice; Dora, wife of A. Yondorf, of the firm of Yondorf Bros., clothing, in this city; Harry, Albert, and Mattie. Mr. Horner was one of the originators of the Chicago Board of Trade, and he remained a member until the time of his death. Resolutions of respect and condolence were adopted by the Board upon his decease.

GEORGE CHURCHILL COOK was born March 10, 1811, in Berkshire, Tioga Co., N. Y. This colony was named after Berkshire, Mass., and contained many prominent families from the last-named region. His parents, Ebenezer and Elizabeth (Churchill) Cook, were among the colonists. Ebenezer Cook died in 1812, and Mrs. Elizabeth Cook in 1825. Thus, at the early age of fifteen, was the subject of this sketch deprived of the assistance and counsel of both his parents, and obliged to set out for himself in life; but this necessity developed in him that resolution, stability and self-denial for which he was ever afterward characterized. Fortunately, however, for him, he went to live with an uncle, Colonel William Cook, in whose employ he became familiar with the details of business life, and where he qualified himself for the management of those large mercantile interests which afterward devolved upon him. He was married November 11, 1834, to Miss Lucy Maria Williams, whose parents were likewise from Berkshire, Mass. He moved immediately to Newark Valley, where he lived nine years, and in 1843, came to Chicago. The city was then small, but, foreseeing its future development, he determined to remain, and established himself in the grocery business. Such was his success that, previous to the great fire, he was the head of the largest house in that line in the Northwest. That calamity swept away his fortune, and shortly afterward he became manager of the Merchants' Safe Deposit Company, which position he retained until his death. He was a man of untiring industry, was diligent in business, and when in charge of the vaults of the Deposit Company was always at his post, even though in enfeebled health. Mr. Cook was converted, and joined the Methodist Church in 1833, and from that time until his death, which occurred April 18, 1884, he was one of the most sincere, earnest and devoted Christians. His devotion to the Church was very intense. Everything was estimated by him by its bearing upon the Church. He was a director and, for a time, president of the Chicago Orphan Asylum. He was a life director of the Chicago Bible Society, and he was a member of the board of trustees of the Northwestern University. Much as Mr. Cook gave before the great Chicago fire swept away his fortune, his largest contributions were in the constant flow of cheerfulness and attention to strangers, by which so many were attracted to the church. His quick eye would detect a stranger in the congregation, and he was sure to make him welcome. Chicago, and that Western land, contain many noble Christians, who, as young men, poor clerks, were noticed, encouraged, and helped into active church work by Mr. Cook. He believed it to be a man's highest duty to do good to his fellow-man, and he was a constant supporter of the old State-street M. E. Church, and, later, of the Wabash-avenue M. E. Church. This Church, on April 21, 1884, adopted a series of resolutions in which they resolved "that we recognize that he has been the leading spirit of our united work since 1851, and that, consequently, we feel a sense of irreparable loss at his removal from our midst." And, although he was not a member of the Commercial Exchange of Chicago, yet, that body, on the same day, resolved "that we shall not forget his kindly face and genial greetings, his high standard for moral and business integrity, nor his active sympathy for the poor and unfortunate, for, if all those for whom he had done some kindly service could throw a blossom on his grave, he would sleep beneath a monument of flowers." The Sunday-school of Wabash-avenue M. E. Church also passed a series of appreciative resolutions. Mr. Cook's love of the beautiful was highly developed. He had made a collection of steel engravings which fill forty large handsome scrap-books, and arranged them with great discrimination as to subjects; and there is probably no other similar collection at all to be compared with it. Mr. Cook left a wife and one son, Henry W. Cook, and an adopted daughter, now Mrs. Walter S. Carter, of Brooklyn, N. Y., as the only members of his family. Henry W. Cook is a member of the firm of Cook, Phillips & Wells.

H. C. & C. DURAND.—This house is one of the largest jobbing and importing houses in this city. No house in this especial line of trade is more widely known throughout the West and Northwest, as it is one of the pioneers of 1850. H. C. Durand commenced business as a wholesale grocer in co-partnership with R. Bailey, at No. 9 Market Street, under the firm name of Bailey & Durand. The firm remained unchanged until 1856, when Mr. Durand purchased Mr. Bailey's interest, and organized the firm of Durand Bros., the individual members being H. C. Durand, John M. Durand, and C. E. Durand. In the year 1857, H. G. Powers became associated with them, and the firm became Durand Bros. & Powers. On January 1, 1872, upon the retirement of H. G. Powers, the firm name was again changed to Durand & Co., its members being John M. Durand, H. C. Durand, and Calvin Durand. Their store was at Nos. 42, 44 and 46 Wahash Avenue, in 1878, when the present firm was established under the style of H. C. & C. Durand, and has so remained until present date. The warehouses, offices, and packing rooms in connection with their extensive business, occupy the five buildings known as Nos. 15, 17, 19, 21 and 23 LaSalle Street, where they have remained since the organization of the present firm.

H. C. DURAND, the founder of the above named house, was born in Clintonville, AuSable Tp., Clinton Co., N. Y., March 1, 1827. His parents, Calvin and Lois Durand, were natives of Chittenden County, Vt. Mr. Durand's early life was spent upon the farm of his parents. In September of 1850, he went to Milwaukee, Wis., and engaged as a clerk in the grocery house of (J. M.) Durand (his oldest brother) & (J. M.) Lawrence, remaining with them until May, of 1851, when he came to Chicago, and established the house of which he is still the head. Mr. Durand married Anna W. Durdall, daughter of Caleb Durdall, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Mr. Durand and wife are members of the First Presbyterian Church of Lake Forest, where they reside.

CALVIN DURAND, of the firm of H. C. & C. Durand, was born in Clintonville, Clinton Co., N. Y., on May 7, 1830, and is a son of Calvin and Lois (Barnes) Durand, natives of Vermont. Calvin, senior, followed the mercantile business and farming most of his life; he also did considerable contracting. He and his wife died in Collinsville—Lois dying in 1860 and Calvin in 1864. Calvin, junior, was educated in the common schools of New York and at Keysville Academy. In the spring of 1860, he came to Chicago, and took a situation as a clerk for his brothers, and remained with them until the spring of 1862, when he enlisted in the Chicago Board-of-Trade Battery, which joined the Army of the Cumberland, and was with it in all its great battles until the summer of 1864, when he was taken prisoner by the rebels, near Atlanta, Ga. He was sent to Andersonville, where he remained three months; thence to Florence, S. C., and was there three months; when he was taken to Libby Prison, where he was kept two weeks, and then exchanged. His treatment at each of these prisons was perfectly inhuman, and he says that history is unable to record the brutal, malevolent and outrageous treatment accorded to our prisoners in those Southern prison-pens. At the close of the War, in 1865, he was discharged in Chicago. He re-commenced work as a clerk for Durand & Hyde, with whom he remained for three months, when he was admitted as a partner into the firm of Durand Bros. & Powers. After this there were several changes in the firm, but Calvin has remained with the house, which is now H. C. & C. Durand. In 1867, he married Sarah G., daughter of Myron D., native of New York, and Lydia Elizabeth (Allen) Downs, native of Connecticut. By the above marriage there are five children—Jennie E., Hattie A., Mabel E., Bertha J. and a baby. Mr. Durand and wife are members of the First Presbyterian Church, Lake Forest, and he is a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M.

THE W. M. HOYT COMPANY was organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, and became incorporated in 1883. The members of the company were also members of the old firm of W. M. Hoyt & Co. The officers are W. M. Hoyt, president; A. M. Fuller, vice-president; and Robert J. Bennett, secretary and treasurer. Mr. Buttolph and Graeme Stewart are directors. The early history of the house is as follows: Mr. Hoyt, the president and senior partner, in 1857, entered into the fruit business at the corner of Dearborn and Randolph streets, and continued therein until 1865. In that year, having bought out James A. Whitaker, at No. 101 South Water Street, he engaged in the wholesale grocery business, associating Christopher Watrous, W. T. Sherer and S. M. Case with him. The firm remained at the same location until after the fire of 1871, when they removed to No. 63 South Canal Street, and from there to their present place of business, the site of old Fort Dearborn. As a fitting memorial of that historic landmark, Mr. Hoyt has caused a marble tablet to be placed in the north wall of his store, the plan and inscription being furnished by his partner, Mr. Bennett. This house is doing a business of three million dollars annually.

ALBERT C. BUTTOLPH, one of the directors of the W. M. Hoyt Company, wholesale grocers, was born in Charlotte, Vt., September 8, 1852, and is a son of Albert A., and Laura (Burnham) Buttolph, natives of Vermont. Albert was educated in the schools of Illinois, and obtained his first experience as a business clerk in a retail store at Morris, Grundy County. In 1873, he came to Chicago, and engaged with the house of W. M. Hoyt & Co., and has continued there since. In 1880, he was admitted as a general partner, and when the firm organized under the State laws, he was made one of the directors. On December 27, 1877, he married Miss Louise Estelle, the daughter of George and Mary (Trusdale) Fuller. They have two children—Grace and Roy. Mr. Buttolph is a member of the Royal Arcanum and of the Loyal League.

ALONZO M. FULLER is the vice-president of the W. M. Hoyt Company, wholesale grocers. He was born in Lowell, Oneida Co., N. Y., on October 4, 1844, and is a son of George W. and Mary (Munson) Fuller. He was educated in the State of New York and in Lake County, Ill. He remained upon a farm until he was seventeen years of age, when he engaged with Mr. Hoyt in the fancy grocery business, and remained with that gentleman for three years. Then he formed a partnership with Robert J. Bennett, to carry on the same business, which partnership continued nine years, when both members of that firm became associated with W. M. Hoyt. On the incorporation of the company, Mr. Fuller was elected vice-president.

ROBERT J. BENNETT, of the W. M. Hoyt Company, was born in Pulaski, Oswego Co., N. Y., February 9, 1839, and is a son of Ruben and Alta (Haskins) Bennett. In 1836, Mr. Bennett, Sr., moved to Illinois, and located at Koscoe, Winnebago County, but remained only a short time, finding land-titles in an unsettled and disputed condition. He returned to New York, where he lived until 1844, when he again came to Illinois, and settled at Diamond Lake, Lake County, where he purchased a farm, upon which he lived some years. He afterward bought land at Libertyville, and remained there thirteen years, until his death, on December 16, 1883. Robert J. was educated in the High School at Racine, Wis., and the Academy at Waukegan. He was reared on a farm, and, after leaving school, was a teacher for a number of years. In 1863, he came to Chicago, engaged as a general bookkeeper and cashier two years, and then formed a partnership with A. M. Fuller in the fancy grocery trade, which he continued for nine years. In 1874, they consolidated with W. M. Hoyt & Co. In 1862, Mr. Bennett married Miss Electa M., daughter of Carlos M. and Julia (Buttolph) Hoyt, natives of Vermont. Mr. and Mrs. Bennett have three children—Arthur G., Maud E. and William.

JAMES S. KIRK & Co.—This house is one of the oldest and largest of its kind any where in the West, and was established in Chicago over twenty-five years ago. Its history is best told in the following brief sketch of its founder.

JAMES S. KIRK, whose father was a ship-builder on the Clyde, was born in Glasgow in 1818, and brought up in Montreal, whither the family moved in 1819. James, the only son, was then six months of age. After graduating from the Montreal Academic Institute, he engaged in the manufacture of soaps, candles and alkali in Montreal. Afterward he became a lumber producer, and personally superintended the camp in the woods and the drive down the Ottawa River to Montreal. When scarcely twenty-one years of age he married Miss Nancy Ann Dunning at Ottawa (then known as Bytown). Shortly afterward he came to the United States, and made Utica, New York, his home. In that city, in 1839, James S. Kirk established a house which has become famous for the manufacture of soap and perfumes. Twenty years afterward found them at Nos. 18-20 River Street, Chicago, in the year 1859, where they remained until 1867. They then removed to North Water Street, where they operate the largest soap manufactory in America. The fire caused the firm a loss of a quarter of a million. For nearly fifty years the stern old churchman (for all his life he has been an earnest and consistent Christian), has striven to perfect the business scheme of his life. Success has crowned his efforts, and he now lives in well-earned retirement, in a luxurious home in South Evanston. An undivided family of seven sons, scarcely less tenacious than the persevering old gentleman himself, have, since their earliest boyhood, been engaged in the business. Four sons—James A., John B., Milton W., and Wallace F.—are the active and directing members of the firm; three others are working in the business, but as silent partners. Through the ingenuity of the junior partners many novel inventions and labor-saving appliances have been introduced. The alkali now in use is caustic soda and soda ash, both unknown in this country when the house first opened in Utica. Then teams scoured the country for wood-ashes, which were leached on the lots outside the works. If the old fashioned plan was resorted to now to supply the daily consumption, a ground space of at least fifty acres would be necessary to plant the leaches. This is but an instance of the march of improvement, and the advance of this firm fully illustrates it. An idea of the volume of business done, by this house, may be gleaned from the fact that in 1883 their total sales amounted to sixty million pounds of soap alone, not mentioning other lines of goods which they also handle.

HARPER BROTHERS.—This firm of wholesale and retail grocers was founded by John C. Harper, in September, 1873. A branch house is located at Cherokee, Iowa, managed by Fred Harper. This house does a large trade extending into all the Western States and many of the territories. From its organization, the house has steadily prospered, and it has increased, from year to year, with surprising rapidity.

JOHN C. HARPER was born in the celebrated city of York, England, on June 27, 1845, and is a son of James and Elizabeth (White) Harper. James Harper was a farmer, and upon the farm and in the city schools John received his early training and education. In 1856, the family came to America and located in Ogdensburg, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., where Mr. Harper Sr., died in 1865. Mrs. Elizabeth Harper now lives with her son Fred., in Cherokee, Iowa. At Ogdensburg, John C. attended school and learned the trade of floriculturist, which he followed in New York until he came to Chicago in 1863. He then worked at bridge-building for various railroads and corporations, and had charge of the reconstruction of the VanBuren Street and other bridges, after their demolition in the great fire of 1871. He continued the bridge-building business until 1873, when he inaugurated the grocery firm as recited. On October 3, 1874, he married Mrs. Eliza J. (Fitzwater) Marquis, of Monticello, Platt Co., Ill. They have had one daughter Ella, now wife of J. W. Heller, of this city. Mr. Harper has been very prosperous since his arrival here, but his prosperity has simply been the result of steady perseverance, industry and commercial integrity—characteristics of the Yorkshirer. He is a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M.

GEORGE HARPER, was also born in Yorkshire, England, on January 20, 1849. He was educated at Ogdensburg, N. Y., after the immigration of his family to America, as before recounted, and worked on a farm until he was seventeen years of age. In 1869, he came West and went to work on a railroad, and continued rail-roading for six years; after which he went into the employ of his brother, where he still remains. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and connected with Acacia Lodge, No. 705, A. F. & A. M., of Ogdensburg.

HENRY SCHOELLKOPF has been engaged in the wholesale and retail grocery business since 1851. In 1863, he formed a copartnership with his brother, C. E. Schoellkopf, and continued in business at Nos. 232-234 Randolph Street, until in October, 1871, when they were burned out. They resumed operations one week after the fire, at No. 102 West Randolph Street, remaining there for about fifteen months, when the firm of Henry Schoellkopf & Bros. was dissolved. Since that time, Henry has been doing business at his former location, in the building which he re-built immediately after the fire. Henry Schoellkopf was born in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany, on April 23, 1826, and was educated at Stuttgart and Heilbron. When his studies were finished, he became a clerk in a store, and thoroughly learned the grocery trade, beginning when quite young, and remaining until he was twenty-two years of age. In 1848, he came directly to Buffalo, N. Y., and was engaged in the Buffalo Savings Bank as bookkeeper for four years. In 1852, he came to Chicago, and commenced the grocery business on the northeast corner of Fifth Avenue (then Wells Street) and Washington Street, where he remained for four years. He then moved to Nos. 232-234 Randolph Street, afterward adding No. 236. He was married in Akron, Ohio, in 1861, to Miss Emma Koehler, daughter of Robert Koehler, and has five children—Henry W., Emma, Minnie, Ida and Edward.

SAMUEL FAULKNER, for many years connected with the wholesale grocery trade of Chicago, was born in Colchester County, Nova Scotia, on October 19, 1828. He is the son of Samuel Faulkner and Sarah (F.) Faulkner, and first came to Chicago from Boston, where he was identified with the grocery trade, on May 27, 1851. Mr. Faulkner inaugurated his long business career in this city by entering the employ of Mr. Heath, a wholesale grocer, as a salesman. Six months afterward, he became connected, in the same capacity, with the flourishing house of Satterlee & Cook, where he met Frederick Fischer, also a salesman, who is now a member of the firm of Reid, Murdoch & Fischer. Mr. Faulkner remained in their employ for three years, when he was admitted as a partner, the firm name being Satterlee, Cook & Co., and composed of G. C. Cook, Meret L. Satterlee, Frederick Fischer and Samuel Faulkner. In January, 1860, their partnership was dissolved, Messrs. Satterlee and Faulkner retiring, and the latter entering at once into the same business, continuing alone until the following October, when he was joined by E. S. Wells, and, in March, 1861, by M. L. Satterlee. The firm of Satterlee, Wells & Faulkner continued without change for six years, occupying a prominent position in the trade.

Mr. Satterlee retired from the firm in 1866, which remained Wells & Faulkner until January, 1878, when the firm was dissolved. This firm met with heavy losses by the great fire, and insufficient insurance greatly impaired their capital, notwithstanding which they discharged all their ante-fire liabilities within forty-five days after their property was swept away by the conflagration. In February, 1879, Mr. Faulkner assumed the management of Messrs. Procter & Gamble's Chicago business. On January 8, 1857, Mr. Faulkner was married to Cornelia E. Smith of Warren, Mass., daughter of Rev. Stephen Sanford Smith. They have had eleven children, nine of whom are living. The eldest, Emma Louisa, is the wife of William R. Chapman, of New York City. Sanford W., the only son, is a general commercial broker in this city. Mr. and Mrs. Faulkner have been actively identified with the First Presbyterian Church since 1857.

A. H. BLACKALL is one of the earliest dealers in teas, coffees and spices in this city, and can justly claim the honor of having the oldest establishment in that line in Chicago. His first place of business was at No. 57 Clark Street, the site of the present Sherman House, where he opened a small store in 1849, which he occupied until 1860, when his increased business necessitated larger quarters. He then removed to No. 49 Clark Street. Prior to this removal, however, he had, in 1857, inaugurated the American Coffee and Spice-Mills on Michigan Street, the location of the present County Criminal Court. These spice-mills formed one of the earliest enterprises of that character in Chicago. Through perseverance and strict commercial integrity he soon succeeded in establishing one of the most flourishing and remunerative business enterprises in the city, and at the time of the fire of 1871 again was preparing new quarters at No. 146 State Street; but the flames reached his building before he did, destroying it, together with his two other business houses, as well as his residence. He was left penniless, with the exception of a little money he had in his pocket. Mr. Blackall, however, being a typical Chicago merchant, wasted no time in lamenting over his losses, but sent East for a fresh stock of goods, and commenced business at No. 289 West Madison Street; also re-establishing the American Coffee and Spice-Mills at their present location on Clark Street. He remained at No. 289 West Madison Street for some time, and then removed to No. 186 on the same street, at the corner of Halsted Street, and from thence to No. 172 Madison Street, which is now one of his branch stores, managed by John Corbett. At the present time he also has a branch at No. 172 State Street, opposite the Palmer House, under the supervision of Edward Seward Blackall; his main store, Nos. 39-43 Clark Street, being also under his son's supervision. These various stores transact a business of about half a million dollars annually.

A. H. Blackall, the inaugurator and conductor of these enterprises, was born in Oxfordshire, England, October 24, 1824, and is a son of William and Jane (Seward) Blackall, natives of that shire, as was his great grandfather before him. William Blackall was an English gentleman who was the owner of large landed estates, and was a lineal descendant of a long ancestry of the squirearchy of that county. He died near Oxford. Mr. Blackall received his education in the public and private schools in the vicinity of his native place, but being seized with a desire for emigration, sailed for the United States in 1842, arriving in New York City, where he remained for seven years. During this time he was engaged in various commercial and clerical capacities, and in 1849, came to this city. In that year he commenced the business, a brief history of which has been given, and which he has continued uninterruptedly, save for one week at the time of the great fire. In 1850, he married H. Maria, daughter of John and Ann Taylor, who were natives of Kent, England. By this marriage there are three children now living—Annie Jane, wife of H. Victor Love, now in Japan; Edward Seward; and Lillie M., who is well known in the amateur musical circles of Chicago. Mr. Blackall is a member of Blaney Lodge, No. 271, A. F. & A. M., and is also a member of Oriental Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S., and of St. George's Benevolent Association.

THE BURNING OF CHICAGO.

INTRODUCTORY.

During the thirteen years that have elapsed since Chicago was destroyed by the great fire, numerous persons have devoted time and money to the labor of gathering accurate data for the use of unbiased writers. Among the most active of these is George M. Higginson, who placed the results of his efforts in the form of manuscript statements of eye-witnesses, in the vault of the Chicago Historical Society. Through the courtesy of Secretary Albert D. Hager, access was allowed to those hitherto unpublished documents, many of which are given in the succeeding pages.

Charles C. P. Holden investigated the progress of the fire from the O'Leary barn to the Water Works, noting it step by step, and fixing in an indisputable manner the exact time of its igniting Batcham's mill, Parmelee's stables, the Court House, Wright's stables, and the Water Works. This information was derived from a great number of sources, involving much labor and patience, and the facts are here given for the first time, and are corroborated by a score of interviews.

The records of the investigation by the Commissioners soon after the fire, and the several conflicting statements made at the time, are referred to only when later statements require such notice. In the description of the terrible calamity, it was found expedient to draw freely from such graphic pens as those wielded by Messrs. Colbert, Sheahan, Upton, Chamberlin, Walker, Wilkie, White, and their brothers of the Press, most of whom were eye-witnesses of the scenes they portrayed. What has once been well told is allowed to remain in its original form.

CAUSE OF THE FIRE.—The precise cause of the fire is now a mystery, and must ever remain so, unless the knowledge at present withheld through fear or pride shall hereafter be revealed, as those who may know the cause manifest a decided aversion to the subject. It is difficult to deal with people who can not be made to understand that accident is not crime, even when dreadful results ensue.

Four theories are advanced relative to the origin of the great fire:

First. That Mrs. O'Leary visited her cows after dark, carrying a lighted kerosene lamp, which was kicked over by the historic cow, setting fire to the surrounding rubbish. This was the first theory advanced, and the one most tenaciously adhered to; which theory conceded that a vicious cow and a pint of oil were sufficient to produce a conflagration that destroyed $192,000,000 worth of property, at the appalling rate of $110,000 a minute.

Second. That some of O'Leary's neighbors surreptitiously visited the barn, also with a lighted lamp, for the purpose of obtaining fresh milk to make punch or oyster stew, and met with a vigorous protest from the disturbed cow, which resulted in the conflagration.

Third. That some boys were enjoying a moment of stolen pleasure in the barn, with pipes or cigars, and carelessly let fire fall among the inflammable substances on the floor.

Fourth. That the fire was the deliberate work of an incendiary.

These pages contain the results of a patient and impartial research among the records, and a painstaking examination of living witnesses, but the admission is made, that a satisfactory conclusion as to the origin of the fire has not been reached. Certain points of valuable evidence, however, are here given to the public for the first time. Among these are the following:

The fire started as early as 8:45, instead of 9:30, as has been asserted by nearly all writers.

A woman's scream was heard in or near the O'Leary barn just before the fire broke out, but no evidence is obtainable to prove by whom it was uttered.

A broken kerosene lamp was found in the ruins of the O'Leary barn the day after the fire.

LOCALITY OF THE FIRE.—In order that the reader may have a clear conception of the locale, as well as the magnitude, of the phenomenal conflagrations of October, 1871, a resumé is given of the chief features of the geographical and social facts already recorded.

The official plan of the city recognized that portion lying south of the main river, and east of the South Branch, as the South Division; that lying north of the main river, and east of the North Branch, as the North Division; that lying west of both branches, as the West Division.

The main river penetrated westward from the lake as far as Market Street, and then, with irregular outline, diverged to the northward and southward.

Communication between the several divisions was facilitated by tunnels under the river, and bridges of the pivot style still in use. On the main stream, the easternmost bridge was at Rush Street, the next crossed at State Street, the third at Clark; at LaSalle, a tunnel afforded passage-way for vehicles and foot-passengers; and a bridge crossed at Wells Street. On the South Branch there were bridges at Lake and Randolph streets; a tunnel at Washington Street; bridges at Madison, Adams, VanBuren and Polk streets—the latter being the southernmost destroyed. On the North Branch there were bridges at Kinzie, Indiana and Erie streets and Chicago Avenue—the last named being the only one destroyed on this stream.

WATER AND GAS SUPPLY.—The water supply was distributed from the pumping-works, located near the lake shore, just north of Chicago Avenue. The capacity of the tunnel was fifty-seven million gallons daily. The ordinary consumption was estimated at about twenty-four million gallons a day. There were about two hundred and seventy-five miles of water-pipes laid at the time of the fire.

The gas supply was furnished by two companies. A sketch of the means of distribution will not be inappropriate and is consequently given:

THE CHICAGO GAS LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY was organized in the spring of 1850. In April, work was begun, and by September 4, five miles of mains had been laid, and on that date the city had its first gas light (see page 155, vol. 1). Hugh T. Dickey was the first president, and he continued to serve until 1871. James K. Burtis was the first secretary and treasurer, and held that position in 1871. The second board of directors was composed of Mark Skinner, Thomas Dyer, Joseph Keen, Jr., William Blair, George Smith, George F. Lee, Eli B. Williams and Jerome Beecher. For a few months, during the absence of Mr. Burtis in the East, W. B. Keen served as secretary and treasurer. William Gentry was the superintendent. The following table shows the growth of the system of mains up to 1871:

Year.	Aggregate number of miles of mains laid.	Year.	Aggregate number of miles of mains laid.
1850	5	1861	60
1851	7	1862	47
1852	7	1863	50
1853	13	1864	53
1854	20	1865	55
1855	23	1866	61
1856	29	1867	73
1857	35	1868	89
1858	39	1869	106
1859	48	1870	121
1860	53	1871	135

The apparent reduction of the total number of miles that had been laid in 1862, was occasioned by the sale of the plant on the west side of the river to the People's Gas Light and Coke Company. This plant consisted of thirteen miles of mains. There were, however, laid in 1862, by the original company, fourteen miles of mains.

The first works and the main office of the Chicago Gas Light and Coke Company were located on Monroe Street, near Market. The works were afterward extended through to Adams Street, and the business office was removed, for a time, to the second story of the building No. 146 Lake Street. The original cost of the works was $105,000. Stock to the extent of $70,000, and bonds to the amount of $30,000 were issued. The contractors of the works took nearly $95,000 of the stock themselves. In 1852, the amount of the bonds was increased to $50,000. The first year, the company laid in a stock of 400 tons of coal, and in 1871, 72,000 tons. In 1850, the price of gas was $3.50 a thousand feet. This rate was subsequently reduced; but during the war, when coal was $13 a ton, it was again increased to $3.50. One of the war taxation measures was a tax of twenty-five cents a thousand feet on gas, and the companies were obliged to make a sworn statement every month of the amount manufactured. In 1871, the price to consumers was $3 a thousand feet. The demand had become so great in 1867, that the Chicago Gas Light and Coke Company erected new works on the North Side, on the block bounded by Hawthorne Avenue, Haines, Hobby and Crosby streets. These works, up to 1871, had cost $300,000. The South Side works were totally destroyed by the great fire, but the North Side works were saved by great exertions.

THE PEOPLE'S GAS LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY, after their purchase of the West Side system of mains, in 1862, built works on West Twenty-second Street, where they still remain. The West Side company was organized as a corporation, but could not float its stock. A. M. Billings and C. K. Garrison, the latter of New York, finally took all the bonds. The company built the works at their own expense, effected a lease of the mains for ninety-nine years, and have ever since been practically the owners of the West Side system. In 1871, there were sixty miles of mains laid and acting as feeders to street lamps and private consumers on the West Side.

FIRE AND POLICE DEPARTMENTS.—The Fire Department consisted of seventeen steam engines, fifty-four hose carts, four hook and ladder trucks, two hose elevators, one fire-escape, eleven alarm bells, and forty-eight thousand feet of hose.

The Police Department comprised four hundred and fifty men, under the general charge of a Board of Police Commissioners.

POPULATION.—The following table shows the population, area, and number of buildings in the city, by divisions, in October, 1871:

	POPULATION.	AREA, ACRES.	BUILDINGS.
North Division	77,758	2,533	13,800
South Division	91,417	5,303	16,300
West Division	165,095	15,104	29,400
Total	334,270	23,000	59,500

The total value of property, including that not assessed for taxation, was: North Side, $89,000,000; South Side, $340,000,000; West Side, $191,000,000; total, $620,000,000.

SCIENCE OF THE FIRE.—In the present condition of human thought, the mind naturally seeks some reason for the unparalleled ferocity of the flames which destroyed, not only Chicago, but vast tracts of timbered country throughout the Northwest, during the summer and fall of 1871. We quote Elias Colbert:

"As a chemical result of this immense burning, we have not less than three million tons of carbonic acid from the city, liberated from its union with other elements, and carried up into the air. Every three pounds of this would take up eight pounds of oxygen, forming eleven pounds of carbonic acid gas. Here we have an addition of twelve million tons of free carbonic acid gas to the quantity already existing in the atmosphere. * * * The quantity of carbonic acid gas normal to the atmosphere at the present day is estimated to be about one part in two thousand; the weight will, therefore, be a little less than twenty thousand million tons. Hence, its proportion in the atmosphere has been increased by about one part in sixteen hundred. The total weight of atmospheric oxygen being a little over nine million tons, its proportion has been decreased to the extent of nearly one part in a million. Accepting Liebig's estimate that the annual consumption of oxygen by the lower animals and by combustion is double the quantity consumed by human beings in breathing, we arrive at the astonishing result that the oxygen taken up by the Northwestern fires was equal to the amount required to supply the consumption of ten months all over the globe." * * * "A recollection of the fact that large quantities of carbonic acid gas were generated by the fire will enable us to understand how very many individuals dropped down dead near the scenes of the conflagration, and were afterward found without the least trace of fire upon their clothing or person. It is demonstrated that eight per cent of this gas in the atmosphere is fatal to life. It would be generated in fully this proportion in the neighborhood of the flames, and would hence spread slowly through the air, over the whole surface of the earth. The amount of carbonic acid gas evolved by these fires would suffice to saturate the air in the locality to the height of nearly fifty yards from the ground. But other and very important chemical changes were involved in these widespread conflagrations. Every one has read, if he did not himself pass through the horrible experience, how the very air itself seemed full of fire, how the flames seemed to take giant leaps of many hundreds of yards, breaking out in points far away from the scenes of general disaster, and how huge balloons of flames swept through the sky, to descend and break like a burning [water] spout, licking up every vestige of human life and labor from open clearings to which many had fled as to a haven of safety. These undoubted facts have been ascribed to 'electricity'—the agency to which every mystery is generally referred, when we fail to assign any other cause. It is true that electric fires were vividly at work during that terrible turmoil of the elements; for we know that no chemical change can occur without the evolution of electrical energy. But the electricity itself was only a phenomenon resulting from the formation of other chemical compounds than the one above referred to. Immense quantities of water were licked up by the flames both in city and country, and converted into super-heated vapor. At this point, the chemical affinities of its constituent gases for each other were overcome by the omnipresent carbon, three pounds of which combined with every pound weight of hydrogen to form what is known as light carburetted hydrogen, while the released oxygen combined with other portions of carbon to form carbonic acid. This carburetted hydrogen is the terror of the coal miner, forming explosive mixtures with the ordinary air of the coal pit. It is also known as marsh-gas, being produced by the putrefaction of vegetable matter under water and mud. The volume of this gas was largely supplemented in the city by the coal gas that escaped from the retorts and the supply pipes. This was the material that, mingling with the ordinary air, changed it into a perfect atmosphere of fire, through which the intangible flames could leap, like the lightning flash, from one point to another far distant. Here was the substance of those mysterious balloon masses; they were aggregations of this gas which could not burn where they originated, owing to a lack of oxygen, which had been already sucked out from the air by the incandescent carbon. These masses went along till they met with a sufficient quantity of fresh oxygen to satisfy their insatiate craving to be reduced back to carbonic acid and water. That condition fulfilled, the change was at once effected, and in the process the devastating flames were kindled afresh in hundreds of places so far removed from the previous locality of the fire, that it seemed as if the havoc could only have been wrought by the torch of the destroying angel. And this hydrogenated atmosphere ministered to the further spread of the devouring element in still another way. The millions of blazing fire brands that were borne mechanically on the wings of the gale would have died out in an ordinary condition of the atmosphere, before they fell. But after the fire had divorced large quantities of hydrogen from its aqueous matrimony, these brands met with fresh fuel in every yard of their course, and set on fire the hydrogen through which they passed, giving rise to lurid lines of light that resembled the path of a mammoth aërolite. Hence, they bore the death warrant to thousands of structures that would have escaped if they had been evolved by a fire of ordinary magnitude. The burning missiles that fell thick and fast on the crib, two miles out in the lake, proved that they had come through an atmosphere highly charged with carburetted hydrogen. Space will not permit a notice of all the chemical derangements produced by these fires. Among the more important of those not already mentioned, is the formation of considerable quantities of ammonia, by the union of portions of this liberated hydrogen with the highly heated nitrogen of the atmosphere. Much of this ammonia will return to the soil to stimulate the growth of vegetable matter, and repair the waste. But no inconsiderable percentage of the whole united with carbon, to form the carbonates of ammonia, or become oxygenated more slowly, evolving an abundance of nitric acid. The latter gave rise to the peculiar odor experienced after the fire, which was remarked by many as identical with that noticed after a severe thunder storm, and is now known to be due to the formation of nitric acid in the air.

"The relative powers of the atomic and molecular affinities vary with a change in temperature. The chemist takes advantage of this, and fire has always been his most efficient aid in working out his transformations of material substantives. Here, we have the same agent operating on a gigantic scale, the magnitude of which is almost too vast for contemplation. But this power acted equally in obedience to natural law when raging over hundreds of miles, as when manipulated in the chemist's furnace, and assumed the functions of teacher, even when laughing to scorn the puny efforts of man to control it. * * *

"That Chicago was 'favorably' situated and constructed for just such a fire none will deny who remember that she presented a four-mile line of wooden buildings directly along the path of the southwest gales, so common in this region. But the forests per se presented no more unfavorable conditions than in years past, yet they, too were licked up by the all-devouring flames. The approximate cause of the conflagrations is found in the fact that the country was unusually dry. One and a half inches of rain fell in Chicago on the 3d of July, but from that date to the time of the fire, on the 9th of October, only two and a half inches fell, whereas the quantity falling in that line had averaged eight and three-quarter inches in former years. The rainfall of the summer season was only twenty-eight and one-half per cent of the average in Chicago; while in the lumber districts it was fully twenty per cent less than even this parsimonious allowance from the clouds. Meanwhile, a hot summer's sun had dried out every particle of the 'water of crystallization,' as the chemists will perhaps pardon us for calling it, and left the whole as dry as so much tinder. All that it wanted was an opportunity to burn, and that want was soon supplied."

Mr. Colbert's statement of the actual rainfall during the summer, or from July 3 to October 9, a period of exactly fourteen weeks, is undoubtedly correct, although published reports by the meteorological bureau of the War Department make even a less encouraging showing. Local scientific observations, probably, recorded the minutest dashes of moisture, and by that method aggregated two and one-half inches of rainfall. The only mention of rain, by one-hundredths of an inch, preserved in the weather reports appears as follows: July 3, 1.5 inches; August 23, .29 inch; August 28, .54 inch; August 29, .04 inch; August 30, .01 inch; September 5, "threatening," but no rain reported; September 14, .36 inch; September 15, .05 inch; September 28, .11 inch. No further mention is made until Tuesday, October 9, at about eleven p. m. This shows but 1.4 inches, exclusive of the fall of July 3. The humidity of the atmosphere, however, is not shown, but the exact measurement is scarcely required, in view of the insufficiency thereof.

DEFECTIVE CONSTRUCTION OF THE CITY.—The allusion to the favorable conditions which might induce a disastrous fire, calls for more than passing comment. Chicago was then built as if to invite its destruction in this manner. On the 10th of September, the Chicago Tribune contained a pungent editorial on this subject, which will be found relevant. Let the fact be borne in mind that this article was written a month before the fire.

"Chicago, as we are all persuaded in our secret hearts and as we sometimes venture to hint in our more confidential moods, has some things to be proud of. So conscious are we of our merits, and so confident of our superiority over all other places, both in the Old World and the New, that we can estimate at their true value the carping criticism and envious jibes of peripatetic letter-writers, who profess to find in us something of the spirit of self-glorification and something of that overweening sense of our own excellence, which assumed that we have nothing to learn from the experience and the ways of older communities. It is well enough for them whose growth has been slow, and whose development has been gradual, to talk of ars longa; it is only for us to remember the other half of the rusty old adage, that life is short, and to do what we do quickly, persuaded that, if only a thing is done at all, it is necessarily done well because we do it. If our buildings sometimes tumble down over our heads, because we run up walls, a hundred feet or more in height, of a single brick's thickness; if our magnificent cornices sometimes come rattling down into the street in a high wind, because their seemingly beautiful stone carvings are only ingeniously-molded and skillfully painted sheet-iron; if our stately Gothic church-towers sometimes topple over, or depart from the perpendicular, because they are tin only, and not the massive stone they are meant to represent; if our marble fronts are sometimes only thin veneers, so chamfered as to cheat the eye into believing that they rest upon solid blocks; if on these fronts we stick figure heads of stucco, or soft stone, in places where, neither in the heavens above nor in the earth beneath, there can be found any reason for putting them at all, or any reason whatever even for the existence of such effigies; if we mix up Ionic and Corinthian, Renaissance and Elizabethan, in inextricable confusion, their lines of beauty and of strength preserved in everlasting pine and shingle-nail and putty—in doing these and a hundred other things like them quite as shocking, when judged by any true standard in art or science, we hug ourselves with a comfortable feeling of self-complaisance, and rejoice, and possibly boast, that if we have not got the real thing itself—if we are sure we know what that is—we have got, at least, the semblance of it. And the worst of it is, we are growing content with that semblance. The dispensation of veneering, of sheet-iron, of pine planks, of stucco, of the meretricious in architecture and the false in art, seems of late to be becoming the established order, and if so be that we can achieve the outside appearance of some respectable reality, we are quite indifferent to the fact that the thing itself is only a sham and a cheat, a snare and a lie. Whether it is that sudden prosperity has debauched us, this is not the spirit that distinguished the Chicago of a few years ago. * * * But where is that spirit now? Has it all run to shams and shingles?"

The same newspaper, in its issue of October 9, 1872, editorially expresses its opinion of the cause of the fire and the celerity of its movement, as follows:

"The experience of this and other cities have driven the civic authorities to establish fire limits, which, at the time of the fire, began on the South Side, at the foot of Twenty-second Street, and ran to State, on State to Twelfth, thence to Clark, thence to Van-Buren, thence to LaSalle, thence to Adams, and thence to the South Branch. On the West Side, they embraced the territory south of Lake, east of Halsted to Madison, and east of Clinton, between Madison and VanBuren. On the North Side, they covered all south of Illinois Street, and one hundred feet on each side of Wells and the streets east of it, nearly or quite up to Chicago Avenue. Small in extent as this territory was, it had been secured with difficulty, and against the opposition of those who thought more of immediate profits than of future security. One-half of the buildings within this area were of wood. As Lazarus sat at the gate of Dives, so decaying wooden shanties and tenements, filled with the most degraded and reckless members of the community, stood immediately against iron and marble palaces. Rows of wooden rookeries confronted immense business blocks, or lurked in their rear. Coal and lumber yards lined both banks of the river, and frame houses, either in patches or dotted around like sentinels, and always preserving a means of communicating fire from one side to another of the fire limits, abounded. The law was constantly violated, wooden buildings were improved contrary to law, and the cupidity of individuals put at defiance the officers of the law, who, in their turn, seemed to fear the unpopularity which a strict enforcement of civic regulations might have brought upon them. A man who received a large rent for a wooden building was unable to see why he should replace it with a more substantial structure, even though by retaining the old one he menaced the property and even the life of others. Generous to excess in giving, the citizens of Chicago often fought too hard against even salutary measures, when they apparently lessened their receipts. * * * The peculiar geographical position of Chicago intensified the dangers growing out of its defective construction. It lay upon a flat prairie, open to the winds from whatever quarter they might come. Those which come from the lake are generally wet, and hardly more than once in the history of Chicago had a fire moved from east to west. Those from the west, and especially the southwest, were hot and dry, and before they reached the substantial buildings within the fire limits, they had extracted all the moisture from acres of frames, and left them as dry as tinder. The business quarter of the city was on the wrong side of the city, if it were to be located with special reference to its protection from fire. But that is a matter which settles itself and does not depend upon men. The location of the business portion of Chicago, as well as the greatness of the city, arose chiefly from natural causes, and while it is in this one respect unfortunate that the best buildings should be where they are, it is inevitable. Thus these wooden buildings, dried by southwesterly gales, lay on the weak side of the structures embraced in the fire limits, overlapping and outflanking them at both extremities and penetrating them at all points between those extremities. * * * Chicago, then, had for years been exposed to a destructive fire. All that was required was the concurrence of certain circumstances, which, separately, were constantly occurring—a long-continued dry season; a fire starting from the buildings on the West Side; a negligent or worn out Fire Department, and a gale of wind strong enough to carry the firebrands across the South Branch and the river. On the 9th of October they happened together."

Of the destructive power of the fire, Hon. William B. Ogden, in a letter to a member of his family, briefly but very succinctly says:

"The reason that buildings, men, or anything did not withstand the torrents of fire without utter destruction, is explained by the fact that the fire was accompanied by the fiercest tornado of wind ever known to blow here, and it acted like a perfect blow-pipe, driving the brilliant blaze hundreds of feet with so perfect a combustion that it consumed the smoke, and its heat was so great that fire-proof buildings sunk before it, almost as readily as wood."

FIRES DURING THE PREVIOUS WEEK.—During this long period of drought, when the country lay sweltering in the sun and gasping in the shade; when cyclones raged with dreadful destructiveness through the south and southwest; when the pineries of the Northwest were disappearing in a flood of flame; when human nature seemed to have reached the limit of endurance, and hundreds were stricken with fatal strokes,—the city was trembling with apprehension lest fire should sweep it from the earth. Evil-minded creatures, bent on plunder, skulked in by-ways and laid blazing refuse in combustible places. Property owners were alert. All feared, as with a foreboding of what was destined to come, the starting of even necessary fires. And yet, in spite of the existing danger, there were many careless persons, who heeded no word of warning—the irresponsible crowd that curses every community, and looks with indifferent or jealous eye on the possessions of the more fortunate. During the week preceding the great fire, there were many alarms. For comparative reference these are cited:

About two o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday, September 30, 1871, fire was discovered in the building known as the Burlington Warehouse "A," situated on Sixteenth Street, near the corner of State; a large brick structure used for storage purposes, and extending one hundred and sixty-five feet on Sixteenth Street, with a depth of one hundred and thirty-three feet, running back to the track of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad. The warehouse was built in 1864, by R. McCabe, and was subsequently purchased from him by Sturges & Co., who used it as a wool and general receiving depot. At the time of the fire it was owned by Samuel M. Nickerson, president of the First National Bank, and leased to S. W. Ailerton, as a warehouse. The building was valued at $50,000. In the basement were stored large quantities of whiskeys, highwines, syrups and empty barrels. The first floor contained sugars, machinery, groceries and general goods. On the second floor was an immense quantity of broom-corn, and on that and the third floor were piled a large number of agricultural implements and other machines, stoves, castings and hardware. The fire originated in the broom-corn, midway of the building in all directions, and spread with irresistible rapidity. A man named Charles Stearns, who was employed in the building, perished in the flames. Owing to the persistent labor of the firemen, the loss was confined to this building, the adjoining property—Warehouse "B" and Burlington Hall—suffering only from water and smoke. The value of stock in store and of the building was estimated at over $638,000. The loss on building and contents was supposed to be covered by insurance to the extent of about $350,000. How much of this was ultimately recovered, it is now impossible to say. After the destruction of the Post-office building, the Federal offices were removed to Burlington Hall, making this an historic structure. The fire in the warehouse was supposed to have been incendiary.

On Sunday, October 1, a new double brick residence, Nos. 1437 and 1439 Prairie Avenue was accidentally set on fire by boys who were playing in the vicinity. The Department succeeded in confining the loss to the site of its origin. The building was not fully completed, and was owned by Michael Mortimore. An incipient blaze in the roof of the North-Western Railway freight office, corner of Meagher and Jefferson streets, caused considerable alarm, about three o'clock Sunday afternoon, October 1, but did little damage. The cause was supposed to have been a spark left fall by a careless tinner who was repairing the roof. A fire on Holt Street, the same day, was produced by children playing with matches—damage, nominal. Still another alarm was sounded from the corner of Market and Kinzie streets, on Sunday, about nine p. m. A defective chimney was the cause.

Monday morning, October 2, fire destroyed a carpenter shop in the rear of a row of brick buildings, Nos. 175 to 185 inclusive, on Twenty-first Street. This row, valued at $12,000, and owned by J. W. Jennings, was burned: Nos. 259, 261 and 263 Burnside Street, and several small buildings in the vicinity, were also burned. The loss was estimated at $45,000. It was attributed to malicious persons. A fire ruined considerable property in Rice & Jackson's building, Nos. 97 and 99 West Randolph, Monday afternoon. Several frame buildings were destroyed on Coolidge Street and Sampson Street, Monday afternoon. A box factory owned by Ray & Whitney, on West Twelfth Street, near the river, was burned on Monday night. A small fire occurred on Ashland Avenue, near Mill Street, Monday afternoon.

The fires on Tuesday, October 3, were: On West Taylor Street; attributed to an incendiary. Eight frame dwellings, several straw stacks, and numerous outbuildings were burned. The fire began at No. 578, and spread in all directions. On Deering Street; frame cottage, No. 130; cause, defective chimney. On Ashland Avenue; St. John's Church, on the corner of Smith Street; cause, a careless tinner at work on the roof. On Pleasant Street; frame cottage, No. 34; cause, defective chimney. On Butterfield Street; frame cottage, No. 80; cause unknown. On Indiana Street; three-story frame, No. 117; cause unknown.

Wednesday, October 4, there were three fires reported: On Illinois Street; cottage, No. 29; cause unknown. On the roof of the Honoré Block; discovered by Captain Bullwinke, and quickly extinguished. On Barber Street; cottage, No. 10; caused by defective fuel.

Thursday, October 5, there were four fires reported: On Indiana Street; dwelling, No. 85; cause, exploded kerosene lamp. On State Street; dwelling, No. 605; supposed cause, incendiarism. On Twentieth Street; sheds adjoining Nos. 237 and 239; cause, carelessness in handling grease in a smoke-house. On John Street; barn attached to No. 11; two horses were burned.

Friday, October 6, five alarms were sounded. A defective chimney at No. 182 Madison Street. Sparks from a chimney at the European Hotel, on the corner of State and Lake streets. A mysterious fire in a freight car, on the Michigan Southern track, near Twelfth Street. A defective chimney at No. 9 Eleventh Street. A mysterious fire—possibly spontaneous combustion—among rags and papers in the basement of No. 561 South Canal Street.

This record is given to show why the Fire Department was in an exhausted condition at the time of the great calamity. Unceasing vigilance was demanded, and the endurance of the men was taxed to its utmost limit.

THE FIRE OF SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7.

In the appalling glare of the Great Conflagration, which began Sunday night, the lesser fire of Saturday night, October 7, 1871, is almost forgotten. Hence it is natural that the historians of the great fire, should find but slight subject for thought in the preliminary disaster.

The fire of Saturday night struck consternation to the hearts of those who witnessed it. Never, in the history of the city, had its parallel in possible results been seen. Not that the locality was one of extraordinary value, or rich in architectural beauty; but the region was one peculiarly suited to the inception of a fire which, in the existing state of drought, might sweep Chicago from the face of the earth.

Some time between ten and eleven o'clock, on Saturday night—the exact minute is not remembered—an alarm of fire was sounded from Box No. 248, summoning the Fire Department to No. 209 South Canal Street. It was discovered that a fire was raging in the boiler-room of Lull & Holmes's planing mill, and threatened communication with adjacent buildings. The mill stood near the center of the block, on the west side of the street, and was sixty by one hundred feet in dimensions; two stories high, and built of brick. No cause could be assigned for the fire, but the inflammable nature of the materials in and about the building resulted in the rapid development of the flames. Almost before the firemen reached the spot, the mill and contents were consumed. It is believed by many that the origin was of an incendiary character.

In the rear of the planing mill, to the west, was a paper-box factory owned by John H. Foster. North of the planing mill, was a two-story frame dwelling, and north of that was another frame building occupied as a dwelling and saloon. At Nos. 189-191 were the Excelsior Vinegar Works, owned by F. Weigle. The greater portion of the block was filled with lumber, sheds, out-buildings, and dwelling houses—a row of the latter running along VanBuren Street, fronting the south. These were not destroyed that night; the south line of the fire on Block 52 being about one-fourth the width of the block north of VanBuren, or near the line between Lots 211 and 213.

The progress of the fire, up to that time, was unparallelled in rapidity. A strong wind was blowing from the south, and drove the flames with terrific force upon the wooden buildings on the north. At the same time the combustible nature of the buildings and materials on the west facilitated the spread of the fire in that direction, and in an incredibly short time the northern three-quarters of the square was a mass of darting, roaring flames.

The wind suddenly veered into the southwest, changing the direction of the fiery torrents. In less than twenty minutes from the discovery of the fire, the area between Jackson and Adams streets and Clinton Street and the river was ablaze.

The east side of South Canal, between Jackson and VanBuren, was occupied as follows: No. 190, the Union Wagon Works, E. F. Flood, proprietor; Nos. 212 and 214, frame tenements, owned by John Sheriffs & Son; Nos. 216 and 218, John Sheriffs & Son's lumber yard, on which was piled 3,000,000 feet of lumber; and in the southeastern part of the block, and along the southern line, Chapin & Foss had piled about 4,000,000 feet of lumber. A portion of this was not burned, which explains the narrow line of unburned territory, facing VanBuren Street. Extensive coal and wood yards occupied most of the space between the river and Canal Street, except as already specified. Among the larger dealers were B. Holbrook, Lamon & Cornish, and W. E. Johnson, agent for the Wilmington Coal Company. The Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad tracks traversed the lots east of Canal Street, and reached to the passenger and freight depots, south of Madison Street. The company's blacksmith shop occupied No. 176. The National Elevator, owned by Vincent, Nelson & Co., stood on the site of their present elevator, south of Adams-street bridge. On the northwest corner of Canal and Adams stood a small hut, occupied by an old woman; and beyond that were the sheds and coach-yard of the railroad, in the latter of which were the usual number of cars.

An iron viaduct spanned the tracks from Canal Street to the bridge, along Adams Street, and a wooden swing bridge stood at the spot now occupied by the iron bridge.

Along the Clinton-street line of the fire, from south to north, were: Holtslander & Randall's box, blind and sash factory, who also owned a lot of materials piled north of their building; the fire-truck house, belonging to the city, on the corner of Jackson; from the northeast corner of Jackson, were a row of half a dozen frame dwellings, four of which belonged to Mr. Watson and two to C. B. Farwell. Jackson Street, between Clinton and Canal, was filled with tenements of a cheap character.

The fire reached the Adams-street viaduct, and the passage-way became barred by a lurid wall. The draught sucked the flames, with fearful velocity, under the viaduct, which lapped with eager tongues all combustible materials upon the viaduct or near it. The Adams and United States express companies lost their freight-sheds and contents, which stood on the northeast corner of Adams and Canal streets.

At this point in the progress of the flames, the destruction of the Pittsburgh & Fort Wayne Railway freight and passenger depots, together with a large number of coaches, seemed inevitable. But by the demolition of the outstanding sheds, the great disaster was averted. The labor was performed by citizens, the Fire Department being unable to reach the spot in time, without deserting other stations, which were threatened with no less danger. The little building on the northeast corner of Canal and Adams streets, was burned, and the poor woman who lived there lost nearly all of her worldly possessions, and barely made her escape by the aid of brave citizens.

While the men were battling so successfully between Canal Street and the river, north of Adams Street, the firemen were having a hard contest on the south line of Adams, west of Canal, extending almost to Clinton.

A dozen leads of hose—all that could be worked to advantage—were brought into the street, and floods of water were poured into the blazing pile. Inch by inch these heroic firemen fought for mastery, in the midst of intense heat. Their courage was magnificent. While spectators, hundreds of feet further away, covered before the blinding drift of glowing cinders, the pipemen stood their ground within a rod of the fiery tempest, now and then withdrawing a few paces to recover breath and strength, but only that they might return refreshed to the charge and attack the flames more manfully than before. They could not hope to extinguish the fire in the region south of Adams Street, but they did succeed in confining it to that area. This was the grand pitched-battle of the occasion, and deserves to be signalized as an event worthy of record in the annals of the Fire Department. As this narrative continues, and the period of the fire of Sunday night is reached, the reader will be asked to recall what is here stated. The actions of the firemen and citizens along the line of this conflagration was the most important service rendered during the ordeal. It was not accident, nor extraneous influence, that checked the fire here, but calm, deliberate, intelligent heroism; and to those heroes Chicago owes eternal gratitude.

It was shortly after midnight that this contest for supremacy occurred. Perhaps it was because there were several vacant lots in the burning block that the struggle terminated as it did. At all events, the buildings on the north side of the street were saved.

It is remarked that a saloon stood on the northwest corner of Canal and Adams streets, kept by Daniel W. Quirk. When he became convinced that his place must go, he threw open his bar to the people, and invited them to free use of his stock of liquors and cigars. Hundreds of men availed themselves of this opportunity to slake their thirst. Among them were many who carried portable fire-extinguishers, and, in return for the bountiful supplies donated by the saloon-keeper, who was engaged in saving some few of his household goods, these firemen directed their miniature engines on the saloon walls. Undoubtedly this lavish use of chemically-charged waters saved the corner and contiguous buildings from destruction.

The wind carried the fire diagonally across the burning block, and it was only by back-setting that the northwestern portion was ignited. A section, sixty by one hundred and twenty-eight feet on the southeast corner of Clinton and Adams streets, was left standing.

One of the most noticeable freaks of the fire, was the escape of Vincent, Nelson & Co.'s elevator, which stood on Block 70, south of the bridge, near the river. The structure was on fire several times, but did not burn, being reserved for destruction the next night.

It is a source of regret that the circumstances and conditions of this preliminary fire were such, that detailed statements concerning it is almost impracticable. No fire that had visited Chicago up to that time progressed so rapidly, consumed so entirely, or was attended by so many obstacles in the way of description at the time. It was almost impossible to ascertain the exact value of property destroyed, and the amount of insurance covering the same.

It is believed that property valued at $750,000 was destroyed, upon which there was an insurance of two-thirds of that sum; but the events of the succeeding twenty-four hours, not only rendered it impossible to conclusively settle this point, but also effected an almost total loss of what was burned, through the failure of many of the insurance companies that wrote the policies.

The Chicago Tribune of Sunday, October 8,—the last issue before the office was destroyed—contained one of the best descriptions of the scene now accessible, a portion of which is as follows:

"Only a few minutes elapsed after the striking of the alarm before the flames were seen sweeping to the sky, and the lurid light that illuminated the horizon, grew more and more powerful, casting its brilliant rays in every direction, bringing out, in bold relief, the fronts of the buildings which faced it from all quarters. The wind, seeming to rise as the flames did, set from the southwest, carrying with it, in its onward rush streams of sparks, cinders, and partially-burned pieces of wood, which covered the sky with dazzling spangles, sweeping northeastward like a flight of meteors, but falling steadily, in a fiery shower of rain, over that broad area embraced between the river, the South Branch, Wells Street, and Jackson Street; the lighter ones going far over on the North Division, while the heavier and more dangerous ones fell before they reached that point. They dropped with great force to the ground, to the occasional danger of the foot-passengers and the scaring of horses, and showered upon roofs of buildings, inspiring constant fears that other conflagrations would break out, and that a terribly broad area would be covered by the flames, and put it out of the power of the engines to combat them.

"Late as it was, the splendor of the flames and the wonderful brilliance of the sky were such as to attract enormous crowds from every quarter. The densely-populated section of the West Division lying near the fire would have, of itself, been sufficient to choke up the surrounding streets with an impassable crowd; but, as the fire showed no signs of abating, they came from greater and greater distances, forcing their way down Clinton Street, in the center of which, near Adams, were half a dozen isolated street-cars, utterly unable to get back to their stables. The crowd made its way down Jackson, near where the fire began, and stopped there, caring nothing for the smoldering ruins which lay beyond that point. * * * * At first, the concourse was all from the West Side; but, as time passed on, they began to come from across the water, until the blazing viaduct and the police made Adams-street bridge impassable. Then they swept in a solid mass over Madison-street bridge, meeting, as they crossed, the returning stream of those who had satisfied their curiosity or who felt it unadvisable to stay there after twelve o'clock. The bridge and the approach on Madison Street were covered with men and women—alone and together—who found there a favorable point for watching the flames, while they were generally out of range of the falling cinders. The viaduct on Adams Street, with its blazing wood-work, stood out in bold relief, and beyond and underneath it, nothing but a wild whirlwind of flames, obscured, for a moment, by bursts of smoke, but re-appearing the next, with added brilliancy. The fire, burning down close to the river, and impelled eastward by the wind, seemed to one on the bridge, to have almost reached across the water, and to have partially consumed that, as well as the more combustible material on which it was really feeding. Above the sound of the conflagration occasionally rose the scream of the engines, or the thunder of falling beams and tumbling houses. The sharp smell of smoke filled the air with its oppressive odor.

"On the west side of Clinton Street, from Jackson to Adams, were the relics of the household goods of the people who had been living on the east side of the street; sometimes piled on drays or wagons, but generally piled upon the sidewalk, after the adjoining houses had proved too small to hold them. Their frayed and dilapidated condition testified to the haste with which they had been carried away. On, around and among them were their unfortunate possessors, who were awakened from their slumbers to flee for their lives.

"The spectators who were near Jackson Street could look, eastward, across a weltering sea of fire, through which, black and desolate, ran Jackson Street, like some road-cutting through the infernal regions. From wrecks of buildings, from rapidly consuming lumber piles, and more slowly but more steadily burning coal heaps, rose thousands of jets of flame, whirling up with them pillars of smoke, through which loomed the buildings along the river, or the slender masts and blazing rigging of some vessel in the river. So grand and so novel was the spectacle, that those poor men and women who stood shelterless did not wail and moan, and hug their babies to their breasts, as is the usual custom of such calamities, but stood, in dazed and dumb amazement, staring straight before them. They did not stop to see what they had lost, or what few trifles had been saved, but watched, as if in admiration, the fearful, fascinating scene.

"Further north on the street, the efforts of the firemen and the eastward tendency of the wind had preserved the houses facing west on Clinton Street—the southern ones being mere shells, but the condition improving as one went northward. The buildings were all much scorched, however, and rendered uninhabitable by fire and water. But though these sombre and forbidding-looking tenements generally barred the view, yet, through alleys and occasional breaks in the buildings, one could get a glimpse into the furnace which lay beyond, as if one were gazing into the portals of hell."

The effects of this fire were so strangely contradictory that one is led to pause before drawing a conclusion. Had the firemen labored less strenuously, there is no doubt the West Side would have suffered, possibly as far north as the city limits. Had this ensued, who can say the fire would have been confined to that Division? It might have crossed into the South and North sides, thereby hastening the greater calamity. On the other hand, it is possible that, had no such strain been made upon the Department Saturday night, the firemen could have successfully combatted the DeKoven-street blaze, thus preventing its spread. But speculation is idle now.

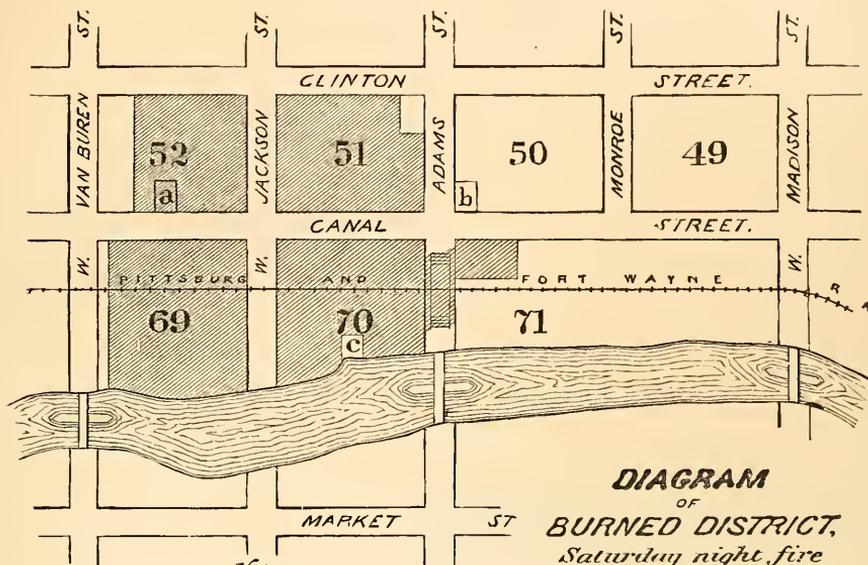

The pathetic side of this fire has never been given the vital touch of personal narrative. From among the hundreds of experiences, one is selected that tells, in simple form, the grief of a broken life; it is the humble story of J. Develin, and is given in his own words:

"Previous to the fire of 1871, I lived on West Jackson Street, near Clinton. I occupied a two-story house, which I had lived in from the time it was built, in the spring of 1857; and, although I did not own the property, I had paid more for it, in rent, pair of rather old buckskin boots. My nervous system was completely unstrung with the fright consequent upon my then state of mind, and bad health followed, so that my ambition was entirely destroyed. I have been comparatively a pauper ever since."

All night, and far into the day, the Department struggled to extinguish the smoldering fires. The burning coal heaps and more enduring debris continued to

DIAGRAM
OF
BURNED DISTRICT,
Saturday night fire
Octo. 7th, 1871.

Note.
Shaded parts indicate section burned.
"a," the spot where fire of Oct. 7 originated.
"b," Daniel W. Quirk's saloon.
"c," National Elevator.

SCALE.
0 100 200 300 400 500 600 700 1000 FEET than the whole thing was worth. At the time of the fire, we happened not to have a servant, and my wife was not only quite alone, but was suffering from a swollen ankle. We had no family, and I was employed in business down in the city. This was on Saturday evening, the night before the great conflagration. My house was fully furnished, and contained many pieces of costly, if not elegant, furniture. I had also about three hundred volumes of well-selected books, mostly English publications. My wife was a careful, saving woman, and much attached to reading and home comforts. She had saved a little money, and was her own banker. She had been for some years gathering and holding on to gold and silver, specie being then scarce. I myself had, on that day, in the inside pocket of a vest, the same being in a bureau drawer, $325 in currency (all bills of large denomination), with the intention of depositing the sum in bank immediately. In all, we had between us, in cash, on that fatal day, not less than $2,300, and our furniture and clothing cost about $2,700. This to us would have been quite a heavy loss, but—oh, horror of horrors!—when I reached what I supposed to be my home, about ten o'clock that evening, I could not get within half a block of where my home had stood, and my wife was nowhere to be found. As soon as it was daylight on the following morning, I and a few friends gathered up the charred remains of my poor wife—a mere handful of burned bones. The coroner was summoned, and all there was left me in this world was the contents of a small wooden box, which I had the melancholy satisfaction of taking to the place of Mr. Wright, the undertaker, on Madison Street, near LaSalle, for interment on the following day. It is needless to say that on that day, not only Wright's place, but the entire city was swept out of existence, so that I was even deprived of the poor bones of my beloved wife. This was my share of the blaze of 1871. At that time I was sixty-three years of age, and was left on the sidewalk, with a thin rag of a summer coat and a emit gases and fitful puffs of flame during Sunday. The firemen, exhausted with their efforts, gladly heard their superiors order a relief.

The thousands of citizens who witnessed the grand but terrifying spectacle went home, and those poor victims of the night's destructive event sought shelter where they could. Throughout the city there was felt a sense of gratitude at deliverance from evil, but under the outward show of easiness lurked the premonition of some terrible disaster.

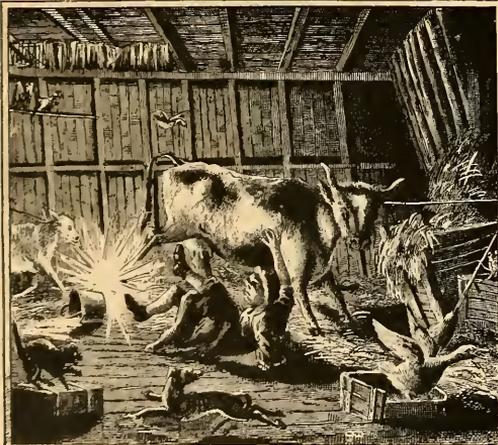

THE GREAT CONFLAGRATION.

About fifteen minutes before nine o'clock on the evening of Sunday, October 8, 1871, fire was discovered in a barn on the rear of lot No. 137 DeKoven Street. The property was owned by Patrick O'Leary. The barn was constructed of wood, sixteen by twenty feet in size, and fourteen feet in height. The exact spot may be found by drawing a line from the northeast corner of the block bounded on the south by DeKoven and on the west by Jefferson, making the eastern end of the line touch the northeast corner of said lot, on the north alley. One hundred and seventy-five feet from the street corner, along this line, will mark the precise site of the incipient blaze.

The barn contained several cows, a calf and a horse, all belonging to the O'Leary family. Mrs. O'Leary was engaged in the business of supplying milk to neighboring families. There was the usual litter about the place, peculiar to a crowded and indifferently-kept stable. The upper portion of the building had recently been filled with hay. The long-continued drought rendered the barn and all adjacent buildings especially susceptible to combustion, and the hazard was increased by the masses of dry refuse scattered through the alley on the north. High wooden fences ran from the barn to sheds on contiguous lots, which afforded easy means of communicating flames. If an incendiary were to seek for a suitable place and time for the perpetration of his crime, he could hope for no more favorable conditions than those which prevailed on the night of October 8, in the vicinity of DeKoven and Jefferson streets. Nature had withheld her accustomed measures of prevention, and man had added to the peril by recklessness.

Who first discovered the fire is not positively known. Several persons saw it at about the same moment. The first to reach the spot was Dennis Sullivan, who happened to be sitting in front of his own house, nearly opposite the O'Leary place.

Before organized resistance was made, the fire had extended to adjoining sheds, barns and dwellings toward the north and northeast, consuming its way from the center of the block toward the streets in those directions, with terrific rapidity, and within thirty minutes, was beyond the control of the Fire Department.

O'LEARY'S BARN.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FIRE must ever remain a mystery, although nothing that may be written will annul the effects of the first assertions concerning it, and which has been given credence in numerous books and documents. For all time, the legend of Mrs. O'Leary's cow will be accepted. While the city was still enveloped in flames, some now-forgotten tongue declared that Mrs. O'Leary was engaged in milking a cow, when the unruly animal kicked over a lighted lamp, and so ignited the straw and refuse on the barn floor. This story was sent throughout the world, and men unhesitatingly accepted it as the correct explanation. Humorists delineated the scene, and trafficked in the work of their illustrative talents.

But even the existence of the spot upon which the alleged lamp stood, the finding of a broken lamp in the ruins, and the evidence of reputable citizens that Mrs. O'Leary really illuminated her humble home with kerosene, are not sufficient to save the theory from discredit. There is no proof that Mrs. O'Leary is responsible for the fire. An official investigation of the disaster resulted in no definitive conclusion. Some fifty witnesses were interrogated, and, from among the number, half-a-dozen, perhaps, gave testimony which bore directly on the subject. Taking these in their proper sequence, it is learned

That Dennis Sullivan discovered the fire at about 9:30 p. m.*; that the O'Leary family was then in bed; that Mrs. O'Leary was in the habit of milking her cows not later than five o'clock p. m.; that a family named McLaughlin lived in the O'Leary house, and was enjoying a social party in honor of the arrival of a relative from Ireland; that this family indulged in the use of beer, but had no whisky or milk punch; that none of the McLaughlins visited the barn that evening for the purpose of obtaining milk; and, in substance, that not one word of evidence was adduced before the commissioners to prove how or by whom the fire originated.

Of course many persons asserted their opinions on the subject, refusing to believe the evidence, and professing to hold so light an estimate on the veracity of the witnesses as to practically charge them with bearing false testimony; but the evidence must stand as conclusive until, by confession of some one who has retained hidden knowledge, the truth is made known.

It is possible that some petty pilferer entered the barn; it is possible that some member of the McLaughlin family did attempt to procure milk, and met with an accident, causing the fire; but it does not seem at all probable that Mrs. O'Leary, who was then suffering from a wounded foot, would leave her bed and go into the barn at nine o'clock to do work which she was accustomed to do at an earlier hour. The fact that she was in bed at half-past eight, while her tenants were in the first stages of social pleasure, shows that she was not on such intimate terms with them as to justify the belief that she inconvenienced herself to supply them with milk.

Michael McDermott obtained affidavits relative to this matter, during the month of October, 1871. As nothing can be given in more authentic form or worthy of greater credence, although Mrs. O'Leary is still alive, those documents are quoted:

"On Sunday last (October 15), I made my way to the O'Leary house, yet standing, and there, at No. 137 DeKoven Street, on the east half of Lot 12, in Block 38, School Section Addition to Chicago, found Dennis Sullivan, of No. 134, and Dennis Rogan, of No. 112, both of DeKoven Street. There and then I took the annexed affidavits. The parties have been known to me personally, for several years, as of irreproachable character.

"Patrick O'Leary and Catharine, his wife, being duly sworn, before me, testify that they live at No. 137 DeKoven Street, and own the lot and house in which they live; they had five cows, a horse and wagon, on all of which they have; they had five cents of insurance. She milked her cows at 4:30 p. m. and 5 a. m., as Mrs. O'Leary peddled her milk. Mrs. O'Leary fed the horse beside the fence at about 7 o'clock p. m., and then put him in the barn. She had no lighted lamp in the house or barn that evening.

* Mr. Sullivan's statement before the commissioners places the time at about 9:30. He now says "about nine o'clock."

" Patrick O'Leary testifies that he was not in the barn during that day or night; left the feeding of the cows and horse to his wife and daughter; that both were in bed when awakened by Dennis Rogan, of No. 112 DeKoven; that they have lost their barn, cows, horse and wagon.

" Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 15th day of October, 1871.

his
" PATRICK X O'LEARY.
mark.

her
" CATHARINE X O'LEARY.
mark.

" MICHAEL McDERMOTT,
" Notary Public for Chicago and City Surveyor."

" Dennis Sullivan, being duly sworn before me, testifies that he was at Patrick O'Leary's house, No. 137 DeKoven Street, on Sunday night, the 8th of October, 1871, from about 8:30 to 9 o'clock at night, during which time Mr. O'Leary and wife were in bed; that he went a few lots east of O'Leary's, on the opposite side of DeKoven Street, until about half-past nine o'clock, when he saw the fire. He went across the street, and cried "Fire, fire," and went into O'Leary's barn, where he found the hay in the loft on fire. He then attempted to cut loose the horse and cows, but failed to save anything but a half-burned calf. He then came to O'Leary's and found them out of bed. Dennis Rogan alarmed them during his time at the barn.

" Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 15th day of October, 1871.

his
" DENNIS X SULLIVAN
mark.

" MICHAEL McDERMOTT,
" Notary Public for Chicago and City Surveyor."

The official inquiry into the origin of the fire was begun November 23, 1871, under the direction of the Board of Police and Fire Commissioners; the investigation lasted several days, and naturally produced a mass of irrelevant matter. The essential points are preserved in this record.

Mrs. O'Leary testified that she and her family—her husband and five children—were in bed, but not asleep, on that Sunday night. They knew nothing of the fire until Mr. Sullivan, a drayman, who lives on the south side of DeKoven Street, awoke* them, and said their barn was on fire. She took a look at the barn, and saw that it could not be saved. She became almost crazy on account of losing all her property—barn, wagons, harness, six cows and a horse—and was very much excited. There were three barns—two besides her own—on fire at the same time. A family named McLaughlin lived in the same house with her, and she understood that they were having a "social time" on that Sunday night; that they had an oyster supper; and a Mrs. White had told her that one of the family went into the barn to milk one of the cows. She herself had no knowledge of it, and could not say whether it was true or not.

Catharine McLaughlin, who lived in the front part of O'Leary's house, testified that no member of her family went to the barn that night to obtain milk for punch. She knew nothing about the origin of the fire. Some young people were celebrating the arrival of a cousin from Ireland that evening, but all were in the house when the fire broke out.

Patrick O'Leary swore that his wife was in bed by eight o'clock, and he followed her about half an hour later. He was asleep when Sullivan aroused him; had he been awake, he might have saved his cows.

Dennis Rogan, of No. 112 DeKoven Street, testified that he was at the O'Leary house about half past eight Sunday evening. Mr. and Mrs. O'Leary were in bed. Rogan inquired why they had gone to bed so early, and Mrs. O'Leary replied that it was because she had a "sore foot." Rogan went home, and to bed. Some time after nine o'clock he heard a neighbor say that the O'Leary barn was on fire, and ran there. He tried to save a wagon that was in the barn, but could not. The heat drove him away. There was company at McLaughlin's, and one was a "fiddler," and Rogan heard music there at the time of the fire. He thought it was fifteen minutes after the fire was discovered before the engines arrived on the spot.

Charles Anderson, foreman of the "American" hose company, testified that he was the first to get a stream of water on the fire.

He drew his supply from a plug, and played upon the barn. In five minutes, from twenty to thirty buildings were on fire.*

William Matham, foreman of the "Little Giant" engine, testified that he heard the alarm, struck 342, but paid no attention to the number, and went directly to the spot where he saw the fire, and took a plug at the corner of Jefferson and DeKoven streets. Laying his hose up the passageway on O'Leary's lot, running north from DeKoven Street, he worked upon the fire until eleven o'clock, at which time he was ordered to go to the river at the foot of Taylor Street.

After a protracted investigation, during which fifty-one witnesses were examined, and all possible theories advanced concerning the origin of the fire and the causes which led to its irresistible spread, the Board of Police and Fire Commissioners submitted the following report:

" The Board find that the fire originated in a two-story barn in the rear of No. 137 DeKoven Street, the premises being owned by Patrick O'Leary. The fire was first discovered by a drayman by the name of Daniel [Dennis] Sullivan, who saw it while sitting on the sidewalk on the south side of DeKoven Street, and nearly opposite O'Leary's premises. He fixes the time at not more than twenty or twenty-five minutes past nine o'clock when he first noticed the flames coming out of the barn. There is no proof that any person had been in the barn after nightfall that evening. Whether it originated from a spark blown from a chimney on that windy night, or was set on fire by human agency, we are unable to determine. Mr. O'Leary and all his family prove to have been in bed and asleep at the time. There was a small party in the front part of O'Leary's house, which was occupied by Mr. McLaughlin and wife. But we fail to find any evidence that anybody from McLaughlin's part of the house went near the barn that night.

" The first information received by the Fire Department came from the alarm struck in the fire-alarm office at 9:30.* The alarm sounded Box No. 342, at the corner of Canalport Avenue and Halsted Street, a point in the direction of the fire, but a mile beyond it. There was no signal given from any box to the central office † but the box was given by Mathias Schaffer, from the Court-house cupola, he being the night watchman on duty at the time, and having sighted the fire. There was no signal given from anybody, † until after the Fire Department had arrived and turned in the second and third alarms. If any person set the fire, either by accident or design, he was careful not to give the alarm. The nearest engine-house was six blocks from the fire; the next nearest one was nine blocks away. The nearest hose-house was located eleven blocks from the fire; and, at this hose-house, the watchman had seen the fire before the alarm was given from the Court House, and the company were on their way to the fire before the box was struck.

" In consequence of this early sighting of the fire, the hose company—the "America"—went eleven blocks, and attached their hose to the fire plug and got water on the fire before any engine did, although two engines were located considerably nearer the fire. It would require five minutes for the nearest engine to go to the fire, a distance of six blocks. From three to five minutes more would be required in which to unreeel and lay out the hose, make the connection with the plug, and go to work. Intelligent citizens, who lived near the place of the fire, testify that it was from ten to fifteen minutes from the time that they first saw the fire before any engine came upon the ground. It is proved that the engines repaired to the fire, after getting the alarm, with the usual celerity. When they arrived there from three to five buildings were fiercely burning. The fire must have been burning from ten to fifteen minutes; and, with the wind then blowing strongly from the southwest, and carrying the fire from building to building in a neighborhood composed wholly of dry wooden buildings, with wood shavings piled in every barn and under every house, the fire had got under too great headway for the engines called out by the first alarm to be able to subdue it.

" Fire Marshal Williams and Third Assistant Marshal Benner arrived upon the ground soon after the engines, and Marshal Williams immediately ordered the second, and, soon afterward, the third, alarm to be turned in; but these only called the distant engines, and many valuable minutes elapsed before they could reach the fire and get to work; and, before this could be accomplished, the strong wind had scattered the fire into the many buildings, all as dry as tinder, and spread it over so large an area that the whole Department, although working with their utmost energy, were unable to cut it off or prevent the wind, which soon became a gale, from carrying burning shingles and brands over their heads, and setting on fire buildings far away from the main fire. After it got into the high church, at the corner of Clinton and Mather streets, and thence to the match factory and Bateham's planing mills and lumber, it was beyond the control of the Fire Department.

* The discrepancy in this statement is not commented on by the commissioners, and must have been regarded (if it was noticed at all) as a lapsus lingue, or an "Irish bull."

* This statement is incredible. No. 6 engine sent the first stream, and had been at work at least fifteen minutes before the "America" arrived.

† Vide affidavit of B. H. Gull heretofore given.

"About this time it crossed the river between VanBuren and Adams streets, by means of flying brands, and set fire to Powell's roofing establishment, adjoining the gas works. But, by this time, the watchman in the Court-house cupola had twice extinguished fire, which had caught from brands carried by the wind into the Court-house balcony from the West Side, a distance of a mile. At eleven o'clock, the keeper of the crib of the lake tunnel—two miles from the shore and three miles from the fire—found the sky full of sparks and burning brands; and from 11:30 till morning, he testified, he worked with all his might to prevent the wooden roof of the crib from burning up and destroying himself and wife.

"From Powell's roofing establishment the progress of the fire was rapid and terrific, sweeping everything in its course. The engines had all been working on the West Side; and they could not reel-up six hundred feet of hose each, and cross the river, and get to work soon enough to prevent it spreading, literally, on the wings of the wind. Blowing up buildings in the face of the wind was tried, but without any benefit. The Court House and the Water Works, though a mile apart, were burning at the same time. Gunpowder was used in blowing up buildings, with good effect, the next day, in cutting off the fire at the extreme south end of it, and preventing it backing any further.

"After the Water Works burned, the firemen could do little good with their engines, except on the banks of the river. They had lost seven thousand five hundred feet of hose and one steam fire engine. Two more engines had been in the repair shops, and were partially destroyed, so that, after eleven o'clock on Sunday night, there were but fourteen engines in service, and, after daybreak, only one-half of our hose remained. This would not admit of an engine conveying water very far from the river.

"The firemen and their officers were sober, and did all that men could do. They worked heroically to save the property of others, when their own houses were burning and their families fleeing from the flames. A large part of the Department had worked on Saturday night, and Sunday until 3 p. m.—eighteen hours' steady work,—and they were nearly exhausted when this fire commenced; but they responded to the call with alacrity and worked with all their remaining energy.

"We believe that had the buildings on the West Side, where the fire commenced, been built of brick or stone, with safe roofings (the buildings need not have been fire-proof) the fire could have been stopped without great danger, and certainly would not have crossed the river. After it did cross, the wooden cornices, wooden signs of large size, the cupolas, and the tar and felt roofs, which were on most of the best buildings, caused their speedy destruction, and aided greatly in spreading the conflagration.

"The single set of pumping works, upon which the salvation of the city depended, were roofed with wood, had no appliance by which water could be raised to the roof in case of fire, and was one of the earliest buildings to burn in the North Division.

"The Board of Police have, year by year, in annual reports to the Mayor and Common Council, endeavored to point out the great defects of the manner in which our city was being built up. We advised and entreated before such an immense amount of combustibles was piled around the heart of the city. We reported mansard and tar roofs to be unsafe; that the water supply was insufficient; that our fire hydrants were twice too far apart; that we ought to have Fire Department cisterns at the intersections of the streets, so that we should always have water at fires; that we ought to have floating fire engines, with powerful pumps, in the river, to enable the firemen to wet down fifteen hundred feet on either side of the river or its branches; that wooden cornices were an abomination; that the Holly system of pumping the water and sending it through the pipes, with a pressure of forty pounds on ordinary occasions, with power to increase it to one hundred pounds in case of fire, would give us four sets of pumping works in different parts of the city, and not leave us to the mercy of chance, or accident, with a single set. We showed that the four sets of Holly works could be built for less than one year's interest on the cost of the present Water Works, and, when built, would admit of the dispensing with every engine in the Fire Department where the water was in the street, allowing us to get rid of most of the horses and all the engines of the Department, and to reduce the number of men one-half—saving two-thirds of the expense of the Fire Department, and making it as efficient as it would be with one hundred steam fire engines. None of these things was noticed by the mayor, the Common Council, or the newspapers. No heed being paid to our suggestions, so far as any improvement of our plan of extinguishing fires was concerned, the only thing we could do was to ask for an increase of the engine companies, in order that we might be prepared, as well as possible, to contend with the great fires to which we were and are still liable. Our engines have always been too few in number and too far apart. The Fire Department should be very much enlarged, or the system of putting out fires by steam engines be abandoned. If the citizens do not believe this now, they will after the next great fire sweeps out of existence the greater portion of the wooden city which now remains.

"If we had had floating steam pumps of large capacity in the South Branch, the fire would not, probably, have crossed to the South Side. If we had had cisterns in the street, there could have been saved all of the North Division, north of Chicago Avenue and west of Clark Street, and all of the southeast part now included in the burnt district of the South Division.

"Evidence was given of money having been paid by citizens to some of our firemen, but we can find no evidence that any of them worked during the fire with any idea of receiving any pay or consideration for their labor upon any property. The money paid was merely a testimonial of respect for the firemen, and an acknowledgment, in a substantial form, of services rendered by the firemen, many of whom had imperiled their lives to save the property of citizens, and lost their own homes while doing so. No money was paid them until weeks after the fire, and its receipt was a surprise to the firemen who got it.

"The Fire Department received all the aid from firemen of nearly every city, far and near, that could be rendered. They came with their apparatus, and worked with a will, and placed us all under a load of obligations which we can never repay.

"The area burned over by the fire is about two thousand one hundred and fifty acres, distributed through the three divisions as follows: About one hundred and sixty acres in the West Division, nearly five hundred acres in the South Division, and upwards of fourteen hundred acres in the North Division. The total loss of property burned is estimated at about $200,000,000. The number of buildings burned is between seventeen thousand and eighteen thousand. The number of lives lost at the fire is supposed to have been about two hundred, although the coroner has as yet found but one hundred and seventeen bodies in the ruins."

This report was signed by Commissioners Thomas B. Brown, Mark Sheridan and Frederick W. Gund.

There are several statements, based upon testimony, which are now shown to be erroneous. The main purpose of the report appears to have been the exoneration of the Fire Department from responsibility; although the most important fact—the exhaustion of the force from overwork—is lightly touched upon. The Press, and the earlier writers on the subject of the fire, openly accused the firemen, and especially the officers of the Department, of incompetency, and, as an allusion in the report shows, of bribery. Calmer judgment discerns the injustice of these charges, although impartiality forces one into saying that "some one blundered." The delay in sending an alarm is the most reprehensible feature of this great disaster, and the error in judgment which located the fire, after it had been going about forty-three minutes, a mile beyond its actual site, was a fatal mistake.

The foregoing report states that Sullivan saw the fire "not later than twenty-five minutes past nine," but this testimony, while tending to exonerate the watchman in the Court House, is contravened by later and trustworthy statements. The fire crossed the river, to the South Side, at 11:30, first igniting Franklin Parmelee's stables, instead of Powell's roofing works; and it is not true, in the sense employed, that the Court House and Water Works were "burning at the same time." The former building was on fire as early as one o'clock, while the latter took fire at 3:20. The declaration that the "America" threw the first stream on the fire is incorrect, as will be shown. The report appears to be little more than an attempt to quiet the too loud expressions of dissatisfaction with the Department.

Hoping to discover more conclusive evidence concerning the origin and the moment of the outbreaking of the fire, many months were devoted to such investigation. The work was materially aided by Charles C. P. Holden, who at about the same time was preparing an authentic history of that particular incident in the great event, at the request of the Chicago Historical Society. Mr. Holden generously placed the results of his labors at our disposal, and from among the numerous interviews had by him the following are quoted or condensed.

ACTION OF THE FIRE DEPARTMENT.—William J. Brown, night operator of the fire-alarm telegraph in the Court-house tower on the night of the fire, informed the collaborator that he was on duty during the evening in question. He and his sister were in the office, which was in the third story of the building, facing south. Soon after nine o'clock they noticed a light in the southwest, but thought it was a re-kindling of the coal-piles in the ruins of the previous night's fire. Some time passed. Mr. Brown then went to the window, and noticed that the light was greatly increased. He called his sister's attention to the fact, and they decided that it was a new fire. Still no alarm was called by the watchman above them in the tower, nor was any box pulled from the outside. The suspense of this silence and inaction became almost unendurable, for with each passing moment the observing operators grew firmer in their conviction that a fire of considerable magnitude was progressing unimpeded. At last the alarm call came down from the watchman in the tower, instructing Brown to ring Box 342, located on the corner of Canal-port Avenue and Halsted Street. The alarm was sounded at 9:32 p. m. Mr. Brown states that, in his opinion, the fire began as early as nine o'clock; basing his belief on the fact that he witnessed the light several minutes before the alarm was given, and that the fire must have been going several minutes before it was even visible to him.

E. B. CHANDLER, who was superintendent of the Fire-alarm Telegraph at the period of the disaster, informs the writer, that "No box was pulled for the fire of October 8, 1871. The Court-house tower watchman saw the light and notified the alarm operator as to which box was, in his judgment, nearest the fire. As the light increased, the watchman urged that a second and third alarm should follow. This suggestion was acted upon by the operator."

This statement would show that persons living near the scene of the fire, who gave the local alarm, made no general effort to secure the aid of the Department. The still alarm sent to No. 6 was about seventeen minutes earlier than the first public alarm from the Court-house tower.

This conflicts with the statement made by Marshal Williams, who says that he ordered an alarm sent in. It is, however, immaterial, since a second and a general alarm were sent from the tower, either with or without calls from the officials on the spot.

MATHIAS SCHAFER, the watchman in the tower, says that it was 9:28 p. m., when he first discovered the light of the fire. Observing it through his spy-glass, he located the scene near the corner of Canalport Avenue and Halsted Street, and rang up the night operator, signaling him to give Box 342. Brown struck the alarm. A short time after that, Schaefer called to Brown, and told him the fire was not so far off; but as the engines would have to pass the spot, it was decided not to send a different alarm, as that might cause confusion. Mr. Schaefer declares that he was constantly on the lookout, and that the fire must have originated about the time he first saw it. The error made by Mr. Schaefer consisted in not sounding a correct alarm, when his mistake was discovered by himself. Had he done so, several engines not in service under the call of 342 would have been brought out.

There are several discrepancies between the statements of Brown and Schaefer, and those already given before the investigating committee. It was also stated before the committee that several boxes were rung during the first half hour, but Mr. Chandler and Mr. Brown do not now say so.

The discrepancy between Schaefer's statement as to the minute of his calling Brown—9:28—and Brown's statement as to the time he struck the alarm—9:32—is difficult to account for. The evidence of Michael W. Conway, David M. Hyland, and Maurice W. Shay confirm Schaefer's statement.

WILLIAM MUSHAM, first assistant marshal and department inspector, was foreman of "Little Giant" No. 6, at the time of the fire. His statement, taken in June, 1884, is as follows: No. 6 was nearly disabled from overwork during the week preceding the fire, and especially because of their labors at the conflagration of Saturday night. All of the men were not present when the alarm was given on Sunday night. At fifteen minutes past nine p. m., October 8, a still alarm was received, and in two and a half minutes the engine was in position at the corner of DeKoven and Jefferson streets. With John Campion, assistant, they laid a line through Patrick O'Leary's lot, and sent a stream directly on the fire. At that time there were two barns and three sheds in flames (viz., at 9:17½). A second line was quickly laid from the same engine, but so rapidly did the fire spread and so inflammable were the materials on which it fed, that they were unable to suppress it. For more than thirty minutes this engine battled alone. Mr. Musham says: "It was too much for us. The fire spread and got into the cottages east of O'Leary's, crossed the alley, and pushed its way into the buildings fronting north on Taylor Street. Aside from what we did, little or nothing was done at this critical period; and about the time the fire reached the buildings fronting on Taylor Street a severe breeze sprang up, increasing the peril. After a long time, No. 5 made its appearance, but did nothing to aid us in keeping the fire where it should have been kept—that is, south of Taylor Street. Later on, No. 5 did good work; but the fire had then crossed Taylor and gone northward, and was beyond control. When No. 5 reached the spot it was disabled, and could effect nothing at first. No. 6 worked splendidly. When we took out the single-line there was so much propelling power that one man could not hold the pipe; and when the second stream was thrown the force was still sufficient. Had the alarm, which came so late, been correctly given, the probabilities are that the fire would have been of short duration, for the call would have brought to the ground, within six minutes, three first-class engines, the 'R. A. Williams' No. 17, the 'John B. Rice' No. 10, and the 'Chicago' No. 5. But as it was, No. 6 was left by itself. It did the best it could, but the fire had too much the start when we reached the ground." Mr. Musham thinks the fire must have been burning from nine o'clock. He also says, with a commendable degree of professional pride, that the Department should have one act of justice done—being accredited with exhaustion from long-continued vigilance at previous fires. Much of the apparatus was out of repair, and many of the companies were but half-manned at the moment of alarm. The records in these pages sustain Mr. Musham's plea, so far as facts are concerned.

ASSISTANT MARSHAL JOHN CAMPION, chief of the Fifth Battalion, was assistant foreman of "Little Giant" Company No. 6, located at the corner of Maxwell and Canal streets, at the time of the fire. His recollections of the opening scenes of that event are given as he related them to us:

"A still alarm was sent the company by their man on watch, and the engine was quickly placed in position, on the corner of DeKoven and Jefferson streets. When they reached the fire it was under such fierce headway that the region was illuminated almost as brightly as if by daylight. A line of hose was speedily run through the O'Leary lot, or the one adjoining it, and a stream sent into the fire, which by that time had spread over five sheds and barns. The engine did splendid service, but the company was short-handed, from exhaustion at previous fires, and there was no one but Foreman Musham and himself to do the pipe-work. Had there been other engines on the ground, to co-operate with No. 6 at this moment, the fire might have been confined to the block in which it originated. One thousand dollars would have paid all losses thereby. The fire gained headway, and No. 6 put a second stream on the blazing sheds. The men were obliged to call for such aid as could be obtained, in carrying and holding their hose and pipes. Mr. Campion says the still alarm was given about 9:20, and the engine began work about 9:24. It was more than half an hour after that when he noticed any other company on the ground; and when assistance arrived, the fire was beyond control. The alarm first received from the Court-house tower was for Box 342, which was nearly a mile from the fire. Through this mistake two of the best engines in the service were left in their houses until the general alarm was sounded. Had the right number been called, these splendid companies would have been at work within six minutes from the receipt of the alarm. No. 5 reached the scene first after No. 6, but was disabled and did no work until the flames had crossed Taylor Street. Then came Nos. 15, 9, 2 and 13, but too late to prevent the spread of the fire. These companies did not belong in the district, and were expected only on a second alarm, although Nos. 2, 9 and 15 started on the first call, being in the district in which Box 342 was located. When they discovered the mistake in the call, they continued to the actual fire, because of the intensity of the light." Mr. Campion gives it as his opinion that the fire began as early as nine o'clock.

CHRISTIAN SCHIMMELS, foreman of "Chicago" Company, No. 5, at the time of the fire, now says that he had been on continuous duty with his company for seventy-two hours, and was nearly blind from the effects of smoke and cinders. He had just sent his watchman, Mr. Mix, to the lookout, when the alarm was sounded from the Court House, calling Box 342. No. 5 was located on Jefferson, just north of VanBuren Street. They started at once, going west on VanBuren to Halsted, and had turned south, when they discovered that the alarm had been incorrectly given. They saw the fire near DeKoven Street. They went through Taylor to Jefferson, and took the plug at Forquer and Jefferson streets. Their pipemen stood about one hundred feet east of Jefferson, on the south side of Taylor, where five buildings facing Taylor Street were on fire. With a full head of steam, a stream was sent upon these buildings, and effective work was begun. They thought the fire would be of short duration, and confined their operations to south of Taylor. No. 6 was playing a heavy stream in and around the barns and sheds on O'Leary's, Dalton's and Forbes's lots, and, to some extent, on the burning materials north of the alley and in the rear of the buildings fronting north on Taylor Street. No. 5 was but fairly started when it became disabled. Schimmels ran to the machine, and found the fireman drawing the fire from the box. This proceeding he ordered stopped, but when the engineer had succeeded in putting the engine in repair, there was no steam. The men tore up the sidewalk and took boards from the fence near by to use as quick fuel, and when the engine was once more running, the supply of coal gave out. They were compelled to send to the engine-house for coal. The delay proved fatal for the fire had crossed to the north side of Taylor Street during the interval. When No. 5 first took position, this company and No. 6 held the key to the situation. The latter did good work, though laboring under the disadvantage of being behind the fire; still, having plenty of water, it did as effective work as was possible under the circumstances. No. 5, however, was at a point to command the fire, and the suppression of the flames really depended upon it. But at the critical moment, disaster came to them. No. 2 did nothing of importance. Through these fatal mishaps the fire was permitted to get away from them. Mr. Schimmels says he was in fine position, with apparent control of the enemy, by 9:35. He thinks the fire had been going about twenty minutes when No. 5 reached there. He confirms the statements made by others relative to the condition of the men and the grave error made in sounding Box 342.

MICHAEL W. CONWAY, chief of the Third Battalion, was a member of Christian Schimmels's Company, No. 5. For about seventy-two hours prior to the fire he had been constantly on active duty. He was at home, doctoring his eyes, which were affected by heat and smoke, when the alarm came. He joined his company, however, and went to the spot. No. 6 was already on the ground, and had done all in its power, although working at a disadvantage, being behind the fire. No. 5 broke down at the critical moment, and No. 2 effected little or nothing. From observations made at the time, Mr. Conway is of the opinion that the fire commenced at or about nine o'clock. As there was no alarm given until 9:23, and then for Box 342, some of the best engines in the Department were not brought to the ground until the flames had passed beyond control. Had the alarm been properly sounded, even at that late moment, it would have called such engines as "R. A. Williams," "Little Giant," "Chicago," and "John B. Rice," and they would have made short work. As it was, one engine held the ground until the fire had grown to such proportions as to defy human agencies; and even this one came out on its own call.

DAVID B. KENYON, acting chief of the First Battalion, was a member of Schimmels's Company, No. 5, at the time of the fire. He corroborates the statements made by the other members. He rode on the hose-truck to the corner of Jackson and Clinton streets; thence south to Van Buren, west to Halsted, and along that street, south, to Taylor. Then they discovered where the fire really was. They turned east on Taylor to Jefferson, and took position. Their engine came up soon after, and was attached to the plug at the corner of Forquer and Jefferson. Hose was strung to a point on Taylor east of Jefferson, the fire being then south of Taylor, though burning in a lively manner on the front of the buildings facing north. A stream was sent on those buildings, but soon ceased, through the disability of the engine. Before the machine was repaired, the fire had crossed Taylor Street, and was beyond control. The wind increased in velocity, sending burning materials far in advance. New fires were thus kindled. The church on the northwest corner of Clinton and Mather streets was in flames while the main fire was yet four blocks away. Had it not been for the breaking down of No. 5, Mr. Kenyon asserts, the fire would have been checked south of Taylor Street. He believes that the fire started about nine o'clock.

HENRY V. COLEMAN, engineer on No. 24, but at that time holding the same station on No. 5, says: At about twenty minutes past nine, on the fateful night, some one on the outside cried "Fire!" From the door the light appeared very bright in the northeast, and they all thought the fire was over in the heart of the city. They started at once. The driver drove north to Jackson and then to Clinton. Mr. Coleman cried out to him to stop, as they were going in the wrong direction. They turned and proceeded into Clinton, and finally to the corner of Forquer and Jefferson streets. He says they drove west on VanBuren to Halsted, south on Halsted to Taylor, east on Taylor to Jefferson, and then to their destination. A line of hose was laid to a position on Taylor. The moment steam was turned on, the pressure burst the hose. This accident they attempted to repair by tying blankets around the defective places and by laying heavy plank on the same. This expedient proved utterly useless. No. 5, therefore, accomplished nothing until another supply of hose had been obtained. By that time, the fire had crossed Taylor Street, and was beyond control. However, this engine did some brave work, even before leaving this plug. Mr. Coleman thinks they were about fifteen minutes in getting from their house to the position at Forquer Street; that when they arrived the flames were still south of Taylor Street, and that during the unavoidable delay the fire moved northward. Mr. Coleman also says that it has been his impression from the first, caused by information obtained from people living in the immediate vicinity of the original fire, and from other sources, that the blaze commenced before nine o'clock.

MAURICE W. SHAY, chief of the First Brigade, was foreman of "Titworth" Company, No. 13, at the time of the fire. About ten minutes past nine o'clock, on the evening of the 8th, he perceived the light of the flames, and called the attention of his men to it; but they thought it the re-kindling of the Saturday night's fire. Their house was at No. 97 Dearborn Street and was surrounded by large blocks.* The light became so intense that Mr. Shay was convinced of the breaking out of another fire. No alarm came, however, until some fifteen minutes had elapsed, and then the call indicated Box 342, and did not include his company. When the third alarm was sounded, Shay took his engine to near the corner of Ewing and Jefferson streets, and there received water from the "John B. Rice." The fire was then beyond control of the men. Shay worked on the Jefferson Street front. The fire was confined to the territory east of that street, and several buildings on the east side of Jefferson, south of Harrison, were saved. When No. 13 arrived at the scene of disaster, the air was seemingly full of burning cinders from materials caught up soon after the flames crossed Taylor Street. The breeze grew into a hurricane and carried large pieces of flooring and other light materials through the air, setting fire to points far in advance. The Department was entirely unable to cope with this phase of the conflagration. Mr. Shay says that had the alarm been correctly sounded, even at the late hour when it was rung, it would have called together the engines "R. A. Williams," "John B. Rice," "Little Giant," and "Chicago," which would have been a strong force. When the "John B. Rice" did arrive, the company worked on the west side of the fire, instead of on the more essential point—the east side. Mr. Shay thinks that the fire began at or before nine o'clock.

ROBERT A. WILLIAMS, at that time fire marshal, says that the first alarm was given about 9:15 by his clock. He was in his wagon in one minute, and drove rapidly to the corner of Taylor and Desplaines street. The "America" Hose Company was then attached to the plug at that point, and was leading up to the fire on the south side of Taylor Street. He immediately ordered his foreman to turn on a second alarm, the man going four blocks for that purpose. Within nine minutes of the sounding of the first, the second alarm was given. This period includes the time consumed by the marshal in reaching the fire, he having come a distance of two miles. Before the engines had responded to the second call, a policeman informed Marshal Williams that the church at the corner of Clinton and Mather streets was on fire. He set the first three engines that then arrived at work on the church and adjoining property, and succeeded in confining the limits there until the church was entirely consumed. He then ordered two of those engines to change the locality of their hose and endeavor to check the progress of the original fire. Before they had time to do so, however, he discovered that Batcham's mills on Canal Street, north of Mather, were on fire. He countermanded his order, and directed those engines to work on the mills. These were large wooden structures, surrounded by combustible materials. A match factory stood at the rear of the shingle mill. The wind was fierce, carrying burning brands far over the city to the lake beyond. Concerning the origin of the fire, Mr. Williams says: "Had the alarm been given from the proper box, late as it was, it would have given me two more engines, the 'Williams' and the 'Rice,' two of the best in the Department. Had either of them been on the ground, as No. 5 was, Chicago would not have had the great fire at that time. No. 5 was disabled, and did nothing to stay the progress of the fire before it had crossed Taylor Street." No. 5 suffered a second misfortune in the loss of her entire lead of hose, pipe and all. There were not fifty feet of surplus hose on that fearful night. Even then the marshal was compelled to use short pieces, in order to make a reel for each company. During the seven days prior to October 8, there were twenty-eight fires in the city, some of them being extensive. In consequence of this extraordinary service, not only were the men exhausted, but the machinery itself needed careful attention. The Department was not in the good condition required to meet such an emergency as that of October 8. The supply of hose was short, and much of that in use was in a bad state. As one account asserts, it may be that the delay in the case of No. 5 was attributable, to a certain degree, to defective hose. It is certain that the accident at this vital moment was due to natural causes. After the fire had crossed Taylor Street, and had found lodgment among the wooden buildings which filled that block, the destroying element became the master, and nothing could hold it back. Surely the machinery at command could not do so. Mr. Williams further states that he had made requisition, from time to time, for a better supply of hose, and had also asked for a steamer to ply up and down the river, with six or eight lines to run out in case of peril to the water front, and with pumps of adequate power to throw those streams to the roofs of the highest buildings; but the authorities had neglected to provide such a floating fire engine, and had cut down his requisition for hose.

* This house was less favorably located for observing the fire than the Court-house tower, although Mr. Shay saw the light about eighteen minutes before Mr. Schaffer.

DENNIS J. SWENIE, now (June, 1885) chief fire marshal of Chicago, states that at the time of the fire he was foreman of Engine Company No. 14, located at No. 38 East Chicago Avenue. When he was notified of the fire, his watch indicated 9:25 p. m. How long it had then been burning, he was unable to say, but as the region of the fire was bright with flames, it must have been going some time. The first alarm struck was for Box 342, three and a half miles from No. 14's station, and therefore not in its district. But when the general alarm was turned in, No. 14 took position in front of Bateham's mill, on Canal street, south of Harrison. Foreman Swenie placed one line of hose in the yard, and another line outside, between the mill and church and match factory. He held this position for more than half an hour. When forced to change, No. 14 made a short hold at Canal and Harrison, but did no service there, being obliged to go to Canal and VanBuren.

DAVID M. HYLAND, a member of "R. A. Williams" Company No. 17, located at No. 56 West Lake Street, near Clinton, says that about 9:27 they had a still alarm from their lookout, and their company was at once in readiness to respond. Hyland took his seat with the driver. At that moment the alarm came from the Court House for Box 342, which was outside of their district. They unhitched their horses. Meanwhile, the light was plainly visible, and indicated a large fire. They awaited orders before proceeding out of their district; and when the second alarm came, they found the flames beyond the control of the Department. Taylor Street was a mass of fire. Mr. Hyland observed: "We belonged to the district where the fire really was, but owing to the call being wrongly given, we did not reach the scene of the conflagration until it was too late to do any good. Had we got there in time, the fire would never have crossed Taylor Street, for we had one of the best engines in the city."

WILLIAM MULLER, who was foreman of No. 15 at that time, located near the corner of May and Twenty-second streets, says: When the alarm for Box 342 came his company was at once ready, that number being in his district. They were off instantly. Upon reaching Canalport Avenue they discovered that the alarm had been incorrectly given, and, as they saw a bright light ahead, they made no stop, although not included in the district where the fire really was. Within eighteen minutes from the time of leaving their house they were in position at the corner of Taylor and Desplaines streets. Their force was only partially filled, and those who were on the engine were exhausted with previous work. They strung their hose down Taylor to a point east of Jefferson, and played on the fire south of Taylor, but it was too late. The flames had crossed Taylor, and appeared to take everything before them. The many streams thrown on the fire instantly disappeared as steam. The wind was terrible, tearing blazing boards from the buildings, and carrying them through the air with fierce velocity. These brands ignited everything with which they came in contact. The church on the northeast corner of Clinton and Mather streets, five blocks from DeKoven Street, was smothered in flames.

LEO MEYERS, chief of the Seventh Battalion, was foreman of "Tempest" Hose Company at the time of the fire. He says, when the call for Box 342 came, about 9:30, he started. In five minutes he had reached the corner of Clinton and Taylor, because he disregarded the false signal, and speedily unreeled his hose. Engine No. 2 arrived at nearly the same time, but they were slow in getting into shape. He is very positive that the fire would not have crossed Taylor Street if No. 2 had been able to attack it at once. No. 6 was behind the fire, but was throwing plenty of water in the vicinity of the alley and the O'Leary barn. No. 5 had become disabled just at the most critical juncture. Mr. Meyers gives it as his opinion that the fire might have been subdued if the alarm had been correctly sounded, even at the time it was given, because several of the best engines could have arrived in six minutes. He also corroborates the statements of other men regarding the exhausted condition of the firemen. He was on the ground at 9:33, and from the appearance of the flames, he thinks they must have been burning fully half an hour when he reached there. Mr. Meyers sums the situation up in a brief line when he says, "From the beginning of that fatal fire everything went wrong."

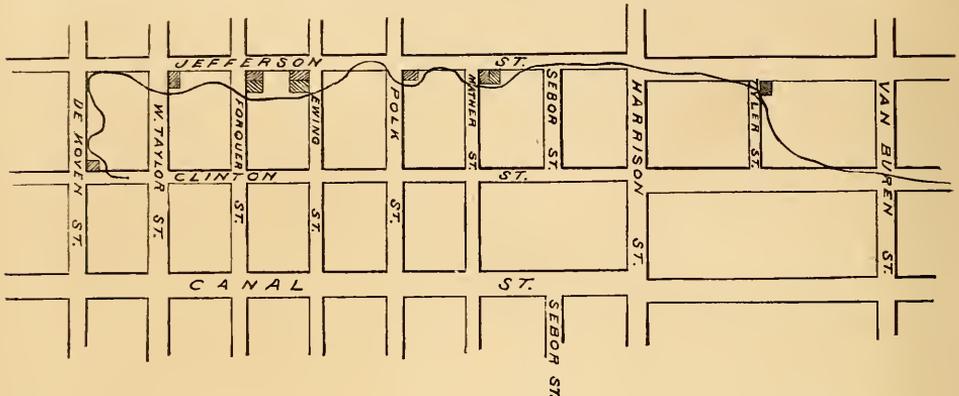

CHARLES S. PETRIE, assistant fire marshal and secretary of the Department, states to us that he was then engineer of Company No. 3, located at the corner of Chicago Avenue and May Street. His engine was in the shop for repairs, and his company was nearly exhausted with constant work in the service for several days previous to October 8. He had gone to bed on the night referred to. His captain, who was in the tower of the engine house, called to the men and told them there was a fire. Mr. Petrie hastily dressed, and went out on the street. He looked at his watch, which then marked 9:12. The light increased, and they waited anxiously for an alarm. When the second call was made, he got upon the truck, and proceeded to the scene, which was reached about 9:45. They stopped at the corner of Forquer and Jefferson streets, where No. 5 was then stationed, although doing nothing, being disabled. The fire had not crossed Taylor Street, although the heat was plainly discernible on the fronts of the houses on the north side of that street. The men were tearing up the sidewalk, and making fuel with which to feed No. 5. The fire had crossed Taylor Street before No. 5 was ready for action. Petrie furnished that engine with additional hose from his truck. He took one section, and began work on the rear of a building on the corner of Taylor and Jefferson streets; and also on another building setting back into the lot. He aided in starting a second short line from No. 5, playing on the property at the southeast corner of Forquer and Jefferson, where he got in behind the buildings. No. 5 was then working well. The stoker of the engine told him she was shut down ten minutes. A still alarm was sent No. 5 at 9:10. Mr. Petrie is of opinion that the fire began not later than nine o'clock.

The foregoing testimony of members of the Fire Department establishes these points: The fire must have originated by nine o'clock or before; the flames had gained sufficient brilliancy to illuminate the heavens half an hour before an alarm was sounded; the error in sounding Box 342 prevented at least four of the best engines, located in the district, taking part in the work; accident deprived No. 5 of the power to render efficient service at the critical moment; a terrific wind spread the flames through a highly combustible region; exhaustion from overwork rendered the men unfit for hard and long-continued labor; and the loss of hose and injury to machinery, caused by previous fires, crippled the Department. It has been asserted that the engines were not judiciously posted on their arrival at the scene, but the fact is plain that the fire had assumed insuperable dimensions long before the greater number of engines arrived. It is easier to discover errors after they are committed than to avoid them in the excitement of a great peril.

TIME OF THE BEGINNING OF THE FIRE.—Turning from the official management of this struggle with adverse forces, we present the statements of citizens who witnessed the fire in its early stages, with a view to establishing accurately the moment at which it originated:

JAMES E. DALTON resided at No. 135 DeKoven Street, at the time of the fire. His cottage was a one-story frame building, and stood next to Patrick O'Leary's on the east. Mr. Dalton says that O'Leary had two small cottages, one immediately behind the other, though practically attached. The two were thirty-six feet north and south, the front being nearly on the street building line. There was a space of about forty feet between the north end and the barn, used as a "back yard." Dalton's cottage set back from the street, leaving room for a contemplated front addition. It stood four feet above the ground, on cedar posts. The front of his cottage was two feet south on the north line of O'Leary's cottages, and his house was forty feet deep. The south line of O'Leary's barn was eight feet north of the rear of Dalton's house.

WEST LINE OF FIRE.

Unburned Buildings are shaded on the Plat.

His cottage was built on the west line of the lot. There were three west windows which looked on the O'Leary yard. A fence, eight feet high, ran from his house to his shed, at the rear of the lot, which was also on the west side. The shed was twelve by twenty feet in size. At about fifteen minutes to nine o'clock, on the night of the fire, Mr. Dalton heard a woman's scream of terror. The sound came from the direction of the O'Leary premises. He is unable to say precisely where the sound came from, nor does he know who uttered the cry, but he heard it through the west windows of his house. About ten minutes later, Mrs. Mary O'Rorke, his mother-in-law, who lived with him, went to her room in the northeast corner of the house, and saw the reflected light of a fire, which shone on the cottage of Walter Forbes, adjoining Dalton's on the east. Mrs. O'Rorke gave an alarm, and Mr. and Mrs. Dalton hastened to the rear door of their house. Fire was then under way in O'Leary's barn. A little water might have extinguished it at that moment, but, being unexpressed, it rapidly communicated with the dry fence and shed, and reached his house in an incredibly short time. This advance of the flames was so sudden, that Mrs. O'Rorke barely escaped from her room alive. The north and east sides of the building crashed in as she fled. Mr. Dalton remarked that the Fire Department did nothing at the critical moment.

Mrs. CATHERINE E. DALTON, wife of James E., says that two young ladies were visiting at her house that evening. Before half past eight o'clock her guests departed, she accompanying them as far as Canal Street, where they stood a few minutes in conversation. Returning to her home, Mrs. Dalton proceeded to put her children to bed. As she returned to the sitting-room, she heard a woman scream, as if in fright. The cry came from some person on the O'Leary premises, although it was impossible to locate the sound exactly. Mrs. Dalton says the fire must have originated as early as 8:45, judging by the time required to perform the duties which occupied her from the moment her guests took their departure. Mrs. Dalton corroborates her husband's statements, already given.

JAMES F. X. DALTON, son of the above, then a lad of twelve, fixes the time at 8:45. JAMES E. DALTON, another son of the above, then eleven years old, says his grandmother, Mrs. O'Rorke, always spoke of the fire as originating at 8:45.

JAMES DALTON, who lived at the corner of Clinton and Forquer streets, was at the fire by nine o'clock, and says it had evidently been going fifteen minutes, or even longer.

JOSEPH DUSHEK offers interesting evidence. He then resided at No. 153 DeKoven Street, and affirms that he first discovered the fire at about 8:45. He fixes the moment by a coincident which was of importance to himself. He states: "On Saturday, the day before the fire, I noticed a fine load of timothy hay which was taken into the alley and unloaded into the O'Leary barn. Just after the fire, while looking through the ruins of the O'Leary barn, I found an oil lamp, of the usual pattern, with a foundation-piece, about five and a half inches square, of brown stone or marble. The upright piece which set into it, and upon which rested the oil-holder, was of brass. The foundation-piece, the upright, and the oil reservoir or holder, were all together. The oil-holder, however, had been broken. The globe and chimney were gone."

Mrs. CATHARINE McLAUGHLIN resided with her husband and children in the front part of the O'Leary cottage at the time of the fire. She was called upon by the compiler of this record, and asked to state what she knew about the origin of the fire. She manifested so decided an aversion to being interviewed that little information was obtained. In fact, she threatened to "prosecute" those engaged in writing the history, if her name were used. The only answer received to numerous inquiries was relative to the hour at which the fire started. Mrs. McLaughlin vouchsafed a reply to that interrogatory, and said it was "About nine o'clock."

WILLIAM LEE resided at No. 133 DeKoven Street, two doors east of the O'Leary cottage, and was among the first who discovered the flames. He, and his brother-in-law, Martin Switzer, with their families, had been to Riverside that day. On their return to the city, the Switzers stopped a short time at Mr. Lee's house. Mr. Switzer was suffering from a badly sprained ankle, and when he arose to go to his home on the South Side, Mr. Lee offered to accompany him and put his horse in the barn. With that purpose in view, Mr. Lee accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Switzer to their wagon, but a presentiment of evil suddenly caused him to change his mind. The Switzers drove away, and Mr. Lee returned to his house. Mrs. Lee expressed surprise at this conduct, but her husband could offer no reasonable excuse. He felt ashamed because he allowed his superstition to control his judgment. Just then his infant child attracted his attention by a cry, and he stepped into the bedroom to ascertain the cause. He noticed that the blinds on the west window were not closed, and lifted the sash to fasten them. He then detected fire coming out of the roof of a building west of his house. At first he thought the flames were in James Dalton's shed, in the rear of No. 135, but soon saw it was in the O'Leary barn, one lot west of Dalton's. He called to his wife, told her to take care of their child, and said he would run to Bruno Goll's drug store, on the corner of Canal and Twelfth streets, and turn in an alarm. He hurried to the store, and applied to the druggist for a key, but was informed that an alarm was not necessary, as the engine had just gone down the street to the fire. Mr. Lee says he could not get the key to the alarm box, nor would the custodian turn in an alarm himself.* Mr. Lee returned to his house. The clock struck nine.

* See affidavit of B. H. Goll.

Soon afterward an engine came and took water at the plug on the corner of DeKoven and Jefferson streets. The fire had been burning at least ten minutes, and possibly fifteen, when the clock sounded nine. The fire spread rapidly, consuming the O'Leary and Dalton barns. Mr. Lee began to pack his household goods, preparatory to leaving his house. His boy, seventeen months old, was placed in a cradle and deposited, by Mrs. Lee, in a vacant lot across the street, west of Mr. Sullivan's house. There the mother and child remained nearly all night. A burned and frightened calf, the only animal saved from the O'Leary barn, stood close beside the cradle of the babe, as if craving human companionship in that frightful hour. Mr. Lee says he has never gotten over the vivid impression made by the mysterious warning not to leave his home that night, and feels convinced that to it is due the rescue of his family and such household goods as he was able to save. It will be observed that Mr. Lee fixes the beginning of the fire at about 8:50.

WALTER FORBES lived in the front part of the cottage, No. 133 DeKoven Street, two doors east of O'Leary's. The house was owned by Forbes, and occupied by himself, William Lee and Morris Connovan. A nephew of Mr. Forbes's, William Dunn, had spent the evening, accompanied by his wife, at this place. Glancing at the clock, Dunn remarked, "It is nine o'clock. We had better go." He and his wife started at once, and when they had reached a point near Blue Island Avenue, Dunn happened to look back. He saw the light, and thought his uncle's house was on fire. Hastening back, he reached Forbes's in time to assist in removing the household goods. Mr. Dunn's statement as to time conflicts with Mr. Lee's, although both were at the same house. Dunn says the fire could not have broken out earlier than nine o'clock.

RICHARD RILEY, a railroad contractor, lived at No. 130 West Twelfth Street, on the southwest corner of Canal, at the time of the conflagration. His house fronted north. Mr. Riley informs the writer that he was to have left the city that night by the Chicago & Alton Railroad, for St. Louis and other points. His frequent railroad journeys, compelled him to cultivate his naturally prompt and methodical habits. He carried a valuable and accurate time-piece of the famous Jurgensen make. The schedule time of the train on which he was to depart was precisely nine o'clock. Mr. Riley had his valise packed, and was waiting for the Canal-street omnibus to pass, in which he was to ride to the Alton depot. He had stepped into the front room, accompanied by his wife, and had just glanced at his watch, which indicated twenty minutes to nine, when, on raising the window to step out on the porch, he noticed the light of a fire just northwest of his house. The parched condition of everything in his neighborhood, and the recent destruction of a building by fire, not far from his place, increased the alarm inspired by the thought of actual fire, and he remarked to Mrs. Riley that he would not go to St. Louis that night. He immediately sought the scene of danger, and reached DeKoven Street, opposite O'Leary's, while the fire was still confined to the barn. But before many minutes the contiguous sheds and barns ignited. Dennis Sullivan had just returned to his own house, across the street from O'Leary's, from the vain attempt to save something from the barn. Everything was destroyed except a calf, which was placed in the lot next to Sullivan's. There were no engines on the ground, and the fire was having free sweep. Some time later, perhaps fifteen or twenty minutes, an engine arrived and took position at the plug on the southwest corner of Jefferson and DeKoven streets. By this time everything in the alley appeared to be on fire. Mr. Riley believed that the region was doomed, and hastened home to prepare for the rescue of his own family and effects. After accomplishing what he could in the way of precaution, he went to the northeast corner of Taylor and Canal streets, where there were piles of lumber about twenty-five feet high. Climbing upon one of these, Mr. Riley watched the progress of the flames. It was then about thirty or thirty-five minutes past nine o'clock. He saw the fire cross Taylor Street. A fierce sea-sawing hurricane set in. The fire appeared to tear up and instantly consume the firmer structures, while light and loose articles were hurled into the air like blazing torches. A large mass of fire, seemingly two feet in length and one foot in thickness, arose from a spot just north of Taylor Street, and went whirling through the air for more than three blocks, alighting on the cupola of the German Catholic Church, on the northeast corner of Mather and Clinton streets. The entire building was almost instantaneously enveloped in flames. The progress of the fire was towards the northeast. Mr. Riley's statement is one of the most circumstantial and positive that has yet been made. He declares that the fire originated before 8:40.*

JOHN COMISKEY, ex-president of the Common Council, furnishes us an interesting statement. It will be observed that he fixes the time of the breaking out of the fire at between 8:40 and 8:45 p. m. The opinion is based on coincident circumstances which can not be easily gainsaid. At the time mentioned he was sitting on the back porch of his residence on Lytle Street, due west from where DeKoven Street ends. There was nothing intervening to obstruct his view. He noticed the light, and, after a few minutes, went into the house, changed his slippers for boots, and told his wife he was going down to the fire. A member of his family was ill at the time, and Mrs. Comiskey remarked that he had better go for the family physician instead of going to the fire. Knowing the doctor's office hours, Mr. Comiskey glanced at the clock, to see if he would be likely to find the physician in. The timepiece indicated 8:55. He hurried to the doctor's office, but did not find him, and prosecuted his search for medical assistance until midnight, without success. Every one he called on had gone to the fire. Mr. Comiskey asserts positively that the fire was burning from ten to fifteen minutes before he looked at his clock. He also says that the congregation assembled at the Jesuit Church had not been dismissed when he started for the doctor. The service usually ends at nine p. m.

* Samuel L. Whipple, of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, showed the writer a time-table in use by his road October 3, 1871. The train on which Mr. Riley was to have gone left this city at precisely nine o'clock that night.

John Comiskey

MATTHEW TURNER owned the block of buildings on the northeast corner of DeKoven and Jefferson streets, and resided at No. 319 Aberdeen Street. He attended service at the Jesuit Church that Sunday evening. As he left the church, at nine o'clock, he saw the light caused by the fire, and hastened toward his premises. The fire had then crossed the alley in the rear of the O'Leary barn. There was but little wind at the time, and that from the southwest. Mr. Turner watched the flames sweep onward, crossing Taylor Street about 9:30. He gave no thought to his own buildings until about ten o'clock. They then appeared to be safe. At about eleven, however, his property took fire and was entirely destroyed. He has always believed this to be the work of an incendiary. In his opinion, the fire started about 8:45.

LAMP FOUND IN O'LEARY'S BARN.

CHRISTOPHER WARNER, who resided on the southwest corner of Harrison and Jefferson streets, states that soon after seeing the fire he went to it, and it had then crossed the alley north of and opposite the O'Leary barn. He watched the progress of the flames, and stood in close proximity to them until they reached Taylor Street. As soon as they had crossed that thoroughfare, the wind began to blow furiously. He glanced at his watch while standing at Taylor Street. The time was 9:30. He hurried home. The fire burned all buildings opposite his residence. He places the inception of the flames at 8:45 p. m.

GEORGE W. SPOFFORD, who lived at the southeast corner of Harrison and Halsted streets, at the time of the fire, states that on the Sunday evening in question he and his family were sitting in a room from which could be had a view of the region southeast of them. At about half past nine they heard the alarm bell of the "America" Hose Company, whose station was at No. 31 Blue Island Avenue. For a long time before that they had noticed a bright light, but as no fire alarm was sounded they paid no serious attention to it. Mr. Spofford followed the hose truck, and observed that the men had taken a plug at the corner of Taylor and Desplaines streets. He then went to the fire, which was south of Taylor Street. While he watched, the flames crossed to the north side of Taylor. He thinks the fire started at 8:50.

JAMES KUBICEK was in Frank Shults's saloon at the time the fire was discovered. When Shults gave the alarm, Kubicek glanced at the clock, and noticed that it was 8:45.

The writer of this record conversed with a number of Bohemians, in addition to those mentioned by name, and found many who were positive that the fire originated as early as 8:30; and those who lived in close proximity to the scene agree that it began not later than 8:45.

It is worthy of notice that all declare that the Turner Block, No. 418 Jefferson Street, was set on fire. They also say that no engine arrived until at least fifteen minutes after the fire began.

JOSEPH PUZNER resided at No. 442 Clinton Street, three doors south of DeKoven, on the night of the fire. He says he first saw the light of the flames at 8:45. He is positive that it was not later, because he went at once to No. 418 Jefferson Street, where his two brothers-in-law, Wensl Wasalik and Joseph Wasalik, lived, and by nine o'clock they had their goods removed from the endangered building.

FRANK SHULTS, who keeps a saloon on the corner of DeKoven and Jefferson streets, says that his mother-in-law, Mrs. Mary Hruby, while looking out of the window in the second story of their house, saw the fire in O'Leary's barn, and at once called to him. He gave alarm to all the building. This was not later than 8:45, as he chanced to observe by his clock, which he declares to be a thoroughly reliable timepiece, and which is still in use.

Having thus presented every imaginable variety of testimony, the most conclusive of all is given in the following affidavit:

AFFIDAVIT OF BRUNO HENRY GOLL.

State of Illinois, County of Cook, ss.

Before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, duly commissioned and sworn, appeared Bruno Henry Goll, to me personally known to be the same person whose name is subscribed to this affidavit, who, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says: That at the time of the fire of October 8-9, 1871, he kept a drug store at the northwest corner of Canal and Twelfth streets, and that he resided in the frame building in which said drug store was located. That the key to the fire alarm box, which was attached to said building on the Twelfth Street side of the house, was kept in his store. That at about nine o'clock or five minutes past nine o'clock of the evening of October 8, 1871, a man—who was in his shirt sleeves—ran into his store, and urgently requested him to turn in an alarm of fire, stating that said fire was near the O'Leary house. Deponent turned in the alarm, and then looked at his watch, which displayed the hour of about nine o'clock p. m. At about ten minutes afterward another man ran into the store crying, "The fire is spreading very rapidly," and deponent then went to the door again, and seeing the flames had assumed considerable magnitude was alarmed, and turned in a second alarm. About twenty minutes after turning in the second alarm, or at about half-past nine o'clock p. m., of October 8, 1871, he went over to the fire, and found some fire engines—perhaps two—at work, and the fire spreading rapidly throughout the frame barns and buildings to the northeast of DeKoven and Jefferson streets. There he met Dr. G. G. Goll, since deceased, and his brother-in-law, Lewis Wesley Fick, now of the firm of Fick & Oliver, and remained with them for some little time, remarking that, "If the wind kept up, the fire would burn Chicago." He then tried to assist some of his friends who were in danger of being burned out, after which he went east to Canal Street, and assisted a friend by the name of William Peters—now deceased—and then traveled with the fire, and was in the scenes attendant thereupon until the morning of October 9, 1871, when he returned to his home at the corner of Canal and West Twelfth streets. Deponent further states that he conducted business in, and occupied, the drug store aforesaid from the year 1863 until 1881. Deponent further states that, despite all assertions or allegations to the contrary, he turned in two separate alarms of fire from the city fire alarm box then attached to his store, as herein specified, within the time embraced by from nine o'clock p. m. to nine o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m., of October 8, 1871, and that he knows these times specified to be accurate, as he consulted his watch at the hours and minutes designated.

Bruno H. Goll,

Sworn and subscribed to before me this nineteenth day of May, A. D. 1885. THEODORE H. SCHINTZ, [SEAL] Notary Public.

I, Theodore H. Schintz, a Notary Public in and for the County of Cook and State of Illinois, am personally acquainted with Bruno Henry Goll, druggist, who has his place of business at the northeast corner of Ashland Avenue and Twelfth Street, and of my own knowledge know him to be a man in whose statements complete credibility can be placed, and whose veracity is thoroughly reliable. THEODORE H. SCHINTZ, [SEAL] Notary Public.

BRUNO HENRY GOLL was born in Werdau, Saxony, Germany, March 20, 1843, and is the son of Charles Henry and Henrietta Goll. In 1853, his parents emigrated to America, bringing him with them, and remained for one year in New York; after which they settled in Toledo, Ohio, where he received an education at the district schools. In 1857, he came to Chicago, and at once entered the drug business, serving an apprenticeship in the pharmacy of Henry Sweet. Being of an enterprising character, and thoroughly acquainted with the business which he had adopted as his life's work, at the age of twenty he commenced in that business on his own account, and after continuing in it for twenty years, at No. 505 Canal Street, he sold out and removed to his present location, at the corner of Twelfth Street and Ashland Avenue. He was married, in 1874, to Miss Emma A. Rice, of Boston. He is a member of Garden City Lodge, No. 141, A. F. & A. M.; of Wiley M. Egan Chapter, No. 126, R. A. M.; and of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.

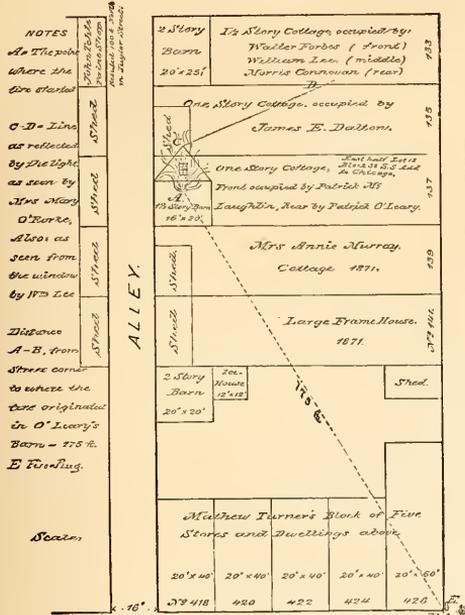

LEWIS WESLEY FICK was born in Norfolk County, Canada, in 1843, and there received his education. He is the son of Frederick B. and Sarah Ann (Ryesser) Fick. While pursuing his studies he worked on his father's farm in the Township of Houghton, Canada, until 1865, when he left home and went to California, where he remained for one year, and then returned to Canada, whence he came to Chicago in 1866. On his arrival here he at once became connected with the lumber business, keeping a tally-board on the river, at which employment he continued for one summer, when he engaged with Artemus Carter in selling cargoes. He occupied that position until 1870, when he entered the employment of the Peshigo Lumber Company, and continued with them until 1877, when he became a member of the firm of Ketcham & Fick, and continued therein for eight years. On May 1, 1885, he entered into partnership with John Oliver, Jr. under the firm name of Fick & Oliver, which co-partnership still exists. In 1869 he was married to Miss Emma A. Goll, daughter of Henry and Henrietta Goll, of Chicago. They have four children—Emma Cecilia, Bruno Wesley, Ella Jessie and Edward Paul. Mr. Fick is a member of the Masonic fraternity, having received the master's degree in 1864, in Walsingham Lodge, No. 178, A. F. & A. M., Canada. In connection with the statement of Bruno Henry Goll, Mr. Fick states that he met said Goll at the fire near the corner of DeKoven and Jefferson Streets, at about 9:30 o'clock p. m., of October 8, 1871, and there said Goll stated to him and to Dr. G. G. Goll, since deceased, the fact of his having turned in two alarms, as is stated in said Goll's affidavit. That Bruno Henry Goll is scrupulously exact, and that the utmost reliance can be placed on any statement made by him. That four or five engines only could work advantageously in the immediate vicinity of the fire, on account of the scarcity of fire-plugs. Mr. Fick is also cognizant of the fact that the key to the fire alarm box was kept in the drug store of Bruno Henry Goll, and that said Goll was always extremely cautious about turning in an alarm, lest he should call out the engines on a false alarm.

The O'Leary cottage was not burned. The now famous building was torn down, and a pretentious stone front erected on the site. This house belongs to Anton Kolar. In 1881, through the instrumentality of Mr. Albert D. Hager, secretary of the Chicago Historical Society, a marble tablet was inserted in the front wall of the new house. This slab is four feet by two feet in size, and bears the following inscription :

THE GREAT FIRE OF 1871

ORIGINATED HERE, AND EXTENDED TO LINCOLN PARK.
Chicago Historical Society, 1881.

The fire actually originated, as is shown in the diagram, in the barn at the rear of this house. Exact measurements are given in the plat.

and it is deemed that the verity of history will be fully conserved by letting actors in the terrible scene speak of their own deeds and observations.

WILLIAM B. BATEHAM, member of the Common Council in 1871, an early fire marshal, and at all times a close observer of the larger fires in this city, furnishes an interesting statement regarding this fire. On that Sunday evening, while sitting with his family in the back parlor of his residence, on the southwest corner of Silver and Harrison streets, from which room a southern view was had, he observed a light reflected from an easterly direction. He noticed the time—8:45. Shortly before nine o'clock he saw that the fire had greatly increased, and through anxiety, because of the exceeding dryness of the combustible portion of the city, he watched the growing light. There was but little wind at that hour. He thought the fire must be in the vicinity of Twelfth and Desplaines streets. The wind sprang up, apparently threatening his own property, on Canal, just south of Harrison, consisting of a shingle mill, box factory and furniture factory. There had been no alarm sounded. He started in the direction of his mill, at about nine o'clock. He met John Garrick. They watched the fire, and saw large pieces of burning material, from three to five hundred feet in the air, flying rapidly in a northeasterly direction. Mr. Bateham left Mr. Garrick at the corner of Clinton and Harrison streets, and hastened on to Canal Street. He reached his mill at 9:30, and found his watchman at work with a chemical engine. They at once started the steam engine, attaching the force-pump, and also laid hose from the fire-plug in front of the mill. By means of this supply, they flooded everything in the yard, in which were a thousand cords of fire-kindling wood, in piles twenty-five feet high, and also six hundred thousand feet of furniture lumber, belonging to the Frank Mayer Furniture Company, who occupied the attic of Bateham's three-story-and-attic mill. The building was two hundred and forty-five by sixty in size. Near by were seven hundred and fifty thousand shingles. The grounds occupied by these mills comprised one and a half acres. Eighty feet west of the main mill was another of the same length, and forty feet in width. The southwest corner of the mills almost touched the church on the northeast corner of Clinton and Mather streets, which was of wood. Eleven feet south of the mills stood a three-story building, fifty by seventy feet, siding on Mather Street. This was used by the Roelle Furniture-finishing Company, and was filled with combustible materials. The northwest quarter of this large block of ground was known as the "Hunton Place," having the appearance of a large country farmhouse. The residence stood well back from the street, and the lot was filled with large trees. The house was a landmark, having been built by Judge J. D. Caton, nearly half a century before. The quaint old mansion had twelve stacks of chimneys, constructed in various parts of the house to accommodate the rooms. It was altogether a picturesque place in a neighborhood of puffing and impertinent modern factories. The house was occupied for many years by Charles Hunton, who died there some years before its destruction. Thus was the block, bounded by Harrison, Mather, Canal and Clinton, not only a landmark of the progress of the great fire, but also a site of historic interest. Mr. Bateham hoped to break the force of the fire before it reached his works. At ten o'clock it looked as if this were possible, for the church had gone down in ruins in advance of the main body of flame. Some of the best steamers were working hard on his property and the Roelle building, and men were encouraged to believe the end was near. But in the very face of those efforts, the Koelle structure went up in smoke and flame. At half-past ten, the heroic men were driven from Bateham's works by the intense heat. As Mr. Bateham turned from his property he remarked : "The materials from this mill will fire the South Side, and nothing can prevent it now." His prophecy proved correct. The wild tornado which swept over the city bore onward the blazing ruins of that pile. The scene which ensued, on the igniting of Bateham's mill was one of the most fearfully grand ever beheld by mortal eyes.

W B Bateham

JOHN GARRICK lived at No. 354 Fulton Street. He owned property on the southwest corner of Harrison and Clinton streets. Before nine o'clock on the memorable Sunday night, he noticed a bright light on DeKoven Street. Being personally interested, he started to see whether there was any likelihood of a dangerous conflagration. He walked quickly to Harrison, but finding no cause for immediate alarm, he went leisurely down that street to Halsted, and was about to return home when he met Mr. Bateham. It was then 9:20. The two men had barely crossed Halsted when they saw large sparks flying through the air. The wind was PROGRESS OF THE FIRE.—By half-past nine o'clock the flames crossed Taylor Street, and the Department was powerless to prevent the rapid movement of the destroying force. Concerted action became impossible, for no sooner was a steamer planted in an apparently favorable spot, than some building, taller or more inflammable than its neighbors, would burst into flames far in advance. Men could not endure the tempest of fire. It was no longer a question of intrepidity. There were no desertions, no instances of insubordination, among the men. All labored with heroic determination, but their efforts were made in vain.

As in the pages just presented, so in this narration, the testimony of eye-witnesses, or participants, is given. To these vivid descriptions there is but little to add :

increasing. Garrick stopped at Clinton Street, but Bateham hurried on toward his own mills. At eleven o'clock the fire reached Garrick's property. The only thing he saved was an American flag, forty feet long, which he wrapped about him, and returned home. Mr. Garrick says the fire must have started about 8:40.

The Tribune of October 11 contained a graphic description of this opening scene:

"So great was the area already covered by half-past ten o'clock, and so rapidly did the fire march forward, that by the time the engines were at work the flames were ahead of them, and again the steamers were moved northward. From the west side of Jefferson Street, as far as the eye could reach in an easterly direction—and that space was bounded by the river—a perfect sea of leaping flames covered the ground. The wind increased to fierceness as the flames rose and the flame: waited more hungrily for their prey as the gusts impelled them onward. Successively the wooden buildings on Taylor, Forquer, Ewing and Polk streets became the northern boundary, and then fell back to the second place. Meanwhile, the people in the more southern localities bent all their energies to the recovery of such property as they could. With ample time to move all that was movable, and with a foreboding of what was coming in the neighborhood at least, they were out and in safety long before the flames reached their dwellings. They were nearly all poor people, the savings of whose lifetime were represented in the little mass of furniture which blockaded the streets and impeded the firemen. They were principally laborers, most of them Germans or Scandinavians. Though the gaunt phantoms of starvation and homelessness, for the night at least, passed over them it was singular to observe the cheerfulness, not to say merriment, that prevailed. Though mothers hugged their little ones to their breasts and shivered with alarm, yet, strange to say, they talked freely and laughed as if realizing the utter uselessness of expressing more dolefully their consciousness of ruin. There were many owners of the buildings who gave themselves up to the consolations of insurance; but even that appeared to weaken as the flames spread, and they resigned themselves to their fate. Many of the victims were stowed away in the houses on the west side of Jefferson Street, losing all but their lives and little ones. How many of these latter were abandoned, either from terror or in the confusion, it is impossible to guess; but every now and then a woman, wild with grief, would run in and out among the alleys, and cry aloud her grief.

"The firemen were working with extraordinary perseverance. Where it seemed impossible for a man to stand without suffocation they carried their hose, sprinkling the houses opposite and endeavoring to stop the spread of the fire in a westerly direction. But it was evident by midnight that human ingenuity could not stem that fiery tide. At the same time, so burdened were the minds of the citizens with the conflagration that the question of where it would end never entered their minds. Engine No. 14, which had retreated gradually north on Canal Street to Chapin & Foss's lumber yard,—or rather where it had been two days before (this yard was on VanBuren Street, from Canal toward the river, and was partly burned in the Saturday night fire),—was suddenly surrounded by a belt of flame and abandoned to its fate. At this time the fire was running almost entirely north, in two solid columns. One was between Clinton and Jefferson, the other between Clinton and Canal streets. In that fearful advance, the fiery cohorts of the eastern column led, and while they made their onslaught upon the barrier of lumber and frame buildings on VanBuren Street (from Clinton to the river), bordering on the blackened site of the preceding night's conflagration, the advance on the west had only reached West Harrison Street. Before the roar of the flames in that lumber yard (Chapin & Foss's) the crowd stood in awe, though even then without a thought of the peril yet to come. It was now about 1:15 o'clock.* But while it seemed as if the demon of flame had reached a desert and needs must die, a new danger appeared to threaten the city. From the South Side, in the neighborhood of Adams Street—but whereabouts, no one on the West Side could then guess with certainty—rose a column of fire, not large, but horribly suggestive. Such engines as could be moved were called from the West Side to protect South Side property, and these flames were left to die of inanition."

The Times, in its resumé, published ten days after the fire, described the scene along the west bank of the river:

"The fire reached over Canal Street, and while that terrible southwestern wind howled in mad delight, it forced its way into the planing mills, and chair factories, and all the other shops which skirted the creek in that portion of West Chicago. Then it got into the lumber yards and into the railroad shops, and the round-houses were soon wrapped in its dread embrace. The bricks themself seemed only additional fuel. The rolling stock in the railroad yards was but kindlings, which helped along the fire already intense. But worst of all, the elevators were next in danger. For a few minutes it seemed as though one or two of the largest ones would resist the flames, and pass through the fiery ordeal unscathed. But this thought was not of long duration, for an instant later the immense piles were ablaze from top to bottom. Like the advance of a great army, the fires moved forward in several columns, and like a well-whipped but unconquered foe the Fire Department slowly retreated. But they stubbornly contested every foot of ground, however, and would not surrender, although often almost entirely surrounded by the dread enemy. Then they would cut their way out and retreat for a short distance, only to turn again and hurl their charges of thousands of gallons of water full into the face of the enemy. But no power on earth could stem the torrent. Never did firemen fight more fiercely to conquer, and never before did their heroic efforts seem so utterly in vain.

"Polk Street was reached, and here a desperate stand was made. One steamer, the 'Frank Sherman,' stood at the plug on the corner of Polk and Clinton, until the heat had scorched the hair from the impatient horses, and the brave engineer and plucky stoker had lost almost all their whiskers. Then the word was given to retreat and run. As they went, the firemen faced the fire, and shouted to the driver to stop at the first plug and let them try again.

"To add to the terrible reality of the scene, it was discovered that a building was on fire away to the rear. Between Sebor and Harrison streets a barn was all ablaze; and before a steamer could reach the spot other barns innumerable were fiercely burning. It was the onslaught of a cavalry corps on the retreating army's rear, and all seemed hopeless. There was one thing noticeable, however, and worthy of special mention. The fierce wind had veered around, somewhat, towards the west, and now the fire was skipping some houses on the western outskirts of the blocks bounded by Jefferson and Clinton streets. To be sure there were not many of these escapes, but the fact was apparent, and it cheered the soul of every one. * * * Across Harrison Street and Tyler, and along VanBuren, the monster ran, carrying destruction in its fiery course. At the approach to VanBuren-street bridge stood the steamer 'Fred Gund,' a first-class Amoskeag engine, with a complement of officers and men in skill and daring second to none in the land. The steamer was completely surrounded by fire, and for their lives the boys were forced to fly. They left their engine, but they have the proud consciousness of knowing she went down in a sea of fire, with steam up and while still facing an advancing foe. * * * Here and there, and almost everywhere, lay thousands of feet of hose, stretched to its utmost tension with watery ammunition, which the powerful engines were constantly throwing on the blaze."

Another writer says:

"When the flames had crossed over Clinton Street, between Ewing and Forquer streets, there were probably left half-a-dozen houses which seem to have been forgotten in the excitement of the moment. But they were not permitted to escape the awful flames. Backward swept the red demon, silently and softly, but swiftly enough to elude all pursuit, and before the terror-stricken multitude could prevent, all these frame buildings were burned to the ground. * * * To the right (eastward) the fire had been driven with great fierceness, and Clinton and Canal and Beach streets, and then the railroads which run along the western shore of the South Branch, were in its grasp. Now was the fire (west of the river) at its fiercest. Upward of twenty blocks were burning. Upward of five hundred buildings, not including outhouses, were on fire. Upward of five hundred families were fleeing from the seeming wrath to come. The streets were almost impassable, with all sorts of vehicles filled with household goods."

In summing up the result of his investigations concerning the precise moment at which the fire originated, and also when it reached various important points in its advance to the Water Works, C. C. P. Holden says:

"There is a great conflict of opinion as to the exact moment of the commencement of the fire. Ordinarily the records of the Fire Department would be conclusive evidence on such a subject; but in this case the records are faulty and silent in the extreme, and really show nothing that will enlighten the public. The various statements, already given in substance in this work, place the time as follows: Mathias Schaffer, watchman in the tower of the Court House, 9:28; Christian Schimmels, foreman No. 5 engine, 9:13; Henry V. Coleman, engineer No. 5 engine, 9:00; David M. Hyland, of No. 17, 9:07; Mrs. Catherine McLaughlin, about 9:00; the several fire marshals, 9:00; the Dalton family, William Lee, William B. Bateham, and numerous persons living near the spot, 8:45; John Garrick, Richard Riley and Matthew Turner, 8:40.

"The progress of the flames was as follows. Beginning, say, at 8:45; reached Bateham's mills at 10:30; Parmelee's barns, on South Side, at 11:30; Court House about 1:30, and bell fell at 2:05; Wright's stables, on North Side, at 2:30, and Water Works at 3:20."

* The fire reached VanBuren Street as early as 11:30.

Mr. Holden maintains that the fire began at 8:45, if not earlier by some minutes. The distance from O'Leary's barn to the Water Works was two miles and twelve hundred and fifty-two feet. The flames traversed this space in six hours and thirty-five minutes.

THE FIRE CROSSES TO THE SOUTH SIDE.—Once more is encountered the embarrassment of conflicting statements. There are scarcely two witnesses to be found, who coincide in their opinions as to when and where the fire seized upon buildings east of the river. From as early as half-past nine, showers of sparks and burning brands fell upon the South Side, and were even carried far into the North Division. But the writers heretofore have generally accepted the assertion that the fire first broke out on the South Side at Powell's roofing-works, near the gas-works, on Adams Street, shortly after midnight.

This statement we believe to be erroneous. The first building to ignite on the South Side was the new stable owned by the Parmelee Omnibus and Stage Company, situated on southeast corner of Jackson and Franklin streets. This spacious structure had just been completed at an expense of $80,000, and would have been occupied for the first time on Wednesday, October 11. The building was the finest of its kind in the country. The impending danger had aroused the parties interested in this property to unusual vigilance. Messrs. J. W. Parmelee and J. E. Sullivan are the authorities for the statements here given. These gentlemen were at the stable, hoping to be able to prevent the destruction of the building. At half-past eleven, October 8, 1871, the fire swept down upon them with such rapidity and terrific force as to compel them to flee for their lives. It seemed but an instant before the edifice was literally engulfed in flame. This was the starting point, and, it will be observed, was but a short distance south of a line drawn from DeKoven and Jefferson streets, through the Court House, to the Water Works.

The fatality which destroyed the Water Works while the fire was in its infancy, so to speak, compels us to digress from the general plan of this record, and trace the fire, by gigantic steps, until the pumping works are reached.

At 8:45 the incipient blaze began. At 10:30, Bateham's mills on Canal Street, near Harrison, were deserted, as beyond salvation. At 11:30, Parmelee's stable was a sea of flame. At about twelve o'clock, the gas works and "Conley's Patch" were on fire. By ten o'clock, the cupola of the Court House had taken fire several times, but had been extinguished by the watchman. At 1:30, the men in the tower barely escaped with their lives. At 2:05, the famous Court-house bell went clanging down. At not later than 1:30, Judge Lambert Tree crossed State-street bridge, which was then burning in spots. At 2:30, Wright's stable on the southeast corner of State and Kinzie streets, at the northern end of the viaduct, took fire. At 1:30, the paint and carpenter shop, standing on piles driven in the lake, near the Water-Works, burned. Lill's immense brewery ignited at this time, and was destroyed as if by magic. Ex-Mayor Rumsey's residence took fire about three o'clock; and at twenty minutes past three the Water Works were in flames. In the brief space of six and one-half hours the fire ran a distance of about two and one-quarter miles, with unerring aim, and laid in ruins the only means of defense against its ravages.

This epitome of events will enable the reader to follow the detailed narrative, which is now resumed.

From the quotations which follow, it will be seen that each writer held a different theory as to the time and location of the first South Side fire. Messrs. Sheahan and Upton state the time of its occurrence with that degree of circumstantiality which usually carries conviction, while the assertion made by Mr. Colbert, not only gives a slightly different location, but times the fire twenty minutes earlier than his contemporaries.

Messrs. Sheahan and Upton say:

"There was probably not a person in the South Division who imagined for a moment that the fire would extend beyond the portion of the city in which it originated. Indeed, when it approached the burned district of the previous Saturday night's conflagration, there was a universal sigh of relief, for here, certainly, it would be stayed, notwithstanding the furious wind. The hope was a futile one. At just twenty minutes past twelve, a huge blazing brand was blown across the river. Onward it sped, like a fiery messenger of doom, and lodged upon the roof of a three-story tenement house, which was as dry as tinder. The roof was immediately in a blaze, and almost instantly every part of the building emitted furious jets of flame. The house was about midway between Adams, Monroe, Wells (Fifth Avenue) and Market streets, and surrounded by one and two story wooden houses and alleys littered with all sorts of inflammable materials. Through this wooden nest the fire spread with inconceivable rapidity, and soon attacked another group of low, wooden buildings, known as 'Conley's Patch,' densely covered with saloons, tumble-down hovels and sheds, and peopled by the lowest class in the city. For years, this spot had been the terror of the neighborhood beyond it, and had been stained with every conceivable crime. The male residents were absent at the fire in the West Division, and as the flames seized upon it, squalid women and children rushed out in droves. Most of them escaped; but undoubtedly some were overtaken by the fire, and miserably perished. Right and left the flames spread as fast as a man could walk, and soon the gas works and huge piles of coal in the yard took fire, and a red glare shone all over the doomed city. Down the south line of Monroe Street it sped with lightning-like rapidity."

Elias Colbert says:

"The first vault across the river was made at midnight from VanBuren Street, alighting in a building of the South Division gas works on Adams Street. * * * Having gained a foothold here, its march naturally lay through two or three blocks of pine rookeries known as 'Conley's Patch,' and so on for a considerable space through the abodes of squalor and vice. * * * Through there it set out at double-quick, the main column being flanked on each side and nearly an hour to the rear. That at the right was generated by a separate brand from the western burning; * * * that at the left was probably created by some of the eddies which were by this time whirling through the streets toward the flame below, and from it above. The rookeries were quickly disposed of. * * * Beyond them, along LaSalle Street, was a splendid double row of 'fire-proof' mercantile buildings, the superior of which did not exist in the land. Would these succumb to the shower of brands and the triple-heated furnace which had been thrown about them?"

William S. Walker, a journalist, in his history of the fire, published in the Lakeside Monthly for June, 1872, offers still another statement touching the first blaze in the South Division. He says:

"The bridges and shipping in the river afforded a superb transit for the flames, and the crossings at VanBuren, Polk and Adams streets were soon frame-works of fire. From these, blazing in a raging wind, there was no lack of communication from the West to the South Side. The latter was fired in two places at a few minutes before one o'clock, on Monday morning, some three and a half hours after its origin in DeKoven Street. The first of these was in a shed on the river bank, near Polk Street. This fire was extinguished with ease—although the structure was itself torn down, as the only method of checking the work of ruin. At nearly the same time, the tar-works belonging to the South Division gas manufactory, situated on Adams Street, near the Armory, were ignited. * * * In less than five minutes a square of buildings was in flames."

The hour named for the firing of the gas-works is clearly wrong; but the extract is here given because of the allusion to the firing of a shed on the river bank—a point made by no other writer. It is probable that such a fire existed and was extinguished, as Mr. Walker relates, but, if so, the time of its occurrence could not have been later than half-past eleven, unless he alludes to the back-setting of the fire, which reached Polk Street at a later hour than one o'clock.

*This statement appears to confirm Mr. Parmelee's narrative.

A writer on the Post, who witnessed the scene, gives a still later hour. He says:

"One o'clock had just struck, and a sudden puff of the variable wind blew down a curved wing of the great golden-red clouds above our heads. It fell like the shear of a sabre, and in a second a red glare shot up on the South Side, as if the blow had fallen upon a helmet and sent up a glitter of sparks and a spurt of blood. The fire had overlapped the narrow river, and lodged itself in the very heart of the South Division. The angry bell tolled out, and in a moment the bridges were choked with a roaring, struggling the greater number being burned or suffocated within two minutes from the time the fire first threatened them.

The Tribune says, describing this instant of the fire:

"By this time the flames had crossed to the east side of Wells Street, and were rapidly working eastward, sweeping everything in their course. It is impossible to estimate the number of lives lost in this locality, the area of which was wholly covered with wooden structures, all of them crowded to the utmost with poor people. In the terror and confusion which prevailed, hundreds of women, with their broods of children, were seen wandering about in a state of hopeless bewilderment, many of them doomed, beyond a doubt, to be overtaken by, and lost in, the wilderness of flame.

"Northward and eastward the flames progressed, crossing Madison Street and extending east to LaSalle at the same time. Stone, brick and wooden structures fell alike, and with almost the same rapidity. It had now become apparent that the whole business portion, to the lake shore, was doomed. No one could doubt this as soon as a fresh display of light farther south announced the fearful fact that the West-side fire had actually leaped the river. At about a quarter to one o'clock, the regular chain of fire from west to east was established, the juncture being effected across the river at or near the VanBuren-street bridge, where the rows of wooden buildings on Market Street, and the remaining portion of 'Conley's Patch,' south of Adams Street, formed a rapid route for the progress of the devastating element. What the first fire on the South Side had left behind, the second one took up, and, working eastward even more rapidly than the other had done, by one o'clock had reached LaSalle Street. A coalition was thus effected between the two divisions of flames at about this time; and then the awful work went on more furiously than ever. Faster than it could be traced—or, at least, faster than, from any position of observation, the looker-on could accurately note the precise buildings which were overtaken, in their order—the flames now raged towards the river and the lake. The finest of Chicago's business architecture—and this the marvel of all America—was included in the ravages of the fire."

Another writer in the Tribune says of the fire's first appearance on the South Side:

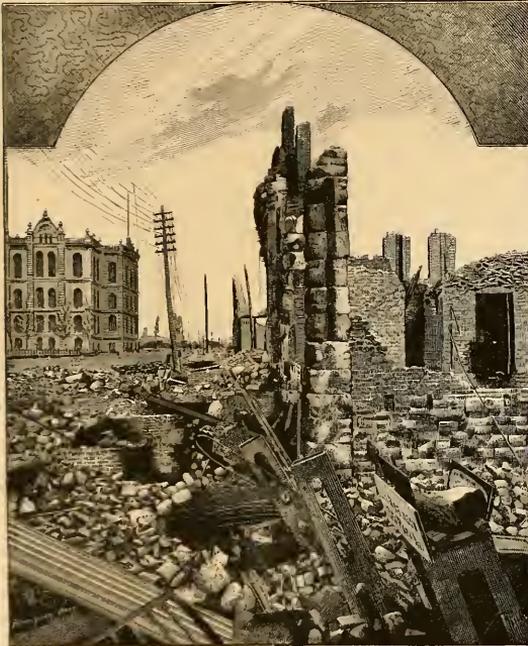

"The messenger, hurrying around to inform the firemen on the West Side of the changed aspect of affairs, had not reached his destination when the firemen themselves had noticed the leaping blaze and rising smoke on the other side of the South Branch; and the chief of the Department, already finding himself unable to cope with the perplexities of the situation, ordered what he could across the river. Had they reached their new field of labor, they could have done little; as it was, they accomplished nothing. From that time on, without a commander, without system, and, soon after, without water, they fought gallantly and stubbornly, but disintegrated, and without success."

The Times of October 18 said:

"The twin rioters of flame and wind, with their appetite sharpened instead of gorged by the feast among the meager buildings of the West Division and the river side, now fell in dire carnival upon the noble edifices of LaSalle Street.

"The Grand Pacific Hotel, upon which the roof had but just been placed, was among the first of the better class of structures assailed by the fire. Angered at its imposing front, and scorning the implied durability of its superb dimensions, the flames stormed relentlessly in, above, and around it, until, assured that it was at their absolute mercy, they left it tottering to the earth, and crawled luridly along the street in search of further prey.

"It was now that the waves of fire began to take upon themselves the mightiest of proportions. How it was that, while even a hundred buildings might be blazing, others, far in advance of the track of the storm, could not be protected, has not been understood by those who were not despairingly following the course of destruction. It was partly on account of the artificial currents already mentioned, and because the huge tongues of flame actually stretched themselves out upon the pinnions of the wind, for acres. Sheets of fire would reach over entire blocks, wrapping in every building inclosed by the four streets bounding them, and scarcely allowing dwellers in the houses time to dash away unscorched. Hardly twenty minutes had elapsed from the burning of the Pacific Hotel before the fire had cut its hot swathe through every one of the magnificent buildings intervening upon LaSalle Street, and crowd, through which the engines cleft a difficult way toward the new peril. The wind had piled up a pyramid of rustling flame and smoke in the mid-air. Lower currents at times varied and drove tides of fire athwart the great roaring stream. When these met, eddies that made the eye dizzy were found, which sucked up blazing brands and embers into their momentary whirl, and then flung them earthward."

RUINS CORNER OF CLARK AND WASHINGTON STREETS.

EXPANSION OF THE FIRE.—Right and left the fire spread, from the mass of seemingly solid flames which rose from the hovels of "Conley's Patch," traveling at a rate of speed never before witnessed. In less than sixty seconds, the space of one block had been traversed, and the south line of Monroe Street was reached, for nearly the entire distance between Wells and Market streets. A sheet of fire enveloped the stables of John V. Farwell & Co. and the American Merchants' Union Express Co., before more than half-a-dozen of the hundred or more valuable animals could be saved, had fallen mercilessly upon the Chamber of Commerce. The few heroic workers of the Police and Fire Departments who had not already dropped out of the ranks of fighters from sheer exhaustion, sought to once more check the progress of devastation by the aid of powder. A number of kegs were thrown into the basement of the grand business palace of the Merchants' Insurance Company. A slow match was applied, and as the crowd drew back the explosion ensued. A broad, black chasm was opened in the face of the street; but, with as little attention to the space intervening as though it had only been across an ordinary alley, the arms of flame swung over the gap, and tore lustily at the rows of banking-houses and insurance structures beyond.

From the Grand Pacific it occupied but a moment of time to reach the Custom House and Post-office building.

BURNING OF THE POST-OFFICE AND CUSTOM-HOUSE.—The destruction of this public edifice was an incident of great importance, and is best related by Henry H. Nash, cashier of the United States Depository, and Alonzo Hannis, an employé in the Post-office.

NARRATIVE OF HENRY H. NASH.—At the time of the fire I was cashier of the United States Depository, and resided at No. 536 West Monroe Street. From the upper rooms of my residence I had a view of the fire when it started on DeKoven Street, near Jefferson. I retired about ten o'clock p. m., and, awakening about twelve o'clock, I looked out of the window and made up my mind, that the fire had got beyond the control of the firemen, as I could see that the fire had reached and crossed the river, and was burning north of Jackson Street. I called up my nephew, Fred. M. Blount, who was a messenger in my office. We dressed and started for my office, coming down and crossing the river at Madison-street bridge. When we reached Market Street the fire was about crossing Madison Street, just east of Franklin. We turned to the north until we reached the alley between Madison and Washington streets. We passed through this alley to Dearborn Street, then south to the Government building, on the corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets. I will here remark that the Chicago Times building was then on the northwest corner of this alley. We went through to Dearborn Street. As we passed, I noticed they were printing the Monday morning paper, which was destroyed, with their office, a few hours later. (I think it was about half-past three or four o'clock a. m.) When we reached the corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets, the fire was raging to the west and south of us, and had taken in the new Grand Pacific Hotel, which was then near completion. We immediately entered the Government building, went to the room of the United States Depository, opened the vault, and placed therein all books and papers in the office (which, from lack of vault room, we had been in the habit of leaving outside). I then opened a safe standing in the room, in which I kept a part of my daily cash, and took its contents (about fifty thousand dollars of currency), a tin box of my own, containing $750 of new United States notes of issue of 1869; also $650 United States six per cent. bonds, belonging to Major Fitch, of the Custom House, a $20 United States six per cent. bond, belonging to E. K. Loomis, of Naperville, some silver spoons, belonging to my wife, some valuable papers of my own and a friend's, to the value of about $15,000—all of which I placed in the vault, and securely locked. Then, with the assistance of the watchman of the building and the janitor of the United States Court rooms, we closed all the iron shutters of the building, except on the first floor and basement, which were occupied by the Post-office. The shutters upon these floors had been taken off when making repairs in the spring of 1871, at the request of the employés in the Post-office. The absence of these shutters left the building exposed, so that when the fire reached the building, it came in upon the west side. Seizing upon the great number of letter-cases which occupied the main floor of the Post-office, they being very dry, and fanned by the gale which was blowing, the fire spread rapidly, and the intense heat caused the iron beams supporting the floor above to bend and give way, carrying destruction to nearly the whole of the inside of the building at about 3 o'clock a. m., October 9, 1871. James E. McLean was collector of customs and, ex officio, the depository; I, as cashier, having charge of the depository. This office, with the one at Cincinnati, and the United States Sub-Treasury at St. Louis, were the principal offices for the receipt and disbursement of Government funds for the West and Northwest. The amount of funds handled in the depository here, up to the opening of the War of 1861, was comparatively small. General Julius White, who was collector of customs and depository at the commencement of the war, resigned and joined the army. If my memory serves me, the balance turned over to Luther Haven, his successor, was less than five thousand dollars. After the war opened, the Government made this city a point for the purchase and distribution of supplies for the army, and the office of depository here soon became one of much importance, the receipts and disbursements amounting to thirty or forty millions of dollars per annum during the nine years I was in the office, which was from 1864 to 1873. The large amount of Government funds handled in Chicago, was recognized by Congress, who, in 1873, created the office of United States Assistant Treasurer here, General J. D. Webster being the first assistant treasurer at this point.

GENERAL JOSEPH D. WEBSTER was a son of Rev. Josiah Webster, of Hampton, N. H., a kinsman of Daniel Webster. He was born August 25, 1811, and prepared for college at Hampton Academy, after which he entered Dartmouth College, and graduated in 1832. He then commenced the study of law in Newburyport, Mass. In 1835, he went to Washington, D. C., where, on the offer of General Cass, then secretary of war, he entered the corps of civil engineers. In 1838, he became a member of the corps of United States topographical engineers, the civil engineer corps being abolished. In that year he removed to Milwaukee and took charge of the government survey at that point, and continued on this work of coast and other surveys until 1847. From Milwaukee he removed to Detroit, where he had charge of the harbor until he was ordered to Mexico, to make military surveys on the Rio Grande. In 1848, he returned to Washington, and was then ordered to Chicago to take charge of the harbor work. In 1854, he resigned and retired to private life, but on the breaking out of the Rebellion he at once volunteered, and, as paymaster, with the rank of major, was with the first troops that arrived at Cairo. Soon after reaching Cairo, he was appointed chief of engineers, with the rank of colonel. He planned and superintended the works around Cairo and at Bird's Point, until the spring of 1862, when he was commissioned colonel of the 1st Illinois Light Artillery. Colonel Webster took part in the battles of Belmont, Fort Henry, Donelson and Shiloh; was chief-of-staff to General Grant, and chief of engineers and artillery at Shiloh. In that battle, one of the most important at that period of the war, he rendered conspicuous and distinguished service. General Sherman says, in a letter of condolence to the son of General Webster, written March 20, 1876, shortly after his death: "As an officer he (General Webster) was that one in whose keeping General Grant and I could always repose any trust with a sense of absolute security. At Shiloh, he arranged and commanded that battery and reserve force which checked the final assault of our enemy, just before night-fall of April 6, 1862." From Shiloh, Colonel Webster went with General Grant to Memphis, and was appointed military commander in the summer of 1863. Having recovered from a severe attack of sickness, he was given charge of the military railway as General Grant's chief-of-staff, and remained on this duty during the Vicksburg campaign and until General Sherman took charge of the Army of the Tennessee. With General Sherman he went to Nashville, took part in the battle of Nashville, was chief of General Sherman's staff throughout the war, and had charge of headquarters during the march to the sea. In regard to his service there, where many of his friends urged and desired him to accept another position which was tendered him, and which offered probably greater chance for marked personal distinction, it may be proper to again quote from the letter of General Sherman, above referred to: "Knowing how important would be our line of communication, and the state of our supplies, I left him at Nashville, and he must have among his papers many letters showing the confidence reposed in him, and how well he fulfilled his trust. He joined me at Savannah, Ga., and continued on my staff until the war was over. Now I recognize the full measure of my obligation to him, and beg that his family will ever turn to me as their friend." In the spring of 1865, Colonel Webster moved to Savannah, where, as stated, he joined General Sherman, and afterward removed to Alexandria and Washington. The war being over, General Webster resigned his military office and returned to Chicago, where he employed himself principally in superintending hospitals, and went on a tour throughout the South to inspect the railroads, and, at the request of the postmaster-general, made a report thereon as a basis for the re-organization of the mail service. In 1868, he was appointed assessor of internal revenue, which office he held until it was abolished in 1873. Soon afterward, he was appointed assistant treasurer, and when the campaign against the "whisky frauds" opened, became collector of internal revenue for the First District of Illinois. In this position his labors became prodigious and incessant, and he was obliged to bear the brunt of the tremendous onslaught which those impliof loss, showed how universal among men of all shades of political opinion, was the estimation for such a character as his. In 1844, General Webster was married to Miss Ann E. Wright, daughter of John and Huldah D. Wright, who were among the earliest settlers of Chicago. Five children were born to them, three of whom survive. His eldest son, L. D. Webster, graduated at the Annapolis Naval School, and accompanied Admiral Farragut on his great cruise. He is now practicing law in Chicago.

JOSEPH D. WEBSTER.

To continue the narrative of Mr. Nash:

This building, in which were the Post-office, Custom House and Depository, Collector of Internal Revenue, United States Courts, United States Marshal, etc., was situated on the northwest corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets. The room occupied by me was in the northeast corner, on the second floor. The building was three stories and basement, built of Lemont stone, backed with brick, very substantial, and designed to be fire proof. In fact, the outside walls were very little damaged, except the west one. This was badly scaled by the intense heat from a six-story building, owned by Benjamin Lombard, which stood west of it about thirty feet. Lombard's block burned very rapidly and made an intense heat, which was driven by the southwest gale directly upon the west wall of the Government building. There being no shutters upon the Post-office floor, the fire found entrance, as I have already stated. Through the inside of the building, north and south, were four rows of iron columns, on which rested hollow iron beams, about six by eighteen inches, and eighteen or twenty feet long. On these rested the cross beams of iron, about eight inches deep, with spaces of about three feet, which were filled, or arched, with brick and cement. From the second floor to the attic (two stories, about forty feet), resting upon these iron beams, was an eight-inch brick wall, forming the partitions of the halls and rooms. The intense heat produced by the burning of the letter-cases on the Post-office floor, caused the iron beams and girders to bend by the great weight upon them, until they gave way, and the whole inside of the building fell into the basement, a confused mass of brick and iron, except a small portion of the south end and a small section in the northeast corner, which was over the lobby of the Post office.

The building as originally constructed had no vaults placed in it. In 1862-63, there were two vaults built of brick, on the second floor, resting upon, and supported by, the iron girders mentioned; one vault opening into the custom house rooms and the other into the depository, the latter being lined with four thicknesses of boiler-plate and chilled cast iron, making an aggregate thickness of about three inches. This inner lining, or box, was about ten feet long, six feet high and five feet wide. These vaults and lining went down into the basement, with the rest of the inside of the building, and were completely covered up in the debris. This mass of brick, mortar and iron was so hot, no water being obtainable to cool it, that no effort was made to reach it until Saturday following, the 14th inst. In the meantime a watch had been kept over it, assisted by a guard of United States* soldiers, which had been sent here at the request of the mayor of the city to hold in check any lawlessness that was feared might show itself.

On Saturday, the 14th, a gang of men was secured, and in the presence of clerks sent from the Treasury Department in Washington, the iron box of the vault was uncovered. On removing the debris, it was found that in falling one of the corners of the iron box had opened about six inches for a space of two feet. After the debris had been cleared away from the door, which was attached to this iron box, or lining, it was broken open. We then found that all the combustible contents were entirely destroyed. The coin and a few remnants of gold certificates remained. Not a book, paper or voucher of the office was left—all had been reduced to ashes. Of my tin box and contents, I found only the lock and a few scraps of melted spoons. The amount of money in the vault was about two millions of dollars. Of this about one million five hundred thousand dollars was in currency. About four hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of this sum consisted of notes of National banks, the balance being United States notes. The most of the gold coin was in bags, in an iron safe in the vault. The bags were burned up and the coins blackened. Some Mexican coin, forty thousand dollars, was on a shelf in the vault, over the safe. This coin was badly melted and mixed with silver and nickels. The coin was all gathered up and sent to the United States Mint at Philadelphia. About forty thousand dollars was re-coined, the balance cleaned and put in circulation.

The loss in the coin account was about six thousand dollars. This was caused by the destruction of coupons that had been paid

*A portion of the 5th U. S. Infantry that were sent here from Fort Leavenworth, Kas.

LAKE AND STATE STREETS.

cated in the frauds led against him, as one of the chief prosecuting officers of the Government. He acquitted himself with his usual vigor and success, cementing to a still firmer degree the confidence which General and President Grant always reposed in him. His constitution, however, which was naturally sensitive, was unable to withstand the severe strain placed upon it, and, after an eight days' illness, General Webster died at the Palmer House, March 12, 1876. The notices of his death that appeared in the daily press, together with the universal expressions of grief, and the sense in coin and were being carried in the coin account, as was the custom, until the end of the month. There were nineteen thousand dollars in gold certificates in the vault, out of which there were fragments enough recovered to get a credit of sixteen thousand eight hundred dollars. This was the only thing of a combustible kind in the vault that was recovered. How it could so happen, when coin six feet from it melted, I could never account for. I will here remark, that when clearing the debris out of the basement, there was found, about ten feet west from where the vault lay, an express-wagon load of mail matter, in bags, not in the least injured. It lay in a pile, and had been overlooked, in the darkness and haste, when taking out the mails on the night of the fire.

In the northwest corner of the room of the depository, partially protected from the direct draft of the fire, stood an old safe which we used for temporary storage of redeemed fractional currency. This floor, being over the lobby of the Post-office, remained intact. In this safe were found thirty-seven thousand one hundred and seventy-two dollars of redeemed currency, not in the least injured. On the top of this safe was a ream of large Manila wrapping paper, very little injured, but the floor under the safe was all burned out down to the brick arches.

The money saved was in

Gold coin.....	$375,903 50
Silver coin.....	5,371 61
Minor coin.....	144 83
Gold notes.....	16,800 00
Fractional currency.....	37,171 93
Total.....	$435,391 87

In the United States Treasurer's report for the years 1872-73 will be found, under the head of 'Currency destroyed,' the following items of 'Unknown denominations':

Legal-tender notes of 1869.....	$ 865,000
Legal-tender notes, new.....	135,000
Fractional currency.....	32,000
Coin certificates.....	2,200
Total.....	$1,034,200

This was an estimate of Government currency destroyed in the vault, the National bank notes destroyed being about four hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

James E. McLean, who at the time was collector of customs and depository, was responsible to the Government for the money destroyed, but Congress passed a special act relieving him of such responsibility.

The inquiry naturally arises as to how the accounts were adjusted, all the books and records of the office having been destroyed. It will be remembered that the fire occurred on Sunday night and Monday. On Saturday, after the close of business, I sent to the Treasurer at Washington a transcript of his account up to date; the other accounts were with a large number of disbursing officers of the Government, scattered throughout the West. Under instructions of the several heads of the departments at Washington, every officer having an account with this office was notified to render his account to the close of business on the 7th of October. With these accounts and a list of balances we had furnished the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st of the month, I think the accounts were all honestly adjusted, without loss to the Government. Some difficulty was experienced in adjusting the accounts of officers residing in Chicago, who had lost all of their papers; but with the accounts which had been rendered on the first of the month, the business of the seven days was, from the memory of sundry persons, and reports, finally adjusted.

James E. McLean was interested with Orville Grant, a brother of President U. S. Grant, in a leather, saddlery and harness hardware store on Lake Street. Seeing that his store would be destroyed by the fire, he got all his books of accounts and other papers from his store, brought them to the Custom House, and put them into the vault, which went down in the ruins, and all were destroyed.

The building destroyed not being large enough to accommodate the Government offices here, the Secretary of Treasury asked Congress to make an appropriation for the purchase of suitable grounds, upon which a building of sufficient capacity could be erected. Under authority granted by an act passed by Congress December 21, 1871, the Secretary of the Treasury solicited bids for such grounds. It was the desire of the Secretary to purchase the remaining portion of the block not owned by the Government, bounded by Monroe, Clark, Madison and Dearborn streets; but the owners of the property in the block placed such a price upon their property that the aggregate cost would have been over two millions of dollars for the additional land wanted. The Secretary declined their proposals, and accepted a bid for the block upon which the present new building stands, at the price of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which was paid by the writer to the several parties interested, on warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Under an act of Congress passed March 3, 1873, the ruins of the building and grounds were conveyed to the city of Chicago, in exchange for lands owned by the city on the corner of Polk Street and Fifth Avenue.

RUINS ON LAKE STREET, EAST OF STATE.

NARRATIVE OF ALONZO HANNIS.—The day preceding the night of the fire of October 9, 1871, I was on duty distributing letters for the out-going mails for the Western Division railroads. Shortly after driving home from my day's work and retiring, I was awakened by the noise of several persons passing the house, crying "Fire!" "Fire!" * * * I saw that there was to be quite a conflagration, and started for the locality where the fire was. I discovered that I might do some good by fighting the fire, and prevent it running on to Desplaines Street, between VanBuren and Harrison. I was so employed when I thought of the Post-office. It was then 11:30 o'clock. I tried each bridge on my way to the Post-office, and found that I could cross Randolph-street bridge. When I got to the Court House the cupola had commenced to burn, and several men were trying to save the Sherman House, by destroying the awnings, which had commenced to burn. On my way to the office I met many whom I knew, and I asked them why they did not try to save their property. They replied they were not afraid of being burned out, as the fire would never reach their property. When I arrived at the Post-office, I rang the night bell, which brought the watchman in response, and I was let in. I informed him (Mr. Wells) and the superintendent (Mr. David Green) that the Post-office was to share in the conflagration, and I asked him to allow me to proceed to prepare the un-mailed packages of letters for the mail bags; but the only satisfaction that I got was: "If you touch any letters without orders from headquarters, you will get your discharge." I then informed him that the gas works had burned, and remarked there would not be any light to work by. He said he would go and see how near the fire was. I thought I would also go, but something kept telling me to save the mail. So I commenced work, and during his absence I had it all prepared to be put into bags at a minute's notice. Then the order came to save the mail. This was about two o'clock. With the assistance of William Bliss, I had the western railroad mails in the sacks, locked, and thrown down stairs. By that time there was plenty of help from other clerks. At 2:30 o'clock, Colonel Wood came in, and gave the order to save all the mail that we could. Mr. Bliss and myself went into the delivery cases and secured the mail (letters) in that department, excluding all circulars and newspapers. We two were then left alone, for the order was given to leave the office in haste, as it was on fire. Three times we were called to, but I would not go until I had finished putting the letters into the bag and saw that it was locked and thrown into the lobby, from which it was afterward saved. All this time we were working by the light of the Lombard and Reynolds blocks, which were ready to fall in upon us. I made a rush for the street, fighting my way through the fire, and stumbled across a large No. 1 leather bag full of letter mail. I caught hold of the strap, and dragged the bag through the streets to Michigan Avenue, and there stood guard duty, not only over the bag of mail, but also over a wagon load of fine cutlery from some wholesale cutlery house on Lake Street, near Wabash Avenue. All this time the wind was blowing a perfect hurricane. With sand and fire, my face was black, while my eyes were red and bloodshot. I saw that the fire was cutting off my chance of escape, so I retraced my way south on Michigan Avenue, and when I arrived at the park in front of Peck Court, I saw a lady sitting upon a bundle of goods. As she had an honest look, I asked her to do me the favor of watching the bag of mail while I went to see if I could find a mail wagon. She seemed very much pleased to do me the kindness, and stood up and spread out her elegant silk dress over the bag, and remarked to me that if any one attempted to take the mail from her possession she would shoot him on the spot. I found the wagon, and at 4 p. m. was very glad to be relieved of the responsibility.

The Tribune of October 16 gives the following statement as to the Custom House and Post-office:

"Some most extraordinary revelations have been made by the fire with regard to the architecture of the Post-office and Custom-house building, which, proving to have been a sham and a fraud of the worst kind, has involved the loss of an immense sum of money. The vault in the sub-treasury office, in which Collector McLean had deposited all the funds pertaining to his department, was built upon the second story. It rested upon two iron pillars built from the basement, with two iron girders of great strength and weight connected with the wall. A third girder connected the two pillars, forming a frame work. A heavy fire-proof vault was built upon this foundation, and proved to be about the weakest in the city to resist the fierceness of the fire. There were in the vault at the time of the fire $1,500,000 in greenbacks, $300,000 in National bank notes, $225,000 in gold and $5,000 in silver; making a total of $2,130,000, of which $300,000 was in specie. In an old iron safe which was left outside the vault was deposited $55,000, consisting of mutilated bills and fractional currency. This safe was regarded with scorn and deemed unworthy of a place in the vault. But like the little fishes in the net, its insignificance saved it. When the building caught fire and burned with fervent heat, the miserable iron pillars melted, and the immense vault, with its fabulous treasure, fell to the basement, burying the insignificant safe and its mutilated contents. The specie was scattered over the basement floor, and fused with the heat. There are lumps of fused eagles valued at from $500 to $1,000 each. * * * About five-sixths of the whole amount was saved. Only one week ago $500,000 in gold and $25,000 in silver were shipped from the city. * * * This vault was only one of the frauds. The fire-proof doors of the Post-office vault, in which were stored the records, proved frail still. The hinges of the massive portals which were

BURNING OF THE COURT HOUSE.—This substantial structure stood in the midst of a square, and it was taken as a matter of course that it would be able to survive, if nothing else should be left standing around it.

"Talk about the Court House," said a leading banker, among the spectators, whose own establishment had already melted to the very foundations; "it will show to be about the only sound building on the South Side to-morrow." And yet, in another five minutes, a great burning timber, wrenched from the tumbling ruins of a LaSalle-street edifice, had been hurled in wild fury at the wooden dome of the Court House. As if a thousand slaves of the fire-king had hidden within the fatal structure, awaiting this signal, the flames seemed to leap to simultaneous life in every part of the building.

MATHIAS SCHAEFFER, the watchman in the tower of the Court House, says that he was constantly on the lookout for fire, as was his duty, and discovered the DeKoven Street light at 9:28. He was relieved at eleven o'clock by Dennis Denene, but remained in the tower. By ten o'clock, cinders and burning materials were seen flying over the South Side. The roof of the Court House caught fire five or six times before he left the building, which was at half-past one. He used two Babcock fire-extinguishers. Shavings had been left in the tower by men who had done some repairs, and the glass in some of the windows was broken. Sparks fell inside, and set fire to the room. Schaffer went down to the street about twelve o'clock, but soon returned. He believed that the men would be able to save the building. About half-past one o'clock he became convinced of the hopelessness of the struggle to save it. Schaffer called to Denene to save himself, but so rapidly did the flames spread through the tower, that the men were badly singed before they could escape. The tower appeared to be completely deluged with fire, which poured against the windows in a solid mass. It seemed to be the center of a burning furnace. Schaffer and Denene caused the Court-house bell to be rung constantly until they were driven from the tower. Schaffer thinks the bell went down at two a. m., October 9.

Mr. Sheahan says:

"Precisely at twenty minutes past two o'clock, the roof of the center building of the Court House fell in."

The Court-house bell, which so faithfully warned the people of the impending danger, and which afterward became historical, because its machinery rang the alarm until it fell, at five minutes past two, Monday morning, was purchased by the city of Jones & Co., bell-founders, of Troy, N. Y., December 3, 1862, at a cost of $3,688.66. It weighed 10,849 pounds, and measured six feet ten inches across the mouth and five feet two inches in height. After the fire it was sold to private parties, and innumerable mementoes were made of the bell-metal.

Alonzo Hannis, in his narrative, states that he crossed from the West Side, by way of Randolph-street bridge, shortly after half-past eleven. The cupola of the Court House was then on fire, and men were trying to save the Sherman House, by tearing down awnings and other combustible materials. Allowance must be made for the time consumed in the walk to the South Side, which would bring his arrival after midnight.

Henry H. Nash relates that, about twelve o'clock, he saw the fire on the South Side, north of Jackson Street. He dressed quickly, and hastened to the South Side, crossing the Madison-street bridge. The fire was then about at Madison Street, east of Franklin.

Hon. Lambert Tree, who resided on the North Side, awoke at twelve o'clock, dressed himself hastily, and crossed from his home, at the corner of Ohio and Cass streets, to his office, on the corner of LaSalle and Randolph streets. The roof and cupola of the Court House were on fire, when he reached the Court-house square—shortly after midnight.

VIEW ON MICHIGAN AVENUE.

to protect the Government records, were only affixed to a single brick. When, therefore, the walls expanded with the heat, the doors fell out, of their own weight, each hinge carrying with it the single brick which held it, while the remainder of the wall was as firm as possible. Of course, all the records were hopelessly ruined."

It must be borne in mind that the progress of the fire was not continuous. The wind carried the blazing brands far in advance of the main body of flame. Buildings a long distance ahead of the principal fire were destroyed, oftentimes, before those in the very heart of the conflagration were consumed. In many instances, where these advance fires did not wholly destroy at once, they at least served as pioneers to direct the way for the main column. Thus it was with the Chamber of Commerce, the Oriental Building and the Court House. The latter, standing isolated from other buildings, was regarded as safe, until the fiery roof and blazing cupola drove the people from the place.

MAYOR R. B. MASON reached the Court House soon after twelve o'clock. He was busily occupied giving orders from the office of the Police Commissioners, which was in the basement of the building. It was then that the mayor issued orders to Alderman J. H. Hildreth, to use powder in blowing up buildings, at about one a. m. The mayor also went to the jail, in the same basement, and ordered the prisoners removed to a place of safety. Although he knew the building was on fire, Mr. Mason remained at his post. Roswell H. Mason, his son, and Hon. H. G. Miller, were with him, but Judge Miller was called away to look after his block on Washington Street. It was not until the upper portion of the Court House was a mass of fire, and the famous bell came crashing and clanging down, that Mr. Mason sought personal safety. By this incident, we fix the instant of the falling of the bell at five minutes past two. When Mr. Mason reached the street, and looked south, along LaSalle Street, "it appeared like a furnace, all fire—the whole street being filled with flame." Washington Street presented a similar aspect. Mr. Mason hurried to Randolph Street, and, looking to the eastward for a place of escape, he found only a wall of flame. The mayor desired to reach his home, corner of Michigan Avenue and Twelfth Street, but how to do so was a problem. He proceeded north on LaSalle to Lake, and again looked to the eastward. Nothing was visible save a mighty flood of fire. He hastened to South Water Street. Everywhere fire—fire. He could not even reach Clark Street. His son accompanied him. They determined to go to the North Side, thence east to Rush-street bridge, and perchance to their home. Just then, Hon. Julian S. Rumsey, who was on his way to his home, at the northeast corner of Cass and Huron streets, on the North Side, came up. Together they tried to go through the LaSalle-street tunnel, but the thoroughfare was filled with a struggling mass of humanity. Failing in that attempt, they went to the Wells-street bridge, and crossed to the North Side.

Mr. Rumsey invited the Masons to his house, to partake of needed refreshments, but the offer was declined. Moving rapidly to the east, they reached a point near the present Criminal Court building, and inferred that the fire had attacked Wright's stables, just northeast of the State-street viaduct. The appalling outlook confounded them. Mayor Mason and his son left Mr. Rumsey, and pushed on rapidly toward Rush-street bridge, which they reached ahead of the fire. Crossing the same in safety, they hurried southward, and reached their home at half-past four.

Resuming the thread of narrative where it was temporarily dropped, in order to preserve Mayor Mason's statement intact, the reader's attention is called to the condition of the South Side at midnight.

At the Court House, as has been shown, the fire had communicated with the roof and dome several times, only to be extinguished. Finally it caught such a hold that the tower had to be abandoned. The great bell, which had been clanging fitfully all night, now kept up an incessant rattle, the machinery having been set by the keeper as he descended. The buildings on all sides were in flames, and the streets filled with ruins of fallen walls. The prisoners in the county jail, almost suffocated with smoke, ran to the doors of their cells and shook the iron bars with the strength of frenzy, uttering fearful yells and imprecations of despair, as a horrid fear that they were to be burned alive possessed them. Captain Hickey, seeing that there was no hope of saving the building, ordered the cells to be unlocked, and in a moment the released prisoners, all bareheaded, many barefooted, rushed into the street, yelling like demons. A large truck, loaded with ready-made clothing, was passing the corner of Randolph Street at the time. In an instant the ex-prisoners swarmed upon it, emptied it of its contents and fled to remote alleys and dark passages to don their plunder and disguise themselves. Not all, however, escaped. Those charged with murder, except Nealy accused of murdering a man on Canal Street, were securely handcuffed and led away between guards. Meanwhile, the bell still clanged incessantly, the flames lit up the faces of the great clock with more than noontide light, the building glowed without and within like a furnace. Some of the prisoners were taken to the North Side station, only to be forced out, as the fire reached Chicago Avenue, on Monday. Several escaped at that time. One man, charged with murder, gained his freedom, but voluntarily surrendered himself, a day or two later.

THE SPREADING OF THE FIRE.—As many as a dozen different fires were raging at once; the flames on Wells, Franklin and Market streets marched steadily toward the northeast, crossing Madison, below Wells. But before they had reached this point, the Union Bank and Oriental building were on fire, the Chamber of Commerce was seamed with flame and enveloped in smoke, the low brick block opposite the Shernan House was ablaze, and the roof of the Court House was strewn with embers, each of which sank out of sight to be succeeded by ominous puffs of pale blue smoke, slowly retreating.

One writer said :

"It was this peculiar progress of the flames which lent to the great fire a distinctive and terrible character. The flames advanced like the charges of an army. Single Uhlan skirmishes here and there far in front, then small detachments cut off the weaker and outlying forces, then well-developed battles took place around the stout buildings, which stood firm like the squares of the 'Old Guard' amid the rout at Waterloo, and finally the main body of fire came up and swept those solitary resisting eddies into the great general tide of ruin. So while the scenes in one street and at one hour might stand for those in the city generally and through the whole night, yet around each of the great buildings, as the Court House and the gigantic hotels, episodes of thrilling and peculiar interest took place."

Another writer on the Times observed :

"As early as twelve o'clock, the air of the extreme South Division was hot with the fierce breath of the conflagration. The gale blew savagely, and upon its wings were borne pelting cinders, black, driving smoke, blazing bits of timber, and glowing coals. These swept in a torrid rain over the river, drifting upon house-tops, and drying the wooden buildings along the southern terminus of Market, Franklin, Adams, Monroe and Madison streets still closer to the combustion point, for which they were already too well prepared. The houses were covered with anxious workers, and cistern streams, tubs and buckets were in constant use to subdue the flying bits of fire that were constantly clinging to shingles and cornices."

"Passing eastward over Madison-street bridge at midnight was an undertaking accompanied with the risk of suffocation; while, once across, the hot wind tore so fiercely along the thoroughfare in question as to wrench off signs and topple over sheds."

"The streets were now swarming, in this portion of the city, with the wretched people who had been driven from their homes by the fire in the West Division. A large portion of these were directing their way towards the North Side, and one of the most pitiable sequences of the continued conflagration was, that hundreds of poor families were forced, on several occasions, from the places where they had vainly hoped to find rest, after having been burnt out the night before."

The Post, in its description of the fire, published on the 17th of October, said :

"From the roof of a tall stable and warehouse to which the writer clambered, the sight was one of unparalleled sublimity and terror. He was above almost the whole fire, for the buildings in the locality were mostly wooden structures. The crowds directly under him could not be distinguished, because of the curling volumes of crimsoned smoke, through which an occasional scarlet rift could be seen. He could feel the heat and smoke and hear the maddened

Babel of sounds, and it required but little imagination to believe one's self looking over the adamantine bulwarks of hell into the bottomless pit. On the left, where two tall buildings were in a blaze, the flame piled up high over our heads, making a lurid background, against which were lined in strong relief the people on the roofs between. Fire was a strong painter and dealt in weird effects, using only black and red, and laying them boldly on. We could note the very smallest actions of these figures—a branchman wiping the sweat from his forehead and resetting his helmet; a spectator shading his eyes with his hand to peer into the fiery sea; another gesticulating wildly with clenched fist brought down on the cursing, threatening, imploring, fighting to get free. Liquor flowed like water; for the saloons were broken open and despoiled, and men on all sides were to be seen frenzied with drink. Fourth Avenue and Griswold Street [Pacific Avenue] had emptied their denizens into the throng. Ill-omened and obscene birds of night were they—villainous, debauched, pinched with misery, they flitted through the crowd, ragged, dirty, unkempt,—those negroes with stolid faces and white men who battered on the wages of shame; they glided among the mass, like hyenas in search of prey. They smashed windows with their naked hands, regardless of the wounds inflicted, and with bloody fingers rifled till and shelf and cellar, fighting viciously for the spoils of their forage. Women, hollow-eyed and brazen-faced, with filthy drapery tied over them, their clothes in tatters and their feet in trodden-over slippers, moved here and there—scolding, stealing, fighting; laughing at the beautiful and splendid crash of walls and the falling roofs. One woman was drawn out of a burning building on Adams Street three times, but rushed back, insane for the moment. Everywhere, dust, smoke, flame, heat, thunder of falling walls, crackle of fire, hissing of water, panting of engines, shouts, braying of trumpets, wind, tumult, and uproar."

The Times, in its graphic resumé, describes the scene from about one o'clock, on the South Side, as follows:

"The course of the fire was now directed almost due east for a few minutes, and Hooley's Opera-house, the Republican office, and the whole of Washington Street to Dearborn was consumed.

"Crosby's Opera-house came next in order. Renovations to the extent of $80,000 had just been instituted in this edifice, and the place was to have been re-dedicated that same night by the Thomas orchestra. The combustible nature of the building caused it to burn with astonishing rapidity, and soon its walls surged in, carrying with them, among other treasures, the contents of three mammoth piano houses and a number of art treasures, including paintings by some of the leading masters of the old and new worlds.

"The St. James Hotel was next fired. And here, at the corner of State and Madison streets, the two savage currents of fire that had parted company near the Chamber of Commerce joined hideous issue once more. The course of one of these currents has been indicated. The other had swept down Franklin, Wells and LaSalle streets to the main banks of the river, swallowing elevators, banks, trade palaces, the Briggs, Sherman, Tremont and other large hotels, Wood's Museum, the beautiful structures of Lake and Randolph streets and the entire surface comprised between Market, South Water, Washington and State streets. Many lives were known to have been lost up to this time; but in the infernal furnace into which Chicago had been turned, it was impossible to conjecture, or to dare imagine how many. The heat, more intense than anything that had ever been recorded in the annals of broad-spread conflagrations in the past, had fairly crumbled to hot dust and ashes the heaviest of building stone. Of what chance was there then of ever finding the remains of lost humanity by those who were already inquiring, with mad anxiety, for the missing ones? But all thoughts of others soon began to vanish in fears for the safety of the living. The stoutest of masonry and thickest of iron had disappeared like wax before the blast.

"Field & Leiter's magnificent store, second only in size and value of contents to one dry goods house in the land, was already in flames. The streets were fast becoming crammed with vehicles conveying away valuables, and the sidewalks were running over with jostling men and women, all in a dazed, wild strife for the salvation of self, friends, and property. The thieving horror had not yet broken out, and up to this time there had been a common noble striving to aid the sufferers and stay the march of the demonaical fire.

"But now the sensation of weary despair, mingled with a grim acceptance of crushing fate, began to be noticed in the tones and doing of the populace. Liquor had flown freely, and from its primal nerving to heroism had passed to the usual inciting to recklessness and indifference. Thieves were beginning to ply their trade, and for once found more to steal than they could carry away, and express drivers and hackmen were charging atrocious prices ere they would consent to aid in removing goods from buildings thus far unconsumed. Hundreds of poor families were being rendered homeless, presenting pictures of squalid misery most pitiable. This was the first path that like an immense wind-fall, mowed its way through the heart of the city, to the North Division on the one hand and to the lake on the other. Cracking and laughing demonaically at the ruin and misery left behind, eager for more valuable prey, the flames sped on, taking in their palm of his hand, as he pointed toward something, we could not see what. To the right, the faces in the crowd could be seen on the streets below, but not the bodies. All faces were white and up-turned, and every feature was as clearly marked as if it were part of an alabaster mask. Far away, indeed for miles around, could be seen, ringed by a circle of red light, the sea of housetops, broken by spires and tall chimneys. To the eastward was the black and angry lake.

RUINS, CORNER OF LAKE AND CLARK STREETS.

"The brute creation was crazed. The horses, maddened by heat and noise, and irritated by falling sparks, neighed and screamed with affright and anger, and roared and kicked, and bit each other, or stood with drooping tails and rigid legs, ears laid back and eyes wild with amazement, shivering as if with cold. Dogs ran hither and thither, howling dismally. When there was a full in the roaring, far-off dogs could be heard baying and cocks crowing at the unusual light. Great brown rats, with beadlike eyes, were ferreted out from under the sidewalks, by the flames, and scurried along the streets, kicked at, trampled upon, hunted down. Flocks of beautiful pigeons, so plentiful in the city, wheeled up aimlessly, circled blindly, and fell into the raging fire beneath. At a bird-fancier's store on LaSalle Street the cries of his imprisoned pets sounded like human wailings, as the suffocating flames reached them.

"The firemen labored like heroes. Grimy, dusty, hoarse, soaked to the skin—time after time they charged upon the blazing foe, only to be driven back to another position by the increasing fierceness, or to abandon their task as hopeless. Or, while hard at work, the wind would shift, a puff of smoke would come from a building behind them, followed by belching flames, and they would discover that they were outflanked. There was nothing to be done but to gather up their hose, and lash the snorting horses through the flames to a place of safety beyond.

"The people were mad. Despite the police—indeed, the police were powerless—they crowded upon frail coils of vantage, as fences and high sidewalks were propped on wooden poles, which fell beneath their weight, and hurled them, bruised and bleeding, in the dust. They stumbled over broken furniture and fell, and were trampled under foot. Seized with wild and causeless panics, they surged together, backwards and forwards, in the narrow streets, course—the track continually widening from the causes mentioned above—Farwell Hall and the elegant stone structures surrounding it, and all the newspaper offices except that of the Tribune, leaving nothing behind but the grandest ruins the world ever saw. Hundreds of the buildings destroyed by this single charge of the devastating fiend were models of architectural beauty.*

The Times stated, relative to the gale which prevailed, that "It might be of interest here to note the peculiarities of the wind currents and their effects, which were such as could only have been produced by such a conflagration as is being described. During all this time, as during the entire continuance of the fire, the wind was blowing a gale from a southwesterly direction; and, above the tops of the buildings, its course, from midnight until 4 or 5 o'clock, varied but little, not veering more than one or two points of the compass. To the observer on the street, however, traversing the thoroughfares and the alleys, the wind would seem to come from every direction. This is easily explained. New centers of intense heat were being continually formed, and the sudden rarefaction of the air in the different localities, and its consequent displacement, caused continually artificial currents, which swept around the corners and through the alleys in every direction, often with the fury of a tornado. This will account partly for the rapid widening of the tracks of devastation from their apex to the lake, as well as the phenomenon of the fire—to use a nautical phrase,—'eating into the wind.'

"All along the east side of State Street, where stood some of the loftiest marts in the city, and on Wabash and Michigan avenues, it was considered that comparative safety was insured. However, many of the dwellers on those last thoroughfares, as well as those persons who owned mercantile houses in the vicinity, took the precaution to remove large quantities of their more valuable goods to the open spaces of Dearborn Park and the 'lake front.' Here all was presumably safe. And yet this very quarter was doomed to be the converging point for the two armies of fire that had parted from each other near the gas works. The march of the northward-striding line, with its slight but steady deflection to the east, has been shown; that which hurried to the lake from the southern end of the Michigan Southern depot, had been slower in its labors, but none the less vindictively accurate in its work of ruin. It had swept from existence the shabbier structures of Third and Fourth avenues, and had crept unrelentingly onward until the De Haven Block, and the towering grandeur of the Bigelow House (on Dearborn, between Quincy and Adams) and Honoré's two massive buildings had fallen into ruin. As these three noble structures reeled to the ground, the day was fully ushered in; but in the murky sunlight, the work of devastation still held on.

"From the Bigelow House to the Academy of Design (Nos. 66 and 63 Adams Street) was less than a block. Within its walls were husbanded some of the noblest works of art America could boast. Among these were a number of paintings which had just arrived in the city, and which were intended for display at the forthcoming fall exhibition,—a new work by Bierstadt, valued at $15,000; dozens of precious pieces by leading artists of other cities; and the studios, with most of the contents, of more than twenty home painters. Rothermel's great canvas, 'The Battle of Gettysburg,' the property of the State of Pennsylvania, and the grandest historical picture in the country, was cut from its frame, and saved.

"The Palmer House fell at nearly the same time as the Academy of Design."

The hotels were, as usual, filled with guests, who having, up to two o'clock, no intimation that any danger threatened, were all soundly sleeping at that hour. There was the greatest danger—indeed, one might say almost a certainty—that many of these would perish before they could be aroused and got out of the vast buildings in which they were imprisoned. It is now believed, however, that all the occupants of the hotels—the nine-story Palmer, the seven-story Sherman, the Tremont, the Briggs, and the rest—descended in safety to the streets, whatever may have been their fate afterward. Undoubtedly many of them perished in trying to thread their way through the burning streets, unacquainted, as they were, with the geography of the city, and hindered by their attempts to save their luggage.

A writer on the Post described the scene at the firing of the Sherman House:

"The Sherman House, notwithstanding its many windows, resisted stoutly. The flames were around it and beyond, but it stood majestically, its white walls rosy and its windows bright with the reflected glare. The woodwork and roof were smoking in places, but for nearly an hour the house held good. Suddenly, a spirit of flame came from a window in the third story on the southern face; another and another followed; and soon from every window was hung out a red festoon, while great coils of black smoke twisted around the eaves, and met above the roof, where the flames were already bursting through."

W. S. Walker says:

"The scenes at the destruction of the Sherman House were marvellously thrilling. Upwards of three hundred guests were lodged there. At the time the fire approached, there were left in active charge only the night clerk and an assistant. The night clerk was a cool, energetic young man, with a remarkable fund of good sense. Of the three hundred guests, a large number were ladies, unaccompanied by male escort; and of these, five were so sick as to be confined to their beds. The clerk having, some time before, secured the valuable papers of the place, proceeded, with his assistant, to arouse every sleeper in the house. The lone women were promptly conveyed to the lake shore, and there placed in charge of policemen, who took them beyond reach of further danger. The sick ladies were placed in hacks, and were being driven away, when, followed by his assistant, and seized with a terrible suspicion, he rushed after and stopped them. Only four were there; five had certainly been recorded in the sick book of the hotel. Back into the now trembling building dashed the two men,* one snatching an ax from a fireman as he passed. Up the stairway, and through the smoke-reeking halls they groped, until the door they desired to find was reached. Two lusty blows, and in it crashed, revealing the woman half-raised in terror in the bed. It was the first intimation of the danger that she had received. A word of explanation, and she had directed them to a closet where hung a dress and a cloak of uncommonly thick stuff. A pitcher and basin, fortunately full of water, served to drench these garments and the main quilt of the bed, and in them was quickly wrapped the invalid. Portions of the soaked clothing were then thrown over their own heads; and in a space of time hardly longer than it has taken to pen this episode, those heroes had instinctively found their way through the familiar passages of the house to the street. When the writer saw them placing the fainting woman in a carriage, portions of their clothing had been burned, and the hands of one were badly scorched. A few minutes afterward, the hotel was one of the most complete wrecks of the night."

RUINS OF D. E. FISK'S STORE.

The personal experiences of guests at the Palmer House are narrated effectively in the following sketch:

NARRATIVE OF MRS. ALFRED HEBARD.—Journeying from New London, Conn., with my husband and daughter, to our home in Iowa, it was found necessary, as often before, to spend Sunday in Chicago, and all through the weary hours of October 8, 1871, we were enjoying pleasant anticipation of the rest and comfort so sure to be found at the Palmer House. Arriving late, and leaving most of our baggage at the Union depot, we were soon comfortably established at the hotel, which seemed almost like a home to us. The wind was high on Sunday morning, and kept increasing; and as we walked to church, covering our faces from the dust, my husband remarked, "How fortunate that the fire was last night instead of to-day."

* The name of the clerk was John Ulickie.

Returning from an evening service, we were told that another fire had broken out in the western part of the city, and was progressing rapidly. We immediately took the elevator to the upper story of the Palmer, saw the fire, but, deciding that it would not cross the river, descended to our rooms in the second story, to prepare for sleep. Husband and daughter soon retired; I remained up to prepare for the morrow's journey, and thus gain a little time for shopping before the departure of the train, at eleven a. m. Feeling somewhat uneasy, I frequently opened the blinds, and each time found the light in the streets increased, until every spire and dome seemed illuminated. I aroused my husband, asking him to go out and investigate once more; which he did, telling me, on his return, not to be alarmed, as there was no danger in our locality. About eleven p. m. I retired, but could not sleep, and it seemed not more than half an hour before there was a rapping at every door, and finally at ours, to which my husband responded, very coolly, "What's wanted?" "Fire, sir!" was the answer; and the same moment we were on our feet. Our daughter was awakened, toilets soon made, and no time wasted in gathering together bags and shawls, ready for departure. By this time, my husband, who had stepped out to reconnoitre, returned, saying that everyone was stirring, and that he saw gentlemen dragging their own trunks down the stairs. The clerks at the office assured him there was no immediate danger, but they thought it well enough to be prepared. Then we all went once more to the seventh story, looked in vain for any evidence that the fire was decreasing, returned to our room, picked up our parcels, including the trunk (for no porters were to be found), descended to the office, paid our bill, and sat down to watch and wait. Finally, leaving our daughter in charge of the baggage, I went with my husband into the street, and around to the rear of the building, where the fire was distinctly visible, and apparently only two blocks from us. Within the house, the perfect quiet had astonished us—every man taking care of his own, silently and rapidly, few words being spoken; only some ladies, unaccompanied by gentlemen, consulting together in whispers what they should do if compelled to leave the house. Outside we found confusion. Irish women, with beds upon their shoulders, crying noisily; children following as best they might; and all going—they knew not whither—only away from their burning homes. Evidently the Palmer House was in great danger, and it was better to leave it now than to wait; but how to remove our baggage was the next question. Once we thought we had secured a cart or wagon; but no sooner was the trunk thrown on than it was pulled off again by some one claiming a prior right, and we were glad to accept the services of two boys, who, for sufficient compensation, agreed to carry it between them; and thus we sallied forth, a little before one a. m., to reach, if possible, the house of my relative, Mr. G. S. Hubbard, on LaSalle Street, a long mile and a half from the hotel. Our boys ran at full speed, and we followed, crossing State-street bridge amid a shower of coals, driven by the furious wind from burning buildings and lumber yards, and which, seeming to be caught by an eddy, were whirled in our faces.

The crowd thickened every moment; women with babies and bundles, men with kegs of beer—all jostling, scolding, crying or swearing; and we were thankful to turn from this great thoroughfare to a more quiet street, calling to the boys to slacken their speed and give us a chance to breathe. It must have been 1:30 a. m. when we reached Mr. Hubbard's, thankful that we had, as we supposed, found a place of safety. We dismissed our boys, with $10 for their services, and, ringing for admittance, were met at the door by our friends, who were all astir—less on account of apprehension for their own safety than a desire to help others. Soon other friends of the family began to arrive, some already homeless, until the rooms were filled. The fire, meanwhile, was coming nearer; and just as we began in earnest to pack necessary things for removal, the gas works were destroyed,* and candles had to be resorted to. Every one thought that house might be saved, standing as it did on a corner, and disconnected from every other building, but we worked on through the night, preparing for the worst, and running often to the garret to see if the worst was not over. In the early morning men came, tore up carpets to cover the roof, draining both cisterns to keep the carpets wet, hoping if possible to stop the fire at that corner. Oh, how they worked! The thoughtful family provided refreshments as long as it was possible, and when all supplies were exhausted, the men labored on—panting and parched with thirst—drinking the very dregs of the cistern water, from tubs in the kitchen, as they passed through. All said, "This house will not burn!" but they might as well have tried to quench Vesuvius. The heat increased. A wooden block near by flashed into flame, and at eleven a. m. the cornice was blazing, and we were obliged to go out through the alley to escape the heat and cinders; but where to go we could not tell. From this point it is impossible for me to describe the course of our wanderings. I only know that we crossed to the west side of the river and reached some depot—I think the North-Western—in season to see the train departing, but hearing that a train on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad would leave about three p. m., we again set forth. It was a weary march of many miles after leaving LaSalle Street. Exhausted and foot-sore, we often sat on door steps and curb stones to rest—drank beer at the street corners—dropped to sleep while waiting to be served, and finally, at a little station in the outskirts of the city, in company with other refugees like ourselves, we patiently waited for the departure of the train for Aurora, where we passed the night. Strange to say, we lost nothing by the fire; the baggage at the Union depot was all moved and protected—the few things at Mr. Hubbard's were not stolen, like some of theirs, but were carefully restored to us.

And now, looking back after the lapse of nine years [this was written in 1880], the whole scene seems like a fearful dream; and yet, strange as it may seem, there are some pleasant things to be remembered; and since it was to be, I have never regretted that we were allowed to see that burning city. Having nothing of our own at stake, we could perhaps look on more coolly than some others. I remember being impressed at the time with the different phases of character so suddenly unveiled. The dear friends who so kindly sheltered us in our extremity, and who, for the last time, threw open those hospitable doors, not to friends merely, but to strangers as well—feeding the hungry, helping and sympathizing with those whose trials seemed greater than they could bear; those friends who looked on calmly as the devouring flames approached their beautiful dwelling, showing plainly that their treasure was laid up in a better country, where they looked for "a house not made with hands." Some came there, trembling and fearful, wholly broken down, as it were, with their own grief; some came professing to help—really to pilfer; but the majority were calm, earnest, resolute helpers, and if ready hands and willing feet could have availed anything, that house would have been saved. As it is, we are thankful that lives were spared, new comforts provided, and faith strengthened in Him who said, "Not as the world giveth, give I unto you."

VARIED SCENES ON THE SOUTH SIDE.—Mr. Chamberlain gives a description of the scene on Randolph Street at four o'clock Monday morning. He says:

"The noise of the crowd was nothing compared with this chaos of sound. All these things—the great, dazzling, mounting light, the crash and roar of the conflagration, and the desperate flight of the crowd—combined to make a scene of which no intelligent idea can be conveyed in words. When it became too hot on Randolph Street, I retired to the eastern approach of the bridge on that street. A knot of men had gathered there, from whom all signs of excitement had disappeared. It was then almost four o'clock, and whatever excitement we had felt during the night had passed away. Wearing with two nights of exertion, I sat upon the railing and looked down on the most appalling spectacle of the whole night. The Briggs House, the Metropolitan House, Peter Schuttler's wagon manufactory, Heath & Milligan's oil establishment (stored five stories high with exceedingly inflammable materials), the Nevada Hotel, and all the surrounding buildings, were in a simultaneous blaze. The flames, propelled by variable gusts of wind, seemed to pour down Randolph Street in a liquid torrent. Then the appearance was changed, and the fire was a mountain over our heads. The barrels of oil in Heath & Milligan's store, Nos. 170 and 172 Randolph Street, exploded with a sound like the rattling of musketry. The great north wall of the Nevada Hotel plunged inward with hardly a perceptible sound, so great was the din of the surrounding conflagration. The Garden City House (Market, corner of Madison) burned like a box of matches; the rapidity of its disappearance was remarked by everybody. Toward the east and northeast, we looked upon a surging ocean of flame. Meanwhile, a strange scene was being enacted in the street before us. A torrent of humanity was pouring over the bridge. Madison-street bridge had long before become impassable, and Randolph was the only outlet for the entire region south of it. Drays, express wagons, trucks, and conveyances of every conceivable species and size, crowded across in indiscriminate haste. Collisions happened almost every moment; and when one over-loaded wagon broke down, there were enough men at hand to drag it and its contents over the bridge by main force. The same long line of men dragging trunks was there, many of them tugging over the ground with a load that a horse would strain at. Women were there, looking exactly like those I had seen all night, staggering under weights upon their backs. * * * Now and then a stray schooner, which, for want of a tug, had been unable to escape earlier from the South Branch, came up, and the bridge must be opened. Then arose a howl of indignation along the line, which, being near, was audible above the tumult. A brig lay above us, in the stream, and the captain was often warned by the crowd that he must make his exit at once, if he wished to save his craft—a suggestion he doubtless appreciated, as he stood upon the quarter-deck, calling frantically to every tug that passed. * * * I saw an undertaker rushing over the bridge with his mournful shroud. He had taken a dray, but was unable to load all of his goods into the vehicle; so he employed half a dozen boys, gave each of them a coffin, took one himself, and headed the weird procession. The sight of those coffins, upright, and bobbing along just above the heads of the crowd, without any apparent help from anybody, was somewhat startling, and the unavoidable suggestion was that they were escaping across the river, on their own account, to be ready for use when the debris of the conflagration should be cleared away. But just as men in the midst of a devastating plague carouse over each new corpse, so we laughed merrily, with grim enjoyment of the ominous spectacle. * * * At last it became too warm to be comfortable on the east side of the river. The fire was burning along Market Street, and many were the conjectures whether Lind's Block, on the fractional block between Lake, Randolph, Market and the river, would go. The buildings opposite burned with a furnace heat, but Lind's Block remained, a monument to its own isolation. * * * Tired with my two nights' work, I joined the crowd, crossed the river, went up Canal Street, and lay down on a pile of lumber in Avery's lumber yard. My position was at the confluence of the North and South branches, directly opposite the middle of the main river, and exactly on the dock. * * * Wells-street bridge took fire, and, as something novel, attracted our listless attention, the south end of the bridge caught alight, and then the north end; but the north end burned less rapidly than the south, and soon outbalanced the latter, when, of course, the whole structure tipped to the northward, and stood fixed, one end in the water, at an angle of about sixty degrees. Then the fire communicated with the whole framework, till the bridge looked like a skeleton with ribs of fire. But presently the support underneath burned away; then the skeleton turned a complete summersault, and plunged into the river, as if seeking refuge from the flames that were consuming it.

* The gas in the mains supplied light some time after the works were destroyed, at about 12:30.

Apparent anachronisms are impossible of avoidance in this recital and in the presentation of the reminiscences of others. But, although the integral elements of the topic may be kaleidoscopic, yet the whole be as harmonious as that scientific toy. With this quasi-apology, another statement is given—that of the late James Washington Sheahan, one of the ablest journalists upon the Chicago press. Mr. Sheahan, writing of the scenes in the streets, says:

"Some were philosophical, even merry, and witnessed the loss of their own property with a calm shrug of the shoulders, although the loss was to bring upon them irremediable ruin. Others clenched their teeth together, and witnessed the sight with a sort of grim defiance. Others, who were strong men, stood in tears; and some became fairly frenzied with excitement, and rushed about in an aimless manner, doing exactly what they would not have done in their cooler moments, and almost too delirious to save their own lives from the general wreck. Of course, the utmost disorder and excitement prevailed, for nearly every one was, in some degree, demoralized, and, in the absence of both gas and water, had given up the entire city to doom. Mobs of men and women rushed wildly from street to street, screaming, gesticulating, and shouting; crossing each other's paths, and intercepting each other as if just escaped from a mad-house. The yards and sidewalks of Michigan and Wabash avenues, for a distance of two miles south of the fire limit in the South Division, were choked with household goods of every description—the contents of hovels and the contents of aristocratic residences huddled together in inextricable confusion. Elegant ladies, who hardly supposed themselves able to lift the weight of a pin cushion, astonished themselves by dragging trunks for a long distance. Some adorned themselves with all their jewelry, for the purpose of saving it, and struggled along through the crowds, perhaps only to lose it at the hands of some ruffian. Delicate girls, with red eyes and blackened faces, toiled, hour after hour, to save household goods. Poor women staggered along with their arms full of homely household wares, and mattresses on their heads, which sometimes took fire as they carried them. Every few steps along the avenues were little piles of household property, or perhaps, only a trunk, guarded by children, some of whom were weeping, and others laughing and playing. Here was a man sitting upon what he had saved, bereft of his senses, looking at the motley crowd with staring vacant eyes; here, a woman weeping and tearing her hair, and calling for her children, in utter despair; here, children, hand in hand, separated from their parents, and crying with the heart-breaking sorrow of childhood; here, a woman kneeling on the hot ground, and praying, with her crucifix before her. One family saved a coffee-pot and chest of drawers, and, raking together the falling embers in the street, were boiling their coffee as cheerily as if at home. Barrels of liquor were rolled into the street, from saloons, and men and boys drank to excess and staggered about. Some must have miserably perished in the flames. * * * Thieves pursued their profession with perfect impunity. Lake and Clark streets were rich with treasure, and hoards of thieves entered the stores and flung out goods to their fellows, who bore them away without opposition. Wabash Avenue was literally choked up with goods of every description. Every one who had been driven from the burning portion of the Division, had brought some articles with them, and been forced to drop some, or all of them. Valuable oil paintings, books, pet animals, musical instruments, toys, mirrors, bedding and useful and ornamental articles of every kind, were trampled under foot by the hurrying crowd. The streets leading southward from the fire were jammed with vehicles of every description, all driven along at top speed. Not only the goods which were deposited in the streets took fire, but wagon-loads of stuff in transit, also kindled, and the drivers were obliged to cut the traces to save their animals. There was fire overhead, everywhere—not only on the low, red clouds which rolled along the roofs, but in the air itself, filled with millions of blazing fagots, that carried destruction wherever they fell. Those who did rescue anything from the burning buildings, were obliged to defend it at the risk of their lives. Expressmen, and owners of every description of wagons, were extortionate in their demands, asking from twenty to fifty dollars for conveying a small load a few blocks. Even then there was no surety that the goods would reach their place of destination, as they were often followed by howling crowds, who would snatch the goods from the wagons. Sometimes thieves got possession of vehicles, and drove off with rich loads of dry goods, jewelry, or merchandise, to out-of-the-way places. A mere tithe of the immense treasures piled up in these palatial warehouses was saved."

The unavoidable removal of lawful restraint was quickly productive of evil results. The vicious classes held high carnival. This phase of the terrible calamity is described by Mr. Walker:

"Before daybreak, the thieves' horror had culminated in scenes of daring robbery, unparalleled in the annals of any similar disaster. In fact, earlier in the history of the flames the pilfering scoundrels had conducted operations with their usual craft and cunningness at evading observation. But, as the night wore on, and the terrors aggregated into an intensity of misery, the thieves, amateur and professional, dropped all pretences at concealment and plied their knavish calling undaunted by any fears of immediate retribution. They would storm into stores, smash away at the safes, and if, as was happily almost always the case, they failed to effect an opening, they would turn their attention to securing all of value from the stock that could conveniently be made away with, and then slouch off in search of further booty. The promise of a share in the spoils gave them the assistance of rascally express-drivers, who stood with their wagons before doors of stores, and waited as composedly for a load of stolen property to be piled in as if they were receiving the honestly-acquired goods of the best man in town. This use of the express-drivers was a double curse, in that it facilitated the abstracting of plunder, while it also took up the time of teams which might otherwise have been used by the merchants. The wagons, once heaped with the loads, were driven pell-mell through the city, adding to the dangers and the accidents of the surcharged streets, and the property was safely 'cached' in the country. Remonstrances on the part of the owners availed nothing. With no one to aid them in the preservation of their goods, or to assist in the apprehension of the villains, the merchant was compelled to stand quietly aside and see his establishment systematically cleaned out by the thieves, and then laid in ashes by the flames. Several cases occurred in which the owners of stores came to the conclusion that if their places must go and nothing could be preserved, some decent people should have the benefits accruing therefrom; they accordingly threw open their stores, and issued a loudly-delivered invitation to the crowd to hurry in and take away all they might be able to carry. The scenes of robbery were not confined to the sacking of stores. Burglars would raid into the private dwellings that lay in the track of the coming destruction, and snatch from the cupboard, bureau, trunk or mantel, anything which their practical senses told them would be of value. Interference was useless. The scoundrels hunted in squads, were inflamed with drink, and were alarmingly demonstrative in the flourishing of deadly weapons. Sometimes women and children, and not infrequently men, would be stopped as they were bearing from their homes objects of especial worth, and the articles would be torn from their grasp by gangs of these wretches.

"Reference has been made to the flow of liquor. Up to three or four o'clock in the morning there was a surprisingly small percentage of intoxicated persons to be seen in any quarter. But as the physical and mental exhaustion pressed heavier, and as the dull horror began to settle upon each soul that perhaps not one stone might be left standing upon another, the inexplicable seeking for an assuage of trouble in potent alcohol followed. Saloon-keepers rolled barrels of the poison into the street, and the owners of great liquor-houses threw open their doors to the overwrought and haggard populace. Men drank then whose lips had never before been crossed by alcohol; while those who had hitherto tasted of its Lethedraughts only on rare occasions, now gizzeted like veteran toppers. This was a new accession to the woe of the event. There were hardened women reeling through the crowds, howling ribald songs; coarse men were breaking forth with leering jokes and maudlin blasphemy; women of the highest culture tossing down glasses of raw whiskey; ladies, with under and tear begrimed faces, pressing cups with jeweled fingers; while of rich and poor, well-bred and poor, the high and low, there were few who did not seem to have been seized with the idea that tired nature must finally succumb unless some stimulant was used. All were not intoxicated. There were probably thousands who found in wine, or stronger fluids, the nerveing to new deeds of heroism and quiet bravery. But the drunken phase was a terribly prominent one, and one that entailed an awful addition to the woe of the conflagration."

THE FIRE AS SEEN FROM THE SOUTH.—A calamity of this magnitude can not be described in exact sequence of time. It becomes necessary to pause in the narrative, and take up a new thread at another point. The Post thus describes the outlook from the south:

"That a fire of considerable proportions was raging on the West Side was known at ten o'clock Sunday evening to persons residing on the South Side, but the fact created so little apprehension that people sought their beds, and many never knew the awful destruction until their usual rising hour in the morning. This, however, was not true of people living north of Twelfth Street; for long before daylight they were warned of the devastation which came upon most and threatened all. At two o'clock, a reporter of the Post ran from his residence to Polk-street bridge. The fire at that time had not crossed the river so far south, but to those residing between the river and the lake it seemed, from the flames, that the fire was immediately upon them. No one knew the extent the disaster had attained, even at that hour. No one would have believed it. From the bridge, the West Side seemed all in flames. The crowd cried, 'Is the river a barrier?' The answer came from the fire itself. It did not cross the bridge, for that had been swung open; it leaped the river at a single bound, and caught in its hot and destructive embrace the lumber yard lying south of Polk Street. So sudden was its crossing that numbers of persons standing on the approach to the bridge narrowly escaped suffocation, and saved themselves only by a hasty retreat through the hot, black smoke that already swept across the street.

"On the northwest corner of Polk and Wells streets stood the old Bridewell, which was then used as the headquarters of the First Precinct police. The buildings were of wood. In a moment they were in flames. There were twenty-five prisoners in the lockup. The keeper opened the door, and bade them run for their lives. They obeyed with fleetness—all save one, who was lying on the floor, stupidly drunk. The keeper could not rouse him.

"To Sherman and Clark, to Fourth and Third avenues, to State Street and Wabash Avenue, ran back the cry, 'The flames are upon us!' That cry of horror awoke every man to frenzied exertions, and, for blocks and blocks, the people who inhabited the houses did nothing but throw out furniture from the homes that were certain to be doomed. The gas ceased to burn, but the fierce fire furnished a ghastly light, by which every one could work. The streets were crowded by half-clad multitudes. Frightened horses were hastily harnessed into wagons, and everyone who could command a vehicle commenced to move. Hurried on by the howling wind, the flames spread northward, and swept away block upon block of the wooden tenements which were crowded into that quarter of the city; but, though the general direction of the fire was northward, yet the fierce heat, in the face of the blast, and though slowly, yet surely, gained in the south. Running down Clark to Taylor, and on Taylor to the river, the writer found himself south of the fire. From Polk Street, the flame had eaten back until it had found Gurnee's tannery (Chicago Hide and Leather Company), which, with its cords upon cords of dry bark, made a morsel that was soon devoured. On the West Side, the immense brick walls of the Chicago Dock Company's storeroom presented a formidable barrier to the further southward progress of the flames; but along the dock, the sheds were burning. The frame work seemed of harder wood than the covering. The framework, fretted with fire, looked like a golden drapery. Upon the building a stream from a single engine was pouring, but as well might one oppose the straw of a pigmy to the sword of a giant. Looking down the river Polk-street bridge was seen tumbling into the stream, which quenched its burning embers. Burning rafts floated upon the water. Tugs, with steam up, essayed to reach the brig 'Fontinella,' which was lying at the dock, near the burning tannery; twice they made the attempt, and twice fell back. A third effort was impossible. The flames boarded her, ran up the rigging, cut her loose to float from the dock, and left her a blackened hulk.

"The stone yard of the Illinois Stone Company prevented the fire running southward on the South Side, but the wooden houses on Wells Street were quickly in flames. Looking northward, the street was a fiery vista. A lot of Norwegian emigrants were grouped about; they were stupid with fear, and had to be almost forced from the street. Returning as he went, the writer reached the corner of Clark and Polk streets, where St. Peter's Catholic Church is located. To it, as to the sanctuaries in the old feudal times, the people had crowded for safety. Its portals were piled up with the Lares and Penates of many a burning home. A block across, the flames were seen running up the golden cross that topped the church of St. Louis. A moment later that church was in ashes.

"On the west of Sherman Street, running from Taylor to Polk, from Polk to Harrison, and terminating on VanBuren Street in the magnificent passenger depot, were the long freight houses of the Michigan Southern Railroad Company. Those persons who had the coolness to think, thought that these buildings would save the district east of them—a hope that could hardly be entertained in face of the fact that the massive stone passenger depot was toppling to ruin; yet these brick depots did save everything between them and the lake.

"A portion of the massive walls of the Grand Pacific Hotel was seen to tumble; and to the east and north nothing was visible but crackling ruins—nothing was heard but the roar of the flames, which sounded like the roar of the sea. It was nearly daylight. The water supply had given out, but no one dreamed that the water had ceased because, a mile and a half away, the walls of the Water Works had tumbled upon the engines. People merely supposed that the fire-engines had exhausted the supply. Even then, the man who would have predicted the burning of the North Side would have been considered a madman."

Mr. Walker says:

"The burning of the VanBuren-street bridge led to a peculiarly picturesque scene. As the fire approached its western end, the men whose duty it was to swing the structure, warned everybody to leave, by an energetic tug at the bell. They then applied the turn-levels, and, giving two or three hasty spins as a starter, darted to the South Side and squeezed through to the street. The bridge, by the impulse thus given, slowly swung open, but not in time to prevent the western end from catching fire. In a moment it was a grand fantastic frame-work of flames, and, in the eddies of the tempest and the artificial currents of heat, was kept swinging to and fro, a huge specimen of grotesque pyrotechnics, which, but for the overshadowing importance of preceding and subsequent events, would have furnished a charming theme for description."

THE WEST SIDE DURING THE FIRE.—The Tribune recites that

"Many of the people on the West Side, especially at a distance from the river, had gone to bed early on Sunday night, and knew nothing of what had transpired until some one, returning, gave them the news. In many cases, the first thing to excite comment was the stoppage of the water supply. Before long, however, trucks and teams, with fugitives and goods, reached even Western Avenue, and the people began to get an idea of the calamity. Nearly all the wells in the city were dry, because of the lack of rain, and cisterns were generally empty. Therefore, the people in the center of the West Side, north of Monroe Street, went with wash-boilers, pails, buckets and pithers to the pond in Union Park, while those further west drove to the artesian well. A new branch of industry was created, and carts drove up and down the streets, filled with casks of water. Sufferers who had friends or relatives on the West Side sought shelter with them, and every vacant house was speedily in demand. The order having been issued that there should be no fires kindled, there was an immediate demand for bread and milk and crackers, and the supply of these was rapidly exhausted. Some grocers doubled their prices on sugar and other necessities, and some of the market-men advanced the price of their meat. Several authentic cases are recorded where the rapacity of the more fortunate overcame their judgment. They compelled sufferers to pay several prices for goods that they could not do without. It is a fact for philosophers to consider that, in nearly, if not every, instance of this kind, the foolish men profited only for the time being, and then became hopelessly bankrupt, dying poor or leaving the city in disgrace. It is not pleasant to contemplate this phase of humanity, and brief allusion to it is here made, only that a comprehensive glance may be taken of the field by the reader. All classes and all conditions were to be found here.

"During Monday night, the people of the West Division naturally felt the greatest uneasiness. A high wind was still blowing, although it lulled for a moment at sunset; and there were feelings of apprehension that new fires would be set in other places, by incendiaries who were bent on plunder, or by people who were crazed at the ordeal of the past twenty-four hours and impelled by morbid fancies to deeds of fearful violence. Such cases of mental derangement were not infrequent; and as there were no means of confining this dangerous class, or of controlling the unfortunates, except where the sentiment of love, in rare instances, dominated the wills of relatives, the greatest peril menaced the dry and combustible West Side. Patrols were, therefore, organized, and a reasonably efficient guard set throughout the undestroyed sections of the city. This rule applied to the entire region, in fact; for all sane people realized the danger they were in. Extraordinary precautions were taken to extinguish fires in stores, and to exercise care with lamps and lights. There were continuous rumors of arrests and summary punishments, many of which were false, but some of which were true. This citizen-police continued for several days and nights, until the immediate peril seemed to have passed away."

The West Side fire did not extend west of Jefferson Street. It worked slowly backward east of Canal, among the lumber and coal yards of that section, gaining sure hold, from the inflammable materials, and intensity from the nature of the food that supplied it. From Clinton on the west to the river on the east, this fire ate steadily away, stopping, however, at the north side of Taylor Street. Here, also, it leaped the river, and set fire to the tan-yard of the Chicago Hide and Leather Company. Thence it burned north, till it reached the starting point of the earlier South Side fires, and east until it reached to open ground along Pacific Avenue, which was the eastern boundary of the conflagration as far north as Harrison Street.

It is again necessary to revert to the main incidents of the fire on the South Side, as recounted by the following individuals, who were personal participators in the scenes of that fearful night. In these narratives repetition may be noticed; but this is but an evidence of the verity of the narrators, as these recollections were penned without any collusion or simultaneous reference.

H. W. S. CLEVELAND'S NARRATIVE.—The following extracts from a document on file in the Historical Society collection, give a good idea of the fickleness of the flames, which, after destroying the Post-office, a supposed fire-proof building, leaped over the combustible Shepard building opposite, but only to return during Monday morning and wipe it out of existence. Mr. Cleveland narrates in detail how he endeavored to save his civil engineering tools, plans, etc., aided by a clerk in S. S. Greeley's office (which adjoined his). This man, John Newman, and Ralph Cleveland, son of the narrator, figure in the extracts, later on. The son did not go down town with the father, but preceded him. After securing sundry articles, and carrying them to Wabash Avenue, Newman started in quest of a wagon, leaving Mr. Cleveland on guard. From that point, the experience is quoted from the document referred to.

Looking west on Monroe Street from Wabash Avenue, I could see that the Honoré Block, and the Post-office, on the southwest and northwest corners of Dearborn were in flames, but could not make out whether the Shepard Building was yet on fire. The nearest point of the fire was the Palmer House, corner of State and Quincy streets, which was all in flames. Looking north on Wabash Avenue, I could see that it was all burning on the east side, north of Randolph Street, but had not yet got to the south of Randolph. The sidewalks, as far as I could see, were piled up with goods, which had been brought out from stores and houses to be ready for removal, if opportunity offered. A poor Irish woman, with a baby asleep in her arms, sat upon the sidewalk close by my pile, with her back against the wall. She looked very anxious, but was perfectly quiet, till a rough-looking fellow came up with a bottle of whisky in his hand, the neck of which he broke off against the wall, and then proceeded to dispose of the contents with three or four companions, drinking from the broken bottle. Some of the whisky was spilled upon the head of the child, and the woman looked up with an exclamation of impatience at his brutality. I thought by the looks of the men that they might give me some trouble, but they went off without other evidence of ruffianism than profanity; and this was the only instance in which I saw or heard any sign of brutality. Soon after, a horse came tearing down the avenue, with the wreck of a buggy at his heels, and I fully expected that serious mischief would ensue; but he made his way, by some means, through the crowd, and disappeared, without doing any injury that I could see. This was the only runaway I saw; and I was continually surprised at the sober, matter-of-fact way in which the horses did their work, showing no sign of alarm, notwithstanding the appearance of the streets was wholly unlike what they were accustomed to.

It must have been at least an hour and a half that I remained watching the goods, before I saw any one I knew, and the first one was Newman's friend, who had previously watched them. He came up with a smiling face to tell me that the Shepard Building was past danger; which seemed to me so absurd that I at first thought he was joking, and when he insisted on it, I set him down for a fool. Presently after, Newman appeared, and confirmed the story; which I still could not believe, though he assured me the occupants of many of the offices were carrying their things back to the rooms from which they had been taken. The crowds of people, and piles of goods in the streets, rendered it idle to attempt to get our things back to the office, and, on examining the situation, we decided to deposit them in Dr. Cushing's office. The volumes of smoke prevented our seeing any considerable distance; but Newman assured me that the Honoré Building and Bigelow Hotel, which were on the opposite side of Dearborn Street from the Shepard Building (between Monroe and Adams streets) were both destroyed; and as the Shepard was the only building on the east side, in that block, there was no longer any danger, except from such cinders as might come from the ruins, as nothing else was left on the windward side. On State Street, the Palmer House, at the corner of Quincy Street, was burned; but so far as we could see to the south, the fire had not crossed to the east side of State Street. The foundations only had yet been built of the new Palmer House at the corner of Monroe and State, and it seemed, therefore, that there was scarcely a chance that the fire could reach the point where I had so long mounted guard over our goods, so, with the permission of the janitor, we put the whole lot then in the back room, piling them carefully by themselves, and then started for the Shepard Building, little thinking we had taken our last look at them.

Making our way through the crowd, we entered the Shepard Building at the north end on Monroe Street, and on going up to my office, found Ralph quietly looking out of the window at the ruins of the Honoré Building, opposite, a large portion of the front wall of which fell into the street at that moment. Ralph told me that on first starting out, he went over to the West Side, and skirting to the windward of the fire, went north to Kinzie Street, where he crossed the bridge to the North Side, intending to cross the main river at State or Rush Street, and so come up to the office. He went as far east as Dearborn Street; but finding that the bridges were burned, and the fire running with fearful rapidity, he retraced his steps to the West Side, and then had to go south to Twelfth Street before he could cross the river. He then made his way to the Shepard Building, through Third Avenue. When he reached Jackson Street, the Bigelow Hotel and Honoré Building were both in flames; and he covered his face, and ran down the opposite side of the street to the Shepard Building, where, finding that we had carried off the things of most value, he went to work and took down the large photographs of Sarah's house from the walls, together with a fine pair of deer's horns, and my English bow and arrows which hung on them. He took all our plans (over two hundred) from the drawers, and rolled them up and tied them with the cords which he took from the pictures, carried them down, and left them with a pile of furniture, which a woman was watching on the sidewalk, and came back to the office, where we found him. On examining the situation, I saw no reason to doubt the safety of the building. The Post-office, which was the diagonally opposite corner, the Honoré Building, directly opposite, and the Bigelow Hotel, a little farther south, were all destroyed; and immediately south, on our side of the street, was a vacant lot of half a square. Nothing was left to windward of us but ruins, and though the air was hot that came from them, there seemed little chance that the fire could now reach us. It seemed so incredible, and gave me so much the feeling of a reprieved criminal, that I could hardly trust my senses; but the occupants of other offices in the building were busily at work bringing back the things they had carried away, and no one doubted that the danger was past. So, after mutual expressions of congratulation, I unstrapped my knapsack, which I had not previously taken from my shoulders, took off my old coat with its pockets full of valuables, and, leaving them on our case of drawers, went with Ralph and brought up the things he had carried down.

It was now about 7 a. m., and knowing how anxious my wife would be to hear from us, and feeling sure that I had good news to tell, I left Ralph and Newman in the office, and started for home. Remembering, however, that Mr. Thayer's office was in the Tribune Building (corner Dearborn and Madison), and wishing to assure myself of its safety by actual inspection, I made my way along Dearborn to Madison (the west side of Dearborn being all burned), and so down Madison to Wabash Avenue, and then home. The Tribune Building was then unharmed, and I supposed was past danger.

I found my family just sitting down to breakfast, which was eaten with lighter hearts for the good news I brought. Nobody knew anything about the condition of the North Side, though the opinion was unanimous that it must be swept clean, if the fire crossed the river. There was a rumor that the Water Works were destroyed and the whole North Side, but no one could tell what was truth and what was rumor. After breakfast, I prepared to return, and found that the fire was raging on the north side of Harrison Street, between Wabash Avenue and State Street, and on both sides of the avenue as far as I could see. I went to try to ascertain the fate of the Shepard Building. As I could not go through Harrison Street on account of the fire, I went south to Peck Court, and then west, through Polk Street, to Third Avenue. Tried there to go north, but could not go beyond Harrison. I managed to go one square west on Harrison to Fourth Avenue, which was burnt so clean on both sides that I could traverse it without difficulty, except that the smoke and hot air were at times very disagreeable. I could see but a little way. I reached VanBuren Street and then went east to Third Avenue, as Fourth was too fiery to admit further passage. On VanBuren Street, I first saw the effect of the fire on the wooden pavements, which in places had been burned in alternate little ridges and gutters not more than half an inch in depth. The pavement had nowhere sustained any serious injury, and much of it was not even scorched. From VanBuren Street I went, through Third Avenue and Adams Street, to Dearborn; and it was not till I reached that point that I could see that nothing remained of the Shepard Building but some fragments of the walls. I could go no further, and started back through Third Avenue. I presently met two men who asked me if they could get through, and seemed to think I had come from unknown depths of the furnace before them. These were the only living beings I saw from the time I entered the burned district till I emerged again on Harrison Street, and the solitude seemed to render the desolation more impressive. Ralph made his appearance at dinner time, and reported that, after I left them, he and Newman stationed themselves at a window at the south end of the building to watch for cinders, as it was only from that quarter they apprehended danger. But it seems that the fire crept upon them unawares from the leeward side, and the first they knew of its approach was seeing flames darting through the windows at the northern end. They could not even get down the stairs at that end, but had barely time to run into the office, where Ralph seized a roll of plans, and he and Newman together took a trunk between them, and ran down and out at the door on Dearborn Street, and then across the street to the alley behind the walls of the Post-office, where they were kept prisoners, and half suffocated with the smoke and heat for nearly two hours before they could make their escape, which they finally did by covering their faces and running out through Monroe and Clark streets, leaving the things they had saved, which they recovered some hours afterward.

STATEMENT OF EX-LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR BROSS.—About two o'clock on Monday morning, my family and I were aroused by Mrs. Samuel Bowles, wife of the editor and proprietor of the Springfield Republican, who happened to be our guest. We had all gone to bed very tired the night before, and had slept so soundly that we were unaware of the conflagration till it had assumed terrible force. My family were very much alarmed at the glare which illuminated the sky and the lake. I saw that a dreadful disaster was impending over Chicago, and immediately left the house to determine the locality and extent of the fire. I found that it was then a good deal south of my house, and west of the Michigan Southern and Rock Island Railroad depots. I went home considerably re-assured, in half an hour; and finding my family packing, told them that I did not anticipate danger, and requested them to leave it off. But I said, "The result of this night's work will be awful. At least ten thousand people will want breakfast in the morning; you prepare breakfast for one hundred." This they proceeded to do, but soon became alarmed and re-commenced packing. Soon after half-past two o'clock, I started for the Tribune office, to see if it was in danger. By this time the fire had crossed the South Branch of the river, and that portion of the city south of Harrison Street, between Third Avenue and the river, seemed a blaze of fire, as well as on the West Side. I reached the Tribune office, and, seeing no cause for apprehension, did not remain there more than twenty minutes. On leaving the office, I proceeded to the Nevada Hotel (which is my property), corner of Washington and Franklin streets. I remained there for an hour, watching the progress of the flames and contemplating the destruction going on around. The fire had passed east of the hotel, and I hoped that the building was safe; but it soon began to extend in a westerly direction, and the hotel was quickly enveloped in flames. I became seriously alarmed, and ran north on Franklin Street to Randolph, so as to head off the flames and get back to my house, which was on Michigan Avenue, on the shore of the lake. My house was a part of almost the last block burned [in Terrace Row].

At this time the fire was the most grandly magnificent scene that one can conceive. The Court House, Post-office, Farwell Hall, Tremont House, Sherman House, and all the splendid buildings on LaSalle and Wells streets, were burning with a sublimity of effect which awed me. All the adjectives in the language would fail to convey the intensity of its wonders. Crowds of men, women and children were huddling away, running first in one direction, then in another, shouting and crying in their terror, and trying to save anything they could lay their hands on, no matter how trivial in value; while every now and then explosions, which seemed almost to shake the solid earth, would reverberate through the air, and add to the terrors of the poor people. I crossed Lake-street bridge to the west, ran north to Kinzie-street bridge, and crossed over east to the North Side, hoping to head off the fire. It had, however, already swept north of me, and was traveling faster than I could go, and I soon came to the conclusion that it would be impossible for me to get east in that direction. I accordingly re-crossed Kinzie-street bridge, and went west as far as Desplaines Street, where I fortunately met a gentleman in a buggy, who very kindly drove me, over Twelfth-street bridge, to my house on Michigan Avenue. It was by this time getting on toward five o'clock, and the day was beginning to break. On my arrival home I found my horses already harnessed, and my riding-horse saddled for me. My family and friends were busily engaged in packing, and in distributing sandwiches and coffee to all who wanted them, or could spare a minute to partake of them.

I immediately jumped on my horse, and rode as fast as I could to the Tribune office. I found everything safe; the men were all there, and we fondly hoped that all danger was past, as far as we were concerned—and for this reason, the blocks in front of the Tribune building on Dearborn Street, and north on Madison Street, had both been burned, the only damage accruing to us being confined to a cracking of some of the plate-glass windows from the heat. But a somewhat curious incident soon set us all in a state of excitement. The fire had, unknown to us, crawled under the sidewalk from the wooden pavement, and caught the wood-work of the barber's shop, which comprised a portion of our basement. As soon as we ascertained the extent of the mischief, we no longer apprehended any special danger, believing, as we did, that the building was fire-proof. My associates, Mr. Medill and Mr. White, were present, and, with the help of some of our employes, we went to work with water and one of Babcock's fire-extinguishers. The fire was soon put out, and we once more returned to business. The forms had been sent down stairs, and I ordered our foreman, Mr. Kahler, to get all the pressmen together, in order to issue the paper as soon as a paragraph showing how far the fire had then extended could be prepared and inserted. Many kind friends gathered around the office, and warmly expressed their gratification at the preservation of our building. Believing all things safe, I again mounted my horse, and rode south on State Street, to see what progress the fire was making, and if it were moving eastward on Dearborn Street. To my great surprise and horror, I found that its current had taken an easterly direction, nearly as far as State Street, and that it was also advancing in a northerly direction with terrible swiftness and power. I saw the danger so imminently threatening us, and with some friends endeavored to obtain a quantity of powder for the purpose of blowing up buildings south of the Palmer House. Failing in finding any powder, I saw the only thing to do was to tear them down. I proceeded to Church's hardware store, procured about a dozen heavy axes, and handing them to my friends, requested them to mount the buildings with me and literally chop them down. All but two or three seemed utterly paralyzed at this unexpected change in the course of the fire; and even these, seeing the others stand back, were unwilling to make the effort alone. At this moment, I saw that some wooden buildings and a new brick house west of the Palmer House had already caught fire. I knew at a glance that the Tribune building was doomed, and I rode back to the office and told them that nothing more could be done to save the building, McVicker's Theatre, or anything else in that vicinity. In this hopeless frame of mind, I rode home to look after my residence and family, intently watching the ominous eastward movement of the flames. I set to work, with my family and friends, to move as much of my furniture as possible, across the narrow park east of Michigan Avenue, on to the shore of the lake, a distance of some three hundred feet.

Following out the idea that each citizen should give the incidents happening to himself or under his own observation, I mention that never did friends toil more loyally than ours did for us. They saved most of our books, furniture, pictures, etc., that were left to us. Some, that were not friends, helped themselves to whatever struck their fancy, when opportunity offered. My coachman filled my buggy with some harness, a bag of coffee and other articles, and left it with his friends on the lake shore. Some one coming along and finding it was my "plunder," said he knew me; would put some more goods in to take home, and return the buggy to me. That was the last I ever heard of the buggy or anything that was in it. My daughter supposed that I had hired an express wagon that stood at the door, and I supposed that she had. We filled it full of goods and furniture, among other things, a valuable picture—a farm and animal scene—by Herring, the great English painter. The driver slipped off in the crowd, and that was the last we heard of that picture or any part of the load. I met a man at my door, looking decidedly corpulent. "My friend," said I, "you have on a considerable invoice of my clothes, with the hunting suit outside. Well, go along, you might as well have them as to let them burn." These were slight affairs compared with what many others suffered by the thieving crowd.

I sent my family to the house of some friends in the south part of the city for safety; my daughter, Miss Jessie Bross, was the last to leave us.

The work of carrying the furniture across the avenue to the shore was most difficult and even dangerous. For six or eight hours Michigan Avenue was jammed with every description of vehicle, containing families escaping from the city, or baggage wagons laden with goods and furniture. The sidewalks were crowded with men, women and children, all carrying something. Some of the things saved and carried away were valueless. One woman carrying an empty bird cage; another, an old work box; another, some dirty, empty baskets. Old, useless bedding, anything that could be hurriedly snatched up, seemed to have been carried away without judgment or forethought. In the meantime the fire had lapped up the Palmer House, the theatres, and the Tribune Building; and contrary to our expectations, for we thought the current of fire had passed my residence, judging from the direction of the wind, we saw, by the advancing clouds of dense black smoke and the rapidly approaching flames, that we were in imminent peril. The fire had already worked so far south and east as to attack the stables in the rear of Terrace Row, between VanBuren and Congress streets. Many friends rushed into the houses in the block, and helped to carry out heavy furniture, such as pianos and bookcases. We succeeded in carrying the bulk of it to the shore. There I sat with a few others by our household goods, calmly awaiting the destruction of our property—one of the most splendid blocks in Chicago. The eleven fine houses which composed the block were occupied by Denton Gurney, Peter L. Voe, Mrs. Humphreys (owned by Mrs. Walker), William Bross, P. F. W. Peck, S. C. Griggs, Tuthill King, Judge H. T. Dickey, Isaac Cook, John L. Clark, and the Hon. J. Y. Scammon.

Having got out all we could, about 11 a. m. of Monday, the 9th, I sat down by my goods, which were piled up indiscriminately on the lake shore. Soon I saw the angry flames bursting from my home. Quickly and grandly they wrapped up the whole block, and away it floated in black clouds over Lake Michigan.

Early in the afternoon we began to send our goods south by teams, and by sun-down all that we had been able to save was distributed among friends south of Twelfth Street. In the evening, my little family of three came together at the house of E. L. Jansen, No. 607 Wabash Avenue, Mrs. Bross's brother, where we remained until most kindly relieved by Dr. Edmund Andrews and family. There was very little sleep that (Monday) night, for everybody was in mortal fear that what remained of the city would be burned by the desperadoes who were known to be prowling about everywhere.

The next morning I was out early, and found the streets thronged with people moving in all directions. To me the sight of the ruin, though so sad, was wonderful—giving one a most peculiar sensation, as it was wrought in so short a space of time. It was the destruction of the entire business portion of one of the greatest cities in the world! Every bank and insurance office, law offices, hotels, theatres, railroad depots, most of the churches, and many of the principal residences of the city, a charred mass—property almost beyond estimate gone.

Mr. White, like myself, had been burned out of house and home. He had removed with his family to a place of safety, and

I had no idea where he or any one else connected with the Tribune office might be found. My first point to make was naturally the site of our late office; but, before I reached it, I met two former tenants of our building, who told me that there was a job printing office on Randolph Street, on the West Side, that could probably be bought. I immediately started for the West Side, and, while making my way through the crowd over the Madison-street bridge, desolation stared me in the face at every step, and yet I was much struck with the tone and temper of the people. On all sides I saw evidences of true Chicago spirit, and men said to one another, "Cheer up; we'll be all right again before long," and many other plucky things. Their courage was wonderful. Every one was bright, cheerful, pleasant, hopeful, and even inclined to be jolly, in spite of the misery and destitution which surrounded them, and which they shared. One and all said, "Chicago must and shall be rebuilt at once." On reaching Canal Street, on my way to purchase the printing office I had heard of, I was informed that while Mr. White and I were saving our families, on Monday afternoon, Mr. Medill, seeing that the Tribune office must inevitably be burned, had sought for and purchased Edwards's job printing office, No. 15 Canal Street, where he was then busy organizing things. When I arrived there I found Mr. Medill in the upper stories among the types and printers, doing all he could to get ready to issue a paper in the morning. I saw at a glance that my work was below. The basement and main floor were filled with boards and boxes and rubbish, and these must be cleaned out at once. I placed a gang of men, under the command of our cashier, to clear out the main floor, and another gang, under a boss, to clear out the basement to receive a load of paper. I then went foraging for brooms, but the market was bare of the article, and I borrowed some of a neighbor. Seeing that business was going on lively, my next duty was to get up four stoves. For these I started west on Randolph Street, but every store had sold out, till I got to the corner of Halsted Street. I found here the four I wanted—price, $16 each. I told the owner I wanted all his men to go to work at once to get the pipe ready; but fearing if he did not know who had bought them, somebody with cash in hand might "jump my claim," I told him they were for the Tribune Company; that we had plenty of money in our vault and in the bank, and as soon as we could get at it he should have his pay. "I don't know about dat," said the worthy Teuton, "I guess I must have de money for dem stoves." The thing amused me at the rapid change the fire had wrought. On Saturday our note would have been good for $100,000, and on Tuesday we could not buy four stoves and the fixtures on credit. In the best of humor, I told him to come with me and measure the height of the holes for the pipe in the chimneys, and before he could get the articles ready he should have his money. This he did; and then my first question, half joke, half earnest, to every friend I met was, "Have you got any money?" The tenth man, perhaps, Honorable Edward Cowles, of Cleveland, Ohio, said, "Yes, how much do you want?" "All you can spare"; and he handed me $60. Not enough for the stove genius; but I walked rapidly to his den, shook the greenbacks at him, and told him to hurry up, for I'd soon have the balance. Came back to our office and found a dozen or more of our leading citizens, all "strapped," like myself, till at last E. S. Wadsworth, Esq., handed me $100. Messrs. Cowles and Wadsworth, therefore, furnished the cash capital to start the Tribune the next day after the fire. But money soon began to flow in. Between three and four o'clock, our clerk, Mr. Lowell, came to me and said, "There are some people here with advertisements for lost friends." I said, "Take them and the cash, registering in your memorandum book"; and upon a dirty old box on the window-sill for a desk, the Tribune at once commenced doing a lively business. A gentleman called me by name and said, "I haven't a morsel of food for my wife and children to-night, and not a cent to buy any; may I paint 'Tribune' over your door?" It was soon done—bill, $3.75. And thus a family was provided for, that night at least, and another citizen started in business. By four p. m., the stoves were up; Mr. White was duly installed with the editors in the rear of the main floor; the clerks were taking advertisements; the paper was soon after going into the basement; arrangements were made to print on the Journal press; our next council was called; a list of materials made out, and it was agreed that I should start for Buffalo and New York that evening to get them. I hurried home, got my satchel—also, clean linen was not to be had—and back to the office. About eight, I took the middle of Canal Street, and went south to Twelfth, thence east to Clark, and thence south to Sixteenth, and just saw the cars moving away. Nothing was to be done but to return to 607 Wabash Avenue. I have mentioned my route thus particularly, to add that this was one of the most lonely and fearful tramps of my life. No street lamps, few people in the streets, and there were good reasons to give them as wide a berth as possible. Another sleepless night; and in the morning, as I sat sipping my coffee over some cold ham, I saw Sheridan's boys, with knapsack and musket, march proudly by.* Never did deeper emotions of joy overcome me. Thank God, those most dear to me, and the city as well, are safe; and I hurried away to the train. Had it not been for General Sheridan's prompt, bold and patriotic action, I verily believe what was left of the city would have been nearly, if not quite entirely, destroyed by the cut-throats and vagabonds who flocked here like vultures from every point of the compass.

Some few incidents are inserted here to show how terrible was the fire. When it had reached the business center of the city, it ceased to be governed by any of the ordinary rules that are commonly attendant upon even great fires, as the terms are usually understood. In places, the heat could only be compared to that from the combustion of oxygen and hydrogen by means of the blow-pipe. In places it would strike great iron columns nearly two feet square, and for four or five feet, perhaps more, the iron would be all burned up. No residuum would be left. Sometimes car wheels standing on the track would be half-burned up. Safes, if exposed to these jets of heat, were of no account whatever. George Smith, banker, told me that they had standing in a back office a large safe full of ledgers and other books. That safe and its contents were all burned. Not a vestige of it remained to mark where it stood. Many safes that stood where brick walls soon fell on, and protected, them were all right, and as usual the manufacturers made a great noise about them; but in no case that I heard of, if they stood in exposed positions, were their contents preserved. Brick vaults, with safes inside, were all right. The Tribune vault, among other things, had a linen coat and a box of matches inside, which were not injured, and the painted figures on the safe door were not even blistered. It should be added that the vault was near the center of the building, north and south, and was protected by the south as well as its own walls. Some of the freaks of the fire are scarcely credible. Very reliable gentlemen reported that they saw jets of flame dart across an entire block, and in an instant envelop the building it struck in a winding sheet of lurid flame. The heat of the burning city was felt far away on the lake; and I have been assured by gentlemen, on whose word I place implicit confidence, that so hot was the wind over at Holland, Mich., a hundred miles or more northeast of Chicago, that some parties there, on the afternoon of Monday, were obliged to get down behind a hedge, and let the scorching blasts pass over them. They were unable then to account for the heat, and greatly feared that the time had come when "the earth and all things therein would be burned up."

HORACE WHITE'S EXPERIENCE.—Among the severest sufferers by the general calamity was Mr. Horace White, at that time editor of the Tribune, now of the New York Evening Post, who lost, besides other property, his elegant home on Michigan Avenue, containing a remarkably select and scholarly library, which was valued at over $25,000. Mr. White, on discovering that the fire was one of unusual magnitude, arose from his bed for the purpose of going to the Tribune office. He thus describes the scenes which met him as he passed out upon the street:

Billows of fire were rolling over the business palaces of the city, and swallowing up their contents. Walls were falling so fast that the quaking of the ground under our feet was scarcely noticed, so continuous was the reverberation. Sober men and women were hurrying through the streets from the burning quarter—some with bundles of clothing on their shoulders; others, dragging trunks along the sidewalk by means of strings and ropes fastened to the handles, children trudging by their sides or borne in their arms. Now and then a sick man or woman would be observed, half concealed in a mattress doubled up and borne by two men. Drives of horses were in the streets, moving under some sort of guidance to a place of safety. Vehicles of all descriptions were hurrying to and fro, some laden with trunks and bundles, and others seeking similar loads and immediately finding them, the drivers making more money in one hour than they were used to see in a week or a month. Everybody in this quarter was hurrying toward the lake shore. All the streets crossing that part of Michigan Avenue which fronts on the lake (on which my own residence stood) were crowded with fugitives hastening toward the blessed water.

Remaining at the office of the Tribune a short time, Mr. White went home to breakfast, noticing as he went that the employes of Messrs. Field, Leiter & Co.'s immense dry goods store were showering that massive pile of pure marble and iron with water from their own pumping engines. He felt sure that that building, as well as the Tribune, First National Bank, and Illinois Central Railroad depot would, with everything to the east of them, be reserved from destruction by the flames. Mr. White's narrative continues:

* As has before been stated, the "boys in blue," whom General Sheridan telegraphed for, were companies of the 5th United States Infantry, then commanded by Colonel Nelson A. Miles—now Brigadier-General—and stationed at Fort Leavenworth. Immediately on receipt of the dispatch, the companies were placed on the cars, and rushed through to Chicago. Governor Bloss is not the only one of our citizens who, in that fearful time, thanked God when the solid mass of blue coats and glittering muskets represented the barrier to the mob that these companies did—giving definite assurance of the might of the law in every gun and in every soldier.

There was still a mass of fire to the southwest, in the direction whence it originally came, but as the engines were all down there, and the buildings small and low, I felt sure that the firemen would manage it. As soon as I had swallowed a cup of coffee, and communicated to my family the facts that I had gathered, I started out to see the end of the battle. Reaching State Street, I glanced down to Field, Leiter & Co.'s store, and to my surprise, noticed that the streams of water, which had before been showering it as though it had been a great artificial fountain, had ceased to run. But I did not conjecture the awful reality—namely, that the great pumping engines had been disabled by a burning roof falling upon them. I thought that perhaps the firemen on the store had discontinued their efforts because the danger was over. But why were men carrying out goods from the lower story? This query was soon answered by a gentleman who asked me if I had heard that the water had stopped. The awful truth was here! The pumping engines were disabled; and though we had at our feet a basin sixty miles wide by three hundred and sixty feet deep, all full of clear green water, we could not lift enough to quench a cooking-stove. Still the direction of the wind was such that I thought the remaining fire would not cross State Street, nor reach the residences on Wabash and Michigan avenues and the terrified people on the lake shore. I determined to go down to the black cloud of smoke which was rising away to the southwest, the course of which could not be discovered on account of the height of the intervening buildings, but thought it most prudent to go home again and tell my wife to get the family wearing apparel in readiness for moving. I found that she had already done so. I then hurried toward the black cloud, some ten squares distant, and there found the rows of wooden houses on Third and Fourth avenues falling like ripe wheat before a reaper. At a glance I perceived that all was lost in our quarter of the city, and I conjectured that the Tribune building was doomed too, for I had noticed, with consternation, that the fire-proof Post-office had been completely gutted, notwithstanding it was detached from other buildings. The Tribune was fitted into a niche, one side of which consisted of a wholesale stationery store, and the other of McVicker's Theater. But there was now no time to think of property. Life was in danger. The lives of those most dear to me depended upon their getting out of our house, out of our street, through an infernal gorge of horses, wagons, men, women, children, trunks, and plunder. My brother was with me, and we seized the first empty wagon we could find, pinning the horse by the head. A hasty talk with the driver disclosed that we could have his establishment for one load for twenty dollars. I had not expected to get him for less than a hundred, unless we should take him by force, and this was a bad time for a fight. He approved himself a muscular as well as a faithful fellow, and I shall always be glad that I avoided a personal difficulty with him. One peculiarity of the situation was that nobody could get a team without ready money. I had not thought of this when I was revolving in my mind an offer of one hundred dollars, which were more greenbacks than our whole family could put up if our lives had depended on the issue. This driver had divined that, as all the banks were burned, a check on the Commercial National would not carry him very far, even though it should carry me to a place of safety. All the drivers had divined the same. Every man who had anything to sell had perceived the same. "Pay as you go" had become the watchword of the hour. Never was there a community so hastily and completely emancipated from the evils of the credit system.

A quantity of trunks and odd articles was thrown into the wagon; and Mr. White, taking in his hand a cage, containing what he calls "a talented parrot"—the family pet—left his brother and wife to prepare the next load, and started off for a friend's house, half-a-mile to the southward. They were an hour or more on the way, owing to the jam, and were at one time deterred by a howling German, who declared that he had lost everything, and others ought to do the same.

Presently [as the narrative continues] the jam began to move, and we got on perhaps twenty paces, and stuck fast again. By accident, we had edged over to the east side of the street, and nothing but a board fence separated us from Lake Park, a strip of made ground a little wider than the street itself. A benevolent laborer, on the park side of the fence, pulled a loose post out of the ground, and with this for a caput, knocked off the boards, and invited us to pass through. It was a hazardous undertaking, as we had to drive diagonally over a raised sidewalk, but we thought it was best to risk it. Our horse mounted, and gave us a jerk which nearly threw us off the seat, and sent the provision basket and one bundle of clothing whirling into the dirt. The etables were irrevocable. The bundle was rescued, with two or three pounds of butter plastered upon it. We started again; and here our parrot broke out with great rapidity and sharpness of utterance, "Get up, get up, get up; hurry up, hurry up; it's eight o'clock", ending with a shrill whistle. These ejaculations frightened a pair of horses close to us, on the other side of the fence, but the jam was so tight that they couldn't run. By getting into the park, we succeeded in advancing two squares without impediment, and might have gone farther, had we not come upon an excavation which the public authorities had recently made.

This drove us back to the avenue, where another battering ram made a gap for us, at the intersection of VanBuren Street, the north end of Michigan Terrace. Here the gorge seemed impassable. We were half an hour reaching the Terrace. From this imposing row of residences, the millionaires were dragging their trunks and their bundles; and yet there was no panic, no frenzy, no boisterousness, but only the haste which the situation authorized. * * * Arriving at Eldrede Court, I turned into Wabash Avenue, where the crowd was thinner. Arriving at the house of a friend, who was on the windward side of the fire, I tumbled off my load and started back to get another. Half way down Michigan Avenue, which was perceptibly easier to move in, I discovered my family on the sidewalk, with their arms full of light household effects. My wife told me that the house was already burned; that the flames burst out, ready-made, in the rear hall, before she knew that the roof had been scorched; and that one of the servants, who had disobeyed orders in her eagerness to save some article, had got singed, though not burned, in coming out. My wife, and mother, and all the rest, were begrimed with dirt and smoke, like blackamoors—everybody was. The "bloated aristocrats" all along the street, who supposed they had lost both home and fortune at one swoop, was a sorry, but not despairing, congregation. They had saved their lives at all events, and they knew that many of their fellow creatures must have lost theirs. I saw a great many kindly acts done as we moved along. The poor helped the rich, and the rich helped the poor (if anybody could be called rich at such a time) to get on with their loads. * * * Presently, we heard loud detonations, and a rumor went around that buildings were being blown up with gunpowder. The depot of the Hazard Powder Company was situated at Brighton, seven or eight miles from the nearest point of the fire. At what time an effort was first made to reach this magazine, and bring powder into the service, I have not learned; but I know that Colonel Marcus C. Stearns made heroic efforts, with his great lime-wagons, to haul the explosive material to the proper point. This is no time to blame anybody, but, in truth, there was no directing head on the ground. Everybody was asking everybody else to pull down buildings. There were no hooks, no ropes, no axes. * * * I had met General Sheridan on the street in front of the Post-office two hours before. He had been trying to save the army records, including his own invaluable papers relating to the War of the Rebellion. He told me that they were all lost, and then added that the Post-office didn't seem to make a good fire. This was when we supposed the row of fire-proof buildings, already spoken of, had stopped the flames in our quarter. Where was General Sheridan now? everybody asked. Why didn't he do something when everybody else had failed? Presently, a rumor went around that Sheridan was handling the gunpowder; then everybody felt relieved. The reverberations of the powder, whoever was handling it, gave us all heart again. Think of a people feeling encouraged by the fact that somebody was blowing up houses in the midst of the city, and that a shower of bricks was very likely to come down on their heads.

The experience of Mr. White and his family was perhaps the average of that of the wealthier classes of the South Division. The experiences of the same classes in the North Division, as narrated by Judge Tree, I. N. Arnold, and others, was much rougher. How much more so with numerous poor families, who had no twenty dollars to give the grasping cart men.

ALEXANDER FREAR, a New York alderman, seems to have seen as much of the fire as any other person in the city; and he tells his adventures in a straightforward way, and very graphically. The beginning of the narrative finds Mr. Frear upon the west side of the river, endeavoring to comfort his brother's wife, the brother being absent from the city, by assuring her, what proved to be a fact, that her house on Ewing Street would not be touched by the flames. Nevertheless, she would not be satisfied until her goods and children had been sent to the house of a friend on Wabash Avenue. Then the anxious mother had to follow in a coach, with her satchel full of valuables in her hand. After a hard drive, by a roundabout route, they were stopped by the jam at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Washington Street. The narrative proceeds:

In the great confusion it was difficult to get any information; but I was told that the block in which the Kimballs lived, the refuge of Mrs. Frear's children, was burning, and that the people were all out. To add to my distress, Mrs. Frear jumped out of the vehicle, and started to run in the direction of the fire. Nothing, I am satisfied, saved her from being crushed to death, in a mad attempt to find her children but the providential appearance of an acquaintance, who told her that the children were all safe at the St. James Hotel. * * * I found that Mrs. Frear's acquaintance had either intentionally or unintentionally deceived her. The children were not in the house. When I informed her of it she fainted. When she was being taken up stairs to the parlor, I found she had lost her satchel. Whether it was left in the cab when she jumped out, or was stolen in the house, I can not say. It contained two gold watches, several pins and drops of value, a cameo presented to her by Mrs. Stephen A. Douglas, a medal of honor belonging to her husband, who was an officer in the First Wisconsin Volunteers during the war, and about two hundred dollars in bills and currency stamps, besides several trinkets of trifling value.

Leaving his charge in care of some ladies, Mr. Frear proceeded in search of the children. He went to the Sherman House, where all was panic.

I looked out [he says] of one of the south windows of the house, and shall never forget the terribly magnificent sight I saw. The Court-house Park was filled with people, who appeared to be huddled together in a solid mass, helpless and astounded. The whole air was filled with falling cinders, and it looked like a snow storm lit up by colored fire. The weird effect of the glare, and the scintillating light upon this vast, silent concourse, was almost frightful. While in the corridor of the Sherman House, I encountered my nephew, and he asked me if I wanted to see the fire, saying he had one of George Garrison's horses, and only wanted a rubber blanket to throw over him to protect him from the sparks. I told him about Mrs. Frear, but he thought there was no reason to worry. He got a blanket from somewhere, and we started off in a light wagon for Wabash Avenue, stopping at Wright's, under the Opera House, to get a drink of coffee, which I needed very much. There were several of the firemen of the "Little Giant" in there. One of the men was bathing his head with whisky from a flask. They declared that the Fire Department had given up, overworked, and that they could do nothing more. While we stood there, an Irish girl was brought in, with her dress nearly all burnt from her person. It had caught on the Court-house steps, from a cinder. When we went out a man in his shirt sleeves was unhitching the horse; and when we came up, he sprang into the wagon, and would have driven off in spite of us, if I had not caught the horse by the head. He then sprang out, and struck my nephew in the face, and ran toward State Street.

We drove as rapidly as we could into Wabash Avenue, the wind sweeping the embers after us in furious waves. We passed a broken-down steamer in the middle of the roadway. The avenue was a scene of desolation. The storm of falling fire seemed to increase every second, and it was as much as we could do to protect ourselves from the burning rain, and guide the horse through the flying people and hurrying vehicles. Looking back through Washington Street, toward the Opera House, I saw the smoke and flames pouring out of State Street, from the very point we had just left, and the intervening space was filled with the whirling embers that beat against the houses and covered the roofs and window-sills. It seemed like a tornado of fire. To add to the terror, animals, burnt and infuriated by the cinders, darted through the streets, regardless of all human obstacles. Wabash Avenue was burning as far down as Adams Street. The flames from the houses on the west side reached in a diagonal arch quite across the street, and occasionally the wind would lift the great body of flame, detach it entirely from the burning buildings, and hurl it with terrific force far ahead. All the mansions were being emptied, with the greatest disorder and excitement. Nobody endeavored to stay the flames now. A mob of men and women, all screaming and shouting, ran about wildly, crossing each other's paths, and intercepting each other, as if deranged. We tried to force our way along the Avenue, which was already littered with costly furniture, some of it burning in the streets under the falling sparks; but it was next to impossible. Twice we were accosted by gentlemen with pocket-books in their hands, and asked to carry away to places of safety some valuable property. Much as we may have desired to assist them, it was out of our power. Women came and threw packages into the vehicle; and one man, with a boy hanging to him, caught the horse and tried to throw us out. I finally got out, and endeavored to lead the animal out of the terrible scenes. When we had gone about a block, I saw that the Court House was on fire, and almost at the same moment some one said that the St. James Hotel had caught on the roof. I was struck on the arm by a bird cage flung from an upper window; and the moment I released the horse he shied, and ran into a burning dray-load of furniture, smashing the wheel of the wagon, and throwing my companion out on his shoulder. Fortunately he was only bruised. But the horse, already terrified, started immediately, and I saw him disappear with a leap like that of a panther.

We then hurried on toward the St. James Hotel, passing through some of the strangest and saddest scenes it has ever been my misfortune to witness. I saw a woman kneeling in the street, with a crucifix held up before her, and the skirt of her dress burning while she prayed. We had barely passed her, before a runaway truck dashed her to the ground. Loads of goods passed us, repeatedly, that were burning on the trucks; and my nephew says that he distinctly saw one man go up to a pile of costly furniture lying in front of an elegant residence, and deliberately hold a piece of burning packing-box under it until the pile was lit. When we reached the wholesale stores north of Madison Street, the confusion was even worse. These stores were packed full of the most costly merchandise, and to save it at the rate the fire was advancing was plainly impossible. There was no police, and no effort was made to keep off the rabble. A few of the porters and draymen employed by these stores were working manfully, but there were costermonger's wagons, dirt carts, and even coaches, backed up and receiving the goods, and a villainous crowd of men and boys chaffing each other and tearing open parcels to discover the nature of their contents. We reached the St. James between two and three o'clock on Monday morning. It was reported to be on fire, but I did not see the flames then. Mrs. Frear had been moved, in an insensible state, to the house of a friend on the North Side. I could learn no other particulars.

The house was in a dreadful state of disorder. Women and children were screaming in every direction, and baggage was being thrown about in the most reckless manner. I now concluded that Mrs. Frear's children had been lost. It was reported that hundreds of people had perished in the flames.

There was a crowd of men and women at the hotel, from one of the large boarding-houses in the neighborhood of State and Adams streets, and they said they barely escaped with their lives, leaving everything behind. At this time it seemed to me that the fire would leave nothing. People coming in said the Sherman House was going, and that the Opera House had caught. Finally word was brought that the bridges were burning, and all escape was cut off to the north and west. Then ensued a scene which was beyond description. Men shouted the news, and added to the panic. Women, half-dressed, and many of them with screaming children, fled out of the building. There was a jam in the doorway, and they struck and clawed each other as if in self-defense. I lost sight of my nephew at this time. Getting out with the crowd, I started and ran round toward the Tremont House. Reaching Dearborn Street, the rush of fire was so strong that I could hardly keep my feet.

I ran on down toward the Tremont. Here the same scene was being enacted with tenfold violence. The elevator had got jammed, and the screams of the women on the upper floors was heart-rending. I forced my way up stairs, seeing no fire, and looked into all the open rooms, calling aloud the names of Mrs. Frear's daughters. Women were swarming in the parlors; invalids, brought there for safety, were lying upon the floor. Others were running distracted about, calling upon their husbands. Men, pale and awe-struck, and silent, looked on without any means of averting the mischief. All this time the upper part of the house was on fire. The street was choked with people, yelling and moaning with excitement and fright. I looked down upon them from an upper window a moment, and saw far up Dearborn Street the huge flames pouring in from the side streets I had traversed but an hour ago, and it appeared to me that they were impelled with the force of a tremendous blowpipe. Everything that they touched melted. Presently the smoke began to roll down the stairways, and almost immediately after the men who had been at work on the roof came running down. They made no outcry, but hurried from the house as if for their lives. I went up to the fourth story, looking into every room, and kicking open those that were locked. There were several other men searching in the same manner, but I did not notice them. While up here I obtained a view of the conflagration. It was advancing steadily upon the hotel from two or three points. There was very little smoke; it burned too rapidly, or what there was must have been carried away on the wind. The whole was accompanied by a crackling noise as of an enormous bundle of dry twigs burning, and by explosions that followed each other in quick succession on all sides.

From the street-entrance I could see up Dearborn Street as far as the Portland Block, and it was full of people all the distance, swaying and surging under the reign of fire. Around on Lake Street the tumult was worse. Here, for the first time, I beheld scenes of violence that made my blood boil. In front of Shay's magnificent dry goods store a man loaded a store-truck with silks, in defiance of the employes of the place. When he had piled all he could on the truck, some one with a revolver shouted to him not to drive away, or he would fire at him; to which he replied, "Fire, and be damned!" and the man put the pistol in his pocket again. Just east of this store there was at least a ton of fancy goods thrown into the street, over which the people and vehicles passed with utter indifference, until they took fire. I saw a ragamuffin on the Clark-street bridge, who had been killed by a marble ball thrown from a window, with white kid gloves on his hands, and whose pockets were stuffed with gold-plated sleeve-buttons. On that same bridge I saw an Irish woman leading a goat that was big with young, while under the other arm she carried a piece of silk.

Lake Street was rich with treasures; and hordes of thieves forced their way into the stores and flung out the merchandise to their fellows in the street, who received it without disguise, and fought over it openly. I went through the street to Wabash Avenue, and here the thoroughfare was utterly choked with all manner of goods and people. Everybody who had been forced from the other end of town by the advancing flames had brought some article with him; and, as further progress was delayed, if not completely stopped, by the river—the bridges of which were also choked—most of them, in their panic, abandoned their burdens, so that the streets and sidewalks presented the most astonishing wreck. Valuable oil-paintings, books, pet animals, musical instruments, toys, mirrors, and bedding, were trampled under foot. Added to this, the goods from the stores had been hauled out and had taken fire; and the crowd, breaking into a liquor establishment, were yelling with the fury of demons, as they brandished champagne and brandy bottles. The brutality and horror of the scene made it sickening. A fellow, standing on a piano, declared that the fire was the friend of the poor man. He wanted everybody to help himself to the best liquor he could get; and continued to yell from the piano until some one, as drunk as himself, flung a bottle at him and knocked him off it. In this chaos were hundreds of children, wailing and crying for their parents. One little girl, in particular, I saw, whose golden hair, worn loose down her back, had caught fire. She ran screaming past me, and somebody threw a glass of liquor upon her, which flared up and covered her with a blue flame. It was impossible to get through to Clark-street bridge, and I was forced to go back toward Randolph Street. There was a strange and new fascination in the scenes that I could not resist.

It was now daylight, and the fire was raging closely all about me. The Court House, the Sherman House, the Tremont House, and the wholesale stores on Wabash Avenue, and the retail stores on Lake Street, were burning. The cries of the multitude on the latter streets had now risen into a terrible roar, for the flames were breaking into the river streets. I saw the stores of Messrs. Drake, Hamlin, and Farwell burn. They ignited suddenly all over, in a manner entirely new to me—just as I have seen paper do that is held to the fire until it is scorched and breaks out in a flame. The crowds who were watching them greeted the combustion with terrible yells. In one of the stores—I think it was Hamlin's—there were a number of men at the time, on the several floors, passing out goods; and when the flames, blown over against it, enveloped the building, they were lost to sight entirely, nor did I see any effort whatever made to save them, for the heat was so intense that everybody was driven, as before a tornado, from the vicinity of the buildings. I now found myself carried by the throng back to near Lake Street, and determined, if possible, to get over the river. I managed to accomplish this, after a severe struggle and at the risk of my life. The rail of the bridge was broken away, and a number of small boats, loaded with goods, were passing down the stream. How many people were pushed over the bridge into the water, I can not tell. I, myself, saw one man stumble under a load of clothing and disappear; nor did the occupants of the boats pay the slightest attention to him, nor to the crowd overhead, except to guard against anybody falling into their vessels.

From the North Side, Mr. Frear made his way to the West Side, where he fell down and slept in the hall of his brother's house, but was roused in half-an-hour to join in another rescue of Mrs. Frear, whose refuge on the North Side was about to be burned. This was accomplished just in time to save the lady from the flames. Mr. Frear and the friend who had told him of her whereabouts hauled her, shrieking with hysterics, in a baker's wagon, some four miles, over much debris, to the home where she ought to have staid in the first place. Her property, including the jewelry, money and relics were all gone, but the children were soon heard from. They were safe at the Riverside suburb.

HONORABLE THOMAS HOYNE'S ACCOUNT.—Among the papers left by the late Honorable Thomas Hoyne is the following description of what he saw and suffered during the conflagration. It is evident that the manuscript was prepared soon after the fire, as a rough draft of what he intended to be a careful statement. Pressure of professional duties compelled him to postpone the revision of the text, and sudden death came to him before the work was done. We give the narrative as it came from his pen, with this explanation of the few verbal lapses which may appear, and which we know he would object to seeing over his name. Mr. Hoyne was exceedingly exact in his methods; and the use of an unfinished paper from his hand is justified only by the fact that his large and noble mind is at rest forever in this world.

The great fire occurred Sunday night, October 8, 1871. On Monday, the 9th, we commenced moving our effects on Michigan Avenue. The fire was arrested by blowing up some buildings on Harrison Street and Wabash Avenue. We moved back to our house* on the 10th of October. But on Friday afternoon, the 13th inst., a fire broke out in the barn, in rear of adjoining premises, occupied by Mr. Bauer, which, in the absence of engines or water from hose, seemed to threaten our inevitable destruction. We began again to move our effects, and were about leaving the house forever, when three cheers outside announced that a fire engine had been found to pump water from the lake, and hose sufficient to convey a stream which extinguished the fire in the barn. God be thanked, and to Him the praise, that we were saved!

On the night of the 8th October, about ten o'clock, when the first alarm was rung, I saw the light of the fire from my house on Michigan Avenue, and passed over Polk-street bridge to the West Side. I found it was a sharp, dry fire, but confined to a few wooden one-story shanties or cabins. A single stream of water would have seemed sufficient to arrest it. And although there appeared then to be water and engines playing, yet the fire gave no sign of abatement. It kept spreading, until I saw it would inevitably extend down to the river, and to the scene of the burned district of the night previous. I saw some poor Germans with their children and household goods, back of Canal Street and near the river, but in the way of the coming cataract of fire. I told them of their danger, and aided in taking some to a place near the bridge on Polk Street, from which they had to be again removed. I told the German, I would watch the goods while he was removing them from the last stopping place on Polk Street, across the bridge to the south side of the river. While this was taking place, I heard for the first time of fire on the South Side. My duty to the German being over, I crossed Polk-street bridge, to witness on the other side a great fire raging along Market Street, in the vicinity of VanBuren. Fear instinctively impressed me. I was like one in a dream, uncertain what to do. I slowly stalked, rather than walked, down to my office, No. 89 LaSalle Street. I went up stairs. I unlocked the door, went in, looked around, and came down again. I saw the sky as it were in flames over my head, and the streets lighted as if by lurid sunlight. I saw clouds of sparks burning over my head, and then again I saw that some roofs in the rear of the large buildings on Washington Street, and to the southwest, were already on fire. I then concluded the destruction of my office building was probable. I returned up stairs, and taking a tin box and some papers, hurried home to awaken my sons, especially Thomas, my partner, to open the safe, of which I had not the key; and going back within the next forty or fifty minutes, I witnessed the whole Court-house square in nearly one mass of flames. What a scene—a sea of fire! But what added to the danger, were the broken masses of flying matter, as they were taken up by the winds and carried in all directions. These alighting upon other houses and roofs, sometimes on loose material on the streets and in yards, carried the conflagration in all directions. I had not yet ascertained that the fire was already raging on the North Side.

* Mr. Hoyne's residence was at No. 267 Michigan Avenue, which site he occupied for his residence since 1839.

Here indeed commenced the total extermination of all that was combustible. Buildings of every description were swept away, leaving the ground upon which they had stood a field of absolute waste, excepting a single house—the property of Mahlon D. Ogden.

The day of the 9th (Monday) was one of excitement and dread. On the North Side, all the people were still flying from the scourge which pursued them. People who saw, from the direction and strength of the wind, that the fire might reach them, though being as yet some blocks of houses distant, made no preparations to move. They still hoped the flames could be arrested on the large spaces of ground intervening. In many such cases, what was their horror to discover in the other direction blazing roofs, to which the flying sparks had carried the fire. It became a race for life, not an effort to save property. Among such was Perry H. Smith's family and my brother Philip's. They left in haste, passing between rows of blazing houses, and sometimes along streets of flame. Philip escaped with his wife to the lake shore. He was hemmed in by blazing piles of lumber on the one hand, and low houses, built close to the lake, on the other. There he remained eleven hours, until the fire was exhausted by burning everything combustible. While so situated, he saw crowds of those who had in some instances saved furniture and had taken it to the lake for safety. While resting in this supposed security, the volume of fiery flakes was so driven in that direction, that the piles of furniture were set on fire, and the refugees were often compelled to throw the burning articles into the water to save themselves. Ladies were seen moving their chairs into the water, and sitting on the top of the backs, while resting their feet on the seats of the chairs. Who can describe the fury of such an element, when even at Lincoln Park it did not pause? But entering this area of solitude, in which stood the old chapel of the cemetery, built of brick, it desolated and scorched that structure. This chapel was surrounded by no buildings, and the nearest outside the cemetery gates was several hundred of feet distant, yet there, among the ancient trees, stands this brick chapel dedicated to the service of the dead—a monument of fire-blackened ruin and desolation.

Did it not seem as if the fire-king wished to seek vengeance on the very dead, by thus coming among the graves, and raising his torch triumphantly over the spot where the rites of religion had been so often celebrated, as each had passed from life to death, from death to immortality?

Mr. Horton, my partner, who had built his new mansion on LaSalle Street, was driven before the advancing flames from post to post. He happened to have a horse and buggy. He had our office account books, which he had removed from the office-safe the night before. He finally drove for refuge to Lincoln Park, where he located himself and wife upon the island in the artificial lake, and thus surrounded by water was even then compelled, during the twelve or fifteen hours he rested there, to keep his goods and their own clothing constantly wetted.

Let us now return to the South Side, where the fire literally ran over brick, iron and marble structures, as if they had been heaps of dry fuel and shavings. The width of the channel, which it was filling as it rushed along, did not seem to have been more than two hundred or four hundred feet. It had passed to the Court-house square, and was evidently going toward the main river, at about State Street and Wabash Avenue. At any rate, it seemed as if it could not pass down the avenues to the southward. I returned home satisfied that, at my house on Michigan Avenue, there could be no possible danger.

Having been up all night, I went to bed in the early morning, at about five o'clock. At seven I was roused from a sound slumber, and told by my wife that we should be compelled to leave our house. The fire had already reached Terrace Row, only two blocks distant, and was steadily advancing against the wind. What could be done, when the fire thus traveled against the wind, disregarding all natural, all conceivable, obstacles? The cry was for aid to stop it. Water being out of the question, since the Water Works had been destroyed, powder was the only resource. This was used, and two houses being blown up on the line of communication, it seemed finally as if a halt had been called, and the flames were under some control. This seemed the more probable, as General Philip H. Sheridan, had stationed himself on Harrison Street, and ordered the pulling down of houses there. By these efforts the progress of the fire was arrested before it reached Harrison Street, and what remained of the South Division was saved.

It is impossible to describe the scenes on Michigan Avenue that morning! Excited crowds of people were running and pressing against each other. Goods and furniture were strewn in all directions. The Park in front was filled with the dry goods stock of the great house of Farwell & Co. Heaps of furniture were piled in each court-yard or terrace. Omnibuses and wagons rushed along in the general melee. Who can describe the confusion, the excited faces, the earnest movements of men, women and children? Here was the rich lady with her arms full of boxes, and there was a poor family with nothing but their children; but the distress expressed in all faces, and by all movements, was something terrible to witness, and never to be forgotten.

In the meantime we had moved some household effects; and it was a serious question during a part of the time, whether in moving as far as Twentieth Street, to H. O. Stone's house, we had even then gone far enough south to avoid a calamity which seemed pursuing us. But how grand, after all, is human nature! While we were taking leave of our home, removing our most precious relics, friends were constantly coming in, pressing our hands, in tears, and soliciting us to take shelter with them. Among these were H. O. Stone and Fernando Jones. They brought wagons, too, to carry our goods. God ever bless them! What consolation in that dread hour did these evidences of friendship afford us! But the great cloud passed over our home. In two days we received back our goods into the house, and, although we had lost our income in rents, we felt grateful that a home had been spared to us.

The week was passing without, however, any abatement of the oppressive and dangerous, dry, windy weather which still prevailed. The southwester was as strong as ever. The public mind was filled with the most fearful rumors of incendiarism. There was still no water. The Fire Department, it was known, was powerless. Another conflagration must completely clear off the whole city site. The burglars, thieves, felons and desperate characters of all other cities, it was reported, had come for plunder. General Sheridan had, therefore, ordered United States troops here, and put them in charge of the burned district. All bank vaults and safes were still in that district, and upon their contents depended even the food that some were to eat, but especially the continuance of any business. All the money left, and securities of any kind, were deposited in those vaults. Hence, a state of general feverishness existed, and a feeling of helplessness. In this condition of things, when I was endeavoring to shake off the lethargy which arose from the general depression, I was called upon to bear a new shock. Who could imagine that, after all we had passed through, fire again would threaten our destruction; and, this time, so near was its origin, that no escape even seemed possible! Our barn, about forty feet distant in rear of our home, at three o'clock of the afternoon, while the southwest wind was still blowing and bearing the smoke and flame directly towards our house, was discovered to be on fire! The people rallied in all directions. They brought buckets or any thing that could hold water. They organized lines down to the lake; and handing water to those at the barn, still smouldering, kept back the flames. But, notwithstanding, the fire was gaining in power, as was evident from the volume of smoke pouring out at the windows of the stable. Wife and servants were all drawing water from our house cisterns. Every kitchen utensil—boilers, pans and buckets—were in demand. It was with difficulty I persuaded my wife that further effort was unavailing, and she must leave her kitchen and desist from her efforts to supply water to those around the stable, and prepare to leave our home forever! How sad the feelings of that terrible moment! I went into the library like one stupefied. I was stunned by blow upon blow which I had received from my losses, until, under the final calamity, I felt like sinking in despair. I had heard of such things, but never was brought into their presence before, nor made to realize the condition of men abandoned to such misfortune. I took final leave of my library, looking upon all that it contained. In every corner of that room, from every shelf and table, arose memories of what had been. And how I had loved its associations! How helpless did I seem against that enemy which, under the providence of God, had ravaged our whole city only the Monday before, and was now advancing under the very eaves of my own house! Passing to the front door, I found friends offering assistance. The time was short to save anything, but we resolved to do our best.

While we were thus engaged in disposing of our valuables for removal—oh! who shall describe the thrill it occasioned?—cheers arose, repeated by thousands of joyful men outside. An engine had been found, and hose sufficient to carry a stream of water from the lake. All feelings of satisfaction must be forever indifferent, compared with the supreme joy of being saved from destruction under such circumstances as these. It seems as if all I had lost was nothing. In the dispensations which Providence had meted out to the suffering in the great fire, gratitude to God and praise for all His goodness took the place of every other feeling. And it seems to me as if I have been nearer our Great Father ever since. Visitations of His providence, such as these, do so improve our moral consciousness of that Power which upholds all existence, that we feel purified and spiritualized. Eternal praise, glory and honor be ascribed to God the Father, and His Son, and the Holy Ghost forevermore!

RETARDING THE RETROGRESSION OF THE FLAMES.
—While the flames were raging upon the South Side, after having crossed the river, danger again menaced the West Side in the threatened burning of the Oriental Mills, situated at the west end of Madison-street bridge. How this danger was averted, and demolition of the whole West Side, in all probability, prevented, is told in the following extract from the Journal:

"At half-past two o'clock, the National elevator, just north of the Fort Wayne depot (on the West Side), the rectifying distilleries, at the east end of the Madison-street bridge, and the new brick building of Coolbaugh & Wheeler (on the South Side) were one sheet of flame. Directly across the river from these latter buildings, stands the Oriental Mills, a five-story brick building surmounted with a two-story wooden cupola. It was evident that if the fire crossed the river it would sweep the Illinois River elevator, the Eagle Iron Works, and perhaps the whole West Side. No fire engines were available, and the situation was most critical. The forethought of the owners of the mill, Norton & Co., had provided a powerful force-pump attached to the engine of the mill, which threw two streams of water above the roof, which effectually stopped the spread of the flames in that direction. The skillful management of the hose-pipe by W. Canfield, superintendent of the mill, deserves special commendation."

Another writer, commenting on this period of the disaster, remarked:

"There was one remarkable turning point in this fire, in which everything was remarkable; and that was at Madison-street bridge, where everyone expected to see the fire re-cross to the West Side, and commence upon a new path of destruction. Directly across this bridge were the Oriental Flouring Mills, which were saved from destruction by the immense steam force-pump attached to the mill, by which a powerful stream of water was thrown upon the exposed property, hour after hour. This undoubtedly saved the West Division from a terrible conflagration; for if the Oriental Mills had burned, the combustible nature of the adjoining buildings and adjacent lumber yards would have insured a scene of devastation too heart-sickening for contemplation."

STOPPAGE OF THE FIRE ON THE SOUTH SIDE.—Mr. Sheahan's account of the progress of the flames, early in the morning, and their estopping on the South Side, is given:

TERRACE ROW,
MICHIGAN AVENUE.

"At four o'clock in the morning the line of flame and ruin in the South Division extended above Harrison Street northward to the main branch of the river, a distance of about one mile. To the eastward, it had reached Dearborn Street, having included the Michigan Southern depot; the mammoth Ogden House, covering an entire block of ground; the new and unoccupied Bigelow House; both of the Honoré blocks, the Lombard and Reynolds blocks, Farwell Hall, all the line of seven-story marble buildings on LaSalle Street, the Chamber of Commerce, the Court House, the Sherman, Briggs and Tremont houses, Crosby's Opera House, Wood's Museum, Hooley's Opera House, Dearborn Theater and the Post, Mail, Staats Zeitung, Volks Zeitung, Times, Republican and Journal newspaper offices. At this hour, the Tribune office was the only newspaper property left untouched, McVicker's the only theatre, and the Palmer House the only first-class hotel.

"The fire had not then crossed Dearborn Street, south of Madison, and it was confidently hoped that the end of the destruction could now be confidently predicted. People began to lift up their heads, and thank God that something was to be left of Chicago. At half-past six o'clock in the morning, there was good reason to believe that the conflagration had spent itself. Thankful and contented in the belief, large numbers of tired watchers went to their homes—if they had any—to get a little food and rest. It was as well that they went, for they were spared the fearful renewal which occurred so soon afterward.

"At about seven o'clock in the morning, a sudden gust of wind swept and eddied through Dearborn Street, beginning at Jackson, where, at that time, the fire had died down to embers. Beds of live coals were caught up bodily by the hurricane, and hurled against, and upon, the wooden structures across the street, and in a moment the fire had gained a foothold, and swept onward once more to the north and east. All that had been left untouched between Jackson and Madison streets, from Dearborn Street to the lake shore, was doomed to destruction. As the fury of the first hurricane subsided, there came a lull, so that the fire began to work southward and westward.

"As the fire progressed up Wabash Avenue and State Street, it seemed as if it would be impossible to stop it. Only two engines were in that section of the city, and these were powerless from want of water. After the conflagration had successively passed Adams, Jackson and VanBuren, and had arrived at Congress Street, a determined and vigorous effort was made at Harrison Street, on the west line. Leaving the block between Congress, Harrison, State and Wabash as certain prey for the flames, the attempt to save was concentrated on the line of buildings on the north side of Harrison. On the corner of State was a wooden building, which was too inflammable to be allowed to stand. The proper method of stopping was here adopted, and the principal actor in the contest was thereafter a red-capped chap, in a square box-wagon, in which were also placed several hundred pounds of powder. The wooden building, on the northeast corner of State and Harrison, was first to go, and was laid flat by two charges of powder. Next to this, on the east, was a three-story double brick, which met the same fate as its neighbor, and in a moment only the front walls remained. The effects of this were quickly seen. The fire was effectually checked, at least so far as the high-reaching, dangerous flames were concerned. Between the brick house, just mentioned, and the church, which occupied the (northwest) corner of Wabash, was a small frame building, which was an extremely dangerous customer, and partook of the same treatment which cured the next house; but not until after it had so far been enveloped in flame as to seriously endanger the church. This last building was, in reality, the hope of the firemen, and it stood its ground nobly. It was commonly called the *Wabash-avenue Methodist Church, and was one of the oldest churches in the city. The blowing up of the building on the west proved the salvation of that end, and the church resisted the attack from that side. On the north side of the church was the real danger, though, fortunately, there was a vacant lot between the nearest house and the church. The heavy, honestly-built walls of the latter and the intervening distance so far protected it that nothing took fire except the ornamental tower on the northeast corner of the building. This was extinguished by a citizen volunteer, who showed most wonderful indifference to danger and marvelous efficiency in work. Here, then, was the real turning-point of the disaster; and, over the barrier formed by the overthrown houses and the church, the flames did not succeed in passing. Between Wabash Avenue and the lake, the firemen were even more fortunate. An attempt was made to arrest progress on the line of Congress Street, and it was partially successfully. The east three buildings were protected by the vacant ground between Terrace Row and the street, and did not ignite. On the Wabash Avenue corner, the fire succeeded in passing the boundary of Congress Street, and attacking the brick block on the southwest corner. Here, again, gunpowder was used to good effect in fighting the flames; and by its aid No. 330 Wabash Avenue was reduced to a heap of ruins in a moment. By this means the fire was checked at this point, and the end of the devastation was at last reached."

* The Post-office was first established at Burlington Hall, southwest corner of Sixteenth and State streets, immediately after the fire and was then removed to this church.

"Terrace Row was the last to yield. It was a beautiful pile, solidly constructed, and in the face of any ordinary fire would have stood. But after burning some three hours, during which time a large share of the superb equipments of the many distinguished homes were transferred to a safe place, the last wall fell; and in the South Division, there remained north of Harrison Street only the buildings east of Wabash Avenue and south of Congress Street,—the Wabash-avenue Methodist Church, standing on the northwest corner of the Avenue and Harrison Street, the five-story building at the east end of Randolph-street bridge (Lind Block), and the Illinois Central elevator, just north of the once magnificent depot of the company.

TREMONT HOUSE, AFTER THE FIRE.*

The Post thus relates its version of how the flames were stayed in the progress southward:

"At the corner of Clark and Harrison streets, the Jones school-house was burned. A wooden primary on the same lot escaped destruction. Why it escaped would be curious to know. The flames, as if weary of the awful race they had run, did not cross the street. At the corner of Fourth Avenue and Harrison Street, the Jewish synagogue burned fiercely, but the Otis Block of brick buildings, on the northeast corner of the street, did not burn. At the corner of Third Avenue and Harrison, men pulled down a wooden residence with chains. Although this house was consumed, it did not burn fiercely. At the corner of State and Harrison, O'Neil's brick block was blown up by powder, and prevented the further spread in that direction. At the corner of Harrison and Wabash, the Methodist church stood, as if defying the flames. The fire did not cross Wabash Avenue south of Congress Street, and the south side of Congress was saved—the Michigan Avenue Hotel standing upon the corner like the huge battlement of a fortress that had withstood a siege.

"By noon (Monday) the fire had ceased in its progress southward, and, except by uncertain rumor, no one south of Harrison knew of the desolation that reigned in the North Division. The *For description of this building see the Hotel history.

'lake front' was filled with household goods, piled in the utmost confusion. Weary watchers stood guard about their little all, and hundreds of people, homeless and without property of any kind, were lying about, exhausted. From the 'lake front,' the destruction of the palatial block of residences known as 'Terrace Row' was watched with intense interest.

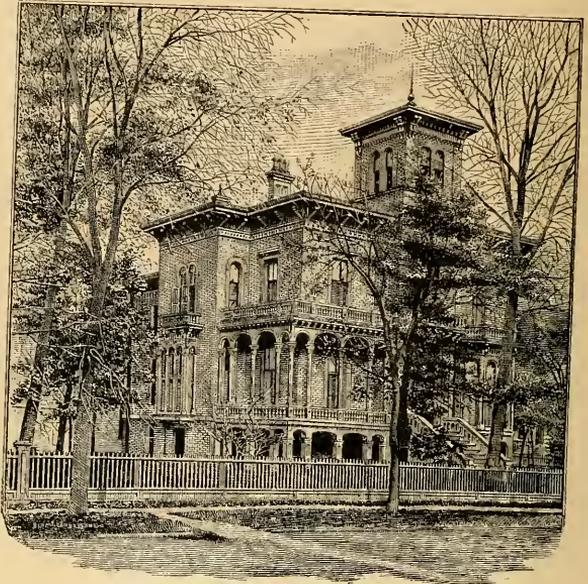

"It was broad day now, and the sun was up. At least, a small crimson ball hung in a pall of smoke, and people said that was the sun. For the rest, all consciousness of the date and hour was lost. The wind had freshened, and the tumult increased. The fire had pursued its inexorable march in the van of the southwest wind across the south side of the river. Toward the west, it had burned more slowly, and it was nearly noon before the distilleries at Madison-street bridge yielded. The North Side was already attacked in a dozen places. Of the South Division, between State Street and the river, all the slighter buildings had been wiped out, many of the larger edifices were in ruins, and a few of the stoutest were still ablaze, islands of fire. The gaps between the ruins were, it is true, still filled with people, but they were not working to save anything. There was nothing to save—no place whence to escape. The tumult was still loud, but it was changed in its character. It was now the wailing of children seeking their parents—of mothers seeking their families—of men, maudlin with liquor and stupefied with grief, bemoaning their losses. The curious now pressed forward to see, and the dishonest to steal. Those coming from the west and the extreme south met the throngs flying from the north, and made human eddies in every street. But the fire was practically over here; the battle had rolled to the northward, leaving behind in its ruins, through which poured the fugitives and the wounded, those who came on errands of curiosity or mercy and those who prowled about to pillage and destroy."

THE NORTH SIDE.

THE FIRE REACHES THE NORTH SIDE.

—The first authentic account of the presence of fire on the North Side is furnished by Judge Lambert Tree, whose valuable statement is given in succeeding pages. At not later than half-past one o'clock a. m., Judge Tree crossed from his office, on the South Side, and discovered little fires burning on the State-street bridge, and at different points along the street, where dried leaves had become ignited by vagrant sparks which fell incessantly from the South-side fire. But these incipient fires were not the cause of the destruction of that vast area, extending from

On the authority of Andrew J. Wright, who observed the time by his office clock, as he was driven from the building by the flames, we state that Wright's stables took fire at half-past two a. m., October 9

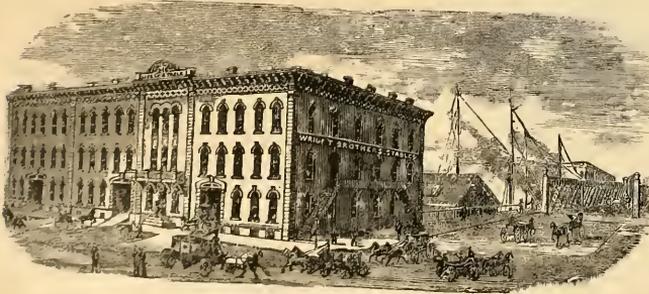

GEO. F. RUMSEY'S RESIDENCE, RUSH AND HURON STREETS.

There was a large quantity of oil in a train of cars which stood on the North-Western Railroad track, south of the stables. This highly combustible substance ignited in some manner unknown, and instantly enwrapped the stables in flames. The proprietor, anticipating danger, had caused his more valuable horses to be harnessed, ready to escape if the situation appeared perilous; but so suddenly did the flames envelop the entire structure that the noble animals, many of which were of high value, could not be driven out in time to save them. There has been much litigation over the losses entailed by this disaster, but only those points which are historically important are here mentioned.

When Julian S. Rumsey parted from Mayor Mason, as has been related, he hastened to his home, on the northeast corner of Cass and Huron streets. He did not think of partaking of breakfast, to which he had a few minutes before invited the Mayor, for he found his house in danger. His daughters, appreciating the situation, had already obtained the garden-hose and were engaged in wetting the house and grounds. The fire was then in sight, although several blocks away. Mr. Rumsey instantly prepared for flight. The fatal delusion which characterized so many persons—the be-the main branch of the river to Lincoln Park at Fullerton Avenue, and from the lake, sweeping, with an irregular western boundary, a territory of about fourteen hundred and eighty-eight acres.

WRIGHT'S LIVERY STABLES.

Mr. Rumsey instantly prepared for flight. The fatal delusion which characterized so many persons—the be-rief that their own property would be spared—did not possess him. He had taken from his office some $40,000 in grain receipts. These papers, together with silverware, were packed in baskets and placed in the daughter's phaeton. A fine oil portrait of the late Hon. John Bice Turner, Mrs. Rumsey's father, was also deposited in the carriage, and this valuable load was driven in safety to the West Side. Meanwhile, the fire advanced northward. Blazing joists went whirling overhead, like monster chain-shot from an infernal battery. A glance toward the south revealed a wall of solid fire. In spite of Mr. Rumsey's wise and deliberate preparation, his family barely had time to escape alive, rushing through the rear doors, into Cass Street, when the flames descended on their beloved home. The flying party undertook to go west, along Huron Street, but the tempest drove them to the northward. They were nearly suffocated with the gases which the heat so rapidly and disastrously generated. To reach Chicago Avenue seemed impossible. As Mr. Rumsey says, "It was like going through fire itself." How they escaped death is still a marvel to them. But even in the midst of perils such as these, there are incidents full of unconscious humor. Just before they were driven from the house, one of the daughters, then seven years old, decided not to soil the fine dress she had on, and hastily exchanged it for a commoner one, leaving the childish prize to burn in the closet. Another, but five years old, seized a small Swiss clock, and bore it safely away. That memento of the night of terror is still retained by the young lady. Mr. Rumsey's personal experiences are illustrative of one phase of the great disaster. He quitted his home so suddenly, on being aroused by the alarm, that he left his watch under his pillow. Subsequently his son, George D. Rumsey, found the timepiece in the ruins. The hands were set, fused by the intense heat, at 3:30, indicating the time when the flames devoured the house.

RUINS OF GEORGE F. RUMSEY'S HOUSE.

From the time Wright's stables were burned, the fire made phenomenal and irresistible headway. It will be seen that only thirty minutes were required to reach Mr. Rumsey's house, about half a mile away.

DESTRUCTION OF THE WATER-WORKS.—The pumping-works were located on the block between Chicago Avenue and Pearson Street, the engine buildings fronting Pine Street, at the northeast corner of Chicago Avenue. The repair-shops, coal-house, barn, tunnel-shaft and main buildings occupied an entire block, about six hundred and eighty feet.

Lill's brewery occupied a corresponding block on the south side of the avenue. This immense establishment extended from Pine Street to the lake. Eighty feet out into the lake, and seven hundred and seventy-five feet east of Pine Street, stood a small building, twenty feet square, sixteen feet high, used by the brewing company as a paint and carpenter shop. It was built on piles driven in the lake-bottom, and was considered so remote and isolated as to in no way jeopardize the brewery. Incredible as it may appear, this insignificant building was the first to ignite on the North Side. Alone; placed expressly to prevent conflagration; and regarded as of no importance, even in the event of its burning,—this contemptible shell was ignited by the falling brands from the South-side fire, then raging near the Court House. At half-past one a. m., while little flames were flashing up in various piles of dead leaves, and on State-street bridge, this detached shed blazed into fierce fire. The large force of men employed by the brewing company, aided by reinforcements from the Water Works, promptly endeavored to suppress the flames, but the shop burned as if by magic. The adjacent buildings were left unharmed.

Thus far the pumping-works had escaped, and those in charge took courage. They believed the edifice would not be reached. Frank Trautman (engineer), S. W. Fuller (time-keeper), D. W. Fuller, and others, were on watch, guarding every exposed point to the best of their ability. The heavens were ablaze, and huge masses of fire fell in all directions. The men gazed with horror at the sight, for it seemed as if the assault was hurled directly at the system of water supply. Mr. Trautman held his engines in superb control, running at the rate of thirty million gallons a day. The reservoir was full; and, although the demand was great, and many breaks had already occurred in the service pipes, the supply was ample, so long as the works remained intact. Soon after three o'clock, D. W. Fuller, who was standing just north of the main building, noticed a fire-brand, apparently twelve feet in length, whirling through the air, directly toward the water-tower, located about one hundred and fifty feet west of the engine building. The blazing signal gyrated as it dashed itself against the pillar at the northeast corner of the engine-house. In an instant, the roof was aflame. Mr. Fuller glanced at his watch; the time was exactly twenty minutes past three. The men did everything they could to stay the progress of the fire, but without avail. A few minutes before four o'clock, they were driven from the buildings by the intense heat.

The official report of the Board of Public Works, for 1871, says:

"The fire reached the Chicago Pumping-Works at three o'clock Monday morning.* The machinery, the buildings, and all connected with this department were never in better condition than at the time of the fire. It being on Sunday, the reservoirs were full of water, and the supply therefore was unusually good. * * * Notwithstanding the conflagration commenced several miles distant, and at the time a fearful gale was blowing toward the Works, yet as the walls of the building were of stone, the roof covered with slate, and the whole structure generally quite as substantial as ordinary circumstances would require, besides being located in the center of a block, with streets on three sides and the lake in the rear, there appeared no immediate cause for alarm or anxiety for the safety of the works. The rapid advance of the main body of fire created, however, an incessant 'shower' of sparks and embers in our vicinity, admonishing those present to take every precaution at hand to guard against destruction. With this view, a line of hose was laid from the hydrant, and men with buckets of water were stationed upon the roof and between that and the ceiling. Notwithstanding these precautions, the north end of the roof caught fire in several places, but the flames were promptly subdued. The first building that caught fire in the immediate neighborhood was a cooper and paint shop on the lake shore, at least six hundred feet distant. At this time, with this exception, there were no buildings on fire for several blocks south of the Works. The roof of the main building, as before stated, was covered with slate; the bays, and that portion adjoining the battlements, of stone, three feet high, were covered with tin. There was no exterior woodwork in the cornice or elsewhere. However but a short time elapsed before the roof ignited, the fire communicated to the floors and other woodwork, and the interior became a mass of flames. At this time, Lill's malt-house and brewery, immediately south, caught fire, and the flames from these buildings were driven by the wind toward the Works, making sad havoc with the Works, driving the employes from their posts. The flames, from this time, spread with such rapidity that the whole neighborhood, for blocks around, became a 'sea of fire.' Thus, at about three o'clock on the morning of the 9th of October, the pumping-works became an utter wreck. Nothing but the naked walls of the building, and the broken and blackened skeletons of three engines, were left to mark the spot from which, only a few hours before, flowed millions of gallons of pure water for the comfort and convenience of our citizens. The water-tower was but slightly damaged. Assistant-Engineer Trautman, with the regular night corps of firemen and others, was on duty at the time of the fire. The men courageously remained at their posts until a portion of the roof fell in, when the engines were stopped, the fires hauled, and the safety-valves raised, leaving the faithful men barely time to escape from the burning building. The safety-valve levers were suspended by ropes, which soon burned, allowing the valves to close. This greatly endangered the boilers, as they were literally surrounded by fire. The main steam-pipe (seventeen inches in diameter) was quickly melted off, allowing the steam to escape from the boilers. In consequence of the whole neighborhood being an unbroken mass of flame, it was impossible longer to remain in the vicinity. * * * Although the engines were stopped at about three o'clock, the supply of water continued from the reservoirs for some time thereafter.

* Mr. Fuller fixes the minute, in a manner that can not be disputed, at 3:20.

Of the danger to the lake crib, Mr. Cregier said:

"This work, so far as is known, is in good order throughout, under water and ground. The slight temporary structures connected with it above ground, on the land end, were destroyed by fire, and the portion of the crib above water, though two miles from the nearest part of the burned district, would have been burned, in consequence of live coals carried to it by the wind, had not the keeper watched them during the night, and extinguished them. The present crib, being so largely of wood, is not only combustible, but perishable."

INDIVIDUAL EXPERIENCES ON THE NORTH SIDE.—The perils, sufferings and adventures which befell the vast concourse of people during the frightful flight from the burning city, would fill many volumes, if it were possible to gather all that might be told. That impracticable task must be represented by a few characteristic narratives, ranging from that of the millionaire, who left behind him fortune, home, art treasures, library and fine establishments, to that of the humble laborer, whose little all would not have sold for so much as a single jewel in the caskets of the rich.

THE EXPERIENCE OF JUDGE LAMBERT TREE.—My residence, at the time of the fire, was at No. 282 Ohio Street, on the south side of the street, between Cass and State streets. The members of my household consisted, at the time, of my wife, my son Arthur, then eight years of age, my father, a man seventy years old, and my sister Ellen, and servants. We retired at about ten o'clock Sunday evening. At 12 o'clock I was awakened by my wife, who told me that a large fire seemed to be raging in the South Division, and, on going to a window in the rear of the house, I found a very serious conflagration was in progress in the direction of my office, which was at the corner of LaSalle and Randolph streets. I hastily dressed and hurried across the river. When I arrived at the building where my office was located, the roof and cupola of the Court House was already beginning to burn; several other buildings south and west of the Court House were in flames, and the air was full of sparks, cinders and pieces of flaming felt, torn from the roofs of the houses, and being carried in a northeasterly direction by the wind, which was blowing a gale. I went up stairs to my office, which was so light from the burning buildings in the neighborhood that I found it unnecessary to turn on the gas. Unlocking the safe, I took out as many papers and other things that I deemed valuable as I could stow in the pockets of my overcoat and a small tin box, and then, locking it again, I started for home.

THE WATER TOWER.

My route on my return was down Randolph to Clark, up that street to Lake, along Lake to State, across State-street bridge, and thence on North State until I reached Ohio Street. When I got out of doors I found it literally raining fire. Along Randolph and Clark streets canvas awnings in front of many of the stores, and in several instances the large wooden signs, also, were burning. Here and there, where the sparks had found a lodgement, small jets of flames were darting out from wooden cornices on the tops of buildings, while the sparks and cinders, which were constantly falling upon the streets, were being whirled around in little eddies and scattered down the basement stairways. As I crossed State-street bridge, I observed an occasional plank burning in the wooden footways of the bridge. Along North State and Ohio streets, the dead leaves, which the wind had from time to time caught up and deposited against and under the wooden sidewalks, had been ignited in many places by the flying sparks, which had in turn set fire to the sidewalks, so that every few yards tongues of fire were starting up between the cracks in the boards. Up to the time of reaching home, however, I could not discover that any house was on fire on the North Side.

As soon as I reached my home I directed everybody to dress, and prepare to leave, if necessary. I then went to the rear of the house, and, on looking out of the window, observed that the railroad depot and Wright's livery stable, near the north end of State-street bridge, were burning. When I passed there, less than ten minutes afterward, the little wooden cottage on the west of me was in flames. This cottage was four blocks north of Wright's livery stable, and, as far as I could discover, there were no buildings intervening between these two points which had yet taken fire; but it was one of the characteristic features of the conflagration that isolated buildings would catch fire several blocks in advance of the main body of the flames, from the flying sparks and cinders. I went upon the roof of my house, and ordered the servants to pass me up buckets of water as fast as they could, thinking that if I wet the roof thoroughly that would at least be a safeguard. In a few moments, however, I became convinced that no amount of water that I could command would save us. The sparks and flaming felt were now flying as thickly on the North Side as I had, a short time before, observed them in the South Division. The size of some of this burning material hurled through the air seems almost incredible. While on the roof of my house, a burning mass, which was fully as large as an ordinary bed-pillow, passed over my head. It fell upon the street, and on descending I had the curiosity to examine it, and found it to be a mass of matted hay. There were also pieces of burning felt, some of which I should say were fully a foot square, flying through the air, and dropping upon the roofs of houses and barns. By this time (which was about half-past two o'clock in the morning), a great many frightened men, women, and children began to appear in the streets, hurrying along, carrying large bundles in their arms and upon their backs, or dragging trunks and boxes. Many of the neighbors were depositing trunks, pictures, and other things which they could most readily remove, into the grounds of H. H. Magie, on the opposite side of the street, it being supposed that a space so remote from buildings must be safe. Two of our servants, catching the general infection to flee, dragged their trunks down stairs, and disappeared in the street. It began to be apparent to the rest of us that we also must seek a safer place. The burning cottage on the west of us, which was now enveloped in flames, and one or two barns on our premises, which had just taken fire, admonished us that our turn would soon come. It was, therefore, determined that we should cross the street, and join Mr. and Mrs. Magie at their house, where we could await the further progress of events. It was now nearly three o'clock, I should think. The ladies put on their bonnets, and my wife, carrying a tin box containing her jewelry and some other valuables, led the way, accompanied by my little son Arthur, my father and sister, and a faithful French girl, who remained with us through our subsequent adventures that night, and, by her coolness and nerve, proved most serviceable. I remained behind a few minutes to secure a trunk containing the family silver, and, as I dragged it through the hall, I also thought I would save a portrait of my son, which was hanging in the parlor. Accordingly I stepped in, cut the cords by which it was suspended, and carried it in one hand, while I drew the trunk across the street with the other. When half-way across the street, I turned and saw that we had left the house with a full head of gas turned on in all the rooms. It was hard to realize that we had left it for the last time. When I reached Mr. Magie's garden, following the example of neighbors, I deposited my picture under a large tree, and it was the last I ever saw of it. The trunk containing the silver met a better fate. Not knowing exactly what to do with it, I delivered it to Mr. Magie's gardener, old Matthew, whom I happened to run across, with directions to bury it. He obeyed my instructions, as I found out the next morning; and this was the only property saved by the whole family.

I entered Mr. Magie's house by the back door; and, as I was approaching it, I saw that his stable, which was back on Ontario Street, was in flames. I found the family all assembled in the library, together with the mother of Mrs. Sylvester S. Bliss, one of our neighbors, who having become, in some way, separated from her own family, had, like ourselves, taken refuge in Mr. Magie's house. We had been there only a few moments, when, on looking out of the window, I discovered that the covered wooden porch, which stretched across the whole width of Mr. Magie's house, was on fire, and urged that we should immediately depart, as it was dangerous to remain a moment longer. All agreed to this, and we started to leave—my wife, my son and myself leading the way. We had scarcely got out of the door before we were assailed by a hurricane of smoke, sparks and cinders, which nearly blinded and suffocated us. Fearing separation, I grasped my wife by one hand and my son by the other, and moved around to the west side of the house, intending to pass through one of the gates on Ohio Street; but we had no sooner got from under the protection which the north wall of the house afforded us, than we met the full force of this hurricane of smoke and fire. My wife's and sister's bonnets and my father's and son's hats were immediately blown from their heads, while the cinders were falling upon heads, hands and faces, and burning them. It was impossible to get to the gate on Ohio Street before being suffocated, and we instinctively turned and ran towards the northeast corner of the block, thus turning our backs to the smoke. I now observed that the paling fence, six feet high, which surrounded the block, as well as the wooden sidewalks on the outside of it, were on fire in many places, and that a great number of bushes, shrubs, and plants, and several of the trees, in the grounds, were burning. As we moved along, to add to the embarrassment of the situation, my wife and sister both showed signs of fainting, and the French girl now had the other arm of my wife, assisting her along.

RUINS OF LILL & DIVERSY'S BREWERY.

Here I must record a circumstance which seemed almost providential at the time. There was no gate at the northeast corner of the block. We were simply driven in that direction by the storm of fire and smoke, because we could go in no other. I was, therefore, feeling very anxious about what we should be able to do after arriving at the fence, when, as we got within a few steps of it about twenty feet of the fence fell over upon the sidewalk, and made a passage way for us. This was undoubtedly caused by the posts having been burned away, in part, near the ground, and the fury of the storm against the fence with its weakened supports. The fence fell upon the sidewalk, which was in full blaze, and thus we passed over it. The skirt of my wife's dress took fire as we went through the flames, and I tore it off.

When we had reached the street, and counted our party, we found, to our horror, that neither Mr. nor Mrs. Magie were with us. It seemed, as we afterward learned, that instead of following us, as we had supposed when we all started from the house, they lingered behind for a few moments, and thus got separated from us. It was as impossible to go back then as it would have been to have crossed a sea of fire, and there was nothing to do but to continue our flight. Our party, as we stood at the corner of Cass and Ontario streets, consisted of those I have mentioned already as having left my house to go to Mr. Magie's, with the addition of the mother of Mrs. Bliss. I also discovered, when we reached the street, that my wife in her fright had thrown away, in the grounds, the box which contained her jewelry and other valuables. It was too late to go back for it. My wife, sister, son, and the mother of Mrs. Bliss were all slightly burned about their heads, hands and faces, and the clothes of all of us had numerous holes burned in them. My wife, sister and son were also halts. Beyond this we were all right; and we hastened eastward along Ontario Street, doubly oppressed by the feeling of uncertainty which now weighed upon us all as to the fate of Mr. and Mrs. Magie. Looking behind me, everything was enveloped in clouds of smoke and sparks, and here and there, a neighbor's house was in flames.

RUINS, STATE AND INDIANA STREETS.

We continued along Ontario Street until we struck the vacant grounds on the shore of the lake. These grounds then occupied a space from St. Clair Street to the lake, and from Superior to about Indiana or Illinois Street, covering many acres perhaps forty or fifty. On the north were Lill's brewery and the Water Works, running to the water's edge, and preventing any advance beyond Superior Street in that direction, especially as both of these buildings were then on fire; on the south were one or two planing-mills and numerous lumber-yards, extending to the river. When we arrived on the lake shore we found thousands of men, women and children, and hundreds of horses and dogs, who had already fled there for refuge. The grounds were dotted all over, at short intervals, with piles of trunks, chairs, tables, beds and household furniture of every description. It seemed as if this great open space, with nothing but the broad lake on the east of us, ought to be safe; and yet there, a few hours later, and for the second time that morning, we nearly perished from suffocation.

It was between three and four o'clock when we arrived on the grounds. We stood among the crowd, watching the fire as it advanced and gradually encircled us, until the whole city in every direction, looking north, west and south, was a mass of smoke and flames. The crowd itself was a study. In some instances whole families were huddled around their little piles of furniture, which was all they had left, that morning, of their yesterday's home. Here and there a mother sat upon the ground, clinging to her infant, with one or more little ones, who, exhausted by the prolonged interruptions to their slumbers, were now sleeping, with their heads reclining on her lap, as peacefully as if nothing unusual was transpiring. Several invalids lay helplessly stretched upon mattresses, but still surrounded by relatives and friends, who were endeavoring to soothe their fears. One young girl sat near me, with a cage containing a canary bird in her lap, whose life she was seeking to protect. She had covered the cage with her shawl, and from time to time raised it to see if the bird was all right. An hour or two later, while she was moving to a place of greater safety, I saw her little pet tumble from its perch to the bottom of the cage. It was dead; and the poor child, who doubtless had met her first sorrow, burst into tears. There was also something of that demoralization visible which, it is said, so often crops out when the good ship has struck upon a lee-shore and total shipwreck is inevitable. Some men and women who had found liquor among the household stores there, and who sought to drown their present woes in the bottle, were now reeling about, drunk; while, in several other instances, rough-looking men were going around, breaking open and rifling trunks and boxes. Judges of courts and police officers were there, but they only formed so many units in that stricken assemblage, and their authority that morning was no greater than that of any other man upon the ground. A poor woman, extremely ill, who had been brought down on a mattress, died in the midst of a mixed crowd of men, women and children; and, although the fact that she had died was understood in the vicinity of where she lay, it did not seem to excite the sensation of horror which one would ordinarily expect at the happening of an event like this, under such circumstances; on the contrary, a knowledge of the fact seemed to be received with comparative indifference. Yet, so solemn an incident as the transition from life to death of a human being, in the presence of the same people differently situated, would doubtless have excited the profoundest sympathy and kindest attention to the friends who stood hovering around the body. That such an event could occur in the midst of such a class of persons, and cause no greater attention than it did, simply furnishes an illustration of the state of people's minds and the immediate danger in which they believed themselves to be standing that morning.

The sparks and cinders were falling as fast and thick as hailstones in a storm; and, soon after daylight, to add to our discomfort and danger, the piles of household stuff, which covered the ground everywhere, began to burn. Among this stuff were many feather beds and hair mattresses, and the heat and smoke became so intense that we were obliged, from time to time, to change our position to one nearer the water. An hour later, and the immense piles of lumber on the south of us were all afire, and then came the period of our greatest trial. Dense clouds of smoke and cinders rolled over and enveloped us, and it seemed almost impossible to breathe. Men and beast alike rushed to the water's edge, and into the water, to avoid suffocation. There was a mixed mass of human beings, horses, dogs, truck-wagons and vehicles of all descriptions there. Some persons drove their horses into the lake as far as the poor beasts could safely go, and men, women and children waded out and clambered upon the wagons to which the horses were attached, while the lake was lined with people who were standing in the water at various depths, from their knees to their waists, all with their backs to the storm of fire which raged behind them.

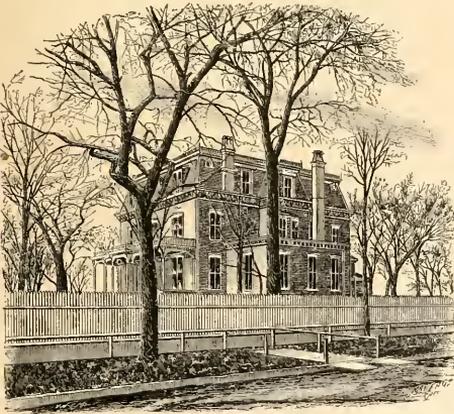

We remained in this position several hours, until the lumber yards were substantially destroyed and the intensity of the heat and smoke had, in some measure, subsided. I then moved slowly, with my family, north along the water's edge as far as the foot of Superior Street—which, indeed, was as far north as one could go on the lake shore, the burning ruins of Lill's brewery and dock making a bar to further progress in that direction. At the foot of Superior Street, there was a wooden one-story shanty, which had been erected for some manufacturing purpose, and which, by some sort of miracle, had escaped the fire; and as we were all suffering intensely with our eyes, in consequence of the heat and smoke to which they had been subjected, we determined to enter the place. We found it already very much crowded with people, and, after trying it for a short time, concluded that the open air, even with the heat and smoke, could be no worse; and therefore came out and sought a position behind the north wall of Superior Street, which had been extended quite to the lake shore. My wife, being very much fatigued, took a seat on the ground, but had been there only a few moments, when I discovered that her clothes were on fire. I immediately raised her, and succeeded in extinguishing the fire with my hands. We became satisfied that the safest place was on our feet, moving around, and waiting patiently until relief should come.

Between five and six o'clock in the afternoon I discovered a vehicle emerging from the smoke which still enveloped the city, although all the houses in this portion of it had already been destroyed. It was coming down Superior Street toward the lake, and I ran forward to meet it. It proved to be a covered one-horse grocery wagon; and I soon bargained with its driver to take as many as we could get into it, to the West Side, for ten dollars. Accordingly, my wife, son, father, sister, the mother of Mrs. Bliss, the French girl and myself, and also Mr. and Mrs. Butterfield, their daughter Clara, and their son Justin, with his pet goat, which he had been carefully trying to shelter and protect through the day, all packed ourselves into the wagon, and started for the West Side. The smoke was still so dense that we could see but little, and really had to grope our way along; but we saw enough to know that the North Side, at least, was destroyed, and that all that was left of the thousands of happy homes of the day before, were a few chimney stacks and an occasional broken and cracked wall. All the rest lay in the smoldering embers and tangled debris of the cellars. Our course was taken along Superior Street to Clark, down Clark to Kinzie, and across Kinzie-street bridge, which fortunately escaped the fire, to the West Side. When we arrived on the west side of the river, the driver asked me where we wanted to go. That question puzzled us all. We did not know. Anywhere, so that we could get a night's shelter and something to eat. It was now seven o'clock, and the last time that any of my family had partaken of food was at our five o'clock dinner on the preceding evening, twenty-six hours before. The man drove us up Washington Street, and stopped in front of a house, which he said was a boarding-house. While descending from the wagon, I was recognized by Mr. Charles Gray, who kindly invited my family, all he could accommodate, to come to his house, which was in the immediate vicinity, and where we were most hospitably treated by him and his wife, and everything they could think of to make us comfortable was done for us. Mr. and Mrs. Butterfield, and the rest, found quarters at the boarding-house.

That night was an extremely anxious one to all of us. Every one felt nervous lest some change of wind might cause another conflagration on the West Side; and as the supply of water was now entirely cut off, it could not be otherwise than disastrous. The streets were patrolled by citizens, who had organized them into districts for the purpose; and I, although somewhat fatigued, walked the district in which we were staying the greater part of the night. So timid did every one feel about fire, that smoking was prohibited on the streets; and it was one of the duties of the patrol to see that this regulation was carried out. An idea seemed also to prevail in the public mind that we stood in peril of incendiarism. I did not remove my clothes during the night.

At daybreak, I hailed an express wagon, and drove over to the North Side, to see if I could find the trunk of silver which I had directed to be buried. When we reached the North Side, everything was the picture of desolation. Not a house remained to the north, south or east of Wells Street, as far as the eye could reach, save only that of Mahlon D. Ogden. The telegraph wires lay curled and tangled upon the streets, and here and there was a dead horse, cow or animal of some kind, which had been overtaken by the fire, and perished. I saw that morning, however, but one dead human body, and that was on Dearborn, between Ohio and Ontario streets. It was burned beyond recognition. When I reached Mr. Magie's grounds, I found that old Matthew had faithfully executed my orders, and that the trunk and its contents were safe; and this was the only piece of personal property which remained to us after the fire. I put it into the express wagon, and drove back to Mr. Gray's house, where we all sat down to an excellent breakfast.

MAHLON D. OGDEN'S RESIDENCE.

I will now return to Mr. and Mrs. Magie. Their story, as related by themselves, is, that instead of following us out of the house, as we supposed at the time, they remained a few moments, to gather up a few keepsakes. That when they did come out, they encountered the same tornado which we had experienced, and were also driven back in their attempt to pass out of the gates on Ohio Street. They then, instead of going to the northeast corner of the block, as we had done, went to the northwest corner of it, where an immense elm tree stood, and which they thought would give them some shelter from the sparks and cinders which were falling upon and burning them terribly. After they had remained in this position for a short time, and when they supposed they were lost, they discovered a hole burned in the bottom of the fence on the State Street side, three or four feet long and two or three feet high, through which they crawled, and thus escaped into the street. They were by this time, however, badly burned upon their ears, noses, hands and limbs. They made their way up State Street to Chicago Avenue, along that street to LaSalle, and up the last street some distance, when a friendly door was thrown open to them. They had only been there a few hours, however, when the house in which they had taken refuge was threatened with destruction by the advancing fire, and they were obliged again to seek a place of safety. Following the crowd of fugitives northward as rapidly as their blistered limbs would permit, they reached North Avenue, along which they walked until they found themselves, late in the afternoon, on the western outskirts of the city, completely exhausted by fatigue and suffering. (It should be stated that Mr. and Mrs. Magie were both approaching seventy years of age at the time.) While standing upon the road not knowing what to do, they were met by Dr. Gillett, a gentleman who had known Mr. Magie in former years, and now recognized him. He kindly procured an express wagon, the only conveyance which was to be had, and assisting Mr. and Mrs. Magie into it, drove them immediately to his own house; so that, in addition to a comfortable shelter that night, the burns of Mr. and Mrs. Magie, which had now become most painful, received immediate and skillful medical attention from Dr. Gillett. Such was the total disorganization of the city immediately after the fire, that it was only after three days of the most diligent search, that we were able to learn whether Mr. and Mrs. Magie were still alive, and of their whereabouts. On finding them, we were all united under the hospitable roof of Mr. Stanford, where we remained a few days and until we could find a house to rent, which was no easy matter at that time.

NARRATIVE OF ARTHUR M. KINZIE.*—I had been, for the two years previous to October, 1871, at the North Manitow Island, near the lower end of Lake Michigan. Having decided to return to Chicago, I arrived here with my family and household goods on Friday, October 6th, and took up quarters temporarily at the residence of my uncle, Colonel Robert A. Kinzie, on Ontario Street, nearly opposite the Historical Society's building, between Clark and Dearborn streets. All of our furniture and effects were placed in a storage warehouse, corner of Cass and Michigan streets, I having refused an offer to store them on the West Side, because the building was of wood, and I was afraid they might be burned before we got settled in a house of our own.

On Sunday evening I had been on the South Side visiting my brother, and was returning home between eight and nine o'clock, when the fire alarm was sounded. After I had reached home and saw how rapidly the fire was increasing, I left the house and went toward the fire. I sat at the south entrance of the LaSalle-street tunnel for some time, until the buildings southwest of the Court-house square took fire, and then started home, convinced that the fire would sweep all the way to the Illinois Central depot, but not for an instant believing it would cross the river. I remember thinking how scared a woman must be who, at the north entrance of the tunnel, asked me if I thought the fire would reach there.

On arriving at Colonel Kinzie's, I found that he had just returned, having been over to his office, at the United States Army headquarters, to secure some valuable vouchers, which he barely succeeded in accomplishing, and that our wives had gone to look at the fire. I retired to my room, and sat reading for some time, when, on looking out of the window toward the south, I saw that the fire was on the North Side. My wife had not returned, so I aroused my two children, and commenced to dress them. At this time the policemen on duty were going from house to house rapping on the doors and telling the people not to go to bed, but to be ready to move on short notice. In a short time my wife and aunt returned, and stated that they had been trying to stamp out the fire in the leaves around Magie's place.

At this juncture, Mrs. Captain Johnson came running in, wild with excitement, and asking us all if our clothes were insured, rushed away again. Just then a boy pounded on the door, rang the bell furiously, and shouted, "Mr. Kinzie your house is on fire!" Hastily running up stairs to the back of the house, I found it to be a fact, and seizing a blanket from the bed, I took one of the children, my wife taking the other, and we left the house—to go, we knew not where. Turning north on Dearborn Avenue, we walked slowly along, scarcely realizing that we were not to return shortly, as if nothing had happened of a serious nature. When we arrived opposite Mr. Mahlon D. Ogden's house, my wife suggested going in there until the fire was over; but as I could not see how that was any safer place than where we had left, I decided to move on. A short distance farther on my wife declared she must stop and rest and get a drink of water, so we went into Obadiah Jackson's house, which we were passing at that time. Mrs. Jackson was very kind, but there was no water to be obtained, the Water Works having ceased operating. She had, however, some very nice bottled ale, which she gave us; and as we were enjoying that and resting, the gas suddenly went out and we were left in darkness. Mr. Jackson's carriage was at the door, and Mrs. Jackson was busy packing the silver, and such articles as they could carry with them, intending to depart as soon as the near approach of the fire forced them to do so. After resting a while longer, we started on again. Every block or two we would sit down on the edge of the sidewalk, and rest until the fire made us move onward. Very little was said by anyone; there was no loud talking or shouting, though the streets were crowded with people and vehicles of every description, loaded with every conceivable kind of luggage. I saw one man carrying the rubber tube and broken standard of a drop-light; another was trundling a wheelbarrow on which was a cook stove, while on his back was a huge feather bed. One woman had a live hen in her arms, several mad cats, and numbers had canary birds in cages. We met Dr. Tolman Wheeler pulling a trunk along the sidewalk by one of the straps; and as he was going directly toward the fire instead of away from it, I turned him around and started him in the right direction.

* Son of John H. Kinzie, one of the early settlers of Chicago.

Just after daylight, we reached the corner of Clark Street and North Avenue. At that place we found Hon. John Wentworth, accompanied by a boy carrying his black leather bag, whom he informed us was a bell-boy from the Tremont House that he had impressed into his services when he left the hotel. We consulted as to the best route to take. He advocated going west across the river, as by so doing we would get out of the track of the flames and eventually arrive at a place of safety. My idea was to push on to Lake View, where we had friends, and trust to the fire burning itself out before it got that far. And so we parted, each taking the route we had decided upon. At this time the whole appearance of things was most unnatural and solemn. The crowded streets and sidewalks; the incongruous heaps of humanity; the dust and smoke driven by the fierce gale which, with increasing force, was sweeping from the southwest; the lurid glare from the flames; and the silence which everyone maintained as they trudged wearily along, not knowing where they were going, nor where their enforced journey would end; together with the ever-falling sparks from the unrelenting and resistless wall of fire behind us, continually impelling us forward, all tended to make the scene one never to be forgotten, but impossible to fully describe.

A short time after leaving Mr. Wentworth and his bag-bearer, we took possession of an empty omnibus; and leaving my wife and children therein, I repaired to a livery stable near at hand, to see if I could make a bargain for some sort of a conveyance to move us more comfortably from the immediate vicinity of the fire. The proprietor did not give up the hope that, somehow or other, his property would be spared, so he would not let anything go out until he had to move altogether. "If I was a mind to wait," he said, "until the fire made him travel, he would give me a lift." No offers of any price could move him from that decision. I heard afterward that he waited so long that he lost most of his stock. When I returned to the omnibus, I found Mr. Thomas L. Forrest talking to my wife, and he kindly invited us to his house, a square or two distant, to rest and have some breakfast. This we gladly consented to do. Mr. Forrest and myself went up on the roof of his house. The sight was truly awful! Towards the south nothing to be seen but what seemed a solid wave of smoke and fire rolling slowly towards us, the latter darting and leaping upward, it seemed, hundreds of feet. The wind was so strong that we could not stand on the roof without holding on to something. When we were moving along Wells Street I could see, as I looked back occasionally, the fire make a jump across the street from west to east and strike a building; the front would melt away, exactly as a sheet of paper laid on a bed of burning coals will smoulder awhile, then suddenly flash up, and be gone. I also observed burning pieces of boards sailing along, high over our heads, that were certainly six feet long and as many inches wide.

When it became evident, later in the day, that our kind host's refuge would soon become untenable, we resumed our enforced pilgrimage. Before we left there, I was out on the street, when I was accosted by Ira Bowen, seated in a one-horse wagon loaded with his Laces and Penates, who said, with the tears making light-colored streaks down his dusky cheeks, "Arth., have you seen my wife and baby? I've lost them!" I answered, "No," and inquired where he had lost them. He said that he had got into his store wagon, put his wife and baby into his carriage, and told the driver to follow him, but, on looking around a short while before, they were nowhere to be seen. He said, "My store is burned; my house is burned; everything is burned; but I won't care for it all, if I can only find my wife and baby." I asked him where he was intending to go when he started, and he said he thought of going to Mrs. Reynolds's. He said he had not been there yet, so I suggested that he do so; and he found them there.

The rest of the trip to the city limits was much the same as the first part of the journey. We saw thousands encamped in Lincoln Park, each group surrounded by the few household effects they had been able to save and transport to that place. On arriving at the city limits, we found Colonel Robert Kinzie's family comfortably settled at the hospitable mansion of Robert Clarke, who, with his family, were busily engaged cooking and distributing food to the famishing refugees who crowded the grounds and adjacent street.

After remaining a short time we accepted the invitation of John Hunter, the conductor of the Lake View dummy, to make his house at Graceland our home, and reached there about dark, Monday evening. The neighboring woods contained a goodly number of outcasts, and the street cars, which had been run up there for safety, made a comfortable shelter for many. A number of the inhabitants of that vicinity were at work with plows and spades, digging trenches and ditches to prevent the fire from passing through Wright's Woods. During the evening the prairie to the west of us took fire, and we began to think that, after all, the lake would be the only safe refuge from the devouring element. That fire, however, shortly burned itself out, which relieved our minds very much. About midnight I heard some one call my name, and running out, I found, with what gratitude to God no one can tell, a carriage containing my brother George and my brother-in-law, who had started at noon, on Monday, from Indiana Avenue near Twelfth Street, and by driving around on the West Side, and thence to the North Side, had succeeded in getting in front of the fire and tracking us to that place. The carriage was loaded with provisions and jugs of water. I hastily gathered my family, and bidding adieu to our kind entertainers, we started for my wife's sisters', on the South Side. In passing through the vacant part of the west side, we distributed our provisions and water to those we could find of the sick, who were encamped in large numbers in that vicinity. We saw in one place a very sick man. His wife was attending him, and had obtained an old piano packing-case, which she had placed on its side, with the bottom toward the wind, and made a bed for her husband inside. A piece of candle fastened to a wire, hung from the top, by the light of which she was reading to him. Her greatest trouble was want of water, and when we gave her a jugful, her gratitude knew no bounds. It was a strange sight as we passed through the burned district that night. All the squares formerly built up solidly were now so many black excavations, while the streets had the appearance of raised turnpikes intersecting each other on a level prairie. All the coal yards were still burning, and gave light enough to travel without difficulty. About daylight, on Tuesday, we reached our destination, truly thankful that we had escaped with our lives, and were provided with shelter and kind friends, while so many were without either at that terrible time.

GEORGE PAYSON'S NARRATIVE.—In October, 1871, I was living at No. 248 North LaSalle Street. At half-past two in the morning of October 9, we were awakened and informed that there was a great fire down town, and that the Court House had just fallen. I dressed in the utmost haste, and in twenty minutes was at my office, No. 39 South Clark Street. I ran into my office and looked around. A fireproof safe stood in one of the rooms, stuffed full of valuable papers. I could not move that, nor did I think it necessary, for it would be safe of course. It never occurred to me that when we came to open it, as we did a week after, we should find nothing but a mass of cinders. I had nothing but my own hands, and it was little enough that I could carry away in them. I fixed on two volumes of Freeman's Illinois Digest, which I had owned for years, and nearly filled with marginal notes, and a large manuscript volume of briefs, which I valued more for the labor they had cost than for any good they might afterward do me. With these books under my arm, I started to return to the North Side. The lights were out in the LaSalle-street tunnel, and the light of the fire could not penetrate the narrow passage. I still seem to hear the oft repeated cry of "Keep to the right," "Keep to the right," by which the burning fugitives gave each other notice of their approach. * * *

From time to time I went to see how the fire was advancing. Its progress was by no means as rapid as is sometimes supposed. It consumed about eight hours in traveling over the space between my house and the Court House, and this dilatory movement occasionally inspired hopes that it might in some way be checked. At Chicago Avenue, on account of its great width, there was some thought of making a formal attempt to stay the advance of the flames by tearing down the houses on the south side of the street; but there was no one with authority to direct operations, and the work was abandoned almost as soon as it was begun.

About six o'clock, Mr. Charles A. Gregory drove up to my door with a horse and buggy, and kindly offered to take my wife and baby to a place of safety. I gladly accepted this offer, and he accordingly took them, with the nurse, to the house of C. N. A. Hutchinson, just north of Lincoln Park, and about two miles from my home, where it was supposed they would be entirely beyond the reach of danger. I remained with my boy to look after the house, which I yet hoped might in some way be preserved, and which I was determined at all events to guard from the thieves, who were now hard at work seeking to profit by the common misfortune. To make sure of our clothing, however, I removed that to the house of Dr. Clark, on Wells Street, and a little farther from the fire than my own. This gentleman was the owner of a large number of rare and valuable pictures, which he had been collecting for years, and most of which, I was sorry to learn afterward, were destroyed.

About ten o'clock, my wife surprised me by returning to our house. Having no longer any fear for her baby, she had become anxious on our account, and could not help coming to look after us. I went with her to the house of Dr. Clark, and, leaving her there, hastened back to my house, to make one final effort for its preservation.

As I have already stated, the fire on the North Side began near the lake, half a mile east of LaSalle Street, and burned first all the houses in that direction. A second detachment then came up from the south and destroyed another line of houses parallel to the first, and so on till the work was complete, like reapers in a field of wheat. Thus it happened that the houses opposite, on the east side of LaSalle Street, burned long before my own, and, from my front windows, I saw it all. A large English ivy that we had been training for years covered nearly the whole front of our parlor. As the windows grew hotter and hotter from the fire opposite, I took down this ivy and laid it all out on the floor, if not to save it, at least to postpone its fate as long as possible. I remained in my house till long after all those opposite had burned to the ground, and till the fire had come up in the rear, forgetting that there might be my only way of escape. In the meantime I made a feeble attempt to save the house. I knocked down the wooden steps that led up to the back door, and covered with blankets the doors that led down into the cellar. Having a bathtub half full of water, I brought down a pailful to throw upon the blankets. As I opened the back door for that purpose, I saw the fire coming along the rear of the block with wonderful rapidity. A long arm of flame, seemingly without support, would dart out through the air; one touch of its finger, and instantly the wooden balconies, fences and outbuildings were in a blaze. A lucifer match does not burn more quickly. Suddenly I received a blow in my face, as from some solid body, that almost knocked me off my feet. It was another burst of flame that came, I could not tell whence, but it was enough to show me that I could not delay where I was much longer. I hastily closed the door, but the next moment it was bored through by the flames in a dozen places, as if it had been so much tissue paper. I saw then that this was the end of it. As the fire came into the house at the back, I ran out at the front, into the burning street. The fence by the side of the door was already blazing, but happily the sidewalk had not yet caught. That was the last I saw of my house till I came, some days later, to survey the ruins, and to moralize, as I suppose so many others have done, over the spot where once had been a pleasant home, but now only a heap of bricks, with the fire still smouldering beneath.

Arrived once more at Dr. Clark's, we all refreshed ourselves with the tea Mrs. Clark was thoughtful enough to offer us, and then started on our way to the house of Dr. George E. Shipman, on Peoria Street, between Randolph and Lake, on the West Side, about three miles away. Burdened as I was with my impedimenta, I could not move fast enough to suit my wife, who was impatient to get to Dr. Shipman's, in order to send some one from there in search of our little girl. She accordingly left us, and went on alone, while we followed more slowly after. We went by way of Division Street, that being the nearest bridge that was then passable. There, too, were thronging thousands, seeking, like us, the nearest way of escape.

It was about five o'clock when we at length arrived at Dr. Shipman's. My wife had reached there, after a very exhausting journey, some hours before, and had dispatched a messenger as soon as possible in search of our absent child. He brought back only the dismal tidings that Mr. Hutchinson's family also had at last been compelled to fly, but where they had gone was more than he could tell. I lay that night on the parlor floor, but not to sleep. No one knew how soon we might be again aroused. The horrors through which we had passed, our fears for the future, our anxiety for our little girl, all conspired to keep us in a state of the most intense excitement.

Early the next morning, I started with Dr. Shipman's horse and buggy in search of my child. Mr. Hutchinson's house, whither I first proceeded, was in ashes, as was also that of Dr. Foster, just north of it. Where should I now go? was the next question. As the natural course of the fugitives would lie in that direction, I concluded to go north into Lake View. The house of Mr. Daniel Goodwin, near the lake shore, was the only place I could think of where Mr. Gregory would have been likely to seek refuge; but here too I was disappointed. The house was standing, the fire not having gone so far, but those I sought were not there, nor any one who could give me any information of them. But a little farther on I met Mr. Mahlon D. Ogden, and learned from him that Mr. Gregory had taken his family out to Emanuel House, a large building occupied as a school, and standing several miles away by itself in the open prairie. My poor horse was by this time well nigh exhausted; but as I now felt sure that I had nearly reached the end of my journey, I pushed on over a wretched road, till Emanuel House at last came in sight, within the walls of which I felt sure of finding the fugitives. But they were not there. They had left the house with Mr. Hutchinson the evening before—that was all I could learn. I drove back to Lake View, without any idea where to look next, and almost in despair. It seemed as if my search would be in vain, and I should have to go back alone. But just then I met Mr. Greenleaf, formerly clerk of the Circuit Court, with whom I was fortunately well acquainted. I stopped, as we were about to pass each other, and asked me if I had found my child and nurse. "No," I cried; "do you know anything about them?" "Yes," said he; "I carried them last evening to the house of Mr. Ward, down here on the lake shore." It was even so. He had found them wandering aimlessly along the road the evening before, not knowing where to turn; and, after everyone else had refused to render them any assistance, he had taken them to a place of rest and safety. He now gave me the necessary directions—the house was not far away; and as I drove up to the door, my little girl, in her nurse's arms, was smiling at me from the window. I found out then how much harder it is to bear joy than pain. That night we were all united.

RUINS, C. H. MCCORMICK'S RESIDENCE.

The history of the next week is known to everyone. It was a week of constant fear and excitement. At night, the light of the huge piles of coal, that continued to burn long after the last house had fallen, filled the sky, constantly causing new alarm. Every hour brought in fresh accounts of incendiaries caught in the very act—accounts so minute and direct that it was almost impossible not to believe them. The destruction of the Water Works, and the consequent want of all means for putting out any second fire greatly increased our anxiety. All that week I never undressed, and hardly slept, not knowing but what at any moment we might be driven to seek safety in the open prairie. In anticipation of such an event, we arranged our plans and mapped out the best line of flight, so that we might all meet, at least, at the same point. But the week passed away, and then another; the Water Works were repaired; the troops came to give us courage, if they did nothing else; sympathy and money and clothing came pouring in upon us; we all at once found out that the world was very big, and that Chicago, though so often scoffed at, was not without many a good lover. And so, by slow degrees, our life flowed back into its old channels.

EXPERIENCE OF HON. ISAAC N. ARNOLD. — The eminent social and professional rank held by Mr. Arnold renders his narrative valuable as a type, while the peculiar adventures of the family, without parallel so far as we have been able to learn, add a romantic touch which enlivens the story with thrilling interest. Why Mr. Arnold chose to ascend the river, between the still burning tracts, instead of going southward on the lake, is a question that naturally suggests itself; but at that time the lake was enveloped in a cloud of smoke and fire, from the burning South Side, and navigation thereon was exceedingly hazardous. Among the many elegant homes which graced a portion of the North Side, there were few that surpassed the Arnold mansion in the appointments which attend a cultivated and intellectual taste. Mr. Arnold enjoyed the fruits of a life devoted to mental labor, as a lawyer of distinction, a litterateur and a public man. He was the friend and biographer of Abraham Lincoln. His spacious home, with its grounds, occupied the whole block bounded by Erie, Huron, Pine and Rush streets. The grounds were filled with beautiful shrubbery and trees, and entirely secluded by a luxuriant lilac hedge. Perhaps the most noticeable feature was the vines of wild grape, Virginia creeper, and bitter-sweet, which hung in graceful festoons from the massive elms, and covered with their dense foliage piazzas and summer houses. There was a quaint fountain playing in front, beneath a perfect bower of overhanging vines. A great rock, upon which had been rudely carved the features of an Indian chief, had been pierced, and over the head of the old chief the water of Lake Michigan was always throwing its spray. On one side of the entrance was a little greenhouse, gay with flowers. Two vineries of choice varieties of foreign grapes, and a large greenhouse and barn, constituted the out-buildings. On the lawn was a sun-dial with the inscription,

"Moras non numero nisi serenas."

Alas! the tablet vindicated its motto but too well. It was broken by the heat or in the melée which accompanied the fire, and the dark hours which have followed pass by without its reckoning.

The failure of Mr. Arnold to save anything, was the result of a most determined effort to save everything, and his too confident belief that he could succeed. Nor did this confidence seem to be unreasonable. His house, standing in the center of an open block, with a wide street, and the Newberry Block, with only one house, in front, and the Ogden Block, with only one house, to the right, directly in the pathway of the flames—it is not surprising that he believed he could save his home. Besides, he had connections by hose with hydrants, both in front and rear of his house. Mrs. Arnold had placed what proved a better estimate upon the danger; and, calling up the family, and dressing little Alice, a child of eight years, she left the house, and went to her daughter's (Mrs. Scudder), leaving Mr. Arnold and the remainder of the family—consisting of an older daughter, a lad of thirteen, a school-girl of fifteen, and the servants—to fight the battle with the flames.

There was a sea of fire to the south and southwest; the wind blew a perfect gale, carrying smoke and sparks, shingles, pieces of lumber and roofs, directly over the house. Everything was parched and as dry as tinder. The leaves from the trees and shrubbery covered the ground. Mr. Arnold turned on the water to the fountains, to wet the ground and grass, and attached the hose to the hydrants. He stationed the servants on each side of the house, and others on the piazzas, and for an hour and a half—perhaps two hours—was able, by the utmost vigilance and exertion, to extinguish the flames as often as they caught. During all this time, the fire was falling in torrents—there was literally a rain of fire. It caught in the dry leaves, it caught in the grass, in the barn, in the piazzas; and, as often as it caught, it was extinguished before it made any headway. When the barn first caught, the horses and cow were removed to the lawn. The fight was successfully maintained until three o'clock in the morning. Every moment flakes of fire, falling upon dry wood, would be kindled by the high wind into a rapid blaze, and the next instant they would be extinguished. Every moment, the contest grew warmer, and more desperate, until, by three o'clock, the defenders of the castle were becoming seriously exhausted. At the hour mentioned, Arthur Arnold called to his father, "The barn and hay are on fire!" "The leaves are on fire on the east side!" said the gardener. "The front piazza is in a blaze!" cried another. "The water greenhouse is in flames!" "The roof is on fire!" "The water has stopped!" was the last appalling announcement. "Now, for the first time," said Mr. Arnold, "I gave up all hopes of saving my home, and considered whether we could save any of its contents. My pictures, papers, and books—could I save them?" An effort was made to cut down some portraits, a landscape of Kensett, and Otsego Lake by Mignot—it was too late! Seizing a bundle of papers, Mr. Arnold gathered the children and servants together, and, leading the terrified animals, they went forth from their so dearly-cherished home. But whither? They were surrounded by fire on three sides; to the south, west and north, raged the flames, making a wall of fire and smoke from the ground to the sky. Their only escape, was eastward to the lake shore. Still leading the horses and cow, they went onward to the beach. Here were gathered thousands of fugitives, hemmed in and imprisoned by the raging element. The Sands, from the Government pier, north to Lill's pier, a distance of three-quarters of a mile, were covered with men, women and children—some half-clad, in every variety of dress, with the motley collection of effects, which they sought to save. Some had silver, some, valuable papers; some, pictures, carpets, beds, etc. One little child had her doll tenderly pressed in her arms; an old Irish woman was cherishing a grunting pig; a fat woman had two large pillows, as portly as herself. There was a singular mixture of the awful, the ludicrous, and the pathetic. Reaching the water's edge, the fugitives paused to examine the situation and to determine where was the least danger. Southwest, toward the river, were millions of feet of lumber, many shanties, and wooden structures yet unburned, but which must be consumed, before there could be any abatement of the danger. The air was full of cinders and smoke; the wind blew the heated sand worse than any sirocco. Where was a place of refuge? William B. Ogden had lately constructed a long pier, north of, and parallel with, the old United States pier, which prolonged the left bank of the river out into the lake, and this had been filled with stone, but had not been planked over; hence, it would not readily burn. It was a hard road to travel, but it seemed the safest place; and Mr. Arnold and his children worked their way far out upon this pier. With much difficulty, the party crossed from the Ogden slip, in a small row-boat, and entered the light-house, where they, with Judge Goodrich, Edward I. Tinkham, and others, were hospitably received.

"* I number none but serene (or happy) hours."

The party remained prisoners in the light-house, and on the pier on which it stood, for several hours. The shipping in the river above was burning; the immense grain elevators of the Illinois Central and North-Western railroads were a mass of flames; and the pier itself, some distance up the river, was slowly burning toward the light-house. A large propeller, fastened to the dock a short distance up the river, took fire and burned. The danger was that, as soon as the hawsers by which it was moored should be burned off, it would float down stream, and set fire to the dock in the immediate vicinity of the light-house. Several propellers moved down near the mouth of the river, and took on board several hundred fugitives, and steamed out into the lake. If the burning propeller should come down, it would set fire to the pier, the light-house, and vast piles of lumber. A fire company was organized of those on the pier, and with water, dipped in pails from the river, the fire was kept at bay. But all felt relieved when the propeller went to the bottom. The party was still prisoners on an angle of sand, the fire running along the north shore of the river. The river and the fire prevented an escape to the south. West and north, the flames were still raging with unabated fury. The party waited for hours, hoping the fire would subside. The day wore on—noon passed—one, two o'clock; and still it seemed impossible to escape to land. Mr. Arnold, scouting to the northward, found his gardener where he had left him, sitting upon the horse far out in the lake, and holding on faithfully to the pony by its halter and to the cow by her horns. The escape to the north was pronounced impracticable for the ladies. And all the while they were in great danger and great anxiety concerning the fate of the missing mother and child.

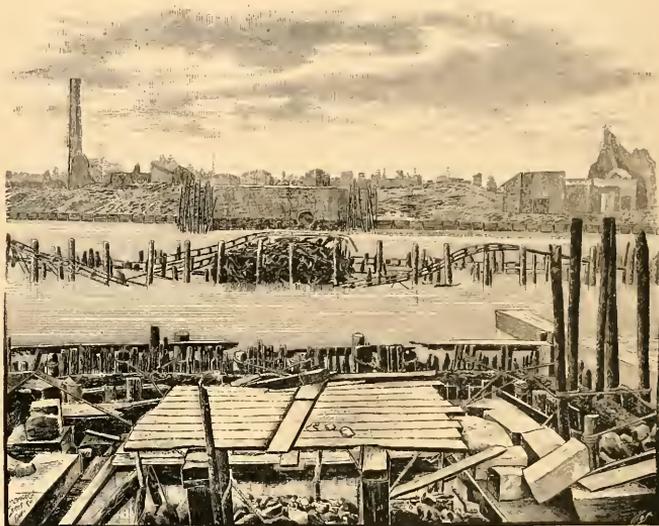

Between three and four o'clock p. m., the tug "Clifford" steamed down the river, having escaped from the burning district, and tied up to the dock near the light-house. Could she return, taking the party up the river, through and beyond the fire, to the West Side? The captain thought she could. The bridges at Rush State, Clark, and Wells streets had all burned, and their fragments had fallen into the river. The great warehouses, stores, elevators, and docks along the river were still burning, but the fury of the fire had exhausted itself. The party determined to go through this narrow channel—to run the gauntlet of the fire to a point outside of the burned district. This was the most dangerous experience of the day. The tug might take her herself—her woodwork had been blistered by the heat as she came down. The engine might become unmanageable after she got inside the line of fire; or she might get entangled in the floating timbers and debris of the fallen bridges. However, the party determined to make the attempt. A full head of steam was gotten up; the hose was attached to the pumps, so that if the boat or the clothes of its passengers took fire they could be readily put out; the ladies and children were placed in the pilot house—the windows shut, and the boat started—in the shelter of the bulwarks. At the State-street bridge, the pilot had to pick his way very carefully through a mass of debris, and the situation began to look exceedingly hazardous. But it was too late to turn back; and so the voyagers pushed on, shooting as rapidly as possible past the hottest places, and slowing where the danger was from below. As they were passing State-street bridge, the pumps gave out, and they now ran great risk from fire. Arthur's hat blew away, and his father covered his face and head with a handkerchief, which he had dipped in the water. Finally they passed the Wells-street bridge, and were still unscathed. "Is not the worse over?" asked Mr. Arnold of the captain. "We are through, sir," was the answer. "We are safe, thank God!" came from hearts and lips, as the boat emerged from the smoke into the clear, cool air outside the fire lines.

Search for the missing ones was immediately commenced. Mr. Arnold spent over twenty-four hours in driving and wandering in pursuit of his wife; now passing among the throng of refugees at Lincoln Park, and peering into every grimy countenance; now getting a clue, whether true or false, and dashing off by a train into a suburb; now baffled entirely and compelled to commence the search entirely anew. Some time during the following afternoon his efforts were rewarded by learning that his wife and child were at the house of Judge Drummond, of the United States Circuit Court, at a suburb called Winfield; and there, during the evening of Tuesday, the family were re-united and joined in thanks to God for their mutual deliverance.

The ensuing narrative gives the experience of a member of another class of society than that in which Mr. Arnold mingled. But it is not the less interesting and touching; on the contrary, the loss by a day-laborer of the accumulations by dint of economy is more irreparable than the loss of one whose intellectual power enables him readily to replace any financial deprivation.

NARRATIVE OF PATRICK WEBB.—In 1860, I built a frame house, No. 204 Church Street, North Side. I was then employed by the North-Western Railroad Company, near Chicago-avenue bridge, as a day-laborer. Monday morning, about two o'clock, I heard the fire-bells, but concluded there was no danger of the fire spreading north, and went to bed again. I rose at the usual hour, and went to my work. My son was employed by Holmes, Prytt & Co. About ten o'clock a. m., Monday, the foreman told me the wind had changed to the south, and that the North Side was in danger. He told me to go home. I did so; and found the fire had crossed the river, but was still a mile away from where I lived. I and my son helped a family, a relative of ours, on Wells Street, to remove their property. The fire at this time was raging along Wells Street and east to the lake, but had spread no farther west. Church Street, where I lived, was crowded with wagons loaded with all kinds of household property. The fire had then passed east of my house one block, so we thought we were safe. Soon afterward word was passed that Chicago-avenue bridge, and the distillery near it, were on fire. The wind, blowing a gale from the south, soon spread the fire about six blocks east to the other fire, and west to Orchard Street. All the loaded wagons that crowded Church Street hastened north to the prairie; and I sent my son to try and get a wagon at any cost—but it was too late, there was none to be had for love or money. I saw some poor men digging pits in the ground, and putting their little household property in them, so I thought I would do the same; and three of us went to work as hard as we could, and dug a pit about three feet deep by three wide, till the water stopped us. While the women were filling the first pit, we were digging another, and so on till every article of furniture, bedding, clothing and utensils were in the ground and covered; but, unfortunately, they were not half covered, for we had not time, as the sparks and burning brands were then falling around us, blown by the strong wind, and we had to escape for our lives. I asked my wife to give me some clothes, as I had nothing on but my underclothes, overalls and overshirt. To my surprise, she told me she did not see them, but supposed they were in the pit, and covered up with other things. There was no help for it. We then went north about half a mile, to the prairie, where there were no houses to burn—I, my wife, and four children (the eldest thirteen years and the youngest thirteen months), and like hundreds of miserable creatures, settled ourselves in the angle of a fence, without shelter, clothing or provisions. There we remained that long cold night till about five o'clock next morning, when a Lutheran church was opened to admit the shivering crowd, which soon filled it, and right glad to get the shelter. We suffered that night very much from the cold. Soon afterward we were told they were giving some provisions to those that had none; so I went and asked some for my family, for we had eaten nothing since about noon the day before. I got a little bread and meat. It was now that I felt real bad, for I considered myself a beggar. I left my family in the church, and hurried off to where my house had stood. It was very difficult for me to find the place, as there was nothing left to mark the spot. When I did find it, I saw smoke issuing from the pits where all that we possessed in the world was buried. I found the shovel that I was working with the previous evening, and examined the pits, but when I stirred them, they blazed up; I had not a drop of water to cast on them. I felt broken down in spirits, seeing all that I had saved during my life (about $1,500) by hard labor, honesty and sobriety, swept away in a few hours, and I at the age of fifty-eight. I returned to the church to tell my wife our great loss, but she and the children, I was told, had left, and were on the way to Waukegan. Our brother-in-law, Stephen Drew, left Waukegan by the first train in search of us, and, after much difficulty, found my family in the church, and took them with him to his house, where they had a home with his family till I had built a hut on my lot to shelter them for the winter. I was insured in the Firemen's Insurance Co., of Chicago, for $800. I think I received about $30 from them; also, ninety dollars' worth of lumber and $100 cash from the Relief Committee, besides some coal, provisions and clothing.

CLARK STREET BRIDGE, LOOKING NORTH.

MRS. MARY FALES TO HER MOTHER.—The following letter was written the second day after the fire, by Mrs. Mary Fales, wife of David Fales, a lawyer. It possesses interest, both because of its date and unconventional tone, which latter differs from a statement intended for publication :

CHICAGO, October 10, 1871.

Dear Mamma:—You have probably heard of our fire, and will be glad to know that we are safe, after much tribulation. Sunday night, a fire broke out on the West Side, about three miles southwest of us. The wind was very high, and David said it was a bad night for a fire. About two o'clock we were awakened by a very bright light and a great noise of carts and wagons. Upon examination, David found that the fire was not at all on the North Side, but was burning so furiously on the South Side that the whole sky was bright. They thought it would stop when it came to the river; but it proved no obstacle, and the North Side was soon on fire, and Wells and LaSalle streets were crowded with carts and people going north. We saw that with such a wind it would soon reach our neighborhood, and David told me to pack what I most valued. It seemed useless to pack in trunks, as every vehicle demanded an enormous price, and was engaged. Several livery stables were already burned, and loose horses were plenty. One of the Wheeler boys had a horse given him for nothing, excepting a promise to lead it to a safe place. He took it home and tied it in their yard. Having no wagon, it was of no use to him, so David took it, and after a while succeeded in finding a no-top buggy. We felt very lucky, as nobody around could get either horse or conveyance. David packed it full of things, set me and himself on top, and started off to the Hutchinsons.

I can not convey to you how the streets looked. Everybody was out of their houses, without exception, and the sidewalks were covered with furniture and bundles of every description. The middle of the street was a jam of carts, carriages, wheelbarrows and every sort of vehicle—many horses being led along, all excited and prancing, some running away. I scarcely dared look right or left, as I kept my seat by holding tightly to the trunk. The horse would not be restrained, and I had to use all my powers to keep on. I was glad to go fast, for the fire behind us raged, and the whole earth, or all we saw of it, was a lurid, yellowish red.

David left me at Aunt Eng's and went for another load of things. This he soon brought back, and then he went off again, and I saw him no more for seven hours. People came crowding to Aunt Eng's, and the house was full of strangers and their luggage. One young lady, who was to have had a fine wedding to-morrow, came dragging along some of her wedding presents. One lady came with four servants, and one with six blankets full of clothing. One lady came with nurse and baby, and, missing her little boy, went off to look for him. This was about daylight, and she did not come back at all. Now and then somebody's husband would come back for a minute; but there was work for everybody, and they only stayed long enough to say how far the fire advanced, and assured us of safety. At twelve, David came and said that he had taken everything out of our house, and buried the piano and books, together with the china, in Mr. Hubbard's grounds. He saw persons taking off all the chairs, tables and light furniture, without saying a word, for he knew they would burn, even in the street, and my nice preserves, which Maggie had set out on the piazza, he gave freely to anybody who cared to take them.

The Hubbards thought they were safe in a brick house with so much ground around it; but wet their carpets and hung them over the wooden facings for additional safety. It was all no purpose. David saw ours burn and fall, and then theirs shared the same fate. The McCagg's large house and stables burned in a few minutes; also the New England Church and Mr. Collyer's. In the afternoon the wind blew more furiously, the dust was blinding, the sky gray and leaden, and the atmosphere dense with smoke. We watched the swarms of wagons and people pass. All the men, and many of the women, were dragging trunks by cords tied in the handles, and children were carrying and pulling big bundles. Soon they said Aunt Eng's house must go too. Then such confusion as there was! Everybody trying to get a cart, and not one to be had at any price. After a while, two of the gentlemen, who had wagons, carried their wives farther north, and those that were left watched for empty wagons, but nobody spoke a word. Mr. Hutchinson, David, and some others, were taking things out and burying them, and many of the ladies fairly lost their wits. Poor Aunt Eng even talked of sending home a shawl that somebody left there long ago. David started for a cart. Again he was successful, and got an old sand-cart, with no springs, one board out of the bottom, with a horse that had not been out of harness for twenty-four hours. He put in all our things, and one trunk of Aunt Eng's, to which Miss M. added a band-box. The West Side was safe; but to get there was the question. The bridges were blocked and some burned, but the man who owned the cart thought we could get there. We thought of Judge Porter's and Mr. Dupe's, where we believed we would be welcome. Wherever Aunt Eng's family went, they must walk, and our prospects seemed so fair that we took May with us. Our ride was an anxious one. The horse had been over-used, and, when urged on, would kick till the old cart bid fair to break in pieces; then he would go on, and finally, finding kicking no use, gave it up, much to my relief. Many times we were blocked, and it seemed as if the fire must reach the bridge before we did. But we were much too well off to complain. Some carts had broken down, horses had given out, and many people were walking and pulling big things, and seemed almost exhausted. Furniture and clothing lay all along the road. Mrs. Hamilton hailed us from a mean little hut, two miles from her house and ours, and asked us to take a bag of Mr. Hubbard's silver. It must have been some servant's house. Anyway, it was burnt soon after, and we still have the silver. The fences were broken in all the unburnt fields, and furniture and people covered every yard of space. After a ride of two hours and a half, we reached Judge Porter's at dusk, and found a warm welcome.

Every family I know on the North Side is burnt out. I can't enumerate them. It would be useless. It is sufficient to say, every individual one. We were the only ones who took our things from Aunt Eng's. The lady with the six bundles left five behind her; the lady with the four servants left a bundle of French dresses to burn, but, worst of all, the baby and nurse. They went with the Hutchinsons. At the last minute, a Miss M. insisted on David taking charge of her watch; she said she could trust it to no one else, and it did not occur to her to keep it herself. All of our clothing is saved, and much we have with us.

I never felt so grateful in my life as to hear the rain pour down at three o'clock this morning. That stopped the fire.

The gentlemen have come in, and David says the piano burned under the ground; nothing was left but the iron plates. The North Side is level, as is the burned part of the South Side, so that the streets are not distinguishable. They say people in every class of life are out of doors. The churches are full, and food is sent to them, but hardly anybody has any to spare. My watch was at the jeweler's, and may have been in a safe, but the safes have not yet been uncovered. I shall write soon again; meanwhile, direct to 445 West Washington Street.

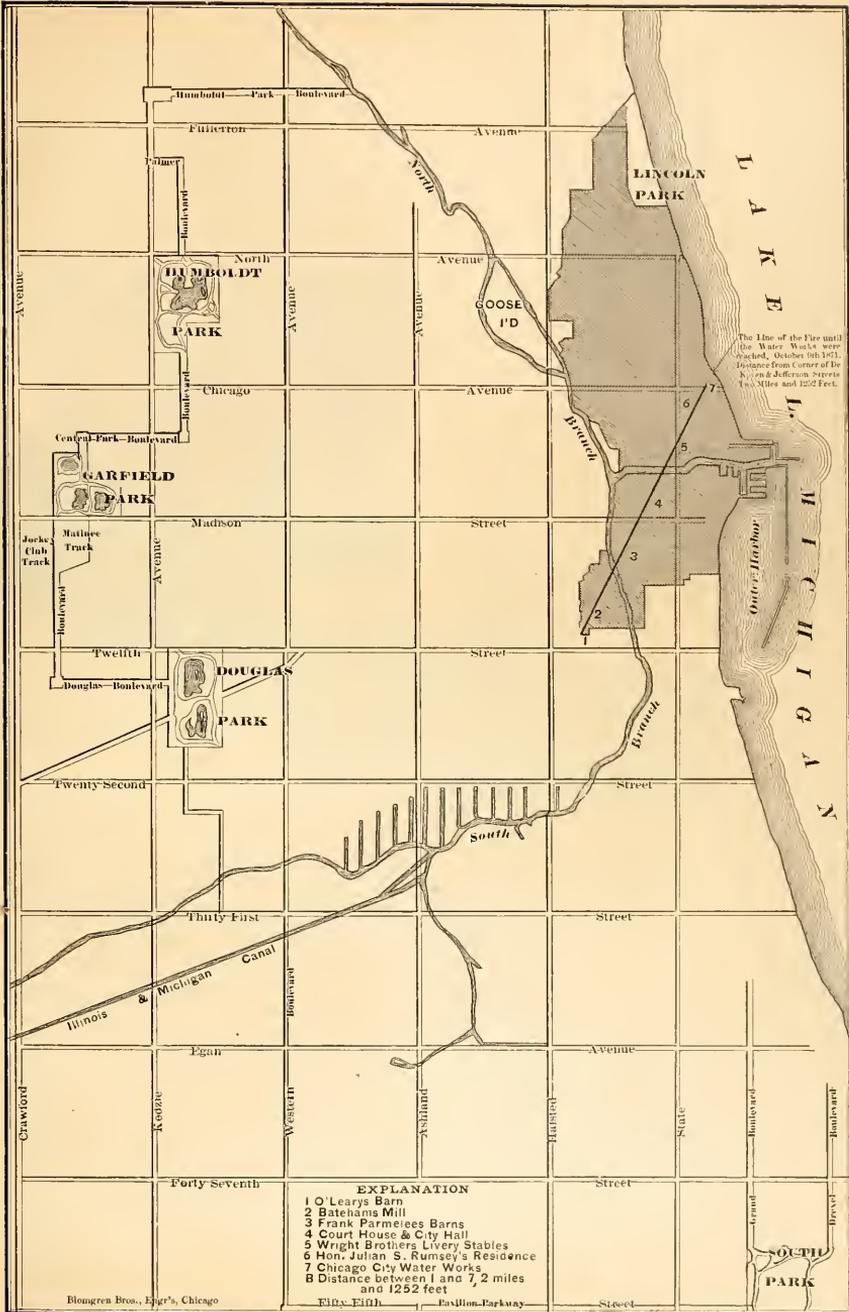

Lovingly and thankfully,
MARY.

NARRATIVE OF GEORGE M. HIGGINSON.—From a very minute narrative of scenes and incidents which came within the observation of George M. Higginson, and which, in manuscript form, is deposited with the Chicago Historical Society, the following interesting facts are gathered :

Mr. Higginson was engaged in real estate business, with an office in Metropolitan Block, northwest corner Randolph and LaSalle streets. He resided at No. 230 Dearborn Avenue, about one hundred and fifty feet north of Chicago Avenue. The house, which he owned, faced the east. His family consisted of his wife and two sons, Dudley and Alexander. Mr. Higginson noticed the glare of the fire about half-past ten o'clock, and became impressed with a sense of impending danger, but endeavored to shake off the apparently unreasonable feeling, and go to sleep. He says :

When I first saw the fire from the roof of my house, the wind was blowing quite freshly from the southwest. After I lay down, it seemed to increase somewhat in power. I began to hear the rattling and rumbling of carts and heavy wagons, indicating that the population was becoming aware of the fact that a great conflagration was under way.

At about half-past one o'clock, I was awakened by a slight noise in my room. I noticed my wife looking out of the window. She called my attention to the rapid spread of the fire and the sound of falling walls. To put on my coat and boots was the work of an instant. As I opened the front door, I saw the cinders falling like flakes of snow in a storm, though the bulk of them fell to the eastward of my house and toward the lake. As I looked to the south, the sky over the city was a bright red, glowing like a furnace, and studded with innumerable sparks, ignited cinders and blazing embers, shining like myriads of red stars; but I could see no flames nor even smoke. Indeed, the absence of smoke from any point of view I had of the fire was a notable characteristic, which I attributed to the intensity of the heat. I continued my course, running down Dearborn Street to Kinzie, and kept on the south side of Kinzie Street, intending to go as far as LaSalle, and there pass through the tunnel. To the best of my recollection, I saw very few people or teams on the route. It seemed as if I were alone in the city, that the last day had come, and the final conflagration of all things created was at hand. I pressed forward, and in a moment an appalling spectacle burst upon my sight,—scores of beautiful structures enveloped in flames, which extended nearly across the street. As clearly as I could judge from my point of view, near the north end of the tunnel, the fire had reached as far north as Washington Street on LaSalle, opposite the Chamber of Commerce. This part of LaSalle Street was occupied by fine stone buildings, which had only four or five years ago re-placed the old wooden structures first erected on the ground some twenty-five years before.

SECTIONAL MAP OF CITY SHOWING BURNED DISTRICT

Heretofore I had been surprised at the absence of people in the streets, but at the outlet of the tunnel, on the north, a stream of fugitives issued in solid mass. As I edged my way in, I noticed by the gas lights which were still burning along the top of the arch, that the road and foot-passageway were crowded with refugees, all going in one direction, toward the north—indeed, I do not remember to have seen any one going in the same direction as myself. What a sight! Here were persons of all conditions, of every phase of appearance. Men and women were carrying trunks and bundles, articles of furniture and ornament; others held children in their arms and, in some cases, sick persons. Some few invalids, wearied with their efforts, were seated on trunks or bundles, endeavoring by a few minutes' rest to gain strength for a new start. It struck one with a feeling of awe, that, in all this rush of the crowd and the sound of heavy boots tramping upon the planks, I did not hear one solitary sound of the human voice. Every person seemed bent on escape, and all were apparently stupefied into silence by the magnitude of the disaster.

As I drew near the southern entrance, I saw quite a number of the police, who led prisoners in handcuffs. What was the meaning of all this? Had the city been devoted to pillage, and were a set of outlaws and incendiaries at work to rob and destroy? The whole scene appeared like a hideous nightmare. My feelings, which had been worked up to the highest pitch by anxiety, exertion, and the sight of these wretches, almost overcame me. It seemed as if destruction were impending, not only over the city, but everywhere. When within fifty feet from the end, my emotions were so intense that I felt my throat grow dry with a choking sensation, so that I could hardly draw a breath; a feeling of faintness and dizziness so oppressed me that I came near falling, and, for a moment, I lost all power of emotion. By an effort of will I recovered from the paralysis which, for a moment, had taken possession of mind and body, and again pressed forward. Owing to the throng of fugitives going in the opposite direction, I made slow work of it; but, on emerging from the south opening, I ran with speed towards Metropolitan Block, where my office was located.

Mr. Higginson then went to his office, and found that the papers had been taken out by Erastus Foote, and were on the way to the house of Albert J. Averell, No. 600 Wabash Avenue, with whom Mr. Higginson was, at that time, in partnership.

On emerging from the stairway, I noticed that the fire had reached Randolph Street, just opposite the Metropolitan Block; I also noticed that the cupola of the Court House was on fire. I was again struck by the fact that there was hardly a person visible on the streets—no fire engines or firemen, and not the slightest attempt to check the fire; which would indeed have been useless, as the whole district to the southwest was a sea of flames. It really seemed as if the city had been entirely abandoned by its inhabitants, to burn in silence—that I was the only spectator of the scene. Filled with apprehensions as to what might be the result of the wholesale destruction, I hastened home by nearly the same route by which I came. * * We proceeded to gather such articles as were deemed most necessary, and to tie them into bundles. It was not long after this—I should judge about four o'clock in the morning—that I noticed a bright light at the Water Works, and I was soon convinced they were on fire. With the destruction of this building, and the engines, all hope of extinguishing the fire, seemed to be at an end. Shortly after, I tried the water-cocks in the house, and could get no water. Going out on the front steps, I met Captain John Prindville, who lived in the third house north of me. He had his horse and buggy with him, and told me that they were at my service for a while. I accordingly put several bundles of clothing and other articles into the buggy, and told my son Dudley to take them to William H. Clarke's residence, about a mile north, on Dearborn Street, fronting the Catholic Cemetery on the lake shore, and about two blocks south of the old Chicago Cemetery, now incorporated with the area of Lincoln Park. I then took some bundles in my hands, and carried them to Mahlon D. Ogden's, from whence I afterward carried them to Mr. Clarke's. Had I left them at Mr. Ogden's, they would have been saved, as this was the only house, for two miles, which did not burn.

RUINS OF E. B. MCCAGG'S RESIDENCE; WITH UNBURNED CONSERVATORY.

As I returned to my home, I noticed the flames had worked well up to the north, along the lake shore, and also north of my residence, which was on a line with the Water Works. Looking south, I saw that the fire had worked from State Street to the windward, and had reached the street I lived on, about one-half of a mile south of me. On entering the house, I found some ladies with their children, who had been driven from their homes. Among these, was Mrs. C. M. Smith. As I looked down the street, I saw the fire steadily advancing north, in one tremendous sheet of flame, which swept entirely across the street. I say "sheet of flame," because it is the common method of speaking of active combustion, but it had more the appearance of a sheet or wall of red-hot air. From time to time, I heard the reports of explosions, probably caused by gas-meters, barrels of kerosene oil, and cans of powder in many of the buildings. It was now about six o'clock in the morning, or about daylight, and I should judge the fire extended in a line running in a northeasterly direction from the river, at Wells-street bridge, to the Water Works. But, as the lake shore was covered almost exclusively with wooden buildings, the fire seemed to have extended more rapidly in a northerly direction, as I saw flames toward the northeast of my house. The fire, by this time, had advanced as far north as Erie Street on Dearborn. I noticed now that the flames were kindled in the spire of the Church of the Holy Name, on the northeast corner of Superior and State streets, and were blazing freely. From the direction of the wind, I felt perfectly secure as to my route of escape.

An occasional sight of some distressed women and children, or some crippled or sick person, limping along, or carried with difficulty, would recall to my mind how great the sum of human suffering must be. I greeted numbers of old and young friends and neighbors as they passed; and they returned the greeting in a cheerful manner, as if engaged in an occupation of not much more than ordinary interest. One would hardly suppose they had been driven from their homes a few minutes before, to which many of them would never again return. I had by this time sent away from the house almost everything there was any chance of saving. The last load I carried away, was in a wheelbarrow, and consisted of a bundle of clothing and some pictures. With this, accompanied by my wife and second son, I went to Mr. Ogden's house, when, leaving the load there, I went with my wife to Gurdon S. Hubbard's, on LaSalle Street, just north of Chestnut.

Mr. Higginson relates his experience while viewing, for the last time, his home. He returned about seven o'clock, and half an hour later the place was in ruins. He then went to Mr. Ogden's. He says:

As I turned the corner at Mr. Ogden's, on Lafayette Place, the north boundary of Washington Square, I once more looked south on Dearborn Street, and saw a sheet of flames apparently proceeding from the block in which my house was located. I noticed at the same time that the Ogden public school was also on fire. This was the last deliberate look I took of the fire; after which my whole desire was centered upon saving such effects as we had rescued, and getting away as soon as possible from the crowded streets and painful scenes which we constantly met.

We reached Mr. Clarke's about half-past eight. We found quite a number of our friends assembled there, among them Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Greeley and Mrs. J. T. Ryerson. Mr. Greeley was city surveyor; Mr. Ryerson was a substantial merchant, who had an office and store on South Water Street. His residence was on Cass Street, between Ontario and Ohio. The fire must have reached him about four o'clock, and he was obliged to take a hurried departure in his carriage, saving little or nothing from the house.

I then went out into the street to procure, if possible, a vehicle in which I could convey to some safe place such things as I had saved. But without success; they were all engaged. At last, I noticed a man driving a one-horse dirt-wagon, the bottom of which was laid with pieces of joists, for the purpose of dumping with facility. He agreed to go with me to the different points where my possessions were deposited, and carry all he could load on to Park Station, on the Galena [Chicago] & North-Western Railroad, situated on the southeast corner of Kinzie Street and Ashland Avenue. It was a very sorry-looking equipage. However, as it was all I could get, I proceeded to load up with the bundles at Mr. Clarke's; and then my wife climbed upon the seat with the driver, while Dudley and I sat on the bundles, and so proceeded to the cemetery, where we found Alexander watching the articles we had first sent there. These were put on the wagon, and Alexander got in. Then we proceeded to Mr. VanWagenen's house, on Belden Avenue, corner of Hurbut Street. Mr. Taylor joined us here, with two horses belonging to C. M. Smith, one of which he rode, leading the other with a bridle. We found only Mrs. VanWagenen at home. We loaded on all we thought we could carry. Mrs. VanWagenen told us that she did not think the fire would reach their house, as it was somewhat isolated, but, in case it did, it would not be until evening, and she would have plenty of time, and no difficulty in getting teams and horses at that late hour, and that she would see that all our articles were taken away with their own effects. I was in doubt, myself, whether the house would burn or not—in fact, I thought the chances were rather in its favor; and so we left them. As it turned out, however, theirs was the last house to the west which was burned on this avenue, and when the fire did come, they had only time to hurriedly put their goods in an open lot, and, covering them with sheets and blankets well wet, leave them to their fate. The heat rapidly dried the sheets and blankets, and, as the eddies of wind carried cinders and live coals among the pile, it was all consumed. Among the pictures I lost, was a portrait of George P. A. Healey, painted by himself, and given to my wife, as a Christmas present, in 1862.

We accordingly mounted our improvised vehicle again, and proceeded, at a slow pace, eastward on Belden Avenue to Clark Street. We then went southerly on Clark until we intersected Wells Street, and so continued south to North Avenue, which we followed until it led us to the bridge over the North Branch of the Chicago River. This bridge was filled, even at this early hour, with a continuous stream of carts, wagons, carriages and pedestrians, all hurrying out of the city. We at last arrived at Park Station, and partly unloaded, and left such articles as books, pictures, etc., at a one-story cottage on the opposite side of Ashland Avenue.

Mr. Higginson found refuge at Thomas B. Bryan's, at Elmhurst, and remained there that night. He continues:

I awoke early the next morning (October 10), refreshed and well, and took the first train to the city, to see the extent of the ruin. The North-Western Railroad train stopped at the junction of Canal and Kinzie streets, on the West Side, instead of crossing the North Branch as usual, the Wells-street depot having been destroyed by the fire. The first thing I noticed was the number of water carts or wagons around which people were crowding for supply, for which they paid some trifling amount. These were impromptu affairs, consisting of casks placed on carts or wagons, and had been filled at the lake shore. The West Side was full of people driven from their abodes in the North and South divisions. I went south on Canal Street to Randolph-street bridge, which had not been burned. On the north side of Randolph Street, and at the east end of the bridge, I noticed the Lind Block of stores was still standing, and apparently uninjured. I went east on Randolph Street, with debris on every side. Although everything combustible had been consumed, there was a vast quantity of heated material, and the cellars were filled with piles of red-hot brick. The wind was still strong, and the air was filled with dust, sand, and pulverized mortar, which very soon inflamed the eyes. Everyone I met was begrimed, and with blood-shot eyes. Progress was impeded by broken stones, bricks, and fallen iron columns; made still more difficult from the quantity of fallen telegraph wire, in which my feet became entangled at almost every step. I reached the Metropolitan Block, where our office had been located, and saw our two safes nearly buried in red-hot bricks. As everything of value had been taken out, I made no effort, then, to get at them. As all the bridges were burned over the main stream of the Chicago River, I was obliged to go west, re-cross Randolph-street bridge, and then proceed north on Canal Street to Kinzie-street bridge, which also remained intact. Going east on Kinzie Street, I reached Clark Street, which had been used for some years by the North Chicago Horse Railway Company. I was surprised to see that the iron rails were warped and twisted by the heat in a most extraordinary manner, being forced up, by longitudinal expansion, to the height of two feet above the ground, and the formerly straight rails bent into every manner of curve. The wooden pavements generally escaped, although they were badly charred in several places, and the blocks had the appearance of having been scooped out by the fire for an inch or more.

LIND BLOCK, CORNER RANDOLPH AND MARKET STREETS.

The North Side, when I first reached it, presented a scene of widespread desolation, rendered all the more so by scattered chimneys, here and there, which stood like grim sentinels over the dreary waste around them. All landmarks were obliterated, all street signs destroyed, and, familiar as the whole area had become to me by a residence of twenty-eight years, it was not until after several efforts that I was enabled to reach and identify the locality where I had lived. A glance at the ruins of my house showed the completeness of its destruction. I saw, lying on the top of the bricks, the iron frame-work and wire strings of my piano; and noticed curiously, that some stone jars in which my wife had put up preserves only a few days before, were standing in a row, half-buried in fallen brick, and yet uninjured. Of course, the contents were burnt to a crisp. There was no salvage in the ruins.

Going from there north on Dearborn Street, I saw for the first time that M. D. Ogden's house had escaped, and stood in almost perfect order, surrounded by large elm trees.

The fire finally spent itself in burning the residence of Dr. John H. Foster, on the north end of Lincoln Park, as then located, being on Fullerton Avenue. The park has since been extended considerably north of this avenue. As nearly as I can learn, his house was burned at half past ten o'clock on Monday night—just twenty-five hours from the commencement of the fire, and about four miles distant from the place of its origin. When I first saw the fire from the top of my house, at about half-past ten on Sunday night, it was about two miles southwest of me, while Dr. Foster's house, where the conflagration ended, was about two miles north of my residence.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS.

From the various recitals of individuals presented, a general idea of the terrors excited by this event may be gained; also a conception of the progress and magnitude of the conflagration. No pen can do adequate justice to the subject. No limner could depict the scene. The incidents will convey an idea of some of the local scenes that transpired, while a consultation of the map will give the great expanse of area traversed by the fire. And this is all that history can perform in conveying an impression of the Chicago Fire of 1871. There is nothing wherewith the fire can be compared. It stands alone, a monument in the annals of pyrology; therefore, in the presentation of data, or historic evidence, the great difficulty was what to avoid embodying in the narrative, for everyone who was here on October 8-9, 1871, had some interesting experience, or was cognizant of some relevant historic fact. But when the reader looks intelligently at the enormous surface burned over, remembers the very brief time occupied in the destruction, and then reads the particular narrative or recital, he may arrive at some little comprehension of the catastrophe.

The North Side, from Dearborn Avenue to Pine Street, and north of Illinois Street, was a fashionable residence quarter—the immediate lake-shore thoroughfares, and those bordering the river, from Wells Street westward, being of inferior character, but more densely peopled. There were also large sections on the North Side in which there were few houses, and those of a cheap sort. The district between the North Branch and the Ogden Canal, on one side, and Lincoln Park and the Old Cemetery on the other, was mainly unoccupied; there was much vacant ground further up the Branch. Horrible as the scenes on the South Side were, the terrors of the North Side were greater. The people of that section, for the most part, were awakened to a consciousness of peril only by finding themselves surrounded by fire. Called from their beds to witness the conflagration upon the South Side, the people of the quiet and elegant residence quarter of Clark Street, south of Superior, were gazing at the magnificent spectacle, and uttering their exclamations of pity for the unfortunate inhabitants across the river, when they discovered that the flames had already reached their own homes, and that the Water Works, and other buildings to the rear of them, were all ablaze. The appalling significance of this discovery was soon apparent to all. It meant that their own homes were doomed, and that, before they could save any of their goods—perhaps before they could escape with their lives—they would be walled in on either side by fire.

The incredible rapidity of the flames was noticeable here, as upon the South Side. In fact, the mind is scarcely able to comprehend what is implied by this term; and none, save those who beheld the scenes of agony, can realize what is meant. The mass of continuous fire sprang from side to side of the street, as it advanced, and oftentimes vaulted over extensive tracts, but always returned to complete the work of destruction. Frequently, before the flames had reached a house, the thick black smoke would roll out of the chimneys and windows, the result of the intense action of the heat before combustion ensued among the wood-work and furniture within. The exterior protections of slate roofs and stone walls did not save even the better structures. The Church of the Holy Name was a fine illustration of this phenomenon. From the crevices of the slate roof poured out eddying whirls of smoke, which, often rising to a short height, burned with a brilliant flame, and then went out, disappearing altogether. It was at the outer regions of the fire, or where the ruins lay smoldering, that smoke was dense. It at times preceded and then tardily followed the volume of flame. By daybreak Monday morning, the fire, moving northeasterly, had reached Rush-street bridge, which was crowded with people. In order to bar the fire, if possible, the bridge was swung; but the only result of this manœuvre was the destruction of some of the persons who were on the bridge. The flames swept onward, and seized upon the frame buildings, the workshops, and the lumber yards, moving rapidly northward toward the site of the ruined Water Works. The sweep of the flames across the region east of Clark Street drove the people living in that section to the lake; but they very soon found that they were between two deaths—the burning city on the one side and the lake upon the other. The intense heat from the west forced the sufferers into the water, where many perished; others, stronger and more self-possessed, bowed their heads close to the watery surface, thus escaping the gusts of gas and smoke that rushed past them. These hot tempests of poisonous vapor rendered life almost unendurable; but no avenues of escape existed, and nothing was left for the victims but to patiently endure, or die.

Vividly as many writers have described the scenes upon this stretch of sandy purgatory, they paused abashed and heart-sick at the awful task before the worst was told. Nor will the pen of man ever dare to lay before a reader's eyes the truth in literal nakedness. No publisher would be permitted to preserve in types—no man of moral consciousness would place before his family—the volume that told what there transpired. The tragedies upon the Sands differed from those where broader limits marked the encampment of the victims of the fire. The prairie seemed to give relief to pent-up agonies, and nerve the soul to silent endurance; even the park and grave-yard, bleak and sombre as they were, seemed to impart an atmosphere of personal security that was not possible upon the Sands. There, on the scorching earth, that held the heat and sent a shimmering, ceaseless wave of blasting air and sand from underneath the feet, parching the flesh and drying up the fountains of blood and life, the spirit of infernal revelry prevailed. As in the region of the damned, told of by Dante, the evil nature of mankind glared forth to vex the tender souls of those whom fate had sent into their presence.

Imagine the scene of the horrid drama. No possibility of escape—a raging fury at the rear, a pitiless expanse of lake in front—a small area filled with human creatures, maddened animals, delicate and refined women, pure and innocent children; the aged, the infirm, the weak, the dying, the despairing; young girls, whose artless lives were unfamiliar with even the name of crime; men of well-ordered lives and Christian minds; brutes in human form, who were not only ready to do acts of crime, but whose polluting wickedness was rank and cast off prison-fumes upon the air. All kinds and conditions and grades of life—all forms of death, from calm and peaceful passing to a welcome rest to that which follows in the train of vicious deeds. Here, huddled close and helpless, the purest girlhood was forced to endure the leering of the vile; and, if a chance protector spoke in her defense, the wicked laughed and jeered and cursed, until the stoutest heart grew faint with apprehension. Women, whose claim to womanhood was long since lost, took fendish delight in adding undefinable shame and terror to the misery of those who shrank from crime. Think what it would be to place a loved one in the lowest haunts of vice, and there bend over the death-bed of that failing friend, while all about the din of wickedness was sounding in the ear. Increase the circumstance of grim necessity, and add the weight of a consciousness that home, treasures, everything was gone, and this the only, the enforced spot, where death must meet the loved father, mother, sister, friend. Could all the powers of hell itself devise a keener form of anguish? Yet these lines are drawn from actual knowledge; and the shudder awakened at the recollection of sights stays the pen, for what was seen can never be spoken to public ears. The creatures who there tortured the helpless were no longer human—vice had dulled their moral instincts, and despair transformed them, for the moment, into demons. Their orgies were born in malice, they delighted in their sins; they shrieked aloud with glee to see the innocent rush from them, and plunge into the lake, that, for the instant, the sight might be shut out. The dying were not always comforted with the caress of love. Upon a burned and blackened blanket lay the dead body of one poor woman, whose babe lay by her side, crying in shrill alarm. The crowd about this type of life and death gave no more heed than if it was the natural order of events. All night the corpse lay there untouched. If fate preserved the babe, the writer does not know of the fact. Above the terror of the fire—for that emotion grew pangless as the hours progressed; above the loss of worldly riches; above the grief of death—for death seemed then the only mercy-bringing power; above all the conditions of the scene that added elements of horror,—the mingling of the two extremes of vice and virtue, and the momentary triumph of the bad, in their malicious show of wickedness, seemed the most appalling quality of this immediate spot.

Mr. Chamberlin writes of the moment when all perceived the North Side to be doomed:

"A terrible panic ensued. There was sudden screaming and dashing about of half-clad women, gathering up such valuables as could be suddenly snatched. There was frantic rushing into the streets and shouting for vehicles. There was anxious inquiry and, anon, distressing cries for absent protectors—a large portion of the men being on the far-side of the river, and, in many cases, unable to reach their homes. There was a pell-mell rush through the streets—some of the wild forces pushing eagerly in one direction, and others quite as eagerly in the opposite; and children screaming and shouts resounding, and brands falling in showers, and truck-men running each other down, and half-drunken, wholly desperate ruffians peering into doors, and seizing valuables and insulting women; and oaths from lips unused to them, as hot as the flames which leaped near by; and prayers from manly breasts, where they had slumbered since childhood; and every conceivable sign of turmoil and terror. * * *

"The most natural resort of the people of the North Side was the sandy beach of the lake, where there were few houses, and those but shanties. This strip of shore, known as 'the Sands,' was famous or rather infamous, in years ago, as the locale of numerous low brothels, to which Hon. John Wentworth, when mayor of the city, gave the coup de grace, by allowing them to burn up. Their place had never been fully occupied; and to the bleak, narrow area thus afforded, the terrified population shrank for refuge from the pursuing monster. Such an assemblage as there congregated, Chicago never witnessed before, and, probably, never will witness again. It was the scene at the 'lake front,' or 'basin,' repeated, with more diversity. The extremes of wealth and squalor had been dwelling within a stone's throw of each other in this section of the city, which had emptied itself upon this scant skirt of sand. These inequalities of society were now leveled off as smooth as the beach itself. No, not leveled; for the landlord and aristocrat, whose many stores are burning on the other side, and his previous library and cabinet—the accumulation of a dotting lifetime—has still a preferment over the poor who now jostles him; he is allowed to lose more and suffer more, and is required to lament less. But that is all; the two must, to-night, share each other's bed—the damp sand, and, to-morrow, each other's fare—nothing but sights of horror. Search a person among the thousands collected on the Sands, and there pent for thirty hours, but had lost some dear one in the confusion attending the escape from their burning houses. Whether these were alive or dead, none could know. Here was the wife of a well-known musician, with her two children, one of them but three months old. When the flames came too close, she must retreat into the water, breast-deep, and bear them aloft. Her husband, after escaping with her from their house, had gone back to save some precious article from the fire, and had not returned to her. Here was a distracted husband who had failed in his efforts to reach his invalid wife—a cousin of the celebrated Madame Parepa-Rosa, and a lady of rare gifts. Poor woman! she died a few days afterward, a raving maniac and one of the many victims of the conflagration. Here was a family of brothers and sisters, mourning a mother who had perished before their eyes. Here were sick ones, snatched from their beds and dying of exposure. Here was every imaginable scene of distress and knotted threads of narrative, which, if followed, would fill volumes. As the morning advanced, some of the sufferers, crawling along the shore and down upon the pier, were taken up by tugs and propellers, and carried up the river or out to sea for safety. They embarked at the peril of their lives, for the docks were on fire, and more than one staunch steamer burned alongside. Such of the North Side people as did not resort to the lake, betook themselves to Lincoln Park, where a day and night of imprisonment and exposure awaited them; or (which proved the wisest course) escaped to the West Side, where they found shelter with friends, or, at least, safety upon the open prairie. Chicago Avenue was the main avenue of escape; and this, becoming choked with vehicles and goods, many perished in attempting to reach the next thoroughfare to the north. Bremer and Wesson streets, in this vicinity, were found strewn with charred corpses when the smoke cleared away.

"All day Monday the fire raged through the ill-fated North Division; but its progress was noted with little interest, except by the luckless people whose abodes it seized upon as it advanced; for everybody had given up the whole of that quarter as lost, and there was no longer any struggle, even of hope and fear. It seemed as if those emotions had run down, as a clock, neglected by its keeper, stops for lack of winding. The index had stopped at the figure of despair!"

Mr. F. A. Eastman, postmaster of the city, whose home was at No. 239 Erie Street, hauled out some trunks of clothing, and found a hackman, whom he desired to take them on board; but the fee demanded exceeded his immediate means, and he was obliged to drag them along, with the help of a maid-servant, his wife, meanwhile, carrying her infant in her arms. Four times they halted, exhausted, in what seemed a place of safety, and four times they were driven on by the insatiable flames.

In thousands of homes to-day are felt the consequential effects of those fateful hours. Shattered nerves, premature age, disordered minds, still cast a harmful influence over lives that, up to then, were vigorous, healthful and sound. If no one can portray the scenes for fear of shocking public taste, at this remote time, what may not the student of heredity find, as food for thought, in this grave subject? The results of the fire upon the minds of those who suffered and still lived can never be fully written.

EN ROUTE TO THE PRAIRIE.—It was about ten o'clock Monday morning when the flames reached Chicago Avenue. Southward, on Clark and Wells streets, there was terrible excitement. The fire had broken out afresh near Ontario, and created new feelings of despair in the hearts of those whose property lay west of Dearborn Avenue. Encouraged in their recklessness by the absence of policemen, the desperate characters of the city broke into saloons along Kinzie Street, and seized upon the liquors, drinking themselves into a condition of maudlin viciousness which no persuasion could check. In numerous cases these drunken creatures were surrounded by the flames and stifled by the smoke. Some lay helpless upon the sidewalks, and met their fate there. Some women, with their children, lingered too long, to save their store of household goods, and were lost. Others were forced to leap from the windows of burning houses, and in so doing received injuries from which they died. The loss of life near the river and in the thickly-tenanted quarters can never be known; but that it was greater than was reported, reason and observation convince those who pause to consider the chances of escape. The swiftly approaching flames devoured even the bones of the victims, in many cases leaving no trace.

The multitude who sought refuge on the prairie experienced less of the mental agonies of those who were forced to endure the terrors of the Sands; but, even there, the same community of physical suffering prevailed. The millionaire, the pauper, the innocent, the prostitute, the young, the old, the strong, the sick and dying—all gathered on the level of corporal deprivation, and shivered under the same chill wind; were parched by the same thirst, gnawed by the same pangs of hunger, felt the same suspense concerning absent relatives and friends, the same grim hoping against hope.

Elias Colbert touches upon the subject so often referred to here—that is, the separation of families:

"This general separation of families may at first seem extraordinary; but it will be recollected that the onset of the fire was very rapid, and that it soon had the city divided in twain by an impassable stream, or wave, of flame; that, in the attempt to save property, which the instincts of all prompted, the weaker ones would be consigned to some place of supposed safety, while the stronger went back to wrestle with the rapacious monster for some of the precious possessions on which he had fixed his levy; and that, in this attempt—so rapidly did the foe advance—separation was almost inevitable. It is also to be noted that flight, on this occasion, was in all directions—the thoroughfares being glutted, not only with the stream of North Side fugitives but with the vast throng which, until the bridges were burned, came pouring over from the South Side, and also with the thousands who rushed in from the West, either as idle spectators or to help in the rescue of friends whom they hoped to reach. Under these circumstances, it is not to be wondered at that hundreds perished in the flames; that almost every family became separated, and that each member was in terrible anxiety for missing ones."

VARIOUS INCIDENTS.—The people living north of Chicago Avenue, and west of LaSalle Street, were hopeful that they would escape, and that the fire would drift steadily eastward, not expecting that it would make any progress against the steady and furious west wind. They also had great hopes in Chicago Avenue, which is one hundred feet in width. But the flames, running up Clark Street, and catching Turner Hall, and a new building north of it, worked backward, and assailed the brick blocks on the east side of LaSalle; then it leaped that street, and took hold of the buildings along the west line. About the same time, it crossed Chicago Avenue, and caught McEwen's planing mill, on Wells, near Pearson Street, and rushed northward among the wooden buildings, blowing them down in ruins almost before they were on fire.

Numbers of citizens seized what property they could, piling it on drays, which they sometimes dragged themselves, and took the goods, thus temporarily rescued, to a vacant lot on Franklin Street, beyond Elm. But this material was of the most incongruous, and often inflammable, nature. Irish women brought straw beds, and others, piled up chairs, bureaus, trunks, and every conceivable article. It was not very long before the cinders, falling in dense masses, began to make of these articles a succession of small bonfires; and the owners, having no water, and no means of covering with earth what they had, were either compelled to stamp out the flames, or let their possessions go. One man was seen marching off with a kerosene lamp. A friend asked him why he was trying to save such a thing; he looked in helpless amazement at the lamp, and tossed it aside. Many persons took their goods to Lincoln Park, hoping that there, at least, they would be safe, but the fury of the flames passed all comprehension, and those in the southern part of the park lost what they had there. Even the trees were burned.

When the people living west of Clark Street, began to see that the fire would go northward to an indefinite point, they turned all their minds to getting to the West Division, where was comparative safety from the flames and plenty of vacant ground on which to encamp. The Chicago-avenue bridge was useless, and the tide turned toward Division Street, which, from Grove to Halsted, was untouched, and promised to remain so. It was not many minutes before vehicles of every description were rushing pell-mell across that bridge, interlocking and breaking, while the southern streets, leading to Division, were also jammed with wagons, which occasionally caught fire. The draymen and expressmen, stimulated by the immense prices they were receiving—twenty to fifty dollars a load—hurried their heavy teams, forcing their way across the river, in order to return as soon as possible for other loads. The streets were filled with people, crazed by excitement and liquor, or stupefied by the gases, and no regard was paid to them by the drivers. Many accidents occurred. One man was driving up Clark Street with a heavy load, and fell from his wagon, instantly breaking his neck. Another case, illustrating the absolute indifference of the people to fatalities, is related by Charles Harpel, who crossed to the West Side in the throng. On the bridge, the crowd was so great that many persons were crushed against the railings, and one young girl fell into the river. She rose, struggled, sank and rose again, without awakening so much as a cry of alarm or pity from the maddened human herd, and then dropped beneath the filthy waters.

The wanderers, crossing Division-street bridge, scattered themselves north and west, or encamped upon Grove Island, which lay between North Branch and Ogden Canal. When the throngs moved a little west, they found their way blocked by the cars of the North-Western Railroad which had been run up there to avoid the fire, and people were compelled to make long detours to get through them. Many, unable to force their way in the confusion at Division Street, turned into the side streets, and made their way to North-avenue bridge, where they were able to get out without great difficulty, though much hampered by the railroad trains after they got across the river. Not only teams, but foot-passengers, carrying in their arms children and some little articles of furniture and wearing apparel, wended their weary way in the same direction. One woman had nothing but a silk sack on. Another was accompanied by a child, who had two cats and a small dog in her arms, and who, while sobbing herself, said, "Don't cry, mamma!" After reaching the prairie, the army of fugitives settled down, wherever they could find room. There was little talking, and sad eyes gazed in agony upon the lurid evidences of disaster that filled the sky. Many, who had teams, went as far west as the artesian well, where they encamped about the large pond, which supplied their parched throats with grateful moisture. There they remained, desolate and forlorn, until their mental sufferings were momentarily lost sight of in the physical tortures that ensued. About eleven o'clock Monday night, the sky, as if in remorse at what the fiery element had done, poured down floods of rain. The victims had come from the more than torrid atmosphere of the burning city. The exertion of escape had drenched them with enervating perspiration. Now, with fatal suddenness, the rain descended on their sensitive frames. Hungry, fatigued, worn out in body and fainting in soul, the wanderers, were subjected to a penetrating rainstorm, that left them utterly despairing.

It was not until Monday evening that Chicago-avenue bridge fell into the river, a charred ruin. By that time, Division-street bridge was almost inaccessible, because of the jam of teams that blocked the thoroughfare. Confusion increased. Families became separated. A policeman picked up a three-months old baby from the pavement, and tried to discover whose child it was. The mother had endured the agony of seeing it torn from her failing grasp by the pressure of the mob, and had been hurried on, unable to save her child.

The fire moved farther and farther north, taking both sides of North Avenue, and continuing until it reached Wright's Grove and Ogden's Grove, where its progress was impeded by the dampness of the timber. The rain, which began about eleven o'clock Monday night, effected a perceptible check on the flames. But the back-fires turned to the coal heaps and lumber yards lying south of Chicago Avenue, and swept them away. So brilliant was the light of these fires on Monday night, that the people west of the river began to lose courage, fearing the river would be crossed, and nothing of the city be left standing.

It was in the North Division that the vulture-like qualities of expressmen and other drivers culminated; for it was there that the distress was greatest and the demand for vehicles most urgent. There were many carters about, but they wanted fifty dollars now for moving a load. Having found a victim, they would stop midway, and assess him again; and if he refused to submit to their levies, or was unable to pay them, off went his goods into the street, to be ravaged by roughs, trampled upon by the crowd, or consumed by flames. In more than one case, however, these drivers were brought to a sense of duty by a sudden declaration of martial law on the part of the owner, and the justifiable presentation of a loaded revolver. The lowest price at which a cart or hack could be obtained for service was ten dollars, and from that figure it ranged upward, according to the ability of the owner or the degree of the hackman's cupidity. E. I. Tinkham, cashier of the Second National Bank, paid an expressman $1,000 for taking a box to the railroad depot on the West Side, a distance of a mile; but this was an unusual case, the box being full of treasure, amounting to $600,000, taken from the bank vaults, and to be carried through walls of fire at the peril of the man's life. The transfer was safely made, and the treasure found a resting place in the vaults of a Milwaukee bank. This case is not to be reckoned among those of inhuman wretches of drivers, who extorted all a poor man's means, or perhaps a helpless woman's, for taking on board a trunk containing a meagre remnant of clothing, probably to be thrown off at the next corner, where the extorting process would be repeated on another customer.

ALONZO HANNIS states that "A better opportunity for witnessing stealing I never saw in my life. While the police were arresting men and boys for stealing, there were women secreting stolen goods, such as fine laces and other valuable goods, in trunks which they had also stolen. I 'spotted' several for the police while I was watching the progress of the fire. On Michigan Avenue I saw two very nicely dressed young ladies, who had a buggy which contained oil paintings, in large, massive gold frames: one of the ladies was pushing behind the buggy, while the other one was trying to pull it. One man with a team had engaged himself to another to move some furniture, when a grocery-man came along, and offered him $400 to move his goods; so he broke his contract with No. 1 and engaged with No. 2; but when his wagon was loaded with goods, he had not even a chance to save his horses, as the flames consumed the horses, wagon, and goods. Some boys were using a little bit of strategy in eluding the police. They had one of their number on the bank of the lake, on guard duty over a pile of stolen goods. They would go to Wabash Avenue, and help themselves, and put on as many as two suits, and then relieve themselves of their burden, and repeat the act till the flames cut off their supplies.

"On the night of the 10th, I saw several men with strips of muslin pinned to the lapels of their coats, with the word 'Police' printed on them. As I thought I might be of service to some one, I applied for the position, and got it. Mr. Campbell and myself were employed to perform duty for Messrs. Preston, Kean & Co., the bankers. There were but very few men on the South Side on that night, as it was red hot. The only way we did duty that night was to lie down on our faces. We quenched our thirst by crawling to the river, at Clark-street bridge, and drank of the river water, which was not very pleasant."

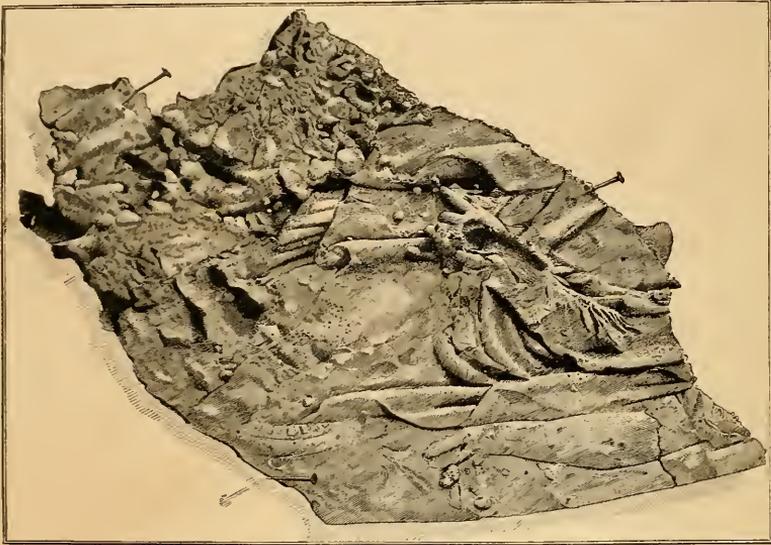

There are numerous statements made of the extortions of expressmen, and no one appears to have met any of that class who made no charge at all. But there were many on the South Side, on Monday morning, who plied between the burning district and that south of Twelfth Street, cheerfully contributing the services of horse and vehicle to suffering citizens gratis. The writer was all through the fire, and can testify that Christian charity was manifested by all classes and conditions. And likewise, he regrets to say, there were no classes but were guilty of excesses and vicious conduct. But no one, not an actual participant, can estimate the heroism, the nobility, and self-sacrificing spirit that was shown by our Chicago people. It is true, evil passions were rampant, inflamed by the terrors of the occasion and by illimitable whisky, but there were also present the good angels of love, charity and hope.

INCENDIARISM.—It is not surprising that men and women, and even children, wicked enough to attempt a revival of the fire, existed in so large a city. It is not recorded that a woman was shot or hanged by the military, police or citizens, but several were taken in the act of incendiarism. A boy was detected, by firemen, while in the attempt to set fire to a building on Thirty-second Street. He was instantly killed. A man was shot by a negro watchman, at the corner of State and Thirty-second streets, while in the act of firing a house. A woman was detected in her efforts to set fire to a barn on Burnside Street; but those who captured her were opposed to hanging a woman, and she escaped. Two men were taken while trying to ignite the Jesuit Church, on the West Side, and quickly placed beyond all power to harm the city. A barn on the corner of Twentieth and Burnside streets was set on fire, Tuesday, but was extinguished. A man found on the premises, in suspicious attitude, was promptly disposed of. Tuesday morning a man living of social encounters. Among three hundred thousand people, it is little short of marvellous that individuals meet acquaintances whose daily lines of habit carry them, ordinarily, wide apart.

Another feature of the fire may be classed among the "curiosities" hinted at, and that is the recovery of

MELTED STATUETTE.

on Fourth Avenue discovered an incendiary in the basement of his house, about to light a bundle of hay which he had carried there. The proprietor of the house gave a cry of alarm. The wretch attempted to escape, but was pursued south along Fourth Avenue, and when near Fourteenth Street was overtaken by the crowd and stoned to death. His body lay for nearly a day in the street, a warning to evil-doers. On Tuesday afternoon, a negro living on Fourth Avenue, saw a white man set fire to his house. A moment later, one more body was added to the list of those overtaken by justice. A second attempt was made to fire the Jesuit Church, on Tuesday evening, and the incendiary was instantly shot by a policeman on duty.

The spirit of outlawry continued until Wednesday. A fire was started in the alley between Taylor and Twelfth streets, near Halsted, but the criminal escaped. Brimstone was found scattered over the floor of the City elevator, on Mitchell Street. The drug store of Mead Brothers, on Canal Street, between Judd and Wilson, was fired, and a tarred rope found under their barn. Hannah, Lay & Co.'s lumber yard, on the river south of Twelfth Street, was endangered by incendiaries, who scattered hay saturated with kerosene about the piles of dry lumber. These cases are cited to show that attempts were made to destroy the city, notwithstanding the assertions of many persons to the contrary.

In the personal narratives given, we have endeavored to select those which furnish greatest variety of description, not merely of the intensity and terror of the fire, but also of this remarkably interesting feature articles of value supposed to have been lost. It is authoritatively stated that papers of inestimable worth to the owners, and which were hastily removed from safes on the approach of the flames, only to be torn from the bearers in the press and scramble of the crowd, were picked up by stranger-hands, and saved, not with regard to their possible value, but merely from the instinct to preserve something.* And these, incredible as it may appear, afterward came into the possession of the rightful owners.

This instinct to preserve something was one of the most ludicrous phases of the flight, as it was also one of the most pathetic. It is related that many a woman collected what she supposed to be her jewels, or other articles, either rich in themselves or through association, only to find, hours afterward, or when some friend called attention thereto, that she had labored hard to save a roll of baby-linen or a broken, worthless trinket. Strong men were seen carrying the fragments of a vase or lamp; and one well-known banker expended a fund of strength to preserve a frying-pan cast aside by an Irish housewife.

The terrific intensity of the heat is shown by one incident. A North Side gentleman carried some of his art treasures to the lake shore, and placed them on the sands. The day after the fire his curiosity tempted him to visit the spot, and there, fused with foreign substances, and run into fantastic form, was all that remained of an expensive bronze statuette. The heat from the distant trying to ignite the Jesuit Church, on the West Side, and quickly placed beyond all power to harm the city. A barn on the corner of Twentieth and Burnside streets was set on fire, Tuesday, but was extinguished. A man found on the premises, in suspicious attitude, was promptly disposed of. Tuesday morning a man living of social encounters. Among three hundred thousand people, it is little short of marvellous that individuals meet acquaintances whose daily lines of habit carry them, ordinarily, wide apart.

* One gentleman, known to the writer, found a trunk, which he had thought burned up in the Nevada Hotel, in the possession of a gentleman on South Peoria Street.

Another feature of the fire may be classed among the "curiosities" hinted at, and that is the recovery of

MELTED STATUETTE.

on Fourth Avenue discovered an incendiary in the basement of his house, about to light a bundle of hay which he had carried there. The proprietor of the house gave a cry of alarm. The wretch attempted to escape, but was pursued south along Fourth Avenue, and when near Fourteenth Street was overtaken by the crowd and stoned to death. His body lay for nearly a day in the street, a warning to evil-doers. On Tuesday afternoon, a negro living on Fourth Avenue, saw a white man set fire to his house. A moment later, one more body was added to the list of those overtaken by justice. A second attempt was made to fire the Jesuit Church, on Tuesday evening, and the incendiary was instantly shot by a policeman on duty.

The spirit of outlawry continued until Wednesday. A fire was started in the alley between Taylor and Twelfth streets, near Halsted, but the criminal escaped. Brimstone was found scattered over the floor of the City elevator, on Mitchell Street. The drug store of Mead Brothers, on Canal Street, between Judd and Wilson, was fired, and a tarred rope found under their barn. Hannah, Lay & Co.'s lumber yard, on the river south of Twelfth Street, was endangered by incendiaries, who scattered hay saturated with kerosene about the piles of dry lumber. These cases are cited to show that attempts were made to destroy the city, notwithstanding the assertions of many persons to the contrary.

In the personal narratives given, we have endeavored to select those which furnish greatest variety of description, not merely of the intensity and terror of the fire, but also of this remarkably interesting feature of articles of value supposed to have been lost. It is authoritatively stated that papers of inestimable worth to the owners, and which were hastily removed from safes on the approach of the flames, only to be torn from the bearers in the press and scramble of the crowd, were picked up by stranger-hands, and saved, not with regard to their possible value, but merely from the instinct to preserve something.* And these, incredible as it may appear, afterward came into the possession of the rightful owners.

This instinct to preserve something was one of the most ludicrous phases of the flight, as it was also one of the most pathetic. It is related that many a woman collected what she supposed to be her jewels, or other articles, either rich in themselves or through association, only to find, hours afterward, or when some friend called attention thereto, that she had labored hard to save a roll of baby-linen or a broken, worthless trinket. Strong men were seen carrying the fragments of a vase or lamp; and one well-known banker expended a fund of strength to preserve a frying-pan cast aside by an Irish housewife.

The terrific intensity of the heat is shown by one incident. A North Side gentleman carried some of his art treasures to the lake shore, and placed them on the sands. The day after the fire his curiosity tempted him to visit the spot, and there, fused with foreign substances, and run into fantastic form, was all that remained of an expensive bronze statuette. The heat from the distant

* One gentleman, known to the writer, found a trunk, which he had thought burned up in the Nevada Hotel, in the possession of a gentleman on South Peoria Street.

CHICAGO, AS SEEN AFTER THE GREAT CONFLAGRATION.

plies had melted the hard substance without totally destroying the outline. The only articles taken from the ruins of the Historical Society's building, so far as is known, were the fragments of a volume or two, and a small vial containing a section of tape-worm, which was in the collection of curiosities. The wealth of literary knowledge, the large collection of rare and valuable things, even the original Emancipation Proclamation—all were lost; and this disgusting vial alone remains.

HOUSES OF UNBURNED BUILDINGS.—The preservation of Mahlon D. Ogden's mansion, located on the block bounded by Oak Street, Washington Square, Dearborn Avenue and Clark Street, was one of the many instances of the fire's eccentric work. The building was of wood, surrounded by a wooden fence, and apparently as combustible as any edifice in the line of the flames. The open square immediately south of it, and the large grounds about the residence, rendered it ordinarily beyond danger, but the fierceness of the heat evaporated what little moisture remained in the wooden walls, and seemingly prepared them for ready combustion. The torrents of cinders, which fell upon every inch of the premises, were sufficient to destroy a structure of greater resistance; and the fact that the fire observed no method or order in its progress, but leaped wide spaces, and consumed buildings far in advance of the main column, pointed conclusively to the loss of the Ogden house. The family was absent on the night of the fire, but friendly hands were there to make a fight with the forces of the air. Washington Square had been filled with fugitives earlier in the night, but they had been compelled to flee, leaving their household goods scattered on the ground. These light goods quickly vanished in the flames. The fence and barn took fire. Blankets and carpets were spread over the exposed places. So long as the hydrants furnished a supply, water was freely thrown over everything, but when the pumping works were burned, recourse was had to the cistern on the premises. Rev. Robert Collyer acknowledges the generosity of those who had charge of this tank, for considerable quantities of water were given to those who sought to save his church.

It is often said that the Ogden house was the only building left standing in the burned area on the North Side. This is not a correct statement. A small frame house on Lincoln Place, about midway between Sophia Street and Webster Avenue, was saved by its owner, in a novel manner. There were vacant spaces contiguous, and Policeman Bellingier, who lived there, was encouraged to believe that he could preserve his home. He tore up the wooden sidewalks, raked the leaves in piles and burned them, and prepared for a battle with the flames in every conceivable manner. When the fire reached him, he covered his house with blankets and carpets, which he kept moistened. But when the fiercest wave of destruction came sweeping down upon him, he found his cistern dry. Even then his courage and presence of mind did not forsake him. His cellar contained a store of cider, and with that fluid he fought his foe, and triumphed. His hands were burned, his cistern was gone, but his home stood amid the general ruin, and he had won the victory in the face of fearful odds.

In the entire burned portion of the South Division, but two buildings were left uninjured. One was an unfinished stone structure at the corner of LaSalle and Monroe streets. There was no wood-work in the building, the walls being of stone and the partitions and floors of brick. The second was the Lind Block, on Market Street, which was comparatively isolated.

The house last burned is authoritatively stated to have been that of John A. Huck, north of the city limits; while No. 863 North Clark Street, and two houses a short distance south, were untouched by the fire, as was Brown & VanArsdale's two-story frame building south of Michigan and east of Kingsbury Street; but these really were sentinels marking the line of the fire, not being, like those mentioned above, in the midst of the burned district.

THE FIRST BOOK published about the fire was by Alfred L. Sewell.

TEMPORARY WATER SUPPLY.—The destruction of the Water Works not only imperiled the remaining portions of the city, but also involved inconvenience and suffering to the people. The means by which this misfortune was measurably overcome are described by Engineer Cregier:

"Fortunately, the water in the river was in a comparatively good condition, owing to the strong current flowing from the lake to the canal. R. T. Crane, president of the Northwestern Manufacturing Company, whose establishment was beyond the fire, tendered the use of a number of steam pumps for the purpose of pumping a limited supply of water from the river to a portion of the West Division. The main pipe at Adams Street was accordingly tapped. The pumps were connected by Mr. Crane and his assistants. John C. Gault, general superintendent of the Chicago

SAFES PILED ON DEARBORN STREET.

& North-Western Railroad Company, promptly furnished a locomotive, from the boiler of which steam was secured, and temporary pumps at Adams Street were started at midnight on the 10th. The supply was necessarily very limited, and although the quality of the water was far from what our citizens had been used to, yet it was water, and, amid the great excitement and suffering among all classes, the water from the Chicago River was doubtless appreciated by those who were fortunate in securing it."

Temporary relief from the water famine was also obtained by laying mains on the surface of the ground, and to the methods employed by the General Relief Committee, described in Mr. Holden's narrative.

GAS SUPPLY.—Gas was furnished to the South Side by the People's Gas Company, of the West Side, as speedily as the ruins could be cleared away and the requisite connections made.

BOUNDARIES OF THE BURNED DISTRICT.—The devastated tract was embraced within the following limits:

On the West Side—Commencing at the corner of DeKoven and Jefferson Streets; thence, northerly, along Jefferson Street, to near the corner of Harrison Street; thence, northeasterly, to near the corner of Clinton and VanBuren streets; thence, east to Canal Street; thence, north, to Adams Street; thence, east, to the river; thence, southerly, along the river, to Taylor Street; thence, west, to the corner of Taylor and Clinton streets; thence, south, to DeKoven Street; thence, west, to Jefferson Street.

On the South Side—Commencing at Taylor Street and the Chicago River; thence, east, to Sherman Street; thence, north, to Harrison Street; thence, east, to Wabash Avenue; thence, north, to Congress Street; thence, east, to the lake; thence, northerly, along the lake shore, to the mouth of the Chicago River; thence, westerly and southerly, along said river, to Taylor Street and the river bank. Within this district, an elevator, near the mouth of the river, the Lind Block, between Market, Randolph and Lake streets, and a Methodist church, at the corner of Harrison Street and Wabash Avenue, escaped destruction.

On the North Side—Commencing near the mouth of the Chicago River; thence, westerly, along the river, to Market Street; thence, north, to Michigan Street; thence, west, to the river; thence, northwesterly, along said river, to near Division Street; thence, northeasterly, to near the corner of Division and Wesson streets; thence, west, to the corner of Division Street and Hawthorne Avenue; thence, easterly, to Clybourn Avenue; thence, easterly, to Orchard Street; thence, northeasterly, to Vine Street; thence north, to Centre Street; thence, east, to Hurlbut Street; thence, north, to Belden Avenue; thence, northeasterly, to Franklin Street; thence, south on Franklin Street, by Lincoln Park, to Clark Street; thence, southerly, to Wisconsin Street; thence, east, to the lake; thence, southerly, along the lake shore, to the place of beginning.

AREA OF BURNED DISTRICT.—"On the South Side [says one authority] the fire destroyed nearly everything in the First and Second wards, and a slight portion of the northwestern corner of the Third. Its southern limit on Michigan Avenue was Congress Street; on Clark, Harrison; and on Wells, a point a little below Polk. The area of the burned district was four hundred and fifty acres. There were destroyed 3,600 buildings, including 1,600 stores, 25 hotels and 60 manufacturing establishments; and 21,600 persons were turned out of their homes, the greater number of whom lived in the Second Ward, west of State Street, where they were closely packed. The residents of the First Ward generally lived in hotels or furnished rooms, except in the western portion of the ward, where many poor families were congregated.

"On the North Side, thirteen hundred acres were burned over, out of the twenty-five hundred in that division, leaving intact a small portion on Kinzie Street, near the river, and several houses north of Division and west of Orchard, including some of the better-settled districts up Clybourn Avenue. The total number of buildings destroyed was 10,000, including over 600 stores and 100 manufacturing establishments. About 70,000 persons were deprived of homes; out of a population of 77,000 only about 7,000 were left with shelter which they could call their own.

"In the West Division, the area of burned territory was not great—about one hundred and fifty acres; and much of that was occupied by lumber and coal yards. But the people who suffered were packed in densely, and nearly 2,000 were turned out into the streets."

From this estimate it will be seen that 13,500 buildings were destroyed, and 92,000 persons rendered homeless. But in the midst of this appalling calamity, the people drew consolation from the thought that the West Side, with its 2,500 dwellings, its 60 churches, 1,600 stores and 600 manufacturing establishments, were still standing, and that the North-side and South-side rolling-mills were able to furnish hundreds of men with employment. The southern portion of the South Side, and the suburban towns offered protection to the homeless, and it was because of the shock to the vitals of the city—the system of life-giving trade—that made men draw back for the instant, stupefied, but not overcome.

The statement of area burned over, and of property destroyed, made by the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, is, however, possibly more authentic, as the result of later and more careful estimates. The report referred to says:

"In the West Division, where the fire originated, the number of acres burned over was one hundred and ninety-four. There were five hundred buildings, mostly of an inferior class, destroyed, which were inhabited by about two thousand five hundred persons.

"The burned area in the South Division comprised four hundred and sixty acres. This district, though comparatively small in extent, was the business center of the city. It contained a great majority of those structures which were costly and magnificent, and were filled with the merchandise which made the city the great emporium of the Northwest. All the wholesale stores of considerable magnitude, the daily and weekly newspaper offices, the principal hotels, the public halls and places of amusement, the great railroad depots, and a large number of the most splendid residences—in short, the great bulk of the wealth and the chief interests of the city—were located in this district. In this Division alone, there were three thousand six hundred and fifty buildings destroyed, which included one thousand six hundred stores, twenty-eight hotels, sixty manufacturing establishments (principally of clothing, boots and shoes, and jewelry), and the homes of about twenty-two thousand people.

"In the North Division, not less than one thousand four hundred and seventy acres were swept by the flames; destroying thirteen thousand three hundred buildings—the homes of seventy-five thousand people, about six hundred stores, and one hundred manufacturing establishments.

"The total area burned over in the city, including streets, was two thousand one hundred and twenty-four acres, or nearly three and one-third square miles. This area contained about seventy-three miles of streets, eighteen thousand buildings, and the homes of one hundred thousand people."

LOSSES BY THE FIRE.—The same report gives, in tabulated form, an "approximately reliable" summary of the losses:

BUILDINGS.

Eighty business blocks.....	$ 8,515,000
Railroad depots, warehouses and Chamber of Commerce .....	2,700,000
Hotels .....	3,100,000
Theatres, etc. ....	865,000
Daily newspapers, including buildings .....	888,000
One hundred other business buildings .....	1,008,420
Other taxable buildings.....	28,880,000
Churches and contents.....	2,989,000
Public schools and contents.....	249,780
Other public buildings, not taxed .....	2,121,800
Other public property (streets, etc.).....	1,763,000
	$ 53,080,000

PRODUCE.
Flour (15,000 bbls.)	$ 97,500
Grain	1,245,000
Provisions (4,400,000 lbs.)	340,000
Lumber	1,040,000
Coal	600,000
Other produce	1,940,000
	<hr/>
	$ 5,262,000

BUSINESS—WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
Dry goods	$ 13,500,000
Drugs	1,000,000
Boots, shoes, leather, etc.	5,175,000
Hardware, iron and other metals	4,510,000
Groceries and teas	4,120,000
Wholesale clothing	3,650,000
Jewelry, etc.	1,300,000
Musical instruments, etc.	900,000
Books on sale	1,145,000
Millinery	1,610,000
Hats, caps and furs	1,060,000
Wholesale paper-stock	700,000
Shipping and dredges	300,000
Manufactories (stock, machinery and products)	13,255,000
Other stocks, and business furniture	25,975,000
	<hr/>
	$ 78,700,000

PERSONAL EFFECTS.
Household property	$ 41,000,000
Manuscript work (records, etc.)	10,000,000
Libraries, public and private	2,010,000
Money lost (Custom House $2,130,000)	5,700,000
	<hr/>
	$ 58,710,000

GENERAL SUMMARY.
Improvements (buildings, etc.)	$ 53,080,000
Produce, etc.	5,262,500
Manufactories	13,255,000
Other business property	65,445,000
Personal effects	58,710,000
Miscellaneous	378,000

Total, in round numbers	$196,000,000
On this, there was a salvage, in foundations and available material for re-building of say	10,000,000

Making the total loss about..... $186,000,000

The value of property in the city at that time, real and personal, taxed and untaxed, was estimated at $575,000,000, of which, according to the above figures, the loss by fire was about thirty-three per cent.

The destruction of property belonging to the city, and included in the foregoing total, was estimated by the several Boards as follows:

City Hall and furniture	$470,000
Bridges	71,000
Damage to pavements	270,000
Damage to sidewalks, etc. (General Fund)	70,000
Damage to Water Works	35,000
Damage to lamp posts	15,000
Damage to hydrants, sewers, water service, reservoirs, etc.	60,000
	<hr/>
	$991,000

FIRE DEPARTMENT.
Buildings	$ 60,000
Furniture	7,500
Damage to engines	8,200
Damage to hose	10,000
Damage to fire-alarm system	45,000
	<hr/>
	130,700

POLICE DEPARTMENT.
Buildings	$ 53,600
Furniture, etc.	32,500
	<hr/>
	86,100

Board of Education: ten buildings valued at $249,780 and other property $1,220	$251,000
Board of health	15,000
Sidewalks, not included in above	941,380
	<hr/>
	1,207,380

Total municipal losses..... $2,415,180

Henry H. Nash, cashier of the United States Depository, in his narrative, states that there were about $2,000,000 in the vault; $1,500,000 of which was in currency. The amount saved was $435,391.87. Loss in coin, $6,000; loss in currency, $1,034,200; making a total of $1,040,200.

The report of the Board of Public Works for 1871 contains this official statement: "The fire spread in a northerly and north-easterly direction with wonderful rapidity, over a territory about four miles in length, by an average of two thirds of a mile in breadth, and comprising about 1,687 89-100ths acres, and finally terminated at midnight of the second day at the extreme north-eastern portion of the city, having destroyed, with two or three exceptions, every building in its course. It burned over, on an average, sixty-five acres per hour, and the average destruction of property for the same time was about seven and a half million of dollars, or about $125,000 per minute."

IMMEDIATE RELIEF MEASURES.

NARRATIVE OF C. C. P. HOLDEN.—Upon the morning of October 9, 1871, the writer went to ascertain the extent of the fire, accompanied by Orren E. Moore, who hitched up his team, and we drove to the west line of the fire, at Jefferson Street, near Harrison.

We the undersigned President and Secretary of the General Relief Committee, organized Monday afternoon of October 9th 1871, certify that the following statement of Mr. Charles C. P. Holden, then President of the Common Council, of the occurrences at that time and the measures taken by the Committee, is substantially true and correct to the best of our knowledge and belief.

Chicago April 11, 1880
(C. C. P. Holden)
Secretary

Orren E. Moore
President
of Committee

There were huddled together large numbers of men, women and children, who had escaped from the flames. Several were reported burned in that neighborhood, and, subsequently, eight bodies were brought and laid on the sidewalk near the southwest corner of Harrison and Jefferson streets. The first bridge over the river to be reached was on Twelfth Street—VanBuren, Adams and Polk-street bridges having gone down. As we hurried forward, the sights were too terrible to behold!—men, women and children in endless confusion, gathered in vacant lots, in the alleys, in the streets, indeed, everywhere. We reached DeKoven Street, where the fire had started. The cottage at No. 137 DeKoven Street, in the rear of which the barn had burned that caused this disastrous conflagration, was still there. We passed on, making our way to and along Clinton Street, and at last reached Twelfth Street. We turned into Twelfth Street, and worked our way, with difficulty, for one block, to Canal Street, where it appeared to be impossible to proceed through the crowd farther, unless we took a long time in so doing. We drove south on Canal to Eighteenth Street, which bridge we crossed to the South Side, and then Mr. Moore drove a little to the corner of Wabash Avenue and Eldridge Court, or a little north of it. Every nook and corner in that vicinity appeared covered with goods and human beings.

We then returned to Madison Street, on the West Side, and there learned that the mayor and many aldermen were then in the South Division, fighting fire; that at one o'clock, the mayor had been at the Court House, where he had given written orders to Alderman J. H. Hildreth to blow up buildings with powder, in order to stay the flames. While we were talking, Chief Fire-Marshal Robert A. Williams came westerly across the bridge. He said "the thing had gone up." There was no water, and his Department was helpless. Some of his machines were taking water from the river. They had made the best fight they could until the Water Works were destroyed, when they were seemingly powerless. He said that cities in every direction had responded nobly for help.

Failing to find any city officers, we again started on our mission of observation. Mr. Moore drove north, and the farther we went the more dreadful became the situation. Vast multitudes had crossed the Indiana-street and Kinzie-street bridges, and also on the railroad bridge, though none but footmen could pass over on the latter. As we drove along, the streets and alleys were crowded with those fleeing from the fire which was then prevailing in the North Division. When we reached Chicago Avenue, the sight was one never to be forgotten. It was reported that whole families had been driven into the lake in an effort to save their lives, but this had resulted in many having perished. The prairie, west of where we were and to the northwest, was said to be literally covered with burned-out people. Men, women and children, in great living masses, met our vision in every direction. There were the sick and crippled, the aged and infirm, great numbers of whom had been injured in various ways by the fire; and all were appealing most piteously for help, although thankful that their lives had been spared. Scores of little children clung to their mothers, while the mothers knew not whither to go or what to do. Women in every station of life were rushing about hither and thither, hunting for their lost little ones; husbands were searching for their wives—wives were hunting for their husbands; and children were crying as though their hearts would break—orphans, indeed, so far as we could judge, and probably orphans in fact, made so during the past few hours. Many were reported dead and lying in buildings in near proximity; but the dead could not longer suffer, and it was for the care of the living that our thoughts were then turned. This terrible scene had been continuously before us from early in the morning.

Having failed to find the mayor and aldermen, with whom to confer relative to the awful situation, who was to care for these sufferers then everywhere to be seen? Where was the Chicago Relief and Aid Society? And where was the county agent and his staff? There was no flag of relief to be seen. It would not do to longer wait and let suffering humanity die for the want of help.

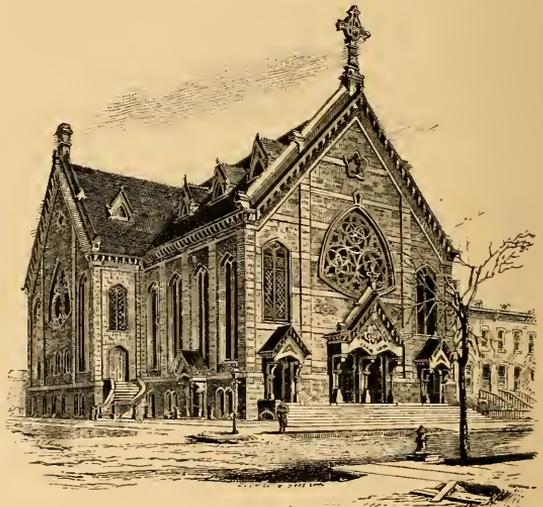

Action, immediate action, was wanted. It was then eleven o'clock of that murky, sultry Monday morning. The situation was thoroughly understood, and something should be done at once, or dire disaster would befall the suffering people, of which it was reported there were then more than 75,000, with the number heavily increasing, as the conflagration was still raging, and nothing to impede it. Then it was that the writer determined upon a plan to relieve the distressed. It was for the city, in its corporate capacity, to step to the front. The writer was president of the Common Council, and next to the mayor in authority, and in that trying hour he would assume the responsibility to act without any further delay. Mr. Moore agreed to the programme we roughly outlined; and then he turned his team homeward, and drove quickly thither.

While en route, great multitudes were met and passed, many of whom stopped us to inquire, "What was to be done?" Among the number the writer recollects Melville E. Stone, Clark Geib and others. We requested them to be at the Congregational Church, corner of Washington and Ann streets, by one o'clock p. m., or sooner, and for all to come prepared for active work. Before reaching our homes, our plans were fully matured. It was now nearly noon, and Mr. Moore drove to the Police Station at the corner of Madison and Union streets, where the writer directed Captain George M. Miller to send one or more officers for Mayor Mason, with the request that he come, without delay, to the Congregational Church, and also that he send a like request to General C. T. Hotchkiss, the city clerk; time, 12:15 p. m. The following gentlemen were also sent for by special officers, and asked to meet us as soon as possible: Hon. S. S. Hayes, General O. L. Mann, Clark Lipe, J. W. Preston, Ira V. Munn, Hon. L. L. Bond, Alderman Thomas Wilce, D. W. Clark, Jr., David Cole, Alderman Woodward, Alderman Sam. McOtter, Hon. G. W. Stanford, John Comiskey, E. F. Runyan, and some others whose names are now forgotten.

E. F. Runyan

Deputy Superintendent Wells Sherman and Captain Miller were requested to report at once at the church, and also to have several patrolmen there for duty. We then drove to the church, which we found locked; but as Rev. Dr. Goodwin, the pastor, lived next door, we found him, told him our mission—which was to make his church a nucleus, or headquarters, of relief, around which all sufferers from the fire could cluster during the trying emergency then at hand. Dr. Goodwin coincided fully with us, and said his church was at our service, and that he was only too glad of the opportunity to have it thus utilized.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

Establishment of Headquarters.—Mr 11. Z. Culver, one of the church trustees, who was living near by, was called on for the keys of the building, and then, in the name of the City of Chicago, we took possession of the First Congregational Church, at 12:45 p. m., October 9, 1871. Chairs, tables and everything were put into shape, carpets were removed from the basement for immediate work, and, as if by instinct, as soon as the doors were thrown open, people began to come for any needed service. General O. L.

Mann, General Joseph S. Reynolds and Melville E. Stone were among the number first there. Mr. Stone had come in his own conveyance, for a trip to the burned district. He was asked to go to such points as he thought best, and impart the information that relief measures had been established at the Congregational Church; to ascertain so far as he could the needs of the sufferers, and, in extreme and urgent cases, to have them attended to if possible. General O. L. Mann, Arba N. Waterman, Colonel W. A. Ray, G.

A. N. Waterman

DeClereq, Pleasant Amick, and many others, started at the same time, but in different directions, on similar missions. The officers who had been sent in quest of the mayor returned, saying that he could not be found, as he was, with many aldermen, somewhere in the South Division, fighting fire. They, with others, were directed to try again, and not to return without him. Those who had been sent for from the police station commenced arriving; General C. T. Hotchkiss, Honorable S. S. Hayes, Honorable Corydon Beckwith, and T. B. Brown were among the first.

Police Measures.—As Mr. Brown was the president of the Board of Police Commissioners, he was requested to issue authority to deputies to swear in citizens for special police service. These special police were to do duty in saving property from incendiaries and all other malicious persons. Allan M. Culver, a mere lad of sixteen, who had a boy's printing press in his father's barn near by, proposed to print the badges; which work he ably performed, assisted by Robert W. Patton and Miss Kate Medill. The badge was simply a small piece of white cotton cloth, with the word "Police" thereon, and some had the words "Special Police." The fac simile here given is taken from one worn on that occasion. There were probably five thousand special policemen sworn in before noon of the next day. Several gentlemen were engaged in swearing in the new men, and giving them directions where to do duty. A. G. Lane and D. L. Jurgens were among the number that did good service in that way.

Refectory established.—Alonzo Snider was directed, with some others, to take possession of the vacant Green-street Church, and manage it for feeding the masses. It being a large structure, it was known that great numbers could be provided for at that point. The owners objected to its occupation, but their objection counted for naught, and Mr. Snider carried out the order, put up cooking-stoves, and got ready for business at once. He was also directed to send to the large bakeries orders permitting them to use fires,* but that everything they baked should be turned over to the Relief Organization; also to bake all the bread they could. Mr. Snider,

Alonzo Snider

POLICE BADGE.

fatherine J. Sinclair

with Misses C. J. Sinclair, Ida Sinclair and Eva Sinclair, did a wonderful work in that old church.

*At ten a. m. of October 9, General O. L. Mann had very wisely ordered, in the name of the mayor, that all fires should be extinguished until the water supply was resumed.

Additional Measures taken.—After a hasty consultation with Hon. S. S. Hayes, he suggested that a proclamation should at once be issued by the authorities, informing the people of Chicago what was being done for the sufferers; also announcing the necessity for the maintenance of order throughout the city; that those in distress should be cared for; that the City of Chicago would meet all expenses thus incurred, etc. This paper, Mr. Hayes promised to prepare. Aldermen Thomas Wilce and W. B. Batcham were directed to erect from one thousand to two thousand houses, suitable for the occupancy of those who had been burned out—this order being given by the writer. They were to take possession of any unoccupied land suitable for the purpose, get the material and employ men sufficient to erect the same at the earliest moment.

As the water supply was entirely stopped, the possibility of the outbreak of any new fires was one of great terror, especially when it was realized that a new fire might at any moment be precipitated upon the people of the West Division, and also on that portion of the South Division lying south of Harrison Street, the thought of which was appalling in the extreme. But all the time men came, asking what they could do to help save that part of the city then untouched by the flames, and what assistance they could render. Among the vast crowd may be mentioned—in addition to those heretofore named—David Cole, Rev. Dr. A. E. Kittredge, D. W. Clark, Jr., J. F. Morris, George L. Scott, J. W. Preston, General J. J. F. Wilson, D. L. Juergens, Hon. J. G. Rogers, Hon. William A. Porter, Alonzo Snider, Aldermen Samuel McCotter, Willard Woodard, J. W. Stanley, John Buehler, J. L. Campbell and

D. L. Juergens

John Buehler

J. J. McGrath, General John McArthur, Rev. Dr. E. P. Goodwin, T. M. Avery, J. H. Pearson, Clark Lipe and L. L. Mills.

Large numbers of couriers were despatched to the outskirts of the burned district, with positive instructions to hunt out those in the greatest need, especially the sick, and have them cared for regardless of cost, many wagons and other vehicles being sent with them, to be used whenever necessary.

Water Supply.—The urgent need for water caused the writer to have water parties immediately organized, in charge of which David Cole, Hon. G. W. Stanford and Clark Lipe were placed. They were authorized to organize thoroughly for the work; and where owners of wagons and other vehicles which they might want would not comply with their request, to press them into the service of the city, and, at all hazards, have the water-brigade in every part of the district where it was needed at the earliest possible moment. These gentlemen, being Park Commissioners, knew where to obtain the water and how to handle it. They soon had a number of devised system had been adopted, making several departments, and placing a thoroughly efficient person at the head of each.

G. W. Stanford

Dr. John H. Kauch, of the State Board of Health, was placed in charge of the Health Department, with all the assistance he needed, to whom applications for medicine, medical or surgical attendance, or for hospital supplies, were to be made. The doctor soon thoroughly organized his department. Many of the best physicians of the city volunteered their services; Dr. Reuben Ludlam, Dr. A. J. Baxter (the latter had been burned out on the North Side, losing nearly his all), and many others were at the front.

General Joseph S. Reynolds was made superintendent of the Lost and Found Department. George W. Stanford, David Cole and Clark Lipe were continued in charge of the water supply; and they then had a large force in the field carrying water to the portions of the burned district, where the sufferers were. The supply was obtained from parks and artesian wells. Colonel Levi P. Wright, the street contractor, who had been burned out on the North Side, voluntarily furnished some half-dozen regular watering carts to the committee, and the men to operate them. The water was supplied to all of our citizens who had no other means of supply.

All boat-houses were taken for hospital purposes. Hon. E. F. Runyan, who had been detailed on the water committee, was directed to see that the order previously given him relative to the throwing open of the school-houses, was fully carried into effect. Major S. D. Phelps was detailed to secure a corps of assistants and go to the South Division, and to look after those in that district who needed help.

It was not yet five o'clock p. m. There were great numbers continually applying for free transportation to the country, and to all such General Hotchkiss gave requests on the various railroads for the needed passes. The trains out of Chicago, that night, were loaded—I should say "jammed." The cars were not only filled to overflowing, but men and boys rode on top of them. Many of our citizens, who had not been burned out, took their chances of discomfort on these crowded trains, and went to stay with friends in the country, making room in their own homes for those who had no place of refuge. It is reasonable to say that one-third of all those outside the limits of the fire had strangers, fugitives from the flames, in their homes during Monday and the few succeeding days.

Those who came in to report progress at the depots as to the shipment of the crowds, told of men, women and children huddled together, covered with soot, cinders and ashes, almost destroying their human appearance. Hon. Julian S. Rumsey, ex-mayor of Chicago, was observed at the North-Western depot, with his wife and some seven children. They had been traveling since three o'clock a. m. of that day, fleeing from fire, and had finally reached the depot. It may with safety be said, that fifteen thousand persons took passage on the outward-bound trains, during that fearful Monday afternoon and night, seeking places of shelter and the necessities of life, who the night before had retired in possession of ample means, little dreaming of the fearful calamity that was to befall them.

Arrival of Supplies.—At 6 p. m., the first relief supplies commenced arriving; but from whence I am now unable to say. They came from the cities and villages within a radius of eighty miles, and trains on all the roads that evening brought large quantities. Mrs. J. W. Boyden, Mrs. William Ripley and Miss Eliza Cherrie immediately took charge of the kitchen and dining-room at the church, and, during that evening, many hundreds had a good substantial limitless numbers who were on the prairie and vacant property in the northwestern portion of the city, many without food and nearly all without shelter; the crying of little children for bread and water was heartrending. Then too came reports from the shore of the lake on the North Side, similar in purport, except that all who were there congregated were without shelter. Many cases of death and sickness were reported, with the fire still burning toward the city limits on the north, destroying everything in its path, but apparently nearing its end, simply for lack of anything more to burn.

Alleviation of Suffering.—This was the outlook for the sufferers on Monday evening. Mr. Moore's committee was doing all they could to provide for those poor sufferers. Many persons were sent, with cooked provisions and water, to the burned district. This was kept up all night. At the same time the special police system was being extended to every part of the city, and the greatest watchfulness was charged upon all. The outlook was truly appalling, for there seemed nothing whereon to base any reasonable hope—all was despair. But the despondency of the situation did not prevent the best men of our city from working with might and main to help the sufferers. Hon. Joseph Medill, Rev. Dr. A. E. Kittredge, Hon. S. S. Hayes, John C. Gault and Judge Rogers were among the vast number of counselors present in the church; they were not alone, for the entire community seemed alive to the awful situation facing us, and no words or deeds were lacking to give encouragement to the committee and those who were foremost in the work.

It was long after midnight before the great crowd dispersed; and when they did, it was to act as special policemen or as watchmen, for all were on guard at that time. Many remained all night. There was no sleep during that period in that church; for scouts and couriers were coming and going continually, taking such information and supplies as we had to send, and bringing such tidings of misery and woe as they had gleaned from the outside.

Tuesday Morning.—With dawn of day on Tuesday, the 10th, came a ray of hope, for it brought rain—the all-needed rain. There was not much of it; but grateful indeed, were the people of the stricken city for what there was. It laid the dust, cleared the air, and helped to stop the fire where it had not already burned itself out. It was truly a God-send to our people. There had been but little rain since early in the preceding July, and not a drop had fallen for six weeks prior to the conflagration.

Not only did the morning of Tuesday bring refreshing rain, but relief came from all parts of the adjacent country, in the shape of provisions, bedding and clothing, and everything that seemed needed for the suffering people.

Indianapolis's Assistance.—Among the first to come, was Eli Thompson, chief of police of Indianapolis, who, at three o'clock a. m., reported that he had brought with him two fire-engines, fully manned, and two car-loads of cooked provisions. They came by the Louisville, New Albany & Salem Railroad. He was accompanied by Lieutenant Robert Campbell, Sergeant Albert Travis, and twenty policemen. The engines were sent to the North Side water-works, and General Mann took charge of the provisions, most of which he distributed among the sufferers in the northwestern portion of the city.

E. M. Harlan, private secretary to Governor John M. Palmer, was at the church by daylight, tendering to the city, on behalf of the State, money, troops and arms. Governor Palmer grasped the situation at once, and had acted accordingly.

St. Louis's Sympathy.—Next came the St. Louis delegation, consisting of Hon. Henry T. Blow, Hon. George Bain, Hon. E. O. Stanard, William Taussig, J.

Mrs. James W. Boyden

diately took charge of the kitchen and dining-room at the church, and, during that evening, many hundreds had a good substantial

to Church

George Barry

supper there. Barrels and boxes came pouring in, filled with cooked hams, roasts of beef, pork, veal, turkeys, chickens, and indeed everything in the way of meat and bread. That Monday evening was one of great activity at the church; great numbers of despatches were received, forerunning the forwarding of supplies, consisting of money, clothing, food, blankets, bedding, and in fact of everything that could be deemed necessary for the comfort of those for whom they were sent. These despatches came from the principal cities of the Union, many of them soliciting replies, which were promptly sent. Truly distressing reports were brought in from all parts of the burned district, giving accounts of almost

C. Ewald, H. C. Breveling, R. P. Tansey, B. M. Chambers, N. Stevens and H. Overstolz.

E. O. Stanard

Other Arrivals.—The Louisville, Ky., delegation followed, headed by Hon. William Morris. And, indeed, delegations from all parts of the western country came pouring in, and the church, by eight o'clock a. m. of that day, was thronged with committees from abroad, and all of them upon the same humane mission. And they did not come empty-handed, but brought all kinds of cooked and uncooked provisions, and every imaginable article fitted to aid the sufferers of our city; such as clothing, boots and shoes of all sizes and for both sexes, ladies' and children's apparel without stint, bedding of every description and in vast quantities, household goods in endless variety, including everything necessary to housekeeping. They even brought tools of various kinds, seeming to fully understand and appreciate our necessities.

Action of Delegations.—The St. Louis delegation apprehended our situation at once, and in the midst of the great excitement at the church that morning, Hon. Henry T. Blow, of that delegation, said to General Hotchkiss: "Boys, keep up your courage. Everything we have is yours until you get on your feet again. We will stay by you; we have come here to stay."

Similar words were spoken by governors of many States, mayors of a multitude of cities, and the leading men of the entire country, as they called on us in that church. And these expressions of sympathy and confidence helped wonderfully to sustain us during those trying days.

Further Systematization at the Church.—The scene at the church during that Tuesday morning was one only to be witnessed on an occasion of the kind. General Mann, J. W. Preston and Colonel William A. Ray undertook to secure all supplies from the railroads in the West Division, and General Hardee had charge of the same service for the South Division, Seaverns's warehouse, corner Fourteenth and Clark Streets, being one of the supply depots. By ten o'clock a. m. every available inch of storeroom in the church was filled with all kinds of supplies. The West-side Rink was made a store and supply room, Nos. 50-52 Canal Street was also a rendezvous for supplies; and quarters on Randolph and other streets were secured and filled. The same rule was adopted by General Hardee in the South Division. In the meantime, the school-houses and churches in general were fully supplied direct from the cars, and large numbers of citizens were engaged in furthering the distribution of these commodities, Aldermen Samuel McCotter and B. G. Gill and Supervisor F. A. Pierce taking charge of the rink. When they had thoroughly established their depot, they had any number of assistants who had volunteered for the work.

At the church headquarters, the ladies had organized an excellent system of distributing male, female and children's wearing apparel, as well as household supplies and furnishings, also maintaining the kitchen and dining-room department. Among the ladies present, and who were most efficient, were Mrs. J. W. Boyden, Miss Eliza Cherrie, Mrs. E. P. Goodwin, Mrs. Orren E. Moore, Mrs. C. C. P. Holden, Miss Sarah E. Stanley, Mrs. Joseph Medill,

Sarah J. Holden

Mrs. H. Z. Culver, Mrs. Thomas Wilce, Miss Julia C. DeClercq, Mrs. H. L. Hammond, Mrs. William Ripley, Mrs. C. T. Hotchkiss, Mrs. Alonzo Snider, Mrs. P. Amick, Miss Kate Medill, Miss Elinor Medill, Miss Birdie Reynolds, Miss Luella Lawrence, Miss

Birdie Reynolds

Emily Fowler, Mrs. Charles E. Culver, Mrs. Goodrich, Mrs. D. W. Clark, Jr., Mrs. George L. Scott, Mrs. W. W. Farwell, Miss C. Sinclair, Mrs. Sawyer and Mrs. Todd. Mrs. Dr. Dickinson and

Phoebe W. Couzins

Miss Phoebe W. Couzins, of St. Louis, had also reported for duty. They had a great work under their charge, and they most faithfully and zealously performed it. Then, too, with General Joseph

Joseph S. Reynolds

S. Reynolds, they had charge of the Lost and Found Department. And that was a busy one; for be it remembered that men, women and children were separated from each other many days, and there were many affecting scenes at that church.

Mayor Mason arrived early that morning, and, in conjunction with the committee, everything was done that could be to continue the efficacy of the work. The mayor and committee issued the following additional proclamation:

"The headquarters of the General Relief Committee are at the Congregational Church, corner of Ann and Washington streets. All of the public school buildings, as well as the churches, are open for the shelter of persons who do not find other accommodations. When food is not found at such buildings, it will be provided by the committee, on application at the headquarters.

"CHICAGO, Oct. 10, '71.

"R. B. MASON, Mayor.

"O. E. MOORE and W. B. BATEHAM, West Division.

"J. H. MCAVOY and N. K. FAIRBANK, South Division.

"M. A. DEVINE and JOHN HERTING, North Division."

The same committee issued the following notice:

"HEADQUARTERS GENERAL RELIEF COMMITTEE, }

"CHICAGO, October 10, 1871.

"J. W. Preston, Esq., President of the Board of Trade, is hereby authorized to receive, on account of this committee, all supplies for the relief of the destitute, and to distribute the same to depots of supplies established in the city, under the control and upon the order of this committee. He is also authorized to hire, or press into service, if necessary, a sufficient number of teams to haul such supplies.

"ORREN E. MOORE, Chairman.

"C. T. HOTCHKISS, Secretary."

On the same day, the Mayor issued an order prohibiting the use of kerosene, or other inflammable oil, in any barn or stable, and forbidding smoking on the public streets, until a supply of water was again had.

These proclamations were immediately printed, and thousands were distributed in all parts of the city, and the police were strictly enjoined to see that they were enforced. At the same time—10:30 a. m.—at the suggestion of the writer, an ordinance was passed fixing the price of bread, as follows:

"Section 1. That the price of bread in the City of Chicago, for the next ten (10) days, is hereby fixed and established at eight (8) cents per loaf of twelve (12) ounces in weight, and at the same rate for all loaves of less or greater weight.

"Section 2. Any person selling, or attempting to sell, any bread within the City of Chicago, within said ten (10) days, at a greater price than is fixed by the ordinance, shall be liable to a penalty of ten (10) dollars for each and every offense, to be collected as other penalties for violation of City Ordinances.

"Section 3. This ordinance shall be in force from and after its passage."

General C. T. Hotchkiss, city clerk, was directed to cause five thousand copies to be printed, and at once distributed throughout the city.

The demand for this bread ordinance was caused by numerous unprincipled persons who took advantage of the great necessities of those who had been burned out, and charged extortionate rates. These extortions were practised, not only by bread-venders, but to a large extent by the owners of all kinds of vehicles; but as rigid instructions had been given to take forcible possession of any such vehicle, in the name of the city, the practice was very soon abandoned, and legal rates and honest policy adopted. Regular policemen, in addition to the specials, were at the church constantly, in case of any emergency. Officers John Reid, John Hickey, and many others, remained there for many days. The roughs, the incendiaries, and bad characters of all classes and kinds, as a rule, gave Chicago a wide berth during those days of great excitement and peril.

General Relief Work.—Relief work of every sort was now being thoroughly done. Most of the churches had taken hold with a will, and were cooking provisions and feeding the hungry. Thea, too, nearly every church had a special relief bureau, where all necessary articles were supplied to the unfortunates who belonged to their denomination or congregation. Alonzo Snider and Miss C. Sinclair, with large numbers of assistants, had arrangements whereby they could feed, to the extent of five thousand daily, at the Green Street (old) Church. They distributed soups, vegetables, meats, bread, coffee, tea, etc. Every train, on every railroad entering Chicago, brought in supplies; and these trains were continuously coming. It seemed as if the railroads and people throughout the country had joined together for this laudable work. Some of the roads had entire trains of supplies for the relief of our sufferers. These trains came from nearly every city and hamlet within a radius of three hundred miles of Chicago, and they, being made up of car-lots, showed that committees had commenced working early on Monday. Those receiving the supplies from the roads were fully occupied. Teams were continually hauling goods to every part of the city, general rendezvous being first supplied.

Seven car-loads of cooked and uncooked provisions, blankets, bedding, clothing, etc., arrived early in the day from Springfield, Ill., also six car-loads from Fort Wayne, Ind.; and Mayor H. Ludington, of Milwaukee, sent six car-loads of cooked provisions, and telegraphed that Milwaukee would find homes for ten thousand homeless people. Hon D. W. Munn brought in two car-loads of cooked provisions, early in the day, from Cairo, Ill. Very large quantities, too, came in from villages which were located away from the railroads.

Money Contributions.—Not alone were provisions and other necessities being received, but telegraphic advices of large sums of money forwarded were constantly arriving, as the following shows:

"You are authorized to draw on Kidder, Peabody & Co., of this city, for $100,000, for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire. —WM. GASTON, Mayor.

BOSTON, Mass., October 10, 1871.

Others were received from A. T. Stewart, New York City, for $50,000; from James A. Weston, Manchester, N. H., for $15,000; from the city of Erie, Penn., for $15,000; from Troy, N. Y., for $10,000; from Montreal, Canada, for $10,000; from Albany, N. Y., for $10,000; from Brooklyn, N. Y., for $100,000; from Philadelphia, Penn., for $100,000; from Pittsburgh, Penn., for $100,000; and A. Belmont & Co., Duncan Sherman & Co., and Brown Brothers sent a contribution of $5,000 each; E. B. Harlan drew a check on Governor J. M. Palmer, payable to the order of the writer, for $5,000; and Kidder, Peabody & Co. sent an order for $100,000; making a total of $530,000. These amounts, by telegraph and otherwise, together with some fifty others, in smaller amounts, were received during the day of October 10, 1871.

Exodus from the City.—Great numbers were leaving the city and G. DeClercq and A. G. Lane, who had charge of the Transportation Department, had all they could do to furnish them passes. The committee had adopted a form of pass to be given, and had a large number printed. On Tuesday morning, it established an office in the main north entrance to the church; and a line of applicants for passes Governor John M. Palmer, in a proclamation, dated October 10, 1871, said:

"A fire of unexampled magnitude has devastated the City of Chicago, depriving thousands of our citizens of shelter and food and clothing. Under these painful circumstances, I call upon you to open your hearts for the relief of the suffering. Contribute of your abundance everything that you can—food, clothing, money; organize committees and systematize your efforts. Remember those, our fellow citizens, who have always responded so nobly to every call."

And on the same day the governor called an extra session of the Legislature, to assemble on Friday, October 13, and recommended the consideration of the following subjects:

"1st. To appropriate such sum or sums of money, or adopt other legislative measures as may be thought judicious, necessary or proper for the relief of the people of the City of Chicago.

"2d. To enact such other laws and to adopt such other measures as may be necessary for the relief of the City of Chicago and the people of said city, and for the execution and enforcement of the laws of the State."

In addition to this official action, the governor telegraphed to the mayor as follows:

"SPRINGFIELD, October 11, '71.

"R. B. MASON, Mayor of Chicago:—Legislature is called for Tuesday, 13th of October. Send down a committee to suggest measures for the relief of your people. Everybody is disposed to aid you, and it is desirable that some of your senators and representatives come.

JOHN M. PALMER."

Committees from the entire surrounding country continued to arrive with proffers of help. These representative committees had to be cared for, and those who had their homes left untouched, and not fully occupied by sufferers, gave them a hearty welcome. Some of the committees, however, remained at the church, making temporary beds of the mattresses and blankets. They were perfectly willing to "rough it," if by so doing they could in the least help those whom they had come to serve. At 7:30 p. m., the Cincinnati delegation arrived, headed by Hon Josiah L. Keck and General A. T. Goshorn, and the following members of the delegation: Richard Smith, Hugh McBurnie, Benjamin Eggleston, Thomas G. Smith, E. V. Brookfield and Alpheus Cutler. They brought with them seven freight cars, loaded to their fullest capacity with supplies of all kinds. That day brought about great results for all those unfortunates who had been burned out. At 8 o'clock p. m., Alderman W. B. Bateham, who had just come in from the North Side, and others who had been to other portions of the burned district, reported that "every homeless soul had shelter, food and water, and that the sick and injured, so far as known, were provided for." Now, when it is remembered that on Monday noon, only thirty-two hours previously, all seemed chaotic, and that the fire was raging on the North Side, the work which had been accomplished in that short period of time seems almost incredible.

Josiah Lawrence Keck.

Scenes among the Sufferers.—The committee having in charge the lost and found had been instrumental in bringing together whole families whom the fire had separated. Mothers had been enabled to find their children and children their parents. At about five p. m., a poor German woman, almost distracted and heart-broken, came rushing into the church with the words, "I have lost my boys, my poor boys," giving the names and ages of each to the lady at the desk of the "Lost and Found Department." She was nearly insane with grief; her children had been separated from her in the midst of the fire, and she mourned them as dead. A gentleman who was in the crowd heard her wails, and, coming quickly to her side, told her that her boys were safe, and at his house, and stated that he found them on that terrible Monday, wandering aimlessly about. The joy of that mother can not be described. There were many similar meetings during those fearful days, but in the morning, it was reported that there were more than two thousand children unaccounted for, besides a very large number of adults of both sexes and all ages.

Eight dead bodies, or parts thereof, were laid on the sidewalk in front of Mathias Mamer's jewelry store, at the southwest corner of Harrison and Jefferson streets, one of them being that of Jacob Wolf, of No. 95 Harrison Street, in whose place, Mr. Mamer was at the time of the discovery of the fire, on the evening of the 8th.

Alderman Bateham reported that night having seen twenty-

RAIL ROAD PASS.
Head Quarters Gen'l Relief Committee,
Chicago, ----- 1871.
----- Rail Road Pass
----- A Sufferer by the late Fire to
Attest: [Signature]	ORREN E. MOORE, Chairman Relief Com.
	Secretary

RAILROAD PASS.

extended for nearly a block west on Washington Street. They issued a ticket to each, similar to that here reproduced. These passes were filled out, and the managers of the various railroads running out of Chicago accepted them. This, of course, was but a temporary expedient, and other modes were subsequently adopted for this service. The number that applied on Tuesday was legion. It was thought that fifteen thousand persons left the city on Monday and fifteen thousand more on Tuesday, or nearly one-third of all those who were burned out. All trains leaving the city that day had all the passengers they could carry; freight trains also carried many passengers during those early days succeeding the fire.

More Help promised.—From telegraphic and other advices received during the day, it appeared that nearly every city and hamlet in the country, from Maine to California, and also from Europe, were taking active measures to send forward contributions for the sufferers. These advices continued arriving during the entire day of Tuesday.

seven dead bodies during the day, some so mutilated as to be beyond recognition. One of the horrible sights seen by him was near the Sands Brewery, and which manifested a mother's love. The spectacle presented was that of a dead woman, who had first dug a hole in the sand, and therein placed her child, and while bending over it, to protect it from the fire, both had perished in the flames. He passed through very many trying scenes among the wounded, crippled and dying.

There were many interesting incidents at the church during the same period, some of which, are worthy of preservation. In one part of the room, a group of colored children were huddled together, their ages ranging from two years upward; the baby had a doughnut, trying to nibble it, while the others were playing around, heedless of their lost condition. Elsewhere was a group of five German children, the eldest, probably twelve years of age, a girl, who was a mother indeed to the others, the youngest of whom, was about four years old. She carefully attended to their every want, and said that she hoped their parents might be safe, but as the children had been separated from them when their house first commenced to burn, she was fearful that they had perished in the flames. Another, an intelligent looking lady with a baby in her lap, and two other children cuddled down by her side, was sorrowing grievously at the supposed loss of her husband, whom she seemed to know was burned, while the two children were sobbing as though their hearts would break—the baby being the only one in the group who was composed.

Tuesday was the children's day at that church, and it was one of the busiest days ever known to a relief or any other organization. Hundreds of children found their parents during the day, who had been lost from them since Sunday night or Monday morning. While the crowd was not only around the church, but extended for a long distance up and down the streets, a German woman had found her way to an open window, where she could see the working masses inside. She attracted the writer's attention by her distressed gestures and appearance, and he sent an officer to bring her in. In answer to a question as to what was wanted, she said that her husband had been crushed, thereby losing a part of his right side and shoulder, but was still living, and she had come for help. Then she swooned, and Dr. Rauch had her taken away and kindly cared for. These trying scenes were of frequent occurrence on Tuesday.

Work done by the Committee.—There had also been a small army fed and cared for in the church on that day by the ladies. Alonzo Snider, with Miss C. J. Sinclair, reported having fed nearly five thousand during the same period at the Green-street Church.

Clothing of all kinds, blankets, bedding, and indeed everything needed to make comfortable those who were in distress, had been distributed. Telegrams were continually coming in, informing us of very large sums of money being collected. It was well known on that Tuesday evening, that more than $1,500,000 had been contributed by the people throughout the country, and the outlook Wednesday was much brighter than it was twenty-four hours before. The scene was now changed; there had been rain; the fire had exhausted itself; a glorious day's work had been done; and all felt more cheerful; and the great numbers of committees from abroad gladly observed this fact, as one of the many excellent results of their visit. Our reports footed up that night, as a part of the day's work, six hundred and fifty wagon-loads of cooked and other provisions, clothing, bedding, etc., delivered to the homeless, and two thousand and fifty-four wagon-loads of women and children brought to the churches, school-houses and other places of shelter. During the same day, Evanston had distributed twelve wagon-loads of cooked provisions to the homeless in and around Lincoln Park. This statement of work performed during the day includes only those teams under the supervision of the General Relief Committee. There were, no doubt, more than two thousand private conveyances carrying homeless people to places of safety and shelter during the same period. Then, too, there were all kinds of private conveyances, hauling supplies from the cars and storehouses to the needy.

Organization by the Churches.—At 11 p. m. Tuesday, the outlook was one of great encouragement. Rev. Dr. Goodwin had been busy all day conferring with representatives of other churches in regard to forming committees in their respective organizations, thus paving the way to establishing regular relief committees in connection with the various religious denominations, to more particularly look after those connected with their own societies, especially those not likely to apply for public relief. He called a meeting of those interested in this work at the residence of Dr. N. S. Davis, No. 779 Wabash Avenue, on the next day (Wednesday), to "organize a special relief committee for the help of burned-out church members and other worthy people." The Hon. Joseph Medill was appointed to represent Dr. Goodwin's Congregational Church on the special relief committee, Rev. Robert Laird Collyer for the Unitarian denomination, E. C. Larned for the Episcopalian, Mrs. Tyler for the Baptist, Dr. N. S. Davis for the Methodist, and many other delegates for other churches whose names are not remembered. At that meeting a course of action was formulated, which resulted in collecting large sums of money and goods from church members who were not burned out or crippled beyond their ability to give.

Committees continue to Arrive.—The writer remained Tuesday night at the church. Everything that was taking place throughout the city, of extraordinary character, was immediately reported to the headquarters. Wednesday morning more committees came from abroad, many from cities in Canada and in the Middle and Eastern States. The one from Hamilton, Canada, was at the church by daylight, and had come well prepared; so in fact had all the committees. It was estimated on Wednesday that representatives of more than one thousand committees had visited our headquarters since Monday noon. They did not come simply to make their donations and then remain spectators, but to consult with our people concerning their needs. The governors of most of the Western States, as well as some from the Southern and Eastern, had also visited us, and invariably brought words of good cheer and encouragement.

More thorough Systematization of the Committee.—Early in the morning the committee assembled, when C. C. P. Holden treasurer, stated that large sums of money had been contributed, and were then en route, some of which were coming to him personally, and by drafts, payable to his order; and he suggested that these sums should be placed in the treasury of the city, where the entire city would be responsible to the contributors. He, therefore, tendered his resignation as treasurer of the Relief Organization, and moved the appointment of David A. Gage—the city treasurer—to that position. Mr. Holden's resignation was accepted, and David A. Gage then became the treasurer and custodian of the world's contributions to the sufferers by the fire. This action gave entire satisfaction to the numerous committees then present and representing the contributors. At the same meeting the committee presented a series of by-laws, which were passed, for a thorough systematization of the work, and especially for the receipt and disbursement of all moneys. The by-laws were as follows:

"1. All supplies of provisions and clothing will be received and distributed by the General Relief Committee, of which O. E. Moore is chairman and C. T. Itotchkiis secretary. Headquarters of the Committee, corner of Ann and Washington streets.

"2. All contributions of money will be delivered to the city treasurer, David A. Gage, who will receipt, and keep the same as a special relief fund.

"3. All moneys deposited at other places for the relief of this city will be drawn only by the mayor of the city.

"4. No moneys will be paid out of the Special Relief Fund, except upon order of the auditing committee. George Taylor, city comptroller; Mancel Talcott, of the West Division, and Brock McVicker, of the South Division, are hereby appointed such auditing committee.

"5. Railroad passes from the city will be issued under the direction of the General Relief Committee, corner of Ann and Washington streets.

"RELIEF HEADQUARTERS, CHICAGO, Oct. 11, 1871."

The New York Train.—Colonel James Fisk, Jr. and Jay Gould, both of the Erie Railroad, had telegraphed on Monday that they were preparing a train to carry supplies to the Chicago sufferers, and on Wednesday, at 10 o'clock a. m., the train left New York. It consisted of seven cars—heavily loaded with provisions and other supplies. It made fifty miles an hour to Port Jervis, reached Susquehanna at 3 p. m., and was reported at Elmira making unprecedented time to that point. Dense crowds of enthusiastic people were assembled at the depots in the principal towns, and many attempted to throw bundles on the train as it flew past. On the evening of that day, Colonel Fisk telegraphed:

"We received to-day, since the departure of the lightning relief train at 10 o'clock this morning, over ten thousand consignments for the sufferers at Chicago, which were forwarded by the express train at 7 o'clock this evening. It would be almost impossible to enumerate the contents of the packages or their value; but as far as we can judge, taking the entire shipment, nothing could be more appropriate had a month been occupied in the selection. I find that in a single consignment there were shipped one hundred coats, one hundred pairs of trousers, one hundred vests; while another consignment included four hundred barrels of sugar and coffee; and still another, one hundred barrels of flour. We have, from appearances, as much, if not more, to receive to-morrow, which we shall forward, by our express trains only, at 9 a. m., 12 m., 5:30 p. m. and 7 p. m." The cash valuation of these first contributions from New York were estimated at not less than $250,000.

Notifications, from every portion of the country, of the transmission of money and supplies kept pouring in, and it appeared as though there was to be no end to the world's charity. During the day Wirt Dexter, and many other members of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society were at the headquarters, and they suggested that their society should be the distributors and disbursers of the world's contributions, it being a regularly organized charitable society under a State charter; that they possessed all the paraphernalia and facilities for carrying out the wishes of the contributors, and that everything in that connection, of right, ought to be turned over to them. The suggestions of Mr. Dexter and his associates were received by the committee who were then in charge of the work, but no further action was taken at that time. In the evening of the same day (Wednesday), the committees from the country-at-large held a meeting at the headquarters, at which more than one hundred of their number were present. Hon. Henry T. Blow, of St. Louis, was the chairman, and addressed the meeting at considerable length, and, after a full discussion of our situation by those assembled, they adopted an address to the people of the Nation, in which they stated the real wants and needs of the sufferers. Having been here for several days, they knew the exact condition of affairs, and spoke intelligently and advisedly. This address had a widespread influence on the country at large for the general good.

A delegation from Cleveland, Ohio, arrived early in the day, consisting of N. B. Payne, W. T. Warren, Colonel W. H. Maynard, David Price, Mr. Mason and Mr. Alford. They brought eight car-loads of provision, bedding, clothing and a miscellaneous assortment of articles necessary for the sufferers. The committee took great pains to ascertain the true condition of our burned-out people, wherein it was assisted by Hon. Henry T. Blow, who was always on the alert and ready to give information to new committees, gained from personal observations during his daily trips through the outskirts of the burned district. Hon. J. L. Keck, of Cincinnati, was another gentleman who was ready at all times to impart information to those who sought it. From these gentlemen, and other members of the committees, an incalculable amount of assistance was derived; and it was well that it was so, for the committee had more than they could possibly do. General Hotchkiss, the secretary, who had not seen a moment's rest since Monday, was still steadily attending to the duties of his position, and, though he had many able assistants, his task was Herculean. Every available foot of space in the church had been filled with the commodities from abroad, and these he had to supervise, both in their disposition and distribution.

Henry T. Blow

Reports came in from all parts of the city where the unfortunates were housed, stating that everything possible had been done for their relief and welfare. Cooked provisions for immediate use had been received, and it was thought advisable to have less of that description in the future, as a large number of families had obtained permanent shelter and had been supplied with necessary cooking utensils. Hence, the committees from abroad, at their meeting, had recommended that uncooked provisions be sent from the country at large.

Those in charge of the headquarters' dining-room had been busy from early dawn feeding the multitude. The tables were loaded down with cold meats of all kinds in abundance, contributed from Maine to California. The review of Wednesday's work was entirely satisfactory; and when it was considered, that we were less than three days in the business, it was not surprising that we felt extremely self-gratulatory over the result. That night I went to my home, to remain for the first time since the night of terror.

Thursday's Work.—Thursday came, and brought with it more hope for the future. Water was being obtained in small quantities in very low stories or basements, having been pumped by fire and other engines into some of the mains, from the river. The Board of Police Commissioners revoked the order creating special police, as it considered the regular force sufficient for any future demands.

Governor Palmer was at headquarters on Thursday, having arrived in our stricken city, to see for himself what was requisite, as he wished the Legislature to pass such acts as would relieve the sufferers to the fullest extent.

Messrs Wirt Dexter, N. K. Fairbank, H. A. Johnson, and other members of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society made another motion at a meeting held this day in the pastor's study, to have the donations transferred to their society. At this meeting, Mr. Fairbank offered the following resolution, as embodying the sentiments of those present, which was passed: "Resolved, As the sense of this meeting, that the organization of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society be adopted as the means of distributing the food and supplies received for the sufferers; and that the present Relief Committee, appointed Monday night last, together with the mayor, comptroller, city treasurer, and two aldermen from each Division of the city; to be selected by the mayor and president of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, be added to the directory of said Society."

Throughout the day all depots for supplies were full to overflowing with the abundance which arrived unremittingly, while hundreds of teams were busy, from early until late, in hauling these supplies where they were required. Alderman Wilce reported that he had ready for occupancy some thirty houses, which he had constructed for the homeless under the order given him on Monday last, and had under way the construction of two hundred more.

Al. Wilce

Applications for free transportation to the country had greatly diminished since Tuesday, although those in charge of the pass department were kept busy during the day.

The Work transferred.—On Friday, the 13th, the mayor turned over everything to the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, by virtue of the following proclamation:

"I have deemed it best for the interest of this city to turn over to the Chicago Relief and Aid Society all contributions for suffering people in this city.

"This Society is an incorporated, old-established organization, and has possessed for many years the entire confidence of our community, and is familiar with the work to be done. The regular force of this Society is inadequate to this immense work, but they will rapidly enlarge and extend the same, by adding prominent citizens to aid this organization in every possible way. I also confer upon them the power, heretofore exercised by the Citizens' Committee, to impress teams and labor and to procure quarters, so far as may be necessary for the transportation, distribution and care of the sick and disabled.

The general Sheridan desires this arrangement, and has promised to co-operate with this association.

"It will be seen from the plan of work detailed below, that every precaution has been taken in regard to the distributions.

"CHICAGO, October 13, 1877.

"R. B. MASON, Mayor."

The Chicago Relief and Aid Society very soon thereafter took possession of the immense trusts thus transferred to their charge, although there were no immediate changes at the church, in the mode of managing the vast system of relief which had been carried on from that great center. On Friday evening, October 13th, the Committees from the Nation held their final meeting, and adopted the following address:

"TO THE PEOPLE OF CHICAGO.

"The undersigned respectfully call your attention to the following facts: The committees from the principal cities of the West, with food and supplies of all kinds, have been in your city since last Monday night. They assembled at the headquarters of the Mayor and City Council, corner of Ann and Washington streets, and have since co-operated with Alderman Holden and other members of the Council.

"Mr. Moore and his associates being the only organization known to them in the city for the relief of the sufferers by the great fire, the St. Louis supplies, with large quantities intrusted to the delegations from Indiana and Illinois, were distributed by General Hardee, who, in person, under orders of General Sheridan, placed them, as we believe, most judiciously.

"We attest most heartily to the unselfish and arduous services rendered by Alderman Holden, Mr. Moore and his associate members, the Mayor and many of the Common Council, Mr. Preston, of the Board of Trade, and, especially, General Sheridan and his aides; and yet deem it a duty to say to you that it is now absolutely essential that the work be systematically and economically extended; that ample arrangements should at once be made for the reception and careful distribution of coming supplies, by an organization which will satisfy yourselves and encourage your friends to continued action. We are perfectly satisfied to recommend to the country that all moneys intended for your relief be sent to the city treasurer, because we believe that they will not only be safe, but will be expended in accordance with the wish of the contributors; but from the facts presented we trust you will see the actual necessity for the systematic arrangement alluded to. And now that your best men can calmly survey the condition without fear of the future, we again most earnestly beg that you will take immediate steps for a thorough and permanent organization, that will be entirely equal to the great work before them.

"HENRY T. BLOW, Chairman of Western Committee.

"A. T. GOSHORN, Chairman of Cincinnati Committee.

"WM. W. MORRIS, Chairman of Louisville Committee.

"RELIEF HEADQUARTERS CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, }
"CHICAGO, October 13, 1871. }

Thus the time had arrived for a separation; and, indeed, it seemed like parting from one's family to bid adieu to these representatives of our Nation who had hastened to us at our first cry of distress, and who had, from the very beginning on that terrible Monday, made our cause their own—indeed, in many things, out-doing us. They came early, and brought succor, remaining until all were provided for. And, strange to say, in all the public acknowledgments emanating from this city relative to the noble deeds done by contributors to the sufferers, there is little or no mention found of the self-sacrificing action of these unostentatious pioneers, who were first in the service of that charity which subsequently became world-renowned. The newspapers of the day briefly mentioned these matters; but that was all.

Sp. Dr. Efford

Cincinnati's Action for our Sufferers.—The following letter, from the Hon. Josiah L. Keck, of Cincinnati, Ohio, is of interest, as detailing the action taken in that city:

"On Monday, October 9, 1871, the Chamber of Commerce, at 12 m., commenced to receive subscriptions of money and supplies for the relief of Chicago sufferers by the fire, and appointed a committee to distribute same. At 3 p. m. of same date, the Common Council met in called session, and I offered a resolution appropriating $100,000 for same purpose, and the appointment of a committee to take charge of same. At 4 p. m., the joint committee of these two bodies met, and I was chosen chairman, and the following gentlemen of the committee were appointed to go to Chicago in charge of the supplies, viz.: Richard Smith, Hugh McBurnie, Benjamin Eggleston and Thos. G. Smith, of the Chamber of Commerce; E. V. Brookfield, Alpheus Cutler, General A. T. Goshorn, and J. L. Keck, of the Common Council; and I was again chosen chairman of this sub-committee. The balance of the joint committee were intrusted with the purchase and shipment of the supplies, and the sub-committee to the distribution of the same in Chicago. We left Cincinnati that same evening, at 7 o'clock, with a train consisting of one sleeper, one baggage-car (used by us as a kitchen during our stay in Chicago), and five freight cars, loaded with coffee, sugar, bread, crackers, tea, provisions, clothing, bedding and blankets, and arrived, after some vexatious delays, at Chicago, at about 7 p. m. of Tuesday, the 10th. We at once visited your headquarters, at the church in the West End, and, with the committee of ladies and gentlemen there, made arrangements to furnish them with the supplies we had. The subscriptions received by the Chamber of Commerce were about $100,000 in money, and some $10,000 in value of supplies. This $100,000 was expended by the committee in the purchase of necessities here, and forwarded to our sub-committee at Chicago, and by them distributed amongst the various church relief societies, hospitals, schools, and ward organizations, together with what was turned over to the Chicago Relief Committee and the individual distributions by the sub-committee. I also took $10,000 in cash, and furnished cash relief to the amount of some $4,000 to build a soup-house, which we ran during the winter; and also furnished church organizations,—to-wit, Catholic, Colored, Jewish, etc.—with many necessities during the winter. Our sub-committee remained in Chicago for two weeks, and I frequently returned to that city during the succeeding three months.

"There was some misunderstanding between Wirt Dexter, Esq., Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, and ourselves. He insisted that we should turn our money, in money, over to his committee, and we refusing, holding that our instructions were to furnish supplies, which we were willing to buy and send from Cincinnati to Chicago. That society refused to receive anything further from us except money, and we refused to furnish money, but were willing to furnish what was required in the way of food or clothing. On this we split, and I returned to the city treasury about $60,000 in cash, having spent about $40,000 of the city's appropriation, as well as all of the citizens' subscription of $100,000, and the supplies that were sent us. Every day during our stay we would receive from five to ten car-loads of supplies from our committee at home, and would distribute the same on arrival. I also received a number of car-loads from Ohio towns, consigned to me, which were all distributed by the committee. I had also the pleasure of entertaining a large number of your citizens at dinner and supper in our car. We ran our kitchen-car all day, and every day during our stay. To the best of our ability we did the best we could, and I have never doubted that we did well. It is my impression that we were among the first to arrive with help; that we remained longer, and did more effectual work, than any other committee. The reason was, we were better kitted up, and had better facilities—not that we had larger hearts or more sympathy in the work.

"J. L. KECK."

What St. Louis did.—And the following was received from Hon. George Bain, of St. Louis, Mo.:

"On the receipt of the news of the burning of Chicago, on the 9th of October, 1871, a public meeting was called at the Merchants' Exchange, presided over by Mayor Joseph Brown; and at that meeting over $70,000 was subscribed for the relief of the sufferers of your city by the fire.

"Besides this, committees were appointed, who collected, that day, six car-loads of cooked and uncooked provisions and one car-load of clothing. The principal subscribers on 'Change were—The Merchants' Exchange, in its corporate capacity, $10,000; St. Louis Gas-Light Co., $2,500; Hon. Henry T. Blow, $1,200; and the following individuals $1,000 each: Mrs. Ann L. Hunt, James H. Lucas, W. M. McPherson, Gerard B. Allen (President Merchants' Exchange), S. C. Davis & Co., Jas. B. Eads, Lavielle Warner & Co. (Southern Hotel), George Knapp & Co. (Missouri Republican), G. R. Taylor, Thomas Allen, Joseph Brown (Mayor), George P. Plant, J. Robb (of New York), Missouri Pacific Railroad, American Wine Co. (Isaac Cook), G. I. Jay & Co., Dodd, Brown & Co., and the St. Louis University.* The same afternoon a special meeting of the City Council was called, and, on motion of Mr. A. Kriechhaus to appropriate $25,000, the writer (Bain) offered an amendment to make it $50,000; which passed by a vote of sixteen to four, and then our Mayor telegraphed Mayor Mason as follows:

Geo. H. Morgan

"MAYOR OF CHICAGO.—Trains will leave by Chicago & Alton R. R. this evening with a quantity of cooked, and other provisions; also provisions by the Vandalia & Illinois Central R. R. The City Council voted $50,000 to the Chicago sufferers, and mass-meeting called for to-night to add to citizens' contribution of to-day of $70,000.

JOSEPH BROWN, Mayor.
"The Committee appointed to carry the provisions to Chicago were Henry T. Blow, George Bain, E. O. Stanard, William Taussig, J. C. Ewald, H. C. Creveling, R. P. Tansey, B. M. Chambers, N. Stevens and H. Overstolz. The provisions and clothing were loaded in seven Vandalia cars, and accompanied by Messrs. E. O. Stanard, N. Stevens, H. C. Creveling and J. C. Ewald; their train leaving at 5:30 p. m., while Messrs. Blow, Bain, Chambers, Taussig and Tansey started by the Chicago & Alton Railroad an hour later, carrying half a car of cooked provisions; the last item handed the writer, being a large box, containing several dozen chickens, which our mayor's wife and daughter—Virginia K. and Jennie B. Brown—had cooked that day, and asked me to deliver to Mayor Mason; but, as you will remember, when our committee had arrived at Van Buren and Canal streets, and met some of your committee, the chickens and other provisions were taken to the church on the corner of Ann and Washington streets, where the women and children were gathered together. After delivering what we had brought up, we went over with your committee to Randolph Street and Michigan Avenue, where we found the Illinois Central train, which had just arrived with the provisions and clothing. We also found Colonel Sheridan, who detailed some soldiers to assist us; and we at once began to distribute provisions among the school-houses and other places of refuge. This was on the morning of the 10th.

Aug. W. N. Brewster

* George H. Morgan, Secretary of the Merchants' Exchange and Secretary of the Relief Committee, was also very instrumental, in St. Louis, in raising subscriptions and supplies.

"That night I slept at your house, and the next morning our force was increased by the arrival of Mrs. Dr. Dickinson and Phebe W. Cousins. Murry Nelson (I think it was) turned over to us seven wagons belonging to Field, Leiter & Co., with their drivers, and loading these wagons with cooked provisions, we started for the North Side—the two ladies and myself—and began distributing our load among the people we found on the lake shore, as far as the cemetery, and to the northern extremity and beyond Lincoln Park. Thence, going westward, we crossed the Chicago-avenue bridge, and left what provisions we had not distributed, in a school-house, which was crowded with people, first having supplied a crowd of about four hundred drawn up in line before the building. That night, a majority of the committee returned to St. Louis, but Mrs. Dickinson and Miss Cousins remained in your city for several weeks, and I am sure rendered valuable assistance.

Joseph Brown

I subjoin, herewith, a list of the committees appointed on 'Change October 9th: Chairman of the Committee to Collect Food in Wagons, S. B. Palling; Purchasing Committee, W. H. Scudder, F. W. Crane, J. D. Husband, S. P. Young, J. P. Fitzgerald; Committee to wait on Banks, Clinton B. Fisk, W. L. Hull, G. E. Leighton; Committee to prepare Circulars, S. W. Hemenway, J. G. Prather, G. F. Cochnower, E. P. Wilcox, M. G. Dodd, James McDonough.

"The foregoing is a brief statement of what I myself remember regarding our trip. GEO. BAIN."

Louisville's Committee.—From Louisville, Ky., there came a large delegation, arriving on Tuesday, 11th. W. W. Morris was chairman of the same. In a letter to the writer, Mr. Morris says:

"I can not give the names of all the committee which went with relief to your city in October, 1871. Messrs. C. G. Davidson, C. O. Smith, M. Muldoon and H. J. Monch were prominent among the number. Colonel Davidson and myself remained twelve days, personally attending to the distribution of $200,000 in supplies. WM. W. MORRIS."

Resumé of Work.—Saturday, the 14th of October, witnessed the absence of the various visiting committees, except where members remained in charge of the distribution of supplies. The Cincinnati people opened their soup-house to the public on this day. It had a capacity for feeding ten thousand persons daily, and it was kept open until late in the winter, providing for all who came.

The Common Council and all city officers, who had made the church their headquarters, found other offices. The Council, which had been in continual session from Monday, at 12:45 p. m., and had had several regular meetings, removed to the police station, at the corner of Madison and Union streets, while other city officers, including the mayor, removed to the corner of Hubbard Court and Wabash Avenue. The mayor having transferred all matters pertaining to relief to the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, the large number of aldermen and other city officers anticipated being in a measure released from the trying position in which they had been placed since October 9; but they were still needed, and continued to perform their charitable work. Among them may be mentioned Aldermen Wilce, Bateham, Woodard, McGrath, Buehler, McCauley, Schintz, McAvoy, Dagg, McCotter, Gill, Campbell, Walsh and Busse.

Theodore Schintz

Allan M. Culver.

On October 17, 1871, the General Relief Committee, through its chairman and secretary, sent the following letter to Wirt Dexter, of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society:

"CHICAGO, October 17, 1871.

"WIRT DEXTER, Esq., Chairman Executive Committee, Chicago Aid and Relief Society:

"SIR,—The General Relief Committee, of which we were chairman and secretary, respectively, with headquarters at the corner of Washington and Ann streets, discontinued all official action as a committee on Saturday evening last, and have since referred all official matters coming before us to your committee.

"We supposed that this fact was generally known, and we now make this formal statement, that you may be assured that there has not been, nor can be, any conflict on our part to possibly embarrass your committee in the full control and direction of all matters pertaining to the relief of the destitute in our midst.

"Respectfully,

"ORREN E. MOORE, Chairman.

"C. T. HITCHKISS, Secretary."

At the request of the aldermen, the writer remained at the church headquarters until Monday, October 23, doing what he could to carry out the original intention of Mr. Moore and himself upon taking possession of the church at noon on Monday, October 9, 1871. In the furtherance of this project there had been, during this time, more than seventy-five thousand people provided for in various ways; the dead had received burial, the sick and wounded had been nursed and cared for, the hungry had been fed, the homeless and houseless had been provided with shelter, lost children had found their parents, husbands and wives who had been separated were re-united, and those who wished to go into the country to friends had been furnished with free transportation.

The Water Supply resumed.—The main water supply, which had been cut off by the fire, was restored on Tuesday, October 17, at 8:20 o'clock, by starting the engine which had been constructed and put into place in 1867, and which had a capacity of eighteen million gallons daily. This again gave to the people the water connection, of which they had been deprived for eight days and five hours. Thus it would appear a reasonable statement, that everything possible had been done.

Unrecorded Gifts.—Relative to contributions and donations made during the early days, by hamlets, towns, villages and cities of the United States and of Canada, it is safe to say that the supplies and money received direct from the donors, and of which no account has been made, would reach the sum of not less than $2,500,000.

It must not be forgotten that the State of Illinois, during an extra session of its Legislature, donated to the City of Chicago the magnificent sum of $2,955,340, by the following Act:

"Provided, however, That not less than one-fifth, nor to exceed one-third, of said sum so appropriated shall be received by said city and be applied in reconstructing the bridges and the public buildings and structures destroyed by fire, upon the original sites thereof, as already provided by the Common Council, and the remainder thereof to be applied to the payment of the interest on the bonded debt of such city and the maintenance of the Fire and Police Departments thereof."

By this timely act, the city was enabled at once to commence re-building and re-instituting the public improvements which had been destroyed.

The writer made a brief report to the Common Council of his action from Monday morning, October 9, until Monday, October 23; which report was spread on the records (vide Council Proceedings 1370-71, pp. 346-47).

After the discontinuance of organized effort by the General Committee, there were many who voluntarily continued in the relief service, without re-imbursment, for many weeks. Many ladies devoted much of their time and means to assist the thousands of women who had lost their positions and only means of support by the fire; while numbers of ladies transformed their houses into storerooms for contributed women's apparel, where those in need thereof could be supplied.

Among the donations of money distributed exclusively by ladies may be mentioned $5,000, given by the Grand Duke Alexis, and $5,000 from the Japanese Prince Iwakura—both amounts having been left with Hon. Joseph Medill, and which sums were placed in his wife's hands for distribution. These amounts Mrs. Medill gave among the various hospitals and charitable institutions of this city. This lady, with her two daughters, devoted the most of the year following the fire to the cause of humanity, in which she was one among a large number of the ladies of our city.

The following letter is of correlative interest as to the relief measures:

"MY DEAR MR. HOLDEN.—You ask for my recollection of the events of Monday, the 9th of October, 1871.

"I had been living at the corner of Robey and Jackson streets. The glare of the great fire, which filled my room, an east one, roused me on Sunday night, and before midnight I had gone down town and was in the thick of it. I was driven before the flames to the lake front, and finally reached home, by the way of Twelfth-street bridge, about noon on Monday, after making a night of it. On my way to my home, I passed down Aberdeen Street, crossing Monroe, to call at my father's residence on Adams Street near Center Avenue.

"It must have been about 11 o'clock a. m., that I met you at the corner of Monroe and Aberdeen, evidently in a hurry. You said you had taken possession of the First Congregational Church, corner of Ann and Washington streets, in the name of the city, you being an alderman; and that a meeting of citizens would take place, to see what could be done for the relief of the suffering and the protection of lives and property. At your suggestion, I went home and got my horse and buggy, and devoted the afternoon and evening among the people who crowded the prairies in the northwestern division, notifying them of the provision you had made for their care. These people had been driven by the fire from the North Side, across Chicago-avenue, Division-street and North-avenue bridges, and were lying out in the groves and on the prairies in a condition of distress and fright which beggars description. How many went to the First Congregational Church it is impossible to say, but the number must have been large. This was the first effort made by anyone to bring order out of chaos. The relief work then begun was taken charge of very soon by the Relief Society.

"When I reached the grounds on which my iron foundry was located, on the historic 'Sands,' I found the remains of three men who had been burned there. I also saw a charred body in the ruins at the northeast corner of Randolph and Clark streets. Indeed but for the importance of the work in hand, and which so occupied my thoughts as to crowd out whatever curiosity I should otherwise have been disposed to gratify, the scenes witnessed during my tramp over the burned district might have furnished me matter for a whole volume of horrible details."

Melville E. Stone

The following letter, written to Rufus Blanchard, on April 24, 1883, explains itself:

"In accordance with your request I submit herewith a statement, compiled from such data as I consider nearly reliable, touching the losses of both personal and real (buildings) estate destroyed by the great fire of October 8th and 9th, 1871.

"The fire destroyed the very heart of our city, taking in its general course all Government, State, County, and a large portion of the Municipal buildings. In its devastating roar it swept over 2,200 acres of soil, burning to destruction 15,768 buildings; 175 manufacturing establishments, 121 miles of stone and other sidewalks, and 73 miles of streets were embraced in the limits of the vast conflagration.

"To enumerate the property destroyed by the fire would be an impossibility, but a tolerably close approximation of the losses can be furnished; and herewith I give you a statement as nearly correct as long research can make it.

"The United States Government lost all its buildings, including the Custom House, and $2,130,000 in money. The city lost, in round numbers more than $3,000,000. The county also lost heavily. Then there were the losses of the great trunk-line of railways, the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Trade, warehouses and elevators, banking corporations and private bankers and brokers, insurance corporations, newspaper offices and effects, hotels and restaurants, opera houses, theatres and other places of amusement, churches, the schools and other places of learning, manufactories of all kinds, the vast shipping interests, including vessels, canal-boats, tugs and dredges, flour, grain and provisions, the brewers, distillers and dealers in wines and liquors, business blocks, stores and dwellings, dry goods, groceries, hardware and iron safes, other metals, coal and wood, clothing, hats, caps and furs, drugs, books, stationery and paper stock, boots and shoes, furniture and bedding, pianos, organs and other musical instruments and music, millinery, jewelry, leather and harness material, tailors' supplies, paints and oils, livery and livery stock, libraries and paintings, and artists' supplies, and all other kinds of business not herein enumerated—a total of $187,927,000; made up as follows, to-wit:

15,768 buildings (and in this number were the business blocks, Custom House, Court House, newspaper offices, railroad stations, depots and offices, hotels, City Hall, churches, opera houses and theatres, and dwellings).....	$ 49,239,000
Household goods, silverware, etc.....	31,536,000
Personal effects, including jewelry and money.....	19,840,000
Flour, grain and provisions.....	5,262,000
Wholesale and retail business.....	46,645,000
Manufactories and shipping.....	14,055,000
All other interests not herein enumerated, city losses outside of City Hall, public libraries, records, and miscellaneous of every description.....	21,350,000
Grand total.....	$187,927,000

"The total valuation of taxable property in the city of Chicago, as assessed for the municipal year 1871, was $289,746,470. The assessment was made for that year on the basis of 50 per cent. of the true valuation of the property thus assessed. Hence the real value of all taxable property in the city for that year was $579,492,940; and thus was wiped out of Chicago's real wealth a little more than 32 per cent. of the same, which would be $185,437,740, leaving a margin of losses, over and above this amount, of $2,489,260.

"These great losses by fire, the like of which were never heard of before in this or any other country during the world's history, were partially met by 201 insurance companies, which companies had at risk in the burned district the sum of $100,225,780; of which amount they paid, according to approximation, the sum of $50,178,925, leaving a net loss to the burned-out property owners of $137,748,075. Sixty-eight insurance companies, with assets of $24,867,109, were compelled to go into liquidation, through losses sustained by the fire.

"Among the products of our soil, and which are enumerated in the above item as destroyed, may be mentioned 15,000 barrels of flour, 4,000 tierces of lard, 1,500,000 pounds of cut-meats, 6,000 barrels of pork, 2,400 tons brown corn.

"Finally, it is safe to say that on that fatal day in the history of Chicago, fully one-third of all her real wealth was destroyed by the conflagration. Not only this, but there were rendered homeless by that terrible calamity more than ninety-four thousand souls; but sadder still is the fact, never to be forgotten, that three hundred human lives were sacrificed to the flames of that ever to be remembered day."

The foregoing is the story, in part, of the first steps taken for the relief of the sufferers by the great fire in Chicago on October 9, 1871. The chapter is made up from such data as I have at hand touching that most memorable occasion. Many of those who were foremost among our citizens in achieving the results accomplished, have since deceased, among them being Hon. Samuel S. Hayes of this city and Hon. Henry T. Blow of St. Louis. Mr. Blow's efficacious work and hearty sympathy in the church headquarters will long be remembered by our citizens. Indeed, all who in that trying hour of our city's history lent a helping hand to our sorrowing and suffering citizens will certainly have their reward.

CHARLES C. P. HOLDEN, the son of Phineas H. and Betsey (Parker) Holden, was born in Groton, N. H., August 9, 1827. His mother's father was Lieutenant Levi Parker, of Dunstable, Mass., an officer in the revolutionary army, and a witness of the hanging of Major André; his mother's youngest brother, Samuel Parker, died in Davenport, Iowa, on August 28, 1884, at the advanced age of eighty-four years. When he was three years of age, his parents moved to West Hartford, Vt., where they remained until the spring of 1836, at which period they moved to Illinois, with their family of nine children, arriving in Chicago on June 30, 1836. His father located a claim, and began farming at Skunk's Grove (now the Town of Frankfort), in Will County, thirty miles south of Chicago. When Charles C. P. had reached the age of fifteen, his father placed him in Charles Sweet's grocery store, which was then on the corner of Wolcott and North Water streets, where he remained for a time, working for his board for the first six months. In the spring of 1847, he enlisted in Captain T. B. Kenney's company of volunteers, for the Mexican War, where he served until October 18 1848, at which time he was honorably discharged from that service, at Alton, Ill. In the spring of 1850, he crossed the plains to California, where he worked in the mines and at farming until December 1, 1853, when he took the steamship "Winfield Scott" for Panama and for home. The second night out from San Francisco, the steamer, in a dense fog, ran on the rocks off Anacapa Island, and was totally wrecked. The passengers were all saved, and remained on that small island for seven days, when they were rescued by the steamship "California," and in due time landed at Panama. Mr. Holden reached Chicago and his home on March 19, 1854. On February 20, 1855, he entered the employment of the Illinois Central Railroad, and remained with that corporation until February 4, 1873. In the spring of 1861, he was elected to the Common Council of this city, to represent the Fifth Ward. He remained in the Council continuously until December 1, 1872, and during that time took an active part in all the great public improvements, then but just begun. He was a strenuous advocate for the building of sewers, the extension of the water system, the improvement of streets, and, indeed, he took the initiative in all works to thus improve the city. He was the moving spirit in cutting down the summit-level of the canal, being the chairman of the committee that went to Springfield and appeared before the Legislature in that behalf. Mr. Holden was the father of the West Side water system, including the second lake tunnel and the works at the corner of Twenty-second Street and Ashland Avenue. In December, 1870, he was elected president of the Common Council, and was the president of that body at the time of the great conflagration, October 9, 1871. In November, 1874, he was elected, for the term of three years, a County Commissioner from the Chicago district, receiving a majority vote of more than eight thousand. He took his seat on December 1, 1874. On the first Monday in December, 1876, he was elected president of the board, and laid the cornerstone of the new Court House on July 4, 1877. The first group of Hospital buildings were erected on Harrison, Polk and Wood streets, during his term in the County Board. Mr. Holden was appointed West Chicago Park Commissioner in March, 1869, by Governor John M. Palmer, in which office he served the people of West Chicago until the spring of 1878. Mr. Holden was married to Miss Sarah J. Reynolds, on September 15, 1855. She was the daughter of Isaac N. and Rue Ann Reynolds, of New Lenox, Will Co., Ill. Mrs. Holden died on July 26, 1873.

OFFICIAL ACTION.

While the flames were still raging, the Mayor of Chicago, and other officials, telegraphed to neighboring cities for engines to help suppress the furious fires and for food to relieve the immediate necessities of those citizens who had been reduced to the condition of homeless wanderers in the brief space of a single night.

The official proclamation is reproduced elsewhere, and an account given of its inception. The original draft was written with pencil upon three half-sheets of commercial note-paper, and is now preserved in the collection of the Chicago Historical Society.

The first act of general importance by the Common Council of the city was the passage of an ordinance, dated October 10, fixing the price of bread, during the ten days succeeding, at the rate of eight cents for twelve ounces.

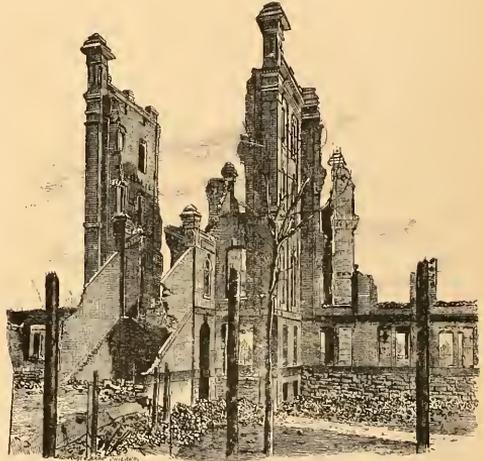

A proclamation was issued by Mayor Mason, on Tuesday, October 10, for the conservation of public peace. The document was published in the Tribune of Wednesday, the 11th, as a completed instrument, containing seven distinct clauses; but the fact is, that these several apparently disjointed announcements were written from time to time, during the early hours of the excitement incident to the fire, and were subsequently combined, perhaps without sufficient authority, by some one who had access to newspaper columns. The first section of the proclamation requested all citizens "to exercise great caution in the use of fire in their dwellings, and not to use kerosene lights at present," as the city was destined to be without a "full supply of water for probably two or three days." The second section proclaimed that "all bridges over the North Branch," and all bridges over the South Branch, "except VanBuren and Adams streets," from Lake Street southward, were passable, whereas Chicago-avenue bridge on the North, and Polk-street bridge on the South Branch, were destroyed. The third section was the first issued in relation to police affairs. It reads:

"All good citizens who are willing to serve, are requested to report at the corner of Ann and Washington streets, to be sworn in as special policemen. Citizens are requested to organize a police for each block in the city, and to send reports of such organization to the police headquarters, corner of Union and Madison streets."

Citizens were requested to avoid passing through the burned districts, to prevent accidents from falling walls; and hackmen and draymen were forbidden to charge more than regular fees for services, under penalty of revocation of license.

On the 19th, the mayor's headquarters were established at the corner of Ann and Washington streets, police headquarters at the corner of Union and Madison streets, and the health department at the same place as the executive rooms. This assumption of the outward show of authority served to impart courage to the alarmed and stricken citizens. In times of peace, men of well-ordered lives move on with scarcely a thought of the mechanism by which peace is preserved. To the many who respect the abstract principles of right, and obey the dictates of conscience and reason, and for whom the law is but the written evidence of what they desire to do, this period of relaxation of the law's agencies was merely an episode; but to those whose minds are ever alert to find opportunities for the evasion of statutory penalties, the confusion was a means to wicked ends. From all parts of the country professional thieves and burglars hastened to this city, where lay vast mines of wealth beneath the ruin of safety-vaults; where houseless wanderers roamed the prairies and the parks with the hastily-rescued treasures of private safes and jewel caskets. It may be doubted whether the calamities of the world, except those inflicted by the hand of war, have offered wider or freer scope for the practice of bold villainies.

RUINS, MAGDALENE HOSPITAL.

Such, in brief, was the social condition of the city when the authorities issued the first proclamation for the preservation of order—on the 19th of October. By command of Mayor Mason, it was proclaimed that five hundred citizens for each of the three divisions should be at once sworn in as special policemen, subject to orders from their respective sergeants, who were, in turn, appointed by the superintendent of police and governed by him. The final clauses of that proclamation read:

"The military will co-operate with the police organization and the city government in the preservation of order."

"The military are invested with full police power, and will be respected and obeyed in their efforts to preserve order."

Two companies of Chicago military—the "Norwegian Guards," commanded by Major J. F. Alstrup—were first to volunteer, and co-operate with Captain Miller, of the West-division police force. The companies were under the command of Captain Bentzen and Captain C. Jahnson. Their service began on October 9.

It has been shown in the preceding narrative that Lieutenant-General Sheridan, then in command of the Military Division of the Missouri, with headquarters at Chicago, asserted that genius for emergencies which has placed him among the foremost men of his time, even before the flames had ceased their work of devastation. When the necessity for the use of explosives was apparent, untrained hands laid mines with slight effect, but when the skilled soldier assumed command of this ultimate resort, the elements themselves obeyed. Great occasions produce great men. The record of the hero of the civil war eclipses the record of the soldier who inspired anew the failing courage of Chicago's citizens, but the qualities which made Sheridan conspicuous at the front flashed into view amid the tottering walls of this doomed city. The perils of fire were first appreciated, and first to be counteracted in his line of work, but when the danger of the moment had been averted, he saw a menacing probability in the inhuman horde that skulked, like ghouls upon the battle-field, to rob the wounded and distressed. With decision, Lieutenant-General Sheridan dispatched to General Belknap, Secretary of War, the announcement of Chicago's destruction while the fire was still raging. He closed his message with these words:

"I ordered, on your authority, rations from St. Louis, tents from Jeffersonville, and two companies of infantry from Omaha. There will be many houseless people, much distress."

Later in the day he again informed the Secretary of War of the extent of the calamity and remarked:

"It seems to me to be such a terrible misfortune that it may with propriety be considered a National calamity."

Secretary Belknap responded, on the 10th, agreeing with General Sheridan as to the National character of the disaster, and announcing that supplies had been ordered, by the War Department, to be forwarded from the several convenient stations in the West.

Although the citizens responded promptly to the call of the mayor for special policemen, and every capable and honest man constituted himself a guardian of the peace, there was a lack of organization. Allan Pinkerton, the well-known detective, joined his corps of men to that of the regular body, and issued a pronouncement to the effect that no mercy would be shown those reprobates who were detected in the act of crime, but that "death shall be their fate." In spite of this, however, there was a deep-seated fear of an outburst of lawlessness. The sentiment of the people was unquestionably a strong desire for the presence of the military, and the popular feeling seems to have been expressed by the Chicago Tribune, of the 11th, which said.

"Lieutenant-General Sheridan has telegraphed to Omaha and the military stations in that section of country for one thousand United States troops to be sent to Chicago, at once, by special trains. These troops are expected to reach Chicago this morning, and will be distributed throughout the remaining residence and business portions of the city, as a protection against incendiarism, robbery, pillage, etc. It is not improbable that the city will be placed under martial law."

Anticipating the necessity for aid and protection, Governor John M. Palmer, on the 9th, sent his secretary, General E. B. Harlan, to Chicago, with instructions to act as in his judgment seemed best for the relief of present suffering. General Harlan reached the city too late to meet Mayor Mason that day, but early on the 10th, after consultation with the mayor, drew on the Governor for $5,000 as a relief fund. The governor, meanwhile, telegraphed the mayor, asking what was needed of him. The mayor responded, under date of the 9th, that food and tents were required. At ten o'clock that night, three car-loads of supplies were shipped from Springfield, and more were dispatched on the following morning.

On the afternoon of the 10th, Governor Palmer received a message from General Anson Stager, tersely defining the extent of the fire and containing these words:

"Two incendiaries shot last night while in the act of firing buildings in the south part of the city. * * The mayor is now organizing a patrol."

The governor replied, requesting the general to inform the State whether troops were needed to preserve order. Through the general, on the same afternoon, the governor learned that Mayor Mason did desire military assistance, which should be ordered to report directly to him. The governor promptly instructed

RUINS, CHURCH OF NEW JERUSALEM.

Adjutant-General Dilger to order the "Sterling City Guards," the "Rock Fall Zouaves," the "Springfield Volunteers" and the "Champaign Cadets" to proceed to Chicago, under command of Colonel H. Dilger, whom he also cordially recommended to the confidence of Mayor Mason. Colonel Dilger left Springfield with his company and one thousand muskets on the evening of the 10th, and arrived in Chicago the next morning. The additional supply of arms and ammunition was sent at the special request of Mayor Mason.

On the morning of the 11th, Colonel Dilger reported to the governor that the rumors concerning outlaws were exaggerated, and that Mayor Mason did not know about the dispatch sent by General Stager for troops. The mayor instructed Colonel Dilger to report to Lieutenant-General Sheridan, who desired the colonel to march his command through the town, for the effect which this display would have on any possible disturbing element. There were by that time some seven hundred regular troops in the city. The governor despatched Colonel Dilger orders to return to Springfield, if his presence was not needed. But the local authorities evidently felt the need of that restraining force, and entrusted the colonel with the care of the North Side.

The Common Council and General Sheridan expressed a wish to have Governor Palmer visit the city. The governor telegraphed General Sheridan to know the number of troops then on police duty in Chicago. The message ended with the cordial words, "Thanks for your promptness." The general replied that there were then seven companies in the city or en route, and that a regiment was about to be formed of volunteers, for twenty days' service. The State troops were to be retained for a day or two.

On this day, the 11th, Mayor Mason issued his proclamation transferring absolute police authority to Lieutenant-General Sheridan. The document reads:

"The preservation of the good order and peace of the city is hereby intrusted to Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan, United States Army.

"The police will act in conjunction with the lieutenant-general in the preservation of the peace and quiet of the city, and the superintendent of police will consult with him to that end—the intent being to preserve the peace of the city without interfering with the functions of the city government."

The police commissioners revoked their order of the 8th, authorizing a special police force, and remarked:

"The large military force now in the city under command of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, co-operating with the regular police organization, is now deemed sufficient to maintain good order and quietude for the future."

On the 12th, or soon after, the peace of the city was conserved by the following troops, under the command of Lieutenant-General Sheridan:

Regular troops—Cos. "F," "H" and "K," of the Fourth Regiment; Cos. "A," "H" and "K," of the Fifth Regiment; Co. "I," of the Sixth Regiment; Cos. "A," "K," and "L," of the Ninth Regiment; and Co. "E," of the Sixteenth Regiment.

State troops—The Springfield Zouaves, O'Meara Guards, and Captain Cyrus Donegan's colored company, Lieutenant-Colonel E. S. Johnson commanding battalion; the Bloomington German National Guards, Captain H. D. Kuhlmann; the Champaign Cadets, Professor E. Snyder; the Sterling City Guards, Captain J. W. R. Stambaugh; the Rock Fall Zouaves, Captain T. Culver; and the Rock Island Light Artillery. Major J. M. Beardsley.

Total, five hundred and sixteen men, with four pieces of artillery.

The regiment of volunteers, alluded to by General Sheridan in his despatch to Governor Palmer, was raised with the approbation of Mayor Mason, and in pursuance to orders from General Sheridan, dated October 11. It was designated First Regiment Chicago Volunteers, and was constituted as follows:

Colonel Francis T. Sherman, commanding; Lieutenant-Colonel H. Osterman, 1st Regiment N. G.;* Major G. A. Bender, 1st Regiment N. G.; Major C. H. Dyer, adjutant; Major Charles T. Scammon, aide-de-camp. 1st Regiment N. G.: Co. "A," Captain Fischer; Co. "D," Captain Pasch; Co. "G," Captain Cronas; Co. "H," Captain Paul; Co. "I," Captain Keller. 1st Chicago Volunteers: Co. "B," Captain Rogers (Lieutenant Adams, commanding); Co. "C," Captain Merrill; Co. "K," recruited by Captain Whittlesey (Captain Baker, commanding); University

* The 1st Regiment National Guards was a part of the Illinois State Militia.

Cadets, Captain Colson; Montgomery Light Guards, Captain Croley; Mulligan Zouaves, Captain McCarthy; Sheridan Guards, Captain Ryan; Chicago Cadets, Captain Sulter; Hamibal Zouaves, Captain Williams. Norwegian Battalion of National Guards: Major Alstrup, commanding; Ole Bendixen, adjutant; Co. "A," Captain Paulsen; Co. "B," Captain Eck; Co. "C," Captain Johnson; Co. "D," Captain Bentzen.

To show the sense of security which the presence of this force inspired, the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of October 12 is quoted:

"Another twenty-four hours have passed without further calamity, and the arrival of troops from Omaha, Champaign, Bloomington, Springfield, and other places, all now under command of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, has placed the city out of danger from riot. The local patrol, reinforced by armed regulars and militia, is abundantly able to take care of the city and deal summarily with all dangerous characters."

The local columns of the Tribune of the same date contained this general comment on the situation:

"The real headquarters of the order-preserving force of the city is now at No. 560 Wabash Avenue, where General Phil. Sheridan has established his headquarters, in the house formerly occupied by the Phoenix Club. Here the head of the city has planted a pine table, and entertains his numerous friends. The force at the general's command, in addition to the city regular and special police, consists of seven companies of regulars and six of volunteers. The former are from Omaha and other western points, and are all camped on the site of the ball-park, on Michigan Avenue. To them, as the most trustworthy and vigilant force at hand, has been intrusted the care of the South Side burned district, reaching from Harrison Street to the main river. In this space is, at present, the wealth and treasure of the city yet in safes, and in most cases buried in the ruins. The number of thieves now known to be in the city, and the presumption that they will make the safes their objective point, render this disposition of the troops the most prudent one possible. The orders to the sentinels last night were of the strictest possible kind.

"The militia are from Bloomington, Springfield and Champaign, and number six companies in all. They arrived in the city yesterday (Wednesday) morning, under the orders of Adjutant-General Dilger. * * *

"General Sheridan seemed satisfied that the city was perfectly safe under the protection already at hand; but, in order to assure this, more troops will arrive shortly. Three additional companies were expected last night, and ten companies more will arrive to-day, making a force large enough to keep in order all the roughs in the United States.

"Another addition to the force of the city was, on yesterday, started by General Frank Sherman, under authority from Mayor Mason and General Sheridan. This will consist of a regiment of militia, to be recruited by trustworthy men, for twenty-days' service. The regiment will consist of ten companies, of sixty men and three officers each. The colonel has established his headquarters at the Wabash-avenue Methodist Church, corner of Harrison Street."

On the 12th of October, the city offices were removed to the corner of Hubbard Court and Wabash Avenue.

General Sheridan, on the 12th, reported to Mayor Mason, as follows:

"The preservation of peace and good order of the city having been intrusted to me by your Honor, I am happy to state that no case of outbreak or disorder has been reported. No authenticated attempt at incendiarism has reached me, and the people of the city are calm, quiet and well-disposed. The force at my disposal is ample to maintain order, should it be necessary, and protect the district devastated by fire. Still, I would suggest to citizens not to relax in their watchfulness until the smouldering fires of the burned buildings are entirely extinguished."

From the report of Adjutant General Dilger, dated October 15, addressed to Governor Palmer, facts concerning the arrival and disposition of the State troops in Chicago are learned, as follows:

"At 5 p. m. of the 10th, the orders to rendezvous at Chicago left the executive office at Springfield. At 8 p. m. of the 11th, three hundred and fifteen, and at 4 p. m. of the same day, a total of five hundred and sixteen men, with four pieces of artillery, reported to General Dilger, in Chicago, furnished with necessary arms and munitions. Additional men and arms were held in reserve at Springfield, ready to start at a moment's notice. General Dilger had, at 4:50 a. m. of the 11th, discovered portions of Major Alstrup's battalion on duty, and took occasion, in his report, to commend the promptness of this force in responding to the need of the hour.

"It was ascertained by General Dilger that the mayor had intrusted the care of the city to General Sheridan, who expected regular troops at an early moment. The call made upon Governor Palmer was not authorized by Mayor Mason, and the governor's order to Major Beardsley of the Rock Island artillery company had been countermanded by the mayor. The major, however, declined to recognize the authority of Mayor Mason to annul the orders of the governor, the commander-in-chief of the State militia, to which the major's command belonged, and therefore he proceeded at once to the scene of the fire.

"In compliance with Mayor Mason's directions, General Dilger reported to Lieutenant-General Sheridan, and the State troops, as fast, as they arrived, were stationed for duty under orders of the chief commander."

On the 12th, Major Beardsley's company was relieved from duty in Chicago, and on the following day, the Sterling City Guards, the Rock Falls Zouaves, the Springfield Volunteers, the Bloomington National Guards, and the Champaign Cadets were all relieved from duty, on special orders issued by command of Lieutenant-General Sheridan. The military force thus left on duty to preserve the peace of Chicago, consisted of the First Regiment Chicago Volunteers, and the companies of United States troops already enumerated. The services rendered proved efficient. Many groundless rumors of lawlessness found their way into print in other cities, but the falsity of them was known to residents here. However, to quiet the public, General Sheridan, under date of October 17, made report to Mayor Mason, in which he said:

"I respectfully report to your Honor the continued peace and quiet of the city. There has been no case of violence since the disaster of Sunday night and Monday morning. The reports in the public press of violence and disorder here are without the slightest foundation. There has not been a single case of arson, hanging or shooting—not even a case of riot or street-fight. I have seen no reason for the circulation of such reports."

On the 20th of October, the Governor addressed the following communication to Mayor Mason:

"STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, }
SPRINGFIELD, October 20, 1871. }

"HON. R. B. MASON, Mayor of Chicago: Sir,—The General Assembly has now, by ample appropriations, provided for the support of a police force in Chicago that will be adequate to the protection of persons and property in the city; and I trust no time will be lost in making all needful preparations for relieving the military now on duty, under the orders of Lieutenant-General Sheridan.

"It excited the greatest surprise, and has occasioned me the profoundest mortification, that you failed to inform me, as you could easily have done by telegraph, or through my confidential secretary, who reached Chicago on the 9th of October, of the necessity, in your judgment, for the employment of military force for the protection of the city; and it has pained me quite as deeply that you should have thought it proper, without consultation with me by telegraph or otherwise, to have practically abdicated your functions as mayor. Happily, there is no necessity, either real or imaginary, for the longer continuance of this anomalous state of things.

"The United States troops are now in Chicago in violation of law. Every act of the officers and soldiers of the United States army, that operates to restrain or control the people, is illegal, and their presence in the city—except for the purposes of the United States—ought to be no longer continued.

"It is due to you that I should confess that, under the trying circumstances that surrounded you on the occasion of the late disaster, it was natural that you should incline to accept aid from any quarter, to enable you to afford protection to persons and property in your city; but I regret that it did not occur to you that your own powers, under the laws, were adequate to meet the emergencies, and that you were entitled, upon notice to me, to the support of the whole power of the State.

"From information that I have not been afforded an opportunity to acquire officially, I have learned that Lieutenant-General

Sheridan has rendered valuable services, for which he deserves the thanks of the people of Illinois; but it would have been more satisfactory to them if he, as a citizen, had given to you the assistance of his eminent abilities, to organize the people to act, in conjunction with the civil officers; for their own protection. That course would have been far preferable to that of concentrating a part of the army of the United States in Chicago, and the assumption, by him, of the substantial military control of the city.

"I hope that you will at once inform Lieutenant-General Sheridan of your readiness to resume the complete government of the city.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN M. PALMER."

To this Mayor Mason replied as follows:

"MAYOR'S OFFICE, }

"CITY OF CHICAGO, October 21, 1871. }

"TO HIS EXCELLENCY JOHN M. PALMER, Governor of the State of Illinois."

"Your letter of the 18th [20th] has been received. Had your Excellency, when in Chicago on the 11th and 12th of this month, informed me, or Lieutenant-General Sheridan, of your disapprobation of the course that I had thought proper to pursue, in having, on the 10th inst., solicited his aid in preserving the peace and order of the city and protecting the lives and property of its inhabitants, satisfactory reasons would have been given your Excellency for so doing—many of which it would, even now, be unwise to make public.

"In the performance of my official duties, I believed that the emergency required me to take the step that I did. I do not believe, when the lives and property of the people—the peace and good order of a large city—are in danger, that it is the time to stop and consider any questions of policy, but if the United States, by the strong arm of its military, can give the instantly required protection of life, property and order, it is the duty of those in power to avail themselves of such assistance.

"Before the receipt of your communication, I had already, upon consultation with other city officers, decided to dispense with military aid in a day or two; and I am happy to inform your Excellency that, on Monday, the 23d instant, your Excellency will be relieved of all anxiety on account of the assistance of military in protecting the lives and property of this people.

"Very respectfully,

R. B. MASON, Mayor."

No important event took place in the city between the 17th and the 21st of October. On the latter date, a tragedy occurred which produced so profound a sensation that, for the time being, it diverted the general mind from the great calamity that had preceded it. This event, was the killing of Colonel Thomas W. Grosvenor, a well-known citizen, by Theodore N. Treat, a student in the Douglas University, and, at the time, a member of Captain Colson's University Cadets, assigned to patrol duty. Colonel Grosvenor had been spending the evening at the house of Justice Banyon, who, about eleven o'clock, accompanied him to a State-street car. At that hour, none but Twenty-ninth-street cars were running which would take Colonel Grosvenor near to his home at Bryant Place. From Twenty-fifth-street, he was walking along Cottage Grove Avenue, and had reached the University, which was about two blocks from his house. As Grosvenor passed the grounds of the University, the patrol commanded him to halt and give the countersign; he did not stop. The guard again called to him, and threatened to fire. Grosvenor returned, it is alleged, a careless answer, and moved on. The guard fired. The ball struck Grosvenor on the left arm, passed through the tenth rib and lodged in the liver. The victim staggered, and fell to the sidewalk, near the corner of Douglas Place. His first broken cry was "Oh, God! My wife! My wife!" He rose to his feet, ran a few steps, fell and rose again; finally dropping to the walk some distance from where the shot was received. Grosvenor was taken to a neighboring engine-house, and shortly afterward to his home, No. 18 Bryant Place, where he expired, at five o'clock Saturday morning, October 21. Theodore Newell Treat was a student in the University, whose home was at Janesville, Wis. He was twenty years of age. When Captain Colson's company was formed, Treat joined the ranks, and had been on duty several times prior to the night of the tragedy.

THOMAS W. GROSVENOR was a native of Utica, N. Y., born in 1834. In 1857, he was admitted to practice at the Bar in that State. At the breaking out of the war, he was practicing his profession at Elgin. He joined the 12th Illinois Cavalry, and was elected captain. He soon rose to the rank of major, and at the close of the war was breveted colonel for bravery. At Harper's Ferry, Colonel Grosvenor received a bullet wound in the right arm. After his return to Chicago, he was on the staff of the Evening Post, and subsequently held the office of cigar inspector. He then resumed his law practice, and was appointed prosecuting attorney by the Common Council. He was a member of Kilwinning Lodge, No. 311, A. F. & A. M., and was buried, on the 22d of October, with Masonic honors.

Treat was placed under arrest, subject to the action of the Grand Jury.

On the 22d, Mayor Mason communicated with General Sheridan, asking if, in his opinion, it was necessary to the maintenance of peace and order to continue the presence of a military force in the city. The mayor prefaced his inquiry by a marked expression of the city's appreciation of Sheridan's course. General Sheridan reported, on the following day, a "good condition of affairs in the city," and expressed a willingness to disband the volunteers and relieve himself of his responsibility. Mayor Mason responded, on the same day (October 23) reiterating his sense of gratitude to the General for services rendered, and designating the hour of 6 p. m. of that day as the time at which "the aid required of you (General Sheridan) shall cease." This order ended with these words:

"Allow me again to tender you the assurance of my high appreciation of the great and efficient service which you have rendered in the preservation of order and the protection of property in this city, and to again thank you, in the name of the City of Chicago and its citizens, therefor."

On the 24th, the ten companies of United States troops were transferred to different posts in the West and South, and the 1st Regiment Chicago Volunteers was mustered out.

Under date of October 25, Lieutenant-General Sheridan reported to the Adjutant-General of the Army, at Washington, the facts already detailed in these pages. The matter was submitted to Secretary of War Belknap, and to General William T. Sherman, in command of the army. On the 31st, General Sherman addressed a characteristically decisive opinion to Secretary Belknap, which was as follows:

"The extraordinary circumstances attending the great fire in Chicago made it eminently proper that General Sheridan should exercise the influence, authority and power he did, on the universal appeal of a ruined and distressed people, backed by their civil agents, who were powerless for good. The very moment that the civil authorities felt able to resume their functions, General Sheridan ceased to exercise authority, and the United States troops returned to their respective stations. General Sheridan's course is fully approved."

No sooner had the troops been withdrawn, than a feeling of uneasiness began to assert itself in various quarters, until it commanded the attention of leading citizens. On the 28th of October, the following letter was sent to General Sheridan:

"CHICAGO RELIEF AND AID SOCIETY,
"Standard Hall, Corner Michigan Avenue and Thirteenth Street."

"CHICAGO, October 28, 1871.
"LIEUTENANT-GENERAL P. H. SHERIDAN, Commanding Department of the Missouri:

"GENERAL,—The undersigned respectfully and urgently request that you will cause four companies of United States Infantry to be stationed at or near this city, until it shall appear that there is no danger of attack, by disorderly persons, upon the depots of the Relief and Aid Society, or other riotous proceedings, for which the recent appalling calamity may have paved the way. We believe that the presence of a small military force in this vicinity would, at the same time, deter any evil-disposed persons from organizing a breach of the peace and re-assure the public mind in an extraordinary degree.

"Thanking you for the great services you have already rendered to this stricken community,

"We are, General, your obedient servants,

"WIRI DEXTER, Chairman Executive Com. Relief and Aid Society,

"JOSEPH MEDILL, Editor Tribune,

"W. F. COOLBAUGH, President Union National Bank,

"H. K. EAMES, President Commercial National Bank,

"J. IRVING PEARCE, President Michigan National Bank,

"C. H. BECKWITH & SONS, No. 140 Michigan Avenue,

"J. W. PRESTON, President Chicago Board of Trade,

"CHARLES RANDOLPH, Secretary Chicago Board of Trade,

"E. HENGERLAND, Illinois River Elevator,

"HORACE WHITE, Chicago Tribune,

"CHARLES L. WILSON, Chicago Journal."

Urged to action by such men as those above named, one of whom, Hon. Joseph Medill, had been chosen to the mayoralty, to succeed Mr. Mason, by an overwhelming popular vote, and that too on direct issues growing out of the fire, General Sheridan did not hesitate to comply with the request. On the 29th, he addressed Adjutant-General Townsend, setting forth the matter, alluding to the withdrawal of the earlier force, and concluding thus:

"The result has been that the troops were no sooner gone than the turbulent spirit commenced to manifest itself, and seems to be increasing. I have, therefore, been solicited by Mr. Joseph Medill, the incoming mayor, and other prominent citizens, to again bring to the city, for the winter, four (4) companies of Infantry. I am satisfied of the necessity of their presence here, and ask the authority of the Secretary or War to bring them."

On the 31st General Sherman replied:

"TO GENERAL P. H. SHERIDAN, Chicago:

"Four companies of the 8th Infantry are ordered to Chicago, to act as police, under your letter of the 29th.

"W. T. SHERMAN, General."

The return of troops to Chicago was opposed by Governor Palmer. The following extract from the Chicago Journal, of November 2, furnishes a comprehensive view of both sides of this phase of the controversy:

"It is telegraphed from Springfield that Governor Palmer is 'decidedly opposed' to United States troops being stationed at or near Chicago, and 'will oppose any such interference of his rights as commander-in-chief of the military of Illinois.' We do not believe, when the Governor knows the circumstances, that he will do any such thing. The officers of the Relief Society, together with a large number of our most prominent citizens, signed an application to General Sheridan to station some of the troops in his command at or near Chicago, to be used in case of emergency. The large supplies the Relief Society will have in store during the winter were not deemed safe; besides, threatened strikes in some quarters indicated that laborers willing to work night not be allowed to do so. General Sheridan referred the appeal of our citizens, with his favorable judgment, to the Secretary of War, who immediately ordered four companies of the 8th United States Infantry from New York to Chicago, and they will arrive to-morrow morning, subject to the call of the authorities, should the necessity, unhappily, arise for their use. Only this, and nothing more.

"That the Government has the same right to establish a military post near Chicago that it has near St. Louis and New York, and other cities, the most sensitive head of the militia of a State can not question. That the authorities can call upon the Government to assist in preventing outbreak, or in putting one down, has been often demonstrated; and that the people of Chicago have a right to the security which the presence of these troops affords them, no one with a grain of sense will pretend to question."

Governor Palmer inclosed the foregoing slip in a letter addressed to President Grant, under date of November 3, wherein was recited the cause of the origin of the article. The letter concluded thus:

"In addition to this [newspaper statement], rumors, in the form of telegraphic despatches from Washington and Chicago, have reached me, that troops were ordered to Chicago for purposes connected with the safety of property and the preservation of order in the city, but no information of the existence of dangers alluded to that it is for the President to designate the stations of the troops composing the army, and that he is under no obligations, founded upon the Constitution or the laws, or upon the rules of official courtesy, to communicate his orders, or the reasons that influence him in making them, to the governor of any of the States, unless the orders in question, or the presence of the troops, are intended in some way to affect or influence the internal affairs of the particular State to which the troops are sent. In the latter case, it will readily occur to you that the governor of the State, whose duty it is to enforce the laws, is deeply concerned; for the troops, and the orders under which they are to act, may operate to diminish, or greatly increase, the difficulties of his official position. I am happy in the consciousness that the authorities of the State of Illinois are abundantly able to protect every interest of the people that depends upon its internal peace and good order, and am unwilling to believe that the President of the United States, acting upon information of a contrary character, communicated by private citizens to an officer of the army, has ordered any portion of the army into this State, to be subject to the call of the authorities, either to protect the store-houses of the Relief Committee, or to interfere with the possible, though not probable, 'strikes' of laborers. I, therefore, deem it due to the importance of the subject, to frankly inquire of your Excellency whether the troops ordered to Chicago are intended, or instructed, to obey the call of any authorities of the State of Illinois or the City of Chicago, or in any way whatever to assume the protection, either of property or the preservation of order, in that city?"

To this letter President Grant responded, November 9, that

"Notwithstanding here even contemplated distrust of the State authorities of the State of Illinois, or lack of ability on their part to do all that was necessary, or expected of them, for the maintenance of law and order within the limits of the State. The only thing thought of was, how to benefit a people stricken by a calamity greater than had ever befallen a community of the same number before in this country, the aid of a like nature with that given in any emergency requiring immediate action. No reflections were contemplated, or thought of, affecting the integrity or ability of any State officer or city official within the limits of the State of Illinois to perform his whole duty."

The State Legislature began a session November 15, 1871, and its first business was to listen to a special message from Governor Palmer. The message is quoted from as follows:

"It was not thought by Mayor Mason or Lieutenant-General Sheridan to be necessary or proper to consult with or even inform me of their purpose to transfer the duty of protecting the lives and property of the people of Chicago, or the substantial government of the city, to the military forces of the United States, although I was in telegraphic communication with the mayor, as will appear by several despatches that will be hereafter mentioned; nor did either of them, when we met on the twelfth day of October, and discussed the affairs of the city at some length, inform me that they had determined that the government of the State was no longer equal to its duties, or that the mayor had determined, as he has elsewhere said, to avail himself of the strong arm of the military power of the United States. Whether they supposed that to be a matter in which neither I nor the Legislature of the State, which was convened to meet on the next day to legislate for Chicago, had the least concern, or that the assent of the Legislature and governor might be safely presumed, I am not prepared to say; but they left me to make the discovery as others did, so that I received no information of the existence of the proclamation of the mayor, or of Lieutenant-General Sheridan's construction of his powers under it, until the 17th of October, and only heard of the regiment raised under the orders of Lieutenant-General Sheridan at a later day, and from an application, by a person who claimed to command one of the companies to be supplied with arms.

"It may easily be imagined that the information of these extraordinary acts of the mayor and Lieutenant-General Sheridan filled me with surprise, for I was conscious that I had put forth every effort, and employed all my official powers, to aid the people of Chicago and to preserve the peace and tranquility of the city. On Monday, the 9th day of October, at noon, when I understood the fire to be still raging (and anticipating the probable necessity of official action, that could best be done at the capitol), I had dispatched General E. B. Harlan, my secretary (in whose energy and prudence I have the highest confidence), to Chicago, with instructions to report to the mayor, and inform him that all the resources of the State that were subject to my legal control, were at his service for the aid and protection of the people."

Here follows a statement of General Harlan's arrival at Chicago, and copies of the despatches between the Governor, Mayor Mason and General Stager, already given in substance; also reciting that the Governor visited Chicago on the 12th of October, and conferred with those in authority, departing the same day for Springfield, to meet the Legislature. It was not until the 17th of October, Governor Palmer states, that he learned of the mayor's proclamation transferring the command to General Sheridan. On the 19th, the Governor addressed Mayor Mason the inquiry:

"What addition to your police force is necessary to enable you to dispense with the United States troops?"

In reply thereto, on the same date, the Mayor said: "I do not think any additional force will be necessary after the lapse of ten or fifteen days."

Then ensued the correspondence between the Governor and Mayor Mason, dated October 20 and 21, already given in full.

On the 22d of October, the Governor learned of Colonel Grosvenor's death, and hastened to Chicago to investigate the affair. On the 28th of that month he addressed a letter to Hon. Washington Bushnell, attorney-general, reciting the facts, and declaring that the action of Mayor Mason and Lieutenant-General Sheridan, together with their subordinates, was illegal, and that it was necessary to inquire into the motives or purposes which influenced them. This communication ended with these words:

"They [the mayor, lieutenant-general, et al.] assumed to suspend the operation of the Constitution and laws of the State, and substitute in their stead the law of military force, to be defined and applied by themselves. They, by their lawless acts, attacked and insulted the dignity and authority of the State, and have, by their dangerous example, weakened public confidence in the Constitution and the laws, and in their attempt to enforce usurped and lawless authority they have sacrificed the life of a peaceful citizen. Animated by the convictions I have thus expressed, and confident in the belief that the State of Illinois, acting through the proper departments of its government, is capable of protecting its own people, and of enforcing the dignity and authority of its own laws, I have to request that you, in conjunction with the State's attorney of the Seventh Judicial Circuit, will bring all the facts before the grand jury of Cook County, in order that all persons concerned in the unlawful killing of Thomas W. Grosvenor may be brought to speedy trial."

On the 30th of October, Governor Palmer addressed a letter to Charles H. Reed, State's attorney of the Seventh Judicial Circuit, on the same subject. That document is quoted from as follows:

"The matter has occasioned me a great amount of anxiety; and after the most mature reflection, I am forced to the conviction that the indictment against Treat, the person who inflicted the wounds upon him, should also include Philip H. Sheridan, Frank T. Sherman, and the persons who claimed to be officers of the reputed 'Company L,' First Regiment of Chicago Volunteers."

"It would be simply dishonorable to you, and to the State, to prosecute young Treat alone to conviction, when you, and every one besides that are supposed to know what the law is, are bound to confess that, if he is guilty of a legal offense, so are those who placed him in a position to do mischief; and neither you nor the State authorities can find a legal excuse for discharging Treat without trial. No course is open to us but to boldly and squarely stand up to the line of duty. I have written this to you because I can well understand that you may feel a degree of hesitation in advising the grand jury to find an indictment against such persons as R. B. Mason, P. H. Sheridan, Frank T. Sherman; and as this case concerns the State in its political capacity, as much as in other respects, I think it proper that the governor should take the responsibility of what is done. And while I have the utmost confidence in you, I do advise the indictment and trial of all concerned."

The governor, in his message in relation to the alleged illegality of the conduct of Mayor Mason and General Sheridan, says :

"It seems to me to be so clear that the conduct complained of is contrary to the Constitution and the laws, that it is impossible, by any process of reasoning, not to make it so. * * * Lieutenant-General Sheridan employed the troops of the United States in a manner not authorized by Federal laws. He raised troops* without the consent of Congress, and imposed upon them an unlawful oath. * * * The ground upon which this dangerous assumption of authority is defended is that of emergency or necessity."

The governor refused to admit that any emergency could arise that would justify the acts, but especially argues against this theory by reciting his own course, as heretofore described. He recognized the danger of bringing upon himself the hostility of many who regarded the ends as justifying the means, by thus openly expressing adverse views, and fortified his position by citations from the Constitution and judicial interpretations thereof. The message was a very powerful and incisive presentment of the governor's position, and naturally produced a profound impression throughout the State. The subject was referred to a select committee of seven members of the House.

The attitude of the President of the United States, as expressed in his letter of November 9, did not meet with the governor's approval. Pending action on the original message, by the legislative committee, Governor Palmer indited another communication to President Grant, in which he said :

"I have been unable to find anything in them [the President's letter and copies of official papers relating to the ordering of troops to Chicago] to justify the extraordinary measure of ordering four companies of United States troops into this State, to report to Lieutenant-General Sheridan, to act as police under his orders. It seems to me to be very well settled as a principle of American public law, that the duty of protecting persons and property, and the preservation of public order and peace against the efforts of disorderly persons, or from local internal disturbances, is the peculiar and exclusive duty of the States, with which the Government of the United States has no concern, and in which it can not interfere, except upon the application of the Legislature or the Executive of the States, as contemplated by the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution; and that any attempt by the officers of the United States army to employ any part of the military forces, as proposed by the gentlemen who made the application for four companies of infantry to be stationed at or near Chicago, for an indefinite period, and approved by Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan, in his letter to the adjutant-general of the 29th of October, and by General W. T. Sherman, by his telegraphic communication to Lieutenant-General Sheridan of October 31, 1871, must be improper, because violative of the Constitution and the laws. I am not at all forgetful that your Excellency says what was done in respect to offering the troops to Chicago was upon the ground of emergency, to aid a people who had suffered greatly; but, in this view, it seems to me that the general commanding the army overlooked the fact, that the disastrous fire at Chicago did not relieve the State of Illinois from any of its duties nor transfer any of them to the Government of the United States. Emergencies that demand extraordinary efforts often occur in the history of governments, but I do not remember another instance in our history, when it was held that an event that created a sudden demand upon the powers and resources of a State operated to transfer any portion of the duties of the States to the United States.

"The great fire at Chicago ceased on the 9th of October, and the executive of the State of Illinois, under the belief that the disaster created an 'emergency' provided for by the Constitution of the State, convened the General Assembly to meet in session on the thirteenth day of that month, to make legal provisions to meet all the requirements of the occasion; and on the nineteenth day of October, that department appropriated from the treasury an adequate sum to maintain a sufficient police force for the protection of every interest of the people. The emergency was thus provided for by the proper department of the proper government, in the only way that it could be done, or can be done. The State enlarged and strengthened its own agencies for the enforcement of its own laws, to meet the requirements of the new situation. The calamity deprived the

* There is the possibility however, that these alleged troops might have been merely additions to the "Police Force," of which General Sheridan had absolute control.

United States of its custom-house, its post-office, its court-room and records, and threw upon that Government the duty of adopting measures to supply the loss; but it has not yet occurred to the authorities of the State that the losses of the United States, or the interruption of its business, has so far changed the relations of the Federal and State systems, as to cast any portion of the duty of providing for any of the wants of the United States upon the State of Illinois; and they are as little able to understand how it is that events that can not operate to enlarge the powers of the government of the State, should operate to confer upon a lieutenant-general of the army the authority to interfere in matters of purely local State concern, or to authorize the general commanding the army to recognize and approve the application of the lieutenant-general, and order four companies of United States infantry to report to him to discharge the mere civil duties of 'police.'

"I do not, of course, propose to discuss with your Excellency the question of the relative rights and powers of the United States and of the States, under the Constitution, for I will not anticipate the possibility of a difference of opinion upon the point that the duties of the executive officers of the two systems are defined so accurately, and are kept so distinct, by written constitutions and laws that there is no possibility of a conflict between them. The duty of the President is to see that the laws of the United States are enforced, and that of the governor of Illinois is confined to the enforcement of the laws of the State. Neither obstructs the other, nor aids nor interferes with his duties. The governor of a State derives none of his powers from the United States, nor are his duties subject, in any respect, to the consent or discretion of the President, who can, in no wise, enlarge, abridge, or interrupt them, either by assuming them himself or entrusting them to others.

"As these opinions seem to me to be incontrovertible, I can not doubt that the orders to the United States troops to act as police, or to otherwise interfere in the affairs or duties of the State, or any of its officers, were made without reflection, and that the troops will be at once withdrawn from this State; or, that the orders for their government will be so modified as to prohibit their employment as police, or in any other way to interfere with any of the duties and functions of any of the officers under the laws of this State. The State of Illinois can not accept their aid, or permit their interference in its affairs, without a sacrifice of the confidence of its citizens, nor without giving countenance to a dangerous example."

President Grant replied, November 25, that he had referred the Governor's letter to the Secretary of War,

"with directions to inform General Sheridan that if the troops under his command have received any orders which, in any way, conflict with the provisions of the Constitution or the laws of the State of Illinois, he is instructed to rescind them."

Governor Palmer refused to accept this construction of the point at issue, and in his message to the General Assembly, December 9, said:

"I deny that the officers of the army have the right to determine the measure of the duties of any civil officer, under any circumstances whatever, or that their powers are increased by any emergency that can possibly happen in the affairs of any State. They are not, as they seem to suppose, the natural rulers of the people under circumstances of difficulty and danger, but they are, at all times, the inferiors of the humblest officer created to execute the laws of the land. * * *

"The general commanding the army seems also to have fallen into the dangerous error of supposing that his official military powers are paramount to the Constitution and the laws. He indorsed, upon the report made by Lieutenant-General Sheridan of his operations while enforcing military rule in Chicago, his approval of all the acts of his subordinates, and that, too, with an emphasis that, he seems to have supposed, will preclude all question of the propriety of his conduct; and on the 31st of October, when the same officer applied to him for leave to bring other troops to Chicago, he not only responded favorably to his wishes, but informed him that the troops were to act as police. It is due to the dignity of the people of the State, that I should say I can not consent that the grave and important subjects that I have urged upon the attention of the President, shall be decided by an officer of the army; but I must hereafter, as I have done in the past, protest against all interference by the officers of the army in the affairs of this State. I must protest against such interference, because it will establish a precedent dangerous to liberty—because it familiarizes the people with military rule, and inspires them with distrust of the capability of civil government to afford them needful protection, and it is now for the representatives of the free people of the State to discharge their duties according to their own convictions and subject to their own responsibilities."

This message was referred to a special committee for consideration. On the 6th of January, the committee submitted two reports—a majority opinion, signed by E. M. Haines, G. W. Rives, H. Watson Webb and Charles H. Rice, and a minority opinion, signed by John M. McMillan, Oscar F. Price and A. J. Galloway.

The substance of the majority report, with one material exception, was embodied in a series of resolutions which were submitted to the house. The question excepted from positive presentment was that of the killing of Colonel Grosvenor, and the conduct of the governor in advising the indictment of Mayor Mason, General Sheridan, and others, as well as young Treat. The resolutions recommended for adoption by the majority of the committee were as follows:

RESOLVED, First, That the late fire at Chicago created no emergency for which the Constitution and the laws and the agencies and resources of the State of Illinois were not equal, and that the act of the mayor of Chicago, in transferring the government of that city to Lieutenant-General Sheridan, an officer of the United States army, and the military forces at his command, was illegal, and a dangerous example.

Second, That Lieutenant-General Sheridan, in accepting from the mayor the alleged authority to control the municipal affairs of the people of Chicago by military forces, or the authority to introduce regular troops into the city, or to raise volunteers, or to call any portion of the militia of the State into service, acted illegally, and such action was dangerous in example.

Third, That the officers of the army of the United States, stationed in this State, have no power, right or authority to interfere with the internal affairs thereof, and that the act of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, in ordering regular troops into this State, or requesting four companies of infantry to be stationed in this State, for reasons assigned in his communication to the adjutant-general of the United States army of the 20th of October, 1871, has no justification or sanction, either in the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this State.

Fourth, That the order and direction given by the general of the army, at Washington, to four companies of infantry to act as police in this State, are illegal, and of dangerous example.

Fifth, That the President of the United States be requested to modify the orders to the troops now at Chicago, so as to prohibit them from interfering in the internal affairs of this State, or that he withdraw them from the State.

Sixth, That the action of the governor in protesting to the President against sending United States troops to Chicago, and against their presence in said city for the purpose of police duty, and his course in endeavoring to enforce civil authority in said city, for the protection of human life, is hereby cordially approved.

From a sworn deposition before the legislative committee, to whom was referred Governor Palmer's messages relating to the presence of military at Chicago, is taken the following summary of the views of Thomas B. Brown, president of the Board of Police, at Chicago, at the time of the fire:

"During the fire, and the two weeks succeeding it, there were remarkably few cases of crime against the person reported by the police, although for the first day or two there were many rumors circulated of individuals being hung to lamp-posts, or shot; yet, on full investigation, we became entirely satisfied that no cases of hanging or shooting had occurred. The rumored hanging or shooting was said to have been done upon incendiaries who were attempting to burn the remainder of the city. In our investigation, we were unable to find a single case of probable incendiarism during the whole time. Soon after the fire, perhaps as early as Tuesday of that week, an Italian saloon-keeper had stabbed three men, two of whom died; and about a fortnight after the fire, Colonel Thomas W. Grosvenor was shot and mortally wounded, in the street, at night, while going home to his family. These are the only cases of homicide that I remember as having occurred from October 8 up to the present time (December 11, 1871)."*

The attitude of the Board of Police toward Mayor Mason is shown in the following communication:

"The Board have never authorized or accepted the services of any soldiers in patrolling the streets of the unburned district of the city at any time since the fire commenced. One apparent exception to this was, that the general superintendent of police accepted the services, generously volunteered by two Scandinavian companies in the West Division, to perform guard duty at relief depots, churches, etc., which duties they performed well, under the direction of the police force. As to the service of any other soldiers not acting under the direction of the police authorities, they have never recognized their right to patrol the streets of the city, except in the case of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, whom, after your Honor had intrusted with the charge of keeping the order, and protecting the property, of the city, they felt impelled, by a sense of courtesy to so distinguished a soldier, to cooperate with him, in the burned district only. As your Honor was pleased to call for the aid of the military, and to give them the direction of affairs without the request of this Board, they leave the time of the military service to be decided by your Honor; suggesting, however, that, in the opinion of this Board, the presence, in the inhabited portion of the city, of military bodies under arms, and patrolling the streets, drinking in saloons, and disgusting citizens, is a measure fraught with evil consequences, and they think that all but regular troops should be relieved of further duty within the city, and that the troops of the regular army would exert just as good a moral influence if they patrolled only in the burned district, leaving to the police the duty of guarding the lives and property of the citizens elsewhere, assisted, as they are, by the responsible and judicious residents on each separate block, between whom and the police there is no controversy or ill-feeling."

* This is at variance with statements published, with circumstantial detail, at the time.

A minority of the committee to which the Governor's messages were referred, composed of John N. McMillan, Oscar F. Price and A. J. Galloway, submitted a report differing from that of the majority, in that it offered justification of the mayor's and general's conduct. They did not deem it their "duty either to approve or condemn the calling into service of the University Cadets or Champaign Cadets."

It was to be

"inferred that Mayor Mason supposed his course was fully in accordance with his Excellency's views."

It was a matter of record that the "military authorities held themselves in entire and complete subordination to the civil; and, co-operating with them in the maintenance of order, the preservation of peace, the protecting of property, and the enforcement of law during the pleasure of his Excellency, cheerfully and promptly withdrew their aid when informed that the same was no longer required."

As to the second act of the military officials, in complying with the request of citizens, and sending four companies of United States troops to Chicago, the minority held:

"While we concur in the general proposition that all violation of law should be condemned, and recognizing the fact that much that was done for the relief of the people of Chicago and the alleviation of their sufferings at the time referred to, was in violation of law, yet, justice, weighing the pure motives that prompted the commission of these unlawful acts, withholds her sentence of condemnation."

When the consideration of the adoption of the resolutions, censuring the mayor and military authorities, came up in the House, on January 24, Mr. King, of Cook County, offered to substitute that, in the judgment of the House, no cause of complaint, as specified, existed. Mr. Haines moved an amendment to the substitute, in which, while the subordination of the military to the civil authorities was a principle of vital concern, and should be insisted upon,

"yet, in view of the trying circumstances and the great calamity existing when this military power was exercised, we exonerate the Federal Government and Federal military authorities from intent to wilfully trespass upon the constitutional rights of this State, or to interfere with its properly constituted authorities during the emergency created by the recent fire." Also, "That the protest of the executive of this State against a violation of the Constitution was the performance of a duty imposed upon him by his office, and establishes a valuable precedent, which is hereby approved"

These resolutions were finally adopted by the House on January 25, 1872.

LEARNING RESOURCE CENTER
KANKAKEE COMMUNITY COLLEGE

