William A. Calhoun.....	19th	D	{2d Lieutenant..... 1st Lieutenant.....	October 20, 1861..... February 1, 1863.....	.....	.....
James E. Faulkner.....	19th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	February 7, 1863.....	Term expired July 9, 1864.....	{Enlisted June 17, 1861, as sergeant Co. A. Promoted.
Samuel S. Boone.....	19th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	July 30, 1861.....	Resigned Feb. 1, 1863.....	.....
David F. Bremer.....	19th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	July 30, 1861.....	Term expired July 9, 1864.....	.....
James W. Raffan.....	19th	E	{1st Lieutenant..... 2d Lieutenant.....	July 22, 1862..... July 22, 1862.....	Term expired July 9, 1864.....	{Enlisted as a private June 4, 1861, and mustered into service June 17, 1861.
Charles D. C. Williams.....	19th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	July 30, 1861.....	Transferred to marine artillery.....	.....
William Bishop.....	19th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	September 13, 1861.....	Resigned Oct. 31, 1861.....	.....
Charles H. Roland.....	19th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	January 1, 1862.....	Transferred to artillery.....	.....
Charles H. Shepley.....	19th	I	{2d Lieutenant..... 1st Lieutenant.....	July 30, 1861..... July 3, 1861.....	Transferred to artillery.....	.....
.....	.....	.....	1st Lieutenant.....	October 18, 1861.....	.....	Died March 23, 1862.

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Com-pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
C. Carroll Marsh.....	20th	.....	Colonel	May 14, 1861	Resigned April 23, 1863.
Lysander Tiffany.....	20th	.....	Quartermaster	September 1, 1862	Mustered out July 16, 1865
James A. Milligan.....	23d	.....	Colonel	June 15, 1861	June 15, 1861	Killed in action July 24, 1864.
James Quirk.....	23d	.....	Lieut.-Colonel	June 15, 1861	Mustered out (?)
Charles E. Moore.....	23d	.....	Major	June 15, 1861	Term expired in 1864.
James F. Cosgrove.....	23d	.....	Adjutant	June 15, 1861	Term expired June 18, 1864
Martin J. Russell.....	23d	.....	2d Lieutenant	November 1, 1861	Term expired Sept. 14, 1864
			Adjutant	June 18, 1864	Resigned Feb. 6, 1862,
Quin Morton.....	23d	.....	Quartermaster	September 10, 1861	with a view of promotion to lieutenant-colonel 23d Missouri Volunteer Infantry.....
William D. Winer.....	23d	.....	Surgeon	June 15, 1861	Resigned Dec. 4, 1862.
Rev. Thaddeus J. Butler.....	23d	.....	Chaplain	June 15, 1861	Resigned March 11, 1863.
Michael Gleason.....	23d	B	Captain	June 15, 1861	June 18, 1864
Daniel W. Quirk.....	23d	B	2d Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Resigned March 5, 1863.
Edward Murray.....	23d	B	1st Lieutenant	March 5, 1862	Term expired Oct. 10, 1864	Transferred from Co. B to Co. A (consolidated) as second lieutenant; promoted to first lieutenant, but commission declined and canceled.
James Finneane.....	23d*	A	1st Lieutenant	September 1, 1864	Resigned March 5, 1863.
James M. Doyle.....	23d*	A	2d Lieutenant	September 1, 1864	Mustered out of service July 24, 1865.
Francis McMurray.....	23d*	C	Captain	June 15, 1861	June 15, 1861	Deceased.
Robert Adams.....	23d	C	2d Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Term expired in 1864.
Patrick Higgins.....	23d	C	1st Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Dishonorably dismissed August 19, 1862.
John Gilman.....	23d	C	2d Lieutenant	August 5, 1861	Resigned May 31, 1862.
James Nugent.....	23d	C	1st Lieutenant	May 9, 1862
John Brown.....	23d	C	1st Lieutenant	May 9, 1862		Killed July 24, 1864.
Henry Pease.....	23d	E	2d Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Term expired Sept. 14, 1864
	23d*	A	Captain	May 10, 1862	Mustered out Oct. 31, 1864	Transferred, as captain of Co. D, to captain of Co. A, 23d Regiment (consolidated).
Thomas Brennan.....	23d	E	2d Lieutenant	May 24, 1862	Mustered out September 14, 1864.
Martin Wallace.....	23d	G	2d Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Resigned April 8, 1862.
John C. Phillips.....	23d*	C	Captain	June 15, 1861	Mustered out Feb. 27, 1865	Transferred, as captain of Co. D, to captain of Co. C, 23d Regiment (consolidated).
James Hume.....	23d	G	2d Lieutenant	April 8, 1862	Resigned April 13, 1862.
John A. Hines.....	23d	G	1st Lieutenant	February 14, 1863	Term expired in 1864.
Daniel Crowley.....	23d	H	2d Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Resigned Feb. 14, 1863.
Thomas Moore.....	23d	H	2d Lieutenant	August 10, 1861	Resigned
			1st Lieutenant	January 26, 1862
James Fitzgerald.....	23d	I	Captain	July 7, 1862	Resigned Sept. 2, 1862
	23d	I	2d Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Term expired September 19, 1864.
Patrick J. Ryan.....	23d*	D	1st Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Mustered out as captain March 1, 1864	Second and first lieutenant of Co. I, 23d Regiment; transferred March 1, 1862, to Co. D, and promoted (September 1, 1864.
Daniel Quirk.....	23d	K	Lieut.-Colonel	May 23, 1865	Term expired in 1864.
James H. Lae.....	23d	K	1st Lieutenant	June 15, 1861	Term expired in 1864.
Bartholomew Quirk.....	23d*	D	2d Lieutenant	December 1, 1861	Term expired Jan. 16, 1865
Edwin Coburn.....	23d*	E	1st Lieutenant	September 1, 1864	Mustered out July 24, 1865
Thomas McGirr.....	23d*	A	Quartermaster	April 6, 1864	Mustered out July 24, 1865
Owen O'Hern.....	23d*	A	1st Lieutenant	March 25, 1865	Mustered out July 24, 1865
Martin Morrison.....	23d*	A	2d Lieutenant	March 25, 1865	Mustered out July 24, 1865
James Burns.....	23d*	B	1st Lieutenant	September 6, 1864	Mustered out July 24, 1865
David Coston.....	23d*	B	2d Lieutenant	March 25, 1865	Mustered out July 24, 1865
Patrick Foley.....	23d*	C	1st Lieutenant	September 6, 1864	Mustered out July 24, 1865
John J. Healy.....	23d*	C	Captain	March 25, 1865	Honorably discharged March 76, 1865.
Thomas Cliff.....	23d*	C	2d Lieutenant	October 15, 1862	Resigned	Killed in action April 2, 1865.
John Dunn.....	23d*	D	1st Lieutenant	March 25, 1865	Mustered out July 24, 1865
Michael O'Connell.....	23d*	D	2d Lieutenant	March 25, 1865	Mustered out July 24, 1865
Stewart S. Allen.....	23d	E	2d Lieutenant	February 9, 1862	Discharged Jan. 30, 1865
Frederick Hecker.....	24th	C	Colonel	June 17, 1861	Resigned Dec. 23, 1861
Geza Mihalotzy.....	24th	C	Lieut.-Colonel	December 23, 1861	Resigned	Killed March 11, 1864.
John Van Horn.....	24th	H	Captain	June 15, 1861	Resigned March 31, 1864.
Julian Kuae.....	24th	C	Lieut.-Colonel	December 23, 1861	Resigned Oct. 31, 1861
Julius Staudan.....	24th	G	Major	June 17, 1861	Resigned
George A. Guenther.....	24th	G	Captain	July 8, 1861	Resigned July 3, 1862
Henry Paan.....	24th	A	Major	December 23, 1861	Resigned
Henry Wendt.....	24th	A	Adjutant	July 8, 1861	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
William Wagner.....	24th	.....	Surgeon	November 1, 1861	Resigned Dec. 16, 1863.
Sidney L. Fuller.....	24th	.....	Surgeon	June 16, 1861	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Carl Stock.....	24th	.....	2d Asst.-Surgeon	November 7, 1863	Resigned Nov. 7, 1863.
Theodore Wild.....	24th	.....	2d Asst.-Surgeon	November 7, 1863	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Erast F. C. Klokke.....	24th	E	2d Lieutenant	June 5, 1861	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864	Resigned as second lieutenant of Co. E, Oct. 31, 1861.
Paul H. Lippert.....	24th	A	1st Lieutenant	January 1, 1862	Received commission September 20, 1863, as second lieutenant of Co. B; assigned to Co. A.
Eugene W. Lippert.....	24th	B	2d Lieutenant	September 20, 1863	Mustered out as second lieutenant July 31, 1865.
Andreas Jacobl.....	24th	B	1st Lieutenant	September 30, 1864	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Anthony Stea.....	24th	C	Captain	September 30, 1864	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
H. F. W. Blanke.....	24th	C	1st Lieutenant	March 3, 1862	Promoted capt. 2d Regiment A. D.
Leopold Becker.....	24th	D	Captain	June 17, 1861	Resigned July 10, 1862
William Vocke.....	24th	D	2d Lieutenant	June 18, 1861	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Jacob Poul.....	24th	D	1st Lieutenant	July 10, 1862	Resigned May 14, 1863.
August Manf.....	24th	E	Captain	April 30, 1861	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
George Guenther.....	24th	E	1st Lieutenant	August 18, 1862	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Frank Schwelnfurth.....	24th	K	2d Lieutenant	September 3, 1862	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Augustus Kovats.....	24th	F	1st Lieutenant	June 5, 1861	Resigned June 17, 1862.
			Captain	January 1, 1862	Honorably discharged March 12, 1865.
			Captain	June 17, 1862	Resigned Jan. 18, 1863.

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES	No. of Regiment	Com pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Hugo Gerhardt.....	24th	F	2d Lieutenant.....	March 3, 1862.	Honorably disch'd March 12, 1865.
Edward Bornemann.....	24th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	July 3, 1862.
August Bitter.....	24th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	January 1, 1862.
Peter Hand.....	24th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	June 29, 1862.	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Arthur Erbe.....	24th	H	2d Lieutenant.....	November 16, 1862.	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Moritz Kaufmann.....	24th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	December 8, 1863.	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Franc Hammerick.....	24th	I	1st Lieutenant.....	November 10, 1862.	Term expired Aug. 6, 1864
Charles Langefeld.....	34th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	January 1, 1862.
Ferdinand H. Reishausen.....	34th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	July 8, 1861.	Dismissed Feb. 22, 1863.
Charles Fritz.....	34th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	July 17, 1863.	Resigned June 29, 1862.
John M. Loomis.....	26th		Colonel.....	August 9, 1861.	Hon. disch'd Mich. 12, 1865
Robert A. Gilmore.....	26th		Major.....	August 29, 1861.	Resigned April 30, 1864.
Charles A. Nazro.....	26th		Colonel.....	April 30, 1864.	Mustered out as Lieut.-colonel Oct. 27, 1864.
Julius White.....	37th		Quartermaster.....	August 29, 1861.	Resigned June 18, 1862.
Ransom Kennicott.....	37th		Major.....	July 16, 1861.	Promoted to brigadier-general June 9, 1862.
Henry N. Frisbie.....	37th		Colonel.....	October 19, 1863.	Honorably mustered out (as lieut.-colonel) April 19, 1866.
Anton Neiman.....	37th		Lieut.-Colonel.....	August 1, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 17, 1863.
Charles B. Chroniger.....	37th		Major.....	June 9, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 17, 1863.
John H. Peck.....	37th		Lieut.-Colonel.....	November 20, 1862.	Promoted to brigadier-general March 24, 1863.
Edwin F. Hummelson.....	37th		Adjutant.....	August 15, 1861.	Mustered out May 15, 1866.
John W. Lutz.....	37th		Quartermaster.....	August 5, 1861.	Resigned Jan. 4, 1864.
John W. Lutz.....	37th		Surgeon.....	August 15, 1861.	Mustered out Oct. 4, 1861.
Wells H. Blodgett.....	37th	D	Chaplain.....	September 18, 1861.	Resigned April 25, 1862.
George R. Bell.....	37th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	August 1, 1861.	Discharged Jan. 1, 1862.
Frederick Abbey.....	37th	I	1st Lieutenant.....	August 1, 1861.	Promoted by President
Isaac C. Dodge.....	37th	I	1st Lieutenant.....	June 9, 1861.	Resigned July 1, 1864.
Austin Light.....	39th		1st Lieutenant.....	August 1, 1861.	Resigned Feb. 28, 1863.
Thomas O. Osborn.....	39th		Colonel.....	February 28, 1863.	Term expired Sept. 22, 1864.
Orrin L. Mann.....	39th		Major.....	August 5, 1861.	Dismissed Nov. 25, 1861.
Frank B. Marshall.....	39th		Lieut.-Colonel.....	July 22, 1861.	Promoted brig.-general Volunteers May 11, 1865.
Joseph A. Cutler.....	39th		Colonel.....	December 1, 1861.	Mustered out as lieut.-col Dec. 6, 1865.
Samuel C. Blake.....	39th		Colonel.....	June 6, 1865.	General March 13, 1865.
Charles M. Clark.....	39th		Adjutant.....	August 5, 1861.	Resigned July 15, 1862.
Cyrus F. Knapp.....	39th	D	Quartermaster.....	August 5, 1861.	Resigned June 13, 1862.
William T. Moore.....	39th	F	1st Asst. Surgeon.....	June 3, 1861.	Resigned June 3, 1862.
Nathan E. Davis.....	39th	F	2d Lieutenant.....	September 4, 1862.	Mustered out Dec. 6, 1865.
Thomas Moore.....	39th	F	1st Lieutenant.....	January 13, 1863.	Term expired Dec. 30, 1864.
William B. Slaughter.....	39th	F	2d Lieutenant.....	April 29, 1865.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 6, 1865.
Charles J. Wilder.....	39th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	July 1, 1864.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 6, 1865.	Died of wounds Dec. 28, 1864
George Searing.....	39th	H	2d Lieutenant.....	October 4, 1865.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 6, 1865.
Emile Gunz.....	39th	K	2d Lieutenant.....	October 4, 1865.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 6, 1865.	Killed in battle, Oct. 13, 1864.
William A. Webb.....	43d		Colonel.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned Sept. 2, 1863.
George W. Roberts.....	43d		Major.....	July 22, 1861.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 31, 1863.
David Stuart.....	43d		Colonel.....	December 2, 1861.	Promoted to colonel 55th Regiment.	Killed at battle of Stone River, Dec. 31, 1863.
Edward H. Brown.....	43d	E	Lieut.-Colonel.....	July 22, 1861.	Promoted to colonel 55th Regiment.	Killed at New Hope Church, June 3, 1864.
Edward L. Swartout.....	43d		Major.....	September 2, 1863.	Killed.
Edwin Powell.....	43d		Adjutant.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 15, 1862.
E. O. F. Roler.....	43d		Quartermaster.....	July 28, 1861.	Resigned.
Alexander F. Stevenson.....	43d		Surgeon.....	July 28, 1861.	Promoted to Surgeon 55th Regiment.
Julius Letman.....	43d	B	1st Asst. Surgeon.....	July 28, 1861.	Resigned Nov. 5, 1863.
Charles C. Phillips.....	43d	F	1st Lieutenant.....	September 18, 1862.	Resigned Nov. 5, 1863.
Andrew H. Granger.....	43d	F	2d Lieutenant.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 13, 1862.
William D. Williams.....	43d	F	1st Lieutenant.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 13, 1862.
George C. Smith.....	43d	F	2d Lieutenant.....	October 11, 1862.	Resigned Sept. 9, 1863.
W. H. Blommer.....	43d	G	1st Lieutenant.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 27, 1862.
Joseph N. Getman.....	43d	G	1st Lieutenant.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned Oct. 27, 1862.
Alfred O. Johnson.....	43d	G	2d Lieutenant.....	July 22, 1861.	Resigned April 8, 1862.
John Wagner.....	43d	G	1st Lieutenant.....	April 8, 1862.	Resigned April 8, 1862.
Louis Mauss.....	43d		2d Lieutenant.....	December 16, 1865.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 18, 1865.
Keimer C. Feldcamp.....	43d	D	1st Lieutenant.....	September 1, 1861.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 18, 1865.
Henry John.....	43d	D	1st Lieutenant.....	September 1, 1861.	Mustered out as sergeant Dec. 18, 1865.
Frederic Pletcher.....	43d	D	2d Lieutenant.....	May 1, 1862.	Resigned Oct. 7, 1864.
August Mengel.....	43d	D	1st Lieutenant.....	September 1, 1861.	Resigned April 30, 1862.
William Kleinf.....	43d	B	1st Lieutenant.....	March 8, 1864.	Transferred to Co. B. as consolidated. Resigned April 7, 1865.
Charles Knobelsdorf.....	44th		2d Lieutenant.....	November 14, 1864.	Transferred to Co. B. as consolidated. Mustered out Nov. 30, 1865.
Lothar Lippert.....	44th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	November 14, 1864.	Mustered out Nov. 30, '65
John A. Commereil.....	44th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	April 29, 1865.	Dismissed Aug. 15, 1862.
Joseph Kuhl.....	44th	E	2d Lieutenant.....	April 29, 1865.	Disability removed Dec. 31, '63; never reinstated.
Frederick Abrahams.....	44th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	August 14, 1861.	Resigned for promotion Feb. 8, 1865.
George B. Cooley.....	44th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	August 14, 1861.	Resigned Dec. 27, 1861.
			2d Lieutenant.....	February 29, 1863.	Resigned Feb. 10, 1865.
			1st Lieutenant.....	February 9, 1862.	Resigned April 9, 1865.
			2d Lieutenant.....	June 7, 1862.	Resigned April 9, 1865.
			1st Lieutenant.....	December 18, 1862.	Resigned June 20, 1864.

* 43d Infantry (consolidated).

MILITARY HISTORY.

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Com-pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
William Schnoeckel.....	44th	K	2d Lieutenant.....	January 16, 1862.	Resigned April 1, 1863.
Frank W. Reilly.....	45th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	August 20, 1862.	Resigned April 1, 1863.
George W. Woodward.....	45th	K	1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	March 21, 1862.	Promoted Surg. 26th Regt.
Frederick A. Starring.....	46th	K	Chaplain.....	January 1, 1862.	Resigned Jan. 25, 1863.
Robert W. Cunningham.....	51st	K	Major.....	September 12, 1861.	Resigned.....
Luther P. Bradley.....	51st	K	Colonel.....	September 30, 1861.	September 30, 1862.	(Promoted brigadier-general, July 30, 1864.)
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	September 30, 1862.
			Colonel.....	December 24, 1861.
James S. Boyd.....	51st	D	1st Lieutenant.....	July 8, 1862.
		B	Captain.....	September 30, 1862.
		E	Major.....	July 31, 1865.
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	September 24, 1865.
Samuel B. Raymond.....	51st		Colonel.....	September 30, 1861.	Mustered out as lieutenant-colonel, Sept. 25, 1865.
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	September 30, 1862.
			Adjutant.....	October 15, 1861.	Resigned October 6, 1863.
Charles W. Davis.....	51st		Major.....	September 30, 1862.
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	September 30, 1862.
			Colonel.....	October 6, 1863.	Honorably discharged as lieutenant-col., June 30, 1865.
Rufus Rose.....	51st	K	Captain.....	May 11, 1865.
		E	Major.....	October 6, 1863.	Resigned March 34, 1864.
John G. McWilliams.....	51st	A	Major.....	December 24, 1861.	March 6, 1865.
James E. Montandon.....	51st	A	1st Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.
		A	Captain.....	April 1, 1862.
		B	Major.....	July 31, 1865.
Henry W. Hall.....	51st	B	1st Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.
		B	Captain.....	June 28, 1862.
			Adjutant.....	September 30, 1862.
Henry Howland.....	51st		Quartermaster.....	September 20, 1861.	Promoted to brigade quartermaster, June 9, 1862.	Killed at Kenesaw, June 27, 1864.
			2d Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.
Albert C. Coe.....	51st	K	Quartermaster.....	June 9, 1862.
		K	Captain.....	June 14, 1864.	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant, Co. H, September 25, 1865.
William C. Hunt.....	51st		Surgeon.....	October 21, 1861.	Resigned April 14, 1862.
John S. Fashley.....	51st		1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	October 28, 1861.	Resigned Nov. 16, 1862.
Henry F. Wescott.....	51st	A	Captain.....	December 24, 1861.	(Dismissed court-martial) April 16, 1863.
Jesse Johnson.....	51st	A	2d Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1862.
			1st Lieutenant.....	March 28, 1865.
			Captain.....	September 20, 1865.	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant, September 25, 1865.
Edward G. Blathemick.....	51st	K	2d Lieutenant.....	June 9, 1862.
		A	1st Lieutenant.....	April 16, 1863.	Term expired Jan. 12, 1865
Antonio De Anguera.....	51st	A	Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.	Resigned June 13, 1862.
John S. Keith.....	51st	A	2d Lieutenant.....	June 13, 1862.		Killed December 31, 1862.
Isaac K. Gardner.....	51st	B	Captain.....	December 24, 1861.
		B	2d Lieutenant.....	January 1, 1862.
George I. Waterman.....	51st	F	1st Lieutenant.....	June 28, 1862.	Honorably discharged May 15, 1865.
		F	Captain.....	August 6, 1864.	Honorably discharged October 28, 1862.
George H. Wentz.....	51st	G	Captain.....	December 24, 1861.
Charles C. Merrick.....	51st	G	2d Lieutenant.....	June 28, 1862.
			Captain.....	September 11, 1862.	Resigned Sept. 12, 1863.
Ezra L. Brulnair.....	51st	D	Captain.....	March 1, 1862.	Mustered out July 8, 1862.
Theodore F. Brown.....	51st	D	1st Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.	Honorably discharged May 15, 1865.
			Captain.....	July 8, 1862.
Thomas T. Lester.....	51st	E	1st Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.
		K	Captain.....	October 6, 1863.
George L. Bellows.....	51st	F	Captain.....	July 15, 1862.		(Killed at Resaca, as 1st lieutenant of Co. E., May 14, 1864.
William B. Oliphant.....	51st	E	1st Lieutenant.....	March 24, 1864.	Honorably discharged as 1st sergeant, May 30, 1865	Killed at Mission Ridge, November 25, 1863.
Merritt A. Atwater.....	51st	G	1st Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.	Mustered out September 25, 1865.
Otis Moody.....	51st	K	1st Lieutenant.....	December 24, 1861.		Killed at Chickamauga, Sept. 19, 1863.
Charles H. Hills.....	51st	K	1st Lieutenant.....	September 19, 1863.	Honorably discharged February 9, 1865.
Henry A. Buck.....	51st	K	2d Lieutenant.....	April 16, 1863.
Charles H. Hill.....	52d		Adjutant.....	June 28, 1862.	Mustered out July 6, 1865.	(Killed at Chickamauga, Sept. 19, 1863.)
George W. Rhor.....	52d		2d Asst.-Surgeon.....	July 15, 1862.
			Surgeon.....	April 23, 1864.	Mustered out July 6, 1865.
James Compton.....	52d	C	2d Lieutenant.....	November 19, 1864.
			Captain.....	April 7, 1862.	Term expired Dec. 13, 1864
John Boylan.....	53d	C	2d Lieutenant.....	January 23, 1863.
Charles R. May.....	53d	C	Captain.....	November 19, 1864.	Mustered out July 6, 1865.
David Stuart.....	55th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1862.	Resigned.....
Oscar Malmberg.....	55th	C	Colonel.....	October 31, 1861.	Promoted brig.-general.
William D. Sanger.....	55th	C	Colonel.....	October 31, 1861.	Term expired September 30, 1864.
			Major.....	December 19, 1862.
James J. Hefferman.....	55th	H	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	October 31, 1861.		Commission as lieutenant-colonel declined
			Captain.....	December 19, 1862.
			Major.....	July 3, 1864.
George L. Thurston.....	55th	B	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	October 31, 1861.	Mustered out November 19, 1864.	Commission as lieutenant-colonel declined
			Adjutant.....	October 31, 1861.
Henry W. Jones.....	55th	B	Captain.....	March 1, 1862.	Resigned Sept. 3, 1862.
			Quartermaster.....	October 31, 1861.	(Promoted by the President.)
Silas D. Baldwin.....	57th		Colonel.....	December 26, 1861.	(Cashiered March 12, 1863. Re-appointed May 31, 1863, but not reinstated.)
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	December 26, 1861.
Frederick J. Hurlbut.....	57th		Colonel.....	March 12, 1863.		Drowned, May 8, 1865.
Norman E. Hahn.....	57th		Adjutant.....	October 1, 1861.	Resigned Sept. 29, 1862.
Gustav A. Busse.....	57th		Quartermaster.....	October 1, 1861.	Resigned Sept. 26, 1862.
William S. Swan.....	57th	C	Captain.....	December 30, 1861.	Mustered out Dec. 29, 1864
Robert B. Morse.....	57th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	December 30, 1861.	Resigned June 7, 1862.
Moses S. Lord.....	57th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	June 7, 1862.	Resigned Sept. 26, 1862.
Frederick Laycock.....	57th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	December 30, 1861.
Robert D. Adams.....	57th	E	Captain.....	December 26, 1861.		Killed in battle of Shiloh.
Bradley D. Salter.....	57th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	December 26, 1861.
			Captain.....	April 7, 1862.	Resigned Feb. 28, 1863.
David Kenyon.....	57th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	April 7, 1862.
Edward Martin.....	57th	E	Captain.....	March 13, 1863.	Resigned Oct. 29, 1864.
Henry S. Blood.....	57th	E	2d Lieutenant.....	April 7, 1862.
			1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	March 13, 1863.	Term expired Dec. 25, 1864
Thomas Laycock.....	57th	E	2d Lieutenant.....	December 26, 1861.		Died.
Gustav A. Busse.....	57th	G	Colonel.....	July 8, 1865.
Fritz Busse.....	57th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	December 26, 1861.	Mustered out as sergeant, July 7, 1865.
Benjamin H. Chadburn.....	57th	I	Captain.....	June 23, 1864.	Resigned June 18, 1864.
Theodore M. Doggett.....	57th	I	1st Lieutenant.....	December 26, 1861.	(Honorably discharged) December 14, 1864.
			Captain.....	December 26, 1861.	Resigned Sept. 1, 1862.
Robert W. Healy.....	58th	A	Colonel.....	December 24, 1861.		Killed at battle of Shiloh.
			Major.....	August 20, 1864.
			1st Lieutenant.....	August 20, 1864.
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	March 27, 1865.	Mustered out April 1, 1866. Brevet brigadier-general, Feb. 13, 1866.

*Consolidated.

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Company.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Washington B. Pultis	58th*	B	Captain	November 5, 1864	Mustered out April 1, 1866
John O. Kace	58th*	D	1st Lieutenant	January 8, 1866	Mustered out April 1, 1866
Louis G. Stevenson	58th*	D	Captain	February 6, 1865	Mustered out Sept. 24, '65
James C. Dolan	58th*	G	2d Lieutenant	March 30, 1865	Mustered out April 1, 1866
Henry N. Snyder	59th	K	1st Lieutenant	February 27, 1865	Mustered out Sept. 30, 1864	(Commissioned by governor of Missouri. Regiment formerly known as the 9th Missouri.)
Allen C. Haskins	61st	I	Adjutant	February 25, 1864	Term expired Sept. 30, 1864
James Lawrence	61st	I	2d Lieutenant	March 7, 1862	Resigned Feb. 25, 1864
Frederick Matter	61st	I	1st Lieutenant	March 28, 1862	Resigned July 8, 1862
William S. Stewart	65th*	...	Lieut.-Colonel	May 5, 1864	Mustered out July 13, 1865
Rosell M. Hough	67th†	...	Colonel	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Oct. 6, 1862
Brock McViekar	67th†	...	Surgeon	June 4, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
John F. Scanlan	67th†	...	Captain	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Peter Caldwell	67th†	B	1st Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
David P. Maloney	67th†	B	2d Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Joseph S. Berry	67th†	C	2d Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Judson W. Reed	67th†	D	Captain	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Frederick W. Cole	67th†	D	1st Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
William Sharp	67th†	D	2d Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Chas. A. Heilig	67th†	E	Captain	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
James A. Sexton	67th†	E	1st Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Charles H. Vogel	67th†	E	2d Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Ruel G. Rounds	67th†	I	Captain	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Kelsey Bond	67th†	I	Captain	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
John Murphy	67th†	I	2d Lieutenant	June 13, 1862	Mustered out Sept. 1862
Lansing L. Tucker	69th†	...	Captain	June 14, 1862		Died August, 1862.
James O. McClellan	69th†	...	Captain	June 1, 1862
John S. Mable	69th†	C	2d Lieutenant	August 18, 1862	Mustered out
Charles Case	69th†	C	1st Lieutenant	August 8, 1862	Mustered out
Fidel Schindl	69th†	E	Captain	August 18, 1862	Mustered out
Charles Yarges	69th†	E	1st Lieutenant	June 14, 1862	Mustered out
August W. Willige	69th†	E	2d Lieutenant	June 14, 1862	Mustered out
Aaron S. Hadley	71st	...	Captain	July 22, 1862	Mustered out
Frederick A. Starring	72d	...	Colonel	August 21, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 21, '65	(Died at Chicago July 6, 1863, of wounds received at Vicksburg.)
Joseph C. Wright	72d	A	Lieut.-Colonel	August 21, 1862
Joseph Stockton	72d	...	Major	August 21, 1862		(Brevet brigadier-general, March 13, 1865.)
Henry W. Chester	72d	...	Lieut.-Colonel	July 7, 1863	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Wm. James, Jr.	72d	C	Captain	August 21, 1862	Resigned Feb. 14, 1863
Ebenezer Bacon	72d	...	Major	July 7, 1863	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Benjamin W. Underwood	72d	D	1st Lieutenant	August 21, 1862		Died January 16, 1863.
Benjamin W. Thomas	72d	...	Adjutant	January 16, 1863	Resigned Aug. 1, 1864
Albert G. Gibbs	72d	...	Quartermaster	July 31, 1863	Resigned Feb. 16, 1863
Edwin Powell	72d	...	Quartermaster	February 16, 1863	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Benjamin Durham, Jr.	72d	...	1st Asst. Surgeon	August 22, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 22, 1865
Henry Barnes	72d	...	Chaplain	August 22, 1862	Promoted asst. surg. vols. Resigned June 20, 1863
William B. Gallagher	72d	A	1st Lieutenant	August 22, 1862	Resigned as 2d lieutenant June 8, 1863
Merritt P. Batchelor	72d	A	Captain	January 19, 1863
Roswell H. Mason	72d	A	1st Lieutenant	June 8, 1863	Resigned Oct. 26, 1864
William Mohrmann	72d	A	Captain	October 26, 1864	Resigned June 1, 1865
George B. Randall	72d	A	1st Lieutenant	June 8, 1863	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant Aug. 1865
Henry A. Ward	72d	A	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Resigned Jan. 13, 1863
Oliver Rice	72d	A	2d Lieutenant	May 19, 1865	Mustered out as 2d lieutenant Aug. 7, 1865
Jacob S. Curtis	72d	B	2d Lieutenant	June 12, 1865	Mustered out as sergeant Aug. 7, 1865
David W. Perkins	72d	B	1st Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Mustered out June 7, 1865
Daniel W. Whittle	72d	B	Captain	August 21, 1862	Resigned Jan. 28, 1863
Glen C. Ledyard	72d	C	1st Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Clifford Stickney	72d	C	Captain	July 7, 1863
James A. Sexton	72d	D	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Resigned Sept. 8, 1864
William G. Mead	72d	D	Captain	April 4, 1864	Resigned Aug. 31, 1864
Louis P. Tweefort	72d	D	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
William B. Holbrook	72d	E	Captain	September 27, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Henry C. Mowry	72d	E	1st Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Porter A. Ransom	72d	E	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Mustered out June 17, 1865
Joseph Strube	72d	E	1st Lieutenant	May 22, 1863	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Isalah H. Williams	72d	F	2d Lieutenant	July 13, 1865	Mustered out of regiment at Vicksburg, Aug. 7, 1865.
George W. Colby	72d	F	Captain	August 21, 1862	Resigned July 13, 1864
Herrick G. Tarnald	72d	F	2d Lieutenant	February 15, 1864	Mustered out as 2d lieutenant Aug. 7, 1865
Henry D. French	72d	F	Captain	May 7, 1864	Mustered out as 2d lieutenant Aug. 7, 1865
Richard Pomeroy	72d	F	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862		Died May 4, 1863.
Edwin C. Pringle	72d	H	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862		Killed May 7, 1864.
Charles E. Thompson	72d	H	1st Lieutenant	June 8, 1863		Died of wounds Dec. 16, 1864.
John W. Murray	72d	II	1st Lieutenant	August 23, 1863
Adolph Burkhardt	72d	H	1st Lieutenant	December 18, 1864	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
James M. Smith	72d	A	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Resigned Aug. 23, 1863
John Field	72d	K	1st Lieutenant	October 26, 1864	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865
Charles Glendon	72d	K	Captain	May 19, 1865	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant Aug. 7, 1865
Gardner Allison	72d	K	Captain	August 21, 1862	Resigned Feb. 15, 1864
LaPayette Faranore	72d	K	2d Lieutenant	August 21, 1862	Resigned Sept. 15, 1863
Edwin Small	72d	K	1st Lieutenant	January 4, 1863
Anton Nieman	72d	K	2d Lieutenant	September 15, 1863	Resigned July 14, 1864
Charles N. Hillwood	74th	...	Adjutant	July 14, 1864	Mustered out Aug. 7, 1865	(Died at Columbus, Ky., January 4, 1863.)
			Surgeon	August 21, 1862	Honorably discharged Jan. 7, 1865
				September 28, 1862	Mustered out June 10, '65

* Consolidated.

† Three Months Infantry.

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Com-pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Albert L. Coates	74th	....	1st Asst.-Surgeon	November 29, 1864	Mustered out June 10, 1865
Edward S. Salomon	82d	....	Lieutenant-Colonel Colonel	September 26, 1862 March 21, 1864	Mustered out as lieutenant-colonel, June 9, 1865 Brevet brigadier-general, March 13, 1865
Ferdinand Rolshausen	82d	....	Major	September 26, 1862	Mustered out as major, June 9, 1865
Emil Frey	83d	II	Lieutenant-Colonel Captain	April 11, 1865 September 26, 1862	Mustered out as captain, June 9, 1865
Otto Balck	83d	C	Major 2d Lieutenant Adjutant	June 8, 1865 January 11, 1863 May 28, 1863 August 3, 1863	Mustered out June 9, 1865
George Schloetzer	83d	....	Surgeon	September 26, 1862	Honorably discharged January 12, 1864
Oscar Julius Bergh	82d	....	2d Asst.-Surgeon	October 11, 1862	Honorably discharged January 16, 1863
Anton Brulon	82d	A	1st Asst.-Surgeon	January 12, 1864	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Edward Kafka	82d	A	Captain	September 26, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Charles E. Stueven	82d	A	1st Lieutenant	September 26, 1862	Resigned Feb. 13, 1863
Peter Lauer	82d	A	1st Lieutenant	February 14, 1863	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant, June 9, 1865
Engene Hepp	82d	A	2d Lieutenant 1st Lieutenant	June 8, 1865 April 11, 1865	Assigned to and mustered out as 1st lieutenant, Co. B, June 9, 1865
Henry Sass	82d	A	2d Lieutenant	February 14, 1863	Mustered out as sergeant-major, June 9, 1865
Augustus Bruning	82d	B	Captain	June 8, 1865	Resigned March 12, 1863
George Heinzmann	82d	B	Captain	August 15, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Joseph Riegert	82d	B	1st Lieutenant	March 12, 1863	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant, Co. H, June 9, 1865
Earl Lotz	82d	G	2d Lieutenant 1st Lieutenant	June 8, 1865 September 3, 1863	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Hugo Schroeder	82d	H	2d Lieutenant	September 3, 1863	Honorably discharged May 15, 1865
Ivan Alexander Weid	82d	I	Captain	April 22, 1863	Resigned Jan. 11, 1863
Jacob Lasalle	82d	C	Captain	March 12, 1863	Resigned May 25, 1863
Mayer A. Frank	82d	C	1st Lieutenant	August 16, 1862	Resigned Feb. 29, 1864
Frank Kirchner	82d	D	Captain	May 28, 1863
Charles L. Mueller	82d	C	2d Lieutenant	August 28, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Matthew Marx	82d	D	Captain	May 20, 1863	Mustered out as sergeant, June 9, 1865
Harthold Krunkenberg	82d	D	2d Lieutenant	August 28, 1862	Honorably discharged October 7, 1863
Joho Hilborg	82d	I	1st Lieutenant	May 20, 1862	Discharged Nov. 10, 1864
Frederick Bechstein	82d	I	Captain	August 30, 1862	Resigned May 20, 1863
Christlan Erichson	82d	I	2d Lieutenant	January 11, 1863	Killed in battle, July 20, 1864
Peter Hanson	82d	I	1st Lieutenant	December 10, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Joseph B. Greenhut	82d	K	Captain	May 28, 1863	Resigned Dec. 10, 1862
Dominicus Klutsch	82d	K	Captain	August 30, 1862	Resigned Feb. 24, 1864
George Beaur	82d	K	2d Lieutenant 1st Lieutenant	October 23, 1862 May 17, 1863 April 11, 1865	Resigned March 29, 1864 Mustered out June 9, 1865
Francis T. Sherman	12th Cav.	....	Major	March 8, 1862	Mustered out of cavalry for promotion (colonel, 85th Regiment, Infantry), November 17, 1862
Alexander S. Chadbourne	88th	....	Colonel	August 27, 1862	Mustered out of service June 9, 1865; brevet brigadier-general Mar. 13, 1865
George W. Chandler	88th	....	Lieutenant-Colonel Major Lieutenant-Colonel	August 27, 1862 September 4, 1862 October 14, 1863	Resigned Oct. 14, 1863
George W. Smith	88th	B	Captain Major Lieutenant-Colonel	September 4, 1862 October 14, 1863 June 22, 1864	Mustered out as lieutenant-colonel, June 9, 1865 Brevet colonel of volunteers and brevet brigadier-general, Mar. 13, 1865
Levi P. Holden	88th	E	Captain	September 4, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Joshua S. Ballou	88th	D	Major	June 22, 1864	Resigned October 6, 1863
Nathanlet S. Bouton	88th	....	Quartermaster	August 27, 1862	Died April 9, 1863.
George Coatsworth	88th	....	Surgeon	September 4, 1862	Died January 16, 1863.
John A. Bross	88th	A	Captain	September 4, 1862	Resigned as lieutenant-colonel 28th Regiment U. S. C., April 6, 1864
John P. D. Gibson	88th	A	1st Lieutenant Captain	September 4, 1862 April 6, 1864	Died as first lieutenant, April 17, 1864.
Edwin L. Barber	88th	A	1st Lieutenant	May 5, 1864	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Lewis B. Cole	88th	A	2d Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Resigned as 2d lieutenant, May 4, 1864
George Chandler	88th	B	1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Resigned October 13, 1863
Gilbert F. Bigelow	88th	B	2d Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Resigned Feb. 12, 1863
Weuster A. Whiting	88th	C	Captain	September 4, 1862	Resigned Sept. 12, 1863
Henry H. Cushing	88th	C	1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Charles H. Lane	88th	C	Captain	September 12, 1863
George A. Sheridan	88th	D	1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Killed in battle, Nov. 25, 1863.
Thomas F. W. Gotten	88th	D	Captain	September 4, 1862	Killed in battle, Dec. 31, 1862.
Alexander C. McMurtry	88th	D	2d Lieutenant	September 4, 1862
Henry C. Griffen	88th	D	1st Lieutenant	January 1863	Mustered out June 9, 1865
James Rhimes	88th	E	2d Lieutenant	September 13, 1864	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Sylvester Titsworth	88th	E	1st Lieutenant	January 1, 1863	Resigned as 1st lieutenant, October 22, 1864
Isaac Reeves	88th	E	1st Lieutenant	March 23, 1864	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Lorenzo Brown	88th	F	2d Lieutenant	June 22, 1864	Resigned Jan. 22, 1863
John W. Chickering	88th	F	Captain	September 4, 1862	Mustered out Nov. 17, 1863
William Lawrence	88th	F	1st Lieutenant	February 1, 1863	Mustered out for promotion, August 26, 1864
Gurdon S. Hubbard	88th	G	Captain	September 4, 1862	Resigned Dec. 29, 1863
Dean R. Chester	88th	G	2d Lieutenant	September 4, 1862
Frederick C. Goodwin	88th	G	1st Lieutenant	February 21, 1863	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Isaac Fraizer	88th	G	2d Lieutenant	December 29, 1863	Resigned Feb. 21, 1863
			1st Lieutenant	March 1, 1863	Mustered out June 9, 1865
			2d Lieutenant	December 29, 1863

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Company.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
William A. Hutehinson	88th	G	2d Lieutenant	June 8, 1865	Mustered out as sergeant June 30, 1865
Alexander C. McClurg	88th	H	Captain	September 4, 1862	Mustered out
Charles T. Boal	88th	H	1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Mustered Jan. 3, 1863
Daniel B. Rice	88th	H	3d Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Resigned Dec. 1, 1862	Killed in battle Nov. 25, 1863.
Henry W. Bigsbaum	88th	H	1st Lieutenant	December 1, 1862	Dismissed Sept. 25, 1864
Joel J. Spaulding	88th	I	2d Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Resigned Nov. 28, 1863
Orest C. Miller	88th	I	1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Mustered out June 9, 1865
Daniel E. Barnard	88th	K	Captain	September 4, 1862	Resigned Sept. 1, 1863
Homer C. McDonald	88th	K	1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862	Mustered out June 10, '65
Charles T. Hotchkiss	89th		Lieut.-Colonel	August 25, 1862	Bvt. brigadier-general March 13, 1865
			Colonel	January 7, 1863
Duncan J. Hall	89th	A	Captain	August 25, 1862
			Lieut.-Colonel	January 7, 1863		Killed in battle Sept. 30, 1863.
James M. Farquhar	89th	B	Captain	January 15, 1863	Mustered out as captain June 10, 1865
			Major	April 25, 1865
Edward F. Bishop	89th		Adjutant	August 25, 1862	Honorably disch'g'd Dec. 28, 1865
Frederick L. Fake	89th		Quartermaster	August 25, 1862	Resigned Oct. 6, 1863
Herman B. Tuttle	89th		2d Asst. Surgeon	August 25, 1862	Mustered out June 10, 1865
James H. Hill	89th		Chaplain	August 25, 1862		Died Jan. 15, 1863.
Edward A. Smith	89th	A	1st Lieutenant	August 25, 1862
			Captain	September 4, 1862	Resigned Dec. 2, 1862
William H. Rice	89th	A	2d Lieutenant	August 25, 1862
			1st Lieutenant	September 4, 1862		Killed in action Sept. 20, 1863.
Heury L. Rowell	89th	C	Captain	August 25, 1862		Died Dec. 3, 1863, of wounds received at battle of Mission Ridge, Nov. 25, 1863.
James A. Bigney	89th	C	Captain	December 3, 1863
Samuel A. Ellis	89th	C	1st Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Mustered out June 10, '65
			2d Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Honorably disch'g'd Oct. 20, 1862
John R. Dawsey	89th	C	3d Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Resigned Oct. 1, 1862
William H. Kinney	89th	C	1st Lieutenant	October 20, 1862	Mustered out June 10, '65
John W. Spiuk	89th	D	2d Lieutenant	March 17, 1864	Resigned Oct. 1, 1864
George F. Robinson	89th	D	1st Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Mustered out June 10, '65	Killed in battle of Chickamauga, Ga., Sept. 19, 1863.
Herbert M. Blake	89th	K	Captain	September 19, 1863	On detached service at muster-out of regiment
William A. Sampson	89th	K	1st Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Mustered out June 10, 1865	Killed in battle of Liberty Gap.
James A. Jackson	89th	K	Captain	August 25, 1862	Mustered out June 10, 1865
			1st Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Mustered out June 10, 1865
Horace K. Greenfield	89th	K	2d Lieutenant	June 26, 1863	Promoted 1st lieutenant Co. B, 99th Regiment
Owen Stuart	90th		Major	September 23, 1862	Mustered out as lieutenant-colonel June 6, 1865
Edwin McCleavy	90th		Lieut.-Colonel	November 25, 1863	Resigned March 6, 1865
Smith S. Davis	90th		Adjutant	November 23, 1862	Mustered out June 6, '65
Thomas F. Kelley	90th		Chaplain	September 23, 1862	Resigned July 23, 1863
John C. Harrington	90th	C	1st Lieutenant	August 25, 1862	Resigned as 1st lieutenant Sept. 8, 1865
Matthew Leonard	90th	E	Captain	June 15, 1864	Dismissed March 26, 1869
David Duffy	90th	E	1st Lieutenant	September 6, 1862	Mustered out June 6, 1865
John McCassey	90th	E	1st Lieutenant	March 27, 1863	Mustered out June 6, 1865
Timothy Mahoney	90th	F	2d Lieutenant	September 5, 1862	Mustered out June 6, 1865
Timothy Mahoney	90th	F	1st Lieutenant	February 1, 1863	Mustered out June 6, 1865
Timothy Mahoney	90th	F	Captain	April 7, 1865		Under arrest at muster-out of regiment.
Lawrence S. McCarthy	90th	H	1st Lieutenant	September 5, 1862	Resigned March 5, 1863
George W. McDonald	90th	H	3d Lieutenant	March 5, 1863	Mustered out June 6, 1865
Michael M. Clark	90th	H	Captain	April 7, 1865	Resigned Feb. 1, 1863
Richard C. Kelley	90th	F	Captain	September 6, 1862	Resigned out June 6, 1865	First commission as captain of Co. F issued Feb. 1, 1863, but canceled
Patrick Feeney	90th	F	Captain	March 7, 1863	Resigned out June 6, 1865	Under arrest at muster-out of regiment.
John Murphy	90th	G	Captain	September 6, 1862	Mustered out June 6, 1865
Patrick Champion	90th	G	1st Lieutenant	September 6, 1862	Dismissed Feb. 5, 1864
Peter Casey	90th	H	Captain	March 27, 1863	Honorably disch'g'd Nov. 16, 1864
Peter Reel	90th	K	Adjutant	August 14, 1862	Mustered out June 10, '65
Edward A. Blodgett	96th		1st Lieutenant	August 27, 1862
Otis S. Favor	104th	K	2d Lieutenant	February 28, 1863	Resigned July 23, 1864
Horace S. Potter	105th		Surgeon	September 5, 1862	Killed in battle June 2, '64
George A. Bender	105th	I	1st Lieutenant	December 17, 1862	Honorably disch'g'd March 18, 1865
George E. Hoge	113th		Captain	August 25, 1864	Mustered out June 20, 1865	Bvt. brigadier-general March 14, 1865
George R. Clark	113th	A	Colonel	October 1, 1862
			Captain	October 1, 1862	Mustered out June 20, 1865
			Major	January 24, 1863
Lucius H. Yates	113th		Adjutant	October 1, 1862	Resigned Jan. 22, 1863
John S. Lord	113th		1st Lieutenant	July 26, 1863	Mustered out June 20, '65
Henry W. B. Hoyt	113th	A	2d Lieutenant	October 1, 1862	Honorably disch'g'd May 15, 1865
Azarah M. Bald	113th	A	Captain	January 22, 1863	Mustered out June 20, 1865
Daniel Ferguson	113th	A	2d Lieutenant	September 5, 1862	Mustered out June 20, 1865
Henry M. Williams	113th	A	1st Lieutenant	May 27, 1865	Honorably disch'g'd Sept. 2, 1863
Charles P. Siloa	113th	A	2d Lieutenant	May 27, 1865	Mustered out June 20, '65
Harvey P. Hosmer	113th	C	1st Lieutenant	October 1, 1862	Mustered out as sergeant June 20, 1865
William E. Barry	113th	C	2d Lieutenant	July 1, 1864	Mustered out June 20, 1865
Robert Wilson	113th	C	1st Lieutenant	October 1, 1862	Resigned Feb. 18, 1863
William C. Evelyn	113th	C	2d Lieutenant	August 31, 1863	Honorably discharged as 2d lieutenant May 15, '65	Not mustered as 1st lieutenant.
Ambruse C. Weber	113th	C	2d Lieutenant	February 18, 1863	Discharged Aug. 11, 1863
John G. Woodruff	113th	G	Captain	July 1, 1864	Mustered out June 20, '65
Frank Brown	113th	G	1st Lieutenant	October 1, 1862	Mustered out June 20, '65
James J. Conway	113th	G	2d Lieutenant	October 1, 1862	Resigned Jan. 13, 1863
			1st Lieutenant	January 13, 1863		Killed in battle June 12, 1864.
Henry C. Pinley	113th	G	1st Lieutenant	June 12, 1865
Clark E. Loomis	115th		1st Asst. Surgeon	August 17, 1864	Mustered out June 11, '65
Philip J. Warder	120th		2d Asst. Surgeon	November 12, 1862	Resigned Aug. 15, 1864
Seely Brownell	120th		2d Asst. Surgeon	November 12, 1862		Died May 19, 1864.
Thomas J. Sloan	124th		Colonel	September 20, 1862	Dismissed Dec. 15, 1863—court martial
Alonzo N. Reese	124th		Quartermaster	September 1, 1862	Mustered out Aug. 15, '65
Ralph A. Tenney	124th	A	Captain	September 10, 1862	Resigned July 9, 1863

TABLE A. INFANTRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Com-pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Asa A. Cowdery.....	124th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	September 10, 1862	Resigned July 24, 1863.
John Van Arman.....	127th		Colonel.....	September 23, 1862	Resigned Feb. 23, 1863.
John Van Arman, Jr.....	127th		Adjutant.....	September 6, 1862	Resigned March 10, 1863.
James A. Wheaton.....	127th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	March 10, 1863
Joel R. Gore.....	127th		Adjutant.....	March 19, 1863	Resigned Nov. 9, 1864.
Frank J. Woodward.....	127th	B	Surgeon.....	September 6, 1862	Mustered out June 5, 1865
Harvey L. Mason.....	127th	B	2d Lieutenant.....	October 31, 1862	Mustered out May 29, 1865
John S. Williams.....	127th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	July 27, 1863	Mustered out June 5, 1865
Thomas Sewell.....	127th	G	Captain.....	October 23, 1862	Resigned Dec. 26, 1863.
Henry W. Adams.....	127th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	October 23, 1862	Mustered out June 5, 1865
Joseph S. Berry.....	127th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	December 26, 1863.	Mustered out June 5, 1865
John H. Peck.....	132d*		Major.....	October 23, 1862
Daniel Neffman.....	132d*		Adjutant.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
William R. Adair.....	132d*		1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
Charles H. Vogel.....	132d*	B	Captain.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
Charles Vargas.....	132d*	E	1st Lieutenant.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
Emanuel Engelstedt.....	132d*		2d Lieutenant.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
Calvin A. Laws.....	132d*	K	Captain.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
Frank H. Betteshall.....	132d*	R	1st Lieutenant.....	June 1, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 17, 1864
Waters W. McChesney.....	134th		Colonel.....	May 21, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
John A. Wilson.....	134th		Lieutenant-Colonel.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Edward D. Laxton.....	134th		Major.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
John C. Bigelow.....	134th		Adjutant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Reuben P. Pierce.....	134th		Quartermaster.....	May 17, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
John Dyer.....	134th	A	Captain.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Charles E. Stclair.....	134th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
George Barry.....	134th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Moses A. Thayer.....	134th	C	Captain.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Marshall B. Hughson.....	134th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Francis X. Dix.....	134th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
William Metlar.....	134th	D	Captain.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Charles E. Dickerson.....	134th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Rosell G. O'Brien.....	134th	D	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Henry J. Milligan.....	134th	E	Captain.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Albert P. Williams.....	134th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Seward C. Metz.....	134th	E	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Freepff Vandervoort.....	134th	F	1st Lieutenant.....	July 10, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Edward M. Atkinson.....	134th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Edward J. Whitehead.....	134th	I	Captain.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Andrew L. Hunt.....	134th	I	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Edward O'Neill.....	134th	I	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Anthony B. Porter.....	134th	K	Captain.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Thomas S. Sexton.....	134th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Albert W. Paaks.....	134th	K	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 25, 1864
Edward Hausmann.....	134th	A	Captain.....	June 18, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 27, 1864
David T. Maurer.....	143d	A	2d Lieutenant.....	June 18, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 27, 1864
Isaac Polans.....	143d	A	1st Lieutenant.....	June 18, 1864	Mustered out Oct. 27, 1864
Werner W. Burg.....	147th		Lieutenant-Colonel.....	February 21, 1865	Dis honorably dismissed, June 2, 1865.
John C. Logg.....	147th		Adjutant.....	February 1, 1865	Mustered out Jan. 20, 1866
Joseph Sears.....	147th		Quartermaster.....	January 30, 1865	Mustered Sept. 12, 1865.
Everett A. Emmons.....	147th		Surgeon.....	February 16, 1865	Resigned Sept. 7, 1865
Francis VanBuren.....	147th		2d Asst.-Surgeon.....	February 16, 1865	Mustered out Jan. 20, 1866
William R. Adair.....	147th		Surgeon.....	December 5, 1865
William J. Couley.....	153d†		1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	January 30, 1865	Mustered out Sept 21, 1865
George W. Nichols.....	147th		Surgeon.....	February 17, 1865	Mustered out Jan. 20, 1866
William J. Couley.....	147th		1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	March 4, 1865	Mustered out as hospital steward, Jan. 20, 1866.
George W. Nichols.....	147th		2d Asst.-Surgeon.....	January 20, 1866	Mustered out Jan. 20, 1866
Romey A. Dixon.....	147th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	February 19, 1865	Mustered out Jan. 20, 1866
Daniel G. Eldridge.....	149th	F	1st Lieutenant.....	February 16, 1865	Mustered out Jan. 27, 1866
John A. Wilson.....	153d†		Quartermaster.....	February 18, 1865
Henry T. Chesbrovgh.....	153d†		Major.....	February 27, 1865	Mustered out as major, September 21, 1865.
William P. Penfield.....	156th		Lieutenant-Colonel.....	September 8, 1865	Mustered out Sept. 21, 1865
William P. Penfield.....	29th		1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	February 18, 1865	Mustered out Sept. 21, 1865
John A. Erross.....	U. S. (Infy.)		Lieutenant-Colonel.....	April 24, 1864.		Killed July 30, 1864, at Peters- burg, Va.

TABLE B. CAVALRY.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Com-pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Henry M. Packer.....	1st		Surgeon.....	July 5, 1861.....	Mustered out July 14, 1862
Theodore J. Bluthardt.....	1st		1st Asst.-Surgeon.....	July 26, 1861.....	Resigned April 5, 1862, with view of promotion as surgeon 23d Missouri Vol- unteers.....
Louis D. Hubbard.....	3d§		Major.....	October 31, 1864.....	Resigned April 5, 1862, with view of promotion as surgeon 23d Missouri Vol- unteers.....	Resigned May 15, 1865
Martin R. M. Wallace.....	4th		Major.....	October 4, 1861.....
Charles C. James.....	4th	B	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	December 5, 1862		Term expired Nov. 3, 1864
Embury D. Oshaud.....	4th	A	Colonel.....	February 16, 1863
Hamilton B. Dux.....	4th	B	Captain.....	August 23, 1861.....	Resigned May 5, 1862.
David H. Gile.....	4th	A	Major.....	August 23, 1861.....	Mustered out as captain and appointed by General Thomas, colonel of the 1st Mississippi Cavalry, A. D., February 29, 1864.
Samuel A. Lowe.....	4th	A	Captain.....	October 3, 1861.....	Resigned May 3, 1862.
Embury D. Oshaud.....	4th	A	Adjutant.....	August 23, 1861.....
Hamilton B. Dux.....	4th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	October 13, 1861.....
David H. Gile.....	4th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	February 16, 1863
Samuel A. Lowe.....	4th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	February 16, 1863
Samuel A. Lowe.....	4th	A	Captain.....	February 29, 1864	Dismissed Oct. 31, 1864.

*100 days Infantry. †One year Infantry. ‡Colored. §Consolidated.

TABLE B. CAVALRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Company.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Frederick Walker	4th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	February 29, 1864.....	.....	No mention of muster.
James Sherlock	4th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	August 23, 1861.....	Resigned June 3, 1863.....
Commodore C. Spaid	4th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	June 3, 1863.....	Mustered out for promotion Jan. 1, 1864.....	Promoted to 3d Regiment (Cold Cavalry, Feb. 29, 1864.)
Edwin M. Main	4th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	December 16, 1862.....	Resigned Sept. 3, 1863.....
George A. Walter	4th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	August 23, 1861.....	Resigned Sept. 3, 1863.....	Resigned Feb. 23, 1863.....
Edmund Moore	4th	D	2d Lieutenant.....	September 22, 1862.....	Term exp'd March 14, '63.....
Charles B. Throop	4th	M	1st Lieutenant.....	September 4, 1861.....	Mustered out October 27, 1865.....	Resigned, and re-entered service as colonel 12th Cavalry.
Charles B. Kendall	5th	.....	2d Asst. Surgeon.....	May 7, 1863.....	.....
Arno Voss	6th	.....	Major.....	June 24, 1865.....	.....	Resigned, and re-entered service as colonel 12th Cavalry.
John L. Beveridge	8th	.....	Major.....	September 18, 1861.....	Honorably disch'd Nov. 2, 1863.....
William H. Medill	8th	G	Captain.....	September 18, 1861.....	.....	Died of wounds, July 16, 1863.
George A. Forsyth	8th	G	Major.....	September 10, 1862.....	.....
James D. Ludlam	8th	H	Captain.....	February 13, 1861.....	Honorably disch'd Feb. 1, 1866. Brevet brigadier-general.....	Term expired January 5, 1865.....
Reubeu Cleveland	8th	F	Major.....	July 6, 1863.....	.....
Dennis J. Hynes	8th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	September 18, 1861.....	Resigned July 31, 1863.....	Discharged for promotion to 17th Cavalry, January 25, 1864.....
George F. Warner	8th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	September 18, 1862.....	.....
Louis H. Rucker	8th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	September 10, 1862.....	.....	Mustered out July 17, '65.
Charles Scribner	8th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	September 18, 1861.....	.....
Rosell M. Hough	9th	D	Major.....	May 3, 1865.....	Resigned April 21, 1865.....	Mustered out July 17, '65.
William J. Wallis	9th	D	Captain.....	September 18, 1862.....	Resigned April 23, 1862.....
John H. Carpenter	9th	L	Adjutant.....	February 18, 1862.....	Resigned Jan. 3, 1863.....	Discharged Sept. 29, 1864.....
Samuel H. Price	9th	K	Quartermaster.....	March 27, 1865.....	Mustered out Oct. 31, 1865.....
Charles T. Scammon	9th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	Sept. 14, '61 Oct. 1, '62	Mustered out April 7, '62.....	Died April 8, 1863.
William M. Childster	9th	I	Captain.....	April 8, 1862.....	.....
Joseph H. Knox	9th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	November 11, 1861.....	Mustered out.....	Honorably disch'd Oct. 3, 1862.....
Louis F. Booth	9th	L	2d Lieutenant.....	October 23, 1861.....	.....
William E. Bayley	9th	L	3d Lieutenant.....	November 11, 1861.....	Resigned April 5, 1863.....	Term expired Nov. 11, '64
Robert J. Belomy	10th	D	2d Lieutenant.....	November 11, 1861.....	Resigned Feb. 9, 1863.....
William Bennett	10th	D	2d Lieutenant.....	September 1, 1862.....	Honorably disch'd Nov. 24, 1864.....	Resigned Sept. 4, 1862.....
Daniel Dempster	10th*	A	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1863.....	.....
Arno Voss	12th	.....	Colonel.....	May 31, 1865.....	Mustered out Nov. 22, '65	Resigned Aug. 11, 1863.....
Hasbrouck Davis	12th	.....	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	February 1, 1862.....	.....
Thomas W. Grosvenor	12th	A	Captain.....	August 14, 1863.....	Brevet lieutenant-general March 13, 1865.....	Resigned Aug. 3, 1864.....
Hamilton B. Dox	12th	.....	Major.....	February 28, 1862.....	.....
Cephas Strong	12th	E	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	August 3, 1864.....	Mustered out May 29, 1866.....	Mustered out May 29, 1866.....
John H. Clibourn	12th	G	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	October 13, 1865.....	.....
James Daley	12th	D	Major.....	February 13, 1862.....	Term expired March 2, 1865.....	Mustered out Feb. 28, '65.
Andrew H. Langholz	12th*	B	1st Lieutenant.....	April 25, 1862.....	.....
Robert J. Foster	12th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	February 15, 1864.....	Mustered out March 17, 1865.....	Honorably disch'd Nov. 8, 1862.....
William R. Carpenter	12th	.....	Major.....	February 24, 1862.....	.....
Jonathan Slade	12th	.....	2d Asst. Surgeon.....	February 15, 1864.....	Mustered out May 29, '66.	Resigned June 9, 1865.....
Alexander Stewart	12th	.....	2d Asst. Surgeon.....	January 6, 1864.....	.....
John McCarthy	12th	.....	Adjutant.....	February 1, 1864.....	Honorably disch'd Jan. 14, 1865.....	Mustered out in 1862.....
Abraham J. Warner	12th	.....	Battalion Adjutant.....	March 8, 1862.....	.....
William M. Luff	12th	A	1st Asst. Surgeon.....	March 1, 1862.....	Mustered out as assistant surgeon.....	Dismissed Oct. 31, 1862.....
Charles Roden	12th	B	Chaplain.....	June 1, 1862.....	.....
Charles F. Voss	12th	B	2d Lieutenant.....	January 1, 1862.....	.....	Term expired March 2, 1865.....
Henry Jansen	12th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	February 28, 1862.....	.....
Charles Gritum	12th	B	Captain.....	February 28, 1862.....	Resigned April 21, 1864.....	Term as 1st lieutenant expired March 2, 1865.....
William J. Steele	12th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	February 28, 1864.....	.....
Richard N. Hayden	12th	D	Captain.....	January 1, 1862.....	Resigned Feb. 24, 1863.....	Term expired March 2, 1865.....
Oliver Grosvenor	12th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	November 17, 1862.....	.....
John P. Harvey	12th	E	Captain.....	February 24, 1862.....	Honorably disch'd July 11, 1863.....	Mustered out.....
Charles Vernard	12th	E	1st Lieutenant.....	October 8, 1862.....	.....
Thomas Logan	12th	F	Captain.....	July 10, 1863.....	.....	Mustered out.....
Joseph Logan	12th	F	2d Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1864.....	.....
George E. Overocker	12th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	January 2, 1864.....	Term expired March 1, 1865.....	Mustered out for promotion Nov. 17, 1862.....
Charles W. Shears	12th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	February 7, 1864.....	.....
Earl H. Chapman	12th	H	Captain.....	March 21, 1862.....	Honorably disch'd March 22, 1863.....	Term expired March 2, 1865.....
George S. Phelps	12th	H	1st Lieutenant.....	November 15, 1862.....	.....
Isaac Conroe	12th*	H	Captain.....	March 3, 1863.....	Term expired March 2, 1865.....	Mustered out March 17, 1865.....
Oliver M. Pugh	12th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	November 1, 1861.....	.....
Thomas J. Smith	12th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	July 14, 1862.....	Mustered out March 17, '64	Term expired March 17, 1865.....
	12th*	F	2d Lieutenant.....	March 2, 1864.....	.....
	12th*	F	2d Lieutenant.....	November 1, 1861.....	Resigned Nov. 24, 1863.....	Mustered out.....
	12th*	F	2d Lieutenant.....	March 2, 1864.....	.....

* Consolidated.

† Reorganized.

TABLE B. CAVALRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Com-pany.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
David C. Brown.....	12th	I	Captain.....	November 1, 1861.	Honorably discharged February 24, 1864.
Edwin A. Webber.....	12th	I	1st Lieutenant.....	November 1, 1861.	Resigned Nov. 15, 1861.
George H. Sitts.....	12th	I	2d Lieutenant.....	November 1, 1861.	Resigned May 3, 1862.
Clarence Adrich.....	12th	I	2d Lieutenant.....	November 1, 1861.	Resigned January 29, 1864.
Amherst F. Graves.....	12th	I	2d Lieutenant.....	February 24, 1864.	Term expired Mar. 17, 1865.
Henry Jansen.....	12th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	December 3, 1863.	Dishonorably dismissed July 2, 1864.
Edmund Luff.....	12th	K	Captain.....	August 21, 1865.
.....	12th*	F	Captain.....	July 2, 1864.	Resigned Oct. 2, 1865.
Charles L. Amet.....	12th	K	2d Lieutenant.....	January 25, 1864.
.....	12th*	F	1st Lieutenant.....	July 2, 1864.	Muster'd out May 29, 1866.
Oscar Charles.....	12th*	B	2d Lieutenant.....	May 15, 1866.	Mustered out as sergeant, March 22, 1863.
Samuel Mourning.....	12th	G	2d Lieutenant.....	March 22, 1863.	Resigned Feb. 19, 1864.
Allen D. Maurer.....	12th*	C	1st Lieutenant.....	May 10, 1865.	Resigned January 17, 1866.
Frank Meacham.....	12th*	C	2d Lieutenant.....	May 15, 1866.	Mustered out as sergeant, May 29, 1866.
George R. Stowe.....	12th*	C	2d Lieutenant.....	August 21, 1865.
.....	12th*	D	1st Lieutenant.....	February 15, 1866.	Muster'd out May 29, 1866.
.....	12th*	E	2d Lieutenant.....	May 10, 1865.	Muster'd out Nov. 30, 1865.
Solomon P. Emden.....	12th*	E	1st Lieutenant.....	December 19, 1865.	Muster'd out May 29, 1866.
.....	12th*	E	2d Lieutenant.....	May 31, 1865.
Charles H. Bussom.....	12th*	M	1st Lieutenant.....	August 21, 1865.	Muster'd out as 1st lieutenant, May 29, 1866.
.....	12th*	M	Captain.....	April 16, 1866.	Mustered out as sergeant, May 29, 1866.
John Few.....	12th*	M	1st Lieutenant.....	April 16, 1866.	Mustered out as sergeant, May 29, 1866.
Henry F. Hyer.....	12th*	M	2d Lieutenant.....	May 29, 1866.	Mustered out as sergeant, May 29, 1866.
Joseph W. Bell.....	13th	.....	Colonel.....	December 7, 1861.	Muster'd out May 20, 1863.
Theobald Hartman.....	13th*	.....	Lieut.-Colonel.....	December 31, 1861.	Discharged June 4, 1864.
Lothar Lippert.....	13th	.....	Major.....	January 27, 1862.
.....	13th*	.....	Adjutant.....	December 31, 1861.	Promoted major 3d Ark. Cavalry, Dec. 14, 1863.	Died October 18, 1863.
Thaddeus S. Clarkson.....	13th*	.....	Adjutant.....	December 31, 1861.
.....	13th*	.....	Quartermaster.....	December 31, 1861.
.....	13th*	B	1st Lieutenant.....	May 29, 1862.	Mustered out April, 16, 1862.
Emil Newbarger.....	13th*	.....	Quartermaster.....	October 1, 1862.	Dishonorably dismissed as quartermaster, December 28, 1864.
.....	13th*	E	Captain.....	July 14, 1864.
Charles Storch.....	13th	.....	Surgeon.....	March 3, 1862.	Resigned June 26, 1863.
Abner W. Henderson.....	13th	.....	Chaplain.....	October 1, 1862.	Honorably discharged November 18, 1864.
.....	13th*	.....	Chaplain.....	October 1, 1862.	Resigned for good of service, May 20, 1864.
Hall P. Talbot.....	13th*	.....	Commissary.....	October 25, 1862.	Resigned Feb. 12, 1862.
Julius Grossenheider.....	13th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.
.....	13th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.
John Stuber.....	13th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	May 4, 1862.	Resigned January 10, 1863.
Henry Feymer.....	13th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	May 19, 1862.	Resigned January 33, 1863.
Henry M. Peters.....	13th	B	Captain.....	December 31, 1861.	Resigned January 6, 1863.
Felix C. Marx.....	13th	B	2d Lieutenant.....	June 7, 1862.
.....	13th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	October 1, 1862.
.....	13th	B	Captain.....	January 6, 1863.	Mustered out May 20, 1863.
Carl W. Kraeger.....	13th	B	2d Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.	Resigned May 3, 1862.
Ernst Riedel.....	13th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.	Resigned May 3, 1862.
George Wolf.....	13th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	October 1, 1862.
.....	13th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	January 10, 1863.	Mustered out May 20, 1863 (Discharged July 18, 1863)
William W. Bell.....	13th	D	Captain.....	February 28, 1862.	Mustered out May 20, 1863 (Discharged July 18, 1863)
Robert G. Dyhrenfurth.....	13th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	February 20, 1862.
.....	13th	D	Captain.....	October 3, 1862.	Mustered out May 20, 1863
S. Chester Hall.....	13th	D	2d Lieutenant.....	April 18, 1862.	Resigned Dec. 10, 1862.
Frederick F. Clifton.....	13th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.	Mustered out May 20, 1863
.....	13th	G	1st Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.
.....	13th	E	Captain.....	August 9, 1862.
Albert Erskine.....	13th*	B	Major.....	October 19, 1863.	Mustered out (term expired) January 5, 1865.
.....	13th*	H	Colonel.....	April 11, 1864.
Michael Schmidt.....	13th	H	Adjutant.....	January 10, 1863.	Mustered out May 20, 1863
Frederick W. Cole.....	13th*	A	2d Lieutenant.....	September 30, 1864.	Mustered out Aug. 31, 1865
Frank Drummond.....	13th*	A	Quartermaster.....	October 28, 1864.	Mustered out Aug. 31, 1865
Keys Danforth.....	13th*	K	Captain.....	June 22, 1865.	Mustered out Aug. 31, 1865
.....	13th*	K	2d Lieutenant.....	May 17, 1864.
Charles H. Temple.....	13th*	M	1st Lieutenant.....	February 21, 1864.	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant, August 31, 1865.
.....	13th*	M	Captain.....	September 5, 1865.
Chauncey Miller.....	14th	G	Adjutant.....	September 21, 1863.
.....	14th	G	Captain.....	June 27, 1865.	Mustered out as adjutant, July 31, 1865.
Jacob J. Ruby.....	14th	M	Major.....	January 7, 1865.	Resigned January 8, 1864.
.....	14th	M	2d Lieutenant.....	January 7, 1865.
James Grant Wilson.....	15th	.....	Major.....	December 25, 1862.	Promoted colonel 1st Cavalry, A. D. C.
Christian Thielemann.....	16th	.....	Major.....	November 1, 1861.
.....	16th	.....	Colonel.....	June 11, 1863.	Discharged August 9, 1864
Robert W. Smith.....	16th	.....	Lieut.-Colonel.....	June 11, 1863.	Mustered out as lieutenant-colonel, Aug. 19, 1865
.....	16th	.....	Colonel.....	August 9, 1864.
Frederick Schaumbek.....	16th	C	Captain.....	July 6, 1861.
.....	16th	C	Major.....	April 17, 1863.
Milo Thielemann.....	16th	B	Captain.....	January 25, 1862.	Discharged June 8, 1864.
.....	16th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	August 7, 1863.	Resigned May 25, 1864.
Joseph Gotthelf.....	16th	.....	Adjutant.....	May 22, 1864.
Valentine Grebenstein.....	16th	A	2d Lieutenant.....	January 30, 1863.	Term expired Sept. 2, 1864
.....	16th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	May 18, 1863.
George Hamilton.....	16th	B	2d Lieutenant.....	November 1, 1861.
.....	16th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	January 25, 1862.	Mustered out Nov. 25, 1864
.....	16th	B	Captain.....	August 1, 1864.
Julius Jaehne.....	16th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	December 15, 1862.
.....	16th	C	Captain.....	April 17, 1863.	Dismissed July 11, 1864.
John G. Roll.....	16th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	July 6, 1861.	Resigned Dec. 15, 1862.
.....	16th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	April 21, 1863.	Term expired July 16, 1864.
John F. Marx.....	16th	C	1st Lieutenant.....	April 17, 1863.	Discharged for promotion April 11, 1863.
Benedict Weniger.....	16th	C	2d Lieutenant.....	December 15, 1862.	Resigned March 16, 1864.
.....	16th	D	Captain.....	April 18, 1863.
Frederick Herfurt.....	16th	D	2d Lieutenant.....	April 18, 1863.	Mustered out as 1st lieutenant, Aug. 19, 1865.
.....	16th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	March 16, 1864.
.....	16th	D	Captain.....	August 7, 1865.
John Hoffmann.....	16th	D	1st Lieutenant.....	April 18, 1863.
.....	16th	D	Captain.....	March 16, 1864.
.....	16th	D	Major.....	July 21, 1865.	Mustered out Aug. 19, 1865

*Consolidated.

HISTORY OF CHICAGO.

TABLE B. CAVALRY.—CONTINUED.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Company.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Francis Jackson.....	16th	I	Captain.....	January 21, 1863.....	Cashiered Nov. 14, 1863....
			Major.....	January 12, 1864.....
Nathan C. Goodenow.....	16th	K	Captain.....	June 8, 1863.....	Mustered out Aug. 19, 1865
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	July 21, 1865.....	On detached service as captain at muster-out of regiment.....
Denois J. Hynes.....	17th	A	Lieutenant-Colonel.....	January 24, 1864.....	Resigned October 24, 1866
			Captain.....	December 1, 1863.....
Hiram Hilliard.....	17th		Major.....	January 23, 1864.....	Mustered out Dec. 15, 1865
John A. Hynes.....	17th		Adjutant.....	October 30, 1865.....	Mustered out Dec. 5, 1865
Philo P. Judson.....	17th		Quartermaster.....	December 2, 1863.....	Appointed commissary of subsistence, April 23, 1864
Francis Beaufort.....	17th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	December 1, 1863.....
			Captain.....	January 23, 1864.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1864.....
Francis LeClair.....	17th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	January 23, 1864.....
			Captain.....	May 6, 1864.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	July 8, 1864.....
Scott W. Harrington.....	17th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	November 17, 1864.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	July 11, 1865.....	Resigned October 2, 1865.
Lyman S. Rowell.....	17th	A	1st Lieutenant.....	December 5, 1865.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	December 5, 1865.....	Mustered out Dec. 15, 1865
James B. Downs.....	17th	B	Captain.....	December 3, 1863.....	Mustered out as commissary sergeant, Dec. 15, 1865
Samuel H. B. McReynolds.....	17th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	December 3, 1863.....	Resigned Nov. 17, 1864.....
Jonas L. Buck.....	17th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	March 13, 1865.....	Resigned October 1, 1864.
Cyrus Smith.....	17th	B	2d Lieutenant.....	May 10, 1865.....	Mustered out Dec. 15, 1865
Douglas W. Scott.....	17th	B	1st Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1864.....	Mustered out Dec. 15, 1865
Edward P. Grosvenor.....	17th	K	Captain.....	June 29, 1865.....	Mustered out Dec. 22, 1865
			2d Lieutenant.....	February 15, 1864.....
Robert Souders.....	17th	K	1st Lieutenant.....	June 23, 1865.....	Mustered out Dec. 22, 1865
			2d Lieutenant.....	January 26, 1864.....
Robert G. Dybrenfurth.....	17th	L	Captain.....	December 10, 1863.....	Mustered out Dec. 20, 1865

TABLE C. ARTILLERY.

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Company.	Rank and Line of Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Joseph D. Webster.....	1st	B	Colonel.....	February 1, 1862.....	Resigned May 6, 1863.....
Exra Taylor.....	1st	B	Captain.....	May 15, 1861.....
			Major.....	October 1, 1861.....
			Colonel.....	May 6, 1863.....	Resigned Aug. 20, 1864.....
Allen C. Waterhouse.....	1st	E	Captain.....	December 19, 1861.....	Honorably discharged.....
			Major.....	May 6, 1863.....	August 23, 1865. Brevet colonel May 30, 1865.....
			Lieutenant-Colonel.....	November 2, 1864.....
Charles M. Willard.....	1st	A	Captain.....	September 27, 1861.....	Resigned January 16, 1863
			Major.....	March 1, 1862.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	May 15, 1861.....
Samuel E. Barrett.....	1st	B	Captain.....	October 23, 1861.....	Resigned Feb. 13, 1864.....
			Major.....	February 1, 1863.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	July 30, 1861.....
Lyman Bridges.....	19th*	G	Captain.....	January 1, 1863.....	Mustered out as captain; declined commission as major. Term expired.....	Mustered into service as first lieutenant 19th Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry.
Edmund Andrews.....	1st	B†	Major.....	January 1, 1863.....	Resigned Jan. 18, 1863.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	December 21, 1864.....
Peter P. Wood.....	1st	A	1st Lieutenant.....	September 27, 1861.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
			Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	September 27, 1861.....
John W. Rumsey.....	1st	A	Sen. 2d Lieutenant.....	February 3, 1862.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.....
			Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	May 24, 1862.....
George McCagg.....	1st	A	2d Lieutenant.....	February 3, 1862.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
			Sen. 2d Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.....
			Jun. 1st Lieutenant.....	May 24, 1862.....
Frederick W. Young.....	1st	A	2d Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
Hoxie L. Huffman.....	1st	A	2d Lieutenant.....	May 24, 1862.....	Resigned January 17, 1873
William M. Pratt.....	1st	A	2d Lieutenant.....	May 24, 1862.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
Edward P. Wilcox.....	1st‡	A	1st Lieutenant.....	July 23, 1864.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
Harrison Roberts.....	1st‡	A	1st Lieutenant.....	April 23, 1865.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
Enoch Colby.....	1st‡	A	2d Lieutenant.....	July 23, 1864.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
James B. Dutch.....	1st‡	A	2d Lieutenant.....	July 23, 1864.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
Spencer S. Kimball.....	1st‡	A	2d Lieutenant.....	April 23, 1865.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
Israel P. Rumsey.....	1st	B	Sen. 2d Lieutenant.....	October 23, 1861.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
			Captain.....	February 25, 1863.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	May 15, 1861.....
Levi W. Hart.....	1st	B	Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	October 23, 1861.....	Honorably discharged.....
			Captain.....	February 25, 1863.....	December 25, 1863.....
Theodore F. Roberts.....	1st	B	2d Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.....	Resigned August 20, 1863
			Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	February 22, 1863.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	February 24, 1863.....
			Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	August 20, 1863.....
Timothy M. Blaisdell.....	1st	B	2d Lieutenant.....	February 25, 1863.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
William W. Lowrie.....	1st	B	1st Lieutenant.....	August 20, 1863.....	Promoted captain of Merican Battery.....
Patrick H. White.....	1st	B	2d Lieutenant.....	May 15, 1861.....	Term expired July 23, 1864.....
William J. McCoy.....	1st	B	Sen. 2d Lieutenant.....	October 23, 1861.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	February 22, 1863.....
Lyman A. White.....	1st	B†	1st Lieutenant.....	August 20, 1863.....
			2d Lieutenant.....	July 1, 1863.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	September 20, 1863.....
			Captain.....	December 21, 1864.....	Mustered out July 6, 1865.
			2d Lieutenant.....	February 22, 1863.....
Franklin Seborn.....	1st	B†	Sen. 2d Lieutenant.....	September 20, 1863.....	Enlisted as sergeant of Co. G, 19th Infantry. Died.....
			1st Lieutenant.....	August 2, 1864.....	Enlisted July 2, 1861, as corporal in Co. G, 19th Infantry. Transferred to Bridge's Battery.
Clark E. Dodge.....	1st	B†	Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	December 21, 1864.....	Mustered out July 6, 1865

*Infantry. †Formerly Bridge's Battery. ‡Consolidated.

TABLE C. ARTILLERY.—CONTINUED.

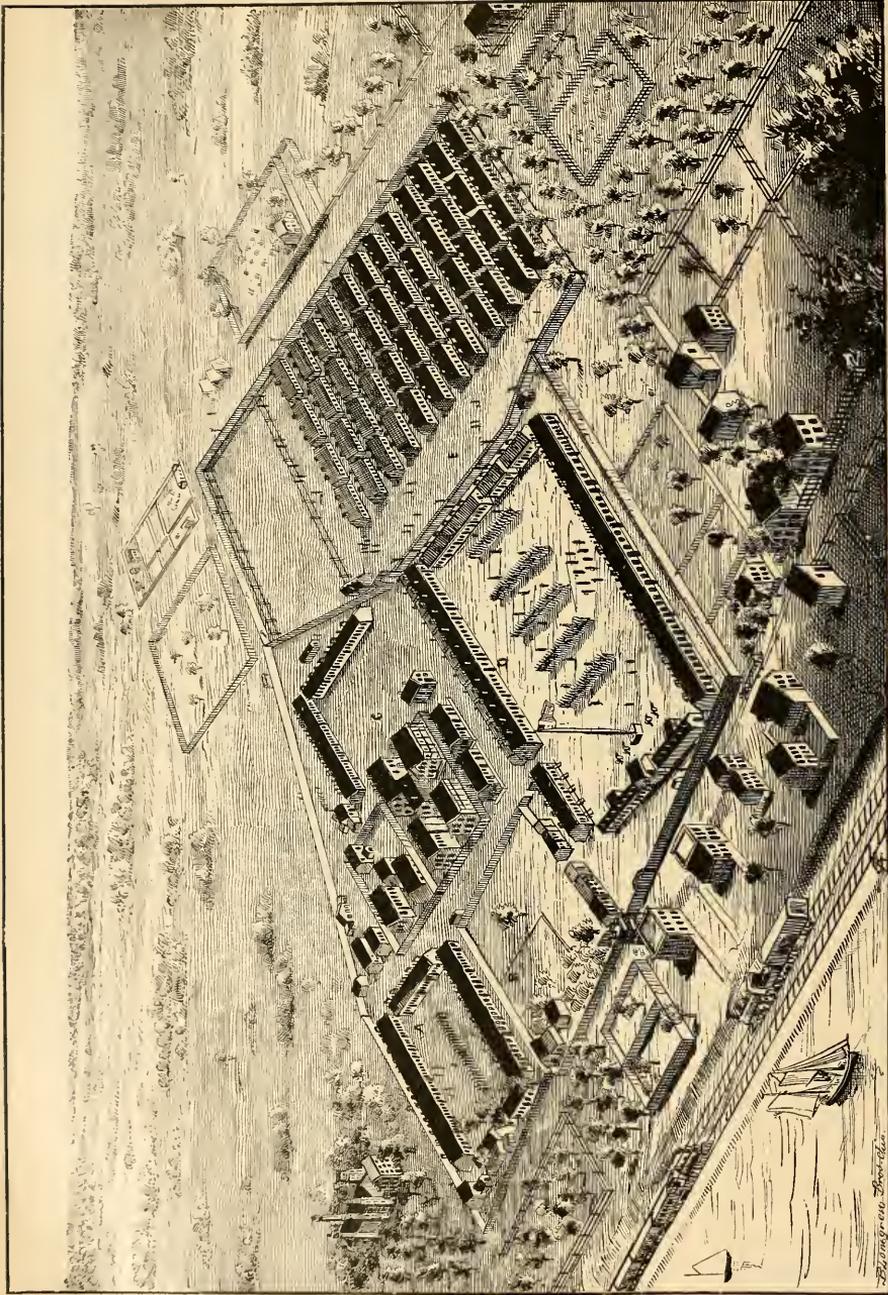

NAMES.	No. of Regiment.	Company.	Rank and Line Promotion.	Date of Commission.	Date of Close of Service or of Transfer.	REMARKS.
Lawman C. Lawrence.....	1st	B*	2d Lieutenant..... Jun. 1st Lieutenant.....	August 2, 1864..... December 21, 1864.....	Mustered out July 6, 1865 Mustered out July 6, 1865	Enlisted as private in Co. G, 19th Infantry. Transferred to Bridges's Battery.
Alphous W. Potter.....	1st	B	2d Lieutenant.....	December 21, 1864.....	Mustered out July 6, 1865
Henry A. Rodgers.....	1st	D	1st Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1862.....	Killed May 29, 1863.
Uziel P. Smith.....	1st	D	Captain.....	May 5, 1862.....
William Chaudler.....	1st	E	2d Lieutenant.....	December 19, 1861.....	Term expired December 29, 1861.....
Lewis B. Mitchell.....	1st	E	1st Lieutenant.....	February 25, 1863.....		Resigned April 14, 1865.....
Morris D. Temple.....	19th	inf. G	Sen. 1st Lieutenant..... 1st Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1862..... January 1, 1862.....	Term expired August 3, 1864 { Promoted colonel 2d Tennessee (Colored) Regt.....	{ Mustered into service as 2d Lieutenant, 19th Regiment, Infantry, Co. G.
Edward Bouton.....	1st	B*	Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	September 30, 1863.....
Albert Cudney.....	1st	I	Captain.....	February 10, 1862.....	Resigned Feb. 10, 1864..... Honorably discharged as captain of new company (Colvin's Battery) June 11, 1865.....
John H. Colvin.....	1st	I	1st Lieutenant..... (Captain.....)	February 1, 1862..... June 16, 1863.....
Charles M. Judd.....	1st	K†	1st Lieutenant.....	June 12, 1862.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
William K. Lee.....	1st	L	2d Lieutenant.....	February 28, 1864.....
Bela H. Flinsky.....	1st	M	2d Lieutenant.....	September 23, 1862.....	Mustered out July 24, 1865
William H. Bolton.....	2d	L	1st Lieutenant..... Captain.....	October 10, 1863..... February 28, 1862.....
Charles J. Stalbrand.....	2d	G	Major.....	September 21, 1864.....	Mustered out as major July 27, 1865..... { Promoted brigadier-general..... { Promoted colonel of 72d Infantry.....
Frederick A. Starring.....	2d	G	Lieut.-Colonel.....	July 24, 1862.....
Frank B. Smith.....	2d	H	Captain.....	October 4, 1861.....	Promoted colonel of 72d Infantry.....
Horatio N. Towner.....	2d	C	Major.....	December 31, 1861.....
John G. Loy.....	2d	C	Major.....	January 30, 1862.....	Dropped from roll..... Honorably discharged as senior 2d lieutenant, Feb. 22, 1865.....	{ Assigned to Co. C by order of Colonel Mather. Declined commission as first lieutenant.
James D. W. Whitall.....	2d	D	1st Lieutenant.....	February 22, 1862.....
Frederick Sparreström.....	2d	G	1st Lieutenant.....	March 1, 1862.....	Resigned Jan. 23, 1863.....
Erastus A. Nichols.....	2d	L	2d Lieutenant.....	December 31, 1861.....
Thaddeus C. Hulaicki.....	2d	L	1st Lieutenant.....	February 1, 1864.....	Resigned June 3, 1865.....
Edward A. James.....	2d	L	Captain.....	May 28, 1864.....
Simon P. Tracy.....	2d	L	Captain.....	March 13, 1865.....	Mustered out Aug. 9, 1865
Charles H. Felton.....	2d	L	1st Lieutenant.....	June 12, 1865.....
George C. Wise.....	2d	L	2d Lieutenant.....	February 28, 1862.....	Resigned May 23, 1865.....
Orlando S. Wood.....	2d	L	1st Lieutenant.....	November 2, 1862.....
James Cunningham.....	2d	L	2d Lieutenant.....	March 28, 1865.....	Mustered out Aug. 9, 1865
John C. Phillips.....	2d	M	1st Lieutenant.....	June 12, 1865.....
Edward G. Hillier.....	2d	M	Captain.....	August 5, 1862.....	Resigned Jan. 23, 1863.....
George W. Reed.....	2d	M	1st Lieutenant.....	March 25, 1862.....
W. C. G. L. Stevenson.....	2d	M	1st Lieutenant.....	September 4, 1862.....	Honorably discharged (Nov. 19, 1862.....
James S. Stokes.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	2d Lieutenant.....	June 6, 1862.....
George I. Robinson.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	1st Lieutenant.....	November 19, 1862.....	Mustered out April 11, 1864
Albert F. Baxter.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	Captain.....	July 31, 1862.....
Sylvanus H. Stevens.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	1st Lieutenant.....	August 22, 1864.....	Resigned Nov. 15, 1862.....
Trumbull D. Griffin.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	2d Lieutenant.....	July 31, 1862.....
Henry Bennett.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	Sen. 1st Lieutenant.....	August 22, 1864.....	Mustered out June 30, 1865
Lewis B. Haud.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	2d Lieutenant.....	July 31, 1862.....
Abbott L. Adams.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	2d Lieutenant.....	August 22, 1864.....	Resigned Feb. 18, 1865.....
Menzo H. Salisbury.....	C. B.	O. T.‡	2d Lieutenant.....	August 22, 1864.....
Charles G. Cooley.....	C. M.	B.§	Captain.....	June 23, 1865.....	Mustered out as sergeant, June 30, 1865.....
Patrick H. White.....	C. M.	B.§	Captain.....	August 29, 1862.....
Frank C. Wilson.....	C. M.	B.§	1st Lieutenant.....	August 29, 1862.....	Resigned Feb. 24, 1863.....
James H. Swad.....	C. M.	B.§	1st Lieutenant.....	August 29, 1862.....
George Throop.....	C. M.	B.§	1st Lieutenant.....	February 6, 1863.....	Resigned Feb. 6, 1863.....
Pickney S. Coone.....	C. M.	B.§	1st Lieutenant.....	February 23, 1863.....
Henry Roe.....	C. M.	B.§	2d Lieutenant.....	February 23, 1863.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
David R. Crego.....	C. M.	B.§	1st Lieutenant.....	April 8, 1864.....
Frederick B. Hickford.....	C. M.	B.§	2d Lieutenant.....	August 29, 1862.....	Resigned Feb. 6, 1863.....
Joseph W. Barr.....	C. M.	B.§	2d Lieutenant.....	August 29, 1862.....
Florus D. Meacham.....	C. M.	B.§	2d Lieutenant.....	February 6, 1863.....	Mustered out July 10, 1865
James C. Sicular.....	C. M.	B.§	2d Lieutenant.....	April 8, 1864.....

*Bridges's Battery.

†New Company (Colvin's Battery).

‡Chicago Board of Trade Battery.

§Chicago Mercantile Battery.

A—WHITE OAK SQUARE.
B—CEMETERY.

C—HOSPITAL.
D—PARADE GROUND.

E—PRISON STOCKADE AND PRISONERS' QUARTERS.

VIEW OF CAMP DOUGLAS.

and fall about eight thousand paroled Federal troops, captured at Harper's Ferry and other places, arrived. General Tyler was placed in charge of this class on the last day of September, while Colonel Tucker remained in command of the Illinois volunteers and the prisoners of war.

The rule of General Tyler was exceedingly unpopular; and the paroled men, not knowing exactly how far they were amenable to military discipline under these new conditions, became almost ungovernable—their dissatisfaction culminating in attempts to burn the barracks and to escape. With the termination of General Tyler's rule, came the end of all mutinous efforts of this kind. Colonel Daniel Cameron, of the 65th Illinois, had charge of the paroled troops for some time after General Tyler's departure.

During the summer of 1862, quarters became overcrowded at the camp. Prisoners of war, paroled Federal soldiers, two three-months regiments (the 67th and 69th Illinois), which remained as guard until discharged, more than filled the original barracks; and as the Board of-Trade regiments, and Board-of-Trade and Mercantile batteries were organized in July, August and September, they were obliged to encamp on the prairie in the vicinity. So also, did the 89th, the 90th, and others, organized a little later. Temporary barracks were built on the old United States Fair Grounds, immediately west of the camp proper, for the use of a portion of the paroled troops. These were occupied by the 9th Vermont and the 127th New York, through the winter of 1862-63. The Federal regiments and batteries were all ordered to the field during the fall and winter of 1862, and on January 1, 1863, Colonel Tucker resigned, and Brigadier-General Ammon was assigned to the command of the camp. Almost simultaneously with the departure of the last Union troops, came a large assignment of Confederate prisoners, among whom were many of Morgan's and Hood's famous troopers. They were provided with good and abundant rations and skilled medical attendance; but the sudden change of climate in the most inclement season, and the defective sanitary arrangements, wrought a fatal work. Pneumonia and camp-fever carried off many victims, the deaths among the prisoners averaging about six a day. They were buried at the old cemetery on the lake shore,* about six miles from camp. By March or April, 1863, all the Confederate prisoners had been removed, except a few too ill to leave; most of the paroled troops had been discharged, and with their departure the camp was again nearly emptied, only the 9th Vermont and Cos. "F" and "H" of the 65th regiment (paroled troops) remaining.

It has been estimated that about thirty thousand troops had been recruited, drilled and equipped at Camp Douglas, up to 1863. Prior to its establishment, the 19th Infantry had encamped and been mustered into service at Camp Long, Cottage Grove, the 23d at "Fontenoy Barracks" (Kane's Brewery), the 24th at Camp Robert Blum, Cottage Grove, the 37th at Wright's Grove, North Side, the 44th at Camp Ellsworth, and the Sturges Rifles at their camp, also on Cottage Grove Avenue. Several regiments, as before stated, were concentrated at the new camp, immediately on its organization, but the 42d Illinois, was the first infantry regiment mustered into service there, September 17, 1861. Succeeding this, were the 9th Cavalry (Brackett's, the first Cavalry regiment), October 26, 1861; Waterhouse's ("E," 1st Illinois Light Artillery, the first battery), December 19, 1861.

* In the possession of the Chicago Historical Society is a complete list of the Confederates who died at Camp Douglas.

The following are the Illinois military organizations mustered into service at Camp Douglas, given in the order of their muster: 42d Infantry, 9th Cavalry, 55th, 39th, 45th and 51st Infantry, Waterhouse's battery, the 57th and 58th Infantry (all mustered-in before the close of 1861). Bouton's, Bolton's and Silversparre's batteries, 23d Infantry (reorganized), Rourke's battery, 12th Cavalry, 13th Cavalry, Phillips's battery, 65th, 67th, 69th, 71st and 72d Infantry, Board-of-Trade Battery, 88th and 89th Infantry, Mercantile and Cogswell's batteries, 90th, 93d, 105th, 113th, 126th and 127th Infantry. The 126th, the last to leave the camp, departed for the field November 21, 1862.

Besides serving as a rendezvous and camp of instruction for these Illinois troops, Camp Douglas, had, as related, served as a military prison for about seventeen thousand Confederate prisoners, and furnished barracks for nearly eight thousand paroled Federal troops. In the summer of 1863, Brigadier-General Ammon was assigned to duty at Springfield, and Colonel C. V. DeLand of the 1st Michigan Sharpshooters, whose regiment had been recently quartered at the camp, succeeded him as post commandant, and proved a most popular and efficient officer. At about the commencement of his administration, the camp was again filled with Confederate prisoners. These he set to work on the premises. A fence was built around the entire camp, and, before the close of the year, pipes and sewers were laid, many new buildings erected, hospital accommodations increased, and various other improvements made. The fence was about twelve feet high, with a narrow platform, some four feet from the top, for the use of the sentries. During the year, the long line of barracks on the north of the camp was destroyed by fire, and new barracks for nine hundred men erected. Dr. Arvin F. Whelan of the 1st Michigan Sharpshooters served as post surgeon, and it was under his direct supervision that the hospitals were improved during that year.

It was in the latter part of 1863 (November) that the "gophers" engaged in their extensive operations. This name was applied to the Confederate prisoners who attempted to escape by burrowing out. Their method of procedure was to remove the boards of the floor in their barracks, dig down a few feet, and burrow along under the fence until they reached the outside. Generally ten or twenty shared the secret. When the tunnel was completed, a number would crawl in, and when the first reached the outer extremity he would raise his head, gopher-like, and watch for the sentinel. As soon as the sentinel passed the spot, the first would crawl out and run, then another and another would follow, until the guard again appeared. During November, 1863, some seventy prisoners made their escape in this way—the tunnel through which they crawled was over fifty feet in length—about fifty of whom were re-captured the same month. On December 25, 1863, Brigadier-General William W. Orme, formerly colonel of the 94th Illinois, was appointed post commandant. Colonel DeLand remained, however, in actual charge of the camp for some time after General Orme's appointment. During December, the 9th Vermont was ordered to Newbern, N. C., and the two companies of the 65th Illinois received orders to join the balance of their regiment at Knoxville, Tenn. Lieutenant-Colonel O. L. Mann was ordered to Camp Douglas, with the 39th Illinois, on recruiting service, remaining until the following spring.

During the latter part of the year, the 8th and 15th regiments of the Veteran Reserve Corps, each four companies strong, under Colonels B. J. Sweet and J. C. Strong, were ordered to the camp as a portion of its garrison, and these, with the Michigan Sharpshooters, constituted the entire garrison at the close of the year, about one thousand eight hundred in all. The number of prisoners was then five thousand six hundred and sixty. When General Orme was appointed commandant, Captain Hudson Burr was assigned to duty as assistant adjutant-general, and Colonel Clarke to the charge of the new commissary department, from which supplies were furnished direct by Government instead of by contractors as before. General Orme remained in command of Camp Douglas until May 2, 1864, when he resigned and was succeeded by Colonel Benjamin J. Sweet of the 8th Veteran Reserve Corps. Captain Joseph M. Barr, of Co. "B," 8th Regiment, V. R. C., was appointed post adjutant-general. Until July, Colonel Sweet had his headquarters in the city; Colonel James C. Strong, of the 15th V. R. C., being acting post commandant. During June the prisoners' barracks were raised four feet from the ground, and arranged in streets, to prevent the escape of prisoners by tunneling. Late in the year, the "Prison Square," covering about twenty acres, was inclosed by a high board fence like that around the camp, the parapet for the sentinels being on the outside, about three feet from the top. There were in this inclosure some forty or fifty barracks. The garrison occupied "Yankee Barracks" in "Garrison Square." Several buildings were moved from the west side of the parade grounds to the southeast corner, near headquarters, and fitted up for officers' quarters. In July, Colonel Sweet removed his headquarters to the camp and assumed personal command. Many improvements were made at headquarters, and the company barracks were largely increased in number. Warehouses were erected in various parts of the grounds for the use of the quartermaster, commissary and other departments. Additional hospitals were built, guard-houses increased in number, and the camp placed in as good a condition as possible. During the year, about seven thousand five hundred prisoners were added to the five thousand six hundred and sixty in camp at its opening. Small-pox and other diseases made serious ravages in their ranks—one thousand one hundred and fifty-six dying during 1864.

From the time of the departure of the Michigan Sharpshooters, early in 1864, until August of the same year, Camp Douglas was guarded by ten or twelve companies of the 8th and 15th regiments of the Veteran Reserve Corps—numbering in all a little over one thousand men. In August the garrison was reinforced by the 106th Pennsylvania Infantry and the 24th Ohio Battery. The Pennsylvania Infantry left camp in October, its term of service having expired, and during the following month, the excitement in regard to the so-called Chicago Conspiracy culminated. This conspiracy, of which a more detailed account is elsewhere given, it was believed, was for the purpose of liberating the prisoners at Camp Douglas and raising an insurrection in the States of Illinois and Indiana against the Government of the United States. The whole number of prisoners in the camp at that time was eight thousand three hundred and fifty-two; the total strength of the garrison, including the 24th Ohio Battery, was seven hundred and ninety-six men and the guns of that single battery.

The cost of buildings erected in camp during 1864 was estimated at $375,000—of which the rebuilding of barracks was $52,000; fences, sewers, etc., $182,000; improvements in Prison Square, $61,000; new buildings, $80,000. The daily expenses of camp, aside from officers' and soldiers' pay, were $8,540.

Of the Federal troops, four thousand seven hundred and ninety-three were treated in the various hospitals during the year; total number of deaths sixty-five; on sick list at close of year, one thousand four hundred. Total number of garrison, two thousand one hundred and thirty-four.

Of the prisoners, one hundred and sixty-five had been released on taking the oath of allegiance and for other causes; one thousand one hundred and fifty-six had died; twenty-one thousand and thirty-seven cases of disease had been treated in hospital. At the opening of 1865, there still remained in the camp eleven thousand seven hundred and eighty prisoners.

The fall of Richmond, in the spring of 1865, and the subsequent collapse of the Rebellion, although not immediately causing the evacuation of Camp Douglas as a military post, abolished the necessity for its existence. In a very short time after peace had been established, the return of Confederate regiments to their homes commenced. In February, one hundred and seventy-eight were released, on taking the oath of allegiance. Soon after, Mrs. Sarah B. Walker, a Southern lady, was appointed agent by friends of the prisoners for distributing goods to those in camp. All those prisoners who applied to take the oath of allegiance before the fall of Richmond, were released on the surrender of Lee. These were nearly all forwarded to their homes during May. In June, five thousand were released on taking the oath, and by the beginning of August all had left, except about two hundred, many of whom were too ill to be removed. Colonel Sweet resigned in the early summer; and the 8th and 15th regiments V. R. C., 48th Missouri, and the 24th Ohio Battery departed soon after June. Captain Edward R. P. Shurly, of the 8th V. R. C., was placed in command of the camp; a few members of the Reserve Corps remaining to guard the Government property. The grounds served for a few months longer as a rendezvous for regiments of Union troops returning from the field, and was then almost utterly deserted. Captain Shurly remained in command until October, when he was ordered to Detroit, as acting inspector-general of the Department of the Ohio, and Captain E. C. Phetplace then took charge until the property was sold, during the following month. The sale commenced on November 24, and continued until all the Government property was disposed of. The old City Hospital, which had been used by Government, was taken possession of by County authorities, to be used again as a City Hospital; the barracks were pulled down and the lumber sold; the Soldier's Rest and all buildings at Camp Douglas, one hundred and fifty-eight in all, including headquarters, officers' quarters, offices, hospitals, guard houses, quartermaster's and commissary's warehouses, etc., were all disposed of to the highest bidder; the fences were also sold for what the lumber would bring; and Camp Douglas thenceforth ceased to exist, except as a memory, and that is now fast fading from the minds of the citizens of Chicago.

STEPHEN ARNOLD DOUGLAS.—This statesman, whose name is indissolubly linked with the history of Illinois, was born in Brandon, Vt., on April 23, 1813. His ancestry sprang from the Puritan stock, which has furnished, through so many generations, many of the noblest names which have illumined the pages of our national history. His father had removed to Brandon from Central New York, and died within two months after young Douglas's birth, leaving the mother in circumstances so straitened that it was impossible for her to keep her children together. Stephen took up his residence with his maternal uncle. His first wish was to obtain a collegiate education; but, after attending the district schools of his native village until he had reached the age of fifteen years, he found it impossible to pursue his studies further, owing to the limited resources of his uncle. The acquisition of a mechanical trade being the only apparent alternative resource open to him, he was apprenticed to a cabinetmaker.

STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.

Owing to failing health, confinement at the bench proved to sever a strain upon his constitution, and Douglas resumed his studies. He had already mastered the somewhat limited course afforded by the New England district schools of those early days, and on quitting the shop he entered Brandon Academy, in which he remained a pupil for one year. At the expiration of that period, his mother having re-married, he removed with her to Canandaigua, N. Y. There he resumed his academic studies, and having chosen the profession of the law as his vocation, he at the same time entered the office of Hubbell Brothers as a clerk.

In 1833, when not yet twenty-one years old, he decided that the West offered the broadest field for the exercise of his talents, and accordingly started on a tour in quest of a location. Passing through Cleveland and Cincinnati, he crossed the State line of Illinois, and found himself in the obscure village of Winchester, rich in the courage that springs from undaunted energy, but poor in purse. His entire capital, at that time, consisted of his somewhat scanty wardrobe and thirty-seven and one-half cents in cash. Necessity compelled him to seek employment of some sort, however temporary. He entered upon the career, whose termination neither he nor his employer could foresee, as an auctioneer's clerk, at a rate of compensation almost nominal. The educational facilities of Winchester being of the most limited description, it occurred to Mr. Douglas that a private school, well conducted, might prove not only a source of benefit to the citizens, but of profit to himself. Acting upon the idea, he opened a school, and the income derived from this source enabled him to prosecute his legal studies to completion, and, in 1834, he obtained from the Supreme Court the completed certificate, entitling him to practice.

In 1835, at the age of twenty-two, with a professional experience of barely one year, his talents and perseverance secured public recognition in his election, by the Legislature, to the office of attorney-general. Finding the fascination of an active political life stronger than the attractions of professional pursuits, he resigned the office of attorney-general, and, in 1836, was elected to a seat in the Legislature. In 1837, he was appointed, by President VanBuren, Register of the Land Office, at Springfield. In 1838, he made his first contest for an election to Congress. He received a majority of the votes cast, but the canvassing board, displaying a familiarity with partisan devices hardly to be expected in those days, discovered that a number of ballots bearing his name were incorrectly spelled, sufficient to justify them in reversing his (apparent) majority, and they gave their certificate to his opponent.

In 1840, he was appointed Secretary of State of Illinois, and in 1841, was elected judge of the Supreme Court. But Judge Douglas soon wearied of the routine duties that attach to judicial honors. In 1843, he resigned his seat upon the bench, and, after a heated contest, was elected to Congress by a majority of four hundred votes, which even the ingenuity of a politically hostile board of canvassers could not overturn. In 1844, he secured a re-election by a majority of one thousand nine hundred, and, in 1846, was triumphantly returned by a majority of three thousand.

On the floor of Congress he found an ample, as well as a congenial, field for the exercise of his abilities, both oratorical and polemical. At the outset of his first term, he was recognized as an earnest and able champion of the doctrine of State supremacy in local affairs, as opposed to National intervention. His first speech was delivered on December 10, 1843, and was devoted to a discussion of the bill appropriating money for the improvement of western lakes and rivers. He denied the right of the Federal Government to interfere in such matters, and advocated a system of tonnage charges, to be levied by the States, who, he claimed, should also have charge of the disbursement of the revenue arising therefrom. Among the more prominent acts of his early Congressional career, may be mentioned his advocacy of the law extending the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts over the great northern lakes, and it is not too much to say that he was mainly instrumental in securing its passage. He was always a warm admirer of and devoted adherent to General Jackson. It will not be forgotten that, previous to Judge Douglas's election to Congress, that body imposed a fine upon the old hero of the war of 1812 for his declaration of martial law in New Orleans. In 1844, a bill was introduced in Congress providing for the refunding of the fine and a brilliant forensic effort by Judge Douglas, in its support, was one of the noteworthy features of the debate upon its passage. General Jackson was so pleased with the speech, that he left with his literary executor, a printed copy, bearing this indorsement: "This speech constitutes my defense; I lay it aside as an inheritance for my grandchildren." The measure was finally passed; the vote in the Senate standing twenty-eight to twenty-two (a strictly party vote), but in the House the record showed one hundred and fifty-eight to twenty-eight in favor of the refunding. The original fine imposed had been $1,000; the amount returned to General Jackson—which, of course, included interest on the original payment by him—reached nearly $2,700.

As regards the foreign policy of the government, Judge Douglas's views were inclined to be aggressively American; his opposition to any compromise of the Oregon boundary question being as pronounced as was his support of the Mexican war.

Before the meeting of Congress in 1846, to which body he had been elected representative by so decided a majority, he was chosen United States Senator, and took his seat in the Senate in March, 1847, remaining a member of that body until his death.

On April 7 of that year, he was married to Miss Martha D. Martin, of Rockingham County, N. C. Two sons and one daughter were the issue of this marriage. His daughter died in infancy, and his wife followed her on June 6, 1853. On November 20, 1856, Senator Douglas married again, his second wife being Miss Adele Cutts, of Washington, D. C., the daughter of J. N. Cutts, then second comptroller of the Treasury. She bore him a daughter, who only lived but a short time.

One of his first prominent acts as senator was the introduction of a bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through public lands, with the title to alternate sections of the same along the route of railroads actually constructed. The passage of this measure—out of which grew the Illinois Central Railroad—was due mainly to his eloquent championship and skillful management.

His attitude toward slavery, and the various measures introduced in Congress for its extension or regulation, particularly the Missouri Compromise and the Fugitive Slave Law, excited much hostile criticism from a very large section of his constituents. At a public meeting held in Chicago, resolutions denouncing his course were adopted, while the City Council formally directed the police not to obey the law commanding the return of fugitive slaves. On the return of Senator Douglas to Chicago, in 1850, he immediately called a public meeting, at which he defended his course with such courage and ability, that resolutions were adopted indorsing him, and condemning the action of the Council. But he was destined once more to arouse the hostility of Chicago. In 1854, his advocacy of the measure known as the Nebraska bill, drew down upon him the denunciations of the Tribune, Democrat, Journal, and Press. Once more did Senator Douglas return to this city, hoping again to obtain a reversal of the popular judgment. On his arrival, he attempted to deliver an address in front of North Market Hall, but his critics were present in force, and after a struggle between his friends and his opponents, lasting nearly four hours, he was compelled to retire without being able to make himself heard.

Senator Douglas's political enemies, however, were not all found among the anti-slavery ranks. He had aroused the animosity of President Buchanan, by opposition to certain measures in which the President was deeply interested, and in 1858, a coalition was made between the friends of Buchanan and the abolitionists, the object of which, was, to defeat Senator Douglas's re-election, and return Abraham Lincoln as his successor to the Senate. The struggle was fierce and exciting, but in the end the coalition proved fruitless, and Douglas was re-elected by a majority of eight.

In 1858, speaking from his place on the floor of the Senate, Douglas denounced, in scathing terms, the Harper's Ferry insurrection, and charged the Republican party with having abetted, if not instigated it. This was his last public utterance of sympathy with his old pro-slavery allies. When the cloud of secession first appeared on the political horizon, Senator Douglas was one of the first to see and prepare to avert the coming storm. With the same fearlessness with which he had, from conviction, espoused the cause of the legal rights of the slaveholders, he now came to the support of the Government, allegiance to which he declared to be paramount. From the moment when boomed the first gun that consummated South Carolina's treason, to the hour of his premature death, he gave to the Federal Government all that he had, of time, of strength, and of devotion. His support of the administration was hearty and sincere, and Abraham Lincoln, his old time antagonist on so many political and forensic fields, soon learned to trust, as a friend and counselor, the man whom he had long since learned to respect as a foe.

Of the efforts of Douglas's admirers and friends to elevate him to the presidency, little need be said. He first appeared as a candidate for the Democratic nomination in 1852, receiving ninety-two votes in the national convention of that year. In 1856, his name was again presented, and his vote reached one hundred and twenty-one; but he having declined to make further contest, his name was withdrawn, and the nomination given to Buchanan. In 1860, during the stormy scenes of the Charleston convention, he was again a prominent candidate, and, after that body had become divided, through internal dissensions, the faction which re-assembled in Baltimore nominated Douglas on the second ballot, he having received one hundred and eighty and one-half votes out of one hundred and ninety-four and one-half votes cast. His vote in the electoral college of that year was insignificant, but his popular vote was second only to that of Mr. Lincoln.

On May 1, 1861, he returned from Washington to Chicago, which city he was destined never again to leave. His patriotic devotion to the Union and the Government had obliterated from the minds of men, the memories of their past differences, and all parties united in making his return the occasion of an ovation. A committee met him at Joliet, and an immense throng greeted him on his arrival in this city. A salute of thirty-four guns was fired as he was escorted to the old Wigwam, which had been re-christened National Hall, where he addressed an audience numbering over ten thousand, on the issues of the day. This was his last public address. The malady from which he had long been suffering—acute rheumatism—shortly thereafter assumed a typhoid type; blood poisoning ensued; and in ten minutes past nine o'clock, on the morning of June 3, 1861, the spirit of Stephen A. Douglas took its flight.

His suffering had been great, although during the latter part of his illness he was almost constantly delirious. At one time, when his mind was unclouded, his wife, tearfully bending over him, asked if he had any message for his sons; his answer was, "Tell my children to obey the laws and uphold the Constitution."

On the day following his death, his body was removed to Bryan Hall, where it lay in state, in care of a Masonic guard of honor, until the day of the funeral. More than fifty thousand people visited the remains of the dead statesman during the days that intervened; and on the evening preceding the funeral, the solemn rites of the Masonic fraternity were performed.

It had been the original wish of Mrs. Douglas, that her husband should be buried in the Congressional Cemetery at Washington, and an appropriation of $2,000 had been made by the Common Council to defray the attendant expense. Subsequently, however, the Council, with committees of the citizens of Chicago and of the whole State, united in requesting Mrs. Douglas to allow her husband's body to find its last resting place within the State on whose name he had shed new lustre. Her consent having been obtained, preparations were made to inter the remains of the late senator in a temporary tomb upon his former estate at Cottage Grove.

The entire city mourned, and emblems of grief were profusely displayed. The Mayor, by proclamation, requested the general suspension of business on the day of the funeral, and a similar request was formally adopted by the Board of Trade and other prominent organizations. At ten o'clock, on the morning of June 7, the body was carried through the doorway of Bryan Hall, and placed upon the funeral car which had been prepared for it. The streets through which the procession passed, were thronged with people, many of whom wore badges of crape. The route of the cortege was through Lake Street, Michigan Avenue, Kinggold Place and Cottage Grove Avenue, the distance traversed being about three miles. During its progress, the bells of the churches were tolled, and deep-voiced cannon boomed at Dearborn Park and at the station of the Illinois Central Railroad. The procession moved in ten divisions. The chief marshal was Colonel J. H. Tucker, who was assisted by the following staff: Major G. E. Stanton, David A. Gage, J. M. W. Jones and James Clapp. Major E. W. Hadley was marshal of the bands. The marshals of the various divisions were Colonel H. D. Booth, John H. Kinzie, S. A. Goodwin, Colonel G. S. Hubbard, J. H. Bowen, C. N. Holden, David Walsh, W. T. Shufeldt, Colonel William S. Johnson, A. H. Burley. The military escort was under command of General R. K. Swift, and consisted of the following companies: Hecker Jaeger Regiment, Irish Brigade; Co. "C," 60th Regiment, I. V. M.; Hoffman Dragoons; German Rifles; Bryan Light Guard; Youths' Zouave Corps; Ogden Light Infantry; Home Guards; Anderson Rifles; Scammon Light Infantry; First Ward Home Guards; Cos. "A," "B" and "D" of the Chicago Zouaves; and the Sturges Rifles. Following the military companies, but preceded by the clergy and attendant physicians, came the funeral car, by the side of which walked the pall-bearers, with the Chicago Light Guard as a guard of honor. The car was followed by United States Senators and Representatives, the governors of Illinois and other States, State officers of Illinois and other States, members of state legislatures, members of the county and city governments, judges of United States and State courts, members of the Bar, representatives of foreign governments, United States officials, members of the county and city governments, representatives of the learned professions, delegations from other States and cities, various benevolent, religious and civil societies, and citizens and strangers, generally, walking twelve abreast and wearing badges of mourning.

A vast concourse had assembled near the place of interment—a grave dug on the spot which had once been chosen by Senator Douglas as a site for his future home. Around the grave was a guard of honor selected from among the students of the University, whose warm friend and liberal benefactor he had been in life.

No religious services were held at the tomb, but a eulogy was pronounced by Rt. Rev. James Duggan, Catholic Bishop of the diocese of Chicago, one of the dead senator's warmest personal friends.

An area of sixteen feet square around the grave was enclosed by a rough board fence, which was afterward replaced by one erected by the City Council. The tomb, however, received no public care, nor was any step taken in this direction until the following October, when the first meeting of citizens to devise a method of erecting a suitable monument was held in the parlors of the Tremont House. At this gathering it was resolved to solicit subscriptions, not exceeding one dollar, to an amount not less than $300,000 nor more than $150,000. Committees were appointed, and the work of solicitation was begun. In November, a permanent organization was effected under the name of the Douglas Monument Association, the government being in the hands of a board of eighteen trustees. In February, 1863, the association was legally incorporated by act of the Legislature. The work of collecting funds progressed but slowly, and it was not until January, 1864, that the board of trustees felt justified in advertising for designs for the proposed monument. The limit which they placed upon its cost was $50,000, and the honorarium to competitors was $75. The successful competitor was Leonard W. Volk, the sculptor, who brought to his work, not only the skill which had even then gained him fame, but the living interest which sprang from a long and warm friendship for Douglas, whose connection, through marriage, he was. The trustees had, in 1863, petitioned the Legislature for an appropriation of $25,000, for the purchase of land, and $50,000 toward the completion of the monument. Eventually, the entire cost of both ground and monument ($96,350) was borne by the State, with the exception of $3,925, contributed by private individuals, and $3,000, derived from the sale of two lots donated to the association by the mother and sister of Senator Douglas. The land around the monument was purchased from Mrs. Douglas for $28,000, the $3,000 received from the senator's mother and sister being included in this amount. The boundaries of this land are as follows: On the north, two hundred and sixty feet, Woodlawn Park; on the east, three hundred feet, Illinois Central Railroad and Lake Michigan; on the south, four hundred and two feet, Douglas Avenue (or Thirty-fifth Street); on the west, two hundred and sixty-six feet, an alley.

On September 6, 1866, the corner stone of the monument was laid. President Johnson, Secretaries Seward and Welles, Generals Grant and Meade, Admirals Farragut and Radford, and many other distinguished guests arrived the preceding day to assist in the ceremonies, which were conducted by the Masonic fraternity. It was estimated that between seventy-five thousand and one hundred thousand strangers were in the city. The public offices, Board of Trade, banks and wholesale houses generally were closed. The procession, composed of the city authorities, military and civil organizations, invited guests and citizens generally, in carriages and on foot, formed in six divisions on Clark and Lake streets, and proceeded to the monument grounds. After the conclusion of the Masonic ceremonies, prayer was offered by the Rev. William H. Milburn, after which the orator of the day, General John A. Dix, addressed the assemblage. Brief speeches were made by President Johnson and Secretary Seward; General Grant and Admiral Farragut were introduced and warmly greeted, and the exercises were at an end. At each corner of the grave had been placed a column, twelve feet high, from which sprang arches, thirty-four feet high, crossing in the center. The space within was strewn with wild flowers, and the columns and arches draped in mourning, with festoons of flags. At the head of the grave were placed, on pedestals, a bust of Douglas and a model of the monument.

On June 3, 1865, the seventh anniversary of his death, the body of Douglas was taken from the grave and deposited in the marble sarcophagus in the center of the tomb. The students of the University acted as a guard of honor. The ceremonies attending the removal were appropriate, though not elaborate. For a few days, the public were permitted to view the once more familiar face of the dead leader through the glass cover of the casket. The features were lifelike—"decay's effacing fingers" had not marred their lines of rugged symmetry, and their expression was that of peaceful rest. It was not until July 17, 1878, however, that the Douglas monument was informally unveiled, with no other ceremony than a brief address by Judge J. D. Catton, president of the Association.

In Volume I. was published an article, which appeared in the Chicago Times of August 19, 1877, purporting to be a correct account of the exciting scene at North Market Hall, on the occasion of Senator Douglas's return to Chicago, in the autumn of 1854, to which allusion is made in the foregoing sketch.

As there has been much discussion as to what actually occurred, the conflicting accounts being either colored by the sympathies or distorted by the prejudices of the narrators, it is deemed simple justice to publish in full another version of the affair, contained in an article written by ex-Lieutenant Governor Bross, which appeared in the Chicago Tribune of August 25, 1877. Governor Bross was, in 1854, one of the editors of the Chicago Democratic Press, and though bitterly opposed to Douglas's course on the question of the extension and perpetuation of slavery, he was exceedingly desirous that the senator should have ample opportunity to give his views to the public.

"Mayor Milliken, who presided at the meeting,—it was published on Monday, Sept. 4,—said to us that the efforts we had made to allay excitement, to preserve the peace of the city, and to save its reputation from the disgrace of mobocracy, met his unqualified approbation, and that of all the papers of the city no one was so deserving of the approbation of the law-and-order loving citizens, as the Democratic Press.

"When Senator Douglas came home, sometime in August, his few faithful friends rallied around him, and, after much caucusing, the time for his great speech was fixed for the evening of the 1st of September, at the North Market Hall. Three or four days before the meeting I called upon him at the Tremont House, and requested him to write out a copy of his speech for me, and I would publish it in full. Though the press had persistently opposed, and perhaps denounced him bitterly at times, he received me with great courtesy and politeness,—he was too good a politician and too thoroughly a gentleman to do otherwise,—thanked me for my offer, but said he never wrote out his speeches before delivery. He let the reporters write them out, and then corrected them where necessary.

"On Tuesday morning before the meeting I published a statement of the programme of the Democracy, and told our liberty-loving citizens how to prevent its accomplishment. It was determined by the Democracy to fill North Market Hall at an early hour with the rabble, thus preventing other people from gaining admittance, pass resolutions strongly indorsing the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and Senator Douglas, and have that go out as the opinion of the people of Chicago. The substantial and order-loving people were urged to turn out early, and thus defeat the schemes of the political tricksters. Mr. Douglas's friends, knowing that this advice would be strictly followed, changed their plan, and built a platform in front of the south door of the North Market Hall. The meeting was an immense one, perhaps the largest up to that evening ever held in the city. We then had no shorthand reporters here, and, unwilling to trust any one else,—as only anxious to give as correct a version of the speech as possible,—I went there myself to report it. I was at once invited upon the stage, perhaps by Mayor Milliken, who presided, and, receiving a pleasant greeting from Senator Douglas, I sat down and composed myself for the work before me. The very first sentence he uttered was considered an insult to the people and the press of the city. He charged them with not understanding so plain a proposition as the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and the press with persistently misrepresenting and maligning him. The statement was received with groans and hisses, and for perhaps two or three minutes nothing else could be heard. When comparative quiet was restored, he spoke for perhaps eight or ten minutes, and then the laughing and hooting were repeated. This thoroughly enraged the senator, and his language and manner became exceedingly offensive. Finding no use for my pencil during the uproar, I slipped down from the stage and circulated among the people, to see in what temper they were. This I did several times, and always found them happy and in the best possible humor. Never before or since have I seen a larger proportion of our solid, substantial, leading citizens at a public meeting. I knew as well as I could know without being told it, there were more than a thousand revolvers in the crowd. All would laughingly tell me, 'Bross, we shall have no mob.' And yet I feared it, for had some Democrat told one of our respectable citizens he lied, he would have been instantly knocked down; and when once a fuss began the pistols would have done their work fearfully. I knew that the human mind is so constituted that the change from the best of humor to the most intense anger requires but an instant. Little did I suppose that I was so soon to illustrate this principle myself, for on returning from one of my short visits through the crowd, and while the hooting and yelling were loud and long, Judge Douglas turned round, and paused for a moment. Knowing he could not and would not be heard, with the best of motives and the politest and most pleasant language I could command, I said, 'Judge, would it not be best to prinit your speech? You can not be heard, allow me to suggest that you retire.' With all the force and power he could command, he said: 'Mr. Bross, you see that your efforts in the Democratic Press to get up an armed mob to put me down have been entirely successful.' In an instant, I sprang to my feet and with very emphatic gesture, said: 'Judge Douglas, that's false—every word of it false, sir!' 'It will do very well, sir,' he replied, 'for you with your armed mob about you to make an assertion like that.' 'It's false, sir—not a word of truth in it,' I replied, and, a little quiet being restored, he turned to address the people.

"I have often wondered at myself for the part I acted in this little drama. There was not more than one or two besides myself on the stage who were not the warm personal friends of Judge Douglas, and to hurl the word 'false' at him might have cost me my life; but I knew I had done all I could to give him a quiet hearing, and I took not a moment's thought, and repelled the charge on the spot. After continuing his efforts to be heard perhaps for half an hour longer, with no success, his friends put him in a carriage, and he rode away amid the jeers of the crowd.

"The question recurs, Was there a mob on the evening of the 1st of September, 1854, to prevent Judge Douglas from making a speech on his Kansas-Nebraska bill—otherwise, his repeal of the Missouri Compromise? If you define a mob to be an angry crowd of men, who use missiles, or destroy property, maim and injure their opponents, perhaps kill them, then I assert positively that there was no mob in Chicago on that evening, and thousands of our citizens who were there, will cordially indorse what I say on the subject. There was not a rotten egg, a rotten apple, or anything else whatever, thrown at any one on the stage during the entire meeting. I was there during the whole time till Douglas left, except a minute or two, as above stated, when I was circulating among the people to see if they were in good humor. Had any missiles been thrown, I certainly would have known it. The truth is, I don't believe there was an angry man there from the commencement to the close of the meeting, except Judge Douglas, a few of his friends, and myself, when we had the little tilt, which I have described precisely as it occurred. These being the facts, I submit, as I then stated again and again in the columns of the Democratic Press, that Chicago did not mob Judge Douglas; that the people were noisy and refused to hear him, thereby resenting the imputations he cast upon them, nobody ever denied. Mr. Douglas was more to blame for what occurred than any and all others. He had, as great men often do, lost his balance, and forgot that he was the representative of the people. After referring to this, I published an article on Monday, from which the following sentences are taken:

"Mr. Douglas came before his constituents—those who had made him; who had entrusted to him the execution of certain duties—rather as a master than a servant. The spirit of a dictator flashed out from his eyes, curled upon his lip, and mingled its cold irony in every tone of his voice and every gesture of his body. His manner, as well as his language, furnished a practical illustration of the possibility of reversing the natural order of master and servant, of representative and constituent, in a free government. The Czar of Russia could not have exhibited a more domineering and intolerant spirit than he.*

"Perhaps I may be pardoned for adding, in this connection, that Judge Douglas and I did not speak to each other for some four years, though we often met at parties and celebrations. For my part, I bore him no personal grudge, but I did not know how any advances on my part would be received. But he was in the end himself forced to break with the Southern wing of the Democratic party, who were determined, at all hazards, to force slavery upon Kansas. He made his great speech on the Leocompton Constitution—one of the grandest efforts of his life, for he was then fighting boldly and bravely for the right of the people to govern themselves—on the 22d of March, 1858. The Democratic Press published considerable portions of it, and commended him highly for the gallant fight and the grand patriotic sentiments it contained. When he came home in the fall, we met at the celebration of the native Pennsylvanians. I was standing in the lobby of the Tremont House talking to three or four friends, not knowing that Senator Douglas was in the house. Coming up from behind me, he called me by name, and we greeted each other most cordially, neither of us referring to the past; and ever after we were personal friends. Of course he remained a Democrat and I a Republican, but that did not interfere with the pleasant relations that existed between us. When he made his patriotic speech in Springfield, in 1861, wherein he declared that, in the contest then raging, there could be but two parties, patriots and traitors, from my heart I thought the nation ought to forgive him for all the errors of the past—I certainly did.

"Subsequently he arrived in Chicago on the evening of the 1st of May, and was accorded a grand reception from our citizens by all parties. He was welcomed on the part of the people by the Hon. Thomas B. Bryan, and, in response, repeated the substance of his Springfield speech. The following is a part of his exact language:

"But this is no time for a detail of causes. Armies have been raised, war is levied, to accomplish it. There are only two sides to the question. Every man must be for the United States or against it. There can be no neutrals in this war, —only patriots or traitors. Thank God, Illinois is not divided on this question."

"Now, as to the so-called mob and my relations with the late Senator Douglas. When Mr. Scripps and I established the Democratic Press, issuing the first number September 16, 1852, it was generally supposed that Judge Douglas had either loaned us money or had an interest in the concern. Neither was true. But both our principles, and as we thought our interest, led us to side with the conservative wing of the Democratic party. John Wentworth's Democrat affected strong Abolition tendencies, and we were therefore right, certainly as a business venture, in the course we adopted. As far as a thoroughly independent journal properly could do so, we favored the policy and the measures of Judge Douglas, quoting his speeches and keeping his name prominently before the people. In the session of 1853-54, he brought in a bill for the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. We then thought it the mistake of his life, and I still believe that so history will record it. His speech on the bill convinced us that the Democratic Press and Senator Douglas must part company, and, after considering the matter for a week or two, Mr. Scripps wrote a scorching article, condemning the repeal, quoting Judge Douglas in 1848 against the senator in 1854. The article created a great sensation, and, coming from a paper that had been his strong supporter, probably did him more harm than all the denunciations of the opposition. As a reason for my using the personal pronoun frequently in what follows, it should be stated that the canvass became very active and exacting, and, as a consequence, the health of Mr. Scripps, never a strong man, gave way in the latter part of July or early in August, and he did not write a line for the paper, and was scarcely ever at the office, till some weeks after the election, in November. Of course I had the entire charge of the paper.

"In the summer of 1854, the 'Know-Nothing' excitement raged throughout the city and country, and it was pitted against Judge Douglas and other leading Democratic politicians, as deriving their strength and support largely from our foreign-born population. The Know-Nothings were composed mainly of the very best portions of our American-born people, and were not the men to take the law into their own hands, unless to defend themselves from the attacks of the rabble. Mr. Scripps and myself were not Know-Nothings. During the early weeks of Mr. Scripps's sickness, I wrote two or three articles, which, without attacking them by name, showed the fallacy of their principles, and really took the foundation stones out of their entire structure. Our friends in the Order said to me, 'You are now on the record; this thing we know can not last; but you will find it to your interest to let it grow and die in its own good time'; and we did so. They told us all that it was necessary for us to know in regard to their movements, and, as Mr. Douglas's meeting approached, they assured us there would be no mob. In the meantime, the Democratic Press used all the influence it could command to prevent one. On the morning of the meeting we said:

"By some means or other the impression has been created abroad that some indignity would be offered to Judge Douglas in the event of his attempting to speak here. We have branded the prediction as a slander upon the good name of our citizens, and we call upon them to vindicate us in that matter by their conduct to-night. Any attempt to interrupt the prescribed course of the meeting would injure the cause it might be designed to promote, as well as leave an indelible stigma upon our city which many long years could not eradicate."

"My last interview with Judge Douglas affords me one of the most pleasant memories of my life, though mingled with a deep tinge of sadness. For some reason, I could not attend and hear his speech on the evening of the 1st. The next day was most beautiful, and, when at home at noon for lunch, I read a most interesting article on the Contrabandists of Spain. On my way to the office, passing McNally's news room, on Dearborn Street, I saw in the window a very striking picture of the Contrabandista, all mounted on mules, with paniers and gay trappings, and the men dressed in bright, gaudy colors—the whole caravan winding up the trail on one of the sea-coast mountains of Spain. It attracted my attention, and I stood for some time gazing at it. Presently I was startled from my reverie by a pleasant pat upon the shoulder, with the remark, 'See here, old fellow, you better not turn your back on me.' 'Beg your pardon, Judge Douglas, I did not know you were within a mile of me,' I replied. We had a most pleasant chat, for perhaps four or five minutes, when he and his friend, Dan McIlroy, passed in, and I went on to the office, musing sadly, for I was sure, from his appearance and what he told me of the state of his health, that his days were numbered.

"He died on the 3d of June, 1861.

"The legislative session of 1865 will ever be memorable in the history of the State. Among other notable acts, the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery in all the States and Territories of the Union, was adopted Feb. 1, placing Illinois at the head of all the States. On the 4th of February, the infamous black-laws—a foul disgrace to the State and to humanity—were repealed. And a bill was passed and approved Feb. 16, appropriating $25,000 to purchase the ground for the State where rest the honored remains of one of her noblest and greatest sons—Stephen A. Douglas. Surely the man who helped to pass, and signed these and many other most important bills, during that session, should feel grateful to the people who gave him that privilege. I certainly know one who does so with all the intensity of his nature. As that Legislature was largely Republican, and the State officers were elected by more than 30,000 majority, their purchase of the grounds for the resting place of the departed statesman shows that Illinois knows how to honor true greatness, and the action of the last Legislature, in appropriating $50,000 to complete the monument, is a fitting supplement to that of the Legislature of 1865. There, on the banks of Lake Michigan, almost in the shadow of the University which his wisdom and his liberality founded, age after age will the patriot and statesman—those who visit the great metropolis of the Northwest—repair and linger, to honor the memory of Stephen A. Douglas."

THE CHICAGO CONSPIRACY.—[The following statements in regard to the so-called "Chicago Conspiracy" are taken from the official report of General B. J. Sweet, dated at Camp Douglas, November 23, 1864; from his testimony given before the military commission in Cincinnati in February, 1865; and from the history of Camp Douglas by William Bross, A. M.]

In May, or June, 1864, Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, Secretary of the Interior during the administration of President Buchanan, went to Windsor, Canada, under the assumed name of Captain Carson, and, having been supplied by the Confederate government with large sums of money for the purpose, there commenced organizing an expedition to release prisoners of war at different United States military camps in the Northwest. He also inaugurated measures to aid the "Sons of Liberty"* with arms and money, and raise an insurrection

* The first, or Temple, Degree of the Order of American Knights, a secret organization that flourished during the war, and was believed to seek the subversion of the Federal Government. The Sons of Liberty in Chicago at first held their meetings in a building on the corner of South Clark and Monroe —having its starting point in Chicago—against the United States Government. On the 29th of August was to occur the Chicago Democratic Convention, and the first attempt of the conspirators to put their plans in active operations was fixed for that time. As early as the 24th of the month, rebel sympathizers, soldiers and escaped prisoners, assembled at Toronto, Canada, and, under Jacob Thompson's supervision, were organized, under command of Captain Thomas H. Hines, formerly of Morgan's command, for the expedition. It was believed that, under the guise of visitors to the convention, a large number of armed men might be introduced into the city, and there perfect plans without detection. Accordingly, arms were furnished them at Toronto, and, in citizen's dress, the members of the expedition came by different routes to Chicago, making the Richmond House their general rendezvous on their arrival. Among the more noted of the command were Colonel G. St. Leger Grenfell, at one time Morgan's chief-of-staff, and afterward inspector-general on General Bragg's staff; Colonel Vincent Marmaduke, of Missouri; Colonel Ben Anderson, of Kentucky; and Captains Castleman and Cantrill, formerly of Morgan's command.* Besides those who arrived from Canada, large numbers of the Sons of Liberty, and other members of the order of "Knights of the Golden Circle," with crowds of irresponsible, discontented, ignorant disunionists, gathered in the city, ready for whatever evil scheme should be devised. The Sons of Liberty and their confederates were to be under the immediate command of Brigadier-General Charles Walsh† of the Sons of Liberty. The plot for liberating the prisoners, if plot there was, amounted to nothing at that time, as the presence of the conspirators was suspected and their designs frustrated. Among those who assisted Colonel Sweet in procuring information were Dr. S. W. Ayer and Robert Alexander, of Chicago; he being also aided in discovering the designs of the secessionists in Canada by Maurice Langhorn and John T. Shanks, prisoners who had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States Government. Colonel Sweet telegraphed for reinforcements, and, before the time of the session of the Democratic Convention, the 19th Pennsylvania Infantry, numbering seven hundred and fifty, with four companies of another regiment, and the 24th Ohio Battery, one thousand two hundred in all, were sent to his assistance. During the session of the Convention, Colonel Sweet had small details posted at various points, to act in case of need. Two companies were stationed near the University building, under orders to occupy it if the camp were attacked. He said, in his testimony before the Military Commission, "One hundred men, or even fifty men, stationed in that building, would command Camp Douglas, and almost make it untenable to any force."

After the Convention was over, no disturbance whatever having arisen, its members dispersed to their respective homes, and the reinforcements were withdrawn from the camp at the expiration of their term of service, sometime in October. The Ohio Battery, which was supplied with Parrott guns, was left as a reserve in case of emergency.

Before the reinforcements were withdrawn in Octo-streets; later, and at the time of the Conspiracy, in the fifty story of McCormick's Block, on the corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets. There were about two thousand members of the organization in Chicago in 1864, James A. Wilkinson being Grand Organizer.

*Many of the prisoners at Camp Douglas were formerly under Morgan, and were among the bitterest of the secessionists.

†Charles Walsh was an Irish citizen of Chicago, at one time the Democratic candidate for sheriff of Cook County. Early in the war he was active in the Union cause, but later became discontented, and a leader among the Sons of Liberty.

ber, the prisoners had made an attempt to escape; the attempt being thus described in a letter from Captain E. R. P. Shurly, post adjutant, to Hon. William Bross:

"In October, 1864, one of the prisoners requested an interview with the commandant of the post, General Sweet. I ordered the prisoner sent to my office. He told me that, for some time, there had been an organization among the prisoners of war to break out of the prison square, and that one hundred men had taken an obligation to lead the way, to break the fence, attack the guard in rear of camp, and in the confusion that would ensue, the eleven thousand prisoners then in charge would escape. He said that at eight that evening was the time appointed; this was about six p. m. that the interview mentioned took place. It was a cloudy evening and dark, looking like rain. After dismissing the prisoner, I started for the prison square. The officer in charge told me there seemed to be an unusual activity among the prisoners—advised me not to go round without a guard. This I knew would attract attention, if not suspicion. At this time, the barracks occupied by the prisoners were in rows, raised on posts, and each barrack contained from one hundred and fifty to two hundred men. I noticed that there was an unusual stir among the prisoners in the barracks. After completing the tour, I returned to headquarters, satisfied that there might be truth in the statement of my 'spy.' I at once sent an order to the commanding officer of the 8th regiment to take post on the south and west of the camp. I ordered the Pennsylvania regiment on the rear of that and around it. I had notified the officer in command of the guard of what might be expected, at the same time had strengthened the guard by turning out the other two regiments. The rain began to fall, and it seemed to me that the camp was unusually quiet. The disposition of the troops had been made so quietly that the prisoners had not suspected it. I greatly regretted the absence of General Sweet; he had been summoned to Wisconsin; but I carried out his plan to the best of my ability. Eight o'clock had scarcely sounded, when crash went some of the planks from the rear fence, and the one hundred men rushed for the opening. One volley from the guard, who were prepared for them, and the prisoners recoiled, gave up, and retreated to their barracks. Eighteen of the most determined got out, but in less time than I can relate it, quiet was restored. I had the Pennsylvania regiment gradually close in from the outer circle of the race-course to the camp, and re-captured all of those that had escaped. I think eight or ten were wounded, but they gradually recovered."

About the 1st of November, another expedition, of the same character as that of the August preceding, was organized in Canada, to be commanded again by Captain Hines. It was composed of the same elements as before, and to be put in execution on the day of the Presidential election, November 8. According to the confessions of rebel officers and others, the design was

"To attack Camp Douglas, to release the prisoners there, with them to seize the polls, allowing none but the Copperhead ticket to be voted, and stuff the boxes sufficiently to secure the city, county and State for McClellan and Pendleton; then to utterly sack the city, burning and destroying every description of property, except what they could appropriate for their own use and that of their Southern brethren—to lay the city waste and carry off its money and stores to Jeff. Davis's dominions."

Colonel Sweet says in his report:

"During the canvass which preceded the election, the 'Sons of Liberty,' a secret organization, within, but beyond all doubt unknown to, the better portion and majority of the Democratic party, had caused it to be widely proclaimed and believed that there was an intention on the part of the Government, and great danger that such intention would be carried into effect, to interfere, by military force, at the polls against the Democratic party, as an excuse under which to arm themselves as individuals. They had also obtained and concealed at different places in this city (Chicago) arms and ammunition for themselves and the rebel prisoners of war when they should be released.

"On the evening of the fifth day of November, it was reported that a large number of persons of suspicious character had arrived in the city from Fayette and Christian counties, in Illinois, and that more were coming. On Sunday, the sixth day of November, late in the afternoon, it became evident that the city was filling up with suspicious characters, some of whom were prisoners of war and soldiers of the rebel army; that Captain Hines, Colonel Grenfell and Colonel Marmaduke were here to lead, and that Brigadier-General Walsh, of the 'Sons of Liberty,' had ordered large numbers of members of that Order from the southern portion of Illinois to co-operate with them.

"Adopting measures, which proved effective, to detect the presence and identify the persons of the officers and leaders, and ascertain their plans, it was manifest that they had the means of gathering a force considerably larger than the little garrison then guarding between eight and nine thousand prisoners of war at Camp Douglas, and that, taking advantage of the excitement and the large numbers of persons who would ordinarily fill the streets on election night, they intended to make a night attack on and surprise the camp, release and arm the prisoners of war, cut the telegraph wires, burn the railroad depots, seize the banks and stores containing arms and ammunition, take possession of the city, and commence a campaign for the release of other prisoners of war in the States of Illinois and Indiana, thus organizing an army to effect and give success to the general uprising so long contemplated by the 'Sons of Liberty.'

The whole number of troops for duty at Camp Douglas, on the 6th, was seven hundred and ninety-six, as follows: 8th Regiment, V. R. C., Lieutenant-Colonel L. C. Skinner commanding; 15th Regiment, V. R. C., Lieutenant-Colonel Martin Flood commanding—in all six hundred and fifty infantry; 24th Ohio Battery, Lieutenant James W. Gamble commanding, one hundred and forty-six men. Of this force, about sixty men were on duty in Chicago, acting as provost guard, leaving seven hundred and thirty-six men to guard eight thousand three hundred and fifty-two prisoners of war confined in the garrison square of the camp by a fence constructed of inch boards, twelve feet high. Becoming convinced that to delay until the night before election would be dangerous, Colonel Sweet ordered to be arrested, by Lieutenant-Colonel Skinner and a detachment of troops, on the night of the 6th, the following: Colonel G. St. Leger Grenfell, and J. T. Shanks, an escaped prisoner of war, at the Richmond House; Colonel Vincent Marmaduke, at the house of Dr. E. W. Edwards, No. 70 Adams Street; Brigadier-General Walsh, of the "Sons of Liberty," Captain George Canbriitt, of Morgan's command, and Charles T. Daniels, at the house of General Walsh, about a quarter of a mile from camp. Judge Buckner S. Morris, treasurer of the "Sons of Liberty," was arrested at his house, No. 6 Washington street, by members of the police. Both Judge Morris and his wife were Southern people, and in camp were many soldiers for whom they doubtless felt great sympathy. Mrs. Morris had charge of the distribution of clothing sent the prisoners from their friends in the South, knew many of them personally, and felt interested in their welfare—probably aided some to escape. Judge Morris was an ardent Democrat, and a member of the "Sons of Liberty," but a man of honor and integrity, kind heart and generous impulses. He was fully acquitted of treasonable designs against the Government by the verdict of public opinion, as by that of the Commission before which he was tried, and, though the accusation was the sorrow of his life and a blow from which he never recovered, he retained the friendship and respect of his associates, professional and business, until his death, which occurred December 16, 1879.* Captain Shurly, the commandant of Camp Douglas after Colonel Sweet, says "History should do justice to Judge Buckner S. Morris. He was entirely innocent, although arrested and held in camp."

On the night of November 6, there were captured in Walsh's house a large quantity of arms and ammunition, shot-guns, revolvers, muskets, etc., loaded and capped. The prisoners arrested were confined at Camp Douglas. On the morning of Monday, the 7th, Colonel R. M. Hough organized a force of mounted militia, which was assigned to duty, and patrolled the streets of the city until the morning of the 9th. In the meantime, the provost marshal, Captain Bjerg, the city police and other authorities, with detachments from the garrison of Camp Douglas, under various officers, arrested, during the day and night of the 7th, one hundred and six men of the rank and file of the conspirators; twenty-seven at the "Fort Donelson House," another gang on North Water Street, and in various places, such as cellars, saloons, etc. These were all prisoners at Camp Douglas before the morning of election day. Among the captured on the 7th, were a large number of the so-called Klingman's band, principally from Christian and Fayette counties, Illinois. The band was chiefly made up of deserters from the Federal army and those who ran away from the draft, and was intended to resist the draft and all operations of the provost-marshal and General Government in the prosecution of the war. Captain Sears, Lieutenant Garland, and the principal men of this gang were arrested. Early in January, 1865, by order of Major-General Joseph Hooker, commanding the Northwestern Department and Department of the Ohio, a military commission assembled in Cincinnati, military headquarters of the Department, to try by court martial the officers and leaders in this alleged conspiracy.

The commission, which formally assembled on January 9, and continued its sessions until the middle of April, was constituted as follows:

President, Colonel Charles T. Murray, 50th Indiana Infantry; Colonel M. M. Wisewell, 6th V. R. C.; Colonel Ben. Spooner, 83d Indiana Infantry; Colonel R. H. DeHart, 138th Indiana Infantry; Lieutenant-Colonel P. Van Radowitz, A. D. C., U. S. A.; Lieutenant-Colonel S. H. Lathrop, A. I. G., U. S. V.; Lieutenant-Colonel Allen Heath, 100th Indiana Infantry; Major S. R. Lee, 6th V. R. Corps; Judge-Advocate, Colonel H. S. Burnett; Recorder, Benn Pittman. On January 18, the prisoners, Buckner S. Morris, of Chicago; Charles Walsh, Chicago; Colonel George St. Leger Grenfell, C. S. A., London, England; Colonel Vincent Marmaduke, C. S. A., Saline County, Mo.; Raphael S. Semmes, Chicago; Charles Travis, Missouri; Benjamin Anderson, St. Louis, and George Cantrill, of Missouri, were arraigned on the following charges:

Charge First—"Conspiring, in violation of the laws of war, to release the rebel prisoners confined by authority of the United States at Camp Douglas, near Chicago."

Charge Second—"Conspiring, in violation of the laws of war, to lay waste and destroy the City of Chicago, Illinois."

The cases for the Government and the defendants were concluded about the middle of April, and the sealed findings of the Court transmitted to General Hooker for approval. They were approved without exception, and were, in effect, as follows:

Charles Walsh, brigadier-general of the Sons of Liberty—Guilty, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment with hard labor in the Ohio State penitentiary. Buckner S. Morris—Not guilty. Vincent Marmaduke—Not guilty. G. St. Leger Grenfell—Guilty of both charges and specifications, and sentenced to the extremest penalty—death. Raphael S. Semmes—Guilty, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

The prisoner Anderson, on the 19th of February, committed suicide by shooting himself, while confined in McLean Barracks, and, on the 16th of the same month, Travis, alias Daniels, escaped from the custody of a careless guard, during a momentary recess of the Court in the Court House.

None of the above sentences were carried into effect. The sentence of Grenfell was commuted from death to imprisonment for life at the Dry Tortugas, and the others were pardoned and allowed to return to their homes, after an absence of nearly nine months.

The following is the roster of the regiments constituting the garrison of Camp Douglas, in the spring of 1865, at the time of the fall of Richmond:

* See "Bench and Bar," p. 426, vol. 1.

EIGHTH REGIMENT, V. R. C.—Field and Staff.—Colonel Benjamin J. Sweet; Lieutenant-Colonel, Lewis C. Skinner; Acting Post-Adjutant, Captain E. R. P. Shurly; Major, Aquilla Wiley; Quartermaster, Edward Bacon; Adjutant, Isaiah S. Taylor; Post Surgeon, Major J. C. Whitehill, U. S. A.; Post Chaplain, E. B. Tuttle.

Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, Emil Munch; First Lieutenant, Morris Briggs. Co. "B": Captain, Joseph M. Barr; First Lieutenant, Joseph A. Green; Second Lieutenant, Edward L. Deane. Co. "C": Captain, Elhanan C. Petteplace; First Lieutenant, George W. Debevoise. Co. "D": Captain, Edward R. P. Shurly; First Lieutenant, Amos S. Collins; Second Lieutenant, Washington L. Wood. Co. "E": Captain, Warner Young; First Lieutenant, Edward Bacon. Co. "F": Captain James M. Tracy; First Lieutenant, Isaiah S. Taylor; Second Lieutenant, Jesse B. Clinton. Co. "G": Captain, W. S. Schoonmaker; First Lieutenant, Henry V. Morris; Second Lieutenant, John Stewart. Co. "H": Captain, S. Vanderhorck; First Lieutenant, S. O. Burnham; Second Lieutenant, Henry H. Kuhn. Co. "K": Captain, Louis A. Phillipoteaux; Second Lieutenant, A. B. Sweeney.

FIFTEENTH REGIMENT, V. R. C.—Field and Staff.—Colonel, James C. Strong; Lieutenant-Colonel, Martin Flood; Major, James E. Cornelius; Adjutant, Isaiah S. Taylor; Quartermaster, Joseph K. Byers.

Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, Wells Sponable. Co. "B": Captain, Joshua H. Hastings; Second Lieutenant, Stephen W. Groesbeck. Co. "C": Captain, Edward Miller; First Lieutenant, John H. Buckley. Co. "D": Captain, Jerry N. Hill; Second Lieutenant, William Palmer. Co. "E": Captain, Samuel C. Gold; Second Lieutenant, Samuel K. Morton. Co. "F": Captain, John Greelish; Second Lieutenant, Samuel McDonald. Co. "G": First Lieutenant, Nathan Fole; Second Lieutenant, William P. Hagedorn. Co. "H": First Lieutenant, Colin L. Downs. Co. "K": Second Lieutenant, William L. McDaniel.

TWENTY-FOURTH OHIO BATTERY.—Captain, J. L. Hill; Senior First Lieutenant, J. J. Brown; Junior First Lieutenant, Fred. W. Poor; Senior Second Lieutenant, William March; Junior Second Lieutenant, Samuel Lyle, Jr.

The following were post surgeons during the occupation of Camp Douglas:

William D. Winer, M. D., surgeon of 23d Infantry, from March, 1862, to June, 1862. Dr. Brock McVickar, of Chicago, from June 23, 1862, to November of same year. Dr. George H. Park, surgeon of 65th Illinois Infantry, from November, 1862, to November, 1863. Dr. Ira Brown, 65th Illinois; Dr. Whelan, Michigan Sharpshooters; Dr. J. S. Grove, Pennsylvania Infantry; and Dr. A. M. Seigmund, Pennsylvania Infantry, in 1864. Dr. J. C. Whitehill (also medical director and surgeon in charge at Chicago) in 1865.

BENJAMIN J. SWEET, son of Rev. James and Charlotte (Newell) Sweet, was born in Kirkland, Oneida Co., N.Y., April 24, 1832. With his father's family he removed from New York to Wisconsin in 1848, and, after residing a brief time in Sheboygan County, settled on a farm in Stockbridge, Calumet County, where he assisted his father in home work, at the same time devoting his leisure hours to study, until he was prepared to enter Appleton College. After taking a partial course in that institution, he returned to Stockbridge, and for a time taught school in a neighboring village. In May, 1851, he was married to Miss Lovisa L. Denslow, also a native of Kirkland, N.Y., and soon after commenced the study of law. In 1859, he was elected to the Senate of Wisconsin, and in the spring of 1861, was among the earliest to offer his services to Government, to aid in the suppression of the Rebellion. On the organization of the 6th Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, in July, 1861, he was commissioned major of the regiment, and with it proceeded to Washington in August. The regiment was assigned to King's brigade (Iron Brigade), and remained encamped at Arlington Heights during the winter. In the summer of 1862, Major Sweet resigned his commission, and returned to Wisconsin, where he assisted in recruiting, and perfected the organization of the 21st Wisconsin, of which he was commissioned colonel. The regiment left the State for the field in September, 1862. On the 8th of October, it was engaged in the battle of Perryville, where it was erroneously placed in position, about a hundred yards in front of the left of Rousseau's division, and suffered most severe loss. Colonel Sweet was wounded early in the morning, by a spent pistol-shot which injured his neck, and, at night, after the conclusion of the battle, a stray bullet pierced the elbow of his right arm, and lodged in his shoulder, inflicting a severe and dangerous wound. For several weeks the surgeons were unable to extract the ball, and his wound remained unhealed for over a year, during the latter part of which, however, he was in command at Gallatin, Tenn., which Rosecrans had fortified, and occupied as a military post. In the fall of 1863, Colonel Sweet was placed in command of the 8th Regiment, V.R.C., and ordered to Camp Douglas, where he remained until the close of the war, his services as commandant being included in the history of the post. After the war, he purchased a home at Lombard, Ill. He was appointed by President Grant, United States Pension Agent at Chicago in 1869, and, in 1871, Supervisor of Internal Revenue for Illinois. In January, 1872, he was appointed Deputy-Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at Washington, and served two years. He died January 1, 1874, leaving a widow and four children. General Sweet's widow was killed by a railroad accident, August 14, 1878. His eldest daughter, Ada C., is United States Pension Agent at Chicago, and the office has the reputation throughout the country, of being conducted most ably and economically. The second daughter, Minnie, married C. F. Weber, and resides in Chicago. The two younger children, Martha Winnifred and Benjamin J., live with their sister Ada, in Chicago, the boy attending the Ogden School, being but thirteen years of age.

COLONEL JAMES C. STRONG was born in New York, and bred to the legal profession. On the breaking out of the war he raised a company for the 21st New York Volunteer Infantry, of which he was chosen captain May 7, 1861. He was transferred, during the year, to the 38th New York Infantry, of which he was promoted lieutenant-colonel on December 17, 1861, and colonel on October 10, 1862. He received a severe wound at Williamsburg, Va., while serving under McClellan in the Peninsula Campaign, being shot in his right hand, and crippled for life in his right hip. On the expiration of his term of service he was discharged, and on September 29, 1863, was appointed colonel of the 15th Regiment, V.R.C., and his command assigned to Camp Douglas as a portion of its garrison. He was afterward detailed for duty in Philadelphia, and was at that point at the close of the war; Lieutenant-Colonel Martin Flood taking command of the regiment at Camp Douglas.

CHICAGO SOLDIERS' HOME.

This most valuable institution was the outgrowth of the knowledge, on the part of our citizens, that many soldiers en route to or from their commands, suffered for the necessities of life and for medical care. This deprivation was no sooner fully realized, than loyal men and women hastened to obviate any recurrence of such misfortunes to our soldiers. The credit of the first direct movement in their behalf is due to the Young Men's Christian Association, which held a meeting early in June for the purpose of devising means of securing and providing for a temporary home for soldiers in transit. On June 6, another large meeting was held in the Scotch Presbyterian Church, of which Rev. Robert Patterson was pastor, when it was proposed that the Young Men's Christian Association and the Chicago Sanitary Commission should unite in the movement—managers to be selected equally from each organization.

An adjourned meeting was held at Bryan Hall, on June 9, at which plans were considered; and it was finally decided that a temporary home, "to provide for sick, wounded and destitute soldiers, and to furnish all with refreshments and temporary lodging gratuitously," should be established—its inauguration, management and support to be committed to the hands of the "loyal women of Chicago"—the organization to be unconnected with either of the others named. A committee, of which Hon. T. B. Bryan was chairman, was appointed to perfect a plan of organization, on the acceptance of which the following officers were chosen: President, Thomas B. Bryan; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. Ambrose Foster, Mrs. E. S. Wadsworth (Mrs. Wadsworth resigned July 10, and Mrs. O. E. Hosmer was elected in her place); Secretary, Mrs. George Gibbs (Mrs. Gibbs resigned, and Mrs. Henry Sayrs was elected secretary); Assistant Secretary, Mrs. Joseph Medill; Treasurer, Mrs. Henry Wadsworth; Executive Committee, Mrs. A. H. Hoge, Mrs. D. P. Liver-more, Mrs. J. H. Woodworth, Mrs. E. Higgins, Mrs. F. W. Robinson, Mrs. A. Foster, Mrs. Hesing, Mrs. E. H. Cushing, Mrs. I. Greensfelder, Mrs. Rorke, Mrs. Jerome Beecher, Mrs. H. W. Hinsdale, Mrs. W. H. Clark and Mrs. Boyd. Mrs. Smith Tinkham and Mrs.

often get now-a-days," just then a dispatch was received and read announcing Meade's success at Gettysburg. All felt that it was indeed an auspicious house-warming. From the very first, the Home proved its right to existence, by the immense amount of good it accomplished. The little building was always crowded, and the labor required of the faithful women, who not only superintended its affairs, but put their own hands to the work of providing meals for the well and caring for the wants of the sick, can never be rightly estimate[d] or told. They worked untiringly and ungrudgingly to supply the wants of any and all soldiers who needed rest, food, or shelter; and as the number of these constantly and rapidly increased, demanding more time, more strength, more constant effort, the demand was met with increased consecration, fidelity and self-sacrifice.

Mary A. Livermore

Bowen were subsequently appointed members of the committee in place of Mesdames Hinsdale and Clark, resigned. The Board of Directors was composed of one lady from each of the churches of the city. Citizens contributed liberally to the enterprise, making, not only immediate donations, but pledging themselves for the future. The ladies also held a strawberry festival during June, which netted them $950, and, by July, they had raised $5,000. In the meantime they had secured a suitable location—the old Mansion House, No. 45 Randolph Street—at an annual rent of $800, which they completely renovated, making it clean, pleasant and wholesome. On July 4, it was formally opened with a grand dinner served to the soldiers of Camp Douglas and of the various city hospitals. Omnibuses were dispatched to bring in the sick and wounded; those that were able came on foot and in the horse-cars; and as they all filed into the dining-room and seated themselves at the bountifully-spread table, laden with real "home victuals, such as they did not Gradually, women from abroad joined the women of Chicago, as co-workers. In September, an Honorary Board of Directors, including all these, some of whom were residents of Wisconsin, some of Michigan, was formed, and during the same month Mrs. J. K. Botsford was elected a member of the Chicago Board.

In the latter part of 1863, wounded soldiers from the battle-fields of Chickamauga and Mission Ridge, paroled prisoners, and recruits on their way to help fill the thinned ranks of the army, filled the Home to overflowing, and even by entertaining regiments, as they arrived, in the basement of Bryan Hall, it was seen that the old building could no longer answer the purpose for which it was hired. On November 20, the ladies held a meeting and resolved to establish a

CHICAGO SOLDIERS' HOME.

"Permanent Soldiers' Home" for the use of disabled soldiers. A building to serve as a rest for regiments or single soldiers passing through the city, and requiring temporary accommodations, was erected by the post quartermaster on the lake shore, near Dearborn Park, the Rest to be under the management of the ladies of the Soldiers' Home, and being really a part of the establishment, forming an extra dining-room, kitchen and sleeping apartments.

Up to this time the Home had been supported by voluntary contributions, and it had required careful financing to keep the resources of the establishment equal to the constant and increasing demand. At the Sanitary Fair held in October, 1863, Mr. Bryan, the president and liberal benefactor of the Home, had purchased the original draft of Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, for the sum of $3,000, which amount was appropriated to the Home by the Executive Committee of the Fair. This precious document was donated by Mr. Bryan to the Home, to be held in trust, and used for the benefit of disabled soldiers. From it the Home realized, directly and indirectly, inclusive of the proceeds of the original sale, over $10,000, which amount was invested in the purchase of grounds and buildings for a Permanent Soldiers' Home. The purchase was made in March, 1864, and included several buildings and two lots, known as the "Baldwin property," at Fair View. This property was soon after sold, and the Langley estate at Cottage Grove, on the lake shore, near the projected Douglas monument, was secured. Upon this, a plain brick structure, designed as the wing of a more imposing edifice was erected at a cost of about $15,000, and was opened as a Permanent Home on May 13, 1864.

In the meantime, the "Soldiers' Rest" was completed and opened on January 22, 1864. The building was two hundred feet long by fifty wide, divided into four large rooms—one dining-room, and three sleeping apartments fitted up with rows of bunks. At the north end of the Rest was a large kitchen, furnished with cooking apparatus. The dining-room contained twenty tables, each capable of seating twenty men, and here many regiments were fed, until the end of the war.

At a meeting held December 4, Mr. Bryan was elected president of the Permanent Home, and J. H. Wadsworth treasurer. Otherwise, the business and management of both Home and Rest were entrusted entirely to the Board of Managers, consisting exclusively of ladies. A monthly committee from the Board was appointed for the Home, under whose general direction the superintendent and matron controlled its internal affairs, and the Rest was personally superintended by a committee from the Board, appointed from week to week. To add to the fund for the erection of the new Home, dollar subscriptions were solicited, the work being commenced immediately after the meeting of December 4, 1863, when the enterprise was undertaken. A committee for districting the city was appointed, with headquarters in the South Division at the house of Mrs. J. C. Shepley; North Division, Mrs. E. Wadsworth; West Division, Mrs. E. B. Tuttle. The work being laid out, ladies were assigned to limited districts, and armed with their little subscription books, countersigned by President Bryan, and stamped with the seal of the Soldiers' Home; also armed with determination, zeal and energy—they set out on their task. Among the most active and persevering of these ladies were Mesdames Henry Says, C. G. Fargo, J. C. Shepley, Myra Bradwell, H. C. Bristol, C. P. Dickinson, Thomas McCalla, D. A. Jones, J. M. Van Osdel, Ambrose Foster, J. M.

Tuttle, J. M. Loomis, J. Long, C. W. Andrews, L. Dagenhardt, M. A. Burnham, Reuben Ludlam, and Miss Ada Bradwell. Soon after the organization of the Permanent Home, Mrs. Henry Says, Mrs. J. M. Loomis, Mrs. Myra Bradwell, Mrs. J. W. Steele, Mrs. N. H. Parker, Miss Ada Bradwell, and Miss Julia Hamill were elected members of the Board of Directors—to all of whom, and in an especial manner to Mrs. Says and Mrs. Bradwell, the Home was indebted for the successful prosecution and accomplishment of its work.

At the first annual meeting, June 17, 1864, sixty-two Chicago ladies were engaged in the work of the Home and Rest, and about twenty from abroad were honorary members of the Board. During the year there had been 46,384 arrivals, 96,909 meals and 16,481 lodgings provided, and 2,557 patients medically treated—the money value of the outlay being estimated at $47,162.

Besides entertaining regiments at all hours of day or night, whenever they happened to arrive, and caring for the sick and disabled at the Home, the ladies had also attended to the wants of sick soldiers at private dwellings, and sent convalescent, as well as deceased, soldiers to their respective homes and friends. The officers elected in June, 1864, were:

President, Hon. T. B. Bryan; First Vice-President, Mrs. O. E. Hosmer; Second Vice-President, Mrs. C. P. Dickinson; Secretary, Mrs. Henry Says (Mrs. J. O. Brayman elected secretary in place of Mrs. Says, resigned); Treasurer, Carl F. W. Junge; Assistant Treasurer, Mrs. E. H. Cushing; Auditing Committee, Miss Elizabeth Blakie, Mrs. J. M. Loomis, Mrs. Shackford.

Early in 1864, it was determined to hold a fair in connection with the Sanitary Commission—the time first appointed being from February 22, to March 4. In consequence of the magnitude of the preparations, the time of opening was postponed to the 31st of May, at which date the fair commenced, and continued three weeks.* To the untiring labors of the managers of the Soldiers' Home, the success of the undertaking was largely due, and its outcome was an addition to their treasury of $83,500. Of this amount, $10,000 was appropriated to pay the debts due at the close of the fiscal year ending June, 1865; some $5,000 reserved for current expenses; and the remainder invested in Government securities, as a fund for the erection of the main portion of the Soldiers' Home building.

At the annual meeting, held during the progress of the fair, and when the labors of the ladies at the Rest were drawing toward a close, Mr. Bryan paid the following richly merited tribute to the faithfulness of their work in the past:

"Never in any city or in any clime have more earnest, unintermitting or untiring labors in behalf of the soldiers been performed than those which it has been the pleasure and the pride of the ladies of this institution to render. Ladies, many of them in affluent circumstances, have persistently, for two years, worked with their own hands in the hospital, the dining-room, and even in the kitchen of the Soldiers' Home and Rest, performing an amount of actual drudgery at which their own hired domestics at home would have rebelled. Nor have these arduous labors been confined to the daytime, to fair weather, or to occasions of public or conspicuous display. On the contrary, they have embraced all kinds—the intensest heat of summer and the most inclement winter weather; and I can, of my own knowledge, bear testimony to the fact of entire nights being spent by them in entertaining regiments—all the rest of the city asleep, while these self-sacrificing and devoted women were industriously employed in feeding the soldiers and cheering them on their march to, and return from, the war."

The following officers were elected at this meeting—the last "war officers" of the Home:

President, Thomas B. Bryan; First Vice-President, Mrs. E. F. Dickinson; Second Vice-President, Mrs. Henry Says; Secretary, Mrs. J. O. Brayman; Treasurer, Carl F. W. Junge; Assistant Treasurer, Miss E. Blakie; Auditing Committee, Mrs. J. C.

*See Sanitary Fair.

Shepley, Mrs. Dr. Ingals, Mrs. C. W. Andrews, Mrs. Myra Bradwell was elected assistant treasurer on June 23, in place of Miss Elizabeth Blakie, resigned.

The arrivals at the Rest during the past year were reported as 60,100; meals prepared, 167,253. At the Home, five hundred and seventy-seven sick and disabled soldiers had been cared for. The receipts had been $33,081; expenditures, $35,850.

During 1865 and the early months of 1866, the main building of the Soldiers' Home was erected, at a cost of about $30,000. It was of the same height as the wing previously erected—four stories—with a frontage of sixty-five feet on Douglas Place, the location being where is now the junction of Thirty-fifth Street and Lake Avenue. Its depth was sixty-five feet, and the building, when completed, could accommodate about one hundred and twenty-five soldiers. At the opening of the new building, May 10, 1866, there were ninety-nine inmates; of whom fifteen were blind veterans; twenty, disabled soldiers, who were studying at the Commercial College, to fit themselves for positions wherein they could earn a living; and the rest crippled or otherwise disabled.

Among the directresses of the Soldiers' Home were:

Mesdames C. W. Andrews, E. Higgins, R. S. Ball, Dr. Ingals, E. S. Brackett, A. E. Kent, H. L. Bristol, J. M. Loomis, W. D. Blain, J. Long, Thomas Church, J. H. Moore, L. Dagenhardt, W. L. Myrick, Ambrose Foster, J. Medill, N. H. Parker, J. S. Fuller, J. L. Patterson, C. Follansbee, J. D. Quinlan, J. M. Harvey, O. D. Ranney, J. G. Hamilton, F. W. Robinson, Df. Hamill, C. W. Sanford, Ambrose Burnam, S. Shackford, O. E. Hosmer, C. H. Stoughton, Isaac R. Hitt, George Schneider, J. C. Shipley, A. Snyder, S. Tinkham, W. Wheeler, T. Button, J. H. Woodworth, C. B. Sawyer, S. C. Sayers, Myra Bradwell, E. W. Brayman, G. F. Dickinson, S. S. Williamson, M. Whittier and the Misses M. L. Says and Elizabeth Blakie.

Advisory Committee, 1865-66, J. H. Dunham, B. F. Jacobs, J. V. Scammon, J. B. Bradwell, Van H. Higgins.

The Soldiers' Home was incorporated as a charitable institution, by act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved February 28, 1867, the sum of $24,000 being appropriated for its benefit by the same act, Judge and Mrs. Bradwell having been appointed a special committee to go to Springfield to obtain an appropriation.

In June, 1867, at the first annual meeting held after the passage of this act, the following were elected officers of the corporation:

President, Hon. J. B. Bradwell; First Vice-President, Mrs. O. D. Ranney; Second Vice-President, Mrs. C. W. Andrews; Secretary, Mrs. E. W. Brayman; Treasurer, C. R. Field, Assistant Treasurer, Mrs. Myra Bradwell; Auditing Committee, Mrs. J. M. Harvey and Mrs. C. M. Clark; Committee on Appeals, Mrs. C. B. Sawyer, Mrs. H. L. Bristol, Mrs. J. M. Loomis, Mrs. J. C. Shipley, Mrs. Henry Sayers; Superintendent, Dr. F. L. Flanders.

The appropriation was received by the corporation in 1869. The expenses of the Home for that year being $10,875, and the number of inmates but forty-one, preparations were made for closing the institution, in accordance with recommendations of a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, passed March 10, 1869, transferring the inmates to the National Homes established by Congress. A part of the disabled soldiers at the Home were thus transferred during the year, but many being unqualified to enter there under the provisions of the act, the corporation was unable to close the Home at that time. To reduce expenses, it sold, on June 3, 1870, the building and grounds on Douglas Place, for $50,000 in cash. The buildings are now (1885) owned and occupied by the Catholics as St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum.

With a portion of the fund thus obtained, a block of ground, located on the lake shore, in South Evanston, was purchased, and upon it a brick structure was erected, which was opened as a Soldiers' Home February 22, 1871, the whole number of inmates then being twenty-six.

This Home was kept open, and thus used by the corporation, until the fall of 1877, when, owing to financial reverses, it was deemed proper to permanently close it, and the inmates, sixteen in number, were sent to the National Homes at Milwaukee, Wis., and Dayton, Ohio. The Home at Evanston was then rented to the Illinois Industrial School for Girls, and is still (1885) so rented—that institution having added a large wooden structure to the original brick building used by the soldiers, and holding the property with the pledge of receiving and caring for such children and orphans of soldiers as the corporation should desire to have admitted.

CAIRO SOLDIERS' HOME.—This valuable accessory to the relief work was established and maintained by Chicago people, Rev. E. Folsom, a missionary from the Second Presbyterian Church of this city, being the first agent there, in October, 1861. On March 23, 1882, Thomas and Mrs. Maddy were sent to Cairo as superintendent and matron, respectively, of the Home. In the winter of 1863-64, a new Home was erected, at a cost to the Government of $10,000, the Chicago Commission furnishing it, at an expense of $2,200. Mr. and Mrs. Maddy were in charge of the old Home until October, 1863, and were succeeded by Miss O. L. Ostram as matron, and by C. N. Shipman as superintendent. When the new Home was opened, Mrs. A. F. Grant became matron—a lady whose tender care, remarkable ability and unflinching faithfulness have made her renowned in war annals.

The Home was closed on October 1, 1865; the sum of $22,271.54 having been spent thereon by the Chicago Branch, the name of which had been changed to the Northwestern Commission. Of this amount, however, $14,196.41 was saved by the sale of the rations of the inmates of the Home. During the year 1864, there were admitted to the Home 98,075 men; and from the 1st of February, 1865, when the Rest was established, and, after which, only sick, wounded or discharged soldiers were entertained at the Home, there were 48,356 of these before it was closed.

MYRA BRADWELL, editor of The Chicago Legal News, was born February 12, 1831, in Manchester, Vt., the daughter of Eben and Abigail (Willey) Colby, both natives of New Hampshire. Mrs. Myra Bradwell taught her first school at Elk Grove, Cook County, in a country district near her father's home, and continued her teaching at Elgin and other places for a short time, when she married James B. Bradwell. Thereafter, her life would become incorporated with that of her husband's in the ordinary course of events, but she had an ambition to open a new field of practical employment for her sex, in contra-distinction to the women's rights demanded from the platform; she therefore chose and thoroughly prepared herself for her profession, before asking admission to its practice. She commenced the study of law in her husband's office, dividing her time between the office and her home and children, until she believed herself competent to pass an examination for a certificate to practice the legal profession. At this point she met obstacles it took time to remove. After complying with all the rules of the Supreme Court, she received from the Board of Examiners the required certificate of qualification for admission to the Bar, but the Supreme Court refused to grant her a license to practice, first on the sole ground that she was a married woman; and, after being driven from this position by an able argument presented by Mrs. Bradwell, they refused it on the ground that she was a woman. She carried her case, by writ of error, to the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington, where Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter made an able argument in favor of Mrs. Bradwell, but the highest court of the Nation affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois, Chief Justice Chase, the ablest jurist on the Bench, dissenting. She was the first woman in the United States to ask permission to practice law. Alta M. Hulett, an unmarried lady of the City of Rockford was the next applicant for admission to the Bar; her request was denied on the ground of her sex. Mrs. Bradwell assisted in, and Miss Hulett secured, the passage of a law declaring that no person should be debarred from any occupation (except military) on account of sex. Gradually, the professions and fields of labor have opened and broadened to womanhood, in a great measure under the efforts of Mrs. Bradwell and her husband. This is not the only field in which she has become celebrated. In the establishment and success of The Chicago Legal News, she has now an enviable reputation among the journalists of this country and Europe. This weekly legal journal favorably compares with any legal journal in the world, and has received the highest praise from eminent lawyers and jurists. Its cases are selected and reported with care, its information is varied and its news is gathered from all quarters of the globe. Mrs. Bradwell was an indefatigable worker in the interests of our soldiers during the war, and of this part of her life's work she and her husband are justly proud. She has twice visited England—first in 1878, and again in 1883, with the Apollo Commandery. She has had four children; the oldest and youngest are deceased, while Thomas and Bessie have grown to manhood and womanhood. Thomas is married, and is devoting his time to the study of law. Bessie graduated from the Chicago High School, was the valedictorian of her class, and afterward took a four years' classical course and graduated from the Northwestern University. After a two years' course she graduated with the highest honors from the Union College of Law, being selected by a class of fifty-four to be their valedictorian. She is now a member of the Chicago Bar. Mrs. Myra Bradwell is one of those true "Women's-rights women" who live their creed instead of talking it, and the good she has done to woman in this manner is yet unknown. Earnest, tender, homelike, and full of that poetic inspiration which is so commonly but mistakenly considered the exclusive prerogative of youth, she is a woman who lives beautifully, will never grow old, and to whom death will be but "the grand final development of life."

RELIEF WORK IN CHICAGO.

THE FIRST NURSES.—On the evening of April 18, 1861, the people of Chicago held an immense meeting at Metropolitan Hall, to devise means whereby to meet the appalling crisis in National affairs. The State had been called upon for six regiments of volunteers, and companies of citizen soldiery were already filling up their ranks and drilling, in preparation for the field. They must be armed and equipped; and one object of the meeting was to make such arrangements as might be necessary for effecting that result.* Even as early as that evening, two ladies present at that meeting publicly tendered their services to the war committee as nurses, to be sent wherever their services might be needed. These two—Miss Jane A. Babcock and Miss Mary E. M. Foster—were the first women in Chicago who volunteered to accompany the troops as nurses; and one of them at least, Miss Babcock, was at work in the hospitals at Cairo, almost as soon as the first regiment reached there from Springfield, and, later, rendered efficient service in the hospitals at Memphis.

On April 21, the Chicago companies, under General Swift, left for Cairo. Dr. Sim, of Chicago, accompanied them as a member of General Swift's staff, and at Cairo, under his supervision, a small but well-arranged hospital was immediately constructed. This was, in a large measure, sustained through the efforts of the women of Chicago, and was the main reliance of the troops at Cairo during the following summer.

On April 20, Mrs. D. M. Braundage, whose four sons had already enlisted, offered her services to General Swift to accompany any volunteers as nurse; and, at a public meeting held at the Briggs House on April 22, Rev. Robert Collyer presiding, her application for such position, and also those of Mesdames J. S. Kellogg, Mary Evans, A. M. Beauhien, E. S. Johnson, E. B.

Graves and Miss Annette Sleightly were formally presented to the war committee.

In the meantime, the women of Chicago, with their sisters all over the land, organized for home work; church sewing-circles, ladies' benevolent societies, young folks' and children's clubs, all laid aside their special work and united in the labor of scraping old linen into lint and tearing old cotton into bandages. It is almost ludicrously pathetic to read in the city papers of the early summer of 1861, of the pathetic and enthusiastic efforts of the women to do something for the soldiers, and the equally patriotic endeavors of the men to encourage them to continue the work which both began to see was not the best, while yet they could not clearly see what the best was. Through the liberality of J. H. McVicker, they were furnished with a room in the South Division of the city, which they fitted up with thirty sewing-machines, and occupied as a general workroom for the manufacture of garments for the soldiers. The "Ladies' Sewing Hall" did a large work in providing for the regiments at Cairo and Bird's Point; and to the untiring labors of the women of Chicago the hospitals, both at these and other points, were indebted for many of their comforts during the summer of 1861.

But this work was necessarily in the beginning more or less spasmodic and of lessened value, because often unsuited to existing necessities. There was need of a medium between the worker and the soldier, to advise what was most needed, enforce regular methods of collection and transmission, and to put to the best use possible the supplies gathered. This the Commission undertook, and this it did throughout the war. It invested great labor, good judgment and continued patience. In the beginning, the supplies gathered in each locality were, as a rule, intended for the volunteers who had gone from it—if not for a particular person or persons, at least for the company or regiment made up from that neighborhood. It was not without oft repeated explanations of its necessity, that mothers and sisters with sons and brothers in the field could be taught to consent that their own handiwork should go into a common stock, to be distributed as the Commission thought best.

Miss Dorothea L. Dix was appointed by Secretary Cameron superintendent of female nurses and matron-general of army hospitals, and she appointed Mrs. A. H. Hoge and Mrs. D. P. Livermore her agents for the West. Early in June, 1861, Mrs. P. E. Yates, of Chicago, was appointed presiding matron of the military hospitals at Cairo; and she selected Misses Jane A. Babcock, L. B. Slaymaker, Mary E. Babcock, Adaline Miller and Teresa Zimmer, of Chicago; Mrs. S. M. Hamilton, of Mounmouth; and Mrs. A. O. Millington, of Springfield, her corps of assistants. The selections were approved by Miss Dix—two of the ladies, Miss J. A. Babcock and Miss Slaymaker, being already employed at Cairo; and, on June 6, Mrs. Yates left Chicago for her post.

INCEPTION OF THE SANITARY COMMISSION.—At an early stage of the war, the Medical Bureau was organized, but it soon became inadequate to the demands made upon it. The Woman's Central Association of Relief, the germ of the Sanitary Commission, was organized in New York April 25, and, under the title of the United States Sanitary Commission, was ordered by the Secretary of War and approved by the President, on June 9, 1861. Rev. Henry W. Bellows was placed at its head, and Judge Mark Skinner and E. B. McCagg were members of the Commission and presidents of the

* To Ezra B. McCagg the publishers are indebted for much valuable assistance in the compilation of this chapter.

Chicago Branch. In September, 1861, Dr. J. S. Newberry, was elected secretary of the Western Department of the Commission, having supervision of all its work in the valley of the Mississippi, and visited St. Louis and Chicago in the interest of the Commission. At his suggestion, leading citizens of the various Western States were elected associate members of the Commission—those from Chicago being Hon. Isaac N. Arnold, Colonel John W. Foster, Drs. R. N. Isham and H. A. Johnson, and E. W. Blatchford.

Before the arrival of Dr. Newberry at Chicago, Rev. Robert Collyer had visited, as an agent of the United States Sanitary Commission, the hospitals in Missouri, and found horrible suffering among the Illinois soldiers. His report aroused the citizens of Chicago to the necessity of more systematic, concentrated work, and the visit of Dr. Newberry found them ready for action.

ORGANIZATION OF CHICAGO SANITARY COMMISSION.—At a meeting held at the Tremont House, October 17, 1861, of which William H. Brown was chairman, and H. E. Seelye secretary, on motion of Hon. William H. Brown a committee of seven, to constitute the Sanitary Commission of Chicago, was chosen, its members being Hon. Mark Skinner, Dr. Ralph N. Isham, Rev. O. H. Tiffany, Rev. W. W. Patton, Colonel John W. Foster, E. W. Blatchford and James Ward.

Organization was perfected by the election of Hon. Mark Skinner president; Rev. O. H. Tiffany vice president; H. E. Seelye recording secretary and treasurer; E. W. Blatchford corresponding secretary. Mr. Blatchford was soon after appointed assistant treasurer, and performed all the duties of the office during the existence of the Commission. To his industry and wonderful executive ability is due, as much as to any other person, the wonderful success of the Commission.

Rooms for the reception and preparation of supplies were given for the use of the Commission, by I. H. Burch, at No. 41 Wabash Avenue; Mrs. Eliza C. Porter was made superintendent, and John Freeman, who served the Commission until the close of its work, was engaged as clerk; and, on November 4, 1861, the Depot of the Chicago Sanitary Commission opened its doors to the public.

The Chicago Commission received its first donations from the liberal-hearted men and women of the city. Over twelve hundred dollars were placed in its treasury by a few leading citizens; the women of the city hastened to pour in their contributions, followed, after a very brief time, by those from the surrounding country, while various Aid Societies applied for recognition as auxiliaries, and rapidly poured in supplies. The first work of the Commission was performed in the camps and hospitals at Chicago and Springfield. In order to work understandingly from the start, Drs. Isham and Patton were sent, within a week after the organization of the Commission, to inspect the camps and hospitals at Cairo, Bird's Point, Mound City and Paducah; and on their return, the Commission issued its first appeal to the public. The work of the Commission was thus defined:

First. To furnish information to all persons who wish to render aid to our troops, with reference (First), To the existing wants; (Second), The most destitute points; (Third), The most desirable and useful method of supply.

Second. To afford facilities for forwarding supplies, so that (First), They may reach their destination, and (Second) be applied according to the design of the donors.

ACTIVE WORK OF THE COMMISSION.—Before the close of the year, Dr. Tiffany and Mr. Blatchford visited the hospitals at St. Louis, Jefferson City, Tipton, Syracuse, Otterville, Smithton, Sedalia, Rolla and Ironton, still filled with sick and wounded from the late campaign in Missouri. The Sisters of Mercy, aided by the Union Defense Committee, had sent twenty nurses to Jefferson City, immediately after the battle of Lexington, to care for the wounded, many of whom belonged to the Chicago Irish Brigade. In many of the Missouri camps and hospitals the troops were suffering fearfully. The tents and huts which they occupied for winter quarters were cold, damp and unhealthful. Deserted houses and empty stores, unwarmed, unclean, ventilated only by draughts of cold air from open doors, were used for hospitals. Small-pox, measles and pneumonia were doing their fatal work; among the inexperienced young soldiers of the West. Every effort was made to relieve their distress. The Chicago Branch sent immediately, to Tipton, thirty-three boxes of supplies, and, during the three months following its organization, distributed two hundred and seven boxes of sanitary stores along the route of the disastrous marches of the late campaign. Mrs. O. E. Hosmer, one of the most efficient sanitary workers in Chicago, also visited the hospitals in Missouri during this period, and by her energetic efforts secured, to the more remote points, large hospital stores from the Western Department at St. Louis. The large military hospital at Mound City, at that period under the supervision of a corps of the Sisters of Mercy, with Mother Angela at their head, was thoroughly renovated, and many sanitary reforms were inaugurated. Kansas, too, received supplies, and the hospitals at Cairo constantly received contributions from the Commission from the time of its organization. Before the close of 1861, many Aid Societies, tributary to the Chicago Branch, had been organized, and contributions were flowing in from Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota, as well as from Illinois. The working staff of the Commission, consisting, at first, of six inspectors, had been increased to fifteen. The financial statement shows that during the two months it received over $28,000 in cash, of which about $18,000 had been expended in hospital supplies, traveling expenses, salaries of nurses, inspectors, etc., etc. The last week of December, 1861, showed contributions from fifty-four different aid societies in the Northwest.

FIRST FESTIVAL.—During the month of December, the first festival for the benefit of soldiers, was held in Chicago, commencing on December 16, and continuing several days. Although this enterprise of the Chicago women was so overshadowed by their later work in the same direction that it is scarcely remembered, it was the beginning of a series of self-sacrificing efforts on their part to benefit the soldiers, and as such deserves especial record. The managers of this festival were Mesdames A. H. Hoge, O. E. Hosmer and D. P. Livermore—ladies, whose labors in behalf of the soldiers never relaxed, until they ceased with the necessity which called them into activity. The sum raised at this early festival was $675.17—small in comparison with the proceeds of later and larger undertakings, but a prophecy of what was to be. The money was placed by the managers at the disposal of the Chicago Commission, for the benefit, especially, of the Western hospitals, the following modest note accompanying the donation:

"TO THE CHICAGO SANITARY COMMISSIONERS:

"Accept this as our Christmas gift. We regret that it is not larger. We shall condense into a permanent organization for active hospital service, and hope to aid you, in a small way, through the war."

EARLY DIFFICULTIES.—Soon after this, the Chicago Protestant Female Nurse Association was formed, which acted for and with the Commission in procuring the services of suitable nurses for the hospitals of the West. Mrs. Sarah E. Henshaw* says of its early difficulties and encouragements:

"Early in its history a difficulty made itself apparent, and one which required much skill to meet. Almost every box arriving at the Chicago depot of the Commission was designed for some specific military organization.

"The Commission seemed to be mistaken for a general army forwarding house, and was supposed to be able to reach any specified company or regiment, under almost any combination of circumstances. It was natural, on the one hand, that, in contributing to the wants of soldiers, thought and effort should be first directed to the volunteers belonging to the contributing locality. Much delicacy and tenderness were required to temper the inevitable disappointment arising from the discovery that stores could not, in many cases, be so forwarded.

"On the other hand, the Commission, keeping itself, through its agents, acquainted with the wants of camps and hospitals and with the movements of troops, was often aware that the specified regiment had been ordered away from the point to which the box had been, by its donors, directed; or that there was abundance in such locality, and destitution elsewhere. To this was added the larger view of its work taken by the Commission, a view that could not embrace the possibility of assisting the volunteers of one section more than those of another; of sending its agents into a hospital to select specified soldiers for its ministrations, where all were alike suffering for their country; or seeming, in short, to sink patriotism into a mere partiality for a particular State. This matter, therefore, required much and oft-repeated explanation, and forms the burden of the Commission's correspondence during this period.

* * * As an auxiliary of the United States Sanitary Commission, the Chicago Branch possessed all the advantages of governmental countenance and support conferred on the Central organization. The agents of the United States Sanitary Commission were the medium through which the Chicago Branch conducted its operations within the army lines, but its own special agents were recognized in the army as possessing official authority, and as much governmental transportation was allowed its accredited messengers and its stores, as could be spared from the pressing necessities of the Government itself.

"But aside from this, upon the request of the Commission, the railroads of the West met its wants in a spirit of unsurpassed generosity. All those centering in Chicago agreed to transport its stores free of charge, and continued to do so as long as the war lasted. The importance and value of this precedent, in enabling the Commission to secure from other western railroads similar advantages, can not be over-estimated. The records of the Commission show a gift of one hundred dollars, presented it in its infancy by the president of the Rock Island Railroad, Mr. Henry Farnum. The president of the Illinois Central Railroad, Mr. William H. Osborne, was, from first to last, its earnest, indefatigable friend, giving to its labors, not only his influence and countenance, as president of his important railway, but adding also to these his personal suggestions, sympathy and assistance. It would be difficult, indeed, to overrate the generosity ever exhibited toward the soldier, and toward the Commission as his representative, by the officers of the Illinois Central Railroad. The zeal and good will of all the railroad companies, indeed, were so abounding that, in a little more than a month after its establishment, the Commission found it necessary to address to them a circular, urging them to grant no requests preferred in the name of the Commission, unless indorsed or countersigned by some one of its members.

"The eastern telegraph companies, from an early day, rivaled in generosity the railroad authorities. Somewhat later in the history of the war, the western lines also remitted all charges on the communications of the Commission.

"The express companies carried its packages for half their usual prices.

"The press of the city was also generous beyond precedent. The principal editor of the Chicago Tribune, Dr. Charles H. Ray, in a double-leaded leader, made a strong and stirring appeal for the support of the Commission, avouching the character and responsibility of its members, and characterizing, in the most emphatic terms, the necessity and sacredness of its object. The Journal and Post gave forth similar utterances.

"The far-reaching power of the press never had more striking illustrations than in the immediate effect of these articles. No sooner were they read and digested than donations began to flow, auxiliaries to organize, and the way of the Commission to be made plain."

FIELD WORK.—With the spring of 1862 came the necessity for doubled exertion. On February 14-15, 1862, * History of the Northwestern Sanitary Commission.

was fought the battle of Fort Donelson, which filled the hospitals at Paducah, Mound City and Cairo with wounded soldiers. Prior thereto, at the suggestion of Dr. G. Agnew, resident camp-inspector for the United States Sanitary Commission at Cairo, General Grant had ordered the large military steamer "City of Memphis," to be fitted up as a floating hospital transport. On the receipt of the telegram announcing the opening of the battle at Fort Donelson, this steamer was fitted up by the Chicago Branch at Cairo, the Commission here having forwarded surgeons and nurses. Seventeen surgeons left this city on the first train for the field, accompanied by a citizens' committee, with three thousand dollars' worth of supplies for the wounded. With Dr. Agnew, of Cairo, and large delegations from all parts of the State, they proceeded, on the "City of Memphis," to the battlefield, arriving two days in advance of any other boat. The floating hospital was under the charge of Surgeon W. D. Turner, U. S. A., assisted by his wife and Miss Hadley, of Chicago. The delegation, with the wife of Dr. George Coatsworth, who accompanied the expedition from Cairo, were the first that arrived on the field, and worked faithfully in the distribution of stores, in consoling and comforting those beyond the reach of mortal aid, and in caring for those removed to the boat. Through the day and long into the night, the work of removing the wounded and dying went on, and at early morning the steamer departed for Paducah.

Early in the spring of 1862, Mrs. Elizabeth Porter resigned her position, as superintendent of the rooms of the Chicago Branch, for service in the hospitals and at the front. Joining her husband at Cairo, to which point she took a corps of nurses from Chicago, she immediately threw herself, heart and soul, into the work of ministering to the sick and wounded, and became known throughout the country as one of the most tender, devoted and faithful workers in the sanitary cause. Soon after the departure of Mrs. Porter,* Mesdames Hoge and Livermore, at the request of the Chicago Commission, visited the hospitals at Cairo and Mound City, still filled with the wounded of Fort Donelson, and into which, according to rumor, various sanitary abuses had crept. They became satisfied that the comforts provided for the soldiers through the munificence of the loyal people of the land, were faithfully and conscientiously applied, according to the needs of the soldiers; and the clear discrimination evinced in their report proved their eminent fitness for the responsible positions they afterward occupied. Before their return, the battle of Pittsburg Landing filled anew the hospitals of the West with wounded and dying and its homes with mourners.

DEPOT AT PADUCAH.—In the latter part of March, Dr. Tiffany had been on a special mission to Paducah, Ky., to make arrangements, if possible, for establishing a new depot nearer the scene of the battle now daily anticipated at Pittsburg Landing. He was accompanied from Cairo to Paducah by Mr. Folsom and Rev. Mr. Bugbee, of Chicago. A supply of stores sent by the Chicago Commission was taken by Mr. Folsom to Savannah, and left there in charge of Mrs. Mary Bickerdyke, already established at that place, in charge of the hospitals connected with the 21st Indiana Infantry. Mrs. Bickerdyke, who, from that time, was connected with the Chicago Branch as one of its "Agents in the Field," had taken possession of a small house, which she had fitted up with some simple cooking apparatus, and in it she cared for seventy wounded men and eight officers of the 21st Indiana, after the battle of Shiloh, besides cooking for and distributing stores to the wounded of other regiments. Mr. Folsom left his supplies with her, one week before the battle. On April 6-7, the days of the engagement, no other sanitary stores had arrived, and the value of these, distributed by the faithful hands of Mrs. Bickerdyke, can scarcely be estimated. Anticipating this battle, as before stated, the Chicago Branch had, to be ready for the emergency, accumulated nearly a thousand packages of sanitary stores at Cairo, and, when tidings of it reached that city, they were at once placed on board the steamer "Patton," and taken to the Landing in charge of William Goodsmith, an agent of the Commission, who was accompanied by a corps of nurses. On the evening of the 9th of April, a large number of surgeons and nurses from Chicago started for the battle-field. Drs. Patton and Isham, of the Commission, accompanied them, carrying large and valuable stores donated by the city, the Board of Trade and private individuals. Arriving at Cairo, the party was transferred to the hospital steamer "Louisiana," and reached the Landing two hours before the "Patton," which left Cairo nearly twelve hours in advance. The two steamers arrived on the afternoon of the 11th, four days after the close of the battle, and yet these sanitary stores from Chicago were the first that reached the field—the first voluntary assistance received by the wounded, aside from that furnished through Mrs. Bickerdyke. It was impossible to land the goods, as the vast encampment was almost floating in an ocean of mud and mire. It was cold, and the rain was pouring down upon wounded soldiers, still lying on the field or moving wearily to the boats on which they were to be transferred to hospitals. The stores from the "Patton" were transferred temporarily, by permission of General Grant, to the "Tigress," his own floating headquarters, but as soon as tents could be procured, the supplies brought by both steamers were placed in them for distribution, every surgeon in Grant's army being notified of their arrival.

*See biography of Mrs. Jeremiah Porter, in vol. 1.

Dr. Isham wrote to the Chicago Commission on the 12th:

"When you know there are no stores here but ours, so far as we can learn, and that we are the first upon the ground, and the only volunteers here, you will see how much work there is for us. There is not a bandage, rag or sponge, or any chloroform (except as Dr. Grinstead tells me he has three pounds) to be had now. We have given out all our rags and bandages, and God knows what we shall do without those articles to dress wounds. I worked until one o'clock last night, after we distributed our stores, assisting in dressing wounds. Disabled men are still being brought aboard the boats, and many are yet in tents, upon the wet straw, for you must know that it rains, and has rained steadily since Sunday."

Besides the distribution of stores on the field, four steamers, filled with wounded for northern hospitals, were supplied from the stores sent by the Chicago Commission, and surgeons and nurses detailed to accompany them.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE WORK.—After Shiloh, as after every battle, the depot and treasury of the Commission was drained of everything; but, as before, contributions flowed in so rapidly that the want was supplied before it was felt. The Common Council of Chicago voted $10,000 to its treasury; the Board of Trade contributed largely; private donations were abundant and liberal; and the Aid Societies, stimulated to renewed exertions, poured in their bountiful supplies. For three months, one distributing agent was employed at Pittsburg Landing or Savannah, and another to move with the army in its approach to Corinth, and co-operate with the agents of the United States Sanitary Commission. Five steamers employed in moving the wounded of Shiloh to the North, were furnished with surgeons, nurses, and a portion of their supplies by the Chicago Branch, and two steamers were fitted out for the purpose of bringing home wounded Illinois soldiers. The money for the purchase of medical stores for these steamers—two thousand dollars—was contributed by the Chicago Board of Trade, as well as hospital clothing and supplies. A complete outfit for a steamer sent by the Wisconsin authorities for removing Wisconsin soldiers, was furnished by the Chicago Commission.

LABORS OF THE NURSES.—Mrs. Porter, after helping to distribute the stores at Cairo, hastened to Mound City to assist in the reception of a boat-load of wounded. Those who survived transportation having been placed in the hospital, she returned to Cairo and conducted six nurses thence to the Central Hospital at Paducah, to which point they had been sent from Chicago by the Commission. She then proceeded to Pittsburg Landing, where she procured from the Medical Director an order for several female nurses for the hospitals at Savannah. Returning to Chicago, she secured them through the Sanitary Commission, and, accompanying them to Tennessee, placed them under the charge of Mrs. Mary Bickerdyke, with whom she was intimately associated in hospital labor from that time.

At the head of the nurses sent to Paducah, and occupying the position of matron, was Mrs. Egerton, for several years the efficient nurse at the Chicago Home for the Friendless. Among them was Elmira Fifield, a young and devoted girl, who had received a thorough medical education in an Eastern institution, and whose remarkable skill, ability and faithfulness as an attendant soon caused the surgeon in charge of the hospital to assign her to a ward of severely wounded patients. She toiled a year without respite, when her robust health succumbed to the united influence of the malarious atmosphere, over-exertion and want of rest; and all that was mortal of the brave girl was brought back to Chicago in a burial casket.

Such, too, was the fate of the Robb sisters. Three were successively examined and approved by the Nurse Association connected with the Sanitary Commission, and left Chicago for their field of labor in the Southern hospitals—all strong, healthy, and fully consecrated to the work. Their widowed mother, a brave, pious little Scotchwoman, might have been seen, day after day and month after month following their departure, trudging through the streets of Chicago with her basket of delicacies for the sick soldiers at Camp Douglas and various city hospitals, her constant answer to the inquiry why she did not leave her lonely home and go to reside with her friends, being, "Na, na; as long as there is a sick soldier here, I will stay and do what I can for him." Before a year had passed, two of her daughters were driven home to Chicago, only the shadow of their former selves—worn, pallid and feeble. The third remained with the regiment to which she was attached, until it was too late to return; she died at her post, and was buried at Milliken's Bend, in sight of the camp where her holy labors were performed.

LAXITY OF EFFORT.—During the summer of 1862, when sickness was fast decimating the ranks of our Western army, and the necessity for systematic, patient effort was more than ever necessary to fill the depots of the Commission, there was, instead, an appalling falling off of supplies. Aid Societies, once enthusiastic and zealous, became cold and indifferent, and a general feeling of discouragement prevailed. Says Mrs. Henshaw, in explanation of this deplorable state of affairs,—

"The distance of the receding conflict, the reaction from the excitement of the spring battles, the season, and the general discouragement, operated to diminish consignments. Systematic assaults began, also, to be made upon the Commission by opponents of the administration, who, now unreserved in their condemnation of everything helping to sustain the army, pronounced its labors unnecessary, and its management inefficient. More painful than all, the soldiers themselves, who were fast returning home on sick leave and short furloughs, made, in many instances, loud complaint, which was reiterated by their friends, that little benefit accrued to the soldier from the work of the Sanitary Commission, but that sanitary supplies were, in most cases, appropriated by hospital stewards, nurses and surgeons. Some of the Aid Societies labored on nobly and intelligently through all these discouragements; but many became irresolute and disheartened, and a few ceased working altogether. A burden of explanation, remonstrance, reasoning, exhortation and entreaty fell upon the Commission, that in the absence of all personal motives to inspire patience, seems most difficult of endurance. * * * The accusations of returned soldiers, who could not be suspected of desiring to injure an organization devoted to their welfare, deserved and obtained serious attention. While it was not maintained that supplies were never misappropriated, it was found that ignorance of sanitary methods was the basis of much misapprehension. Very few soldiers knew the difference between governmental and sanitary stores, nor what was peculiar to either. Such peculiarities could not easily be distinguished, because articles at one time furnished exclusively by the Commission, were, at another, adopted and issued by the Government, causing continual change. Sutlers sold many delicacies included in the stores of the Commission; and soldiers, distrustful of their officers, did not always stop to discover whether given articles were purchased from the former or purloined from the latter."

"The Commission had, at this time, agents in the field of proved reliability, who formed a chain of communication from Chicago to the front. Dr. H. A. Warriner, an inspector of the United States Sanitary Commission, a gentleman of cultivation, position and responsibility, took chief supervision of its stores. Establishing his headquarters at Columbus, he watched over the condition and management of hospitals from there to the seat of war, giving himself no rest from journeyings, perils and fatigues. Mr. William Goodsmith, whose judgment and fidelity were so remarkable as to create a desire for his continued services wherever their value had been experienced, was stationed at Corinth; Mr. T. P. Robb, afterward, for his intelligence and energy, appointed by Governor Yates State Sanitary Agent of Illinois, represented the Chicago Commission at Jackson. Enthusiastic testimonials were forwarded from different points respecting the fidelity in distributing the stores of the Commission evinced by Mrs. Eliza C. Porter, already mentioned, who had been performing arduous labors at the front since the battle of Pittsburg Landing, and to Mrs. Mary A. Bickerdyke, whose devotion to the soldiers has made her name among them a synonym for motherly kindness. But under the unusual pressure of doubt and misapprehension, it was thought best to employ an agent extraordinary, whose especial mission it should be to visit the hospitals and camps in the southwest, and, while inspecting their general condition, make observations with particular reference to the question of misappropriation. Mr. C. T. Chase was the gentleman entrusted with this errand. He performed it intelligently and thoroughly, visiting the hospitals at Corinth, LaGrange, Bolivar, Jackson, Columbus and intermediate places. * * * Mr. Chase found the agents of the Commission untrusting in their fidelity. They formed a chain from Chicago to the front. From Chicago, the goods passed to Mr. Folsom, at Cairo. Mr. Folsom sent them to Dr. Warriner, at Columbus, Ky., and this gentleman superintended their further progress. Mr. Goodsmith gave earnest care to those designed for the hospitals at Corinth. Mr. Robb sought to obtain positive proof of fidelity in their distribution at Jackson, by establishing over the hospitals there a system of private police. Mrs. Porter took great pains to make the soldiers understand the source from which came the goods that she dispensed, and numerous testimonials were the result, expressive of gratitude to the Commission."

Although the Chicago Commission labored under discouragements through the summer and fall of 1862, it still accomplished much. Goods were sent regularly to its agents; the battle-field of Perryville was visited by a delegation of its members carrying sanitary supplies, where, as at Pittsburg Landing, the condition of the wounded was exceedingly distressing, the only supplies outside of the ordinary army ration, for days and days, being those furnished by the Commission; and the Home at Cairo was also supported, and relief was extended to colored refugees.

THE WOMAN'S COUNCIL.—In November, 1862, Mrs. Hoge and Mrs. Livermore, who had been actively interested and identified with the work of the Commission from the first, attended, as representatives of the Chicago Branch, the first "Woman's Council" of the United States Sanitary Commission. This Council, which was held in Washington, was composed of representative women from the various branches and aid societies of the Central Commission, and its chief objects were to devise means whereby supplies might be obtained regularly, and bestowed on United States troops, irrespective of special regiments or particular States. The Chicago Commission entrusted the organization and superintendence of this work to their representatives at the Woman's Council, who, on their return from Washington, became permanently connected with the Commission as associate managers, entering upon the work assigned them December 8, 1862. On the 16th of the same month, Messrs. George C. Cook, Amos J. Throop, Cyrus Bentley and Ezra B. McCagg were elected members of the Commission.

THE COMMISSION AGAIN FLOURISHES.—With the opening of 1863, the discouragements under which the Chicago Branch had hitherto labored, vanished. Various reasons contributed to this result. The people of the Northwest had learned, through many bitter experiences, that if the Commission had not always the power to take their contributions surely and swiftly to the identical point designated by the donors, and keep careful watch over them after they reached their destination, lest some dishonest officer or greedy nurse should appropriate choice dainties; neither could their own agents and committees provide against every possible mistake and misappropriation, even if they were fortunate enough to penetrate the army lines, which was very uncertain. If the facilities of the Commission were not entirely adequate, their own were almost worthless, and from this time were seldom tried. The churches too, all over the Northwest, joined in the work with a new spirit and fervor; pastors urged the claims of the Commission, and their congregations responded heartily. Active warfare was renewed. The wounded of Chickasaw Bluffs, Arkansas Post, and Murfreesboro' needed help. The members of the Commission, gave their whole time, strength and energy to the work of stimulating supplies. By letters, by visits, by eloquent appeals, by the magnetism of their presence, by the influence of their example, they aroused the indifferent, quickened the sluggish, and directed the energies of the auxiliary societies now rapidly increasing all over the Northwest. They visited the army, and returned to their homes to carry the story of what they saw of want, or sickness, or neglect, or heroism, or self-sacrifice to the women on the prairies, in the cities, on the farms, in the luxurious mansions of Illinois and Wisconsin, Minnesota and Iowa, and everywhere to organize aid societies, if possible. The result was a constant, gradually increasing store of supplies in the depots of the Commission, until supplies were no longer needed.

WORK IN THE FRONT.—Immediately after the battle of Murfreesboro', which ended on January 2, 1863, the Commission raised in Chicago, by personal appeal, $3,000. This was expended in sanitary supplies for the wounded on that field and at Vicksburg. Delegations of nurses were forwarded every day from the Chicago Branch to both points, each delegation taking forward large shipments of stores. Although both the depot and the treasury were nearly empty at the close of 1862, during the opening week of 1863, one hundred and seventy-six packages were forwarded to Murfreesboro, and four hundred to Vicksburg—the latter augmented by the addition of six hundred from the depot at Cairo. The work of the Commission at Chicago soon became of such magnitude that, to relieve the pressure, county societies were formed, the principal town in each county becoming a center, to which the smaller reported, and acting as a medium between its auxiliaries and the Commission at Chicago.

During the early part of 1863, five delegations were sent to Vicksburg, to learn by personal observation the exact needs and condition of the army, so as to be able to report accurately on their return. The first delegation, which left Chicago in January, consisted of Mrs. Hoge, Mrs. H. L. Colt, secretary of the Milwaukee Aid Society, and John C. Williams, of Chicago. This party embarked at Cairo on the steamer "Ruth." This was seized at Columbus as a transport of war by General C. B. Fisk, and the delegates were taken with the expedition of General Gorman up White River, to Duvall's Bluff, Ark. In February, Mrs. Hoge, W. Reynolds, president of the Peoria Branch of Christian Commission, Ira W. Munn and Mr. Willard, of the Chicago Board of Trade, visited General Grant's army at Young's Point, carrying a large amount of supplies of all kinds. Being detained at Memphis, the delegation visited and examined the hospitals at that point; of the condition and management of which a most admirable account was written by Mrs. Hoge. The visit to the camps and hospitals at Young's Point revealed the presence of incipient scurvy, that fearful scourge of the army. Sickness and destitution prevailed among the soldiers to an alarming extent. Twelve thousand men, about thirty-three and one-third per cent. of the whole number, were on the sick list, and the unhealthful location, unfavorable surroundings, lack of good water and nutritious food, threatened to swell the list. The sanitary stores taken by the delegation were transferred to the "Silver Wave," which had been assigned by General Grant as a depot for the stores of the United States Sanitary Commission, and distributed from its store-rooms to the sick. Besides the relief carried to camps and hospitals, the result of this visit was the institution of permanent sanitary reforms in the Western army, and the donation of a large amount of cotton to the Commission, some of which was made into comforts for the soldiers, and enough shipped to the East to bring $1,700 to the treasury of the Chicago Branch.

On the return of this delegation, the work of gathering fresh vegetables and other anti-scorbutics, to ward off scurvy from the troops, was commenced, and vigorously prosecuted until spring, when the danger seemed to have, at least temporarily, passed. The following description of the methods employed in gathering these articles, gives an accurate idea of the labor involved:

"Early in March the Chicago Commission issued an appeal to the Northwest for anti-scorbutics, to be used in the army of General Grant. It was dated March 4, 1863, was short and very urgent. In addition to this little circular, which was scattered throughout the Northwest, and to articles inserted in the Chicago daily journals, the Commission telegraphed concerning the emergency to many of its larger auxiliaries. The following are specimens of dispatches thus forwarded:

"Rush forward anti-scorbutics for General Grant's Army.

MARK SKINNER.

"General Grant's army in danger of scurvy. Rush forward anti-scorbutics.

MARK SKINNER.

"These telegrams were sent to Milwaukee, Detroit, Aurora, Ottawa, Mendota, Rock Island, Beloit, Belvidere, Kenosha, Madison, Racine, Freeport, Sheboygan, Whitewater, Ann Arbor, Adrian, Battle Creek, Grand Rapids, Galesburg, Jackson, Kalamazoo, and many other places.

"Then ensued a passage in the history of the Northwest that was one of the most remarkable of the varied experiences of the aid societies. It was March, the month of the vernal equinox. Vigorous rains had taken the place of the cloudy, sullen weather of winter. The rich, black soil of the Northwest, saturated, and more than ever adhesive, offered an almost impassable barrier to locomotion. But neither rain nor mud was heeded. Wherever the telegrams were sent, wherever the circulars were directed, wherever the newspapers were read, there immediately went abroad committees begging anti-scorbutics for the soldiers.

"The towns were divided into districts, and every house was visited; a central depot of deposit was appointed, to which humble and rich were alike invited to send contributions. In the country, committees went in wagons, begging as they went, and taking possession of what was given as they labored from house to house. This was done, day after day, first in one direction and then in another, through rain and mud, by men and women. These collections were made by the delicate lady, who could ill bear the exposure; by the farmer's wife, who could ill spare the time; by the tradesman, who could ill neglect his business; by the clergyman, who could ill forego his strength. To remarks depreciating such effort, the answer was, 'Our soldiers do not stop for the weather; neither must we.' There were but small quantities of these articles in the Northwest, compared to the usual abundance; for what had escaped a destructive drought, which prevailed the preceding summer, had been in a great measure destroyed by the rot of the wet winter just closing. Illinois had but few of the desired vegetables; in some localities, not enough for planting; in others, none at all. Michigan was a little better off; Wisconsin was still more fortunate; and so was Iowa. But, whatever the supply, whether great or small, it was cheerfully divided with the soldier. In quantities descending from bushels to pecks, from pecks to quarts, from quarts, in some instances, to a handful, the precious stores were gathered. The same causes which had destroyed the onion crop, had diminished also the articles used for pickles; and these were gathered in a similar manner. Cabbage pits were opened, explored and rifled; horseradish was dug and added to the collection.

"From Wisconsin, and those localities which had not suffered from the causes mentioned, the consignments came rushing forward. They filled the depot; they overflowed upon the sidewalk; they encroached even upon the street in front of the Commission rooms. As fast as they arrived they were forwarded, and their places occupied by others. Milwaukee, Racine, and Whitewater, each large shipping points, hurried to Chicago car-load after car-load of the precious homely vegetables, more valuable now than gold. A few farmers of the little towns of Windsor, Bristol and Spring Prairie, Wisconsin, volunteered and forwarded two hundred and twenty-eight bushels. The shipment from Whitewater was the largest and most remarkable.

"The aid societies gave themselves up to the occasion. Regular meetings, extra meetings, and canvassing expeditions, filled up the time. Begging committees were ordered to report on certain days, and the whole society, in its anxiety, came together to hear of the result. These gatherings were, with ready tact, seized and made useful for the packing and forwarding of the onions and potatoes, and for the preparation of the sour-kraut and horseradish. 'Pickling meetings,' as they were called, became the reigning reunions of the aid societies. Barrels and kegs were begged and purchased, sour-kraut cutters were borrowed or hired; men were employed to use them in reducing the cabbage to the requisite fineness, the 'aids' packed it with layers of salt between, and vinegar was poured over the whole. Meanwhile, the 'grating committee,' amid much rallying, and with many tears, was courageously working at the horseradish. Besides the large quantities of anti-scorbutics so freely given, the Commission purchased all that could be found in Chicago. This resource exhausted, aid societies and agents were employed to buy in the surrounding country. On this, and on several similar occasions, the Commission thus swept the market, and sensibly affected prices.

"As rapidly as possible, during the month of March, 1863, were shipped from Chicago, to the army of General Grant, all the anti-scorbutics that could thus be collected by free-will offering and by purchase. All through the month, potatoes and onions, sour-kraut and pickles, rolled across the Central Railroad, and sailed down the Mississippi. A line of vegetables connected Chicago and Vicksburg. Not less than a hundred barrels a day were shipped, and the average was more. In two days, in the middle of the month, were forwarded three hundred and forty-four packages, of which three hundred and fourteen were vegetables. The average of vegetable shipments was a thousand barrels a week, and other sanitary supplies were not sensibly abated. One delegation alone, from the Chicago Branch to Vicksburg, took with it, during this month, thirty tons of supplies.

"This movement is more striking from the fact that the Government had endeavored to obtain these articles, and failed. But for the Sanitary Commission, the army would have gone without them. General and medical officers, present with the troops at Vicksburg, bore testimony to these facts, and to the incalculable value of the shipments made by the Chicago Branch at this time."

On March 10, 1863, the Commission sent a delegation, consisting of Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Colt, of Milwaukee, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Throop, to visit the army encamped at Young's Point and Milliken's Bend, between four and five hundred boxes, of every variety of hospital supplies, were distributed by them among the sick of the army. During March, Dr. Patton visited the army, leaving sanitary stores along the Mississippi posts, and sending a boat-load to the Yazoo Pass. He obtained, during this visit, General Grant's order for the establishment of a sanitary boat on the Mississippi, for the conveyance of the stores of the United States Commission to sick and wounded—the same order forbidding the free transportation of any goods but those of the Sanitary Commission.

"The same struggle that had been instituted, during March, against scurvy in the Army of the Mississippi, commenced in April, on behalf of the Army of the Cumberland. Beginning on April 18th, the Chicago Commission sent a car-load, or about one hundred and twenty-five barrels, daily, for several successive days, to the army of General Rosecrans. Two car-loads were sent on two successive nights to Louisville, for the hospital in charge of Dr. Woodward, near Murfreesboro'. For a time, the great press of vegetable shipments for Murfreesboro' crowded out all other supplies. * * * From January to July, 1863, the Chicago Branch shipped eighteen thousand four hundred and sixty-eight bushels of vegetables. Of other anti-scorbutics, it forwarded in that time sixty one thousand and fifty-six pounds dried fruit, three thousand six hundred and fifty-eight cans of fruit, and three hundred and eighty-seven packages of pickles. In the month of June alone, it shipped two thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven packages, of which two thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine were for the army investing Vicksburg, leaving sixty-eight packages for other localities. One of these shipments filled eight cars. In the first six months of the same year, viz., January to July, 1863, the Commission received into its treasury contributions amounting to $42,158."

After the assaults of May 19 and 22 on the defenses of Vicksburg, Mr. Seelye took to the troops large quantities of sanitary supplies, by the steamer "Jacob Strader," and as soon as those wounded at Vicksburg could be taken to Memphis, the Chicago Branch forwarded to them both nurses and supplies. On June 2, eight hundred and sixty-nine packages were sent for the relief of the Vicksburg sufferers.

By the end of June, the treasury had received, during 1863, $42,158. The Commission had permanently rented commodious rooms under McVicker's theatre, No. 66 Madison Street, and had established a sewing room, for the manufacture of hospital garments. Mr. Blatchford was treasurer of the Commission, Mr. Freeman shipping clerk, Mr. Goodsmith office clerk. During this summer the shipment of ice was commenced. There were eleven thousand sick and wounded men at Memphis, one thousand five hundred at Helena, and in the various hospitals of the Southwest some 50,000. The labors of the Chicago Branch were incessant. During the summer, Mrs. Colonel Sloan, Mrs. C. C. Webster, Mrs. Beaubien, Miss Culver, Miss Elizabeth Hawley, Miss Elizabeth Blakie, A. H. Hoge, C. T. Chase, and others, assisted in office labors.

The autumn brought the battles at Chickamauga and Mission Ridge; the early winter, Knoxville. After the battle of Chickamauga, Dr. Patton went to Nashville, to which place all the wounded who could bear the journey had been sent. Sanitary stores could not immediately be taken further south, on account of the scarcity of transportation, but as soon as possible they were forwarded to Chattanooga, and there deposited by the faithful agents of the Commission, Mrs. Bickerdyke and Mrs. Porter, who had followed General Sherman, at his own desire, from Vicksburg, to that place. Mrs. Bickerdyke was the first woman on the ground after the battle of Mission Ridge, and she was soon joined by Mrs. Porter. Together, they worked through the terrible winter, and, together, followed Sherman's army to Atlanta, improvising hospitals and kitchens, where hosts of wounded were cared for, and hosts of famished fed. No more devoted women served any association than these, and well may the Chicago Commission cherish the remembrance of their fidelity and heroic self-abnegation.

FIRST CHICAGO SANITARY FAIR.—In July, 1863, Mesdames Hoge and Livermore laid before the Commission a formal proposition for a Sanitary Fair in its behalf, to be participated in by all the aid societies in the Northwest. The expenses of the year had been heavy. The armies of the Tennessee and Cumberland had filled the hospitals all over the West, and large accessions of money and supplies were needed by the Commission. They believed they might raise $25,000 by a united effort of the Northwestern women, and also enlist and utilize, for the benefit of the soldiers, a new element hitherto unappropriated. Thus far, there had been little amusement—little that appealed to the pleasure-loving portion of the community in the work of the Sanitary Commission; and all must be reached. Thousands of people could make or buy some pretty trifle, who could not give the needed time and strength to the regular work of the Commission to make their labor profitable. The gentlemen of the Commission encouraged the undertaking, while yet a little doubtful as to its success. A mass meeting of the ladies of Chicago was held, at which a delegation of sixteen ladies was appointed to make preliminary arrangements, the initial step in the programme being the issuing of a circular calling a "Council of Women from the Northwestern States," at Bryan Hall, on September 1, 1863. One hundred and fifty delegates from the various aid societies connected with the Chicago Branch were present at the opening of the council, and their number was doubled during its session. Mrs. A. H. Hoge was made president of the council; and her simple words, "The soldiers must be cared for; remember the wounded of Belmont, Donelson, Shiloh, Perryville and Murfreesboro'," struck the right chord. The vice-presidents were Mrs. Governor Harvey, Madison, Wis.; Mrs. Judge Hubbell, Milwaukee; Mrs. J. A. Rice, Adrian, Mich.; Miss V. Campbell, Detroit, Mich.; Mrs. S. M. Langworthy, Dubuque, Iowa; secretaries, Miss M. Louise Urison and Miss Jennie E. McLaren, Chicago. An executive committee was appointed, of which Mrs. D. P. Livermore was chairman; E. W. Blatchford, treasurer of the Chicago Sanitary Commission, was elected treasurer; and Mrs. Hoge and Mrs. Livermore managers of the Fair, which was to be opened the last week of October and continued two weeks. The following programme was arranged, and carried out:

Bryan Hall was fitted up as a grand bazaar for the sale of fancy and useful articles of all varieties.

Lower Bryan Hall was arranged as a dining hall, where hot dinners for one thousand and five hundred persons were daily served. This department was under the superintendence of Mesdames O. E. Hosmer and W. E. Franklin.

Manufacturers' Hall (a temporary building in rear of Bryan Hall), was used for the display and sale of heavy manufactures.

Rooms in McVicker's theatre were arranged as an Art Gallery, under the supervision of Mrs. H. L.

Colt, of Milwaukee, Wis., and Mrs. E. C. Henshaw, of Ottawa, Ill.

The Supervisors' hall, in the Court House, was filled with rare and valuable relics and trophies, and presided over by Judge James B. Bradwell and wife, Mrs. W. E. Doggett, of Chicago, and Mrs. Dr. Carr, of Madison.

Metropolitan Hall was reserved for evening entertainments, which were supplied by the unflinching genius of Mrs. Livermore.

To perfect all these arrangements required tact, time, and an immense amount of labor. The women of the city and of the Northwest plunged into the work of preparation with zeal commensurate with the demands of the great occasion. This was the pioneer sanitary fair; it was planned by women; was to be executed by them; and it must not fail. "Vigorous correspondence was opened with statesmen, military men, clergymen and aid societies. Circulars, with an earnest written line attached, were scattered like the forest leaves in autumn." On one day, sixteen bushels of mail matter were sent from the rooms of the Commission. Mesdames Hoge and Livermore visited Eastern cities, and aroused enthusiasm for the success of the enterprise among their sanitary workers. New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Connecticut, Pittsburg, sent large and valuable gifts. Farmers and merchants donated their best and rarest; the press gave unsinted space and praise; the pulpit urged on its hearers to help.

Of the opening ceremonies, the pageant of October 28, the Tribune says:

"Memorable it will remain, both as history and as patriotism. Such a sight was never before seen in the West on any occasion, and we doubt whether a more magnificent spectacle was ever presented in the streets of the Empire City itself, than the vast procession of chariots and horsemen, country wagons and vehicles, civic orders and military companies, both horse and foot, which converted Chicago, for the time, into a vast theatre of wonders. From the earliest dawn of the day, the heart of the mighty city was awake, and long before eight o'clock, the streets were thronged with people. Citizens hurried excitedly to and fro, and country women, with their children, came in early in the morning, with colors tied to their bridles, and miniature flags tied to their horses' heads. From house tops, from the tops of public buildings, was displayed the glorious flag of liberty. Drums beat in all parts of the city, summoning the various processions or accompanying them to the great central rendezvous. Bands of music, playing patriotic tunes—bands of young men and women, singing patriotic songs—enlivened the streets."

A striking feature of the procession, was the "Lake County Delegation"—the generous farmers of that county, with one hundred wagons loaded to overflowing, the staid old horses decorated with red, white and blue, and the leading wagon bearing a flag with this inscription, "The gift of Lake County to our brave boys in the hospitals, through the Great Northwestern Fair."

"Every wagon was filled to overflowing, with great heaps of potatoes and silver-skinned onions, mammoth squashes, huge beets, and monster cabbages, barrels of cider, and rosy apples, load after load, with many a gray-haired farmer driving, face weather-beaten, frame rugged, hands bronzed, and eyes sparkling with the excitement of the project his big heart conceived; and back of the farmer, mounted on the vegetables, were the boys, filled to repletion with fun."

On the arrival of the procession at the Court House, an address was delivered by Hon. Thomas B. Bryan, after which the farmers took their laden wagons to the store-houses of the Sanitary Commission, which were more than filled with their generous and wholesome gifts.

It is needless to describe the Fair; suffice it to say, that it was eminently a success from the opening to the close. The most valuable and valued gift was that of the original draft of the Proclamation of Emancipation, written and corrected by the hand of the beloved President, so soon to be taken from the people and the land that could so illy spare him, and by him donated to the Fair, with an autograph letter, ending with the following simple expression of his sympathy with the movement: "I had some desire to retain the paper, but if it shall contribute to the relief or comfort of the soldiers, that will be better." The document, soon to be doubly precious, was purchased by Hon. T. B. Bryan, for the sum of $3,000, and by him donated to the Soldiers' Home, of which he was then the president.

On the last day of the Fair, all the wounded and maimed soldiers from the hospitals, that could possibly be taken to the dining hall, were gathered there, and made to remember with grateful hearts, that the women of the Northwest "delighted to do them honor." Anna Dickinson, in eloquent words, spoke to them of their services, and the love and gratitude they had earned; and then, with cheers for the living heroes and a dirge for the dead, the public exercises of the Fair were closed.

The net proceeds of this First Great Sanitary Fair were $86,000, more than triple the amount expected by the ladies, at the commencement of the undertaking. Soon after its close, the name of the organization, heretofore known as the "Chicago Sanitary Commission," was changed to "Northwestern Sanitary Commission," in accordance with a resolution passed by the assembled ladies at the close of the Fair, reading thus:

"Resolved: That in view of the unanimity with which the Northwestern States have combined in this Fair, we request that the name of the Chicago Sanitary Commission shall now, and henceforth, be Northwestern Sanitary Branch of the United States Sanitary Commission."

At the time of this Fair, the associate members of the Sanitary Commission were, Mrs. A. H. Hoge and Mrs. D. P. Livermore, Chicago; Mrs. H. L. Colt, Milwaukee; Mrs. E. C. Henshaw, Ottawa. Mrs. J. C. Fargo, Mrs. E. C. Long, and Mrs. C. A. Lamb, were secretaries of the Fair, and Messrs. Fargo and Long, cashiers.

CHANGE IN OFFICERS.—With the opening of 1864, some changes were made in the officers and personnel of the Commission. The health of Judge Skinner had become so seriously impaired by the continued strain demanded by his duties as president, that he was obliged to resign his office, much to the regret of his associates, and E. B. McCagg, who for two years or more had been corresponding secretary, was elected to fill the position. Dr. Isham and Messrs. Throop and Ward also resigned about the same time. A sketch of this kind is necessarily a statement of agencies employed, and of results reached at different points. It fails to give, because that can not be set down in words, the work done at the home office in Chicago, in the direction and care of so enormous a charity as was this Commission. The labor imposed upon its responsible head, and the staff at home, and by them well and faithfully done, must be measured by what was accomplished as set down in these pages.

The reorganized board consisted of the following gentlemen: President, E. B. McCagg; Vice-President, Rev. W. W. Patton; Corresponding Secretary, Cyrus Bentley; Treasurer, E. W. Blatchford; B. F. Raymond, Ira Y. Munn, Wesley Munger and Jabez K. Botsford.

DEMANDS ON RESOURCES.—The first call upon the resources of the Commission in 1864, came from Chattanooga, quickly followed by one from Knoxville. To these points there were sent, in January, two hundred and fifty packages; in February, two thousand three hundred; in March, one thousand eight hundred. In April, an average of ten tons daily were shipped from Chicago to those two places. Mrs. Bickerdyke and Mrs. Porter were in the South, with headquarters at Huntsville, Ala., to receive and distribute stores to the portions of Sherman's army most in need, and Dr. Patton went to Knoxville, to attend to the suffering at that point. In May and June, Messrs. McCagg and Blatchford also visited the front, following Sherman's route to Kingston, Ga.; and in October, 1864, Mr. McCagg, in company with the general secretary of the United States Sanitary Commission, made a tour of inspection of the stations and sanitary work at City Point and Bermuda Hundred.

With the close of the Atlanta campaign the demands upon funds and supplies of the Northwestern Commission became so great as to lead to a fear that they might be exhausted. So much money and material had been brought into its treasury by the Fair, that the necessity of continued and persistent labor by the aid societies was not fully realized—and the consequence was, that another extraordinary effort soon became necessary, in order that it might assuredly be in a condition to meet the demands of the sick and wounded.

SECOND SANITARY FAIR.—On Saturday, October 22, 1864, the managers of the Soldiers' Home, Chicago, held a special meeting to consider the best means to be adopted for the conduct of a proposed Fair for the benefit of that institution. At that meeting it was suggested by a member of the Sanitary Commission that the two organizations unite in a joint Fair for the benefit of both. The suggestion was adopted—the basis of union being that $25,000 of the proceeds should be given to the Home—the balance to the Commission. It was decided to open the Fair on February 22, Washington's birthday, and to close on March 4, Presidential inauguration-day. An executive committee, consisting of Mrs. O. E. Hosmer, Mrs. C. P. Dickinson and Thomas B. Bryan for the Home, and Mrs. A. H. Hoge, Mrs. E. W. Blatchford, and Mrs. Lawrence for the Commission, was appointed. On the Tuesday following, the executive committee held a meeting at the office of Hon. T. B. Bryan, for the purpose of arranging plans and details for the task before them. There it was resolved to make a public appeal, and a call was issued for a grand mass meeting in Bryan Hall on October 27. At this meeting, over which Colonel C. G. Hammond presided, the attendance was large, nearly every church in the city being represented. The executive committee reported a plan of operations, and recommended the appointment of the following officers: President, Hon. Mark Skinner; Vice-Presidents, Colonel C. G. Hammond, E. B. McCagg, T. B. Bryan; Secretary and Treasurer, E. W. Blatchford; Corresponding Secretaries, Mesdames A. H. Hoge, D. P. Livermore, C. P. Dickinson.

The work progressed rapidly. On Saturday, the 29th, the ladies again assembled at Metropolitan Hall, when it was determined to introduce the denominational feature in the arrangements, and thus more heartily enlist the churches of the city and country in the enterprise. After the lapse of several weeks, the committees found that the work was of far greater magnitude than at first conceived. It had outgrown the limits of Illinois, or the Northwest even, and now seemed likely to become in reality a National Fair. The time allotted for preparation was altogether insufficient for the consummation of the enlarged plans, and, at a meeting held January 16, 1865, the time of opening was postponed until Tuesday, May 30. This new arrangement rendered almost an entire reorganization necessary. Major-General Joseph Hooker was chosen honorary president of the Fair; an honorary committee was appointed, embracing prominent names from all over the country; Hon. Thomas B. Bryan was chosen chairman of the executive committee, E. B. McCagg vice-president, E. W. Blatchford treasurer, and Mrs. O. E. Hosmer was added to the former list of corresponding secretaries.

Committees of business men, representing every branch of industry, were appointed, with sub-committees innumerable, and the vast machinery was speedily set in good working order. Mrs. Hoge and Mrs. Livermore, also several gentlemen, visited the East in the interests of the Fair, the ladies on a special mission to invite President and Mrs. Lincoln to attend the exercises. In April, the "Voice of the Fair," a paper edited by Andrew Shuman, of the Chicago Journal, and devoted to the interests of the Fair, was started, and proved a most valuable auxiliary to its success. In the early part of the month of May the proposition was made by the Northwestern Branch of the Christian Commission, of which John V. Farwell was president, to unite with the Sanitary Commission and Soldiers' Home, and share the labor and benefits of the Fair. A basis of union was finally decided upon, by virtue of which, the Christian Commission was to receive $50,000 of the net proceeds, the balance to be equally divided between the Sanitary Commission and Soldiers' Home.

The expectations of the managers of the Fair, and of the thousands working in its behalf, fell somewhat, when, with the fall of Richmond, and the collapse of the Rebellion, the national conditions under which the work was projected were so changed, that the "beginning of the end" of sanitary labors in the army could be seen. To many, it seemed that the actual end had come.

The day appointed for the laying of the corner-stone of the Fair building brought the tidings of the assassination of President Lincoln. The work was to have been inaugurated with the usual parades and processions. All these were abandoned. "Ichabod" was written on the projected walls of the splendid structure; and with heavy hearts and hands the work was begun. This feeling of depression could not soon pass away, and the prosecution of the labor, although brave and vigorous, thereafter lacked the joyous enthusiasm which marked its inception.

On the opening day, however, the gigantic preparations were nearly completed. The Fair building was an immense structure, consisting of a central edifice and two parallel wings. Union Hall, the central portion, consisting of a main hall with a minor or sub-hall on each side, was sixty feet wide, about four hundred long, and enclosed by a Gothic arch fifty-five feet high. The wings, of the same depth as the main building, were forty-five feet wide. The structure covered Dearborn Park, and inclosed an acre of ground. The main entrance was on Washington Street, fronting Lake Michigan. The Soldiers' Rest, near by, was connected with Union Hall by bridges, and served for a dining hall. Besides the main building, was the Hall of Arms and Trophies, under the superintendence of Judge James B. Bradwell, in Bryan Hall; the Art Gallery, in a building in the rear of Bryan Hall; Monitor Hall, on the lake shore, north of the Soldiers' Rest; Horticultural Hall, covering the whole of Michigan Avenue from Washington to Randolph streets; the New England Farm House, in the north end of the Soldiers' Rest; and various other departments, too numerous to mention. The denominational and fancy booths, with those representing various States, classes of goods, and manufactures, were located in Union Hall.

The "Army of the American Eagle," which, through the skill and tact of Alfred L. Sewell, of Chicago, brought to the treasury $16,308.93—nearly one-tenth of its entire profits—must not be forgotten. His device was to enlist an army of children—they becoming members or officers of the army by selling a greater or less number of the pictures of "Old Abe," the famous eagle of the 8th Wisconsin Infantry, for the benefit of the Fair. How zealously he and they worked is shown by the result noted above.

The inaugural ceremonies were opened by Hon. T. B. Bryan. Buchanan Reed recited a poem written for the occasion; there was an original hymn by O. W. Holmes, and a speech by Governor R. J. Oglesby. Generals Grant and Sherman and Hooker (the latter honorary president of the Fair), besides scores of officers of lesser military rank, were present, during the progress of the Fair.

Among those prominent in carrying on the work may be mentioned the following, who officiated as superintendents of various departments and booths:

Foreign, Charles L. Wilson, Mrs. W. J. Barney; New England Farm-House, Cyrus Bentley, Mrs. O. B. Wilson; Bryan Hall, Arms and Trophies, Judge J. B. Bradwell and wife; Michigan, Miss Valeria Campbell; Wisconsin, Mrs. T. B. Miller; Philadelphia, Mrs. T. P. James; Norway, Mrs. Louis Johnson; Horticultural Hall, A. H. Hovey, John Blair; Colleges and Seminaries, Dr. Burroughs, of the Chicago University; Roman Catholic, Mrs. General W. T. Sherman, Mrs. Judge Arrington; Presbyterian, Mrs. Z. M. Humphrey, Mrs. E. S. Wadworth; Unitarian, Mrs. Henry Sayrs, Mrs. S. Tinkham; Universalist, Mrs. D. F. Livermore, Mrs. J. H. Tuttle; Methodist, Mrs. O. H. Tiffany; Episcopal, Mrs. Clinton Locke, Mrs. Frank; Congregational, Mrs. W. W. Patton; Baptist, Mrs. C. N. Holden; New Jerusalem, Mrs. J. M. Underwood; Spiritualists, Mrs. J. S. Fuller; Miscellaneous, Mrs. H. L. Bristol.

The German ladies also contributed, through their department, largely to the proceeds.

The fair lasted three weeks. The net receipts amounted to $240,813 of which the Northwestern Commission received $84,364.

LAST WORK OF THE COMMISSION.—At the end of July, 1865, the official connection of Mrs. Hoge and Mrs. Livermore with the Commission ceased, the work of the office being thenceforward done chiefly by Mr. Goodsmith. Mrs. Porter was still in the field, being employed through the summer in the hospitals at Louisville and Huntsville. On her return to Chicago in the fall, the Commission held a meeting (October 7) and voted to send supplies under her charge to the soldiers still on the Mexican frontier, to which locality she and her husband immediately proceeded, and remained until June, 1866, Mrs. Porter being the last as well as the first agent of the Northwestern Commission in the field. On October 1, 1865, the Home at Cairo was closed; and on November 30, the Commission held its last meeting, and the office in Chicago was also closed. The following summary of the work accomplished by the Northwestern Branch of the United States Sanitary Commission is taken from the pages of its published history:

"In the four years of its existence the Northwestern Commission disbursed seventy-seven thousand six hundred and sixty-six packages from its storehouse and $105,792.66 from its treasury. It received thirty-one thousand nine hundred and sixty-nine of these packages from its tributaries, and the remainder it purchased.

"The First Sanitary Fair brought to this Branch the sum of $72,645, and the Dubuque Fair, $50,348, which are included in the above estimate. The Second Sanitary Fair brought it the sum of $84,364.67. From other sources, $74,665.51. Whole money receipts of Branch, $411,027.35.

"The value of the whole disbursements amounted to $1,056,192. * * * This Branch did, also, the work of the Union and of the Freedman's Commission, before either of these organizations found existence. This is a part of its unrecorded labor which has never had an accurate estimate. But so much is on record, viz., that it furnished transportation for the supplies raised on behalf of these interests, and disbursed for them, in money and goods, over $50,000. For the Northwestern Christian Commission, it furnished largely the transportation and traveling passes needed by its supplies and agents. And from the proceeds of the last Sanitary Fair, it voted to give the Christian Commission the sum of $50,000, and faithfully executed the agreement."

NORTHWESTERN BRANCH OF CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.—The United States Christian Commission was formed November 16, 1861, at a convention of the delegates from the Young Men's Christian Associations, its object being "to promote the spiritual and temporal welfare of the officers and men of the United States army and navy, in co-operation with chaplains and others." At the head of the organization, as president of the executive committee, was George H. Stewart, Esq., of Philadelphia, who gave the Commission rooms for its central office and storehouse, the services of clerks, porters, etc., and his own time and labor, free of charge, and faithfully worked, from first to last, in its interests. Agencies or branches were established in the principal cities of the Union, the president of the Chicago Branch being John V. Farwell, who was also a member of the Central organization. The other members of the Chicago Branch were Tuthill King, B. F. Jacobs and D. L. Moody.

The Commission had two general divisions of labor: that in camps and hospitals at a distance from the field being under the charge of the Young Men's Christian Association, if practicable, and that at the seat of war under the charge of the Commission proper—the latter division comprising the care and relief of the wounded during and after battle, and supplementing the labor of the army chaplains. During the year 1862, the Chicago Commission sent out twenty-six men and four women as commissioned delegates, who visited camps, battle-fields and hospitals all over the Western Department, distributing stores and relieving distress, both physical and mental, wherever it could be reached. A chapel was built by the Branch, at Camp Douglas, that would hold over one thousand persons, in which daily meetings were held. These were attended, not only by Federal soldiers, but by the Confederate prisoners, and were believed to be productive of much good. Just before the departure of the 113th Illinois Infantry for the seat of war, a soldiers' Communion was held, in which over two hundred participated. The departments of Missouri and Tennessee fell especially within the field of labor of the Chicago Branch, and much good work was done by it during Grant's long campaign on the Mississippi, in the camps at Young's Point and Vicksburg, and in the various hospitals at Memphis, Helena and Corinth.

With the opening of 1863, the work of the Commission commenced with the sending of delegates and supplies to Murfreesboro'. The report of the year states that, during 1863, forty-eight delegates were sent to the field, who visited the battle-fields, camps and hospitals at Louisville, Nashville, Murfreesboro', Cowan Station, Bridgeport, Stevenson, Chattanooga, Tullahoma, Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, Cairo, Corinth, Memphis, Vicksburg, Natchez, Helena, Little Rock, New Orleans, and other places, spending an aggregate of sixty-five months, holding thousands of meetings and distributing to many thousand soldiers religious publications, as well as stores for their temporary necessities.

The receipt of money during the year is reported at $8,182.29, of which $5,806.14 was expended on the field, and $2,003.37 remitted to Philadelphia for relief of Richmond prisoners; 275,200 copies of the Bible and religious books and papers were distributed, besides an immense number of tracts. The local work of the Chicago Branch was in Camp Douglas, Camp Wright, the City, Marine and Camp Douglas hospitals, and the Soldier's Home, of the city.

The officers of the Northwestern, or Chicago Branch, of the United States Christian Commission, in 1864, were: John V. Farwell, president; B. F. Jacobs, secretary; S. P. Farrington, treasurer; D. L. Moody, J. L. Reynolds, P. L. Underwood, executive committee. In addition to places visited during the preceding year, delegates were sent to Bridgeport, Huntsville, Fredericksburg, the battle-fields of the Wilderness and Shenandoah Valley, and various other points. These delegates gave their time (their traveling expenses, except meals, were free), so that nearly everything contributed could be used for the benefit of the soldiers. At the close of 1864, the following report of operations, since the opening of the war, was made:

Contributed from June 1, 1861, to Dec. 30, 1863	$ 20,127 89
Contributed during 1864	83,189 93
	$103,317 82
Disbursed from June 1, 1861, to Dec. 30, 1863	$ 19,679 52
Expenses	448 37
Disbursed during 1864	77,090 96
Expenses, 1864	2,786 83
	$100,005 68

Throughout the war, the Commission was ready to co-operate with other organizations for the relief of the soldiers, and, in the summer of 1865, joined with the Northwestern Sanitary Commission and Soldiers' Home of Chicago in holding an immense fair, the Christian Commission receiving $50,000 of the net proceeds. At that time, the army work of the organization was drawing to a close, and the fund thus established was turned into other channels when the soldiers needed it no longer.

CAMP DOUGLAS HOSPITAL AID SOCIETY.—This benevolent society was founded, December 18, 1861, by a few leading ladies of the South Division of the city, who desired to do something for the welfare of sick soldiers at Camp Douglas. The ladies first engaged were mostly members of Grace Episcopal Church. These were gradually joined by other ladies from various churches, and the benefactions of the society were extended beyond Camp Douglas to other hospitals, finally reaching to soldiers' families. When the City Hospital passed into the hands of the United States, the society assumed the charge of furnishing for it the comforts which could not be expected from Government, but which are so grateful to the sick. In the spring of 1863, the ladies opened a repository at No. 51 State Street, for the purpose of procuring work for the wives of soldiers and for other poor women, and of selling any articles they might make. On the formation of the Ladies' Relief Society, in the winter of 1863, and the consolidation of various benevolent societies for home work at that time the Camp Douglas Aid Society directed their labors into another channel—the establishment of a free hospital for the sick poor of the city. A small building, No. 539 State Street, was procured, and the hospital was opened with accommodations for but six patients. About this time, St. Luke's Hospital was established, and these patients were transferred to that institution.

THE LADIES' RELIEF SOCIETY was organized on December 12, 1863, as auxiliary to the Young Men's Christian Association, and had for its especial object the relief of soldiers' families, providing fuel, food and work, if possible. Its officers were: President, Mrs. A. H. Hoge; Vice-President, Mrs. E. I. Tinkham; Secretary, Mrs. C. A. Lamb; Treasurer, Mrs. H. D. Smith.

THE LADIES' LOYAL LEAGUE was formed in May, 1863, as a secret organization, but becoming convinced that more good could be accomplished by another course, the ladies reorganized as an open league the following October. Of this society, Mrs. Henry Sayrs was president, and Mrs. Paul Mondon secretary. All needy persons shared the benefits of the League. In the winter of 1863, the ladies established a Soup-House on Washington Street, D. L. Moody furnishing them a room for the purpose, and during that winter a daily warm meal was furnished to the poor of the city.

PHILO CARPENTER'S OLD RESIDENCE, CORNER OF RANDOLPH AND MORGAN STREETS.

THE BOARD OF TRADE.

INTRODUCTORY.—The history of the Board of Trade, in the first volume of this work, does not show that it was on a stable or paying basis, such as could guarantee a continued and useful existence, until 1857. At that time it had so far developed as a regulating and fostering power in conducting the growing trade and commerce of the city, as to be recognized as the most important agency for carrying on the business of its rapidly increasing list of members, which comprised representatives from nearly every leading commercial firm in Chicago. With the exception of some crude by-laws, regulating the business conduct of its members and the gathering and publication of statistics, also the public interest it had shown through its various resolutions and acts on questions concerning the prosperity of Chicago, the Board had done little practical or efficient commercial work; and that little carried small weight outside the circle of its own members, except so far as it commanded respect for the apparent merits of its acts and for the influential and respectable standing of the body, as fairly representing the business sentiment of the city. The most important measures it had inaugurated prior to 1858 were: The suggestion, first promulgated by the Board in 1854, which resulted in the substitution of weights, instead of measures, in measuring grain, seeds, and other commodities; and the first attempts, in 1856, to designate wheat by standard grades. These two reforms marked the beginning of the present system of handling, measuring and inspecting grain now generally adopted in the principal grain marts of the world.

During the period treated in this volume, the Board became the chief exponent of mercantile power and the great medium through which business in grain, breadstuffs and provisions was transacted—having a controlling influence over methods of doing business and in the establishment of prices, not only throughout the West and Northwest, but in Eastern markets and those across the sea. In 1857, there were no western grades of wheat known, and, of the seven and one-half million bushels exported to England in that year, it is doubtful whether a single bushel was known in the English markets as Chicago wheat, or whether many buyers even knew of the existence of such an organization as the Board of Trade of Chicago. In 1871, nearly twenty-three million bushels of American wheat were sold in London and Liverpool, of which probably three-fourths was raised west of Lake Michigan; and wheat known and sold by the grades established in Chicago then became familiar to the English buyer, while prices on the Chicago Board were telegraphed to the produce exchanges and English grain dealers, as important factors in the settlement of the market prices of the day.

The story of the growth of the Board of Trade, from the days of small things to the influential position it came to occupy among kindred institutions throughout the world, is so interlaced with the growth of western commerce and western business methods—being little less than their complete history in all the different phases of development—that it may command an interest not restricted to those engaged in commercial pursuits.

THE YEAR 1858-59.

The tenth annual election of the Board was held April 5, 1858. Officials for the ensuing year were elected as follows: Julian S. Rumsey, president; T. H. Beebe, vice-president; W. W. Mitchell, secretary and treasurer. The members numbered, at the beginning of the year, four hundred and sixty-one, which was increased at the annual meeting by the accession of twenty-nine, and in October by the addition of thirty. The treasurer's report showed the fiscal affairs to be in a solvent condition. At this meeting, the first move was made for the restriction of the business transacted on 'Change to members of the Board, by the passage of an amendment to the by-laws, providing that none but actual residents engaged in business in Chicago, should be admitted to membership, and forbidding the buying or selling of provisions, grain, flour or lumber, the chartering of vessels, or the contracting for freights, on 'Change, by any person not a member of the Board. The question of an entire revision of the constitution and by-laws was discussed, resulting in several changes during the year, and a complete revision during the following year.

INSPECTION OF WHEAT.—A most important improvement in the inspection and grading of wheat was inaugurated during the year, which, with the co-operation of warehousemen, was put into effect. An inspector of grain was appointed, grades of wheat established, and each grade definitely described, as never before, specifying required weight, condition, etc. The inspector had full control of the assistant inspectors at elevators receiving grain from the several railroads, with the consent of the proprietors of the leading elevators, which was cheerfully accorded. Thus began the great reform in the handling of grain, which was the basis of the present system, the perfection and reliability of which are recognized throughout the world, wherever American wheat is bought.*

TELEGRAPHIC REPORTS.—Daily telegraphic market reports were first regularly received by the Board, for the benefit of its members, during 1858. The cost of obtaining such reports was not defrayed from the general treasury, but was raised by subscription, the amount subscribed being $500. It was at first determined to receive reports from New York, Montreal, Buffalo and Oswego, at that time the most important markets to which Chicago products were shipped; but the outlay required having been found to exceed the sum subscribed, dispatches from New York only were received. The cost of the dispatches for the year was $435.25, paid to the telegraph company; the balance—$64.75—was remitted to Mr. Trafton, of New York, as compensation for securing and forwarding the reports from that city.

FIRST STOCK TRANSACTIONS.—In October, Messrs. Lee & Armstrong were, by vote of the Board, permitted to sell stocks on 'Change, by auction, after the close of the regular sessions, on two days of each week. How long the sales, thus authorized, were continued is not recorded. This was one of the earliest, if not the first, attempt made in Chicago, to sell stocks and securities in a manner similar to that of Stock Exchanges in Eastern cities. It has never developed into sufficient magnitude to be recognized as an important element even of the speculative trade of the city.

* For further information concerning the establishment of the new system of inspection, see article on Elevators.

RECIPROCIITY TREATY.—During the fall, the attention of the Board was for a time engrossed in what were then considered very important questions, growing out of the commercial treaty in force with Canada, known as the "Reciprocity Treaty." The questions first brought to notice by a communication from the New York Chamber of Commerce, were: Under the existing treaty, can flour manufactured in Canada from wheat grown in the United States be admitted into our ports free of duty? and, Can shaved shingles be admitted free of duty? The subject was submitted to a committee, which, after due deliberation, reported that in their opinion not only both articles named, but also flour made from corn, oats, or other grain, should be admitted free.

CHARTER OF THE BOARD.—In February, 1859, the functions of the Board of Trade were defined and enlarged by a special article of incorporation passed by the General Assembly. It read as follows:

Be it enacted by the People of the State of Illinois, represented in the General Assembly:

SECTION 1. That the persons now composing the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, are hereby created a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of the "BOARD OF TRADE OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO," and by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, receive and hold property and effects, real and personal, by gift, devise or purchase, and dispose of the same by sale, lease or otherwise, said property so held not to exceed at any time the sum of two hundred thousand dollars; may have a common seal, and alter the same from time to time, and make such rules, regulations and by-laws from time to time as they may think proper or necessary for the government of the corporation hereby created, not contrary to the laws of the land.

SECTION 2. That the rules, regulations and by-laws of the said existing Board of Trade shall be the rules and by-laws of the corporation hereby created, until the same shall be regularly repealed or altered; and that the present officers of said Association, known as the "Board of Trade of the City of Chicago," shall be the officers of the corporation hereby created, until their respective offices shall regularly expire, or be vacated, or until the election of new officers according to the provisions hereof.

SECTION 3. The officers shall consist of a president, one or more vice-presidents, and such other officers as may be determined upon by the rules, regulations or by-laws of said corporation; all of said officers shall respectively hold their offices for the length of time fixed upon by the rules and regulations of said corporation hereby created, and until their successors are elected and qualified.

SECTION 4. The said corporation is hereby authorized to establish such rules, regulations and by-laws, for the management of their business, and the mode in which it shall be transacted, as they may think proper.

SECTION 5. The time and manner of holding elections and making appointments of such officers as are not elected, shall be established by the rules, regulations or by-laws of said corporation.

SECTION 6. Said corporation shall have the right to admit or expel such persons as they may see fit, in manner to be prescribed by the rules, regulations or by-laws thereof.

SECTION 7. Said corporation may constitute and appoint committees of reference and arbitrations, and committees of appeals, who shall be governed by such rules and regulations as may be prescribed in the rules, regulations or by-laws for the settlement of such matters of difference as may be voluntarily submitted for arbitration, by members of the association, or by other persons not members thereof; the acting chairman of either of said committees, when sitting as arbitrators, may administer oaths to the parties and witnesses, and issue subpoenas and attachments compelling the attendance of witnesses, the same as justices of the peace, and, in like manner, directed to any constable to execute.

SECTION 8. When any submission shall have been made in writing, and a final award shall have been rendered, and no appeal taken within the time fixed by the rules or by-laws, then, on filing such award and submission with the clerk of the Circuit Court, an execution may issue upon such award as if it were a judgment rendered in the Circuit Court, and such award shall thenceforth have the force and effect of such a judgment, and shall be entered upon the judgment docket of said Court.

SECTION 9. It shall be lawful for said corporation, when they shall think proper, to receive and require of and from their officers, whether elected or appointed, good and sufficient bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties and trusts, and the president or secretary is hereby authorized to administer such oaths of office as may be prescribed in the by-laws or rules of said corporation; said bonds shall be made payable and conditioned as prescribed by the rules or by-laws of said corporation, and may be sued, and the moneys collected and held for the use of the party injured, or such other use as may be determined upon by said corporation.

SECTION 10. Said corporation shall have power to appoint one or more persons, as they may see fit, to examine, measure, weigh, gauge or inspect flour, grain, provisions, liquor, lumber, or any other articles of produce or traffic commonly dealt in by the members of said corporation, and the certificate of such person or inspector, as to the quality or quantity of any such article, or their brand or mark upon it, or upon any package containing such article shall be evidence between buyer and seller, of the quantity, grade or quality of the same, and shall be binding upon the members of said corporation, or others interested, and requiring or assenting to the employment of such weighers, measurers, gaugers or inspectors; nothing herein contained, however, shall compel the employment, by any one, of any such appointee.

SECTION 11. Said corporation may inflict fines upon any of its members, and collect the same, for breach of its rules, regulations or by-laws, but no fine shall exceed five dollars; such fines may be collected, by action of debt, before a justice of the peace, in the name of the corporation.

SECTION 12. Said corporation shall have no power or authority to do or carry on any business, excepting such as is usual in the managements of Boards of Trade, or Chambers of Commerce, or as provided in the foregoing sections of this bill.

WM. R. MORRISON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN WOOD,

Speaker of the Senate.

Approved February 18th, 1859.

WM. H. BISSELL, Governor.

By the provisions of the new charter, powers were conferred upon the Board which greatly increased its authority and efficiency. Theretofore it had no legal right to compel the settlement of disputes arising among its members through arbitration, or to enforce the awards made by the committee of reference, even when the cases decided had been voluntarily submitted by the contestants. It thus happened that the cases submitted were unimportant, and the decisions made had little effect in the promotion of fair dealing or in the prevention of litigation in the courts. The charter gave to the committees of arbitration power to administer oaths, compel the attendance of witnesses, the same as justices of the peace, and gave force to its final awards, on which judgments might issue if no appeals were taken, as if the same judgments had been obtained in the Circuit Court. The tribunal thus became invested with the legal authority of an inferior court over the business transactions of its members. The charter also, for the first time, conferred on the Board the power to appoint weighers, gaugers, measurers and inspectors, and made the brands or certificates of such appointees of the Board evidence between buyers and sellers who employed them, as to quality and quantity of property inspected, measured or weighed.

The Board, soon after its special charter was granted, adopted a more comprehensive code of by-laws, under which the new powers conferred upon it could be brought into practical use.

Many of the individual operators and firms of brokers who became members of the Board in these early years, have continued to be prominently identified with its subsequent growth and prosperity, and they are entitled to something more than passing mention.

RUMSEY BRO. & CO.—John S. C. Hogan, 1828 to 1831; Newberry & Dole, 1831 to 1847; G. W. Dole, 1847 to 1848; Dole, Rumsey & Co., 1848 to 1854; Rumsey Bro. & Co., since January 1, 1854.

Oliver Newberry, of Detroit, brother of the late Walter L. Newberry, of Chicago, was one of the earliest and most energetic pioneers on the Western lakes. Among his vessels were the schooners "Napoleon," "Austerlitz," "Lagrange," "Marshal Ney," "Marengo," "Prince Eugene," "Jena," "Detroit" and "A. V. Knickerbocker," the brig "Manhattan," and the steamboats "Michigan," "Illinois," "Nile," "Michigan 2d" and "Illinois 2d." The names of these vessels are given because they, as well as their owner, being pioneers, did much toward populating Chicago and the Northwest, and because many will remember them with much pleasure. Oliver Newberry controlled the sutlership of Fort Dearborn, and, in 1828, sent John S. C. Hogan to Chicago to attend to its duties, which he did until 1831. G. W. Dole came to Chicago in May, 1831, to succeed Mr. Hogan, and Madore Beaubien, Antoine Ouillmette, Elijah Wentworth, G. S. Hubbard, R. E. Heacock, Alexander Robinson, Billy Caldwell (the last two Indian chiefs), R. J. Hamilton (general office-holder), Joseph Bailey, T. J. V. Owen, E. E. Hunter, J. N. Bailey, William See, J. Porter, S. Forbes, Rufus Brown, Gholson Kercheval, Thomas Hartsell (former owner of Newberry's Addition), J. Roth, P. F. W. Peck, Dexter Graves, John and Mark Noble, John Blackstone (Blackstone's Grove), John Welmaker, S. Ellis, Judethan Smith, A. D. Taylor, Heman Bond, B. Harris, Seth Scott, Claude LaFramboise, Francis Bulbony (Bulbony's Grove), Joseph Naper (Naperville), Charles Taylor, N. Bolvin, John Naper, Matthew Legg, S. P. Brady, George H. Walker, E. D. Harmon, Anson H. Taylor, Hiram Pearson, G. W. Snow, Paul Samberneau, I. Harmon, Willard Scott, Alanson Sweet, Peter Cohen, John as a partner of Mr. Newberry. Still continuing the sutlership, he established a storage, forwarding and commission business, under the firm name of Newberry & Dole. Mr. Newberry resided in Detroit until his death, as did Mr. Dole in Chicago, the latter dying April 13, 1860. On the 2d of July, 1847, Thurlow Weed, while on board the steambot "Empire," on his way to the Chicago River and Harbor Convention, said of Mr. Newberry: "Early this morning we passed the steamer 'Illinois,' Commander Blake. She is owned by my old friend, Oliver Newberry, whose intelligence and enterprise are associated with all the improvements of this new world." Of Mr. Dole it is only necessary to say that, from the time of his selection as first lieutenant by the early settlers for defense against the Indians at the breaking out of the Black Hawk War in 1832, and his election as one of the town trustees and as town treasurer at the incorporation of Chicago, in 1833, to the time of his death, he was almost constantly in some place of public trust, being sought after to settle differences of his neighbors, and known by them to be an honest man. On the first page of one of their day-books, still in existence, labelled "Blotter B," under date of April 11, 1831, are charges against Lieutenant David Hunter, now major-general in the United States Army (retired), Joseph LaFramboise, Mrs. Ellen Wolcott, "per Mrs. Helm"—the first being the wife of Dr. Wolcott, original proprietor of Wolcott's Addition, the other, one of the few whose lives were spared at the massacre in Chicago in 1812; also against R. A. Kinzie, who entered Kinzie's Addition at the Government Land Office, at $1.25 per acre; John K. Clark, A. Clybourn, Stephen I. Scott, David McKee, J. B. Beaubien, Lieutenant Amos B. Foster, brother of the late Dr. J. H. Foster—all prominent for various reasons in early Chicago. To the end of the second and only remaining book, to June 15, 1833, frequently occur the following names: J. H. Kinzie, Mark Beaubien, J. S. C. Hogan, James Kinzie, Samuel Miller, John Mann,

Edu. E. Hunter

GEORGE W. DOLE

Isaac Harmon

Watkins, Dr. P. Maxwell, David Carver, S. Downer (Downer's Grove), S. T. Gage and B. H. Loughton. The above named persons, and others also, while all here before the incorporation of the town in 1833, were not necessarily voters on that occasion. Many were officers in the army, others had settled in the surrounding country, some had not been here long enough to entitle them to vote, others were Canadian French, Courriers du Bois, half-breeds, etc. Entries are also made against the American Fur Company, the Indian Department and the Quartermaster's Department. The troops must have left Fort Dearborn about the 1st of June, as charges against them cease about that time; and, on the 5th of June, 1831, are sent to N. Goodell, at Green Bay, for collection, notes against Co. "A" for $1,155 87, and also against Co. "I" for $1,006, both companies being of the 5th Regiment of Infantry. On April 15, Lieutenant Hunter is charged as follows: "To 1 letter to Mrs. J. H. Kinzie, 25 cts"; and on the 20th, "To amount postage account up to March 31, $12.50." Other officers are charged with different sums for postage. The sutler's store seems to have comprised a post-office, hardware, dry goods, crockery, arms, groceries, provisions, liquors, lumber, leather, horses, whisky, and Indian goods generally. Banking was quite an important feature also, as many of the individuals named above are charged, at different times with cash borrowed, in sums varying from $1 to $1,000, and even larger on one or two occasions, as well as with an endless variety of articles, including guns, powder, shot, lead, caps, flints, knives, and even daggers, fish-lines, hooks, etc. Whisky was sold at 40 cents and at 50 cents a gallon, corn meal at $1, and dried apples at $1.02½ per bushel. Flour is charged at $6 and dried apples at $3.50 a barrel. Many Spanish cigars were sold at 25 cents a dozen. Much liquor was sold in small quantities; and just before New Year's day there were made twenty-three charges for small quantities of whisky, gin, wine, shrub, etc.; Mr. Dole charging himself with "1 bottle, etc., $1."

Other prices charged on those days, were: 1 pair brogans, $2; 13 yards domestic plaid, at 12½ cts.; ½ yard linen cambric, at $3.50; 5 lbs. hard bread, at 18½¢; 1 lb. raisins, .25; 2 lbs. shot, .12½; 1 qt. wine, .75; 1 qt. brandy, .50; 1 qt. sherry, 50½¢; 1 pair Russia duck pantaloons, $1.25; 50 percussion caps, .12½; garden seeds, .62½; 100 lbs. 6d. nails, .12½; 1 gal. cider, .18½; 1 pair pumps, $1.02½; 2 pairs socks, at 62½¢ and .50; 1 dozen Spanish cigars, .25; 1 pair colored kid gloves, .50; 1½ lbs. black paint, .50; 1 set cups and saucers, .75; 1 bbl. S. F. flour, $9.

On October 12, Oliver Newberry, of Detroit, was charged with "3 boxes specie, $5,000, shipped by schooner 'Marengo.'" It has ceased to be necessary to ship money East by sail vessel. In January, 1832, T. J. V. Owen is credited "By three months' board, per Dole, at $10—$30." D. Graves, "By 11 wolf skins, .25, and 1 fox skin, .75." James Kinzie is charged "To 6 bush. oats, at .87½." In April, R. J. Hamilton is charged "To 1 bbl. flour, $8.00." A. Robinson is credited "By 42 'coon skins, at .37½; 20 'coon skins, at .20, and 4 mink skins, at .25; 150 muskrat skins, at .20; 1 otter, $1.50; 13 deer skins, at .50; 1 otter, $5.50; 40 muskrats, at .20; and 4 dry hides." In May, Oliver Newberry is charged as follows: "Pr. Schooner 'Marshal Nev.' To 1033 'coon skins, 2577 rat skins, 118 deer skins, 66 wolf, 30 wild cat, 13 red fox, 4 gray fox, 67 mink, 5 otter, 6 badger, 10 fawn, 43 dry hides, 3 calf skins—and also cash and check, $400.04. In June, 1832, the Indian Department is charged "To 1 bbl. pork, $14; 10 bbls. of flour, at $6; and also 5 bbls. pork, at $12.50"; and the American Fur Co. "To 1 blank book, $1.75." About this time the fort was re-garrisoned, as appears from the names of Major Whistler, Captain McKay, Captain J. B. Brown, Lieutenant Smith (of Captain Backus's Company), Lieutenant Kingsbury, Captain Boardman, Lieutenant Penrose, Dr DeCamp, Captain Johnson, Lieutenant Long, Lieutenant Day and Dr. P. Maxwell. In July, R. Brown was charged "To 1 bush. dried apples, $2.00." Indian Department, "To 2 bbls. prime pork, at $12.50." Major Whistler, "To 1 bbl. pork, one hog, $15; 1 bush. corn, $1." Quartermaster Kingsbury, "To 90 feet of boards, $1.50." D. McKee, "To 273 ft. boards, $5.40." August Knuyam, "To 1 bbl. salt, $3." Lieutenant Smith (Captain Backus's Company), "To 1 bbl. crackers, $6.50; 33 lbs. ham, 12½."

On August 23, John Sherry was charged "To cash advanced, $100, on 43 bbls. of flour left in store to sell at $6; 10 kegs of butter, containing 307 lbs., to sell at 12½; 10 kegs of lard, containing 501 lbs., to sell at 10 cts.; 12 bush. meal at $1.25 per bush." (This, doubtless, is the first commission business transacted in Chicago.) In September, Major Whistler was charged "To 12 bush. corn at $1." Captain Johnson, "Per daughter, to 1 pair thin shoes, $1." J. Sherry is credited "By 114 bush. oats at .43; by 39 bbls. flour, to clear $6; by 1 keg lard (50 lbs.) at 10;" and was charged "To 65.70 bbls. salt at $3, and 1 umbrella, $1.50." Charles Reid is charged with 11,210 bbls. of salt at $3.00; 1 pair of boots, $4.00. Lieutenant Penrose is charged "To 1 blue blanket, $6." John Noble "To 1 cook stove, $45." Willard Scott, "To 1 cook stove, $40." Mark Noble, "To 1 pair pants, $4." Rev. Mr. Walker, "To 1 blanket coat, $14." And P. F. W. Peck "To 43 lights-sash," no price given, and "1 pair pants, $6.50." On November 1, Charles Reid is charged "To cash, $820." Robert Kinzie, "To 1 horse, $30." Indian Department, "To amount paid Tope-ne-be, $100." S. P. Brady, "To 16½ lbs. sole leather, $4.95." Stephen Downal was credited "By plastering store and building chimney, $19"—probably in the new warehouse on the corner of South Water and Dearborn streets. John Bates was charged "To transportation on goods, 19 bbls. bulk, from Detroit, at $1; to cash advanced by O. Newberry, at Detroit, charges on goods, $29.34; commission on above, $2.60, and 1 cap (Alcove) $9." Samuel Ellis was credited "By one cord dry wood, $2.00." Dexter Graves was charged with "734 feet lumber at $24, $14.68." J. S. C. Hogan, with 250 brick, no price given; and J. B. Chevalier (per Oullimette) with 25 bu. of corn, $1; and three barrels of flour, $7. On November 11, O. Newberry was charged "To cash, for beef, 9200 lbs., at $2.75. Paid Charles Reed for beef, 50,949 lbs., at $2.75. To 257 bbls. beef, 14 bbls. tallow, 152 dry hides and 2 bbls. beeswax, shipped per schooner "Napoleon," Captain John Stewart, to O. Newberry, April 17, 1833." (This was probably the first beef ever shipped from Chicago.) On December 23, Mr. Newberry is charged "To paid John Blacket, for 328 hogs, $3 140 lbs., at $3. Shipped by schooner "Austerlitz," between April 20 and May 2, 1833, to O. Newberry, 200 bbls. pork, 12 bbls. lard, and 43 dry hides." (This was the first pork ever shipped from Chicago.) There appears to have been a scarcity of provision barrels for packing above meats, but during the winter of 1832-33, credited on the books, mostly to A. Clybourn, are about 140 barrels at .87½ each. Others may have been bought for cash, and so do not appear on the books at hand, or may have been brought up on the "Marengo," in the spring. Following are some articles sold during the months named: May: Eggs, 14 cents; bacon, 10 cents; candles, 19 cents; nails, 12½ cents; crackers, 12½ cents; cheese, 12½ cents; loaf sugar, 25 cents; watch crystals, —; buttons, 19 cents; brooms, 25 cents. September: Buttons, 12½ cents; coffee, 25 cents; lime $1.25 per bbl. December: Cloth, from $1.25 to $5.50 per yard; bar soap, 12½ cents per lb.; rice, 6½ cents; sugar, 12½ cents. January: Moccasins, 50 cents per pair. In January, 1833, Heman Bond was charged "To storage on wheat, 13 cts." (This was probably for seed, and is the only mention of wheat.) On March 11, Francis Bulbony is credited "By five hundred muskrat skins, at 22 cents; 57 'coon skins, at 33 cents; 8 mink skins, at 37½ cents; 4 deer skins, at 50 cents; and 6 otter skins, at $6.00." On April 1, Stephen Downal is credited by 1092 feet of timber (probably used for new warehouse, corner of South Water and Dearborn streets), $43.68. Champagne is charged at $1.50 per bottle; butter at 16 cents per pound; iron at 8½ and 9 cents per pound; shot at $2.25 per bag; powder at $8 per keg; lead at 12½ cents per pound; beans at $1.50 per bush.; sperm candles at 35 cts. per pound; oats at from 40 to 75 cents per bushel; horses at from $30 to $45; while town lots were taken at from $41 to $55.

There were no loaded vessels of any considerable size entering the harbor until 1836. In that year, Newberry & Dole moved from their warehouse and store, on the southeast corner of South Water and Dearborn streets, to their new warehouse on the north side of the river, east of Rush Street and opposite Fort Dearborn. Mr. Dole's nephews, George F. and Julian S. Rumsey, came to Chicago under his auspices, and became members of his family. George F.

JULIAN S. RUMSEY.

came in 1836, and at once entered the employ of the firm. Julian S., although he came the year before, was too young to begin his business experience with shipping until 1838.

From the time vessels and steamboats began to enter the Chicago River, the business increased rapidly. There was soon a line of splendid steamers running between Buffalo and Chicago, bringing full loads of passengers for their household goods and merchandise, not only for Chicago merchants, but also for those of interior places, including Galena, Springfield, Danville, Ottawa, Joliet, and the various Fox and Rock River towns. In some cases, merchants of those places sent teams for their goods, and in other cases the goods were forwarded by teams procured in Chicago. Nor did the steamboats go back light; as the boats that brought large quantities of leather and great piles of brooms, would return loaded with hides, broom-corn, provisions, flour and grain in bags, which gave them all the return cargo required. It became fashionable for Southerners to make the trip of the lakes; and when some favorite boat left, frequently there were on board from one to two hundred who had come up the rivers to Fern and by stage from there to Chicago. For several years, the arrival and departure of a steambot were important events. Steamers and vessels landed on the north side of the river below State Street. The officers constructing the harbor had a very tall flag-staff erected, and when a vessel from the lower lakes was sighted, they raised a flag; and when a steamer was seen six flags were raised, one above the other, and then people turned out in great numbers, to be at the wharf when the boat arrived.

Mr. Newberry retired from the firm in 1847, and, in 1848, the Rumseys were admitted to partnership, the firm becoming Dole, Rumsey & Co. Mr. Dole being appointed postmaster, and called upon to perform various other public duties, withdrew from active business, to which he had given but little attention for some years. In 1854, the firm became Rumsey Bro. & Co., as it still remains. The opening of the Illinois & Michigan Canal in 1848, the building of railroads, and the consequent rapid development of the country, soon changed the character of the business of the firm. The storage and forwarding branches were dropped, the commission department only being continued. In 1857, H. A. Towner, who had been for some years in the employ of the firm, was admitted to partnership and is still a member; and in 1866 A. J. Marble, who likewise had been with the firm some years, was admitted to partnership, retiring in 1878 with the best wishes of those with whom he had been associated. George Dole Rumsey, son of Julian S. Rumsey, became a partner in the beginning of 1879, and still remains in the firm. In 1881, George F. Rumsey died; since which time the firm has consisted of Julian S. Rumsey, Henry A. Towner and George Dole Rumsey.

FIRST SHIPMENT OF GRAIN FROM CHICAGO'S FIRST DOCK.

First Shipment of Grain.—From their warehouse on the North Side was shipped, in September, 1839, the first cargo of grain from Chicago. It consisted of about twenty-nine hundred bushels of wheat, per brig "Osceola," Captain Billings, consigned to Kingman & Durfee, Black Rock, N. Y. It was all weighed, and partly carried on board in boxes, by Rumsey Brothers. The wheat had been purchased by them of farmers who hauled it to Chicago in bulk in wagons, some of it from a distance of one hundred and fifty miles. The price paid was from fifty to sixty cents a bushel. The freight to Black Rock was probably about twelve or fifteen cents a bushel; the next year it reached twenty-eight cents to Buffalo. The "Osceola" was capable of carrying about five thousand bushels. At the time this wheat was handled no provision had been made for such business. Most of the farmers were too poor to own bags, but spread sheets or blankets in their wagon-boxes, and filled in the wheat in bulk. The warehouse furnished bags to be filled, and then they were hoisted to the upper floor—at first by hand, but subsequently by horse-power. The bags were then carried back and emptied into the bins, which were only as deep as between the floors. The next problem was, how to get the wheat on board the vessels when the time came to ship it. On the occasion of loading the first cargo of wheat to be shipped in bulk, a spout about one foot square (one a quarter of the size would have answered as well), with a much larger opening at the upper end, was erected, extending from the third story toward the vessel; but the wharf was so wide that the grain would only run to within about twelve feet of the edge. There was a slide at the end of the spout, to close off the grain at will. Scales were placed under the lower end of the spout, and several boxes were provided, with handles nailed along the sides for two men to grasp, each end of a box being like a wheelbarrow. Standing upon the scale, the boxes were filled with six bushels of wheat, which it was soon ascertained was too heavy a load for two men to carry up the gang plank, and new boxes were provided, each containing only four bushels. From these boxes, the wheat was emptied into the hold of the vessel. Two lines of men passed the wheat, in pairs, from the bins in the warehouse, and emptied it into the upper end of the spout. While this was the first cargo shipment of grain from Chicago to the East, the same firm had, during several preceding years, shipped grain in bags to various ports on Lake Michigan.

First Receipt of Coal.—Another incident connected with this firm is interesting. The first shipment of coal to Chicago was discharged on their dock, in 1811, from the schooner "General Harrison," which, with the coal, belonged to Captain E. B. Ward. The coal was bituminous, came from Cleveland or Erie, and consisted of about eighty tons. It took the firm nearly two years to dispose of it. Wood was then the only fuel used, and was sold at about $2 50 a cord; and it was not until grates, on legs—to put in the fire-places—were cast, for the special purpose of burning this coal that it could be sold.

The Old Cannon.—Still another episode pertaining to the history of this firm is of interest. This was in reference to the brass cannon raised, in 1837 or 1838, by the pile-driver from the Chicago River, near the present Rush-street bridge (where it is supposed a second one still rests). This cannon had been a part of the armament of Fort Dearborn, and was thrown into the river at the time of the evacuation and the massacre in 1812. It was a six-pound brass piece, and there was considerable excitement throughout the city on account of its recovery. For some time it was a question as to who were its rightful owners, the city claiming it; but Samuel Jackson, Morgan L. Shapley and others engaged in dredging and pile-driving for the Government, finding it, claimed and kept it. The General Government, however, never made any attempt to assert its ownership, and the matter was compromised by the city building a carriage for it, upon which it was mounted and used for celebrations, etc. In 1833, Oliver Newberry brought out the magnificent steamer "Illinois," the name being given in compliment to the State, and on this account the citizens presented her with a set of colors. The steamer was commanded by Captain Blake, and made a trip, every sixteen to eighteen days, between Buffalo and Chicago. As further acknowledgment of the compliment to the State in naming the steamer, the cannon was permitted by all concerned to be placed on board the "Illinois." It was carried on her deck during part of the sailing season of 1840; and when the steamer was leaving or arriving at this port, a salute was fired from the cannon. During the presidential campaign of 1840—one of the most exciting ever known in this country,—the Whigs planned an excursion from Chicago, under the leadership of the present Major-General Hunter, to attend the great convention at Springfield. They desired to take this cannon with them, to assist in stimulating the enthusiasm for Harrison, the Whig candidate for president. The Democrats were determined that this part of the Whig programme should not be carried out, holding that it was not proper to use such a national and historic relic for partisan purposes. Newberry & Dole had possession of the cannon, inasmuch as it was on board the "Illinois," and to prevent its capture by the Democrats and to save it for the Whig excursion, Julian S. Rumsey and his brother George F., assisted by their warehousemen, got the cannon to the warehouse, hoisted it into the third story, and sunk it in a bin of wheat. This proved to be a secure hiding place; and although a writ of replevin was obtained, the cannon could not be found, and hence attempts to take it into custody, to prevent its use by the Whigs, were at length abandoned. The Whigs themselves gave up the plan of taking it with them to Springfield, on account of the trouble of transportation. They did, however, take a band of music, a full rigged brig, a canal-boat on wheels, and a large number of baggage wagons. They had no ardent spirits except several barrels of hard cider, this being what was called the "Hard Cider Campaign." The delegates went in covered two-horse wagons. Among those still living who went with the crowd are James A. Marshall, S. B. Cobb, S. F. Gale, Grant Goodrich, Robert Freeman, Gordon S. Hubbard, H. G. Loomis, T. Theodor Doty, George Chakhsfid, Calvin DeWolf, Philo Carpenter, Jerome Beecher, Sidney Sawyer and John L. Wilson.

Breaking a Corner in Flour.—When Julian S. Rumsey came to Chicago in 1835, Newberry & Dole's warehouse was on the southeast corner of South Water and Dearborn streets, their dock being on the north side of South Water Street. An incident occurring that year is worthy of perpetuation. They had shipped to them a cargo of flour for their regular trade. Late in the fall the vessel arrived and anchored outside the bar, vessels not being able to enter the river at that time. There were in the place only about twenty or thirty barrels of flour, with no hope of any more arriving until the following spring, and this was owned by Charles Chapman, who was asking for it $20 a barrel. Certain parties offered Messrs. Newberry & Dole $15 a barrel for the entire cargo on board the vessel, taking the risk of shipwreck before and during its discharge. The firm declined the offer, the flour was loaded into bateaux, towed by yawl boats to their dock, and sold to private families, boarding-houses and hotels in the town and vicinity, according to the probable necessities of each for the coming winter, at $8.50 a barrel. This incident is still remembered to the credit of the firm by recipients of the flour as well as other citizens.

Early Ship-building.—This firm was the first, or among the first, manufacturers of and dealers in lumber. They participated in the building of the steamers "James Allen" and "George W. Dole" in 1838—the first ship-building done in Chicago, with the exception of one small vessel (the "Clarissa"), and assisted in the building of, or purchased, the brigs "Minnesota" and "Sultan," the schooners "Ocean," "Wave," "Ark," "Michigan" and "Huron," and were agents for a large fleet of steamers and vessels belonging to other parties. They were also among the first to place boats upon the Illinois & Michigan Canal at its completion.

They assisted in establishing the Board of Trade in 1848, and subsequently in obtaining the present charter and framing a new set of rules; also in establishing its present system of statistics and grain inspection. During the war they were largely engaged in buying grain for the use of the army, partly on direct orders from the Government. Railroad transportation being at times inadequate, they at one time shipped very large quantities in canal boats, by the Illinois & Michigan Canal, and the Illinois, Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee and Cumberland rivers, to Nashville, Tenn., and Muscle Shoals, Ala. One great satisfaction in doing this business was, that grain from Chicago was always approved in regard to quality, while it was seldom that any other was. The Government officials finally advertised that grain delivered on contracts must equal Chicago Board of Trade inspection. The location of this firm's business was originally at Fort Dearborn, then, as has been said, on the southeast corner of South Water and Dearborn streets. In 1836, they removed to North Water, east of Rush Street; and, in 1841, they increased their facilities by renting the warehouse and wharf next east of them, which had been previously occupied by Kinzie, Hunter & Co. In 1845, they erected a warehouse on South Water Street, west of and adjoining Clark-street bridge, where they remained over twenty years, or until 1867. In the meantime, they erected large sheds for unloading steamers and vessels on North Water Street, at the foot of Dearborn Avenue, using them in connection with their warehouse for many years; finally selling them and going out of this branch of business. In 1867, they moved from the corner of South Water and Clark streets to No. 116 LaSalle Street, opposite the Board of Trade, where they remained until the fire of 1871; since which time their office has been located in or in close proximity to the Board of Trade building. At present the firm is located at No. 10 Pacific Avenue. Their business is in grain, seed and provisions on commission.

On the Board of Trade of Chicago, there are two very different types of operators who have amassed fortunes. The first is the true speculator—the man who looks about him—the man of foresight, who sees the great tide of coming events and their influence upon the markets of the world, and suits his operations to them. Anyone can tell the effect of an event after it has happened; but to foresee the event, and tell what the effect will be before it has happened, is the province of the great speculator. The other type is the man who can accurately measure the current of opinion from hour to hour; who can watch the swaying moods of the great crowd of buyers and sellers, and take instant successful advantage of them. To the first class belong men like Philip D. Armour; to the second, men like B. P. Hutchinson.

PHILIP D. ARMOUR was born on a farm in northern New York in 1830. He received a common school education, and then was indentured to a farmer. He grew to be a stout, broad-shouldered young fellow, with an ambition to strike out in the world for himself. Accordingly, when he was twenty, he sought and gained a release from his apprenticeship. The California gold fever was then at its height, and Phil. started with an overland company for El Dorado. Reaching the promised land, he met with some sickness, and many hardships; but pluck and hard work overcame every obstacle, and in four or five years he turned eastward again, having accumulated some money. He then established himself in Milwaukee, and engaged in the grain-receiving and warehouse business, which he conducted successfully for a number of years. He next formed a partnership with John Plankinton in the pork-packing business, under the firm name of Plankinton & Armour. Just before the close of the war, in the spring of 1865, pork was selling at $40 a barrel, and the New York operators thinking it would go to $60, were buying it right and left. Mr. Armour thought that the Rebellion was on the eve of collapse, and that if the war should suddenly end, pork, instead of being worth $40 a barrel, would not be worth $20. Mr. Plankinton was of the same opinion. Carefully arranging his plans, Mr. Armour hurried to New York, and commenced selling pork short. His advent caused a sensation in the New York markets, but the provision men bought from him all he would sell. The market soon commenced to break. Then came the news of the fall of Petersburg, of Richmond, and the surrender of the Confederate army, and Armour bought in his pork, which he had sold at $40 and down, at $15. This, his first great operation as a speculator, made him a millionaire. He enlarged the scope of his business by establishing packing houses in Chicago and in Kansas City, and then removed to Chicago. He now has agencies in all the larger cities of the South, and at the principal markets of Europe. His employes number more than ten thousand, and the product he manufactures is valued at $50,000,000 annually. With such vast interests to protect, it may be well supposed that he needs to be assiduous, watchful and alert. He is the most indefatigable of workers, and no clerk in his employ numbers the hours of labor that he does. From 7 a. m. until 6 p. m. he is engaged at his office, and during that time nothing but business employs his thoughts. When at home, his business cares do not pursue him, and he enjoys the comforts and repose of a truly happy domestic life. In 1878, operators on the Board of Trade, large and small, thought it a good year to sell pork. Men who had scarcely even seen a barrel of pork, much less owned one, commenced to sell short the product that Mr. Armour and his firms were manufacturing on a larger scale than ever. Other packing houses also joined with the crowd. Mr. Armour was forced to support the market, and for many months at a great loss. It cost him more than a million dollars; but he foresaw that the tide must change, and took all the pork that was offered. In 1879, the tide did change, and he recovered his losses with an added profit of many millions of dollars. He has conducted several operations in wheat with great success, and is a bold and daring speculator of great foresight. He is a constant friend, an uncompromising foe, upright and honorable in all the varied relations of life. He is very charitable, giving to every deserving cause without stint. He attends Plymouth Congregational Church, of which his wife is an active and devoted member.

BENJAMIN P. HUTCHINSON was born near Danvers, Mass., in 1828. Born on a farm, he early learned to dislike the plow and the sickle, and, before he reached man's estate, he turned his back on country life and sought the avenues of trade. He went to Lynn, and there became employed in the shoe-making business, for which that city is famous. He learned to cut leather to advantage, and soon became a successful manufacturer. The revulsion of 1857 found him with his lines too much extended. His customers failed, he followed their example, and was obliged to leave Lynn. Although he left it heavily in debt, it was not many years before he had paid up all his indebtedness. He looked out over the great West for a new field, and first tried Milwaukee, where he remained a short time. Perceiving the greater opportunities of Chicago, he removed to this city in 1859. He paid $5, and became a member of the Board of Trade. He had not allowed his failure at Lynn to entirely cripple him, knowing right well that, without capital, he could neither successfully earn money to pay his creditors nor support himself and family. With the capital he brought, he was enabled to at once commence operations on the Board of Trade, in buying and selling grain. He had the genius of a careful speculator, but was not a daring one. He understood fully, and acted upon, the first half of Ricardo's great maxim, "Cut short your losses." He had no pride of opinion, but could change with the varying tide of the market. He was at one time a bull, and at another time a bear, and often both by turns, within the compass of an hour. No man ever had a keener perception of what the crowd was doing, as well as what particular operators were doing. No man on "Change, who dealt largely, could long hide his schemes from "Old Hutch," as the boys soon began to familiarly call him. Many a time he has escaped but narrowly being a victim to the great operators, but he has always escaped. Whenever he scented danger, he ran. In the early days he would run small "concerns" himself, but they were little affairs, for options, at the longest, run scarcely longer than a week, and the main business was done in cash grain. But "corners" were not to his taste, his great principle of speculation being to get in and out of the market quietly, and before the "tailors" could perceive what he had been doing. He may be called, without exaggeration, the Prince of Scalpers. Between 1859 and 1863, he had amassed money enough to pay all his Lynn debts, and to have a fortune estimated at $150,000. By that time, too, he had also entered upon the business of pork packing, which he foresaw was to become one of Chicago's great industries. Although ignorant of the business, he had brains and ingenuity. He introduced new methods in cutting and in various details of the business, and at once became very successful. In 1863, he made large gains on whisky and high wines, in anticipation of the revenue tax. He was one of the promoters and first stockholders of the First National Bank; but the Corn Exchange, soon afterward started, was his own child. Long the president of it, it is known far and wide as "Old Hutch's" bank. His packing establishment became the largest one at the yards, and a few years later was consolidated with that of A. E. Kent & Co., under the name of the Chicago Packing Company. Mr. Hutchinson has always been an untiring worker, early and late, but he has also devoted time to intellectual pursuits. He is a great reader of the best literature, and is at all times an amusing and interesting companion. He is one of the best types of Chicago's successful business men. He is close in small matters and liberal in great ones. He will help a friend to $100,000, but will watch the smallest unnecessary outlay in any branch of his business. His cardinal business maxim is to own no unproductive property. If he finds himself in possession of property that brings him no income, he disposes of it at once for what it will bring. He has dealt largely in real estate, and is an extensive owner of houses and lands. He is a tall, florid, well preserved gentleman, with a nose such as Napoleon would have admired. He has long been married, and has two sons and two daughters. His wealth is estimated at $5,000,000.

JOHN L. HANCOCK was born in Buxton, York Co., Maine, March 16, 1812. He was the youngest child of John Lane Hancock and Hannah (Prescott) Hancock. His educational advantages were such as the common schools of New England at that time afforded. He lived in Buxton, the place of his birth, until 1828, when he removed, with his father's family, to Hiram, Oxford Co., Maine, and later to Westbrook, Cumberland County, in the same State. At the latter place he engaged in the slaughtering and packing business with good success, taking such a leading position as to gain the full confidence of Cragin & Co., of New York City, with whom he entered into a connection in 1854, and came to Chicago during that year to establish a packing business at this point, then the extreme western limit of the business. On page 562 of the first volume of this work, the arrival of young Hancock is announced. He immediately built what was then the largest packing house in the West, and, as the representative of Cragin & Co., was, for many years after, the leading packer and dealer in provisions at Chicago. He became a member of the Board of Trade, and early was identified with it as a leading member, serving in nearly every capacity of trust. He was vice-president in 1862-63, and was chosen president in 1863, and re-elected in 1864, being the first president who was complimented by a re-election. He was one of the pioneers in the provision trade, and did as much as any other man to bring it to its present perfection in the mechanical means of slaughtering and packing and reliable standard of inspection. Mr. Hancock was, during the last year of the war, ordered to take charge of Camp Fry, then the rendezvous for conscripts. Under his command, the 147th, 153d and 156th regiments were raised, and many companies were recruited to fill up depleted regiments still in the field. The sudden close of the war left in the hands of Colonel Hancock a large amount of bounty money not yet paid to recruits, besides some $23,000 left by deserters who failed to report. This large sum was paid over to the State Treasurer, at the close of his administration.

JOHN RUSSELL BENSLEY was born May 1, 1833 in Springville, Erie Co., N. Y., the son of Eaton and Sophia (Russell) Bensley. He received but a superficial education, although it was given at an academy in Springville. The education that fitted Mr. Bensley for the prominent position in the mercantile world he occupies was not obtained at schools, but was inherent and cultivated by the assiduous care of his parents, being integrity, perseverance and untiring industry. These were alike his distinguishing characteristics in his first entry into the commercial world as a clerk in a general store at Springville, when he was eighteen years of age, as when he was president of the Board of Trade, in 1876. In 1851, he was clerk, as stated; in 1854, he bought out the stock and good-will of this store; in 1857, he left the East, and removed to DuPage County, Illinois; and in 1858, removed to Chicago, establishing himself in the commission business at No. 247 Kinzie Street, and becoming a member of the Board of Trade, of which he is one of the oldest members, holding certificate of membership No. 1. In his connection with the Board, his career has been full of earnest labor in its interest, and official positions have resulted from a recognition thereof by its members. In 1868, he was made a member of the Committee of Arbitration; in 1872-73, he was a member of the Board of Directors; in 1874, he was second vice-president; in 1875, vice-president; and in 1876, president. In 1873, he was appointed by Governor Beveridge a member of the State Committee of Appeals on Grain Inspection, and, in 1877, was elected a member of the Committee of Appeals by the Board of Trade, serving during 1877-78. In 1880, he was prominent as a promoter of the erection of the new Board of Trade building, at its present location; and, in 1881, was elected manager of the real estate interests of the Board in connection therewith. While acting in this capacity, he procured the vacation of the ground by the Common Council—as the building closes up LaSalle Street—and purchased the property, on behalf of the Board, for a quarter of a million dollars. Mr. Bensley was elected president of the Call Board, in 1881, and re-elected in 1882. He has been as enterprising and thrifty in his personal business, which has grown from his individual commission merchantship, in 1858, to the firms of Bensley Brothers—John R. and George E. Bensley—commission merchants in grain, flour, etc.; and Bensley Bros. & Co.—John R., George E. Bensley and Madison C. Scobey—live stock commission merchants. In 1863, the operations of Bensley Bros. were extended into the live-stock interests. During the same year, he removed his residence to Hyde Park, and in that village, which covers thirty-eight square miles of territory, his abilities were recognized by his election as trustee in 1875, and re-election in 1876-77; during the latter two years, he was also elected by the trustees president of their Board. He then declined any further political honors, although he has always maintained his interest in politics and his working Republicanism, being at the present time (1885) president of the Oakland Republican Club. In the conservation of the interests of those for whom he acts, Mr. Bensley is alike energetic and untiring; as an evidence of which it is only requisite to adduce his reevevship in the matter of McGeoch, Everingham & Co. In June, 1883, he was appointed receiver by the Court, and although the affairs of that firm were in apparently hopeless confusion, and there were twelve suits pending in five different States, he settled up their affairs in thirty-two days, collecting and disbursing $5,250,000, thus enabling the firm to resume in three months after their suspension. In his personal life, Mr. Bensley is kind, genial, courteous and generous, and makes his home the haven toward which he looks after the tiring and exhaustive labors of his daily business career. He was married the second time, in 1863, to Miss Augusta F. Fuller, daughter of Elijah Fuller, of Wyoming Co., N. Y.; they have two children, Martha S. and John K., Jr.

STEPHEN CLARK, the tenth president of the Board of Trade, was born in Johnston, Montgomery Co., N. Y., September 25, 1814, and, in 1824, removed to Geneva in that State, where he remained until 1829, receiving such education as the district schools afforded. At that time he entered the office of the Geneva Gazette, and remained there, as an apprentice in the printing office, until 1831. Being at that time an orphan, he accepted the invitation of relatives then living in Ohio to go to them, and accordingly threw up his situation, abandoned his chosen trade, and moved to Milan, Ohio, where he entered the extensive mercantile establishment of Standart & Hamilton. There he remained for six years, learning most thoroughly all the details of mercantile business. In 1837, he removed to Cleveland, Ohio, and engaged in the ship chandlery business until 1852, at which time he came to Chicago, as the manager of the Ogdensburg Propeller Line, afterward the Northern Transportation Company. In 1853, he became a member of the shipping firm of Mather, Clary & Co. The firm commenced the building of a line of canal-boats, vessels, and steamers, and, in 1862, when the war had closed the navigation of the lower Mississippi, they were prepared to do an extensive business in the transportation, by way of Chicago, of flour and other produce from St. Louis, seeking an eastern outlet. Mr. Clary became a member of the Board of Trade in 1853. As the organization grew in importance, he became one of its active and efficient members, and was also identified with nearly every effort for systematizing its work and laying the foundation of what has grown to be the most influential and powerful commercial association in the country. On the passage of the law which placed the inspection of grain and the warehouse business under State control, in 1871, Mr. Clary was appointed to the office of State Registrar of Grain Receipts. This office he occupied until the fall of 1873, when he resigned. During Mr. Clary's membership in the Board of Trade, he filled nearly every office of responsibility within its gift. He served as a director and vice-president in 1859-60, and in 1861, was elected president, holding that office at the breaking out of the war, and doing, without faltering, the full duties of a patriot, in the arduous and difficult position in which he was called to act. Mr. Clary is still a resident of Chicago, connected with the large wholesale stationery and printing warehouse of Brown, Pettibone & Kelly, and is active in the prosecution of his business duties in the city where he has spent the best years of a wonderfully energetic, efficient and useful life. Mr. Clary's surviving family consists of two daughters—Mrs. T. H. Brown, Jr., of Chicago, and Mrs. T. W. Ward, of Norfolk, Neb.

JOHN B. LYON, one of the oldest members of the Chicago Board of Trade, came to Chicago in August, 1858, and in that year purchased his membership for $15. He was born in Canandaigua, N. Y., on April 16, 1829, and when he was but two years old his parents moved to Ashtabula County, Ohio, where he received his education in the common schools. When about fourteen he left school for a clerkship in a store, and, at the age of seventeen, he opened a general storage and commission business at Conneaut, Ohio. After becoming established in business on the Board of Trade here, he took a partner, in 1862, Mr. William Murray, with whom he operated for a year or two under the firm name of Lyon & Murray. In 1871 a co-partnership was formed between J. B. Lyon, George J. Brine and Thomas B. Price, with the firm name of J. B. Lyon & Co., but as the business association was not successful it dissolved in the fall of 1872, Mr. Brine withdrawing. A new partnership was formed in the spring of 1874, John T. Lester taking the place of Mr. Brine and the style of the firm being changed to Lyon, Lester & Co. In 1879, Mr. Lester withdrew, and the other partners continued under the style of Lyon & Co. to the present time.

ABNER M. WRIGHT, founder and senior member of the firm of A. M. Wright & Co., was born in Waterford, Caledonia Co., Vt., January 23, 1828. He received the advantages of the common schools of his native State and of Newbury Seminary; and emigrated to Ohio in 1848. He began business life for himself as teacher of mathematics in the Painesville Academy, and after a year's service became the principal, which position he held for two years. His ambition desiring a wider scope, he abandoned the profession. During the presidential campaign of 1852, he established a campaign paper at Painesville, in the interests of the Whig candidate, General Scott. At the same time he was telegraph operator for the O'Keilly Telegraph Company in that city. At the close of 1852, he moved to Cleveland, and kept books for two years for French & Co., the leading wholesale and retail dry goods house there. In 1854, he went to Freeport, Ill., and engaged in the Stephenson County Bank as bookkeeper, where he remained until he came to Chicago, in 1856. Here he obtained a situation, first as teller in J. M. Adist's bank, where he remained three years. In 1859, he formed a partnership with J. H. Miles, in the grain commission business, and they soon after took Rollin Sherman into the company. In 1861, Dr. Jared Basset became a member of the firm, and soon after Mr. Miles withdrew. This company was dissolved in 1863, and a new business relationship established by Mr. Wright with Horace Burton, which existed, under contract, one year. June 20, 1860, Mr. Wright married Miss Helen S. Hickcox, the daughter of P. Hickcox, and, in 1865, he entered into a co-partnership with his father-in-law, which, under the firm name of A. M. Wright & Co., has lasted to the present time. Mr. Wright is a prominent member of the Episcopal Church, and was a member of the vestry of Bishop Whipple's church, the Church of the Holy Communion; afterward a vestryman of the Church of the Epiphany; and when the Reform movement was begun, he sided with Bishop Cheney and helped to organize the Reformed Episcopal Church of St Paul's, Bishop Fallows, rector, of which he is a vestryman and senior warden. He was made a mason in Freeport in 1857, and is now a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33. Having been a member in good standing for twenty-five years, he is now, according to their rules, an honorary member for life. He is a member of the Citizens' Association, and of the Illinois Club. He has been a Republican in politics for many years. In 1879, he was unanimously nominated—by acclamation—in convention, for mayor, but was defeated by Carter H. Harrison, by four thousand majority. Mr. Wright has three living children—Hallie, Charles H., and James N.

DAVID H. LINCOLN was born at Amesbury, Mass., on February 20, 1834, but when quite young was brought West by his parents, who settled in Racine County, Wis., where, until 1855, he attended school. He then came to Chicago, entering upon his business career, as a clerk in a grain commission house, and remained in that capacity for two and one half years; after which he started in the grain commission business for himself, becoming a member of the Board of Trade in 1858. During his business career here, he has been on all the different committees of the Board and has also been a member of Directory. He has also held the office of the first, and second vice-president, and in 1877, was elected president of the Board, which position he filled one term. Mr. Lincoln is a member of Covenant Lodge, No. 526. A. F. & A. M.

THE YEAR 1859-60.

The eleventh annual meeting was held at the beginning of the twelfth fiscal year, in April, 1859. The officers elected were: Julian S. Rumsey, president; T. H. Beebe and Stephen Clary, first and second vice-presidents; Seth Catlin, secretary. A proposition was made to the directors by John S. Newhouse, to lease the second story of a new brick block, then being built by him on the north side of South Water Street, to the Board of Trade, for the term of ten years, at an annual rental of $1,250. The proposition was accepted, and during the year the hall and apartments were completed, and occupied by the Board. The number of members reported by the secretary was five hundred and twenty,* over one hundred new members having been admitted during the year.

REPAIR OF THE NORTH PIER.—The most important outside work in which the Board was engaged during the ensuing year, was the repairing of the north pier, which had been reported by a committee appointed by the Board "to be in such dilapidated condition that unless some action was speedily taken, the pier would be totally destroyed and the harbor shut up." The committee recommended the raising of sufficient funds to make the necessary repairs, by individual subscription, and that the work be done immediately. The suggestions of the committee were at once carried out; $800 were raised, and $700 were expended in repairs deemed necessary to save the harbor from destruction.

NEW ROOMS OCCUPIED.—On Wednesday evening, February 29, 1860, the Board took formal possession of its new rooms. Nearly five hundred persons were present at the ceremonies. The inaugural address was delivered by the president, Julian S. Rumsey. He gave a most interesting account of the early struggles of the Board, furnishing detailed statements of the many ways in which the organization had, in the past, defended and advanced the interests and promoted the prosperity of the city.

* The number of names appearing on the list of members in the secretary's annual report published February 3, 1859, was three hundred and seventy-three. A note at the bottom of the list says: "In giving the foregoing list of members, we have to apologize to those whose names are omitted. There are so many names in the books of the Board of persons who have died, left the city, etc., that until arrearages are paid, we do not know who wish to retain their membership."

The main room of the new chamber was ninety-five feet long, forty-seven feet wide, and eighteen feet in height, to which there were two entrances, one at each end of the hall. The ceiling was supported by girders, thereby obviating the use of columns. Convenient ante-rooms, two at each end, opened off of the main hall, fitted up for telegraph office, wash-room, secretary's office, and reading-room. Tables were arranged about the sides of the main hall, for the display of samples of grain, flour, seeds and other commodities offered for sale. The walls were frescoed, as the Chicago Tribune stated, "in a style and on a scale which entirely placed in the shade all other institutions of the kind in the United States." The various devices were emblematical of the different branches of trade; such as a reaper, a loom, a phœnix a canal-boat, a cattle scene, a propeller, etc. A highly colored eagle watched over the proceedings from his perch above the carved oak, semi-circular desk of the president, which stood on an elevated platform in the north side of the hall.

SOUTH WATER STREET, EAST FROM DEARBORN.

Among the older firms who participated in the business transacted in these new rooms, were the following:

B. ADAMS & Co.—In 1852, the firm of B. & J. Adams was formed, and the Adams Mills were erected between the river and North Water Street, and about eighty feet west of Dearborn Avenue. The buildings consisted of a four-story brick building, sixty by ninety feet in size, with an addition of sixty by eighty feet, in the rear. The mills were in close proximity to the track and the grain elevators of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad. Their river front afforded equal advantages for receiving or shipping; the firm, in fact, besides being extensive manufacturers, were large shippers of flour and wheat to New York and Boston. By 1854, they were grinding one hundred and fifty thousand bushels of wheat and five thousand of corn, and had passed the Chicago Mills (Gage & Haines) in the strife for supremacy. The mills, at first, had four run of burrs, but afterward three more run were added. In 1856, James Adams died, and soon afterward Benjamin Adams received G. P. Adams into partnership, the firm name being changed to B. Adams & Co. In 1859, J. Q. Adams was admitted to partnership, G. P. Adams retiring in 1870. Until within a few years preceding the great fire, the Adams Mills continued to manufacture more flour than any other establishment of the kind in Chicago. When that wide-spread calamity came upon them, these, with five other mills, were swept away, the firm losing $20,000 above insurance. During the last year of their existence, the Adams Mills manufactured 39,473 barrels of flour. The great fire was the means of dissolving the old firm of B. Adams & Co., which had stood staunch for so many years, each member of which has, since 1871, conducted a grain and provision business on his own account. About 1852, the Adams brothers became members of the Board of Trade, and are therefore among the oldest in that body. Previous to the fire, the grain and provision trade had been carried on, to some extent, by B. Adams & Co., J. Q. Adams also dealing somewhat extensively in real estate. Soon after the fire they took an office at No. 156 Washington Street, remaining there until 1881, when they removed to their present location. In their later individual business efforts, as in their former combined ventures, they have been uniformly successful, and stand to-day, after so many years of trial, among the most substantial members of the Board of Trade. They are from Hopkinton, Middlesex Co., Mass. B. and J. Adams were in a general jobbing business at Galena, Ill., before coming to Chicago, and J. Q. Adams came directly to this city after leaving his native place.

JAMES M. BRYANT, the head of the commission house of Bryant, McCampbell & Co., has been a successful business man all his life, and still continues in active work at the age of sixty-two. The house here is the main one of six connected institutions, dealing in stocks, grain, cotton, petroleum, provisions and coffee. At Louisville, Ky., the house is known as Bryant & Co., A. G. McCampbell, managing partner; at Kansas City, it is the same, with L. Stockton resident partner; at New Orleans, it is Bryant, Dudley & Co., William S. Dudley at the head; in St. Louis, it is Bryant Commission Co., with S. P. Cronie managing partner; at Galveston, Texas, it is S. S. Floyd & Co., with S. S. Floyd at the head. The house here is composed of James M. Bryant, Amos G. McCampbell and E. S. Rowland, who is an active partner on 'Change and a very capable business man. Some idea of the extent of his joint business may be gathered from the fact that in one year, July, 1853-'54, their operations aggregated $300,000,000. Mr. Bryant is a native of Lancaster, Garrard Co., Ky., born on January 1, 1823. He was educated at the Lancaster Seminary; left school at the age of seventeen and entered the house of Henry Bell & Co., wholesale and retail dry goods dealers at Lexington, as salesman. He remained with them until 1846, when he returned to Lancaster, and entered into business with William H. Kinnaird. They dealt in general dry goods, under the firm name of Bryant & Kinnaird, until 1852, and then dissolved. He came to Chicago in 1854. From 1854 to 1857, he was engaged in loaning money and doing a general brokerage business, in the old Masonic building on Dearborn Street, with Robert A. Watts, under the firm name of Bryant & Watts. In 1858, he established a wholesale dry goods jobbing house at Louisville, Ky., under the name of Bryant, Harris & Barbee. This prospered until broken up by the Rebellion in 1861; after which he became associated with Moses Brown, under the firm name of Brown & Co., doing business in good securities, etc., until 1865. Returning to Chicago in 1865, he built the Bryant Block, and managed it up to 1868. In 1876, the present firm was formed here, and it has continued to do business on the Board of Trade up to this time. Mr. Bryant has been married twice. On July 1, 1845, at Lancaster, Ky., he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah W. Leavett, who died at Louisville in 1865, leaving four children, three of whom are still living. On September 4, 1866, he married Miss Roberta S. Edwards, by whom he has had four children—all living.

A. G. McCAMPBELL is a man of about thirty-seven years of age. He has had a successful business career, based upon experience in various lines of commerce. He makes his home at Louisville, Ky., where he manages the business of Bryant & Co. He resided in Chicago during 1876-'78, and is a member of the Board of Trade. Here, as well as in Louisville, Mr. McCampbell is regarded as an able man and one of the leaders in his present calling. The success of the Chicago business is largely due to his experience and energy.

HENRY AUGUST'S TOWNER, since 1857 a member of the commission and forwarding house of Rumsey Bro. & Co., now the oldest house on 'Change, was born in Batavia, Genesee Co., N. Y.,

June 14, 1832. He comes of old New England parentage, his father, Benjamin Franklin Towner, being a native of Connecticut, and his mother, Eliza Moore, a native of Pittsfield, Mass. He left school at the age of fourteen, and spent about five and a half years in the store of his uncle, Samuel C. Holden, coming West in the spring of 1852. On the first of May, 1852, he obtained employment in the commission house of Dole, Rumsey & Co., which, upon the retirement of Mr. Dole, became Rumsey Bro. & Co. In 1857, he became partner, and still remains an active member of the house. In 1856, Mr. Towner became a member of the Board of Trade. In 1866, he was elected director, serving two terms; and in 1869, was vice-president for one term. Before the great fire, he served four years as director of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, but resigned when that great calamity compelled him to devote his entire time to his own affairs. He is a member of St. James Episcopal Church, and has been a vestryman and warden for nineteen years. On the 25th of January, 1858, Mr. Towner was married to Miss Theodora A. Turner, the daughter of John B. Turner. They have had four children—Elizabeth, Martha, Henry A., Jr., and John DeKoven.

JOHN CRIGHTON was born in Perthshire, Scotland, in 1824, where he received his education, and became imbued with the principles of undeviating rectitude which have distinguished his after life. He was married on May 12, 1849, to Miss Jessie Butters, at Edinburgh, and on May 17 of that year, he left the "land of the leal" with his young bride, making their wedding tour to this city, where they arrived August 3, 1849. Mr. Crighton shortly after became a clerk for Rumsey, Dole & Co., with whom he remained fourteen years. He was, in April, 1862, elected flour inspector for the Board of Trade, which position he filled for seventeen years; and has been a member of the Board of Trade for twenty-six years. The firm of John Crighton & Co., of which he is the senior member, was formed in March, 1881, his partner being Sanford A. Scribner. This firm succeeded the well known firm of Low Bros. & Co. Mr. Crighton resided in Chicago until May, 1881, when he removed to Elgin, where he has since lived, and where his wife died, on August 21, 1883. Mr. Crighton has the following children: Belle A., William J., Alice M., Helen J., and Jessie A.

First Grain Dryer.—In 1859, Sylvester Marsh and James W. Sykes erected the first grain dryer ever built in Chicago, on the site then known as the Carpenter's packing house, and now occupied by James S. Kirk & Co.'s soap manufactory. The partnership ended within a year. Mr. Marsh is now president of the White Mountain Railroad, New Hampshire. In 1859, James W. Sykes established his present business at No. 142 South Water Street, under the firm name of J. W. Sykes & Co., which it has since maintained. While at No. 122 LaSalle Street, the great fire made a clean sweep of Mr. Sykes's property, and he was unfortunate enough to be among those who recovered no insurance. He resided, at that time, at No. 275 West Jackson Street, and there he at once re-established his office. As soon as the Oriental buildings, No. 122 LaSalle Street, were completed, he took office-room there. From there, he removed to the store, Nos. 101-93 Washington Street, and, in 1873, he removed to Nos. 108-12 Quincy Street, and probably would have been there yet, had not the rise in values, occasioned by the erection of the new Board of Trade building in the vicinity necessitated a change. Another removal, and the last, was made to the present location. Mr. Sykes has seen the seed business grow from its infancy into a great Eastern consumption and a large foreign trade.

JAMES W. SYKES was born at Great Falls, Strafford Co., N. H., May 1, 1833. His father, Richard Sykes, was a woolen manufacturer. James W. received his education at Worcester High School and Leicester Academy. About 1851, he went to Boston, and clerked in a flour, grain and seed store. There he remained until ill health brought him to Chicago in 1859, where, as has already been told, he founded the business of which he is still the head. While he claims no keen foresight as to Chicago's future greatness, he has abundant reasons to be satisfied with the choice he has made. For seven years Mr. Sykes was a member of the New England Congregational Church, but since 1871 has been a member of the First Congregational Church, and for seven years has been its clerk. He was married December 4, 1860, in Newton, Mass., to Sarah Jane, daughter of William H. Clark. They have four children: Mabel, Marion, Florence Winnie and Walter James.

CHARLES E. CULVER was born August 13, 1831, in Hopkinton, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y. His parents were of New England birth and of Welsh-English descent. He received his rudimentary instruction in the public and private schools of his native village and from the private tuition of a clergyman. He early acquired habits of industry, from being required, when not attending school, to work on his father's farm and assist in the business of a country store. After completing the higher studies at the St. Lawrence Academy, in Potsdam, N. Y., he decided not to enter college and prepare for professional life, as his parents had desired, but to fit himself for a mercantile career. Accordingly, in 1850, he entered the service of Edward Lambert & Co., a wholesale silk and dry goods house in New York City, and later, accepted a clerkship with Golding, Leete & Co., in Potsdam, with whom he remained two years—receiving, during the last twelve months, the highest salary paid by those extensive dealers to any clerk in their employ at that or any previous time, viz., $20 a month and board. In October, 1853, with the salary of the previous year in his command, young Culver started for Springfield, Ill., where he had friends. He arrived at Chicago; but his endeavors to find employment here being futile, he went to St. Charles, Ill. He there engaged with an old schoolmate in the purchase of grain. This business resulted, in the course of a few months, in his return to Chicago, where, in 1854, he founded, with his brother, B. F. Culver, the house of Culver & Co., which still exists. At the formation of the firm, Charles E. was resident partner at Chicago, doing all the business of the house at this point unassisted, and B. F. purchased and consigned grain from Princeton, Ill., to which point the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad had been recently opened. At present (1885), the firm consists of Charles E. Culver, his brother, George N. Culver, and nephew, Charles H. Hurlburd, the house being widely known for the extent and honorable character of its business operations. As a noteworthy fact, showing alike the growth of the grain trade of Chicago and of this particular firm, it may be mentioned that Culver & Co. have recently, in a single day, bought and sold more grain than were the total shipments from Chicago during the entire year of 1854—the year of the establishment of this house. Mr. Culver was elected a member of the Committee of Appeals—the highest tribunal of arbitration of the Board of Trade—while comparatively a new member of that body. In 1861–62 and 1873 he served as a director, and in 1871–72 as vice-president; being, also, during the latter year, a member of the Committee on Finance. From the vice-presidency, he was unanimously—less two dissenting votes—promoted to the presidency, serving one year from January, 1873. On retiring from the presidency, he received a complimentary vote that again made him a member of the Board of Appeals during 1875. At the first meeting held in the Exchange rooms, in the Chamber of Commerce Building, October 9, 1872, the celebration of the rebuilding and occupation of the new Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Culver, as first vice-president, presided in the absence of the president, Mr. Preston. On that occasion, Mr. Culver's response to the brief address by Daniel A. Jones, president of the Chamber of Commerce, giving to the Board of Trade formal possession of the new and beautiful hall, was a valuable contribution to the annals of the Board of Trade, both as to the past of the Association, and as marking an important step in the reconstruction of the "New Chicago." During the administration of Mr. Culver occurred the great financial panic that succeeded the failure of Jay Cooke & Co.; and it was, in part at least, owing to his good judgment and action that Chicago escaped the effects thereof, as did no other large city in this country. In view of the suspension of the New York banks, the closing of the Eastern Stock and Produce Exchanges, as well as the impossibility of the Chicago banks obtaining remittances for balances then due from New York, certain bankers of this city, and prominent members, urged a discontinuance of the sessions of the Board of Trade and an indefinite cessation of business on 'Change. President Culver vigorously opposed the proposition, and argued that to discontinue legitimate trading in grain would intensify the feelings of distrust, and would cause the suspension of every Chicago bank, while, by keeping open the avenues of trade, Chicago would soon receive, daily, hundreds of thousands of dollars for investment in grain and provisions, and that the banks would be strengthened thereby. On the day of the greatest excitement, a resolution for adjournment was prepared, and the president was requested to submit it immediately to the Association for its action. Fortunately, he secured a delay until a meeting of the directors could be held. At this meeting, it was agreed to recommend the Association to suspend the rules of the Board, and to adopt the following resolution (which was so adopted September 26, 1873, and rescinded by resolution, adopted October 1): "That all rules of this Board authorizing the Board of Directors to consider and act on complaints for violation of contract, be suspended, so far as such complaints are based on contracts for the delivery of property in future, made between the passage of this resolution and the further order of the Association; and further, that the Board shall not entertain complaints for the violation of contracts claimed to have been closed during the time above indicated, by reason of a non-deposit of a margin; provided, that this resolution shall in no case be held to apply to any trades made in settlement of existing contracts." The prediction of Mr. Culver was fully realized; for, during the next few days, the receipts of currency by express, at the banks of the city, exceeded $1,000,000, most of which was for investment in property dealt in on 'Change. At the conclusion of his term of office, President Culver closed the customary annual report of the Directors to the Association, in the following language: "The events of the year have not only proved the stability of our corporation, and tested the strength of our banks, merchants and manufacturers, but have also established the trade supremacy of our city. Notwithstanding the interruption of business incident to a period of general financial distress, the trade of Chicago, for the past twelve months, greatly exceeds that of any former year. The recent financial panic, entirely unexpected in its coming and in its severity, overtook the business men of this city in the height of the busiest season, and when, as a matter of course, they were most extended. The effect of the money crisis under such circumstances could not have been otherwise than serious. All cities and all interests suffered alike, but not equally. Whilst many an association similar in character to our own, was forced to succumb to the pressure of the panic, and was obliged to temporarily suspend business, this Board of Trade suffered no adjournment of its regular business session, and not one of its members was reported to have failed by reason of the panic. The certain and continued increase in the membership of our association, is but an illustration of the marked growth and prosperity of those interests that make up what constitutes the business, trade and commerce of the city in which we live." No member of the Board of Trade has labored more effectively than Mr. Culver in seeking to promote the high commercial character of that institution, and no member more fully enjoys the respect and esteem of his associates on the Board. Although he has filled many places of trust and responsibility, Mr. Culver has resolutely declined to be a candidate for political office.

C. MCCLAY CULBERTSON was born at Big Creek, Jefferson Co., Ind., August 5, 1819. He received his early education at the district schools, and when fourteen years of age went to Newport, Vermillion Co., Ind., where he completed his studies, and entered the store of his brother-in-law, J. Wilkinson, as a clerk. Subsequently, in 1838, Mr. Wilkinson's business being closed by his death, which occurred in 1836, he engaged with Daniel A. Jones as a clerk, and three years after became his partner. The partnership continued twenty-three years. In 1856, Mr. Culbertson removed to Muscatine, Iowa, where, with his partner, Mr. Jones, he carried on the packing business for one year. He came to Chicago in 1857, and immediately commenced the packing business on a most extensive scale. The firm of Culbertson, Blair & Co. was established in 1864, and for ten years was the leading packing-house west of Cincinnati. At the time of opening his establishment in this city, the whole business was in the crude state. There was no defined standard for the cutting of hogs or cattle, and a barrel of pork or beef, whether branded prime, mess, or otherwise, meant little more than that there purported to be two hundred pounds of beef or pork in the barrel. The difficulties of devising standards and grades that would be accepted by the packers and acknowledged by the trade in Eastern and foreign markets, were well nigh insurmountable, as it covered the ground, not only of defining the grades, but directing as to how hogs and cattle should be cut to insure inspection. Mr. Culbertson was one of the earliest Chicago packers to attempt to bring order out of confusion in his line of business, and was the first to introduce resolutions on the Board of Trade for the adoption of a code, or set of rules, for the regulation of the packing, curing, and inspection of provisions. His resolutions were adopted. A committee was appointed, of which he was a member, to report a plan for the inspection of provisions. Their report was adopted, and is, to-day, with such amendments as experience and the changes in the trade have made necessary, the basis of a system of packing and a standard of provision inspection known and accepted wherever American provisions are sold. Mr. Culbertson became a member of the Board of Trade in 1857. He served as a director in 1864–65–66, and during his time of service, was the chairman of the committee on the inspection of provisions. He is still a member of the Board in uninterrupted good standing. He bought the nucleus of his present farm at the United States Land office, at Danville, Ill., in 1853, but continued actively engaged in the packing business until 1877, since which year he has devoted his attention to the raising of stock, having become known as one of the leading raisers of reliable blooded stock in the country. Mr. Culbertson was married December 1, 1842, to Miss Rhoda A. Killiams, of Newport Ind. They have six surviving children—two sons and four daughters.

THE YEAR 1860–61.

The twelfth annual meeting was held in the new rooms in April, 1860. At this time the members numbered six hundred and twenty-five, showing an increase of sixty five during the month since the Board had taken possession of its new rooms. The election resulted in the following officers for the ensuing year : Ira Y. Munn, president ; Eli Bates and J. V. Farwell, first and second vice-presidents ; Seth Catlin, secretary ; and George Watson, treasurer.

SUSPENSION OF RECIPROCITY TREATY.—In the early part of the year, strong exertions were made by parties whose interests would be somewhat advanced by the abrogation of the existing reciprocity treaty with Canada, to influence the authorities at Washington so as to accomplish the desired end. Under the treaty a most profitable trade in grain, flour and provisions had grown up between Chicago and other lake cities and the Canadas. Its proposed abrogation was deemed a direct blow at the prosperity of the West, and the Board took strong and vigorous grounds against it. A protest was drawn up by a committee, which was numerously signed by the members, and presented to the United States Senate by Hon. S. A. Douglas, and to the House of Representatives by Hon. J. F. Farnsworth. Copies of the protest were also sent to the Boards of Trade of other Western cities, where they were signed, and sent to Washington. The influence of this action was of sufficient weight to postpone the proposed rescinding to a later day ; when it was declared abrogated for National reasons which were, at the time, considered sufficient to preclude any opposition on the part of the intensely patriotic Board. Action was also taken favoring the construction of the Iowa Central Railroad, between Cedar Rapids and the Missouri River.

CHARITABLE AND HOSPITABLE ACTION.—Large sums of money were raised, and provisions and clothing donated for the relief of the sufferers by the great tornado which swept through parts of Iowa and Illinois about the 1st of June, destroying the crops, and rendering many homeless and destitute. Rev. Robert Collyer was chosen as the bearer of these contributions.

During the year, the Board showed that generous hospitality, which came naturally with its increasing prosperity and the more pretentious habitation which it had recently occupied. It entertained the delegates of the National Republican Convention, held in Chicago in May, and, during the summer and fall, delegations of merchants from Philadelphia, Montreal, and Quebec. Its hospitalities to the Philadelphians resulted in enlarged business connections between that city and Chicago. The friendships thus inaugurated were confirmed by an invitation to the Board to visit Philadelphia. The invitation was accepted, and, on January, 21, 1861, a large delegation of influential members of the Board, and other prominent citizens, set out to return the visit. These visits marked the beginning of business connections between the two markets, which have remained unbroken to this day.

THE YEAR 1861-62.

The thirteenth annual meeting was held in April, 1861. The members had increased to seven hundred and twenty-five. The treasurer's report showed a surplus on hand more than sufficient to meet the probable current expenses, and it was resolved to invest $4,000 in Chicago City or Illinois State bonds. The report of the inspector showed the inspection, during the year, of five hundred and eighty-one cargoes of grain, comprising 8,255,466 bushels.

The officers elected for the ensuing year, were : Stephen Clary, president ; Clinton Briggs and E. G. Wolcott, first and second vice-presidents ; Seth Catlin, secretary ; and George Watson, treasurer. At this meeting it was resolved that a committee be appointed to take the necessary measures to have the bar at the entrance of the harbor sufficiently dredged out to afford not less than fourteen feet of water.

THE WAR PERIOD (April, 1861, to April, 1865).—The history of the Board of Trade has thus far shown in its characteristic development no exciting phases. The work it had performed had been done in the peaceful by-ways of trade and commerce, with only an occasional episode sufficiently removed from the daily duties of its existence to show that its members represented the higher virtues of charity when called upon to act. Profound peace had reigned for a generation, and patriotism had taken a latent form, which gave but faint indication of the tremendous force it was to become when fairly aroused to action. The amor patriæ of the Board of Trade had been, through the preceding years of its life, circumscribed by the interests of trade. It had even eschewed local politics, and its interest in the country seemed, so far as its action indicated, limited by the horizon which bounded the commercial and mercantile prosperity of Chicago.

That the men of the Chicago Board of Trade were capable of bounteous and disinterested charity, had been proven. No appeal for the alleviation of suffering had ever failed to meet a generous response. But its patriotism was now to be tested, and its heretofore hidden virtues tried by the severest ordeal through which an association of its kind could be called to pass. Nearly every member was at that time a voter ; and each had his own ideas as to the policy of the Government. The Board had no leading political bias, so far as was evinced, either in the individual transactions of its members or by its corporate acts. It had already established a profitable trade in corn and provisions with most important southern points from Baltimore to New Orleans. The sudden breaking up of this rapidly-increasing trade, it was believed, would prove a serious blow to the business interests of the members of the Board.

The attack upon Fort Sumter and its abandonment to the Southern forces, April 14, 1861, broke the delusive spell under which the people of the North had hitherto been bound, and brought them to the sudden realization that threatened treason had at last culminated in open rebellion, and that a war for the destruction of the Republic had actually begun. From the hour the news reached the Board, until peace came again—through every vicissitude of the desperate conflict—it stood, the undaunted, unswerving and ready champion of the Union cause, giving without stint of men and money, and upholding the flag with unflinching hand until the danger was passed.

THE BOARD-OF-TRADE FLAG.—On Wednesday, April 18, 1861, a most patriotic scene took place at the Board of Trade rooms. The following resolution was passed by unanimous and loud acclamation :

"Resolved, That the board of directors be requested to purchase an American flag, and cause the same to be hung from the rooms of the Board of Trade, as an emblem of our devotion to the glorious stars and stripes."

Captain Akhurst, of the firm of Akhurst & Douglas presented to the Board a flag-staff, from which the flag waved its defiance to treason until the war was ended.

WAR FINANCES.—At a mass-meeting, held at Bryan Hall, Wednesday evening, April 17, the Union Defense Committee was appointed, composed of A. E. Kent, Gurdon S. Hubbard, C. G. Walker, J. L. Hancock and P. Conly—all members of the Board of Trade, with the exception of Mr. Conly.

On Friday, the subscription list was presented on 'Change, and subscriptions to the amount of $5,000 obtained from members of the Board. A member moved that the Board subscribe $500, to be paid from the treasury. A discussion arose as to the legality of such subscription under the provisions of the charter, which was brought to a somewhat unexpected close by Charles H. Walker, Jr., who moved that the motion be amended so as to increase the subscription to $5,000. The amendment was passed amid such uproarious applause as to completely annihilate all further objections as to the technical legality of the measure. The total amount raised at this meeting was $10,000. This was the first of the many munificent donations of the Board which followed, increasing in amount with every new emergency that presented itself, until the war was ended.

DEPRECIATION OF SECURITIES.—With the additional task which the Board had cheerfully assumed, of doing its full part in sustaining the Government, and in which it then early took the lead, it did not abate its watchfulness and solicitude for the business interests of the city. The first outbreak was followed by a decline in all Southern State securities, many of which were owned by the Illinois banks, and held by the State treasurer as collateral security for the redemption of their bills. The banks holding a large proportion of such securities soon found them inadequate, under the constant decline, for the security of their outstanding circulation. While the bank issues, based on United States or Northern States bonds, remained at par, and were circulated at full value, those based on Southern stocks depreciated as the stocks declined from day to day. The currency soon became so completely deranged, as to threaten a general demoralization of business. The bills of the sound banks rapidly disappeared from circulation, while those which were distrusted were passed from one anxious holder to another, imperfectly performing the functions of money; not exactly discredited, as the State authorities were reluctant to risk the consequences of a peremptory call upon the unfortunate banks to make the sudden and unexpected depreciation in their securities good, but under a cloud of distrust, which showed in the premium required to convert them into gold or exchange on the East. This varied with the value of the various securities on which the bills were based, and the probable ability of the several banks to make them good. The banks published daily bulletins of the constantly changing values of the various State-bank issues, and the rates at which they would be taken on deposit or on payment for the day. The notes based on Northern stocks, were known as the "short list," those doing business on Southern stocks, as the "long list." "Short list" bills would buy New York exchange at from ten to fifteen per cent. premium; "long list" bills were from fifteen to seventy per cent. discount. The railroad companies, the Merchants' Association, and the lumbermen had also their private lists, all differing from that of the banks, and each differing from the other. The confusion which ensued was so serious an obstruction to business, as to call for some concerted action to avert the general suspension of business, which was imminent. The Board of Trade, as had become its wont in all emergencies, took the initiative steps toward bringing such order as was possible out of the confusion.

On Thursday morning, May 17, a full meeting was held at the Board of Trade rooms, to adopt some uniform policy, concerning the currency. A resolution, offered by Mayor Rumsey, was passed, to invite a conference with committees, consisting of ten each, representing the following interests: the city banks, the country banks, the Board of Trade, the Merchants' Association, the railroads, and the lumber trade. The committee appointed on the part of the Board, were: J. S. Rumsey, Wolcott, Briggs, Fairbank, Houghteling, Kent, Randolph, Watson, McChesney, and Curtiss. A resolution was adopted, recommending that all advances heretofore made on produce should be settled in currency on the basis of the price of New York exchange on the day on which the money was paid. Another resolution, recommending that coin be adopted as the basis of future transactions, was voted down, on the ground that it would forestall the decisions of the conference committees before mentioned. The various committees met the following afternoon, and agreed upon a list of banks which should be taken at par, and another list which should be taken as currency, so soon as the banks therein named should make their securities in Northern and United States stocks equal to ninety cents. The result of the conference was reported at a meeting at the Board of Trade on the same evening, when, after long speeches from W. B. Ogden, Wirt Dexter, Hon. N. P. Banks, John C. Haines, and Stephen Clary, the report was adopted. Although the inconvenience arising from a depreciated currency continued until the bills were withdrawn, or driven from circulation, the action inaugurated by the Board, which resulted in a uniform valuation of the currency afloat, by the diverse business interests of the city, as well as the banks, restored confidence, and enabled business to be again conducted with comparative safety.

The pressing necessities for large sums of money to prosecute the war had, meantime, completely absorbed the resources of the Eastern banks and forced the Government to adopt what, at the time, was a measure new in the financial experiences of the country, and directly in opposition to the traditions and prejudices of the leading capitalists and bankers at the money centers. A bill was introduced in Congress, and passed, after much discussion and several amendments, which provided for the issue of $200,000,000 in bonds bearing 7.3 per cent. interest, and also $50,000,000 of demand-notes, in small denominations, bearing no interest, which should be a full legal tender throughout the United States for all debts, both public or private. The Board of Trade indorsed by resolution the proposed issue of treasury notes, and telegraphed to the Illinois representatives in Congress, recommending that a bill should pass immediately making such notes legal tender. The Board also passed resolutions condemnatory of the act passed by the State Legislature entitled, "An act to establish a general system of banking upon a specie basis." The ground of its objection to the act, as stated, was that it tended to the aggrandizement of the commissioners and their friends in preference to the general welfare of the people.

The Board evinced its continued solicitude for the Canadian Reciprocity treaty by presenting to Congress the following memorial:

"The Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, Illinois, would respectfully remonstrate against any action suspending or repealing that treaty between the United States and Great Britain, known as the reciprocity treaty, believing that its repeal or abrogation would materially affect the producing interests of the Northwest."

It also sent a committee to Washington, bearing petitions and a memorial to Congress, praying for the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

NEWS OF FIRST VICTORY.—On February 17, 1862, the news of the first great victory of the war, the capture of Fort Donelson, was announced on 'Change, at the opening of the noon session. No business was attempted. The whole Board was resolved into a war meeting, and the doors thrown open to every rejoicing patriot who could crowd into the hall. The Board was called to order for business—war business only. It is unnecessary to portray the scene of uproarious confusion amidst which it managed that day to do its patriotic and efficient work.

The first, as recorded, was the passage, amid deafening and long continued cheers, of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this Board hears, with pride and heartfelt thanks, the glorious news of the success of our troops in the capture of the rebel stronghold, Fort Donelson. That we tender the thanks of this Board, also of all loyal citizens of our city, to the commanding officers and their commands, for their triumphant efforts to plant the stars and stripes over the same, and that we do particularly thank our gallant battery, Co. "B," Chicago Light Artillery, for their daring and successful courage, displayed on the fields of Frederickton, Belmont and Fort Donelson.

Resolved, That the president of this Board be requested to forward these resolutions to the commanding officers of the expedition, and a copy to Captain Ezra Taylor, Chicago Light Artillery, Co. "B."

E. W. Blatchford gave the history of the struggles and trials of the loyal merchants of St. Louis, where the disloyal element had for a time held almost entire control of the business interests of the city, and announced the formation there of the Union Merchant's Exchange of St. Louis, every member of which had subscribed to an unconditional oath of allegiance to the Federal Union, and pledged himself "to discourage and forever oppose secession, rebellion, and disintegration of the Federal Union." The right hand of fellowship was extended to the stout-hearted merchants of St. Louis, who were thus faithful in the very den of secession, in suitable resolutions, which were presented by Mr Blatchford at the close of his speech, and unanimously passed.

Following this, a committee of four was appointed to act in concert with the people and the Sanitary Commission, as a Relief Committee, which was constituted as follows: N. K. Fairbank, A. E. Kent, N. D. Hough-teling, and Gurdon S. Hubbard; and $675 were paid on the spot for the purpose above indicated.

REPROVING SOUTHERN SYMPATHIZERS.—Many of the prisoners taken at the capture of Fort Donelson were sent to Springfield and Chicago, to await exchange. The first installment reached Chicago on the 18th. Among the officers were several from Southern cities who, previous to the war, had had business relations with Chicago and were well known in social circles. Instead of being treated with the proper spirit which their recreancy would seem to merit from all loyal people, these officers were being cordially received, hospitably entertained, and otherwise lionized by some of their former friends. These rumors were peculiarly exasperating to Chicagoans who mourned, as the price of victory, many a gallant father, son or brother who would never more return to them. The indignation of the members of the Board found expression in a set of resolutions, passed at its session on the 20th of the month, presented by Ira Y. Munn. They were as follows:

"WHEREAS, Our Government has been pleased to place among us a large number of prisoners belonging to the rebel government, it is our duty, and we doubt not the wish of the citizens of Chicago, to see that they are well fed and cared for; but we can not but feel that in view of the dead, of the suffering wounded, of the broken and crushed hearts among our own people, caused by the late battle, grown out of this unholy Rebellion, it is earnestly our duty—a duty we owe to ourselves as well as to our Government—that the officers, as well as the privates now prisoners among us, should receive such attention at our hands as humanity alone would dictate. Therefore,

Resolved, That this Board frowns upon and condemns any attempt to make 'lions' and 'distinguished visitors' of any of the prisoners now among us.

Resolved, That we recommend to the citizens of Chicago to abstain from offering to any of the prisoners now here, or who may hereafter arrive, those polite and marked attentions that make them heroes in their own eyes, to the manifest degradation of ourselves.

Resolved, That we believe many of the privates among our prisoners are honest and true men, but have been deceived by their designing and contemptible leaders. To all such who will give evidence of honesty and loyalty, we will extend the right hand of brotherhood."

Thus the staunch-hearted merchants maintained their Union principles and resolved not to allow even the appearance of sympathy for the Rebellion to exist in their midst.

It is now necessary to glance at the personnel of some of the men who were so ably sustaining the Union cause, Federal credit and Chicago's commerce during this crucial epoch of our national history.

One of the oldest firms in the city, doing business on the Board, is that of

HOUGH & Co., which is lineally descended from the firm of R. M. & O. S. Hough. In 1839, Oramel S. and Rosell M. Hough were with Sylvester Marsh, and the directory for 1845 states that O. S. Hough was a butcher, and R. M. Hough foreman at Wadsworth, Dyer & Chapin's packing-house. In 1848-49, Oramel S. Hough was foreman at Wadsworth, Dyer & Chapin's; and the beef packed by him and exported to England met with such a favorable sale, that, in 1850, O. S. & R. M. Hough built a packing-house, and commenced the business on their own account. This firm obtained a large contract for supplying beef to the English troops in the Crimea during the Russian war. They were very successful, and met with no reverses until their packing-house was destroyed by fire in 1856; they, however, rebuilt it the following year near Halsted-street bridge. In 1856, R. M. Hough sold out his interest to C. J. Renshaw and Charles Seaverns, and the firm name was Hough & Co.; Rosell M. Hough being at this time a member of the firm of Hough, Hills & Co., soap and candle manufacturers, Newberry C. Hills being the other partner. In 1857, the directory gives Oramel S. Hough as the packer; and in 1858, the firm again became R. M. & O. S. Hough, continuing under that designation until 1862, when the packing-house was known as the Chicago packing-house, and the Chicago firm Worster, Hough & Co.—comprising John Worster and Cyrus Dupee, of Boston, Mass., A. Worster and R. M. and O. S. Hough—and the corresponding firm in Boston being Worster, Dupee & Co., and in New York, Cyrus Dupee & Co. This association continued until 1865, when the old firm of R. M. & O. S. Hough was reinstated, continuing until 1867. In the year 1866, Albert J. Hough was bookkeeper and Charles J. Hough clerk for the firm, and the packing-house was located on the west side of Lime, near Halsted Street. In 1867, the firm became Jones, Hough & Co., comprising Daniel A. Jones, R. M. Hough, Oramel S. Hough and Charles L. Raymond; the Houghs also being interested in the lumber firm of Hilliard, Pierce & Co., composed of Laurin P. Hilliard, L. H. Pierce, Oramel S. Hough and Daniel A. Jones, and of which lumber firm Walter C. Hough was bookkeeper. In 1868, the packing firm remained the same, except that R. M. Hough retired. In the same year, Mr. Jones retired from the lumber firm. In 1869, D. A. Jones and C. L. Raymond retired from the packing firm, and started the firm of Jones & Raymond. In 1869, the lumber firm was named Hilliard, Pierce & Co., and comprised L. P. Hilliard, L. H. Pierce, O. S. Hough and S. A. Hilliard. In 1870, the lumber firm continued as in the preceding year, but the packing firm was changed to O. S. Hough & Sons, and comprised the senior partner and Albert J., Charles H. and Walter C. Hough. In 1871, the lumber firm was Hilliard, Churchill & Co., and comprised L. P. and S. A. Hilliard, Oramel S. Hough and W. L. Churchill; and the following year Mr. Hough withdrew from the lumber business. The firm of O. S. Hough & Sons continued until 1872, when the packing-house was torn down, and an elevator called the Chicago & St. Louis Elevator, built on its site; and the firm operating it were R. M. & O. S. Hough & Co., the company being Albert J. and Charles H. Hough. O. S. Hough & Sons were also the company in the packing-house of Lees, Hendricks & Co., and re-established the packing business on their own account—Albert J. and Charles H. being the sons. During 1874, the firm of O. S. Hough & Sons comprised the senior partner and Charles H. and Walter C. Hough; Albert J. Hough being a member of the firm of Barter & Co. (Thomas O. Barter and Albert J. Hough) ham-curers. In 1875, the firm name was changed to O. S. Hough & Son (Charles H. Hough), Albert J. Hough being a provision dealer, and Walter C. Hough a broker. In 1876, Oramel S. Hough died, and, in 1878, the present firm of Hough & Co. was inaugurated—Albert J. being the principal partner, and his brothers, Charles H. and Walter C., the company. This company is still in existence, and is the proprietor of an excellent reputation for energy, business enterprise and fair dealing that has made it widely known and that is a fitting and honorable characteristic of a house of such long standing. The present members of the firm were all born in Chicago.

TOBEY & BOOTH.—The oldest, as well as one of the largest, packing-houses in this city, is that of Tobey & Booth, which was established in 1852 by Orville H. Tobey and Heman D. Booth. At that time there were only four packing-houses in Chicago. In the spring of 1846, Orville H. Tobey arrived in Chicago. In 1851, he commenced packing beef. In the following year he formed a partnership with Heman D. Booth, and commenced business at the corner of what is now known as Eighteenth and Grove streets, but which was then out on the prairie, and away from the business portion of the city. The first packing-house was cheaply put up, as the proprietors thought that the authorities would not let them remain in so close proximity to the business part of the town, owing to the obnoxious odors unavoidable about slaughtering houses. The building was a frame structure, 40 by 130 feet. They handled nothing but cattle for a number of years, and packed only in the winter seasons, until the summer of 1857. They employed forty men, and slaughtered one hundred and fifty cattle a day. The product found a ready sale in the domestic market, and the business gradually increased, until it became necessary to erect more substantial and larger quarters. In 1857, they tore down the old building, and put up a much better structure on the same spot, 30 by 130 feet in size, with an "L," fifty feet in width. Upon the completion of this, they commenced slaughtering hogs and curing meats in the summer season. They discontinued handling beef and commenced packing pork for the foreign markets. In 1862, they enlarged their packing-house to its present dimensions, 260 feet frontage on Grove Street and 150 feet on Eighteenth. Upon the completion of the enlarged quarters, they were only enabled to handle one hundred and fifty hogs a day during the summer season, but now that they have their work so systematically arranged, in addition to modern conveniences, that they have a capacity for handling one thousand two hundred hogs a day, and in winter two thousand. In 1863, they erected a brick building on the northeast corner of Grove and Eighteenth streets, opposite the packing-house, which is ninety feet wide and two hundred feet long. This was used for several weeks after the great fire of 1871, as a distributing depot of the provisions and supplies sent in from abroad for Chicago's homeless and destitute people. It is now the jobbing and retail department of Tobey & Booth, and a portion is used for making all kinds of minced meats. The arrangements in and about their packing-house are complete in every particular. The firm makes a specialty of preparing meats for export, and has handled three hundred and seventy-one thousand hogs annually. The firm is composed of Orville H. Tobey and Mrs. Elizabeth W. Booth, relict of Heman D. Booth, who died in 1872. E. P. Tobey, a son of the senior member of the firm, has been superintendent of the packing department since 1861.

ORVILLE H. TOBEY is one of the oldest business men of Chicago, and has been in the packing business for thirty-four consecutive years. He was born at the town of Sharon, Lyscoming Co., Conn., March 13, 1814. He resided in his native town and attended school until he was seventeen years of age. He then went to New York City, and engaged in the mercantile trade, where he remained until 1846, when he came to Chicago. During the first year or two after coming here, he worked by the day in a packing-house. He afterward opened a meat market on Randolph Street, a few doors east of Clark Street; and upon the completion of the Market Building on State, between Randolph and Lake streets, moved thereto, and kept a meat-stall for some time. In the fall of 1850, he took charge of the packing-house of Wadsworth, Dyer & Chapin, and worked for them during that season. In 1851 he commenced packing beef on his own account, and his packing-house was located at Twelfth-street Slip. In 1852, he associated with him Heman D. Booth, and they commenced the packing business at the corner of Grove and Eighteenth streets. Mr. Tobey is still active in the management of the business. Mr. Tobey was married in New York City, in 1835, to Miss Mary Williams. Their children are Mrs. Elizabeth W. Booth, of Chicago; Mrs. Abbie C. Rood, of New York City; Edgar P. Tobey, of Chicago; John A., William W. and Frank H., who are residents of New York City. Mr. Tobey has for many years been a member of the Calumet Club, and also belongs to the Washington Park Driving Club.

ASA DOW was born in Hopkinton, Merrimac Co., N. H., September 20, 1823. With his father, Amos Dow, he moved to Cass County, Mich., in 1831, where, in 1847, he began business in general merchandising, with his brother, S. E. Dow. In 1849, he crossed the plains to California, where for six months he followed mining pursuits, and then once more entered the mercantile field, and, continued therein twenty-two months. He returned to Michigan, where he followed merchandising in connection with the grain and provision trade. In 1855, he located in Joliet, Ill., where he followed the grain and provision business, until April 1, 1858; when he came to Chicago, and at that time became a member of the Board of Trade. Mr. Dow has, during this period of twenty-six years, been prominently identified with the grain and provision trade. For the first two years, he was a member of the firm of Dow, Hurd & Co., and, from 1860 to 1873, of the well-known firm of Dow, Quirk & Co., since which latter year he has operated entirely on his own account. He was also for three years connected with the extensive packing firm of B. F. Murphey & Co. Mr. Dow has always taken an active interest in the management of the Board of Trade, was a member of the Committee of Appeals, several terms, also a member of the Board of Directors; was vice-president for one term, and, in 1879, was elected president, serving his term until 1880, with credit to himself and the Board of which he has so long been a member.

ENOCH B. STEVENS was born in Livermore, Androscoggin Co., Me., March 23, 1830. He came to Illinois in 1843, settling first in Quincy, where he received his education, and learned telegraphy, and afterwards was, for four years, the manager of the Cornell Line. He came to Chicago in 1850, and became a member of the Board in 1854, at which time he embarked in the grain business. He subsequently became largely interested in warehousing, and was, from 1860 to 1881, a member of the well known firm of Vincent & Co. The grain commission firm of E. B. Stevens & Co., still in existence, was organized in 1859, and has done business uninterruptedly since that time, being now one of the oldest grain firms in the city. As a member of the Board of Trade, Mr. Stevens has been honored with many positions of trust and responsibility. He has served as a director, and as a member of both the Committees of Arbitration and of Appeals. He is an enthusiastic member of the Masonic fraternity, having honorably attained to the highest degrees that can be conferred in America. He was first made a master mason in the Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. and A. M., in April, 1851, of which he is still a member, and of which he was worshipful master in 1856-57. He became a member of Lafayette Chapter, No. 2, in 1854, of which he was high priest in 1861. In 1854, he also became a knight templar, and a member of Apollo Commandery, No. 1. In the encampment he has filled every office up to, and including, that of Generalissimo. He has received all the Scottish Rite degrees, the 33rd being conferred in Boston, in April, 1866. Mr. Stevens was married in Chicago, in 1854, to Elizabeth, daughter of Charles Larmine, who settled in Chicago, in 1849. They have seven children.

NATHANIEL T. WRIGHT was born in Oneida Co., N. Y., in October, 1835, and came West with his father, Thomas G. Wright, in 1837. They passed through Chicago and located in Kendall County, Ill., where Nathaniel was reared on a farm. In 1856 he went to St. Paul, Minn., and in the fall of 1858 came to Chicago. In April, 1859, with G. T. Beebe, he established the firm of Wright & Beebe, and carried on a large commission business for over fourteen years. Mr. Wright subsequently became connected with the Northwestern Malt Company, with which he served three years as president, when he sold out his interest. On November 1, 1870, he joined Charles T. Nash, and formed the firm of Nash & Wright, which, in 1883, changed to Nash, Wright & Co., the company being Thomas D. Wayne, jr., and which firm is virtually the successor of the old firm of Wright & Beebe. Mr. Wright has been a member of the Board of Trade since early in 1859, purchasing at that time a membership for $5. He has, on several occasions, refused to accept a nomination for an office in the management of the affairs of the Board, but in 1883, was prevailed upon to accept, and was elected a member of the Committee of Appeals.

P. MORAN is a native of West Ireland, where he was born in 1833. He was for about two years before emigrating to America engaged in the grocery and bakery business. He arrived in America, in June, 1853, and in August, of that year moved to Ohio, and entering the employ of J. C. Dow, of Hudson, learned the business of making butter and cheese. He was frequently sent by the dairymen and dealers of the place to points farther west to sell their products, and as their agent, visited and opened a dairy trade at Toledo, Detroit, Chicago and at points on the Mississippi River as far north as St. Paul. In the interest of the dairymen and dealers of the Western Reserve, he removed to Chicago in 1857, and opened a small commission house on South Water Street, exclusively for the sale and purchase of butter and cheese. He received most liberal patronage in Chicago, and built up an extensive trade throughout the West. In 1858, his former employer, J. C. Dow, came to Chicago and entered into a partnership with him in the business he had established. Besides Mr. Dow, Mr. Moran connected himself in the business with M. A. Devine and I. H. Wanzer and started two cheese factories and creameries—the first in the West; and this firm may therefore claim the distinction of being the pioneers in the business which has now grown to be one of the most extensive and important in the great Northwest. The style of the firm was Dow, Moran & Co. The business of the firm increased rapidly, much of the Western Reserve dairy business being transferred to Chicago and to the house of Dow & Moran. At the time of the fire theirs was the leading dairy house in the Northwest. Their orders came from as far East as Boston and as far South as New Orleans, while their consignors embraced leading dairymen and manufacturers in Illinois, Wisconsin and Iowa. The great disaster swept away the property, stocks, books and accounts of the firm. Insured in home companies, which went down in the general ruin, the calamity left little for Mr. Moran but his real estate, covered with ashes, and his integrity and pluck, unimpaired. The story of his recuperation is as honorable as it is short. He refused the offer of his creditors to accept a dividend of fifty per cent. on their claims, and, within three years after the fire had paid them all in full, with ten per cent. interest. Mr. Moran may well be proud of the record here made; that, through all the vicissitudes of trade, he has kept his faith on every contract he has ever made, and that the cloud of bankruptcy or repudiation throws no shadow over his business career. In 1876, Mr. Dow sold out his interest to Mr. Moran, and shortly after the style of the firm became P. Moran & Co. His present partners are A. E. Woodhull and I. R. Lang. After a life of over a quarter of a century, this is one of the solid firms of America in the business with which it has been so long identified. In 1879 it had branch houses in Liverpool, England, and in New York, but since that year has found an ample outlet for its trade in orders received from all parts of the country at their central point in Chicago. Mr. Moran has been a member of the Board since 1858.

ROBERT WARREN was born in Ireland, and early in life emigrated to Canada, from whence, in 1857, he came to Chicago. In 1855, he entered the employ of Hugh McLennan, and remained seven years. He then formed a co-partnership with W. P. McLaren, under the firm name of McLaren & Warren, maintaining offices in both Chicago and Milwaukee. Mr. Warren being in Milwaukee and Mr. McLaren in Chicago. In 1868, this partnership was dissolved, since which time Mr. Warren has conducted his business alone, under the name of Robert Warren & Co. The office of the company was in the Board of Trade Building until 1869; it was then in the Mercantile Building until the fire of 1871; was after that removed to a small room on the West Side; and upon the completion of the Farwell Building, on Market Street, moved into that building. At the end of one year it was moved to its present location. Mr. Warren has been for the most part engaged in exporting flour and grain, and was, from 1869 to 1881, one of the largest, if not the largest, exporters of these products doing business in Chicago, having shipped as much as two million bushels of grain in a month from different cities in the United States to Europe. He is also largely interested in the provision trade. Mr. Warren has experienced the day of small things in his mercantile career, and therefrom, by his industry, perseverance, and integrity, has built up an immense business, and an individual reputation that is one of the best among the commercial magnates of our city. He is vice-president of the International Packing Company, and is owner and manager of the old packing business of Davies, Atkinson & Co. He has been a member of the Board for the past twenty years, and has filled such positions as director and member of the Committees of Appeals and of Arbitration.

JAMES VAN INWAGEN was born in Fairville, N. Y., June 1, 1837, and came to Chicago in 1854, and became junior partner in the commission house of Van Inwagen & Co. in 1856, his father, now deceased, being the senior member of the firm. He was associated with Samuel T. Atwater in the insurance business from 1857 until ten years later, during which time they organized the Traders' Insurance Company of this city; they also represented a number of Eastern insurance companies. In 1867, Mr. Atwater retired and Mr. Van Inwagen carried on the insurance business alone. He also succeeded to the secretaryship of the Traders' Insurance Company, which was subsequently merged into the Merchants' Insurance Company, an older local company. Mr. Van Inwagen continued to follow the insurance business until the great fire, which ruined the companies he was representing. In 1872, he resumed his former grain commission business on the Board of Trade. The firm of Van Inwagen & Hamill was established in 1875, and did a very large commission business for several years—Mr. Van Inwagen retiring therefrom in 1882, but continuing identified with the grain trade. He has been a continuous member of the Board since 1862, and has also served as a director, retiring from that position January 1, 1884. He has been prominent in the promotion of local musical art, and was president of the Apollo Musical Club for several years. He is now (1884) director of the Calumet Club, Washington Park Club, Central Music Hall Company, and the Chicago Musical Festival Association.

DANIEL F. BAXTER was born in Quincy, Mass., in 1830. He removed to Boston in 1842, and engaged, during the succeeding two years, in the retail grocery business. In 1884, he entered the employ of Fulser & Co., an extensive packing firm, having their leading business in Boston, with branch establishments in the West. In 1849, he took the superintendency of their branch house at Vincennes, Ind., and thereafter, for five years, spent six months of each year, during the packing season, at that point. In 1854, he severed his connection with that firm; in November of that year, came to Chicago, and, early in 1855, became a member of the Board of Trade, for several months engaging in local business upon the Board. In the fall of 1855, he formed a partnership with George Webster, under the firm name of Webster & Baxter, for carrying on a commission business in grain and provisions. They built up an extensive trade in dressed hogs, and during the last two years of the war did an enormous business in supplying forage to the Government. The firm became extensively known throughout the country as one of the largest and most reliable in their line of business, shipping as high as twenty-two cargoes of grain a day. In the fire of 1871 they were burned out, Mr. Baxter losing upwards of $150,000. Shortly after the fire he recommenced business, dealing almost exclusively in rye, which he has continued up to the present time, increasing it from year to year, until it has reached the enormous proportions of 12,000,000 bushels of rye per annum, cash and options. He was for two years a member of the Committee of Arbitration of the Board, and served two years on the Committee of Appeals.

JULIAN KUNE is a member of the Board who has quite a romantic history. He was born on July 10, 1831, in Bellenyes, Hungary, and received a collegiate education, attending the university at Szarvas. When the Hungarian rebellion broke out, he enlisted in the Honvéd army, and served through the war. His company left Hungary in July, 1849, by way of Rotherthurm. After a severe battle between the garrison of that post and the Russians, under Lueders, they had to lay down their arms to the Turkish garrison stationed at the Wallachian frontier town, opposite Rotherthurm. The Russians surrounded their camp and insisted upon leading them away as prisoners of war, but the firmness of their Turkish protectors saved them. They were afterward marched under guard through Wallachia to Kalafat, opposite Widdin; at the latter place they met Kossuth and thousands of other refugees, who had escaped, after the memorable surrender at Vilagos, into Turkish territory. After spending some time in Widdin and Schumla, they were transported, some with Kossuth to Kutayah, Asia Minor, and others, including Kune, to Aleppo in Syria, with General Bem at their head. There they were nominally enrolled into the Turkish army with full pay as officers, according to their rank, but in fact they were political prisoners under the surveillance of the Ottoman government, and, by the joint agreement between the leading European powers, were allowed full liberty to go and come wherever they pleased within the boundaries of the city. While there, the great Christian massacre took place at Damascus and throughout Syria. They were all confined for over two weeks in the barracks, until aid came, and over two thousand Arabs and Bedouins were slain by the Turkish army. While in Aleppo, Mr. Kune was sent by the governor, under escort, to Damascus on a mission to the governor of Syria. The journey across the desert lasted about two weeks and was very dangerous on account of the many hostile Bedouin tribes they had to pass. Mr. Kune left Syria in November, 1851, for Egypt, thence to Algiers, Morocco, Gibraltar, Malta and England, where he arrived in February, 1852. Arriving at New York in the clipper "Cornelius Grinnell," May 1, 1852, he immediately went to work in an ammunition factory or arsenal, and was there five weeks when the factory had to close on account of lack of funds. He next found work in a clock factory at Bristol, Conn., remaining there until the latter part of 1853, when he removed to Hartford and engaged in teaching French and German, both in private families and at the Normal School in New Britain. He also had classes in Springfield, Mass., and at Chicopee, Mass. In the fall of 1855, he came to Chicago, and went into the law office of Scammon & McCagg. A few weeks later, he entered the employ of the Marine Bank, and staid there until 1860, when, at the solicitation of the State and United States campaign committees, he stumped the States of Illinois, Indiana and Michigan for Abraham Lincoln. After the election of Lincoln, he was elected assistant enrolling and engrossing clerk of the Senate. When the call was made for troops, after the firing on Fort Sumter, he was offered a commission in the regular army, but as he was engaged in organizing a regiment in Chicago he declined the offer. After the acceptance of the regiment by the Government, he was elected its major. Unfortunately, dissensions and secret plottings on the part of some of the officers caused him to resign in 1862; and although Governor Yates offered him the command of another regiment, the state of his health, which had been impaired in former campaigns, decided him to give up the path to glory, and enter the one leading to wealth. So, in 1862, he became a member of the Chicago Board of Trade, where he has since continued to be, with the exception of about four years while he was traveling in Europe. During part of the interval alluded to he was South Side City Assessor in 1865. He also visited Europe several times between 1869 and 1873. While in Hungary, on a visit in 1870, the Franco-Prussian War broke out. Horace White, chief editor of the Chicago Tribune, sent him a cablegram asking him to follow the Prussian Army as the Tribune war correspondent. He accepted, and went through the campaign until the fall of Paris, when he returned to Chicago and resumed his business on the Board of Trade as receiver of grain. His specialty has been the barley trade, in which he is still engaged. He has an elevator and warehouse on the corner of Eighteenth Street and Stewart Avenue and handles from three hundred and fifty thousand to four hundred thousand bushels of barley, during the season, shipping it to all parts of the United States. He also deals largely in oats, corn and mill-stuffs. Mr. Kune was married on June 23, 1861, to Miss Galloway, of Chicago, and has three children.

JOSIAH W. PRESTON was born at Warsaw, Genesee Co., N. Y., August 31, 1833. In 1836, his father, Isaac Preston, moved, with his family, to Kane County, Ill., where Joseph W. passed his boyhood, and received his education. After leaving school, he followed mercantile pursuits, in various places in Illinois, until 1852, when he went to Oregon, and remained three years, employed on the United States General Survey, in that and Washington Territory. Returning to Illinois, in 1856, he embarked in mercantile and grain business, at Alton, in partnership with Harmon Spruance, the firm being Spruance & Preston. In August, 1861, the firm moved to Chicago, and, until 1864, carried on business under the old name, when it was changed to Spruance, Preston & Co.; the latter partnership being dissolved in July, 1876. From 1877 to 1881, Mr. Preston was in partnership with E. H. Lahee, and has been, since that time, with O. H. Roche. He became a member of the Board in 1861, and was elected president of that body in April, 1871, performing the duties of the position, which, during the year of the fire, were especially responsible, with such efficiency and faithfulness that he was re-elected, in the spring of 1872. Mr. Preston was one of the directors of the Board, in 1868-69, and in 1869-70, was on the Committees of Membership and of Cemeteries. He was married in Alton, Ill., to Miss Anna Clawson and has three children.

SAMUEL W. ALLERTON, one of Chicago's millionaires, commenced life as a farmer's boy, in Northern New York. That rugged region had few charms for him, and before he was twenty, he began to look upon the Great West as the land in which he would try his fortune. In 1853, when he was scarcely twenty, he settled in Southern Illinois, and engaged in buying and shipping hogs. In this he had varying success, but at last his untiring industry began to tell, and he commenced to accumulate money. In 1860, he enlarged operations, by making Chicago his headquarters, and here at the stock-yards he could be found, early and late. Year by year he added to business operations, becoming interested and a large owner in the cattle-yards at East Liberty, near Pittsburgh, and in those at Jersey City. He also has a packing-house at Chicago, a ranche in Nebraska, and a farm in Southern Illinois. Mr. Allerton is a man full of charitable deeds and kindnesses, is easily approached, and never turns a deaf ear to the worthy.

IRA S. YOUNGLOVE was born in Vernon, Vt., November 10, 1835, the son of Ira and Feronia (Johnson) Younglove. He attended the common schools of Vernon during his earlier years, and afterward became a pupil in the schools of Fitchburg, Mass., whither his family had moved at the time he was seven years of age. He left school at eighteen, and for three years worked at the carpenter's trade, and also at chairmaking. In 1856, he came to Chicago, and for one year was a clerk for A. G. Garfield, a hardware merchant. In 1858, he went to Mobile, Ala., and was employed as a bookkeeper until 1861, when he was obliged to journey northward, on account of the hostilities occasioned by the civil war. Returning to Chicago, he again entered the employ of A. G. Garfield, and remained with him until August, 1862, when he was engaged by A. E. Kent & Co., and four years later was made a member of the firm. This partnership continued until 1872, when the Chicago Packing and Provision Company was formed. For three years, Mr. Younglove was assistant secretary of this company, and, in 1875, was elected secretary, and, in 1880, president, which position he has held until the present time. He was married first, in 1866, to Miss Mary E. Platt, of Chicago, by which marriage he has one son, Ira P. He was married a second time, on June 20, 1877, to Miss Lizzie Quirk, of Ypsilanti, Mich. They have three children—Roy S., Bessie K., and J. Madge. Mr. Younglove is a member of William B. Warren Lodge, No. 209, A. F. & A. M.; Lafayette Chapter, No. 2, R. A. M.; Apollo Commandery

No. 1, K. T.; and of Oriental Consistory, 32d degree, S. P. K. S. For one year he was acting master of William B. Warren Lodge, and was elected master for two years. He has been associated with the Board since 1862, and became a member a few years later. He served on the Committee of Arbitration, and also was a director, resigning the latter office after occupying it for one year.

D. S. MUGRIDGE is a native of Portsmouth, N. H., where he was born July 31, 1836. He was educated in the school near his birthplace, and, in his youth, removed to Boston, where he was employed for several years in a wholesale dry goods house, there learning thoroughly the details of mercantile business. In 1857, he came West, and first lived in Fulton, Ill., where he engaged in buying and shipping grain. He removed to Chicago in July, 1860, and immediately commenced business as a commission merchant in grain and provisions, continuing it alone until 1874; at which time he entered into a copartnership with James B. Peabody, under the firm name of Mugridge & Peabody. In 1876, the firm was dissolved, and since then he has continued alone the business he so long ago established. He has been a member of the Board since 1861, and was one of the organizers of the Open Board of Trade, in 1877, of which he was vice-president that year. Mr. Mugridge married Cornelia G. Pennock, of Marlborough, Stark Co., Ohio, in 1869. They have one son, Harry P.

JAMES HENRY DOLE was born in Bloomfield, Oakland Co., Mich., July 6, 1824, the son of Sydney and Eliza (Swan) Dole. He received a common school education, and, at an early age, left his native town and came to Chicago. He was one of the men who ran on the first train on the first road which was built from Chicago, the old Galena & Chicago Union. He immediately commenced in the grain business, and, in 1871, had amassed a snug fortune; but, on the night of the memorable 9th of October, his house, all his art treasures, and the greater portion of his possessions, were swept away. While the fire was burning, he found a location in a machine shop, in an unburned portion of the city, and soon the sign of "J. H. Dole & Co., commission merchants," was swinging in the breeze. This sign, an old trunk for a vault, a pen, a bottle of ink and a few sheets of foolscap paper, formed a nucleus for the commencement of a new business in the same line. He has long been a member of the Board, and for years has been one of its directors—having held every position in it except that of president, the duties of which he could not find time to discharge, and therefore would not accept—and has aided in shaping its affairs, so that that body is now an important factor in the world's commerce. He was the twelfth member who paid $5 for his membership. He was president, and is now vice-president, of the Industrial Exposition. J. H. Dole & Co. have forty-five elevators on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway and its branches throughout the country, and Mr. Dole is also connected with the firm of Armour, Dole & Co., extensive elevator owners of this city.

CHARLES M. ARMSTRONG, the business manager and active man of the commission house of J. H. Dole & Co., and a rising man on the Board of Trade, is the second son of the late Colonel George B. Armstrong, the famous founder of the railway mail service. He is of Scotch descent, and the first of his family who came to America was James H. Armstrong, who settled in Virginia in 1812. He is a second cousin of ex-president James Buchanan, through whom the line can be traced as far back as 1630. Colonel George B. Armstrong was a resident of Virginia, but moved to Baltimore at an early day, where his son Charles was born, October 18, 1819. Colonel Armstrong was in the commission business, and came to Chicago with his family, April 12, 1854. He opened the same business here, but subsequently became assistant post-master until he resigned, to accept the position of superintendent of the railway mail service—a Bureau which was made during General Grant's administration, and to which Colonel Armstrong was called. Charles M. Armstrong was educated in the Ogden School, and when sixteen years of age, his father's connection with the postal service, secured him a position as clerk in the Aurora post-office. After one year he became chief clerk; but feeling that such a position offered no scope to any proper ambition, he resigned after three months, and returned to the city. Here he first found employment with A. H. Miller, wholesale jeweler, but, after six months he became dissatisfied, and, being offered a position with J. H. Dole & Co., accepted, and has remained with them ever since. He began in the humble position of messenger boy, and, by sheer force of character, and superior ability, he has rendered himself of great value to his house. The house does a net annual business of not less than $12,000,000, and sometimes received two hundred and thirty cars of grain a day, all of which Mr. Armstrong has cared for without assistance. On October 9, 1879, Mr. Armstrong married Miss Nettie E. Southard, daughter of Charles E. Southard, and grand-daughter of Samuel L. Southard, secretary of the navy under the administrations of James Monroe and John Quincy Adams.

SCHWARTZ & DUPEE.—In the recital of men whose energy and business talent have been the pillars upon which the transactions of the Board of Trade rested, the firm of Schwartz & Dupee must be prominently mentioned. It is composed of Charles Schwartz and John Dupee, Jr., and the names of these men have long stood as emblems of enterprise and integrity. Not alone are these characteristics of the gentlemen individually, but also in the transactions made for their customers these qualities are prominent. One case in point is sufficient testimony as to their method of doing business. Finding the magnitude of their transactions, and the interests of their clients, required other telegraphic service than that obtainable from the general office, they procured private wires to furnish the requisite exclusive means of communication.

John Dupee, Jr., was born in Bangor, Me., in 1842, moved to Boston in 1844, and attended school until he was sixteen years of age. He then served an apprenticeship of about four years in the wholesale grocery business in that city, and also served as a member of the old 6th Massachusetts Regiment during its first term of service in the Rebellion; and came to Chicago in 1862. Immediately upon his arrival in Chicago, he went into the commission business, and has been since actively engaged in it. He became a member of the Board of Trade in 1863. He was married, in 1865, to Miss Evelyn M. Walker, daughter of S. B. Walker, of Chicago; they have two children, Eleanor W. and Walter H.

Charles Schwartz, of the firm of Schwartz & Dupee, commenced business in 1871, in this city, as a member of the firm of (William H.) Murray & Schwartz, commission merchants. This firm continued until 1873, when Mr. Schwartz went into business on his own account, remaining alone until 1876, when he formed a partnership with H. O. Chambers, under the firm name of Chambers & Schwartz. This firm continued for a year, and then Mr. Schwartz again did business on his own account until 1881, when he entered into partnership with John T. Lester and Samuel W. Allerton, under the firm name of John T. Lester & Co. This firm continued until Mr. Schwartz entered into partnership with Mr. Dupee. Mr. Schwartz was born in Albany, N. Y. He became a member of the Board of Trade in 1871, and has served on various important committees.

GEORGE WEBSTER was born in Gilsium, Cheshire Co., N. H., on August 24, 1824, and received his education in the schools of that county and at the High School of Thetford, Vt. He taught school, subsequently, from the age of eighteen to twenty-one. Upon attaining his majority, he entered into the general merchandise business, at Alstead, N. H. Three years later, he was burned out, and ceased business. About 1849, he went to Boston, where, for a period of six months, he was engaged as a clerk in a wholesale dry goods house, after which he engaged in the retail dry goods business, carrying it on until 1853, when he sold out and moved to Toledo, Ohio. At Toledo, he engaged in the business of contracting for the construction and building of railroads, and took a large contract for the construction of a portion of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, during the prosecution of which Mr. Webster introduced the first steam-shovel ever brought into the western country. In the fall of 1855, he sold out his interest in Ohio and came to Chicago, and entered into partnership with Mr. D. F. Baxter, in the grain and provision business, under the firm name of Webster & Baxter. They built up a very large trade in dressed hogs, and during the last two years of the war did an enormous business in supplying forage to the United States Government, and their firm name became known all over the country as one of the largest and most reliable operators on the Board of Trade, shipping, at times, as many as twenty-two vessel-loads of grain in a day. During the fire of 1871, Mr. Webster again was burned out, and lost some twenty dwellings, etc., which, with the losses in his business, made a net loss, above insurance, of $200,000. Since the fire, Mr. Webster has been trading on the Board in his individual interest, and has built up a large and increasing business in that branch of commercial investment. Mr. Webster has been a member of the Board of Trade since his arrival in this city, and in 1860-61, was a member of the Board of Directors of that institution. He has always been identified with, and prominent in, the financial and commercial interests of Chicago, and was for several years a member of the Board of Directors of the First National and of the Union Stock Yards National Bank.

CHARLES T. TREGO has been in the grain commission business on the Board of Trade, since 1862, and, during the twenty-two years in business in this city, has at various periods been connected with the committees and the directory of the Board, and was for two terms vice-president of the Call Board. Mr. Trego was born near Philadelphia, Penn., December 16, 1837, but came west with his parents who settled near Rock Island, this State, in 1842. He remained at school there until 1849. He then returned to Philadelphia where he remained at school until 1855. He then came west to Galena, Ill., where he began his business career as clerk in a dry goods store, and later was engaged in a hardware store until January, 1862, when he came to Chicago. On May 14, 1863, he was married, in Galena, to Miss Medora Harris. They have four children, two boys and two girls living—Charles H., Estelle, Frank H., and Alleen.

THE YEAR 1862-63.

The fourteenth annual meeting was held Tuesday, April 8, 1862. The number of members reported by the secretary was nine hundred and twenty-four—an increase of one hundred and ninety-nine during the year. The election resulted in the choice of the following officers for the coming year: C. T. Wheeler, president; Asa Dow and J. L. Hancock, first and second vice-presidents. The director's report showed the total receipts for the past year to have amounted to $25,000, of which sum $5,000 had been disbursed for war purposes. Through all the stirring vicissitudes of war, among all the responsibilities it assumed, and notwithstanding the arduous and absorbing labors it performed, the Board of Trade kept its business consciousness undisturbed, and wove, with patient care, the thread of trade into its historic fabric. The war only brought to light new capabilities, and developed its efficiency in a new line of duty. It took up cheerfully the burden which the Nation's needs imposed, but threw down none it had carried before. It went through the war carrying a double load, well balanced. Working, as it did, in this dual capacity, the attempt to put an account of its labors in chronological order must of necessity result in a narrative wherein the threads of business and war appear alternately uppermost, as the web of its history is woven.

GRAIN INSPECTION.—During the year just passed, many abuses had become apparent in the modes and methods of inspecting and handling grain under the system in vogue. The grades, especially of wheat, although nominally kept up to the standard prescribed, had gradually so deteriorated—as it was shipped in cargoes from the Chicago warehouses—as to seriously impair the reputation of all Chicago wheat in Eastern markets. Consequently, prices were not only depressed in Chicago, to the great disadvantage and loss of shippers and growers who were forced to seek this market, but much trade was diverted to other markets, where the grades were more reliable. Much of the wheat of the crop of 1861 came to market in bad condition—damp, sprouted or musty—caused by heavy rains during harvest time. Such as could not pass inspection, would be bagged out, and, after being blown, dried, scoured, mixed with other wheat, or otherwise doctored, would, it was alleged, be smuggled into the various warehouses, and disappear. It was difficult to place the responsibility on any particular class engaged in the wheat trade, although the warehousemen, being the last to handle the grain before it left, had to bear the brunt of the complaints. Open charges of fraud, against warehouses in particular, and wheat doctors and inspectors in general, at last became so common in the newspapers and among the grain receivers, as to cause the Board to take action. Some time in August, 1861, it appointed a committee to investigate and report as to the facts, suggesting such remedies for the existing evil as should be deemed practicable. The whole subject came up for consideration at the annual meetings, at which time it received mention in the official reports of the directors and the inspectors, and was treated at length in the report of the investigation committee, which was at that time submitted.

Henry Cogger, chief inspector of grain, reported the inspection, during the year, of 90,149 car-loads and 2,436 canal-boat loads of grain, amounting in round numbers to 40,000,000 bushels. Three hundred and sixty-two cargoes, amounting to over 20,000,000 bushels, had been inspected on board vessels. His report condemned the practice of receiving bagged wheat of an uncertain grade into the elevators, to which he attributed much of the trouble which had existed with the grain inspection, and further stated that this practice had been abandoned. It was recommended that the inspection should be a straight one, from the car or canal-boat to its place of destination. It was due to the farmers who had submitted to the inspection for the purpose of improving the reputation of Chicago wheat in Eastern markets, that the integrity of the grades should be strictly adhered to; so that New York quotations for Chicago wheat might be given with reference to the true standard of Chicago inspection. "We know," said Mr. Cogger in closing, "that such is not now the case, as our best grades are now sold there for Milwaukee or Racine club—leaving only the poor grades to represent Chicago spring—thereby detracting from the reputation of our wheat, and inflicting a serious injury to those shipping to our market; giving also a false and undesired importance to Milwaukee and other ports, which justly belongs to Chicago."

ALLEGED WAREHOUSE FRAUDS.—The directors, in their annual report, also considered briefly the subject of the alleged warehouse frauds, in which the warehousemen were denominated "a much abused class of our fellow citizens," but recommended the report of the investigation committee as likely to meet the wants of the Board. With regard to loaning grain, the report stated that the practice could not be wholly abandoned, where so large an amount of grain as fifty millions of bushels was shipped annually. Some member, opposed to loaning of receipts by warehousemen, moved to reject the report, but his motion was lost. After it had been fully explained to the recalcitrant members, that to accept and place on file the report was not its adoption, or in any way an expression of the sentiments of the Board, it was so accepted and placed on file.

Mr. Wright, chairman of the special committee appointed on the 25th of October, to investigate the alleged frauds in the grain trade, presented a report, in which it was stated that the committee had conferred with the various railroad officials, warehousemen, and the Board of Directors, and that all parties seemed desirous of adopting efficient means for the suppression of the evils complained of. The committee recommended that all grain that was bagged on the track, should be refused by the warehousemen; that the parties having the matter in charge did not deem it either practicable or necessary to have an inspector appointed at each warehouse, but would recommend that regular inspectors should reject all grain out of condition; and that, when any frauds in the trade should be discovered, the full facts, together with the names of the guilty parties, should be posted upon the bulletin board of the Board of Trade. The Board adopted the report. Mr. Wright did not submit the evidence taken by the committee with the report. There seemed to be a tacit understanding on all sides that it should be suppressed.

On April 25, the directors passed such resolutions as were required to give force to the previous action of the Board; also, one rendering null and void a resolution passed by the Board in June, 1861, which enabled warehousemen to deliver heated corn or spring wheat, if they had any such in their houses, on old receipts.

The warehousemen gave full assent, and pledged themselves to the observance of the new rules. There the matter would have ended, but for a parting shot at the warehousemen, which was given by the Tribune after the war was over and the treaty ratified. The Tribune intimated that the evidence suppressed by the committee was of a damaging nature to many of the warehousemen. The latter replied in a communication to the Board, in which they demanded a complete investigation; the Tribune's comments were denounced as injurious to the grain trade of the city, and it was demanded that the files of the paper in question be excluded from the reading-room, and the expulsion of Tribune representatives from the Board rooms was asked. This communication was signed by Munn & Scott, Hiram Wheeler, Flint & Thompson, Armour, Dole & Co., Munger & Armour, Sturges, Smith & Co., George Sturges & Co., Charles W. Wheeler & Co., Sturges, Buckingham & Co.

The communication was considered at a special meeting, held on the evening of May 2. The reading of the letter was followed by a long and animated discussion. It was at first moved to refer the whole matter to the board of directors. An amendment was made, offered by Mr. Hough, an elevator man, that the evidence on which the committee had based their report should be read; but, in spite of the passage of a vote to that effect, the chairman of the committee, who possessed the only authentic copy, refused to produce the record, as he deemed it would be divulging testimony given under the pledge of secrecy. So the world was never enlightened as to the evidence on which the Tribune had based its articles or the committee its report.

FURTHER WAR ANNALS.—News of the battle of Pittsburg Landing, which occurred on April 6-7, was received on the 8th. There were no such joyous demonstrations as followed the surrender of Fort Donelson. The Board passed no resolutions, but gave renewed proof of its unfeeling capacity to act for the cause. On the 10th, a dispatch was read from General Strong, commandant at Cairo, asking for surgeons, nurses, and medical stores to be sent immediately for the wounded soldiers in Tennessee. The members raised by private subscription, on the spot, nearly $500, and voted a donation of $2,000 from the treasury, to be placed in the hands of the Sanitary Commission. The amount in cash not being in the hands of Mr. Watson, the treasurer, that gentleman promptly offered to advance the required sum.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.—On May 3, a memorial was presented to the Board, signed by seventy-one members, calling for the adoption of a resolution requiring every member or applicant for membership to subscribe to the oath of allegiance to the United States, before he should be considered eligible to membership or admission. Pursuant to this petition, a meeting was held on Friday evening, May 16. The petition and resolution were read. A motion was made, and, seconded, that the communication and resolution be laid upon the table. The motion was strongly opposed by J. M. Richards, Mr. Handley and others. In the course of his speech Mr. Richards said:

"If there be any man on this Board that is disloyal, he should be exposed and cast out. I remember when Fort Sumter fell, and the President issued his proclamation calling for 75,000 volunteers. It was a dark and gloomy Sunday night. I remember that the next morning I came to this room and proposed to raise the American flag upon this building. Members opposed it, because this was a place of business—that fealty to the flag was not a subject which came under the jurisdiction of this Board. And to this day, these dark traitors come here—men who keep their pictures of Jeff. Davis, Beauregard, and other like enemies of the best Government upon the face of the earth, within the sanctuary of their own dwellings. I would put these men to the test. If they be traitors let us know it."

The vote being taken on the motion, the president declared it carried. An appeal was taken from the decision, and on a division of the house it was declared that the motion was not carried.

Another long period of discussion ensued, in which several valid objections were offered to the passage of the resolution, by members whose loyalty was undoubted. The excitement calmed down as the discussion proceeded. The president did not think the Board had any power to act, and other members quoted from the by-laws in confirmation of that position. One member, although willing himself to take the oath, deprecated the bringing of politics or theology into discussion on the Board, which was organized for purely business purposes. After the re-reading of the resolutions, Stephen Clary proposed the adoption of the following resolutions, as a substitute for those before the meeting:

"Whereas, This meeting was called for the purpose of adopting resolutions proposed in the call for the meeting; and

"Whereas, Such resolutions can not be adopted without an infringement of the rules and regulations, which prescribe a different mode of procedure; Therefore

"Resolved, That this Board has given indubitable proof of its loyalty in the giving of money freely for the purpose of sustaining the war and for the support of the families of the soldiers battling for the Constitution and the Union.

"Resolved, That while our rules and regulations prescribe no such requisite as requiring its members to take the oath of allegiance, we do again aver, thus publicly, our fealty to the Constitution and the Union.

"Resolved, That the Board of Directors be requested to refuse admission to the membership of this Board of any citizen of the United States against whom suspicions of disloyalty to the General Government are known to exist, until such suspicions are proved, to their satisfaction, to be unfounded."

After another season of discussion, entirely in favor of upholding the Constitution and the Union, the motion for the adoption of the original resolutions was withdrawn, and those offered by Mr. Clary adopted.

RATES OF COMMISSION ESTABLISHED.—On July 2, at a special meeting, the Board adopted an amendment to the by-laws, which made it the duty of the directors to establish such rates of commission for the purchase and sale of property by the members of the association, as in their judgment should be deemed proper and reasonable; and any member violating such rates, either in over or under charging, was made liable to expulsion. Members were also required to subscribe to an oath that they would not, directly or indirectly, deviate from such rules as should be established by the Board of Trade. A resolution was also adopted unanimously, that the board of directors should not approve any one as a member of the Board of Trade who was not a resident of, or doing business in, the city. A committee of ten members was chosen to confer with the directors in establishing the rates. The meeting adjourned to the 12th of July; and at the adjourned meeting the subject-matter above given was reported in the form of resolutions, all of which were adopted and became incorporated in the by-laws.

During this period a large number of energetic men became members of the Board of Trade, and afterward were prominently identified with the commercial interests of the city.

SAMUEL HARKNESS McCREA, the sixteenth president of the Board of Trade, is of Scotch-Irish descent. He is the son of William and Abigail (Harkness) McCrea. His parents emigrated from Belfast to America in 1820, and settled on a farm in Goshen-Orange Co., N. Y. There Samuel was born, August 16, 1826. He was reared on the farm of his father and there received the best educational advantages that the common schools afforded. In 1839 he removed, with his father's family, to Rochester, N. Y., and remained seven years, during which time he learned the tinner's trade, which, however, he never followed. In 1846, he went to Canada, where he was employed as collecting agent for Kelley & Co., nurserymen and florists, until 1849. On the discovery of gold in California, he emigrated there, and remained three years. During the winter of 1849-50, he engaged in the lumber-carrying trade along the coast of San Francisco Bay. In 1850-51, he was a miner in what is now Calaveras County, where he was successful, and returned to the States in 1852. He next went to New Orleans, and engaged in the enterprise of railroad building. He had charge of the construction of the New Orleans and Opelousas railroad, now known as the Morgan Railroad. His headquarters were at Bayou de la Fourche, in the heart of the sugar region, and one of the most unhealthful localities in the South. His robust health, good habits and indomitable will-power enabled him to do what his predecessors had failed to accomplish; he brought the road so nearly to completion that its establishment was assured. In 1854, after two years of railroad building in Louisiana, he removed to Rockford, Ill. He also did business at Sterling for a short time, and, in 1855, permanently established business at Morrison, Ill., then the terminus of the Dixon Air Line Railroad, now included in the Chicago & North-Western Railroad. From that point he forwarded the first wheat shipped by rail to Chicago. He became one of the leading shippers of grain on the road, his principal points being at Sterling and Morrison, where he did the bulk of the grain and lumber business for the succeeding seven years. In 1862, his Chicago business had grown to such magnitude that he removed to this city to attend personally to the sales of his immense shipments. He held his business connections with the country houses for some years thereafter, selling out his interests in Sterling in 1871, and in Morrison in 1874.

On his establishment in Chicago, he immediately took rank as one of the largest and most influential receivers, and as a member of the Board of Trade, which he joined in 1862. He was a most reliable and staunch exponent of the interest of the country and commission interest, as against the local interests represented by the Chicago warehousemen and the speculators of the Board. The history of the Board of Trade and the warehousing business shows the important influence he exerted in working for the reform of abuses as they became apparent. He served as a member of the Board of Directors in 1867-68-69; was elected first vice-president in 1869, and in April, 1870, was chosen president, representing the conservative element of the Board. During his administration, the inspection of grain and the warehousing and storage of grain were subject to a most radical change, by which the whole business of grain inspection, storage, and shipment was taken from the control of the Board of Trade and the warehousemen, and placed under the surveillance of State officials acting under statutory law. It is not relevant here to repeat the history of the contest between the conflicting interests, which resulted in the sweeping change. Mr. McCrea who had, from the beginning, advocated the open registration of receipts to avoid over-issues; and, failing in gaining its voluntary adoption by warehousemen, he used his influence to bring the whole business under State control. He was the efficient advocate of the registry and inspection law, passed just at the close of his administration, and which has been, with such amendments as experience has dictated, the basis on which the vast inspection and warehouse business of Chicago has been safely conducted. Mr. McCrea has filled many offices of honor and trust not above enumerated. As will be seen by the roster of committees of the Board of Trade, he has served on nearly every committee of importance. Although a staunch Republican ever since the party was formed, he has not engaged in politics beyond the exercise of his franchise and the advocacy of the tenets of his party. He was elected as alderman of the 12th Ward, in 1876, not less on account of his political affiliations than his personal popularity. The city at that period was in a bad condition financially. In that year he was made chairman of the Finance Committee, with a depleted city treasury, several millions of certificates of indebtedness outstanding, and the firemen and policemen unpaid. But he put money in the treasury, and established the credit of the city on an excellent financial basis by the redemption of its obligations, in which labor he was ably assisted by the Finance Committee. He refused a reelection, because he was nominated as county treasurer by the convention of 1877, and elected by some seven thousand majority in the fall of that year, serving two years. During his administration, he collected taxes to the amount of ninety-five per cent. of the whole assessment—something that had not been done for a long time. In the spring of 1877, he was appointed, by Governor Cullom, park commissioner for West Chicago, and at the expiration of his term, in March, 1879, he was re-appointed. He served as park commissioner for six years, and was twice president of the board. He resigned in August, 1883, on account of the pressure of private business, after the most successful administration. Mr. McCrea was married, June 23, 1856, to Miss Coralina T. Johnson, daughter of Daniel H. Johnson, of Cook County. The family came from Drafton, Vt., where Mrs. McCrea was born. They have three sons—Wiley S., Charles M. and Samuel H., Jr. At the present time (1885) Mr. McCrea is the head of the firm of S. H. McCrea & Co., and controls a large receiving business over the western extension of the road where he began business over a quarter of a century ago. In 1884, he went with his family to Europe, to enjoy his first surcease from the cares of business since he took them up as a poor boy, in Canada, forty years ago.

ALBERT MORSE was born in Middlesex County, Mass., January, 1831, and was educated in that locality, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits until the spring of 1854, at which time he came to Chicago, and was employed in merchandising until 1856. In January of that year he became a member of the Board, and commenced business under the firm name of Morse & Co., Silas Willard being his partner. In 1858, the firm was dissolved, and Mr. Morse became a partner in the firm of How, Eckley & Co. The firm continued until 1860, when its style was changed to Albert Morse & Co. In the fall of 1860, the firm name was again changed to Morse, Ward & Co. They do a large business as receivers and shippers, and rank as one of the leading and solid commission firms on 'Change. Mr. Morse was a member of the Committee of Arbitration in 1863, served one term on the Committee of Appeals, and, in 1865-66, was a member of the Board of Directors.

JAMES L. WARD, of the firm of Morse, Ward & Co., was born at Tremont, Tazewell Co., Ill., August 14, 1841. His father was one of the earliest settlers of that county. He received his education in the common schools near his place of birth, came to Chicago in March, 1857, and entered the employ of the warehousing firm of Flint, Thompson & Co., where he remained twelve years, during a part of his term of service being their chief clerk. In the fall of 1860, he became a member of his present firm.

ZENOPIHLE P. BROUSSEAU was born at LaPrairie, near Montreal, Canada, October, 1840, and there received his early education. At the age of fifteen he went to Malone, Franklin Co., N. V., where he was employed in mercantile pursuits. In 1860, he came to Chicago, and for a few months was employed in the dry goods business. In September, 1861, he became a member of the Board of Trade, and at that time entered the employ of McDonald & Winslow, commission merchants. About two years later Mr. Winslow died, and Mr. Brousseau carried on the business for a few months in company with Mr. McDonald. He then embarked in business alone. In the great fire, both his home and office were destroyed, at a loss of $30,000, although insured for $25,000. In 1881 he admitted W. S. Booth, and the style was then, for three years, Brousseau, Booth & Co., since which period Mr. Brousseau has done business under the name of Brousseau & Co. He ranks among the oldest members of the Board, and has never been known to fail to meet his obligations, besides being widely and favorably known to the trade. He is an enterprising man, and by his energy and experience has built up a large and successful business, which is strictly commission. He takes an active part in several of the charitable institutions of the city, and has for twenty-four years been a member of, and active worker in, the Cathedral of the Holy Name.

I. P. WALLACE was born in New Hampshire, in 1825, and came to Chicago in June, 1859. He entered into business in the grain and general commission trade, with E. L. Pomeroy, James B. Peabody and John G. Law, at different times, under the firm name of I. P. Wallace & Co., and with George A. Wheeler under the firm name of Wheeler, Wallace & Co. He is at present connected with the house of David Dows & Co., one of the largest commission and forwarding houses in the world; and his connection therewith is sufficient testimony to his business talent and integrity.

CHARLES L. RAYMOND was born on June 6, 1840, in Boston, Mass., and was educated at that city and at Cambridge, coming to Chicago when he was twenty-one years old. He immediately went to work for R. M. & O. S. Hough as bookkeeper, and remained in that position until 1865, when he was admitted as a partner under the firm name of R. M. & O. S. Hough & Co. In 1867, the firm name was changed to Jones, Hough & Co. (Daniel A. Jones), and in 1870 the name was again changed to Jones & Raymond, which is still in existence. Mr. Raymond became a member of the Board of Trade in 1863, and has been secretary and treasurer of the Chamber of Commerce Association since 1864, and was superintendent of the building after the fire. Mr. Raymond was married in 1869, to Miss Florene Merriam, of Greenfield, Mass., and has the following children: Jessie Alvord, Edward Franklin, Charles Merriam, Abbie Fisk and John Dwight. He is a member of the Chicago and Calumet Clubs; and during his long association with the Board has become noted for the strict integrity of his transactions, his scrupulous fidelity to the trusts reposed in him, and his exactitude in the performance of his contracts. He is a model business man, a firm friend, a kindly host and an indulgent husband and father.

RANSOM W. DUNHAM was born at Savoy, Berkshire Co., Mass., March 21, 1838. His early education was received at the common school, and his later education at the high school at Springfield, Mass. From August, 1855, to August, 1860, he was engaged in the office of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company, in the meantime removing from Springfield to Chicago, April 1, 1857. Since 1860, he has been a grain and provision commission merchant and on December 2, 1871, he became a member of the firm of William Young & Co. In 1865, he joined the Board of Trade and was one of the Board of Directors for three years; was second vice-president in 1880, first vice-president in 1881, and was president in 1882. Mr. Dunham was elected to the Forty-eighth Congress as a Republican in 1882, by a majority of over one thousand over John W. Doane, Democratic candidate for the same position, and was re-elected in 1884.

RAISING OF TROOPS.—At a meeting held July 18, 1862, the first direct move was made by the Board to have its membership personally represented on the field. The following communication marks the beginning:

We the undersigned members, request you to call, at an early day, a general meeting of the members of this Board, to pledge ourselves to use our influence and money to recruit and support a battery, to be known as the Board-of-Trade Battery.

M. C. STEARNS, C. H. WALKER, JR., WILLIAM STURGES,
I. V. MUNN, FLINT & THOMPSON, E. AIKEN,
G. L. SCOTT, GEORGE STEEL, E. G. WOLCOTT,
T. J. BRONSON.

A special meeting was called for the next Monday. The meeting was one of the most enthusiastically held during the war period. Resolutions were passed, pledging the Board to immediately recruit and tender to the Government a company of mounted artillery, to be called the Board-of-Trade Battery, to serve three years unless sooner discharged; and $10,000 were appropriated for the raising and equipment of recruits, which sum was to be raised so far as possible by voluntary subscriptions, the deficiency, if any should appear at the end of one week, to be made up by levying an assessment of $10 on each member who had not subscribed that amount or more. A bounty of $60 was to be paid to each recruit, in addition to any which might be paid by the Government. The members also pledged themselves that, should any of their employes join the battery, on their return they should be re-instated in the places they had left. It was resolved that the names of all members refusing to pay the war tax of $10 should be posted in a conspicuous place during the continuance of the war, with the proviso that the directors be permitted to exempt from such posting the name of any member who should make it appear to the directors that he was absolutely unable to pay such tax without injury to his family.

Following the passage of the resolutions, $5,121 were subscribed. A muster-roll was placed on the table and signed by nine young men. The names of the first recruits were: S. H. Stevens, S. C. Stevens, J. W. Bloom, Calvin Durand, Jr., Valentine Steele, George B. Chandler, A. F. Baxter, H. J. Baxter and J. A. Howard.

The meeting adjourned, to meet every night until the battery should be raised.*

*Detailed accounts of the Board-of-Trade Battery and the three Board-of-Trade regiments subsequently raised, with a history of their brilliant services in the field, appear in the Military History, in this volume.

At the noon session of the following day, a committee was appointed to disburse the war fund of the Board, consisting of the following members: J. L. Hancock, H. W. Hinsdale, E. H. Walker, George Armour, and S. H. Stevens. The fund before the close of the session had increased to $11,125. At the evening meeting, it was still further increased to $11,550, and the roll of recruits numbered sixty-three names. At the noon session of Wednesday (the third day after the work was begun), the fund was swelled to $15,210 and one hundred and six new names were added to the muster-roll.

The Board of Trade rooms were again filled to overflowing in the evening. The meeting was called to order by J. L. Hancock, who announced that the Board-of-Trade Battery was full, and that measures had been taken to insure its immediate acceptance by Government. He read to the enthusiastic assembly the following dispatch which had been sent to President Lincoln by the committee:

BOARD OF TRADE ROOMS, }
CHICAGO, July 23, 1862. }

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States:

The Board of Trade of this city have, within the last forty-eight hours, raised $15,000 bounty money, and have recruited a full company of artillery. Will they be accepted, and will orders be given at once for the subsistence, arms, uniforms, etc.? We are trying to raise a regiment of infantry to support the battery.

Following the applause which greeted the reading of the dispatch, Mr. Walker offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Board of Trade be requested to recruit a company of Infantry, and that we guarantee to each member enlisted a bounty, either from the county fund or our own, of sixty dollars."

The resolution was carried unanimously, and on the announcement that the committee of the Board of Supervisors had agreed to appropriate, $200,000, the resolution was amended to read "regiment," instead of "company."

Isaac Williams, who, it was announced, had already raised forty men, and would soon have his company full, tendered it as the first company of the regiment. The offer was unanimously accepted.

The Young Men's Christian Association was invited to co-operate with the Board in raising the regiment. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, the Association returned answer, through a committee consisting of J. C. Wright and J. V. Farwell, that the invitation was accepted, and it would pledge itself to furnish five companies. At this juncture, some rash individual braved the prevailing sentiment by ejaculating, "Humbug extraordinary." The intruder, amidst cries of "Put him out," "Hang him," etc., was seized, lifted along over the heads of the crowd, hurried down the stairs and deposited in the street. Patriotic fervor, at this period, had control of the entire membership.

Prior to the tender of five companies by the Young Men's Christian Association, George I. Robinson had tendered a company, which had been accepted. His was the second company offered.

A committee was appointed to solicit subscriptions to the Board of Trade war fund from citizens. During the evening, $2,000 were added to the fund, making a total amount of $17,000 raised in three days.

The meeting adjourned with its enthusiasm at white heat. From that time there was no abatement of ardor or labor until the crisis passed. Trade went on, but it was so overrun, for the time, by the warlike spirit which had centered in the Board, as to move only as an undercurrent. The rooms of the Board became the grand recruiting rendezvous, and its committee the most efficient executive agency, in the exigency which the fortunes of war had forced upon all. Each noon session resolved itself into a war meeting, and each evening saw the rooms lighted and open for the enrollment of soldiers, for the dispatching of business pertaining to the work in hand, for reports of progress, or for consultation with committees of the Mercantile Association, the Young Men's Christian Association, and other organizations, which, inspired with a like zeal, were working with the Board to the same patriotic end. A "Home Guard" was organized, of members not liable to military duty. It would be impossible to give even meagre reports of the numerous meetings that followed.

On Thursday evening, July 24, the war-fund was $20,675; on Friday noon, $21,285; and at the close of the evening meeting of the same day, $28,190. The subscriptions on Saturday swelled the amount to $33,671. On Wednesday, July 29, the war committee of the Board was increased by the addition of two members from the Mercantile Association, one from the Young Men's Christian Association, and one from the Union Defense Committee. Thereafter, the work of these associations, and that of the Board of Trade, was more co-operative than before. It was at this time decided to raise a brigade of three regiments, to be recruited under the auspices of the Board and these associations, all of which should share equally in the benefits of the war-fund. The amount of the war fund at the last named date, was $39,170; the following day it was increased to $41,565; and on Friday, to $43,979. Before the work was finished, it amounted to over $55,000.

BOARD-OF-TRADE REGIMENTS.—The attempt was made to raise what the Board of Trade and its allied associations were pleased to term, "a brigade of three regiments." The three regiments were raised and mustered into service, although never forming a brigade, or serving in the same brigade during the term of their service. They were known at home as the Board-of-Trade regiments, and were mustered into service as the 72d, 88th and 113th Illinois Infantry Volunteers.

The 72d was mustered into the service of the United States, August 23, just one month from the time recruiting began, leaving the same day for Cairo. Its strength was thirty-seven officers and nine hundred and thirty men. The 88th was mustered in on September 4, and immediately dispatched to Louisville, Ky. The 113th was mustered in early in November, and left for Memphis, Tenn., on the 6th of that month. The work of raising the regiments was thus completed, and the three regiments placed in the field in seventy days from the time it was begun.

On August 1, the Board-of-Trade Battery was mustered into the service of the United States, after which they marched to the Board of Trade rooms, where they were formally received, and listened to patriotic speeches from J. L. Hancock, J. C. Wright and others. The battery, numbering one hundred and fifty-six men, went into camp that afternoon, where they were paid their bounty by the Board of Trade committee, and their glorious war record was begun.

STILL-HUNT FOR TRAITORS.—Early in August, the Board of Trade varied the monotony of raising funds and recruiting soldiers by instituting a "still-hunt" after traitors. It had been rumored that Colonel Tucker, the commandant at Camp Douglas, knew of many dangerous but secret sympathizers with the South, who were residents of Chicago. A committee was appointed to investigate the matter and report.

The result of their labors proved unsatisfactory to all but the obnoxious persons in covert, if any such there were. The committee reported as follows:

Your committee, appointed to visit Camp Douglas and ask Colonel Tucker for the names of citizens supposed to be rebels or sympathizers with rebels (which information it was understood he could give), have attended to that duty, and beg leave to report, that, after a long interview with Colonel Tucker, we have not been able to obtain any information that is tangible enough to work upon. Colonel Tucker informs us that he has no information criminating individuals, but he has no doubt that there are citizens of our city who are hovering around Camp Douglas with a view of assisting the prisoners to escape, or otherwise to aid them. Still, he (in his opinion) has not evidence enough to take the responsibility of causing their arrest, or of furnishing their names to your committee.

JULIAN S. RUMSEY.
I. Y. MUNN.
M. C. STEARNS.

ARRIVAL OF THE "SLEIPNER."—Direct trade between Norwegian ports and Chicago was first opened by the arrival of the little brig "Sleipner," direct from the Norwegian port of Bergen, on Saturday evening, August 2, 1862. The brig was under the command of Captain Waage and his first mate Hardler. It was of three hundred and fifty tons burden, and brought over one hundred and fifty Swedish passengers and one American, who was born on Lake Erie. The entire passage from port to port was made, including a stop of four days in Quebec, in seventy-one days. As a part of her cargo she brought two hundred barrels of herring, consigned to Swana & Synestvedt, then doing business at No. 115 Kinzie Street. She was the first European vessel which had ever reached this port direct, with emigrants and consignments, and her arrival was celebrated with considerable enthusiasm. On the Tuesday following his arrival, Captain Waage was tendered the hospitalities of the Board, at which time he was presented with an address congratulating him on being the first to inaugurate direct trade between Chicago and Norway.

INTERNAL DISSENSION.—During the terrible struggles and reverses of 1862-63, even in the most loyal parts of the North, there was a minority of citizens, more or less strong, whom, if not in sympathy with those in rebellion, took no pains to suppress their disapproval of the war itself, and lost no opportunity to condemn the manner in which it was prosecuted, or to throw distrust upon the efforts of those engaged in the almost hopeless task of conquering the rebellious States. This element of discontent and discouragement found nowhere in the North a more able, bold and uncompromising exponent of its views than the Chicago Times. It did not at that time seek that popularity which comes from espousing the popular side in the momentous issues then pending; but from the virulent and defiant manner in which it opposed the war, and the Administration which was carrying it on, seemed to court rather than fear the inevitable and bitter hatred of all who espoused the popular cause. It had its friends among the members of the Board of Trade, but they were not sufficiently numerous or outspoken to be a controlling, or even obstructive, element in the war policy which the Board had chosen to adopt, and which it had so vigorously carried out. It was, therefore, quite natural that the war element should take offense at the continued derision and contempt expressed by the Times for what was deemed the most sacred work in which patriots could engage. Matters came to a crisis on December 31, at which time the following resolutions were adopted:

"WHEREAS, The articles appearing almost daily in the Chicago Times newspaper are calculated to give aid and comfort to traitors engaged in a most unholy war upon the Government; and,

"WHEREAS, In publishing such matter as charging upon the Administration—in its efforts to put down the Rebellion—the 'murder of the fathers, sons and brothers of the North,' as well as almost every other crime in the category, said paper is doing what lies in its power to create discord and dissension at the North, leading to the loss of the Constitution and the ruin of the Union; and,

"WHEREAS, The said paper is in the practice of making the most outrageous and uncalculated-for attacks upon the private character and standing of our most respectable citizens, thereby causing it to be deserving of unmeasured reprobation; Therefore,

"Resolved, By this Board of Trade, while disclaiming all partisan feeling, and being actuated by no other motive than the public welfare and the fair fame of our city, that the Chicago Times is unworthy of countenance or support, and that the directors are hereby requested to exclude it from the reading-room of the Board.

"Resolved, That this Board knows of no objection to the commercial editor of the Chicago Times, personally, but inasmuch as his presence on 'Change, to a certain extent, tolerates the paper, he is hereby excluded from the rooms, as a reporter for said paper."

In answer to this expression of feeling on the part of the Board, the Times charged that the resolutions were introduced clandestinely and forced hastily through, after a majority of the members had left 'Change, and that they did not fairly represent the sentiments of a majority of the members of the Board. At twelve o'clock of the noon session of the Saturday following, the matter was again brought up. N. K. Fairbank, the original mover of the resolutions, arose and stated that, inasmuch as the Times had charged that the resolutions had been introduced clandestinely and smuggled through by fraud, as there was a full representation of the membership of the Board now present, he desired to have another expression, about which there could be no doubt. He therefore moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolutions were adopted. The motion was seconded, and a motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider, having been voted down, the original resolutions passed by an overwhelming vote. For a time this action of the Board engendered not a little dissension among the members, it being viewed by not only the friends of the Times, but others, as a species of persecution on political as well as patriotic grounds, which was entirely foreign and antagonistic to the legitimate objects of the association. The most earnest protesters took measures for the organization of a new Board, where politics should not obtrude, nor persecution for opinion's sake be possible. A room was engaged and a charter obtained, under which a primary organization was effected. Better counsels, however, prevailed, and the old Board suffered no material damage from the temporary disaffection; on the contrary, as will appear, the charter then obtained became the organic act under which the Board was afterward enabled to provide itself with a permanent location and rooms more adequate to its growing needs than, under the restrictions of its own charter, would have been possible.

MISCELLANEOUS WAR WORK.—From January 1, 1863, to the close of the fiscal year, war matters did not so largely engross the attention of the Board. One war meeting was, however, held, which is deemed worthy of mention, as showing how the Board cared for its soldiers after they took the field. It was held Saturday evening, February 21, at which time J. L. Hancock, chairman of the War Fund Committee, presented an elaborate report of the moneys and goods received and disbursed for war purposes, since the committee was first called to act. Following is a summary of its labors, as then presented:

The total receipts up to February 14, were $50,375.38; total disbursements up to the same date, $29,810.41; balance on hand, $20,564.97.

The items of expenditure were: Paid to one hundred and ninety families of soldiers of the Board-of-Trade Battery and regiments, $5,292; paid bounty to members of the battery, $9,360; advanced on allotments to families, $797; sent goods, exclusive of money and goods raised by contributions on 'Change, $4,520.46; paid for recruiting, $2,415.62. Total expenditures up to October 15, 1862, $22,601.48. Disbursements from October 15 to February 14, 1863, $7,208.93. Total disbursements, $29,810.41.

The report was approved; following which a resolution, offered by Murry Nelson, was adopted, authorizing the committee to offer bounties to recruits for the battery and the 88th Infantry, which had been decimated by sickness and by their participation in the recent bloody battle of Stone River.

Reports were read from the various visiting committees which had been sent to visit the battery and regiments.

January 4, G. H. Weeks was sent with packages of goods and supplies to the battery, then at Bowling Green, and the 88th, then at Nashville. On the 24th, E. B. Stevens visited these two organizations, and distributed large amounts of goods, clothing and supplies for the sick and wounded, made up by the Ladies' War Committee, under the supervision of the Board. Medicines, stores and rubber blankets were sent to them by T. Maple. Immediately after the battle of Murfreesboro', Mrs. E. O. Hosmer and Mrs. Smith Tinkham were sent to the hospitals at Nashville and Murfreesboro' by the Board. They were accompanied by Mr. Adams and others. W. H. Hoyt was sent with supplies to the 72d, at Memphis, and to the 113th, at Vicksburg. Among the supplies distributed by Mr. Hoyt, were five hundred rubber blankets to each regiment.

Soon after this meeting, the attention of the Board was called to the condition of the Board-of-Trade regiments, then in the field, by Ira Y. Munn, who had recently visited them. He detailed, in a graphic and most affecting manner, their sufferings from privation, and told of the sickness then prevailing among the boys, more especially those of the 113th, at Vicksburg. His stirring appeal aroused the sympathies of the Board, and resulted in the raising of a special fund for their benefit, independent of the war fund—the work being put into the hands of a separate committee, leaving them free to disburse what might be given, without any of the restrictions that governed the disbursement of the war fund, which was in a manner pledged to the continuous work of supporting soldiers' families, and was not, therefore, available for the many urgent calls from the soldiers in the field. The new movement was started at once, by the appointment of the Board of Trade Relief Committee, Murry Nelson, chairman; and $1,000 were subscribed on the spot. Circulars were distributed throughout the city and State, calling for donations of fruits and vegetables, then much needed, as well as money. Mr. Nelson's store became a depot of supplies, to which the numerous donations were sent, and from which they were forwarded, as fast as received, to the suffering soldiers at the front. Mr. Nelson, on March 27, one month after the movement was begun, reported as already received, from Chicago and all parts of the State, $3,080 in money, and nearly as much more in value, consisting of vegetables, clothing and sanitary stores. The labor of this new war agency was continuous thereafter.

DEATH OF SECRETARY CATLIN.—On Sunday, January 18, 1863, Seth Catlin, the secretary of the Board, died, after a lingering illness of several months. He had been the statistician of the Board from the institution of its system of publishing annual statistical reports up to the time of his death, and had won high rank in his profession, by the fullness and accuracy of his work. Mr. Catlin was among the earliest settlers in Chicago, arriving in 1836. After being in business some time, with Houghteling & Shepherd, in this city, he took charge of their business at LaSalle, where he was agent for their line of boats, and managed all their financial affairs at that place. After his return to Chicago, he filled several positions of trust in leading banking and commercial houses, until he was elected secretary of the Board of Trade. He inaugurated the popular system of keeping their books and the publication of their model Annual Review. Mr. Catlin was a native of Massachusetts, and fifty years of age at the time of his demise.

His death was announced on 'Change, which had been the scene of his faithful and unassuming labors for so many years, on the Monday following, at which time the appreciation and affectionate remembrance in which he was held by the members of the Board was publicly expressed in appropriate resolutions. The Board also erected a handsome monument over the deceased secretary's final resting-place, at Rosehill.

February 26, John F. Beaty was elected secretary, to fill the vacancy occasioned by Mr. Catlin's death.

THE CHICAGO MERCANTILE ASSOCIATION.—During the latter portion of 1860, the business men of Chicago became convinced that something must be done at once to purify the commercial atmosphere of the community, and especially to establish the currency upon a sound basis. Organization naturally followed, the first decided step in that direction being the appearance of a call on the 1st of December of that year, signed by one hundred and fifty of the leading merchants and firms representing the great commercial interests of the city. A short time thereafter, a meeting was held to get an expression of sentiment relative to the banking laws of the State. The Supreme Court had lately decided that the Legislature had the right to amend the law, and this enthusiastic meeting, held on December 7, was designed to influence the action of that body, which was soon to assemble. Before the end of the month the Mercantile Association had been formed, with the following organization: President, G. C. Cook; Vice-Presidents, Fred Tuttle, W. E. Doggett, C. L. Harmon and J. V. Farwell; Secretary, Merrill Ladd; Treasurer, H. W. Hinsdale; Executive Committee, C. G. Wicker, J. V. Farwell, Nelson Tuttle, E. Hempstead, Clinton Briggs, H. A. Hurlbut and H. W. King. This body, when the War of the Rebellion fairly opened, co-operated with the Board of Trade in all patriotic objects, and a committee was appointed from these two bodies, the Young Men's Christian Association and the Union Defense Committee, to raise a regiment. The muster-rolls were opened August 5, and in about three weeks one hundred and fifty-six had joined the company. The leading subscriber for the association was William E. Doggett, and the company was at first named the "Doggett Guards." In the meantime, however, it had been ascertained that the War Department was willing to furnish union repeating guns, and consequently the organization went into Camp Douglas as the Doggett Guard Battery, and afterward was best known as the Mercantile Battery. On August 26, the officers were elected, with Charles G. Cooley as captain, and on the 8th of November the battery left Chicago, as fine a military company as was ever raised in this city. Its subsequent brilliant career is traced in the war history.

CURRENCY AND OTHER REFORMS.—But the Association firmly held to its original purpose of "correcting" the currency, and even taking up such other unsavory subjects as the "condition of the Chicago River." Mr. Doggett succeeded Mr. Cook as president, in 1862, but the secretary and the treasurer remained the same. In January, 1863, the election resulted in the choice of J. V. Farwell for president.

Principally through the persistent exertions of the Mercantile Association and the Board of Trade, which crystallized the public sentiment of the city and State, the obnoxious "wild-cat" currency was driven from Illinois. The ship canal and public measures, generally, were vigorously and ably supported. John Tyrell succeeded Mr. Farwell as president, in January, 1864, and the next month the Association opened its new and spacious rooms in the third story of Dickey's building, opposite the Tremont House. Under President Tyrell's administration, the war against the "stump-tail," "wild-cat" currency was continued with renewed vigor. In April, 1864, the merchants of Chicago held a great meeting, formally adopting greenbacks as the standard currency, and calling upon the bankers to do the same. A month later, although decided opposition was manifested, a majority of the money-changers adopted United States and National bank notes as legal tender. Thus it was that the continued efforts of the Association at last bore fruit. Edwin Burnham became its president, in 1865, and Henry W. King in 1866. Mr. King served nearly two years. The Association gradually declined, and finally ceased to hold meetings.

THE SHIP CANAL PROJECT.—The subject of enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal sufficiently, in connection with a proposed enlargement of the Canadian canals, to make a continuous waterway for the largest lake craft, via the St. Lawrence River, from the upper Mississippi to the Atlantic, began to be discussed early in November. The commercial value of such means of communication to the Northwest, and especially to Chicago as the lake terminus, could not be overestimated. Its advantages to the Nation in quelling domestic insurrection was most forcibly brought to notice, and the need of it made most painfully apparent by the war in which the country was then engaged. It was believed that the time was propitious for influencing Congress to undertake the work, both as a war measure and as an internal improvement for the advancement of the commercial interests of the great Northwest for all time to come. On November 15, a committee was appointed, consisting of eight members, five of whom represented the Board of Trade, the remaining three being members of the Mercantile Association. It was composed as follows: Board of Trade, George Steel, George Armour, M. C. Stearns, W. D. Houghteling, and Ira Y. Munn; Mercantile Association, Nelson Tuttle, A. Benedict, and John Tyrell. The joint committee commenced its work at once by sending a strong delegation to Washington to urge the favorable consideration of the project upon members of Congress, and, if possible, secure the passage of a bill providing for the immediate prosecution of the work as a National undertaking. Owing to the diverse interests and perhaps local jealousies existing among the representatives of the various States, it was found impossible to get Congress to favor the project; and the commission returned to Chicago, crestfallen but not discouraged, to report the failure of their mission.

February 24, 1863, a large meeting of the business men of Chicago assembled at Metropolitan Hall, at which the joint committee made a most elaborate and able report and speeches were made by Colonel Foster, a member of the Washington delegation, and others. The committee submitted with the report, a series of resolutions embodying in proper form for action of the meeting the recommendations contained therein, which, after a season of effective speech-making, were adopted by acclamation.

The labors of the delegation sent to Washington did not prove futile. Though they failed in their primary object, they succeeded in enlisting the warmest interest of many influential members, who, on March 2, issued at Washington a call for a mass convention of citizens from all the Northern States, to convene in Chicago on the first Tuesday of the following June, and inviting the co-operation and aid of all the Boards of Trade, agricultural societies, and business associations of the country. The call was signed by Hon. Edward Bates, attorney-general of the United States, fourteen members of the United States Senate and seventy-eight members of the House of Representatives.

DISCIPLINE.—The immense volume of trade, and numerous intricacies of the transactions involved, occasionally developed cases of unmercantile conduct, dishonesty, or sharp practice, which were calculated to bring disrepute upon the Board. Under the then existing rules, it was necessary to bring complaints before the full Board for a hearing; and on the question of expulsion of any offending member, it was difficult, on evidence such as could be presented, to get a vote sufficiently large to expel.

On March 27, two complaints were brought before the Board. The first alleged that the member named in the complaint, had attempted to insure a vessel after he had received positive information that the said vessel was lost. The plea set up in defense was that the application to the underwriters was only intended as a joke. In this case, the motion to expel the offending member was carried. The second complaint was against a leading firm, who, having suspicions that some grain delivered to them by a broker was the property of a dealer then owing them, gave a check for the grain in order to get it into their possession, and immediately after stopped payment on the check, in order to collect the debt. The broker appeared as the complainant, claiming that he had been defrauded of his property by this sharp practice. In this case, the motion for expulsion was not sustained. At the close of the proceedings, an amendment to the by-laws, which brought all complaints for breach of contract under the jurisdiction of the directors was offered, with the understanding that it should lay over until the annual meeting.

Some of the firms and individuals who became members of the Board, about this time are herewith presented.

BLACKMAN BROS. are commission and brokerage merchants, and among the oldest and most prominent members of the Board. They do an extensive business, reaching all over the Northwest, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. The firm consists of three brothers, Carlos H., Willis L., and Chester S., natives of Chittenden County, Vermont. Their father moved West in 1857, and settled at Marengo, Ill., and two years later moved to Harvard, Ill., where he engaged in mercantile business.

Carlos H. Blackman was born in 1841, and received the principal part of his education in Vermont, completing it after coming to Illinois. He remained at home, assisting his father in the store, until twenty-two years of age. He came to Chicago in 1863, and entered the commission business, becoming a member of the firm of Linsley, Hanchett & Co. Two years later the firm changed, and was known by the name and style of Linsley, Blackman & Co., which existed until 1869, when the firm of Blackman Bros. was formed. Mr. Blackman became a member of the Board of Trade in 1863. He has been a member of the Committees of Arbitration and Appeals, and was a member of the Board of Directors one term. He is also a member of the Chicago Stock Exchange. He was married in 1868, to Miss Flora Littlefield, of Rockford, Ill.

Willis L. Blackman was born in 1845, and received his education in the public schools of Marengo and Harvard, Ill., and spent his early days, and received his business training, in his father's store. In 1865, he came to this city, associated himself with his brother in the commission business, and became a member of the Board the same year. He was married in this city, in 1869, to Miss Carrie Linsley. They have three children.

Chester S. Blackman, the junior member of the firm, was born in 1848. His early days were spent at home, in school, and assisting his father in his store. In 1870, when twenty-two years of age, he came to Chicago, and entered his brother's commission office, and one year later became a member of the firm, also a member of the Board of Trade the same year. He was married to Miss Jennie Diggins, of Harvard, Ill., in 1877.

ALEXANDER BELL, foreign commission merchant and dealer in flour, oatmeal and provisions, is of a mingled Scotch and English descent, and has marked characteristics of these races in his sturdy physique. On the father's side he is descended from the Scotch covenanters, who fled from Scotland to escape persecution in the reign of Charles II., and took refuge in the north of Ireland. His great grandfather was the Thomas Bell, mentioned in the encyclopædia as among those liberty-loving seceders from the established kirk, who left Ayrshire, Scotland, and settled in Belfast, Ireland. On his mother's side, he comes from that Sayers family who were famous in Northumberland, North of England, for their physical size and prowess. The family moved to Belfast about the same time that the Bells came from Scotland, and they became intimate and fast friends, their children intermarrying. Clement Bell—the father of Alexander—was a butter and provision merchant in Belfast for forty years, bringing up his son to the business. Alexander was born in Belfast on February 28, 1822, and came to America in 1847. He first settled in Cincinnati, where he packed pork for three years; but after moving to Racine, Wis., in March, 1850, he went into the soap and candle business. Afterward he added the manufacture of potash, pearlsh and saleratus; but, business in that line declining, he began again, in 1860, to pack pork. In this he succeeded and moved to Chicago in 1862, to enlarge his business facilities. Henry Milward, a Chicago broker, became a silent partner, and they did business for one year on Archer Road as Alexander Bell & Co. In 1863, he built a packing-house on Archer Road and Wallace Street, which he sold, in 1864, to B. T. Murphey & Co. In the fall of that year he began to supply Wisconsin flouring mills with wheat, buying back their flour at a fixed price; which business he continued for two seasons only. In the meantime he had built another pork-packing house on Quarry Street and the Chicago & Alton Railroad, where he packed the pork crop of that year. He subsequently rented his establishment, and, in 1876, established his lines of foreign commission in England, Ireland and Scotland; and has done a fairly prosperous business to date. He is particularly fortunate in being able to send to Ireland and Scotland large shipments of a very superior quality of oatmeal, so largely consumed in those countries. This is manufactured expressly for his trade in Iowa, and is fully equal, if not superior, to the best foreign makes. While living at Cincinnati, on November 13, 1849, Mr. Bell was married to Miss Jane Ireland. They have three daughters and two sons, Clement and John. Mr. Bell is a member of the Fifth Presbyterian Church of this city. He has never taken part in American politics, and has never been naturalized; yet, during the war, he stood his chances in three drafts without a murmur of protest.

ANDREW J. HOAGLAND was born in Hunterdon County, N. J., in 1831, and spent his early years on a farm. At fifteen years of age he became employed in a general store at Flemington, in the same county, and for eighteen months previous to coming West was employed in mercantile pursuits in the city of New York. He came to Chicago August 5, 1850, and entered the employ of R. D. Jones & Son, dry goods merchants, with whom he remained seven years. In 1857, he became a member of the Board of Trade, and, in 1858, embarked in the provision business, on South Water Street, buying his meats in St. Louis. In 1862, he closed out his store, and engaged exclusively in the commission provision trade. He built up a large business during the war, and, from 1866 to 1868, did an immense trade in flour as a commission merchant and forwarder. He subsequently gave up the flour business, and confined himself entirely to the provision and grain commission trade. On October 1, 1871, he became associated with A. E. Clarke, under the firm name of Hoagland & Clarke. The firm did a large and successful business up to October, 1883, when it was succeeded by Hoagland & Hill (J. G. Hill). This firm continues to do a very large shipping and commission business. He was for twenty-one years treasurer of the Second Universalist Church (Church of the Redeemer), and has been ever one of its staunchest and most consistent members.

HENRY W. ROGERS, JR., the son of Dr. G. A. Rogers, was born in Bath, Steuben Co., N. Y., March 27, 1832. At the age of twelve years, he went to reside with an uncle in Buffalo. There he spent the years of his youth and early manhood, received his school education, and learned most thoroughly the principles and executive details of mercantile business. For thirteen years he was engaged in the ship chandlery business, and, in 1860, emigrated to the West, first settling in Clinton, Iowa, engaging in mercantile business with his father. He came to Chicago April 17, 1863, became a member of the Board of Trade soon after his arrival, and established himself in the commission trade, under the firm name of H. W. Rogers, Jr. & Co., his partner being P. B. Wear. Under this firm name he conducted business for some years, subsequently forming a copartnership with his brother, James C., when the name was changed to H. W. Rogers, Jr. & Brother, which has continued to the present time. Mr. Rogers has been an active and valuable member of the Board since he became identified with its work. He has served on many important committees, among which was the Committee of Arbitration, and has held nearly every office of honor or trust within its gift. He was first a director; second vice-president in 1879; first vice-president in 1880; and president, in 1881. During his administration, the project of building the new Chamber of Commerce was brought into the practical shape that has resulted in the present magnificent structure. He was a member of the committee which performed the first efficient work toward its erection, selecting and securing the site on which the edifice is built, and adopting the plans and methods for the building. He was, by virtue of his office as president, the first chairman of the real estate managers. As a citizen, he has been accorded a high rank, as is evinced from the fact that he is a member of the Executive Committee of the Citizen's League, and was, in the summer of 1883, appointed a director of the Chicago Public Library. The mere enumeration of the positions held by any true American citizen gives but faint hints of the sterling worth which is evinced in the faithful performance of the duties devolving upon them. These are known to their contemporaries, and go to make up the true character; and on this true test of worth the subject of this sketch has built up a most enviable and lasting reputation.

WILLIAM E. MCHENRY was born in Westfield, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., September 13, 1844, and came to the West with his parents in 1849, who settled, in 1850, in Racine, Wis. There he received his education and engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1863, at which time he came to Chicago, where he first entered the employ of Wiley M. Egan. He subsequently was with C. B. Goodyear eight years, being for three years a partner. In 1872, he engaged in the grain commission trade alone, which business he followed until 1877. In December, he entered into a co-partnership with Charles G. Cooley, under the firm name of Cooley & McHenry. The firm dissolved in 1878. Mr. McHenry continued business alone until 1881, when he became a member of the firm of Preston & McHenry. This continued but a few months. February 1, 1882, he formed a business connection with F. P. Rush & Co., under the firm name of McHenry, Rush & Co. February 1, 1883, he became a member of the present firm of McHenry & Balding, his partner being Thomas E. Balding, formerly of Milwaukee, and the junior member of the firm of Charles Ray & Co. Mr. McHenry has been a member of the Board of Trade of Chicago since 1863. He was a director in 1878-79-80; second vice-president in 1881; and first vice-president in 1882. During his term of membership, he has served on many important committees and held many responsible positions not above enumerated. He has been a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 38, A. F. & A. M., since 1875, and served as its Worshipful Master in 1877-79. He is also a member of Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.; Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; and of Oriental Consistory, 32<sup>d</sup>, S. P. R. S.

T. E. BALDING was born in London, England, in 1837, came to America and settled in Milwaukee in 1849, where he received his education in the schools and business houses of that city. He enlisted as a private in the war, and came out, after his full term of service, as captain of his company and the rank of brevet major, bestowed for bravery and meritorious services in the field. He has been an active member of the Milwaukee Board of Trade for twenty years, and left his connection with one of the leading firms of that city to join Mr. McHenry in their present business.

THE YEAR 1863-64.

The fifteenth annual meeting was held April 6, 1863. The membership was reported at nine hundred and seventy-eight—an increase of fifty-four during the past year. The officers elected were: John L. Hancock, president; N. K. Fairbank and Charles Randolph, first and second vice-presidents.

The report of C. T. Wheeler, the retiring president, gave the following summary of the fiscal affairs of the organization: Total amount received into the treasury, exclusive of the war fund, $33,836.37; total expenditures, $31,832.03. In addition, the Board had collected $51,305.99, and paid out on orders of the war fund committee, for war purposes, $36,566.12, leaving in the hands of the Board, subject to the order of the committee, $14,799.87. The president called attention to the rapid growth of the association, which had already outgrown the capacity of the rooms, and recommended that the Board take steps to procure a suitable location, and erect, during the coming year, a Board of Trade building. He called the attention of the members to the numerous charges which had been made against members for sharp practice and dishonorable dealing, and recommended the adoption of more stringent rules, whereby, when charges of that nature had been proven against a member, he might be expelled in a more summary manner than was possible under the existing rules. He announced the annual dues from members, for the ensuing year, to be fixed at ten dollars.

NEW RULE FOR SUSPENSION.—In accordance with the recommendation of the president, the amendment in regard to the suspension of members, which had been presented to the Board, on March 27, was taken up, and, after due consideration, adopted. The amendment reads as follows:

"Any member of the association making contracts, either written or verbal, and failing to comply with the terms of such contract, shall, upon representation of an aggrieved member to the Board of Directors, accompanied with satisfactory evidence of the facts, be suspended by them from all privileges of membership in the association until such contract is equitably or satisfactorily arranged and settled. And it shall be the duty of the Board of Directors to cause to be publicly announced to the association, the suspension or restoration of any member suspended under this rule."

THE WAR RECORD.—During the earlier months of the year, the Board continued to perform the work of aiding soldiers in the field and their families at home, with the same munificence and promptness which had characterized its work since the war began. To sustain the country and aid her defenders had been accepted as a duty to be performed without question and without delay, for months and years to come, if necessary.

On April 16, the death of Lieutenant J. S. Ballard, of the Second Board-of-Trade Regiment was announced. Appropriate eulogies were enunciated and resolutions adopted. His funeral, which was observed on the day following, was attended by the members of the Board in a body.

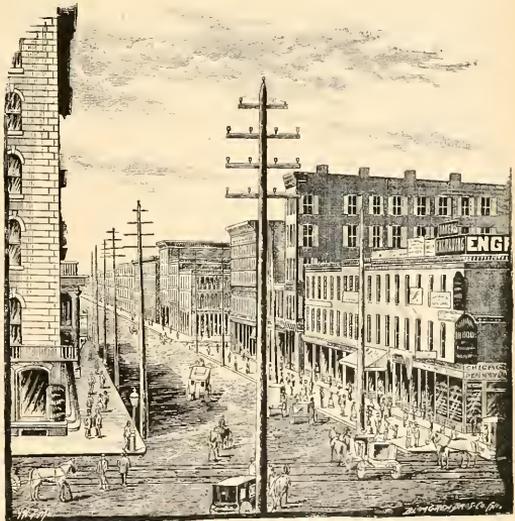

On June 1, State Adjutant-General Allen C. Fuller addressed the Board concerning the urgent necessities of the Sanitary Commission, which, at that time, was the great agency for the systematic distribution of supplies to the sick and disabled soldiers. General Fuller gave a clear account of its plan of work, and of the vast field in which it was engaged. He closed with a most eloquent appeal for aid. The ordinary and sure response of the Board was forthcoming. The association, in its corporate capacity, gave $2,500, to which sum the members added $5,560, by individual subscriptions.

The death of Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph C. Wright, of the First Board-of-Trade Regiment, was announced on 'Change, July 6. He died from a wound received in the arm at the attack on Vicksburg, May 22. Fitting eulogies were pronounced by his old friends, I. Y. Munn, Charles Randolph and Murry Nelson, which brought tears to many eyes. Resolutions of condolence and sympathy were passed. Colonel Wright had been eloquent in defense of his country from the first, and was among the earliest to affirm the sincerity of his speech by his acts. He took an active part in enlisting the regiment of which he was afterward lieutenant-colonel. He was pressed to accept the colonelcy, which he firmly declined, for what he deemed patriotic reasons, and through that distrust of his own abilities which is so often found in exalted souls. He was well fitted for the position he finally accepted by a thorough training at the military school at Norwich, Vt. His funeral was largely attended by members of the Board and citizens generally; after which his remains were borne, under military escort, to the railway depot, for transportation to Oswego, N. Y., his former home.

On the day of the opening of the first Sanitary Fair (q. v.), the business of the Board was suspended.

On October 18, President Lincoln issued another call for three hundred thousand men, to be furnished by volunteers, until January 5, 1864, on which date drafting would commence in all districts where the quota had not been filled. The quota of Chicago under this new call was estimated at about three thousand. To fill this requisition, without resort to a draft, was the most arduous task that the necessities of the war had yet imposed upon the citizens. It was rendered peculiarly difficult, since the call came at a time when laborers were scarce and found more profitable employment than at any season of the year. Soon after the call had been made, Adjutant-General Fuller visited Chicago, and addressed the Board of Trade in regard to the pressing necessities of the country, and the importance, if possible, of furnishing the quota of Chicago without resort to a draft. He announced that permission would be given to responsible parties to establish recruiting agencies and appoint recruiting agents. This intimation to the Board that its services were required as a recruiting agency met a ready response.

CORNER OF RANDOLPH AND CLARK STREETS, LOOKING SOUTH.

RECRUITING AGENCY ESTABLISHED.—On November 19, S. S. Green and Joseph C. Riddle were appointed recruiting agents, and an office opened at

No. 4 Clark Street. It was resolved, first to fill the Board-of-Trade regiments, after which, the recruiting should be continued until the quota of the city should be filled. The Government bounties offered were as follows: For new recruits, $302—$75 in advance, $50 the first pay day following (two months after), and $50 every six months thereafter, until the full bounty should be paid. A veteran nine-months man received $402, payable in the same manner as that of the raw recruit. In case of death, any unpaid installment of the bounty was secured to the heirs of the deceased. In addition to this, the Board added special inducements to such as enlisted in the Board-of-Trade organizations then in the field.

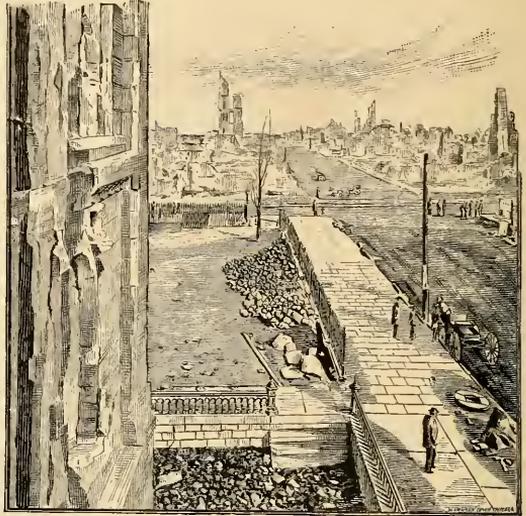

There was but little enthusiasm among the people for many weeks after recruiting was begun, and but few men were obtained. As the time appointed for the draft approached, anxiety at the small number of recruits offering became intense. It was plain that some vigorous methods were needed on the parts of the county and city authorities as well as the citizens. Accordingly, mass meetings were held each evening, from December 16 to 21; the first being held in Bryan Hall, and those subsequent at the Board of Trade rooms. Owing to the difficulties of obtaining a correct enrollment, and efforts to obtain at Washington an abatement of the State quota, the draft was postponed until late in the spring, and the quota was finally filled. The success was doubtless more largely attributable to the well-directed efforts of the members of the Board of Trade than to any other single cause.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.—So rapid had been the increase in membership that the rooms which had been leased for ten years, and first occupied in February, 1860, had, in less than two years from that date, become so crowded as to necessitate an addition of forty feet on the east end of the hall. In his annual report, January 1, 1862, Secretary Catlin congratulated the Board on the commodious rooms, the enlarged dimensions being, "including the secretary's office, grain inspector's office, reading-room, sales room, etc., one hundred and sixty feet long by about fifty feet wide." Early in 1863 it became certain that the Board must obtain larger rooms or restrict its membership, and the question of a new hall began to be seriously discussed. The Board first took action on the matter by the appointment of a building committee, which was to consider and report some plan for building or otherwise securing suitable rooms. The members of the committee were N. K. Fairbank, Charles Randolph, J. C. Dore, Julian S. Rumsey, Stephen Clary, W. D. Houghteling and C. T. Wheeler. The committee, ultimately, May 21, reported an act for the organization of the Board of Trade Building Association, with a capital stock of $300,000; the building not to be commenced until $100,000 had been subscribed.

The committee at the outset had believed it feasible for the Board to effect a building organization under its own charter, but, on further examination, found it of doubtful legality and of very questionable expediency. It therefore proposed that a joint-stock company be formed under the charter of the Chamber of Commerce of Chicago, the provisions of which were fully adapted to the purposes of the Board. After discussion, the proposition was accepted, and the subscription books were immediately opened. Seventeen subscriptions, of $500 each, were obtained before the meeting adjourned, and the whole amount required was subscribed by the members of the Board and the corporation within the ten days following.

The Chamber of Commerce was incorporated by act of the State Legislature, April 14, 1863, and had effected an organization, although it had not assumed any of the active functions authorized by the charter.

RUINS, CLARK AND RANDOLPH STREETS.

The incorporators were: John C. Hilton, T. J. S. Flint, Charles H. Walker, Thomas Harless, Asa Dow, Clinton Briggs, Henry Milward, Thomas B. Taylor, S. M. Johnson, Hugh McLennan, M. C. Stearns, V. A. Turpin, Hugh Adams, Hiram Wheeler, W. F. Coolbaugh, Walter S. Gurnee, Marcus D. Gilman, Myron H. Horton, Potter Palmer, William M. Ross, William R. Arthur, John B. Turner, John F. Tracy, John V. Ayer, David Keigh, Horatio Reed, of the City of Chicago; F. W. Leonard, John McIntire, of Pekin; J. M. Rollins, of Quincy; G. B. Stiles, of Dixon; Tobias S. Bradley, of Peoria; N. H. Ridgely, of Springfield; and George Woodruff, of Joliet.

It had authority to conduct commercial affairs, the powers conferred being similar to those granted in the charter of the Board of Trade, and expressed in similar language. To Section 5, concerning the admission and expulsion of members, was added the following proviso, not appearing in the Board of Trade charter:

"Provided, no person shall ever be rejected or expelled for religious or political tenets; and no member shall be expelled or any penalty inflicted upon said member for any offense against said corporation, except upon conviction, after due notice, and a fair trial and hearing in the presence of the accused (unless said member has absconded), who shall be permitted to examine and cross-examine witnesses upon said trial. The testimony taken at said trial, if requested by either party, shall be taken in writing and accessible to either, for reading, copying, or publishing the same."

The first election of officers of the Chamber of Commerce, after its interests became merged with those of the Board of Trade, was held March 1, 1864, at which time the following officers were chosen: President, R. M. Hough; Vice-President, V. A. Turpin; Treasurer, J. V. Farwell; Directors, John L. Hancock, T. J. Bronson, P. L. Underwood, H. Milward, Lyman Blair, D. Thompson, J. M. Richards, Hugh McLennan, George F. Ramsey, S. M. Nickerson, J. K. Pollard.

After various propositions were considered, it was determined to buy of the First Baptist Church, the lot on the southeast corner of Washington and LaSalle streets for $65,000. At a meeting held February 26, it was decided that the rental should be determined by a committee of six persons, all to be members of both associations, and, in case of a failure to agree, three referees were to be added to the said committee, not members of either association. The decision as to the rental was to be based on an annual return of ten per cent. on the cost of such part of the building as should be occupied by the Board. The president and directors were also empowered to enter into an agreement, binding the Board to lease the rooms, when ready for occupancy, for a term of ninety-nine years, at such annual rental as should be determined by the above mentioned committee. The rental finally decided upon was $20,000 per annum.

All preliminaries being at last arranged, the total stock was announced at $500,000, and early in the spring the work of building was begun.

MINOR TOPICS.—The mention of many minor occurrences during the year have been omitted, as having no important bearing on the continued growth of the association in influence or importance. In May, it appointed a committee to make a survey and estimate of the cost of improving the harbor. It also did its full share of work in making the great Canal Convention, which convened in Chicago in June, a success. Through the Board of Trade committee, it was furnished with most elaborate statistics of the trade and commerce, not only of Chicago, but of the whole Northwest; and the Board freely extended its hospitalities to the members of the convention throughout the session. In August, many members, in response to an invitation from the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., visited that city, in company with delegates from the Boards of Trade of Detroit and Milwaukee. A special train over the Grand Trunk Railway conveyed the excursionists from Detroit to Portland. Short stops were made at various stations in Canada, where speeches of welcome were made and every token of good will evinced. At Montreal, they were entertained for a day and a night by the large-hearted merchants of that city. The hospitalities extended by the citizens of Portland far transcended every anticipation of the visitors.

Following are personal mentions of some of the gentlemen who became members of the Board during the epoch just treated, and whose subsequent career has been alike honorable to the city, its mercantile interests and themselves.

CHARLES D. HAMILL is senior member of the firm of Hamill & Brine; of which George J. Brine, is the junior partner. It was instituted on January 1, 1854. Mr. Hamill was born in Bloomington, Ind., in 1839, and came to Chicago in 1852. He joined the Board of Trade in 1864, and has served on various important committees since that date, as well as having been a director for three years. From 1875 to 1882, he was a member of the firm of Van Inwagen & Hamill. Mr. Hamill is vice-president of the Chicago Club, one of the trustees of the Chicago University, a director of the Art Institute, and has always taken an active interest in all movements instituted for the purpose of advancing culture in our city.

GEORGE J. BRINE is a native of Newfoundland, and was born at St. John's on December 9, 1839. He received his early education at the common schools of his native town, and, after making a voyage or two as supercargo, and engaging in some mercantile ventures, he determined to seek his fortune in the West. In October, 1859, when not twenty years of age, he came to Chicago, and entered the employment of his uncle, William Brine, one of the early members of the Board of Trade. Very shortly after his entry into this department of commerce, the young man was found to be very useful, from his previous knowledge and adaptability to the requirements of his position, and his uncle accordingly took him into partnership, under the firm name of William Brine & Co., which existed until 1866. In 1863, William Brine went to New York, and there opened a branch house of the Chicago establishment, leaving George J. Brine to operate the main house in this city. After the dissolution of this partnership, Mr. Brine conducted a commission business alone for three years, and then entered into partnership with John B. Lyon and Thomas B. Rice, under the firm name of J. B. Lyon & Co., which was dissolved in the fall of 1872. Until 1879 Mr. Brine did business alone, but, during that year, he became an employé of Armour & Co., with whom he remained five years. On January 1, 1884, he entered into his present business association with Charles D. Hamill, under the firm name of Hamill & Brine, and which occupies a deservedly prominent position on the Board of Trade and in commercial circles. Although a foreigner by birth, and not even a naturalized citizen until after the war, Mr. Brine did his duty to his adopted country in the day of its trouble, and sent a substitute to the ranks, at a cost to himself of $600. He is a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M.; also of the Union Club; and is connected with Professor Swing's congregation.

JAMES S. AND WILLIAM F. PEIRONNET are natives of Binghamton, N. Y. They came to Chicago at the age of twenty and twenty-three years, respectively, and in September, 1864, established the firm of J. S. Peironnet & Co., forwarding and commission merchants. Being conservative, competent, and in other respects well qualified for the business, they for years transacted one of the largest and most successful businesses on 'Change. Through the many vicissitudes of trade, they are one of the few firms who have always stood unchanged, with reputation, responsibility and credit unimpaired. Their patrons, friends and acquaintances acknowledge them to be of unusual business ability, and justly entitled to the prominence they have attained.

GEORGE W. PHILLIPS, JR., is a native of Cincinnati, where he was born, in 1828. He engaged in the provision business with his father, George W. Phillips, in 1848, at Chillicothe, Ohio. In 1849, they moved to Madison, Ind., and established the firm of George W. Phillips & Son, packers of pork. This concern did a large business, and built up an enviable reputation. Six years later, George W., Jr. returned to Cincinnati, and began business as a provision broker. He was for about a year a member of the firm of Phillips, Sledge & Co., after which he carried on business alone. He built up an enormous trade, and was the leading man in the provision market for a number of years. During the war he established the Phillips Provision Exchange, and carried it on successfully for a considerable time. Mr. Phillips came to Chicago, in October, 1864, and established the commission firm of George W. Phillips & Co. In 1880, he became associated with O. A. Fitch (who died in March, 1881), and organized the firm of Fitch & Phillips, commission merchants. Mr. Phillips has been a member of the Board since his arrival in this city, and since January, 1884, has been a member of its Committee of Arbitration. He is an active, enterprising business man, and one of the oldest and most experienced provision dealers on 'Change.

THE YEAR 1864-65.

The sixteenth annual meeting was held on Monday, April 4, 1864. The number of members reported was one thousand two hundred and fifty-seven—an increase of two hundred and seventy-nine during the year. The election resulted in the choice of the following officers: John L. Hancock, president (re-elected); Thomas Parker and C. J. Gilbert, vice-presidents. The president's annual report of the fiscal affairs of the Board gives the following items:

Total receipts for the year.....	$45,908 21
Total expenditures .....	41,909 82
Balance in hands of the Treasurer.....	3,998 39
Balance unexpended in the hands of War Fund Committee.....	5,129 79

The report also gave a review of the work of the association during the past year, making allusion to the various subjects on which it had acted, which have been adverted to in the foregoing pages.

NATIONAL vs. STATE-BANK CURRENCY.—At the beginning of the war, the depreciation in Southern stocks nearly annihilated a majority of the Illinois and other Western banks, whose circulation was based on them. The subsequent establishment of National banks, and the issue of legal tender notes by the Government, with the tax imposed on State banks, resulted in closing up most of the Western banks that had survived the first shock. There was no profit in issuing bills for home circulation where constant redemption in greenbacks was required. The Eastern banks, however, found a profitable business in loaning their bills for circulation in the West, where they often remained for months before returning, to be immediately sent West again on their tour of profit. The volume of State-bank bills gradually increased. At the beginning of the war, it was but $150,000,000 in all the loyal States; in 1864, it had increased to over $400,000,000, and was fast driving out of circulation the legal tender money of the Government. Chicago was flooded with it; the banks received and paid it out, holding the reserve in their vaults, so far as possible, in greenbacks. The public, made wary by past sad experiences with State-bank money, became suspicious and fearful of a collapse which would bring renewed business disaster. A few of the leading members of the Board of Trade determined to take the initiative in forcing the retirement from circulation of all bills not convertible into legal tender notes in Chicago, without loss or delay. The work was inaugurated at the annual meeting. I. Y. Munn called the attention of the Board to the miscellaneous currency with which the West was flooded. He believed that there were now "greenbacks" and National bank notes enough in circulation for the legitimate business wants of the country, and deprecated the further recognition of the State-bank bills, which he styled "wild-cat currency." He believed the Board of Trade, as the most important commercial body in the West, should take the initiative steps toward driving them from circulation. He offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That on and after the first of May next, all transactions by members of this Board shall be for United States legal tender notes and National bank notes or their equivalent.

"Resolved, That this Board hereby request the banks of the city to aid them in this effort to make treasury and national bank notes the basis of all money transactions."

P. L. Underwood moved an amendment that a committee be appointed to confer with the merchants and bankers in relation to the substitution of National currency in place of the miscellaneous currency with which the country was flooded, and that the committee report the next Monday.

W. D. Houghteling also moved an amendment that all the resolutions, except that in relation to the appointment of a committee of conference, be laid on the table, and that the committee be requested to report on Monday night.

The motions of Messrs. Underwood and Houghteling were both carried, and a committee appointed, composed of I. Y. Munn, P. L. Underwood, R. M. Hough, and the chairman, to confer with the bankers in accordance with the resolutions.

A public meeting was held at the Board of Trade rooms on Friday evening, April 8, to get a more general expression of sentiment on the subject. It was largely attended by merchants, bankers and business men. The feeling expressed was almost unanimously in favor of the move inaugurated by the Board, among the bankers as well as other classes of business men represented. The only difference expressed was as to the time when the measure should take effect. A majority of the bankers who took part in the discussion thought the first of May (the date set by the Board of Trade resolutions for making legal tenders the basis of currency circulation), would not give sufficient time for banking or business generally to adapt itself to the proposed change without serious disarrangement. The meeting finally passed a resolution requesting the bankers, acting in concert, to name such time as they might deem it expedient to establish treasury notes as a basis of business, and to report such time agreed upon to the Board of Trade committee, at the meeting to be held on the following Monday evening.

At the meeting on Monday, the chairman of the committee Mr. Munn, submitted a report which closed as follows:

"No person doubts the solvency of the New York banks, their securities being ample, always convertible in New York at 1-4 per cent. discount; and so of the New England banks, redeemable in Boston, and at that point equal to treasury notes. Your committee are pleased to state that some of our leading bankers have published a card, in which they decline to receive the bank notes of Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey, Michigan and all except the State Banks of Ohio and Indiana, and believe this step will accomplish much if not all the Board had in view in the commencement of this project; and fully believe that the day is not far distant when our currency will be in a measure purified. If Congress had compelled the National banks to redeem their issues at central points, then we should have found no difficulty; and as there has recently been introduced a bill in Congress relating to banks, that may contain this feature, your committee recommend that all further action be postponed until we learn the action of the present Congress on this question."

The discussion which followed showed, beyond question, that the members of the Board were determined against a postponement as recommended, and that the motion for the adoption of the report would, if put to vote, be defeated by a large majority. Mr. Munn therefore, in behalf of the committee, asked permission to withdraw the report, and offered, as a substitute, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That on and after the 15th of May next, all our transactions shall be based on United States treasury notes or their equivalents."

This resolution was carried with great unanimity; and the Board of Trade thus took the first step toward the desired financial reform without the full cooperation of the banks which had generally favored the indefinite postponement of further action on the part of the Board, as had been first recommended by the committee.

As the time approached when the resolution would go into force, the bankers showed increased uneasiness as to its probable effect; and the more timid business men had become so wrought up by the prophecies of dire disaster that would follow, that strong efforts were made to induce the Board to rescind or modify the resolution. At the noon session of April 20, resolutions were offered extending the time until July 1.

The consideration of the resolution was postponed until the evening of April 21, at which time a very large meeting was held. Following the reading of the resolution, a lengthy and earnest discussion ensued, which was participated in by R. M. Hough, N. K. Fairbank, Julian S. Rumsey, I. Y. Munn, and J. Young Scammon. Mr. Scammon, at the close of a lengthy speech, offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That each and every member of this Board of Trade pledge himself to make no business transactions except upon the basis of legal tender treasury notes, or their equivalent; and that he will keep no account with any banker, broker or banking house, except in legal tender treasury notes, or their equivalent; and that he will not pay out nor circulate, at par, any money or bank notes which are not equivalent to legal tender treasury notes.

"Resolved, That all bank notes which are redeemed at par in Boston, New York or Chicago, shall be deemed equivalent to legal tender treasury notes.

"Resolved, That these resolutions shall take effect and be in force on the — day of May, next."

The blank in the third resolution was filled to read the "fifteenth," as in the original resolution; and the second resolution amended, by striking out "in Boston and New York," thus leaving Chicago the only place of redemption. As amended, the resolutions were passed, the Board thus reiterating its uncompromising determination to stand by its former decision.

ACTION OF THE BANKS—The banks did not yet give up the hope that the Board and the public would ultimately see the danger they apprehended, and extend the time of redemption to avert it. At a meeting of bankers, held May 8, it was unanimously decided that on and after Monday, May 9, the rate of exchange on New York should be one-half per cent. premium for miscellaneous currency. It was further resolved, that on and after the 1st of July, the bankers of Chicago would receive and pay out, as par funds, United States notes, National bank notes, and such other notes as were redeemed in legal tender notes in the city of Chicago, only, and that hereafter, for the present, solvent New England bank notes, and the notes of such other solvent banks as were redeemed at par in New York, should be taken at one-fourth per cent. discount; Ohio, Indiana, Iowa and New York state-bank notes, and the notes of such Illinois banks as were not redeemed at par in Chicago, should be subject to one-half per cent. discount; and that after the date above mentioned, nothing but United States notes, National bank notes, and such other as were at par in Chicago, should be paid on checks, or in settlement of balances between banks and brokers.

This tardy action of the bankers, and their independent manifesto as to when and how they proposed to meet the question, did not have the effect to induce the Board to re-open the subject. So soon as the determination of the bankers to delay the assumption of the legal standard basis until July 1, the following was published, signed by one hundred and fourteen of the leading firms and members of the Board:

"CHICAGO, May 9, 1864.

"We, the undersigned, members of the Board of Trade, agree, on and after the 15th, to base all transactions, either buying or selling, on legal tender treasury notes, or their equivalent."

The united and determined resolution on the part of its members to sustain the action of the Board, and the known popularity of the measure in all business circles, outside the banks, forced them to a reluctant acquiescence in the measure, as appears by the following, which was published on the 12th of May:

"The undersigned, banks and bankers of the city of Chicago, hereby agree that, on and after Monday, May 16, 1864, we will receive on deposit at par, and pay out at par, only legal tender notes, National bank notes, and the notes of such other banks as redeem at par in the city of Chicago.

"It being understood that all the checks dated prior to May 16, may be paid in the present currency, and all balances due between banks and bankers, on Monday morning, are to be settled on the same basis."

This was signed by twenty-six of the leading public and private bankers.

The railroad and express companies also signified their intention to adopt the same rule. On May 16, the city of Chicago, for the first time in its history, conducted its business on the basis of a National currency. The Board of Trade, in thus inaugurating the movement and carrying it to a successful issue against the combined money-lending power of the city, demonstrated, as never before, that it had become the chief agency in controlling and directing the methods and conduct of the business of Chicago.

ACTION ON EXTRANEOUS SUBJECTS.—On May 24, at a meeting of a joint committee of members of the Chicago Board of Trade and the Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, uniform rates of commission and brokerage, for the purchase and sale of all commodities dealt in by the members of either association were adopted.

On January 6, 1865, the Board passed resolutions favoring the project of a ship canal around Niagara Falls on the American side.

February 8, a resolution was passed relative to the purification of the Chicago River by means of the enlargement of the Illinois & Michigan Canal, and recommending such legislation as would enable the city of Chicago to undertake the desired improvements in concert with the board of trustees of the canal. In accordance with these resolutions an act was passed and approved February 16, under which the city appointed a board of commissioners, who were empowered to borrow money and enabled to ultimately complete the desired work.

During February, the Board passed a series of resolutions condemning the ninety-nine-year street railway franchise and the Chicago and Evanston Railroad charter, which were extremely obnoxious to a majority of the citizens. Notwithstanding the general opposition, the joint measure was passed; was returned by the governor with his objections thereto; again passed over his veto; and became a law February 6.

CLOSE OF THE WAR PERIOD.—The Board continued its incessant labors in support of the Union cause as in former years. These unremitting efforts for the relief of sick and disabled soldiers flowed largely through the channel of the Sanitary Commission, and its work in recruiting was extensively done by individual members. It held a series of war meetings in May, to promote enlistments for the call for one-hundred-day troops, and proved itself, as before, the great source from which came ever-renewed enthusiasm and courage for the faltering or faint-hearted. The continued calls for new men at last overtook even the enthusiasm of the Board, and brought the citizens face to face, with the last resort—a draft. Drafting commenced September 26, at which time the city was in arrears one thousand two hundred and thirty-five men. The deficit was distributed throughout the different wards, none being entirely exempt. Under these circumstances the energy of the Board could not be exerted as a body, each member being most seriously exercised in getting his own ward free from the draft.

The drafting went on intermittently for about three weeks, during which time substitutes were furnished nearly as fast as conscripts were drawn—each town or ward having, through local committees, the work of furnishing substitutes for its own conscripts.

The close of the fiscal year saw the end of the long and bloody struggle in which the Board had so effectively borne its loyal part. The news of the fall of Richmond was received on Monday, April 2. The victory, so long delayed, had come at last. The heavy burdens which patriotic duty had imposed, dropped from the tired shoulders that had carried them with the utmost patriotism and patience. It is needless to repeat the oft-told story of the tumultuous rejoicing that followed. Business was suspended, and all through the long, bright day, and far into the night, the hall resounded with congratulatory speeches and the responsive shouts of applause of the exultant crowds.

Thus closes the record of the most memorable period in the annals of the Board of Trade. Throughout the struggles of those weary years it had never faltered in its work nor lost hope in the final victory. Underneath its turbulent waves of speculation and trade, burned, with never-failing and fervid heat, the fires of patriotism, until, emerging from the conflict, it took the place in history accorded only to those who had stood, with fearless and uncompromising spirit, the staunch friends of the Nation through every vicissitude of uncertainty, doubt and discouragement, even to the end.

One of the oldest houses doing business in the city, and one which has attained commercial prominence, is that of Albert Dickinson.

ALBERT DICKINSON'S SEED HOUSE was originally started by the father, Albert F. Dickinson, in 1854, and in 1872 was changed to the name of the eldest son. The three brothers are working together in the business.

Albert F. Dickinson was born June 28, 1800, at Hawley, Franklin Co., Mass., and received a common school education in his native country. He became a teacher in Savoy and Adams, Mass., and was afterwards clerk in a dry goods store at Adams. He then went to Curtisville, Mass., and became agent for two cotton factories located at that place, going to New York to purchase the raw cotton for the mills and sell the manufactured goods. In 1840, he visited the West, and came to Chicago and continued his journey up into Wisconsin, but afterward returned to Massachusetts and purchased a grist-mill at Curtisville, Berkshire County. He was elected justice of the peace, selectman, and to other town offices, and was appointed postmaster. In 1848, he was elected by the Democratic party a member of the State Legislature. In 1852, he moved to Albany, N. Y., and engaged in the flour and commission business, but shortly afterward disposed of the business and moved to Buffalo, N. Y. He there formed a partnership with Chester Hitchcock, which was terminated in 1855. In 1854, he came to Chicago, his family following him in September, 1855. He soon commenced the seed and grain business, in which he continued until 1872, when, on account of failing health he transferred his business to his oldest son, Albert Dickinson. In the early days of the Board of Trade he became one of its members, when a membership cost only five dollars. At his death in 1881, the Board passed the following resolutions of respect: "Resolved, That in the death of Mr. Albert F. Dickinson this association has lost a member, who, in his long intercourse with us as a business man always commanded our sincerest respect as a man of an exceptionally high sense of commercial honor, and whose integrity was never questioned in the many transactions in which he was engaged during his residence in the city." He was married in Adams, Mass., in 1836, to Miss Ann Eliza Anthony, daughter of Humphrey and Hannah Anthony; and there are six children living, viz.,—Hannah (now Mrs. Charles C. Boyles), Melissa, Albert, Nathan, Fannie and Charles.

Albert Dickinson was born in Curtisville, Mass., in 1841, and came to Chicago, in 1855, with his parents. For a short time after school, he assisted his father in business. In 1861, he enlisted in the army, as a private in Taylor's Battery, and remained for three years. He was in the battles of Donelson, Vicksburg, Shiloh, and other engagements. He then returned to civil life, and commenced business at Durant, Iowa; from there he was called to Chicago on account of his father's failing health, and at once took the responsibilities of the business upon himself, and actively commenced the duties of manager. He has since associated his two younger brothers with him.

Charles Dickinson was born in Chicago in 1858, and was educated in the schools of this city. He began trading on the Board in his seventeenth year. He traveled in Europe in 1880, and in Europe and Africa in 1883-84.

Nathan Dickinson was born in Curtisville, Mass., in 1848, and was educated in Chicago. After attending the High School for a short time, he was needed in the business, and commenced under his father's instruction. He has remained continuously in the establishment since.

GEORGE T. SMITH, one of the vice-presidents of the Board of Trade, was born in Providence, R. I., in 1849, and received his education there and at Lockport, this State. He came to Chicago, in 1865, and commenced his business career,—which has been so replete with energy and fortuitous results,—as a clerk for Spruance, Preston & Co. He remained with them eight years, subsequent to which he started in the commission business for himself and conducted it two years. He then went into partnership with Henry G. Gaylord, under the firm name of Smith & Gaylord, continuing therein for two years; after which he withdrew, and has since conducted a general business. In 1880, Mr. Smith took a tour around the world, which occupied one year in transit, visiting Europe, India, China, Turkey, and, in fact, the notable places of historic interest and memorable occurrences. During the last year he became identified with the United States Storage Company, and was elected its president. In 1875, Mr. Smith married Miss Frances Gaylord, and has one daughter, Annie D., who was born in 1883. Although Mr. Smith has received no educational advantages beyond those of a common school, his travels and observation have given him the finished aplomb of the cultivated gentleman, and he is a splendid evidence of what natural ability and self-culture can accomplish. He has been a member of the Board of Trade for twelve years; was a member of the Committee of Arbitration for two years and of the Committee of Appeals for 1880-81, and was elected vice-president in January, 1884.

LYMAN EVERINGHAM, the principal of the house of L. Everingham & Co., commission merchants, is the son of J. S. Everingham, a Baptist minister, and Jane Maria Cowles, his wife, formerly of Geneva, Ontario Co., N. Y., where he was born on September 9, 1831. His youth was spent at various points in the State of New York, as the ministerial duties of his father necessitated his presence at those places. He is the eldest of eight children, four brothers and four sisters, all of whom are still living. At the age of twenty, he left school to take a place in the office of the Buffalo, Corning & New York Railroad, under J. A. Redfield, superintendent. He felt conscious of possessing ability, and was eager to begin life for himself, so he seized the first opportunity that offered itself, which, in this case, was handling a truck and loading freight into cars at $20 a month. That his self-reliance was not the result of vanity, but arose from a just estimate of his powers, is proved from the fact, that, within two years, he was promoted to the position of paymaster and chief clerk, or what is now known as auditor. Nothing but merit, and that of an uncommon character, could have accomplished this result. Desiring a larger field for the exercise of his powers, he resigned his position at Corning, and came West in March, 1856, to take the position of chief clerk in the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway freight office, at Chicago; and immediately identified himself, as an active member and worker, with the First Baptist Church, then situated at the corner of La Salle and Washington streets. In October, of the same year, a better position was offered him as freight agent of the old LaCrosse & Milwaukee Railway, with his office at Milwaukee, Wis. After the consolidation of that road with the Milwaukee & St. Paul, he took charge of the freight offices of both divisions, until May, 1865, when he resigned to engage in the commission business. E. P. Bacon, general freight agent of the Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railroad, resigned at the same time, and they entered into partnership under the name and style of Bacon & Everingham.

In 1874, E. P. Bacon retired from the concern, and Mr. Everingham continued the business under the name of L. Everingham & Co., until 1880, when Mr. Bacon re-entered the firm, doing business at Milwaukee under the style of E. P. Bacon & Co. Mr. Everingham then came to Chicago, and opened a commission house, under the name of L. Everingham & Co., leaving the Milwaukee business in charge of E. P. Bacon. This arrangement was very satisfactory; but, in 1883, the partnership was again dissolved, Mr. Bacon taking the Milwaukee business and Mr. Everingham that in Chicago, which he has since conducted alone. During all this period, while subject to so many changes, and now (1884) passing through the third period of serious and universal business depression since its establishment, this house has never had a cloud upon its record nor a single reverse, and is steadily advancing in the confidence of the business world. For solid worth and integrity it has a reputation second to none in the country. Mr. Everingham was married, on December 23, 1857, to Mary M. Dickinson, of Oswego County, N. Y., by whom he has five living children, two sons named Edward and Henry Dickinson, and three daughters named Julia, Belle and May. He is a member of the First Baptist Church of Chicago, of which he is a deacon. He is one of the trustees of Chicago University, and a member of the executive board. He is the superintendent of the First Baptist Church Sunday-school, and has had an extensive experience as superintendent at Milwaukee and Evanston, Ill. At the former place he had charge, for some time, of the home school of the First Baptist Church, and, for two years, had charge of the Sharon Mission of the same Church. At Evanston, he was, for two years, superintendent of the Sunday-school of the First Baptist Church. Mr. Everingham is very active in all Christian and benevolent work, and takes an earnest interest therein; which extends not alone to personal effort but also to financial aid, as he has, on several occasions, by prompt and generous impulse, been instrumental in saving Church property when seriously embarrassed financially.

ABRAHAM KEITH is a member of the firm of Keith & Crocker, commission merchants, in flour, on the Board. Their business, as a firm, was established in 1878, and is now quite large, receiving flour from some of the best mills in Illinois, Minnesota, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Dakota, Kansas and Colorado. Mr. Keith was born in Barre, Vt., in January, 1821, a son of Willis and Dorcas (Clark) Keith. He was educated in Vermont, and in 1839 went to Boston, where he was with J. S. Gould & Co as bookkeeper, until 1848. He then went to California, via Cape Horn. In San Francisco, he was a member of the firm of Plummer, Keith & Co., wholesale grocers and flour dealers, during 1849-50. They imported large quantities of flour for their trade, from Chili, South America; no wheat at that time had been raised in California. He returned to Vermont in 1851, and, on August 17, 1852, was married to Sarah, daughter of the late Colonel J. P. and Sarah (Arms) Miller, of Montpelier, Vt. Soon after his marriage, Mr. Keith, accompanied by his wife, visited Europe, and after his return, represented Montpelier in the Vermont Legislature in 1854. He was engaged in the flour and lumber trade in Montpelier for a few years. At the commencement of the war of the Rebellion, Mr. Keith was senior aide to Governor Erastus Fairbanks, with rank of colonel. He assisted in the organization of the 1st Vermont Regiment, and afterward went to Washington, and served on the staff of Major-General H. G. Wright, during 1861-62, in the Department of the South and Army of the Potomac. He came to Chicago in 1864, and became a member of the firm of Savage, Keith & Wood; and of the firm of D. W. & A. Keith & Co., from about 1868 until 1873. Mr. Keith is a director of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, and after the great fire of 1871 gave considerable time, for several months, to the work of that organization.

THE YEAR 1865-66.

The seventeenth annual meeting was held April 10, 1865. The number of members reported was one thousand four hundred and sixty-two—an increase of two hundred and five. The officers elected for the ensuing year were: Charles Randolph, president; Thomas Maple and John C. Dore, vice-presidents. The fiscal report showed:

Total receipts for the year.....	$59,999 15
Balance on hand at beginning .....	59,790 58
Disbursements for war fund .....	12,427 57

The assets of the association had been decreased during the year by $3,789.32.

The president in his report announced that the war fund was now exhausted, and that the war committee had become dependent on the Board of Trade for funds to disburse to the soldiers' families and other war purposes to which it was pledged. To meet these requirements, and the prospective increase in current expenses which would arise from the occupancy of the new rooms, then in process of construction, the directors had advanced the annual assessment from ten to twenty-five dollars. In regard to the business of the past year he said:

"In the early part of the past season, large profits were realized from nearly all classes of trade, but, later, business became embarrassed, in consequence of greater fluctuations having occurred in prices of the leading articles of merchandise than ever before, the rates of premium on gold having declined from 192 to 47 per cent., within the past eight months, rendering many investments unprofitable. And yet, a greater amount of business has been transacted on the Board than in any previous year since its organization. In view of lower prices prevailing, and with the present prospect of an early and permanent peace, many of our merchants have made great sacrifices, in order to reduce stock and prepare themselves for any emergency that may arise. And, yet, nearly every member has met his obligations promptly, and no important failures have transpired during the season."

The Secretary said:

"It is true that speculation has been too much the order of the day, and buyers and sellers of 'long' and 'short' and 'spot' have passed through all the gradations of fortune, from the lower to the higher round, and in many instances have returned to the starting point, if not a step lower; but it is to be hoped, that, with the return of peace, this fever of speculation will abate, and trade will be conducted on a more thoroughly legitimate basis."

A new code of general rules was adopted by the Board, at a special meeting held October 14. The by-laws were slightly amended at the same meeting. The new rules defined more specifically the duties of officers, and the rights of parties on time contracts and the manner and conditions for calling for margins on the same. The duties and powers of the Arbitration Committee were enlarged. Under the new rules, the dealing in "futures" was recognized as a legitimate feature of trade, and full and complete rules established for its unrestricted prosecution, if carried on according to the rules then adopted. Under the new rules, the deals in "privileges," or what were then termed "puts" and "calls," were discredited. The new rules repudiated the practice in the following language:

"The privileges, bought or sold, to deliver or call for grain or other property by members of the association, shall not be recognized as a business transaction by the Directors or Committee of Arbitration."

During the year, representatives of the Board made several commercial visits. In June, delegates from this and other Western Boards of Trade visited Boston, being magnificently entertained by the Boston Board of Trade and the city government. In July, a large delegation attended the National Commercial Convention at Detroit.

Two memorials were addressed to Congress during the year—one, in January, 1866, relative to the necessity of protection to the shipping interests on the great inland lakes; the other, in March, praying for the passage of the National Bankrupt Act, then pending.

On April 2, the Board appointed a commercial committee, consisting of twenty-one members, representing as many different departments of trade and manufacture, to whom was to be referred, thereafter, all general questions pertaining to the interests and prosperity of the city.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BUILDING.—The corner-stone of the new Chamber of Commerce was laid Sunday, September 11, 1864, with Masonic ceremonies. It was the occasion of the largest public Masonic parade theretofore witnessed in the city. The stone was in laid in due form, in the presence of a dense crowd, which filled the Court-house square and covered the roofs of the surrounding buildings, and every point from which the ceremonies could be witnessed. Within the stone were deposited various documents, newspapers, coins, etc. The stone was lowered into position, and the customary Masonic ceremonies were performed, under the auspices of the Most Worshipful Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Illinois, Hon. Thomas J. Turner.

The building thus begun was completed in August of the following year, and the rooms designed for the Board of Trade were first occupied by that body on August 13. The festivities and ceremonies for the inauguration of the new rooms, were on a scale commensurate with the importance of the occasion. The jubilee began on August 30, and lasted three days. The programme, as carried out, was essentially as follows: Wednesday—Inaugural ceremonies in the new hall; concert at Crosby's Opera House in the evening. Thursday—Excursion on the lake, on the steamer "Planet"; grand banquet at the Chamber of Commerce in the evening. Friday—Delegates, escorted by committees, visited the Stock-Yards and other notable features of the city; grand ball at the Chamber of Commerce in the evening.

Delegations came from Portland, Boston, New York,

Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Albany, Troy, Oswego, Buffalo, Canada, Milwaukee, Louisville, St. Louis, Indianapolis, New Orleans, Memphis, Natchez and Cairo—the aggregate number of invited guests entertained exceeding six hundred. The columns of the newspapers of the day were crowded with the accounts of the magnificent reception, inaugural ceremonies, ball, concert, excursion and banquet. It was the most prolonged and successful season of festivities ever seen in the West.

At eleven o'clock, the assemblage was called to order by Charles Randolph, the president of the Board of Trade. The gentlemen chosen to respond for the various States were invited to seats on the rostrum, after which the ceremonies were opened by a prayer offered by Rev. O. H. Tiffany. The order of exercises which followed is given below:

Inaugural address, by Charles Randolph, president of the Board of Trade. Responsive addresses for the several States represented, in the following order:

Maine, S. T. Anderson, of Portland; Massachusetts, J. S. Roper, of Boston; Ohio, W. T. Perkins, of Cincinnati; New York, D. G. Fort, of Oswego; Pennsylvania, J. B. Bankson, of Philadelphia; Michigan, G. V. N. Lathrop, of Detroit; Canada, Adam Brown, of Hamilton; Kentucky, Judge Habbison, of Louisville; Missouri, Mr. Abel, of St. Louis; Indiana, E. B. Martindale, of Indianapolis; Louisiana, John W. Norris, of New Orleans; Tennessee, A. J. Smith, of Memphis; and New York, A. L. Pease, of Troy.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Chamber of Commerce was located on the south-east corner of Washington and LaSalle streets. The building was completed August 28, 1865. It was of cut stone (Athens marble) on the three sides fronting north, east, and west, and of brick on the south side, which faced Calhoun Place. The façade on Washington Street had a frontage of ninety-three feet; the depth, on LaSalle Street and Exchange Place, was one hundred and eighty feet. The main entrance on Washington Street opened upon a corridor on the ground floor, sixteen feet in width, running through the center of the building from north to south, from which opened, on either side, entrances to various business offices which occupied the first story. Underneath the ground floor was a high and well-lighted basement also fitted up for offices, with street entrances on the sides of the building. The façade above the first story was divided into three parts by large quoins projecting boldly from the wall line. The middle space was a circular-topped triple window of plate glass, thirty feet high and twelve feet wide, with architraves and an ornamented keystone, and the side spaces had each two windows similar in style of ornamentation but of smaller dimensions. There were also side entrances to the building from LaSalle Street and Exchange Place, which led to the main corridor and to the stairways of the second story. The whole building was surmounted by a Mansard roof, the extreme height of which was twenty-three feet above the cornice and ninety-nine feet from the basement floor. The cornice was ninety-nine feet from the basement floor. The design was not strictly in accordance with any known style of architecture, the æsthetic element in art being kept in subservience to the practical uses for which the building was planned, and restricted by the economical limitations to the cost of the proposed structure. It was, however, when finished, with one exception, the most pretentious and substantial edifice in the city, and, although severely plain in its outward adornments, was symmetric in its proportions, massive in style and an ornament to the growing city.

The quarters of the Board of Trade were in the second story, which was reached by two iron stairways, five feet wide, at the north end, and another seven feet wide at the south end. Ample offices were fitted up, which occupied a space of thirty-five feet across the south end of the building. The hall was one hundred and forty-three feet long, eighty-seven feet wide, and forty-five feet high from floor to ceiling. The president's desk, was in the center of a dais at the north end of the hall, and across the south end was a gallery or balcony, from which spectators could look down upon the throng below, and from which the secretary was wont to proclaim the markets and make his other official announcements. The hall was well lighted by ten windows on either side and five at the north end, and the walls and ceiling were adorned with frescoes in designs illustrative of the various departments of industry—agriculture, manufactures, commerce, etc. The edifice was heated by steam, and at evening sessions illuminated by ten large reflectors from the ceiling. The total cost of the building, including the lot, was not far from $490,000. The rental paid by the Board was $20,000, and that received for other offices in the building nearly $30,000, per annum.

The several contractors on the work were: Architect, Edward Burling; Draughtsman, E. Baumann; Carpenters, Warwick & Cassidy; Masons, Carter Brothers; Plasterers, Doyle & Johnson; Painters, Milligan & Heath; Heaters, Murray & Gold; Decorators, Jevne & Almini; Iron Work, F. Letz; Gas Fitter, J. Scanlan; Plumber, John Hughes; Roofer, W. Clark; Stone Cutters, Wenthe & Moessinger, E. Walker, J. L. Brainard & Co.

THE LAST WAR PLEDGES REDEEMED.—Although the war had ended at the beginning of the year, the battery and the three Board-of-Trade regiments were not out of the service, and the pledges of support made to the soldiers' families were still to be carried out until the last surviving soldier had been welcomed home.

The 88th was the first to return, and arrived June 13, accompanied by the 89th. Both regiments were publicly received and welcomed at the Chamber of Commerce. Murry Nelson, of the committee of reception, announced their presence and welcomed their return in a short, eloquent speech. Sergeant John Cheever, with the flag that first floated from Mission Ridge, was received with a wild and enthusiastic burst of applause. Colonel Charles T. Hotchkiss responded for the 89th. Speeches followed by Governor Oglesby and Senator Yates, after which the two regiments were entertained by banquets—the 88th at Metropolitan Hall, under the charge of a Board of Trade committee; the 89th at the Soldiers' Rest, as guests of the railroad men, who had raised the regiment three years before.

The 113th reached Chicago June 22, at one o'clock p. m., too late to be received on 'Change. It marched under escort of the reception committee to Metropolitan Hall, where, after partaking of refreshments, welcoming speeches and responses were made by Murry Nelson, President Randolph, Nelson T. Maple, J. C. Dore, Rev. C. H. Fowler, Colonel John L. Hancock, Judge J. B. Bradwell and others.

The Board-of-Trade Battery arrived in Chicago, Tuesday, June 28. It was met by the reception committee of the Board of Trade at Michigan City, and welcomed home at three o'clock a. m., with cannon and music, and shouts from thousands of people, who had patiently waited its coming nearly all night. The formal reception on 'Change occurred at noon. The veterans bore with them their battle-flag, glorious with the record of their valiant service. On it, were emblazoned, "Stone River," "Elk River," "Chickamauga," "Farmington," "Dallas," "Noon Day Creek," "Kenesaw Mountain," "Atlanta," "Nashville," "Salem" and "Macon." Addresses of welcome were made by President Randolph and Colonel John L. Hancock, to which there were short responses by Captain George I. Robinson, Lieutenants J. H. Stephens and T. D. Griffin, Sergeants Durand and Adams and Privates Odell and McClellan.

The reception closed by the election, on motion of P. L. Underwood, of "all the boys who had honorably served in the battery, as honorary members of the Board of Trade of Chicago." In the evening, the members of the battery were again welcomed and entertained at Metropolitan Hall, by a grand dinner, given by the Board. The memorable feast was lavish, brilliant and sumptuous beyond precedent in affairs of the kind.

The 72d was the last to return. It arrived on Saturday, August 12, at one o'clock p. m. The soldiers were honored with a reception and banquet given by the Board at Bryan Hall, which was on a scale of magnificence fully equal to the reception given the battery.

During the closing months of the year, the members of the Board finished their glorious and patriotic work, by bearing from distant Southern graves, the remains of those of the battery who had fallen in the strife, and placing them in a common resting-place at Rosehill

THE YEAR 1866-67.

The eighteenth annual meeting was held April 2, 1866. The membership reported was one thousand four hundred and one—a decrease of sixty-one during the past year, which was attributable in part to the increased assessment. The officers elected for the current year were: John C. Dore, president; P. L. Underwood and E. W. Densmore, vice-presidents. Owing to the extraordinary expenses incurred in opening and furnishing the new hall, and the continued war expenses, the treasury, for the first time since the Board was fairly established, showed a serious deficit, as appears in the following summary of the directors' annual fiscal report:

Total receipts from all sources.....	$74,129 39
Total expenditures.....	76,035 86
Liabilities outstanding were:
Due the Treasurer for advances.....	$2,569 75
Due Chamber of Commerce, one quar- ter's rent, to April 1.....	5,000 00
Due proportion of heating expenses to April 1.....	1,200 00
	<hr/>
	$8,769 75
Cash in hands of secretary.....	663 28
	<hr/>
Net deficit.....	$8,106 47

The principal items of extraordinary expense which had brought the Board in arrears were:

Expenses incurred on account of regiments and battery.....	$3,692 75
Reception of regiments and battery.....	2,427 50
Expenses of bringing home, and funeral of, members of the battery.....	2,349 96
Curbing and improving cemetery lot.....	1,033 00
	<hr/>
Total war expense.....	$9,503 21
Furniture for new hall and offices.....	7,915 67
Expenses of opening new hall.....	$19,807 45
Less collected from tickets and subscriptions.....	15,566 00
	<hr/>
	4,241 45
Expenses attending ceremonies of respect to the late President Lincoln, draping hall, etc.,	217 25

On August 27, the Board evinced its interest in extraneous commercial projects by appropriating $500 toward the expense of the survey of a canal route from the Illinois & Michigan Canal to the Mississippi River, at Rock Island.

In December, an effort was made, which was quite generally supported by the Boards of Trade throughout the country, to establish the cental system for the measurement of grain. By the old method, unhappily still in practice, the bushel was the unit of measure in all purchases of grain, although the weight required for a bushel varied not only on different varieties of grain, but on the same variety, as established by custom or law in the different States. The advantages of the new system proposed, if once established, were obvious, as it would not only simplify the process of computation, but bring it in harmony with the system of measurement adopted at Liverpool, as well as the decimal system of monetary computation of the United States. The Boards of Trade in Milwaukee, Detroit, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, all passed resolutions agreeing to adopt the new system on January 1, 1867. The Chicago Board passed a like resolution on December 10. Owing to a want of co-operation in New York and other Eastern markets, the proposed reform was not effected.

On December 20, the Board passed resolutions against the too rapid contraction of the volume of currency, as it involved so great and sudden a depreciation in the value of commodities as to threaten widespread business disaster.

A LAW AGAINST SHORT SELLING.—During the session of the Legislature, a bill, known as the Warehouse Act, was introduced and subsequently passed, which, during the months of January and February, was the chief topic of discussion on 'Change. It provided for the proper storage of grain in the warehouses, forbade discrimination in receiving from different roads, and otherwise put the whole business more directly within the purview of the law than before.

THE YEAR 1867-68.

The nineteenth annual meeting was held April 1, 1867. The membership reported was one thousand two hundred and fifty-nine—a decrease of one hundred and forty-three during the year. The annual assessment for the ensuing year was fixed by the directors at $35. The officers elected were: Wiley M. Egan, president; Lyman Blair and C. B. Goodyear, vice-presidents. The following is the summary of the annual fiscal report:

Actual indebtedness at the beginning of the year.....	$ 9,212 16
Total receipts.....	94,864 69
Total disbursement, including payment of the old deficit.....	96,693 74
Net deficit.....	1,829 05

The president reported that the commercial committee, appointed the year before, had thus far failed of its object, as, owing to the large number of its members (twenty-one) selected to represent as many important interests, and their being widely scattered, it had been difficult to get a quorum together for the transaction of business. It was, therefore, recommended that the number constituting the committee remain the same, but that five instead of eleven should constitute a quorum. It was accordingly so voted by the Board.

THE OBNOXIOUS WAREHOUSE BILL.—At the annual meeting, the obnoxious features of the warehouse bill, which defined the selling of grain for future delivery, unless it was at the time actually owned by the seller or his agent, as gambling, came up for consideration. The species of trading thus made a misdemeanor, and punishable by what was deemed an excessive fine, constituted more than half the business daily transacted on 'Change. This attempt to eliminate an acknowledged and growing evil from the legitimate trade, threatened to go far towards destroying the trade itself. Moreover, the Board had, so far as it possessed the power, distinctly recognized short selling as one of the legitimate forms of trade, by laying down specific rules as to margins, penalties for non-fulfillment, etc. The law, to say the least, was an innovation on all former commercial usage, and calculated to bring the business of the Board, as then conducted, into disrepute. It was not deemed either wise or consistent with the dignity of the Board to openly defy the law until its validity had been tested in the courts, certainly not without legal advice. It was, therefore, voted to obtain the written opinion of Messrs. Arrington & Dent, counselors at law, as to the constitutionality of the various sections of the bill, as a preliminary to further action. Awaiting the opinion, the members of the Board did considerable trading in defiance of the law, without molestation. In June, Messrs. Arrington & Dent, after long and careful consideration, gave, as their opinion, that the section made to prohibit gambling sales was unconstitutional and void, as to business on the Board. Their argument, on which they based the opinion, was elaborate, and carried conviction to the minds of the members, with whose preconceived opinions the result of their examination so exactly accorded. Thus fortified, the law was, without further action on the part of the Board, treated as a dead letter by the members, and short selling, the putting up of margins, and the bringing of delinquents before the Board of Arbitration, went on as though no statute had designated the business as "gambling." The reward (half the fine) offered to any person prosecuting and convicting offenders, however, at last developed a champion, who undertook its vindication, it was charged, as a business venture.

Whatever his motive, he was sufficiently earnest in his convictions to open a most vigorous and unexpected onslaught on the dealers in option contracts and margins in the face of the forbidding statute. The name of the self-appointed vindicator was Daniel A. Goodrich. Little can be ascertained as to his antecedents—nothing that would be to his prejudice, or lead to the belief that he was not up to the average standard as to morality, respectability and ability. He had been at one time a lawyer, and was at this time the senior partner of the firm of Goodrich & Moulton. The name of Mr. Goodrich did not appear on the records as a member of the Board of Trade, but he procured a visitor's ticket, which gave him admission to the rooms. The result of his observations, while thus a favored guest, were developed on the following Saturday, August 10.

On this date, a constable appeared on the floor of the Chamber, with warrants for the arrest of nine members of the Board, on the charge of gambling. When the object of his mission was made known, B. P. Hutchinson suggested an easy way of making the arrests. He said, if the constable would but read out the names, he would call the parties together. By this time nearly all the attendants on the Board had grouped themselves around the constable, who proceeded to call the accused parties into the ring. Seven of them answered to the call. These were Charles B. Pope, B. P. Hutchinson, John J. Richards, William J. Scheik, Howard Priestly, A. Eichhold and Don Carlo Scranton. Amid many tender adieux they parted from their fellow members; not, however, until these had escorted them to hacks employed to convey them to the North Side. Those who were left behind cheered them on their way; and, in a few minutes, the whole party, accompanied by several of their friends, found themselves in the office of a justice of the peace. When it was learned that the complainant was none other than the young lawyer, Goodrich, the members indulged in a great many sarcastic observations at his expense. Mr. Goodrich, who was present, made no reply to the miscellaneous abuse heaped upon him, but sturdily maintained that his only object in causing the arrests to be made was to vindicate the law.

After the preliminary examinations had been made, the defendants signed each other's bonds, and the case went over to the Recorder's Court. The party then returned to the Chamber of Commerce, where they were received with cheers. Later in the day E. K. Bruce, C. B. Goodyear, George J. Brine and George M. How were also arrested and taken before the justice, where they furnished bonds to appear before the Recorder's Court. At the request of George J. Brine, Mr. Goodrich, the complainant, was also held in bonds of $3,000 to compel his attendance in court as a witness for the prosecution.

On August 14, a special meeting of the Board was held to take such action in regard to the recent arrests as the case might seem to demand. The result of the deliberations appears in resolutions, offered by Mr. Charles Randolph, and adopted, after discussion and amendment, by the Board. The resolutions declared that the members could see no wrong in, and recognized no moral difference between, transactions on 'Change and other transactions where property was delivered at the time of sale; and that the Board would, in future, as in the past, stamp with its condemnation and disapproval any and all acts of its members not in accordance with the recognized principles of commercial integrity. The directors were requested to procure counsel to defend members charged with violating the obnoxious provisions of the Warehouse Act.

The cases against the members never came to trial. The prosecution broke down, not on the merits of the case, but from the stress of impecuniosity, the complainant being unable to furnish the bonds required for his appearance as prosecutor and witness in the Recorder's Court, to which the cases were sent for trial.

There was no further attempt made to prosecute violators of the law; and, although it was decided by the courts to be constitutional, it was tacitly understood to be unmercantile in its spirit and scope, and was accordingly treated as a nullity until the convening of the next Legislature, when the obnoxious sections were repealed.

POWER TO SUSPEND MEMBERS AFFIRMED BY THE COURT.—On May 14, 1867, James P. Page sold to Stevers & Brown a quantity of corn, deliverable at the option of the seller, at any time thereafter during the month, both parties to the transaction being members of the Board of Trade. On the 21st of the month, corn having materially advanced in price, Page offered to settle the contract by the payment of $500, which offer having been accepted, he paid to Stevers & Brown $100 in money and gave his note, payable on demand, for $400, in settlement. Page failing to pay the note when demanded, Stevers & Brown made a complaint to the Board of Directors, before whom Page made answer, admitting the indebtedness, but stating his inability to pay. Thereupon the Board made an order in accordance with the fifth by-law, suspending him from the privileges of the Board.

Page made application to the Circuit Court of Cook County for a mandamus, to compel the Board to annul the order suspending him, and restore him to full membership; affirming in his petition that he had no corn at the time he contracted to deliver it to Stevers & Brown, and that the trade being illegal and void, under the provisions of the Warehouse Act, the Board could not legally recognize it by prescribing a penalty for non-fulfillment. The petition was dismissed, and went to the Supreme Court on an appeal. Opinion was rendered May 12, affirming the judgment of the lower court, which had sustained the Board in its act of suspension, but giving no decision, as had been expected, on the constitutionality of the Warehouse Act.

NATIONAL COMMERCIAL CONVENTION.—Pursuant to a call from the Boston Board of Trade, a National Commercial Convention was held in Boston, on February 5, 1868. The growing importance of the trade organizations at the various commercial centers, as gatherers and disseminators of facts on which to base legislation, had come to be widely felt; and this convention had been called with a view of inaugurating a system of concerted action among the commercial bodies of the country. The convention was attended by delegations of Boards of Trade and commercial associations from every important city in the country. The Chicago Board of Trade sent a representative delegation. The topics considered were:

First, The improvement of inland transportation, including rivers and canals.

Second, The restoration of our foreign trade and shipping interests, including the organization and subsidy of ocean steamship lines.

Third, The relief of our manufacturing and other great producing interests by reducing the burden of taxation.

Fourth, The adjustment of the National finances and currency upon a basis more favorable to stability in values and the free movement of capital.

Fifth, The adoption of the cental, or some other uniform system, for the measurement of grain.

Sixth, The speedy construction of the North Pacific Railroad.

Seventh, The organization of a National Board of Trade.

To the above was added, by a special resolution of the convention,

Eighth, The agriculture and manufactures of the country, and the promotion and the protection of these great national interests.

The subjects above named were thoroughly discussed and reports adopted, and memorials drawn for presentation to Congress, giving the result of the deliberations on such subjects as required national legislation. It was decided to organize a National Board of Trade, and the Commercial Convention adjourned, to report to a delegate convention to be held the following year, at Philadelphia.

THE YEAR 1868-69.

The twentieth annual meeting was held Monday April 6, 1868. The membership was reported at one thousand two hundred and twenty-four—a decrease of thirty-five during the year.* The polls were open for the election of officers from 10 o'clock a. m. to 4 p. m. It was one of the liveliest elections ever held. In addition to the two leading tickets in the field, headed by E. V. Robbins and J. M. Richards, there were a dozen independent tickets, got up to enliven the occasion. Among the outside tickets, one creating great amusement was termed the "anti-gong" ticket. Among the operators who were daily "gonged" out of the hall at the close of business hours the ticket found many supporters.

The election resulted in the choice of E. V. Robbins as president, by a vote of three hundred and seventy-six as against three hundred and sixty-one votes cast for J. M. Richards. The vice-presidents chosen were E. K. Bruce and J. G. Cole. The election throughout was characterized by great spirit and general good nature.

The report of the directors summarized the financial affairs as follows:

Total receipts for the year.....	$102,260 18
Total disbursements, including payment of deficit of year before .....	86,974 60
Balance on hand.....	$15,285 58

The amount received for grain inspection was $49,592.20; expenses of inspection, $42,053.64; profit derived from inspection, $7,538.56. Among the minor items of expenditure, was $1,000, paid to the "Widow's and Orphan's Fund."

With the deficit of the past two years extinguished, and a large surplus in the treasury, the directors deemed it good policy to reduce the annual assessment from $35 to $30.

The directors were authorized to nominate to the full Board twice the number of delegates to which the Board was entitled in the National Board of Trade, from which the members were to choose the requisite number.

ACTION ON SHORT-WEIGHT CARGOES.—Serious dissatisfaction had arisen on the part of shippers and vessel owners, on account of the discrepancy in weight on cargoes of wheat, as shipped from Chicago elevators and as received at the Eastern ports of destination. At a convention of ship-owners, held in Cleveland, it was recommended as a remedy for the evil, that all Boards of Trade and similar organizations, at all shipping points, be requested to appoint weighers of cargoes, whose duty it should be to weigh all cargoes of grain in and out of the vessels carrying the same. With a view to bringing the proposition before the Chicago Board at the annual meeting, on motion of Murry Nelson, a committee of fifteen was appointed to consider the matter and report at a future meeting. The committee was to consist of three shippers, three elevator owners, three bankers, three carriers, and three grain receivers, and should they report favorably on the project, the directors were to nominate suitable persons for the new position, who were to be appointed by the president.

*The directors erroneously reported an increase of twenty-three members during the year. They had based the income of the year before on a membership of 1,200, but the actual number reported was 1,259.

The committee, at a business meeting, held April 14, submitted majority and minority reports. The minority report was signed by H. K. Elkins and R. P. Richards, and recommended the appointment of weigh-masters for the purposes named, in order, if possible, to protect shippers thoroughly as to quantity received, as they were by the system of inspection as to quality. The majority report was signed by B. P. Hutchinson, Charles Randolph, C. S. Hutchins, J. W. Preston, S. H. McCrea, Ira Y. Munn and T. N. Bond. It reported, as the sense of the committee, that it would be inexpedient for the Board of Trade to assume the appointment of weighers of grain in the elevators of the city; but earnestly recommended to the vessel interests of the city the appointment, under their own auspices, of competent men at each elevator of receiving and delivery, whose duty it should be to fully understand the construction of the elevators to which they were severally assigned, and attend personally to the weighing and delivery and receiving of all cargoes of grain. It further reported a resolution, that "If any elevators in the city are so constructed that grain, after being weighed for the vessel, can, by any possibility, be returned to the house, the proprietors of such elevators be requested to so alter their houses, in this regard, that the several weighmen may know positively that when grain is once weighed for the vessel it must certainly go on board."

The minority report was laid on the table, and so much of the majority report as is above summarized was adopted.

THE SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.—The question of erecting a soldiers' monument was revived at the annual meeting, and it was—

"Resolved, That the board of directors be requested to set apart from the funds now in the treasury, the sum of $5,000, to be paid over to a committee to be appointed, two from this Board and three from the citizens or other organizations, when other subscriptions to at least the same amount are collected by said committee. The said committee of five to be empowered to appropriate such funds to the completion of a monument upon the grounds indicated by the proposition of the Rosehill Cemetery Company, to the Board, on the 4th of November, 1863; provided, that no money shall be expended by such committees for personal services of themselves in connection with the erection of said monument."

The resolution was adopted, with but one dissenting voice. This action of the Board involved the creation of a new Committee on Cemetery. The members were announced at a subsequent meeting. They were J. W. Preston, George Field and S. H. McCrea.

SPECULATION had, under the excitement of the war, the derangement of values, and the constantly recurring fluctuations, become a prominent factor in the business of the Board. The bulk of the sales of grain were made with no expectation, on the part of settlers, to make an actual delivery of the property sold, and with as little idea on the part of buyers of receiving it. Indeed, there were few dealers in grain who could liquidate, by actual receipt and delivery, the volume of their transactions for a single day. This year is memorable as the year of corners. It, for the first time since the war closed, brought all those engaged in the business to a realizing sense of the truth, that there was an actual basis of property underneath every trade; and that to sell what one did not possess was fraught with as much danger as to buy what one could not pay for. In 1867, as has been recounted, the evil of short-selling had culminated in a statute, defining it as gambling, which, although not yet repealed, was a dead letter in the statute book. This year the grievance to the trade was not so apparent in short selling as in long buying; for, under skillful management, the market had been successfully cornered, and prices unnaturally forced above their natural level, much to the disgust and pecuniary embarrassment of the short sellers, who numerically were in the ascendant on the Board. Scarcely a month had elapsed, since New Year's day, without a corner on 'Change. Three on wheat, two on corn, one on oats, and one attempted on rye, and the year threatened to go out with a tremendous corner on the products of hog-packing—technically known as provisions. It is unnecessary, in this connection, to give a specific account of the various corners alluded to. Wheat was successfully cornered in June. The price started at $1.77 per bushel, and culminated at three p. m., June 30, at $2.20. The price in New York, on the same day, was $2.02, and fell in Chicago, immediately after the corner collapsed, to $1.85; and continued to rule below that price for weeks thereafter. The other corners during the summer were not so severely felt by the bears, nor so disastrous to them in their results, but were getting so inconveniently frequent as to call for action on the part of the Board. Accordingly, October 13, the Board of Trade adopted resolutions providing for the expulsion of members engaging in corners, under Rule V, which designated what were considered improper and fraudulent transactions.

Soon after the passage of this resolution, another corner was run on No. 1 corn. At the beginning of November, the price was 77 cents per bushel; it gradually advanced in price to 95 cents, on the 21st of the month, when it was discovered that the market was cornered, and that the corn was virtually in the possession of a single firm and a syndicate of their friends. The syndicate ran the price up to $1.08, on the last day of the month. The price in New York on that day was $1.14, and on the succeeding day fell to 80 cents in Chicago.

Many leading firms of undoubted credit and untarnished business reputation were caught in the corner; but, contrary to expectation, refused to settle their deals at the price demanded. Among the firms who rebelled against the extortion, were Murry Nelson & Co., W. H. Lunt, Eli Johnson & Co., Spruance, Preston & Co., and others. It was determined by them to submit a test case to the Board of Arbitrators, the delinquents depending on the resolution recently passed for a vindication. The case was brought by Priestly & Co., who had engineered the corner, against Murry Nelson & Co.

The case, as presented, was, that Nelson & Co. sold, on the 16th of November, for delivery during the month, to Priestly & Co., five thousand bushels of No. 1 corn, at 78 cents a bushel. On the last day of the month, they found it impossible to purchase the said corn, except from Priestly & Co., or parties acting in concert with them, and the nominal price for settlement had been set by them at $1.08 per bushel. Nelson & Co. offered to settle the contract on the basis of ninety cents, which offer was refused, and the difference was brought before the Board.

That it was, under the rules, a technical default of contract, was a fact not in dispute by the litigants; but it was claimed that the contract had been vitiated by act of the purchasers in forcing the price to an extortionate figure, contrary to the resolution so recently passed condemnatory of such transactions. After a full hearing of the case, and arguments, it was decided against Nelson & Co.; and they were, on December 15, notified that, unless, within ten days, they should effect a settlement with Priestly & Co., of the difference awarded, they would, in accordance with the by-laws, be suspended from the privileges of the Board.

On or before the expiration of the ten days, Messrs. Nelson & Co. obtained from the Circuit Court an injunction upon the Board, its president and secretary, forbidding them from carrying out the threatened expulsion. The case was thus carried into the courts, and, pending a decision, held in abeyance by the Board. It was finally decided that the resolution did not amend the rule, under which the Board had a right to expel any member who, for violation of contract or other cause therein named, might be subject to such discipline.

The year ended in a most successful corner on pork and lard. It could not, perhaps, be strictly termed a corner, so much as a general concentration of the entire product in strong hands, that controlled the price thereafter for the season. Unlike the corners in grain, there was no culmination at the close of any month which was followed by such marked decline as to show that the deal was engineered for local speculative purposes, although short sellers of provisions suffered no less than had their unfortunate brethren in the grain trade. The packing season opened under discouraging conditions. There was no speculative demand for provisions in any form, and the whole market was lifeless. It seemed to the best observers, that only lower prices could put any life into the trade. The packers themselves took that view, and sold largely short on their prospective products, at quite low figures. They were joined by many short sellers having like views of the situation. The result was, that during November, and the early part of December, the market became alarmingly short; the shortage being stated at 30,000 bbls. of mess pork, on December 12, at an average of $24 a bbl. Lard had been also largely sold ahead, at from 13½ and 14 cents. The packers already short found an unexpected demand for their products in December, at prices above the average of the short sales they had made, and became bidders in the open market for their own products. It thus happened that prices were rapidly advanced during the latter part of December—on mess pork $3 a bbl. and on lard 3 cents a pound. The lard and pork was, at the close of the year, in the control of one or two packing firms, and held by them until finally disposed of, there being no serious break in prices below the figures at which the shorts were forced to settle, until the season was over. It could not, therefore, be termed a speculative corner, gotten up for local profit, so much as a combination of packers to protect their own legitimate products from what they deemed an unnatural depression. The average price of the short sales of mess pork made in November, and early in December, was not above $23.50, and the settlements were made at an average of $28.50, on January 1, 1869. During the succeeding months, prices never fell off; reaching $33 a bbl. in January, $33.25 in February, and $32.25 in March. Lard was sold short in November and December at 13 and 14 cents, and settled in January at 17 and 18 cents. The range thereafter was for January, February and March, 18 and 20½ cents. In the eyes of the short sellers who had suffered, however, the deal on pork was out of the legitimate range of trade, and was classed with the many corners on grain that had resulted so much to their discomfiture during the year. The result was, that the Board, in the revision of the by-laws at the close of the fiscal year, enacted a specific rule calculated to protect adverse interests against corners. It reads as follows:

Rule XIII.—Whenever any member of this Board shall claim that the fulfillment of his contract is interfered with by the existence of a "corner," the President of the Board shall, upon the application of any party to such contract, appoint a committee of three disinterested members of the Board, who shall decide as to the existence of a "corner," and if they find that a "corner" existed at the time of the maturity of the contract, such contract shall be settled on the basis of actual value as compared with other property of the same kind, but of a different grade in this market, and with property of the same grade in other markets—such value to be ascertained, as near as may be, and the price to be fixed, by a majority of such committee.

Pending the test suit of Priestly & Co. vs. Murry Nelson & Co., the Board had evidently settled itself in the conviction that both extremes of speculation—over-selling and over-buying—were subjects to be regulated, since the roots were too deep to be eradicated. The by-laws at that time in force recognized short selling as legitimate, by providing for the putting up of margins on such sales, and for the discipline of such short sellers as should default on the settlement of their contracts. The buyers of property were free to buy up to the point where Rule XIII could be enforced.

While these events were in progress new members continued to join the Board. Among the number were those whose sketches are herewith presented.

CYRUS H. ADAMS, son of Hugh and Amanda J. Adams, and nephew of Cyrus H. McCormick, was born at Kerr's Creek, Rockbridge Co., Va., February 21, 1849, and moved to Chicago with his father's family in 1857. After studying at the University of Chicago, he entered the office of the grain commission firm of C. H. McCormick & Co., in 1867. This firm was established in 1859, by Cyrus H. McCormick and Hugh Adams. Cyrus H. Adams was admitted to the firm as partner, and the name was changed to McCormick, Adams & Co., in 1872. Hugh Adams was a native of Virginia—a successful merchant there and in Chicago—a man of the highest integrity, of unblemished character; who died respected by all who knew him, in March, 1880, leaving a widow and a family of eight children, of whom Cyrus H. was the third. After his death, the firm was continued by Cyrus H. McCormick and Cyrus H. Adams, under the same firm name, until the death of Cyrus H. McCormick, in May, 1884. The business was then succeeded by the present firm of Cyrus H. Adams & Co., composed of Cyrus H. Adams, Hugh L. Adams and Edward S. Adams, brothers. Cyrus H. has been a member of the Board of Trade since 1869, and for seven successive years, during that time, served the Board of Trade in official capacities; first, as a member of the Arbitration Committee; second, as director; and, third, as member of Committee of Appeals. He has twice, since retiring from the Committee of Appeals, been urged to accept candidacy for office of president of the Board, but declined on account of pressure of private business. He is the author of many of the most important rules governing the intricate and vast business of the Board, and has perhaps done as much toward simplifying and perfecting its system of trading, and rules governing same, as any other member. The firm, of which he is now senior member, is one of the largest established houses in the trade, and is well regarded. Cyrus H. Adams was married to Miss Emma J. Blair, daughter of Lyman Blair, on September 26, 1873; they have one child, a boy, who bears the name of his father.

JAMES M. BALL was born in Sheffield, England, in 1845. Eight years later his parents emigrated to America, and he was reared at Dixon, Ill. After leaving school he was, for a short time, employed as a clerk in a general store. In the summer of 1862, when but seventeen years of age, he enlisted in Battery "F," 1st Illinois Volunteer Infantry. In June, 1864, he was promoted to second lieutenant, 3d United States Colored Artillery; in February, 1865, promoted to first lieutenant, made captain in the following July, and early in 1866 was brevetted major serving until mustered out, June 30, 1866. Mr. Ball recuperated for a short time at his home in Dixon, and on the first day of January, 1867, came to Chicago and entered the employ of Winans, Matthews & Co., commission merchants. In 1868, the concern changed to Matthews, Zollars & Co., he being admitted as a partner, and in 1869, to Matthews & Ball. This firm did a large and successful business and was well and favorably known to the trade. In May, 1883, they dissolved, and Mr. Ball established the present firm of J. M. Ball & Co. The subject of this sketch has been a member of the Board of Trade since 1868, and has been largely interested in the management of its affairs. He was a member of the Committee of Arbitration during 1879-80, a member of the Committee of Appeals during 1881-82, and was one of the Board of Directors from January, 1883 to 1885. Mr. Ball is also a member of the Chicago Stock Exchange, and one of the governing committee of that institution. He is one of the directors of the Board of Trade Telegraph Company, and was for two years its treasurer. He is also a member of the Union League Club, and for a year was one of its membership committee.

GEORGE C. BALL, grain commission merchant, is a native of Sheffield, England, born on February 28, 1847. He came to America with his parents, Joseph and Caroline (Carnel) Ball, in 1853, and, after stopping a couple of years in the city of New York, settled in Dixon, Ill., where his mother died in September, 1870, and his father in April, 1871. At the tender age of eight, he entered the stationery store of James Mead, in Dixon, and subsequently that of J. B. Pomeroy, where he remained until December, 1862. Although but thirteen years old, he then enlisted as a bugler in Co. "D," 1st Illinois Light Artillery—McAllister's Battery—but was very soon detailed as private orderly for General Frank P. Blair, and followed his fortunes until honorably discharged in June, 1864. He then came to Chicago, and entered Eastman's business college, completing the course, and receiving his diploma, in the incredibly short period of six weeks. Such was his proficiency, that he was at once engaged as teacher of the First Theory Department, but subsequently took charge of the stationery and advertising, in which he was engaged when he was offered the position of cashier of the Rockford Insurance Company, at Rockford.

III. He accepted this offer, and remained with that company until 1870, when he entered the office of Matthews & Ball (J. M. Ball, his brother), on the Board of Trade. He subsequently took charge of the books of the registry department of the Board, which he resigned to take a place in the office of C. H. McCormick & Co. In 1875, he started an independent commission house, with N. B. Ream as partner. The name and style of the firm was George C. Ball & Co., and continued until 1878, when Mr. Ream withdrew, and C. J. Singer took his place, changing the firm to Singer & Ball. After about eight months they dissolved, and Mr. Ball has followed the commission business alone, to the present time. He has been a member of the Board of Trade since 1871, and served on the Committee of Arbitration two years. He is a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M. He is a Republican in politics, and a member of the Young Men's Republican Club; also a member of the Chicago Club. He was married January 27, 1875, to Carrie Woodruff, the daughter of Jackson Woodruff, of Chicago, and has had two children, Woodruff and Marie.

JONATHAN ABEL is president of the Phoenix Distilling Company, and for seventeen years has been an honored member of the Board of Trade. Mr. Abel was born in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., December 4, 1832, and received his education and early business training in his native place. In 1857, he caught the western fever, came to Illinois, settled at Sandwich, and engaged in the lumber business; which he successfully carried on for two years, when he disposed of his interests in that line, and entered the drug trade in the same village, in which he remained eight years. While a resident of Sandwich, he became a member of Meteor Lodge, No. 283, A. F. & A. M., and Sandwich Chapter, No. 107, R. A. M. In 1868, he came to Chicago, and purchased Colonel Wheeler's interest in the firm of Dickinson, Leach & Co., distillers. The great fire of 1871 swept away their distillery on Indiana Street, on the North Side, and their rectifying house on Wells Street. After the fire, the firm bought the distilling interests of Thomas Hollihan & Co., which constitutes the present business of the company. George T. Burroughs, now vice-president, was at that time, admitted into the firm. Two years after Wilson Ames and B. W. Kendall bought the interest of E. C. Leach, and a stock company was formed, under the name of the Phoenix Distilling Company, of which Mr. Kendall is the present secretary, and Wilson Ames treasurer. The company own a large distillery and warehouse at Clybourn-street bridge. The magnitude of their business places them in the front rank of their line in the city. In 1884, their transactions amounted to over two and one-half millions of dollars. Mr. Abel became a member of the Board of Trade in 1869, holding certificate No. 4, and has been connected with it ever since.

EDWARD W. BANGS, a member of the well-known firm of John T. Lester & Co., was born near the city of Rochester, N. Y., on January 9, 1844. He left school at the age of fifteen, and entered his brother's store in Bangor, Me. In 1861, when seventeen years old, he enlisted in the 3d New York Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Simon Mix. He was sent to Washington, and fought with his regiment at Shenandoah, North Carolina, New Orleans and Fort Hudson. He accompanied General Nathaniel P. Banks on the miserable fiasco entitled the Red River Expedition, and he was finally mustered out on April 25, 1865. On being discharged, he went to Waterville, Me., and engaged in the flour business with his brother for about one year. He reached Chicago in the spring of 1868, and went into the commission business with J. B. Hobbs, under the firm name of J. B. Hobbs & Co. This lasted for four years, and was dissolved by mutual consent in 1872. In 1875, he began business for himself, and in 1880, found him on the wrong side, and retired him, somewhat financially the worse for wear. He, however, went to work for John T. Lester & Co., and served them faithfully for three years—in the meantime paying up every dollar of his debts. In February, 1884, he was taken into partnership, and is now a very active member of the firm. He has been a member of the Board of Trade since 1869. Mr. Bangs was married on October 22, 1870, to Miss Louisa Bodfish, and has one son, Edward.

EDWARD H. NOYES was born in Brattleboro', Vt., September 18, 1844, and came to Chicago in the spring of 1864, and entered the employment of Sherman, Hall & Pope, with whom he remained for two and one-half years. He subsequently entered the employment of P. S. Sinkey & Co., with whom he also staid for two years and a half. He then, in 1869, embarked in business on his own account as junior partner in the firm of Chandler, Pomeroy & Noyes, staying with that firm for a little over two years, and then selling out his interest therein. The firm of Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. succeeded the firm of which Mr. Noyes was a member, and about six months after he left, in the year 1872, it failed. Meantime he had been conducting a successful business on his own individual account, and, in 1875, became junior partner in the firm of Peck & Noyes. In 1878, he was a member of Underwood, Noyes & Co., and in August, 1879, established the firm of E. H. Noyes & Co.; he has continued that firm in the grain shipping business since that time. Not alone, however, in this firm, but throughout all his business connection and association, Mr. Noyes has maintained an enviable record for integrity and scrupulous observance of all contracts made by him. Strict attention to business, and honesty in its conduct, has resulted in an excellent connection, and one which is constantly increasing. Mr. Noyes was married, on August 8, 1870, to Mary Cornelia Hamilton, and has three children—Edward Hamilton, William Horatio, and Albert Chandler. He has never held any office on the Board of Trade, but has been a member since 1869.

A. G. ASHLEY, the senior member of the hay and grain commission house of Ashley & Co., is a son of a farmer, Hiram Ashley, who settled in Richmond, N. Y., and married Polly Gilbert, of that place. He is the second son of a family of four boys and two girls, and was born in Richmond, Ontario Co., N. Y., April 15, 1832, whether his father removed when he was but four years old. His father was one of the solid farmers of Western New York, and a man of note among his neighbors. He was sent to the State Legislature in 1849, and served a term in Congress in 1854. Augustus G. Ashley, besides the early advantages of the public schools, received all the assistance that could be rendered by private institutions of a higher grade; and after spending one year at Palmyra, one at Canandaigua, and two at Lima College, graduated at the latter institution when nineteen years of age. On leaving college, he bought a half interest in a drug store in Nunda, Livingston Co., N. Y., on the Genesee Valley Canal. There he married, on January 24, 1858, Miss A. L. Spencer, sister of Charles L. Spencer, his present partner; and there he spent fourteen years in the drug business. Two of his children were born there—two sons; and his two daughters were born respectively at Belvidere and Chicago. It was not till failing health admonished him that the atmosphere of a drug store was slowly undermining his constitution, that he sold out his business and came West. For a single year—from the fall of 1862, when he first came West, to the fall of 1863—he ran a drug store in Belvidere, Ill., where he first settled. But his health still failing, he abandoned the business permanently, and came to Chicago in 1863. At that time, there was but one hay-press doing business in the city, and most of the hay consumed here was delivered in bulk from farmers' wagons. He at once engaged in the hay and grain commission business, put up a warehouse and hay-press on West Madison Street, at the corner of Morgan, which was at that time away out of town,—and took an office at No. 4 Market Street. He shortly afterward erected a large warehouse on the river, just below Rush-street bridge. He was at once in possession of a flourishing business, and soon had all he could do. He placed hay presses in various parts of the country tributary to Chicago, and at one time bought every ton of hay procurable in this region. He had an undeniable corner on hay; and consumers at the Stock-Yards had to pay $36 a ton for hay which cost him but $73. Since then, he has kept the lead in his line, and has shipped hay to California, Liverpool, London, South America, Cuba, and all parts of the Southern States, besides furnishing the copper and lumber regions of Lake Superior large quantities for many years. His home trade has grown from three car-loads of pressed hay a day to thirty. He lost heavily in the great fire, getting only $73 on policies covering $17,000, all in home companies. Two years ago (1882) he was one of the pioneers in the organization of the Gurney Cab Co., L. B. and M. S. Starkweather, with himself, forming the company. On Christmas of that year, they put five cabs on the street; now they have forty-six running, and one hundred and eighteen horses at work. Mr. Ashley is a member of Dr. Kittredge's Church, and belongs to the Presbyterian Union Club. He has been a member of the Board of Trade since 1869, and has served on the Arbitration Committee for one term.

THE YEAR 1869-70.

The twenty-first annual meeting and election was held Monday, April 5, 1869. The membership reported was one thousand two hundred and eighty-seven—an increase of sixty-three members during the year. The election resulted in the choice of J. M. Richards as president, and S. H. McCrea for first vice-president. None of the candidates for second vice-president received a majority of the votes cast; there was consequently no choice.

Following is a summary of the annual fiscal report :

Total receipts from all sources.....	$95,502 73
Total disbursements.....	95,271 60
Surplus assets.....	17,213 35

Among the items of expenditure were: For repairs on the hall, $7,628.80; assessment on account of the National Board of Trade, $1,648.92; legal expenses, $456.50; for appropriation to the Packers' Association, part expenses incurred in investigating the Texas cattle disease and in procuring State legislation on the same, $750; also the expenses of a banquet given to members of the Wisconsin and Minnesota boards. The cost of grain inspection for the year was $46,147.89; the receipts from the same amounted to $47,370.56.

Colonel Beaty having resigned as secretary, Charles Randolph was selected to succeed him.

Rule XVI was so amended as to raise the initiation fee for membership to $25.

The directors, in the annual report, made reference to their success in settling all cases coming before them for adjudication, except that of Priestly & Co. vs. Nelson & Co. In reference to this case, the report was as follows:

"Your directors regret feeling obliged to enforce contracts of that nature, yet we find no rules or by-laws of the association that will release a member on his contract, even when caught in a 'corner'; and we recommend the continued prosecutions of this case, not, however, in a spirit of persecution, but for the purpose of testing the rights of our institution to compel its members to conform to its rules and by-laws."

CORNER IN CORN.—The work of this year was largely of the routine character pertaining to trade. There were, however, several cases which, in their prosecution and decision, brought the powers of the Board more definitely under law, and are worthy of mention as experimental steps in the progress of the organization. The efficiency of Rule XIII, made to provide for corners, was tested for the first time. During the month of May, the market got so largely oversold on No. 1 corn, that the price was—compared to the price of No. 2—extortionate. On the 15th of May the difference in the price of the two grades was not above 3 cents a bushel. At the close of the month, No. 1 corn had advanced to 10 cents a bushel above No. 2. Sales were made of 47,000 bushels of No. 1 at 68 cents. No. 2 sold at 58 cents. C. P. Goodyear, being a sufferer on the short side, declined to settle a trade for 15,000 bushels for May, sold to Anderson, who had been principal buyer, and appealed for relief to the Board, affirming that a corner existed. The committee heard the evidence, and reported that, considering all the evidence and facts elicited, no corner existed. Goodyear settled up his May deals in accordance with the decision. He was still a bear on the corn market, and sold largely of No. 2 corn, for delivery in July. A large proportion of his sales were made at buyer's option, as they brought a much higher price, on a weak market, than seller's option or cash. In July, it happened that the corn in store became quite generally out of condition, and, under the rules, was so posted by the various elevators, under notification of the inspectors. By the middle of July it was plain that unless warehouse receipts of No. 2 corn could be delivered on short sales, regardless of any subsequent change in quality arising from heating since put in store, that the deliveries could not be made, and that a corner existed. It was so believed by the majority of short sellers, and another attempt was made by them to enforce Rule XIII. On July 15, the following communication was presented to the acting-president, the president being absent:

S. H. MCCREA, Vice-President of the Board of Trade:

The undersigned, interested in corn contracts for delivery during this month, claim that, by reason of the corn now in store under grade No. 2, being largely declared to be out of condition, and therefore not deliverable on such contracts, creates a corner, within the meaning of Rule XIII of the general rules of the Board, and, in order to properly adjust unfulfilled contracts equitably, request that you will appoint a committee of three disinterested members of the Board to determine upon a proper price at which unfulfilled contracts may be settled, whether such contracts be buyer's or seller's option for July.

W. L. BRAINARD, A. DOW,
C. P. GOODYEAR, B. F. MURPHY & CO.
J. K. FISHER & CO. HOWARD PRIESTLY,
R. MCCLESNEY, CHARLES G. COOLEY.

V. A. Turpin, N. K. Fairbank and R. Prindiville were appointed as the committee to act under the rule. The case was heard July 19. Mr. Cooley, one of the petitioners, desired to have his name erased from the call. He stated that he had settled the bulk of his sales at 78 cents a bushel, and did not think that a corner existed. The question whether a corner existed, hinged on the condition of the corn then in store, and whether sales made while the corn was in good condition were valid after the basis on which the sales had been made had been changed. The chief inspector testified to the condition of the No. 2 corn then in store. It was out of condition in all but two elevators in the city—more so than at any time for three years. F. M. Mitchell, Howard Priestly, J. K. Adams, and others, testified that they had repeatedly tendered warehouse receipts for No. 2 corn, in houses outside the North Side and Central elevators, and had been unable to deliver such receipts on their matured contracts. E. K. Bruce and others testified that business was not blocked by hot corn; that they bought, sold and shipped as usual. The evidence was profuse on all sides; and, after due consideration, the committee reported, on the 20th, that,

"Owing to the large sales and the bad condition of the corn, as reported by the inspectors, a 'corner' existed, and submitted, as a basis of settlement of outstanding contracts: 'On corn sold at seller's option, on which receipts have been tendered and refused, since 11 o'clock a. m., July 16, 78 cents per bushel; on seller's options for July, not yet tendered, if tendered before the close of July 21, 78 cents per bushel; on buyer's options, called before July 20, where receipts tendered had been refused, 80 cents per bushel'; but on buyer's options not yet called, the committee did not deem it within their province to consider or report."

On the basis of this report most of the options were settled, except a line of buyer's options, put out by

Goodyear & Co., which had not matured, and which were not called until the end of the month, at which time No. 2 corn was as effectually cornered as ever. Goodyear tendered the corn due on the last day of the month, in receipts which had been condemned as 'hot.' They were refused, whereupon he offered to settle on the basis of 80 cents per bushel, as had been provided for buyer's options called early in the month. The principal buyer, J. T. Lester, refused to settle on those terms, brought the case before the arbitrators, and was awarded the difference claimed. Goodyear & Co. refused to abide by the decision, and commenced a suit to recover damages in the courts. The directors reported that the firm failed to fulfill a contract after it was duly awarded, and, on September 13, reported the firm as suspended under the rules. Their action was confirmed by vote of the Board. At this time, Goodyear & Co. stood as one of the leading firms on the Board, both for financial ability and uprightness of character. Mr. Goodyear had served, in 1867, as vice-president of the Board, and his partner, Mr. McHenry, was personally one of the most popular young men on the Board. Under the rules, the directors had no discretion. The firm was liable to suspension, and was therefore suspended. The feeling of regret was general, and, on September 20, the matter was again brought before the full Board. The following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That the president and directors of the Board of Trade be, and are hereby, requested to reinstate C. B. Goodyear and W. H. McHenry to membership of this Board."

The resolution, if carried out, would have been in direct violation of the rules of the Board. The directors met, and adopted resolutions pledging themselves to resign if their action was not sustained. An adjourned meeting of the Board of Trade was then held, and the re-instatement of Messrs. Goodyear & Co. stated to be the wish of the Board. Therefore, the resignation of the officers became operative. A meeting of the Board was then called, and Dr. Turpin offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Board of Trade has received notice of the resignation of its officers with profound regret.

"Resolved, That the action of the adjourned meeting of the full Board, on the evening of the 20th instant, is not the sentiment of this Board.

"Resolved, That the officers of this Board be respectfully requested to withdraw their resignation."

On the following day these resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the officers withdrew their resignation.

THE ELEVATOR DIFFICULTY.—The elevators, during this year, became more antagonistic than ever before to the grain interest, which was mainly represented through the Board of Trade, of which nearly all the receivers, shippers and dealers in grain were members. Their grievances were most fully set forth in the press, and their cause found champions therein. There had been a constant series of troubles between the elevators, the inspectors, the receivers and shippers all through the previous year. The trouble appears to have been that there were many conflicting interests involved, and that the business was carried on without any controlling supervision of law. A conflict was inevitable, however, before the trouble could be adjusted, and it culminated in the appointment of a committee by the Board of Trade, to consider the alleged irregularity in the issuance of warehouse receipts, and other evils in the warehouse system, and to report thereon. The committee, on Friday, January 21, 1870, presented a report containing recommendations intended to form a basis for compromising the differences. The report was adopted on the following Monday. On February 1, a plan, in accordance with the resolutions, for the registration of receipts and the prevention of over-issues, was presented to the warehousemen for approval.

On February 7, the proprietors of the principal elevators replied, and declined the proposition; when the Board again submitted a basis of compromise, which was again rejected, and the year closed with the Board of Trade and the elevators in distinct variance, and with little chance for any satisfactory settlement of their differences. The time had arrived, however, when the immense and constantly-increasing interests of general trade could no longer be left unprotected by positive law. The quarrels between the conflicting interests, which were found to be incapable of settlement, proved to the great commercial public that the time had come to put under the paternal care of the State these great interests which had outgrown the control of all private integrity, and were fast consolidating into a monopoly which would only be measured in its degree of extortion, honesty or beneficence to trade, by the honesty or cupidity of the men who held control of the vast interests involved in the handling of all the surplus grain of the great Northwest.

THE YEAR 1870-71.

The twenty-second annual meeting was held Tuesday April 5, 1870. The membership reported was one thousand, three hundred and forty-two—an increase of fifty-five during the year. The election resulted in the choice of the following officers: S. H. McCrea, president; B. F. Murphey and P. W. Dater, vice-presidents.

A summary of the fiscal report gives the following:

Total receipts.....	$93,434 55
Total expenditures.....	94,635 72
Excess of expenditures.....	$ 1,201 17
Assets in bonds and cash.....	$13,945 43

During the year, the receipts from inspection were $40,267.20, and the expenses, $46,036 50—a deficit in that item of $5,769.30; $3,500 was also paid on the soldiers' monument; repairs made in the hall, and legal expenses in defending suits against the Board, amounted to $3,688.43; and the assessments of the National Board of Trade, with expenses of delegates attending its annual session, were $1,092. Considering these extraordinary items of expense, the fiscal report was deemed satisfactory.

The initiation fees were raised to $50, by vote of the Board. The breach between the warehousemen and the Board of Trade had been made the issue at the election, in so far as to have resulted in a warehouse and anti-warehouse ticket. The candidate put forward by the elevator interest was Julian S. Rumsey, who, from his personal popularity, his acknowledged business ability and fitness for the position, was, perhaps, the strongest opposition candidate that could have been selected. He received three hundred and eighty-one votes against four hundred and eighty-nine for the successful candidate. A resolution was adopted to enforce the Warehouse law for the delivery of grain, as the owner or consignee may elect. Another resolution was also passed, providing for a thorough revision of the existing rules regulating the packing and inspection of provisions, and all matters relating to their sale or purchase, through a joint committee, consisting of three members each of the Board of Trade and the Pork Packers' Association, and three buyers of provisions—the committee to submit the new rules to the full Board for adoption.

The business of the Board for the year was chiefly confined to buying and selling—little of historic interest occurring, beyond what appeared in the statistics showing the enormous volume of business done under the control and supervision of the Board. A revision of the by-laws was effected, and the inspection of provisions, under well defined rules, inaugurated. The difficulties between the warehousemen and the owners of property consigned to their charge continued a source of trouble and discussion during the year; and when the Legislature convened in January, 1871, one of the first subjects which engaged its attention, was a bill regulating public warehouses and the inspection of grain; which, after amendments, was passed. The fiscal year closed while the bill was still pending.

THE YEAR 1871-72.

The twenty-third annual meeting was held Monday, April 3, 1871. The membership reported was one thousand two hundred and seventy-two—a decrease of seventy during the year. The falling off was attributed to the large accessions just prior to the close of the previous year, and in anticipation of the increase in the admission fee; which gave an unusually large membership at the close of the year, leaving the accessions this year not sufficient to offset the losses. The officers chosen for the ensuing year were: J. W. Preston, president; C. E. Culver and W. N. Brainard, vice-presidents.

The fiscal report of the Board of Directors showed the following:

Total receipts from all sources.....	$106,804 00
Total disbursements.....	104,347 00
Balance of assets on hand .....	$ 16,402 00

The receipts for inspection for the year were $49,668, the expenses, $39,369—net income from this source $9,299. The expenses of the National Board of Trade were $736. The last item of war expenses appeared in this report, it being the payment of the balance due on the soldiers' monument, amounting to $1,931. The annual assessment was fixed at $30. The directors reported a revenue of $3,000 from visitors' tickets, the issuance of which had been first authorized in July, 1870.

From the directors' report the following extracts are given, as of historic value:

"The subject of the transportation and handling of grain, which has more or less been a subject of discussion for several years past, has engaged the attention of your directors; and, as the newly-adopted Constitution of the State seemed to call for some legislation on those subjects, they, in conjunction with the commission appointed to revise the statutes, had prepared two bills for submission to the Legislature, the one having reference to the duties of railroads as carriers of grain, and the other with reference to the duties of those engaged in storing the same. The former is pending in the Legislature, with the approval of the Committee on Railroads, without essential modification, and it is believed, will become a law, before the adjournment of that body; the latter, amended by the committee to whom it was referred, and with some alterations, concurred in by the directors of this Board, has passed the House, and will no doubt meet the approval of the Senate at an early day. The modifications in the original draft of the bill, are not, in the judgment of your directors, improvements, but it is hoped that they may not seriously injure or inconvenience the trade of this city. By the provisions of the bill, as amended, the inspection of grain is to be controlled by the State, and this Board, will, if the bill becomes a law before the vacation of the Legislature, be relieved of this care and responsibility on the 1st of July, next.* If this branch of business be as well done as heretofore, we shall be well satisfied.

* The bill passed March 15, and was approved April 25.

The responsibility in this regard has been very great, and no subject has engaged the attention of the officers of the Board more carefully and vigilantly than this. That entire satisfaction could be given was not to be expected; that the best efforts of the Board have been given to perfect the system, none will deny."

The delegates to the National Board of Trade submitted their report of the proceedings of the annual session, held in Buffalo, from December 7 to 12, 1870. The delegates were: P. W. Water, V. A. Turpin, J. G. Guthrie, R. Prindiville and Charles Randolph. The subjects discussed and approved were:

1. Giving of "clean" bills of lading for grain in bulk by railroads.
2. Approving and recommending the cental system of weights and measures.
3. The selling of cotton in bale by actual tare.
4. The abolition of all laws, State and Municipal, that restrict inter-State commerce.
5. The establishment of a Department of Commerce by the General Government.
6. The immediate and unconditional repeal of the franking privilege.
7. A revision of the tariff, and a reduction of the duties to a revenue standard.
8. Civil service reform.
9. Direct importation to inland cities of the country.
10. Postal steam service.
11. Early return to specie payments.
12. Abolition of all usury laws.
13. Improvement of river navigation by General Government.

The Warehouse law, as enacted, provided for the appointment of a registrar, having powers that made him something of an autocrat in the eyes of the warehousemen; who, although working under corporate authority conferred by the laws of the State, could not ignore their individual rights to control their own business. They, therefore, chose to rebel against the law, to the extent of applying to the courts for relief. The Board of Trade also determined, before taking measures to enforce the law, to have legal advice. The whole law was submitted to Messrs. Hitchcock, Dupee & Evarts, counselors-at-law, for their opinion as to its constitutionality. Their opinion, given June 21, substantially sustained the legal validity of the entire railroad and warehouse legislation. The warehousemen having been led to believe, by their legal advisers, that the fixing of the rates of storage, and other points in the law, affecting their business, were arbitrary and unconstitutional, refused to receive grain except by request or consent of the owner until the question should be settled in the courts. Considerable confusion ensued, but nothing to seriously obstruct the course of trade. The registrar's authority was not fully acknowledged for the time being, and it was not until the court decided as to the validity of the law, and disclosures were made of gross attempts at fraud on the part of individuals identified with the elevator business, that the law was put into full and unimpeded effect.

On September 20, resolutions were passed favoring the construction of an international ship canal at Niagara, and the directors were authorized to appoint delegates to a canal convention, to be held at an early day at Detroit. During the same month, the by-laws were amended and the rules revised, particularly as to option sales for future delivery, margins, and the inspection of provisions before delivery on sales.

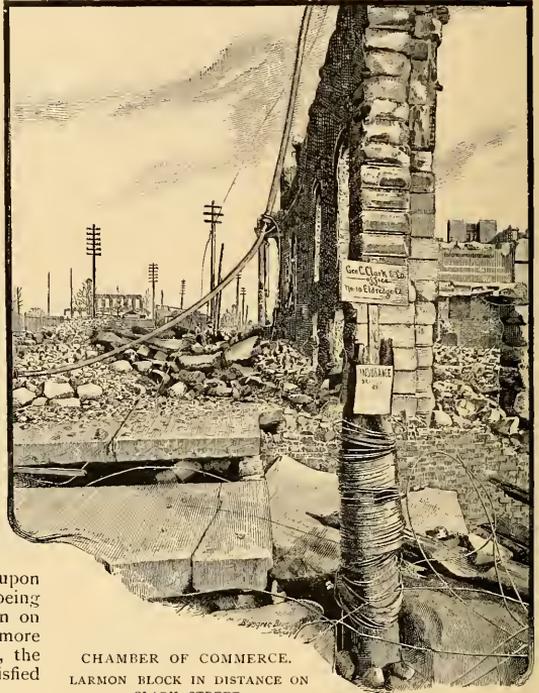

THE MUNN & SCOTT DIFFICULTIES.—The first warehouse commissioners appointed under the Warehouse law were, David Hammond, of Chicago, and Colonel Morgan, of Bloomington. The inspection and registration offices were opened August 1, 1871; but as the warehousemen almost entirely ignored the law, but little effort was made prior to October, 1871, to get an account of the grain on hand in the elevators. The registrar kept an account of all receipts issued, as they could with difficulty be negotiated without this certificate. During 1872, it was regarded as important and necessary that the quantity of grain in store should be ascertained, in order that an amount of receipts and shipments might be accurately kept by the registrar, as contemplated by the law. Members of the Board of Trade who had interests at stake were anxious to "weigh up," and while some of the warehousemen were willing, others declined, among the latter being Munn & Scott. Later in the season, however, when all the others had weighed and given the registrar an account of all grain in store, Munn & Scott announced that their report would be forthcoming as soon as they could get it ready. When the inspector examined the Munn & Scott elevator, the Northwestern, he carefully calculated the capacity of the bins when full, the same as in the case of other elevators, and he thus knew the actual capacity by measurement. The report of the inspector was copied on the registrar's books, and the general impression prevailed that from this beginning, the public, in future, would know something of the operations of the warehousemen. Suspicions were rife on the Board, however, that there was not so much wheat in store as was claimed. The registrar was finally directed to investigate the Northwestern elevator, and he directed assistant inspector Kennedy to carefully examine into the matter. His efforts were speedily rewarded by the discovery, through an employé of Munn & Scott, that several of their bins had been floored over near the top, and a covering of wheat placed upon the boards to give the bins the appearance of being full. There was great excitement and indignation on the Board at this disclosure, and it led to a more complete and satisfactory observance of the law, the better class of warehousemen having become satisfied it was the only way to protect themselves.

GRAIN RECEIVED ON OCTOBER 9, 1871.—The receipts of grain in Chicago, on Monday, October 9, 1871, were the largest in a single day in the history of the city, comprising 11,863,937 bushels of the crop of 1871; 6,818,314 of 1870, and 6,246,042 of 1869. The fire did not stop the receipts and shipments of grain, a great deal of which had already been consigned and was on the way. During the week succeeding the fire, the receipts aggregated 1,635 cars, and the shipments 220,460 bushels.

BURNING OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.—The Chamber of Commerce was destroyed between one and two o'clock a. m., the morning of October 9. At about 1:20 a. m., a great billow of flames rolled over LaSalle Street, and broke in the windows of the Chamber of Commerce on the west side, near the south end of the building, and at the same time seized upon the roof and fastened into the overhanging cornices. So swift was the fire in its progress, that the building was gutted and a part of the walls melted away in a few minutes. The Associated Press operator, in the Merchant's Building, diagonally opposite on Washington Street, who was sending out an account of the fate of the Chamber of Commerce, was compelled to break off in the middle of a word and flee for safety. The Court House, a fitting companion to this magnificent building, caught fire in the cupola, and at 2:05 o'clock a. m., the great Court-house bell pitched from its fastenings down through the crumbling ruins, clanging out a close to operations on the old Board and a knell for the perished greatness of the queenly city. The loss on the Chamber of Commerce was estimated at $284,000.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
LARNON BLOCK IN DISTANCE ON CLARK STREET.

The day after the fire the Journal extra contained an announcement that the Board of Trade would meet at Nos. 51-53 Canal Street, and that there would be an immediate meeting of the Board of Directors. Messrs. B. P. Hutchinson, N. K. Fairbank, John L. Hancock and others, representing more especially the provision trade, leased Standard Hall, and invited the South Side members to meet there as a matter of convenience. On Wednesday, the directors of the Chamber of Commerce decided to re-build at once. It was announced that about $100,000 of the insurance of $225,000 on the building destroyed would probably be recovered. On Friday, the following resolution was unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Board on Canal Street:

Resolved, That the Board of Trade notify the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce that it holds to and will comply with the provisions of its lease, and requires said Corporation to re-build at once, as we wish to re-occupy the building at the earliest possible day."

The following committee was appointed to remove damaged grain, and dispose of the same "for account of whom it may concern": North Side Elevator, J. B. Lyon, S. H. McCrea, C. W. Wheeler; Central Elevator "A," E. Buckingham, M. S. Bacon, Josiah Stiles; National Elevator, C. J. Gilbert, E. B. Stevens, D. W. Irwin

The inconveniences of having two places of meeting soon became evident, and efforts were made to compromise on the erection of a temporary structure, near the entrance of Washington-street tunnel. The provision brokers and packers resolved to meet at Standard Hall from 7:30 to 9:30 o'clock in the evening. They organized by electing B. P. Hutchinson, president; Colonel Richardson and C. M. Culbertson, vice-presidents; J. P. Marot, secretary; and A. S. Burt, treasurer.

An agreement was finally reached as to a temporary location, until the Chamber of Commerce should be rebuilt; and on Monday, two weeks after the fire, the Board moved into a hall at the southwest corner of Washington and Franklin streets, and business was formally resumed. The main entrance was a stairway on Washington Street, and, although the rooms were small, they were well lighted, and if the rough pine benches and tables were not rich enough to invite indolence, they were at least serviceable. Aside from being compelled, during the thaws of the succeeding winter months, to wade across a miniature river in Market Street, the members got along very comfortably, and fully appreciated the kindness of Judge Farwell, who had given them the use of the rooms rent free, for so long a time as they might desire to occupy them.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, FROM CORNER WASHINGTON AND LA SALLE STREETS.

LIST OF OFFICERS FROM 1858-72.

YEAR.	PRESIDENTS.	VICE-PRESIDENTS.	SECRETARIES.	TREASURERS.
1858-59	Julian S. Rumsey,	Thomas H. Beebe,	W. W. Mitchell,	W. W. Mitchell.
1859-60	Julian S. Rumsey,	Thos. H. Beebe (1st), Stephen Clary (2d), Eli Bates (1st), John V. Farwell (2d), Clinton Briggs (1st), E. G. Wolcott (2d), W. H. Low (1st), John L. Hancock (2d), N. K. Fairbank (1st), Chas. Randolph (2d), Thomas Parker (1st), C. J. Gilbert (2d), T. Maple (1st), John C. Dore (2d), P. L. Underwood (1st), E. W. Densmore (2d), Lyman Blair (1st), C. B. Goodyear (2d), E. K. Bruce (1st), J. D. Cole, Jr. (2d), S. H. McCrea (1st), H. A. Towner (2d), B. F. Murphey (1st), P. W. Dater (2d), Chas. E. Culver (1st), Wm. N. Brainard (2d),	Seth Catlin, *	George Watson.
1860-61	I. V. Munn,		Seth Catlin,	George Watson.
1861-62	Stephen Clary,		Seth Catlin,	George Watson.
1862-63	C. T. Wheeler,		Seth Catlin,	George Watson.
1863-64	John L. Hancock,		Seth Catlin, † John F. Beaty,	George F. Rumsey.
1864-65	John L. Hancock,		John F. Beaty,	George F. Rumsey.
1865-66	Charles Randolph,		John F. Beaty,	George F. Rumsey.
1866-67	John C. Dore,		John F. Beaty,	George F. Rumsey.
1867-68	Wiley M. Egan,		John F. Beaty,	George F. Rumsey.
1868-69	E. V. Robbins,		John F. Beaty,	George F. Rumsey.
1869-70	J. M. Richards,		Charles Randolph,	L. V. Parsons.
1870-71	S. H. McCrea,		Charles Randolph,	George Sturges.
1871-72	J. W. Preston,		Charles Randolph,	Orson Smith.

* The duties of the office of superintendent were merged with those of secretary in 1859, and Seth Catlin, the former superintendent, was elected to the latter office. The duties of treasurer were at the same time detached from those of secretary.
 † Seth Catlin died January 19, 1864. Colonel John F. Beaty was chosen his successor about the 26th of January.

DIRECTORS AND COMMITTEES, 1858-72.

1858-59.—DIRECTORS: R. M. Mitchell, H. K. Elkins, I. Y. Munn, George Armour, N. Ludington, J. Magill, B. F. Culver, C. T. Wheeler, D. Kreigh and M. C. Stearns. FIRST COMMITTEE OF REFERENCE: W. T. Mather, J. V. Farwell, S. B. Pomeroy, E. S. Shepard and T. M. Avery. SECOND COMMITTEE OF REFERENCE: E. W. Densmore, S. H. Fish, R. Robinson, Samuel Howe and Nathan Mears. STANDING COMMITTEE: George M. How, Eli Bates, J. J. Richards, W. S. Stewart, B. W. Thomas, Clinton Briggs and G. Wentworth Scott.

1859-60.—DIRECTORS: E. W. Densmore, George Steel, A. Dow, W. Munger, J. H. Tucker, E. B. Stevens, George M. How, L. P. Hilliard, A. S. Burt and Hiram Wheeler. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): J. J. Richards, C. H. Curtis, N. Ludington, R. Robinson and Thomas Parker; (for second six months): D. L. Quirk, H. McLennan, J. H. Tiffany, B. F. Culver and J. B. Waller. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: M. C. Stearns, C. T. Wheeler, B. Adams, H. K. Elkins, C. H. Walker, D. C. Scranton, E. Rawson, J. V. Farwell and George Watson. SUB-COMMITTEES OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS: On Finance, Stephen Clary, W. Munger, L. P. Hilliard. On Grain Inspection, Hiram Wheeler, E. B. Stevens, A. Dow. On Inspection other than Grain, Thomas A. Beebe, George Steel, E. W. Densmore. On Admission of Members, J. H. Tucker, George M. How, A. S. Burt.

1860-61.—DIRECTORS: J. W. Finley, George Webster, E. G. Wolcott, Clinton Briggs, A. E. Kent, C. H. Curtis, B. P. Hutchinson, Charles S. Dole, D. L. Quirk, Julian Magill. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): John Brodie, Windsor Leland, S. T. Atwater, Howard Priestly, C. A. Rogers; (for second six months): Tracy J. Bronson, Samuel M. Johnson, John Maitland, William H. Low, C. J. Davis. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: P. Anderson, M. C. Stearns, Hiram Wheeler, Gordon S. Hubbard, Charles H. Walker, Hugh McLennan, Thomas Harless, L. P. Hilliard, Joel C. Walter. SUB-COMMITTEES OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS: On Finance: John V. Farwell, Clinton Briggs, D. L. Quirk. On Grain Inspection: A. E. Kent, E. G. Wolcott, J. W. Finley. On Inspection other than Grain: Julian Magill, C. S. Dole, B. P. Hutchinson. On Admission of Members: George Webster, Eli Bates, C. H. Curtis.

1861-62.—DIRECTORS: J. V. Clark, Charles E. Culver, V. A. Turpin (*), Charles Hinckley, J. L. Hancock (*), Samuel Shackford (*), C. J. Davis, Charles H. Walker (*), Hugh Adams, C. H. Curtis (*). COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): Silas Pratt, J. D. Ballie, Thomas Parker, William D. Houghteling, C. Y. Richmond; (for second six months): L. D. Norton, W. N. Brainard, S. A. Kent, T. T. Gurney, J. K. Fisher. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: S. T. Atwater, E. Rawson, George Steel, Samuel Howe, F. D. Gray, William H. Low, Asa Dow, George Armour, Hugh McLennan. SUB-COMMITTEES OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS: On Finance: Clinton Briggs, J. V. Clark, V. A. Turpin. On Grain Inspection: S. Shackford, Charles Hinckley, C. J. Davis. On Flour Inspection: V. A. Turpin, E. G. Wolcott, W. H. Low. On Inspection other than Grain and Flour: Charles H. Walker, J. L. Hancock, Hugh Adams. On Admission of Members, E. G. Wolcott, Charles E. Culver, C. H. Curtis. On Telegraph Messages: V. A. Turpin, E. G. Wolcott, J. L. Hancock.

1862-63.—DIRECTORS: T. Maple (*), Charles E. Culver (*), Charles Hinckley (*), Charles J. Davis (*), Hugh Adams (*), Lemuel D. Norton, B. P. Hutchinson, E. W. Denmore, N. K. Whitney, Thomas Parker. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): R. McChesney, D. C. Scranton, H. C. Ranney, S. P. Carter, S. M. Johnson; (for second six months): Albert Morse, Henry Milward, Wiley M. Egan, N. K. Fairbank, E. W. Denmore. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: B. Adams, George Armour, C. R. P. Wentworth, W. D. Houghteling, C. J. Magill, H. H. Ross, Clinton Briggs, Samuel Howe, V. A. Turpin.

1863-64.—DIRECTORS: Lemuel D. Norton (*), B. P. Hutchinson (*), E. W. Denmore (*), N. K. Whitney (*), Thomas Parker (*), Samuel Howe, J. C. Dore, E. G. Wolcott, Murry Nelson, S. P. Carter. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): S. T. Atwater, A. Handy, W. N. Brainard, S. Pratt, George D. Russell; (for second six months): S. Shackford, M. S. Nichols, P. L. Underwood, J. D. Cole, Jr., A. J. Denison. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: Ira Y. Munn, C. Wheeler, George Steel, William H. Low, Julian S. Rumsey, George A. Gibbs, Stephen Clary, Thomas Richmond, E. Rawson. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: N. K. Fairbank, Samuel Howe, J. C. Dore. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: E. G. Wolcott, Charles Randolph, Murry Nelson. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: L. D. Norton, E. W. Denmore, B. P. Hutchinson. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: Thomas Parker, J. C. Dore, N. K. Whitney. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: N. K. Fairbank, Samuel Howe, S. P. Carter. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHY: S. P. Carter.

1864-65.—DIRECTORS: Samuel Howe (*), E. G. Wolcott (*), J. C. Dore (*), Murry Nelson (*), S. P. Carter (*), William Nason, J. S. Harvey, Albert Morse, W. N. Brainard, C. M. Culbertson. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): C. Y. Richmond, E. V. Robbins, T. J. Bronson, U. H. Crosby, T. M. Hibbard; (for second six months): E. K. Bruce, B. P. Hutchinson, T. H. Seymour, W. N. Woodruff, J. W. Preston. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: Ira Y. Munn, J. W. Finley, S. Clary, C. J. Davis, C. T. Wheeler, Solon Cumins, George M. How, S. T. Atwater, D. L. Quirk. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: Samuel Howe, J. C. Dore, S. P. Carter. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: Samuel Howe, Albert Morse, Murry Nelson. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: William Nason, C. J. Gilbert, J. S. Harvey. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: C. M. Culbertson, J. C. Dore, W. N. Brainard. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: Thomas Parker, Murry Nelson, E. G. Wolcott. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHY: S. P. Carter.

1865-66.—DIRECTORS: William Nason (*), J. S. Harvey (*), Albert Morse (*), W. N. Brainard (*), C. M. Culbertson (*), S. S. Williamson, E. V. Robbins, W. H. Low, S. A. Kent, J. W. Odell. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (for first six months): J. W. Sykes, C. Hinckley, D. G. Brown, C. B. Pope, S. Cumins; (for the second six months): W. M. Egan, D. C. Scranton, J. B. Lyon, J. H. Dole, J. K. Fisher. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS: Ira Y. Munn, D. Kreigh, H. McLennan, S. Clary, S. T. Atwater, R. McChesney, J. S. Rumsey, C. J. Gilbert, C. H. S. Mixer. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: J. C. Dore, E. V. Robbins, W. N. Brainard. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: T. Maple, A. Morse, W. N. Brainard. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: W. H. Low, William Nason, J. S. Harvey. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: S. S. Williamson, C. M. Culbertson, S. A. Kent. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: E. V. Robbins, William Nason, A. Morse. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHY: J. W. Odell, S. A. Kent, J. S. Harvey.

* Those marked with (*) served one year, unless re-elected; others two years.

1866-67.—DIRECTORS: S. S. Williamson (*), E. V. Robbins (*), W. H. Low (*), S. A. Kent (*), J. W. Odell (*), H. Botsford, J. H. Dole, T. H. Seymour, H. A. Townier, J. W. Pottle. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1867): A. G. Hoagland, J. Priestly, C. Y. Richmond, W. T. Baker, I. P. Rumsey; (term expiring in 1868): C. J. Magill, M. S. Yarwood, C. A. Knight, C. W. Boynton, Michael Leary. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS (term expiring in 1867): V. A. Turpin, M. C. Stearns, C. T. Wheeler, C. Randolph, E. F. Lawrence; (term expiring in 1868): J. W. Finley, H. Sprague, C. J. Davis, H. McLennan, L. D. Norton. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: E. V. Robbins, H. A. Townier, J. W. Odell. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: J. H. Dole, T. H. Seymour, H. Botsford. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: W. H. Low, E. W. Denmore, S. S. Williamson. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: J. W. Pottle, S. A. Kent, J. H. Dole. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: P. L. Underwood, H. Botsford, E. W. Denmore. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHY: J. W. Odell, S. A. Kent, E. V. Robbins. COMMITTEE ON CEMETERY: S. S. Williamson, P. L. Underwood, T. H. Seymour.

1867-68.—DIRECTORS: H. Botsford (*), James H. Dole (*), T. H. Seymour (*), H. A. Townier (*), H. C. Ranney (*), W. E. Richardson, S. H. McCrea, W. H. Lunt, George M. How, George Field. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1869): D. H. Lincoln, Joseph B. Phelps, J. B. Hobbs, J. R. Bensley, J. J. Richards. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1870): H. C. Russell, J. H. Dwight, D. G. Brown, W. H. Goodnow, S. P. Carter. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS (term expiring in 1869): C. E. Culver, T. Maple, R. M. Cannon, E. B. Stevens, Thomas Parker; (term expiring in 1870): B. P. Hutchinson, W. M. Egan, E. W. Denmore, Samuel Howe, M. A. Lawrence. COMMERCIAL COMMITTEE: R. McChesney, J. C. Dore, W. D. Houghteling, W. F. Coolbaugh, John L. Hancock, John M. Douglass, Nathan Mears, J. V. Farwell, W. R. Gould, R. Prindiville, Ira Y. Munn, William Blair, Stephen Clary, W. H. Low, Murry Nelson, S. Clement, W. E. Doggett, L. B. Sidway, N. K. Fairbank, P. Wadsworth, Samuel M. Nickerson. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: H. C. Ranney, H. A. Townier, George M. How. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: J. H. Dole, H. Botsford, S. H. McCrea. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: George Field, H. A. Townier, H. C. Ranney. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: H. A. Townier, C. B. Goodyear, W. H. Lunt. COMMITTEE ON LUMBER: Lyman Blair, S. H. McCrea, W. E. Richardson. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: George M. How, W. E. Richardson, Lyman Blair. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHY: H. Botsford, W. H. Lunt, C. B. Goodyear. COMMITTEE ON CEMETERY: T. H. Seymour, Lyman Blair, S. H. McCrea.

1868-69.—DIRECTORS: W. E. Richardson (*), S. H. McCrea (*), W. H. Lunt (*), George M. How (*), George Field (*), J. W. Preston, D. W. Irwin, L. D. Irwin, George J. Brine, Levi Higgins. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1870): H. C. Russell, J. H. Dwight, D. G. Brown, W. H. Goodnow, S. P. Carter; (term expiring in 1871): A. M. Bennett, George Stewart, Allen Howes, C. G. Cooley, J. C. Guthrie. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS (term expiring in 1870): W. M. Egan, B. P. Hutchinson, Samuel Howe, E. W. Denmore, M. A. Lawrence; (term expiring in 1871): W. H. Low, B. F. Murphy, Hugh Adams, J. H. Dole, J. B. Lyon. COMMERCIAL COMMITTEE: R. McChesney, J. C. Dore, John L. Hancock, John M. Douglass, W. R. Gould, R. Prindiville, G. D. Watkins, Ira Y. Munn, Stephen Clary, William H. Low, L. B. Sidway, N. K. Fairbank, E. K. Bruce, M. S. Bacon, B. P. Hutchinson, J. M. Millar, S. A. Kent, Marshall Field, Asa Dow, Thomas Whitney, B. F. Culver. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: George M. How, George J. Brine, J. W. Preston. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: George Field, J. D. Cole, Jr., George J. Brine. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: S. H. McCrea, L. D. Norton, D. W. Irwin. COMMITTEE ON LUMBER INSPECTION: W. H. Lunt, E. K. Bruce, L. D. Norton. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: W. E. Richardson, Levi Higgins, George M. How. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: E. K. Bruce, W. H. Lunt, Levi Higgins. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHY: D. W. Irwin, W. E. Richardson, J. D. Dole, Jr. COMMITTEE ON CEMETERY: J. W. Preston, George Field, S. H. McCrea.

1869-70.—DIRECTORS: J. W. Preston (*), D. W. Irwin (*), L. D. Norton (*), George J. Brine (*), Levi Higgins (*), R. Stone, C. W. Kreigh, D. H. Lincoln, R. W. Pettit, J. K. Fisher. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1870): H. C. Russell, D. G. Brown, S. P. Carter, J. H. Dwight, W. H. Goodnow; (term expiring in 1871): A. M. Bennett, G. Stewart, Allen Howes, C. G. Cooley, J. C. Guthrie. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS (term expiring in 1870): B. P. Hutchinson, E. W. Denmore, M. A. Lawrence, W. M. Egan, Samuel Howe; (term expiring in 1871): W. H. Low, B. F. Murphy, J. B. Lyon, Hugh Adams, James H. Dole. COMMERCIAL COMMITTEE: R. McChesney, J. C. Dore, John L. Hancock, John M. Douglass, W. R. Gould, R. Prindiville, Ira Y. Munn, Stephen Clary, W. H. Low, G. D. Watkins, E. K. Bruce, M. S. Bacon, B. P. Hutchinson, J. M. Millar, S. A. Kent, Marshall Field, Asa Dow, Thomas Whitney, B. F. Culver, L. Sidway, N. K. Fairbank. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: George J. Brine, J. K. Fisher, R. W. Pettitt. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: R. W. Pettitt, R. Stone, George J. Brine. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: S. H. McCrea, D. W. Irwin, D. H. Lincoln. COMMITTEE ON LUMBER INSPECTION: L. D. Norton, D. H. Lincoln, Levi Higgins. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: C. W. Kreigh, Levi Higgins, J. K. Fisher. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: H. A. Townner, L. D. Norton, J. W. Preston. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHING: D. W. Irwin, R. Stone, C. W. Kreigh. COMMITTEE ON CEMETERY: J. W. Preston, S. H. McCrea, H. A. Townner.

1870-71.—DIRECTORS: R. Stone (*), C. W. Kreigh (*), D. H. Lincoln (*), R. W. Pettitt (*), J. K. Fisher (*), D. H. Denton, E. F. Lawrence, O. S. Hough (*), H. Goodnow, A. H. Pickering. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1871): A. M. Bennett, George Stewart, Allen Howes, C. G. Cooley, J. G. Guthrie; (term expiring in 1872): J. F. Gillette, Robert Warren, C. C. Moeller, A. J. Latham, J. B. Hall. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS (term expiring in 1871): W. H. Low, B. F. Murphey, J. B. Lyon, Hugh Adams, J. H. Dole; (term expiring in 1872): W. N. Brainard, George H. Gibson, C. Hinckley, J. D. Cole, Jr., R. P. Murphey. COMMERCIAL COMMITTEE: W. M. Egan, W. H. Low, J. W. Preston, J. C. Dore, S. A. Kent, Josiah Stiles, H. A. Townner, W. D. Houghteling, Asa Dow, Gurdon S. Hubbard, Thomas Whitney, Ira Y. Munn, Charles J. Davis, R. Prindiville, D. A. Jones, Clinton Briggs, C. H. S. Mixer, W. V. Kay, V. A. Turpin, George C. Walker, L. B. Sidway. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: B. F. Murphey, D. H. Lincoln, W. H. Goodnow. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: D. H. Lincoln, D. H. Denton, P. W. Dater. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: P. W. Dater, R. W. Pettitt, R. Stone. COMMITTEE ON PROVISION INSPECTION: C. W. Kreigh, J. K. Fisher, O. S. Hough. COMMITTEE ON OTHER INSPECTION: J. K. Fisher, E. F. Lawrence, A. H. Pickering. COMMITTEE ON REGISTRATION: R. W. Pettitt, A. H. Pickering, D. H. Denton. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHING: R. Stone, O. S. Hough, B. F. Murphey. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: W. H. Goodnow, E. F. Lawrence, C. W. Kreigh.

1871-72.—DIRECTORS: E. F. Lawrence (*), O. S. Hough (*), W. H. Goodnow (*), A. H. Pickering (*), Daniel A. Jones (*), Josiah Stiles, J. H. Dwight, I. P. Rumsey, A. M. Wright, I. N. Ash. COMMITTEE OF ARBITRATION (term expiring in 1871): J. F. Gillette, Robert Warren, C. C. Moeller, A. J. Latham, J. B. Hall; (term expiring in 1872): C. J. Blair, C. T. Trego, R. W. Dunham, T. T. Gurney, J. B. Hobbs. COMMITTEE OF APPEALS (term expiring in 1871): W. N. Brainard, C. Hinckley, George H. Gibson, J. D. Cole, Jr., R. P. Murphey; (term expiring in 1872): W. M. Egan, M. G. Linn, M. A. Seymour, James H. Dole, Howard Priestly. COMMITTEE ON FINANCE: Charles E. Culver, W. H. Goodnow, J. H. Dwight. COMMITTEE ON FLOUR INSPECTION: A. M. Wright, I. P. Rumsey, A. H. Pickering. COMMITTEE ON GRAIN INSPECTION: William N. Brainard, Josiah Stiles, I. N. Ash. COMMITTEE ON PROVISION INSPECTION: O. S. Hough, Daniel A. Jones, Josiah Stiles, W. E. Richardson, H. Milward. COMMITTEE ON TELEGRAPHING: Daniel A. Jones, O. S. Hough, A. M. Wright. COMMITTEE ON MEMBERSHIP: W. H. Goodnow, B. F. Lawrence, I. P. Rumsey. COMMITTEE ON REGISTRATION: A. H. Pickering, William N. Brainard, J. H. Dwight. COMMITTEE ON ROOMS: A. M. Wright, W. H. Goodnow, Charles E. Culver. COMMITTEE ON METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATION: Charles Randolph, J. H. Dwight, I. P. Rumsey.

E. NELSON BLAKE, president of the Board of Trade, and senior member of the firm of Blake, Shaw & Co., cracker bakers, is a native of West Cambridge, Mass., and the son of Ellis Gray Blake, printer, who was born in Boston, but spent his early life in Richmond and Petersburg, Va. He was born February 9, 1831, and received a common school education in his native town. In 1841, his father died, and, in 1843, he left home to work on a farm in West Cambridge. In the fall of 1850, he went to California, returning in the spring of 1853. The next four years he spent on his uncle's farm, at the old homestead. In the summer of 1857, he began commercial life as a porter in the commission flour store of Harvey Scudder & Co., Boston; but before the close of the year, the firm was a silent partner in the jobbing concern of E. N. Blake & Co. On the 1st of January, 1858, he bought out the other interests, and, taking Kilby Page, Jr., into partnership, continued the business under the firm name of E. N. Blake & Co. In June, 1869, J. M. Dake, the founder of the Dake Bakery, Chicago, died, and the administrator sold the bakery to Messrs. Blake & Page; who associated with them S. B. Walker and F. M. Herdman, and began the business of cracker-making and general custom baking, under the firm name of Blake, Herdman & Co. Mr. Herdman, not liking the business, sold his interest to the remaining partners who took into the firm, W. W. Shaw, who was previously the bookkeeper of Mr. Dake, and the firm of Blake, Walker & Co., was formed. Since the death of Mr. Dake, and the transfer of the property to Blake, Shaw & Co., Mr. Blake has remained at the head of the house; during all its changes he has been identified with its interests, and the guiding mind in the conduct of its affairs. Their business has increased greatly, at times consuming over fifty thousand barrels of flour in a year. In 1872, Mr. Blake became a member of the Board of Trade, to further the interests of his house; and in 1881, he was elected a member of the Board of Directors. His term of office expired with the year 1883, and at the ensuing election on the first Monday in January, 1884, he was elected president of the Board. His administration of its affairs was so successful and so satisfactory to the members that, at the annual election, for 1885, he was re-elected almost unanimously—the first instance since the fire of a re-election of president. He was also elected, for the fourth time, president of the Western Cracker Bakers' Association, at its last annual meeting, held at the Grand Pacific Hotel in this city, February 4, 1885. This is an association numbering one hundred and ten members, and comprises the principal manufacturers in twenty-three States and Territories, from Colorado to Pennsylvania. Mr. Blake has served them in his present capacity from its organization, and, at the last election, only reluctantly accepted the position, after having been three times unanimously chosen to fill the office and promptly declining twice. At the convention in 1882, which was held in Cincinnati, his fellow members signified their appreciation of his character and abilities, by presenting him with a Jules Jurgensen gold watch, with chain and seal attached, the best that money could buy. Mr. Blake is a member of the Citizens' Association. He is a member of the Second Baptist Church of this city; and, while his general benevolence is large, his gifts to the church of his choice, and to the Morgan Park Theological Seminary, connected with it, have been princely. He at one time gave $30,000, on condition that $100,000 should be raised, and engendered an enthusiasm that raised $200,000 instead. He has given to it, at various times, in various amounts, $30,000 more; making a total to this institution alone of $60,000. On September 15, 1858, Mr. Blake was married to Anna E. daughter of Joseph W. Whitten, of West Cambridge, Mass. They have two children living—Mabel E., now the wife of H. H. Kohlsaat, and E. Nelson Blake Jr. Of this gentleman, a contemporaneous writer thus speaks: "The life of such a man makes the world better, by helping others to seek a better life than they might otherwise suppose within their reach. Believing that stewardship is attached to every station in life, Mr. Blake has steadily confined himself to business; and although adhering to the Republican party, has strongly resisted every inclination and invitation to engage in political or public life. By a strict observance of this principle he has been successful, never falling in anything he has undertaken; and as he reviews his past life, he is a firm believer in an over-ruling Providence, who specially cares for those who trust in Him and seek His guidance. He is still in the prime of his life, and looks forward to a life of devotion and usefulness in the cause of the God of his youth."

CHARLES COUNSELMAN was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1849, and there received a common school education. He came to Chicago in 1869, and went to work for Eli Johnson & Co., in a very subordinate capacity and for very small remuneration; but being possessed of but little funds and having a good appetite, it was needful to do something, and no one who knows Mr. Counselman can understand him resting supine when there was anything to be done. He had to make his living, and made it by hard, laborious work; by doing everything that came to his hand conscientiously and well, he made a success of all that he undertook. After he had worked for Mr. Johnson for some little time, he procured a position with Chase, Hanford & Co., selling oil on commission. He then, in 1871, started in the commission business for himself, and joined the Board of Trade about the same time. Since that time his career has been one of continued success. Fortune might appear to frown upon him temporarily, but the same undaunted perseverance that made him take off his coat and do the first thing that came to hand, in 1869, overcame adversity also; the integrity and economy that helped him in his early Chicago life manifested themselves in his later career, and these qualities gained fresh clients day by day, with the result that Mr. Counselman to-day enjoys one of the most flourishing commission businesses in the city. In August, 1883, the Counselman Building was commenced, and completed on May 1, 1884. It is owned by that gentleman and is a monument not alone to the business architecture of Chicago, but to the enterprise and energy of its proprietor. Mr. Counselman is a member of the Board of Directors of the Board of Trade, and is a member of the Board of Real Estate Managers,—having been re-elected to that office,—and has been very influential and efficient in the erection of the present building. In 1879, he erected large warehouses at the Union Stock Yards, where he does a large business in warehousing provisions, and where he also has extensive real estate interests. Mr. Counselman is likewise a large owner of real estate in the North and West divisions of the city, which he subdivides for residence property. His business is in stock and grain, and he has a branch office at No. 17 Mills Building, New York City; and to facilitate his enormous transactions he has in his office private telegraph wires connecting with New York, Cleveland, Boston, Rochester, Buffalo, Providence and other large eastern cities, also with Baltimore, Washington, and Richmond and Norfolk, Va. Mr. Counselman was married, in 1875, to Miss Jennie E. Otis, daughter of Judge Otis.

GEO. C. ELDRIDGE & CO.—There was probably no firm better known on the Board of Trade at the date covered by the last chapter than that of George C. Eldredge & Co. The firm comprises Mr. Eldredge and Nathaniel S. Jones. It is one of those firms—the mention of whose name conveys an assured idea of comprehensive business talent, energy and unquestionable integrity; and precision has enabled it to take advantage of the mutations in the market that others, less fortunate, failed to perceive. By acting upon strict business principles, and by making a record of which any house might well be proud, George C. Eldredge & Co. stand in the front rank of the members of the Chicago Board of Trade. Mr. Eldredge came to Chicago in 1867 and became bookkeeper for Shiek, Wagner & Co., with whom he remained two years. He then went into business for himself, with the result as just stated.

Nathaniel Strong Jones was born in Centerville, Ohio, on January 26, 1841, and received his education at Xenia, Ohio. In 1859, he went to Cincinnati, where he engaged in the lard refining business, and subsequently in the grain and commission trade. In the fall of 1875, he left that city and came to Chicago, and entered the commission business, in which he has since remained without intermission. In December, 1875, he joined the Board of Trade, and on November 20, 1882, became a member of the firm of George C. Eldredge & Co. He was married, in 1863, to Mary W. Scammon, daughter of General E. P. Scammon, and niece of J. Y. Scammon, and has the following children: Nathaniel Scammon, Caroline Mary, Margaret Mary, Robert, Mary and Winifred Mary. He is a member of the Chicago and Union clubs, and is, perhaps, known as much for his genial and courteous hospitality as he is distinguished for his commercial ability.

HAMILL & CONGDON.—Ernest A. Hamill is the youngest son of Dr. R. C. Hamill, of Chicago, and was born at Bloomington, Ind., in July, 1851, and came to Chicago with his parents when but ten months of age, locating here in the spring of 1852. He received his education in this city at the common schools, and at the age of sixteen became employed in the hardware business, first with Edwin Hunt & Sons, and afterward with Miller Brothers & Keep. In 1875, he first engaged in the commission business, with the firm of Van Inwagen & Hamill, and, in the spring of 1878, he engaged in the brokerage business alone. On April 1, 1879, he established the firm of Hamill & Congdon, commission merchants, grain and provisions, which is still in existence, and doing a flourishing business. Mr. Hamill joined the Board in 1876, and was made a member of the Committee of Arbitration for the years 1883-84. He was married, in 1880, to Miss E. S. Corwith, daughter of Henry Corwith; they have one son—Alfred E. Mr. Hamill is one of the charter members of the Calumet Club, and is one of the executive committee of the Citizens' League, an organization that has done so much toward retarding evil in the individual and in the official acts of our city. He is also one of the governing committee of the Chicago Stock Exchange.

Charles B. Congdon, of the firm of Hamill & Congdon, was born in Massachusetts, in the year 1853, and received his education in that State. In 1873, he came to Chicago, and went into the commission business, in the ensuing year, with O. W. Clapp, remaining with him until 1879, in which year he entered the firm of which he is now a member. He became a member of the Board of Trade in 1875, and is one of the directors of the Lake Bluff Hotel and Improvement Company. He was married, in December, 1876, to Miss Cynthia Willis, and has three children—Harry, Bessie and Louise.

GEORGE G. PARKER.—Probably in no city in the world are so many instances of men who have arisen by their own exertions to positions of honor, trust and commercial importance, as in Chicago. This statement is peculiarly applicable to the members of the Board of Trade, and one of the foremost instances is George G. Parker. Born in Boston, Mass., in 1851, he came to Chicago in 1862. He had but few educational advantages, as the boy had either to work, or starve—and he is not of the starving kind. To obtain food and lodging, he carried newspapers, at the princely remuneration of $2 a week, and continued this during 1863-65. In the latter year, he obtained the situation of doorkeeper in the main hall of the Board of Trade, and was also bookkeeper in the inspection office. He occupied these positions until 1870, when he entered the employment of H. F. Lewis & Co., commission merchants, and remained through their business existence, and was also with Musick & Gross, who succeeded Lewis & Co. in 1872. He remained with Musick & Gross until 1876, when he went into business for himself, and has managed his own trade since that time. He became a member of the Board of Trade in 1870, and was a member of the Committee of Arbitration in 1882-83, and was also a member of the Executive and Finance Committees of the Call Board, which was closed up on May 1, 1884. Mr. Parker married, in 1874, Miss Luella Knapp, of Boston, and has three children—Leslie G., Lella C., and Fred A. A sketch of this gentleman's life would be incomplete without adverting to the qualities he possesses, and which have enabled him, though so young a man, to attain the honorable position he occupies in the Board of Trade and the commercial world. These are grit, perseverance, scrupulous honesty, and business tact and comprehension, that seem almost intuitive. No lucky stroke of fortune has elevated the newsboy to the honored merchant, but the genius of hard work and uprightness of character has attended George G. Parker, and made him one of the representative self-made men of the Chicago Board of Trade.

BIGELOW & CO.—The commission house of Bigelow & Co., is composed of Edward A. Bigelow and his brother, James L. Bigelow, active members, and Samuel H. Laramie, silent partner. The house was founded, in 1865, by the last named gentleman, and did business for many years as S. H. Laramie & Co. It began in a small way, its receipts for a long time not averaging $1,000 a month; but maintaining strict integrity in all its dealings, and exercising care and prudence in all its transactions, it steadily gained in favor with the public and in financial strength. In 1877, Edward A. Bigelow entered their employ, and became so essential a factor in the business, that two years later, he was admitted into partnership, and became the principal working man of the firm. Owing particularly to the skill and enthusiasm with which he conducted the business, its receipts soon grew to over $100,000 per annum from commissions alone. For some years before he finally relinquished all active work, Mr. Laramie surrendered the expert direction of the business and, in 1883, withdrew, and a new firm was organized as first stated. This action was caused by steadily diminishing health. By the advice of his physicians he purchased a home in Santa Barbara, Cal., whither he retired in 1883, but gaining no benefit from the change, and pining to see Eastern friends before he died, his physicians here advised a return to Chicago, so, at present writing (1885), he is sojourning with relatives in the East, and not without hope that he may yet find relief and recovery from his dangerous malady.

James L. Bigelow was born at Zanesville, Ohio, on November 24, 1847. After the war, he remained with his father until 1876, when he entered the employ of Charles Ray & Co., commission men on the Board, as bookkeeper. He remained with them for two and a half years, and, when E. B. Stevens, a partner, drew out and the firm dissolved, he went with him and remained in his employ for one year more. He then began to operate on the Board for himself, and so continued until he entered into partnership with his brother Edward, in 1883. He is an active member of Grace Church, and a valuable helper in all Sunday-school, Church and benevolent work. He is a member of George H. Thomas Post, No. 5, G. A. R. On November 14, 1872, he was married to Miss Lydia M. Gould, the daughter of the late Philip N. Gould, an old and well known citizen of Chicago. James Bigelow being the older brother, during the time that they were in the army, he naturally had to guide and counsel his junior, and hence has become conservative, deliberative, and accustomed to carefully weigh the arguments before and against any project. To his excellent judgment and commercial integrity, the firm owes much of the deserved reputation it enjoys for stability and fidelity to the interests of its customers.

Edward A. Bigelow is a native of Zanesville, Ohio, where he was born on August 18, 1849. In the latter part of 1863, an older brother being already in the army, he and James—two years his senior—enlisted in Co. "F," 68th Ohio Volunteer Infantry. James was but sixteen years and Edward fourteen, but, joining the Seventeenth Army Corps, they participated in all the glorious achievements of the grand Army of the Tennessee, until they were honorably discharged at Louisville, Ky., in July, 1865—neither of them having received a scratch. While all his boys were in the army, the father, who had made such a sacrifice for his country, moved his business to Chicago. He was a druggist in Zanesville, moved to Cleveland before the war, and thence to Chicago in 1864. Here he started in the drug commission business, and when his boys returned from the army he took them into his employ. Edward continued with his father until 1877, when he went on the Board of Trade as before stated. In 1871, he lost all he had laid up, by the great fire. He had previously been engaged to be married to Miss Margaret Rebecca, the daughter of W. H. Bush, a wealthy retired lumberman; and the young couple married during the week of the fire. Mrs. Bigelow died in May, 1879. Mr. Bigelow is a member of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, and a most earnest and successful worker there. He is particularly active in Sunday-school work, and has already graduated a class, and the majority of the graduates have taken their places in the Church and Sunday-school. He is of a cheerful temperament, is enthusiastic and thorough, with a strong will, and, underneath all, has an honest and faithful heart.

JOHN W. LYKE is one of those men who, beginning life under circumstances of great hardship, early acquire a firmness and strength of character which enables them to overcome with ease obstacles which appal those more tenderly raised. It will be seen that he has fought his way up from the bottom, contesting every inch of ground, and winning by sheer force of character and solid merit. He is of German parentage—the son of Henry and Elizabeth (Merens) Lyke—and was born near Sharon Springs, Schoharie Co., N. Y., August 15, 1836. When but two years old, his parents moved to Oswego County, twenty-four miles from Oswego and fifteen from Syracuse, into an almost unbroken wilderness. Four years later his mother died, and John was put out to a severe, old-fashioned Puritan Yankee, to whose nature mercy was a stranger. But John grew, in spite of his hardships, and at the age of twelve ran away from his tormentor, and found the world, so unfriendly to the most of us, a paradise in comparison. In June, 1854, when nearly eighteen years of age, he made his way to Chicago, and that winter went down to Morris, Grundy County. There, in company with his brother, he cut and handled cord-wood on contract for the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad, receiving 75 cents a cord for cutting and $1 a cord for hauling. By extraordinary diligence and skill, he made money, and had some to lend when spring opened. He then went on the canal, as a common hand, and after working sixteen days only, was promoted to be captain, and followed the business until 1861, when he began to buy grain at Spring Lake, in company with his brother-in-law, W. H. Hamlin, whose sister, Esther Hamlin, he had married in May, 1859. In 1865, they located at Havana, Mason County, and continued to buy grain in company for three years, when they dissolved, and Lyke continued in the grain business alone—virtually until the present time. He was one of the trustees of the town for two years, and was elected a member of the board to build the Fulton and Mason County bridge, across the Illinois River. His grain business led him into close relations with Chicago Board of Trade men, and for years before moving, he was, for all business purposes, a Chicago man, but he did not move his family here until 1873, at which time he became a member of the Board. He is a staunch Republican and a popular man in the Thirtieth Ward, where he resides, as is shown by his election to the Common Council, in April, 1882, being elected by six hundred and ninety-nine majority, three candidates being in the field and that being the largest majority ever given. He is also a member of the Masonic fraternity, having been made a master mason in 1857, and is a member of Hesperia Lodge, No. 411, A. F. & A. M., of Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.; of Siloam Council, No. 59, R. & S. M., and of Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T. He is a member of the Young Men's Republican Club, and during the last presidential campaign was a member of the State Republican Campaign Committee. He has three daughters—Elizabeth E., Carrie S. and Lottie M.

ELEVATORS.

The increase in capacity of the grain elevators in Chicago, may be learned from an examination of the appended tables. The increase in capacity was not so much due to an increase in the number of the elevators as to their enlargement. Several of the smaller elevators went into disuse during this period, and were replaced by others of greater size. It is enough to say that the total increase in capacity in two years was 1,500,000 bushels; during the following year the increase in capacity was 900,000 bushels; in 1863, Chicago's facilities for storage were increased 2,650,000; during the eight years following, statistical tables show a further growth in elevator capacity of 1,365,000 bushels.

1868—Seventeen reported; storage capacity, 10,680,000 bushels. 1869—Seventeen reported; storage capacity, 11,580,000 bushels. 1870—Seventeen reported; storage capacity, 11,580,000 bushels. 1871—Fifteen reported; storage capacity, 11,375,000 bushels. The great conflagration of October 9, 1871, destroyed six elevators, having an aggregate storage capacity of 2,475,000 bushels, and, containing, at the time they were burned, 1,559,395 bushels of grain.

ELEVATORS DESTROYED BY FIRE, OCTOBER 9, 1871.
NAME.	PROPRIETORS.	RECEIVED FROM.	NORMAL CAPACITY.
Central Elevator A.....	I. & E. Buckingham.....	Illinois Central R. R. and Canal.....	700,000
Munger & Armour's Elevator.....	Munger, Wheeler & Co.....	C. & N. W. R. W., Calena Div., and Canal.....	600,000
Calena Elevator.....	Munger, Wheeler & Co.....	C. & N. W. R. W., Calena Div., and Canal.....	450,000
Hiram Wheeler's Elevator.....	Vincent, Wheeler & Co.....	C. & N. W. R. W., Calena Div., and Canal.....	400,000
National Elevator.....	Vincent, Nelson & Co.....	Chicago & Alton R. R. and Canal.....	250,000
Lamb's Elevator.....	Orrington Lamb & Brother.....	Canal.....	75,000
Total.....			2,475,000
ELEVATORS REMAINING, OCTOBER 9, 1871.
NAME.	PROPRIETORS.	RECEIVED FROM.	NORMAL CAPACITY.
Central Elevator B.....	I. & E. Buckingham.....	Illinois Central R. R. and Canal.....	1,600,000
Rock Island Elevator A.....	Flint, Thompson & Co.....	C. R. I. & P. R. R. and Canal.....	750,000
Rock Island Elevator B.....	Flint, Thompson & Co.....	C. R. I. & P. R. R. and Canal.....	1,250,000
C. B. & O. Elevator A.....	Armour, Dale & Co.....	C. B. & O. R. R.....	1,250,000
C. B. & O. Elevator B.....	Armour, Dale & Co.....	C. B. & O. R. R.....	850,000
City Elevator.....	Munn & Scott.....	C. & N. W. R. W. and Canal.....	1,200,000
Union Elevator.....	Munn & Scott.....	Chicago & Alton R. R.....	790,000
Northern Elevator.....	Munn & Scott.....	C. & N. W. R. W. and Canal.....	600,000
Munn & Scott's Elevator.....	Munn & Scott.....	C. & N. W. R. W. and Canal.....	200,000
Iowa Elevator.....	Sprague, Peterson & Co.....	Canal.....	300,000
Illinois River Elevator.....	Edward Hempstead.....	Canal.....	200,000
Total.....			8,900,000
Total.....			1,559,395
Total.....			1,559,395
Total.....			1,559,395

During this period, the storage capacity increased from 4,095,000 bushels in 1858, to 11,375,000 bushels in 1871. Each succeeding year found the warehouses full during the winter months, and often loaded vessels were lying in winter quarters, along the adjoining docks, to relieve the overflowing bins.

The receiving and handling of bulk grain from cars and canal-boats, and transferring the same, of like quality, kind and grade, to other cars, or ships, with greater expedition and at the least possible expense, was the all-important function to be performed. Thus, every railroad entering the city found elevators, with one side fronting navigable water, the other adjoining their tracks, as necessary a part of their system as the rails, engines or cars; and each new railroad completed, either laid rails to warehouses already built, or caused another of these huge structures to appear upon the banks of the river, or along the canal. In the construction of the elevators, working efficiency was of no less importance than storage capacity.

No elevators of large size were erected prior to 1854. That year, the Galena elevator was built as well as the Munger & Armour warehouse, on North Water Street, on the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad track. The Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company's elevator was built in 1855.

ELEVATORS ESTABLISHED.—WALKER, BRONSON & Co. established an elevator in 1856, or earlier. In 1858, the style of the firm was changed to Walker, Bronson & Cole (Charles H. Walker, Tracy J. Bronson, Josiah D. Cole and George C. Walker). In 1859, the firm name was changed to Walker Brothers; in 1860, to Walker, Washburne & Co.; and in 1863, to Walker, Bronson & Co. The firm disappeared from the elevator business in 1864. HIRAM WHEELER built a new elevator and established himself in the business in 1859. He continued alone until 1863, when he consolidated his business with, and became a member of the firm of, MUNGER, WHEELER & Co., of which he is still a member. ORRINGTON LUNT & Bro. (Orrington and Stephen P.) established an elevator in 1860, and continued in business until October 9, 1871, when their elevator was destroyed in the great fire. SMITH & STURGES established an elevator in 1860. The style of the firm was changed to Sturges, Smith & Co., in 1861, and again, in 1862, to Albert Sturges & Co. The firm disappeared from the list of elevator firms in 1863. STEEL & TAYLOR (George Steel and Isaac Taylor) did business during the year 1863, having a capacity for storage reported at 1,250,000 bushels. They were succeeded by Munn & Scott, in 1864. CHARLES WHEELER & Co. were first established in 1861, at which time they became proprietors of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Elevator. The business of the firm was consolidated with that of four other firms, in 1863, under the name of Munger, Wheeler & Co. SAMUEL HOWE was proprietor of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Elevator in 1856. He was succeeded by Charles Wheeler & Co., in 1861. GIBBS, GRIFFIN & Co. became established, in 1854, under the firm name of Gibbs, Griffin & Co. (George A. Gibbs, E. W. Griffin), and ceased the elevator business in 1859. GEORGE STURGES & Co., became established in 1859. They were proprietors of the "Fulton Elevator" until 1863, at which time the business was consolidated under the firm name of Munger, Wheeler & Co., as heretofore stated. S. A. FORD & Co. was established as early as 1856. The name was changed to Ford & Norton in 1860, and the firm continued in the elevator business until 1863. JAMES PECK & Co. established an elevator prior to 1856, and continued in the business until 1860. Dale & Clemons succeeded to the business in 1861, and discontinued the following year. L. NEWBERRY & Co. built a new elevator in 1861, having a storage capacity of 300,000 bushels, and the firm did business during 1862, being merged into the firm of Munger, Wheeler & Co. in 1863. HOWE & ROBBINS (Samuel Howe, proprietor of Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Elevator from 1856 to 1861, and Enos V. Robbins) were established in 1863, and the firm changed to Howe, Robbins & Ferry (Theodore Ferry) in 1864, during which year their elevator was destroyed by fire. FINLEY & BALLARD (James W. Finley and Addison Ballard) built the Illinois River Elevator, and commenced business in 1866. In 1867, the firm name was changed to Finley & Rogers (W. H. Rogers), and, in 1868, they were succeeded by Edward Hempstead. W. H. LUNT began in the elevator business as proprietor of the New Iowa Elevator in 1866, and had charge of it for two or three years. He was succeeded by Spruance, Preston & Co., in 1869. SPRUANCE, PRESTON & Co. (Harmon Spruance and J. W. Preston), established an elevator in 1860, and continued in business until 1871. EZRA E. FAY operated a floating elevator in 1861, believed to be the first ever used in the city.

J. & F. BUCKINGHAM.—In 1855, Solomon Sturges and his brothers-in-law, C. P. and Alvah Buckingham, formed a partnership for the purpose of carrying on the elevator business. They leased from the Illinois Central Railroad the ground where the Central elevators now stand, for a period of ten years. The first year they put up an elevator with a capacity of 700,000 bushels, designating it by the letter "A." Two years later they built another, of equal size, which they called elevator "B." These were the first large elevators in the city, and they received grain from all the roads entering Chicago until 1860. With 1865, their lease expired, and the Illinois Central bought the property. Immediately the new firm of John & Ebenezer Buckingham leased the same property from the railroad for ten years. The great fire burned elevator "A," leaving "B" untouched—the only elevator spared in the burned district. The firm immediately began the work of reconstruction, and in the spring of 1873 had completely re-built "A," with a capacity of one million bushels. In 1869, they enlarged elevator "B" to a capacity of one million five hundred thousand bushels, and later added cribs with a storage capacity of three hundred and fifty thousand bushels. This gave the Central elevators a capacity of two million eight hundred and fifty thousand bushels of grain. Elevator "A" is 100 by 200 feet on the ground, and is furnished with all the modern appliances for rapid handling of grain. The power is supplied by a Corliss engine. A single belt is capable of elevating five thousand bushels of grain an hour, and, on one occasion, they loaded a vessel with sixty-five thousand bushels of wheat in an hour and twenty minutes. Elevator "B" is 100 by 300 feet on the ground. Both elevators are under contract, and can receive grain only from the Illinois Central Railroad, except the overflow from the other elevators in the city.

Ebenezer Buckingham, the only surviving partner of the elevator firm of J. & E. Buckingham, was born at Zanesville, Ohio, January 16, 1829. His brother, and former partner, John, was also a native of Zanesville. The brothers formed a co-partnership about the close of 1865, for the purpose of taking the place of Sturges, Buckingham & Co. in the control of elevators "A" and "B," which they subsequently named the Central elevators. They did a prosperous business for many years, and the partnership was only dissolved by the death of John Buckingham, August 21, 1881. Ebenezer Buckingham entered Yale College in the fall of 1844, from which he graduated in 1848, at the age of nineteen. Until 1857 he was connected with the banking business. In 1859, he came to Chicago, and was employed by the firm of Sturges & Buckingham, with which firm he remained until 1866, when he and his brother John succeeded the original house. On May 5, 1853, he was united in marriage to Lucy Sturges, daughter of Solomon Sturges, by whom he has had several children. Mr. Buckingham is one of the best known and esteemed of the old citizens of Chicago. If he would consent to burden himself with their care, there is no end to the interests which would be intrusted to him; but he is not ambitious in a political sense, and too much occupied with his own affairs to find leisure to attend very much to the affairs of others. He is, however, president of the Trader's Insurance Company and director of the Northwestern National Bank. He belongs also to the Citizens' Association and the Citizens' League, and is a member of the First Presbyterian Church.

MUNGER, WHEELER & Co. This house was established in 1854, by the firm of Munger & Armour (Wesley Munger, George Armour). In 1863, the firm name was changed to Munger, Wheeler & Co. and the business interests of Wesley Munger and Hiram Wheeler were consolidated. The latter had followed the elevator business here since 1849, and Munger and Armour since 1854. In the winter of 1855-56 Munger & Armour built an improved steam elevator in the city, and these two firms did the principal business in their line. In 1864, James R. McKay, who had been in the employ of Munger & Armour since 1858, was admitted into the firm; and in 1867, George Henry and Charles W. Wheeler also entered into partnership. Wesley Munger died January 24, 1868, and his only son and heir, Albert A. Munger, took his place in the company. In 1881, George Armour died, and his estate is now represented in the firm; the estate also of Jesse Hoyt, who died in 1882, still owns its interest in the concern. The active members of the firm at present are George H. and Charles W. Wheeler and James R. McKay.

Hiram Wheeler, the founder and senior member of the firm of Munger, Wheeler & Co., was born at New Haven, Addison Co., Vt., August 20, 1809. At the age of fourteen, he entered his brother's store at Vergennes, as a clerk, and in a few years went to New York. In the fall of 1832, he removed to Niles, Mich. In 1840, Mr. Wheeler moved to this city, and purchased a warehouse on South Water Street, near Clark-street bridge, and entered into the storage and forwarding business. He moved thence to the foot of Franklin Street, where he rented the Gibbs & Griffin elevator and the Marine Bank. On his return to New York City, in September, 1853, Mr. Wheeler married Miss Julia Smith, daughter of Francis Smith, by whom he has had five sons—Frederick A., Charles W., George H., Eugene and Arthur. Having brought up all his sons to his own business, when he started in Chicago he had ample assistance in his own family. Hiram Wheeler has been a member of the Chicago Club, since its first organization. He also belongs to the Calumet Club, to the Washington Park Driving Club, and to the Sons of Vermont. He has withdrawn from active life, and is enjoying, with his wife and family, his ample fortune. He made an extensive tour in Europe in 1879-80.

Albert A. Munger is the only child of Wesley Munger, who died in 1868, to whose place in the company and the large estate he became sole heir. He was born at Chicago, January 24, 1845, the place of his birth being the site of the wholesale dry goods house of Marshall Field & Co. In 1862, he went abroad with his parents to complete his education, and received the best instruction obtainable in Geneva and Dresden. He did not return until after the close of the war, in 1865. Mr. Munger is a gentleman of leisure, with ample means to gratify every taste. He leaves the affairs of the wealthy company of which he is a member to his partners Messrs. Wheeler Bros. and McKay, and, beyond the time necessary to the management of his private estate, he pursues his own inclinations and pleasure. He is a bachelor, and spends much of his time abroad, traveling in various parts of the world. He owns an elegant home in this city, and there keeps bachelor's hall, where he entertains his friends. He has a cultivated taste, and has collected a large assortment of art treasures, with which he has adorned his home and the large rooms he keeps for his offices in the Metropolitan Block, of which he is the owner. He is very popular with his friends, and has all sorts of social honors thrust upon him. He is an honorary member of Co. "F," 1st Regiment, Illinois N. G., a distinction very rarely conferred by this popular and aristocratic military organization. He is also a member of the Chicago, Calumet and Union clubs and of the Citizens' Association.

Charles W. Wheeler was born at LaPorte, Ind., November 11, 1838. He received a common school education and found employment in his father's business as soon as he was old enough to be of any use to him. First at LaPorte, then at St. Joseph, Mich., and finally at Chicago and continuously ever since, his business interests have been inseparable from those of his father. In 1867, he was admitted into the firm of Munger, Wheeler & Co., and has always taken an active part in the conduct of its affairs. He was married, on December 27, 1866, to Adaline Parmelee, daughter of Franklin Parmelee, the well known omnibus man of Chicago. He is a member of the Chicago, Union and Calumet social clubs and of the Washington Park Driving Club.

George Henry Wheeler was born at LaPorte, Ind., August 1, 1841. He was but eight years old when he came with his father's family to Chicago in 1849, and is essentially a Chicago man in everything except birth. With the exception of a business course in Racine College in 1856, he received his education in the schools of this city, and his whole business and social life has been passed here. He began work with his father, and in 1867 was admitted into the firm, taking at once an active and important part in the management of its affairs. On December 15, 1864, Mr. Wheeler was married to Miss Alice L. Lord, daughter of G. Lord of Watertown, N. Y., and has had two children, Henry and Mabel. He is a member of several society clubs and organizations, a life-member and patron of the Art Institute of Chicago and several other similar associations, but is very domestic in his habits and tastes, devoting his time to his family outside of business hours.

James R. McKay was born in Lemont, Will Co., Ill., June 8, 1840. His father, James McKay, came to Chicago in 1835, and, while engaged on the Illinois and Michigan Canal, lived for a short time at Lemont. After its completion, he moved to Waukegan, in the spring of 1841, and finally settled in Chicago in 1855. When fifteen years old, James entered Hathaway's Mathematical School, on the very spot where the Metropolitan Block now stands, and spent about two and a half years in study under the best instructors the city then afforded. He then engaged in the bank of I. H. Burch, on the corner of Clark and Lake streets, as assistant teller, where he spent two years. In 1858, he entered the employment of Munger & Armour, as bookkeeper, and in 1864, at the consolidation with Hiram Wheeler, he became a member of the new firm of Munger, Wheeler & Co., and has had charge of their office ever since. January 10, 1867, he was married to Elizabeth Mears, daughter of the well known lumberman, Nathan Mears. They have had five children—Marion, Elizabeth, James, Robert and Nathan. Mr. McKay is a member of the Citizens' Association, and of the Chicago and Union clubs.

ARMOUR, DOLE & Co. was established in 1860, by Wesley Munger, George Armour and Charles Dole. In 1861, they took the firm name under which they have done business continuously ever since. They have had charge of the grain receipts of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad since the building of the first elevator ("A"), capacity 850,000 bushels, in 1860. The increase of their business has been as follows: In 1863, elevator "B" was built, storage capacity, 850,000 bushels; in 1873, elevator "C" was added, capacity, 1,500,000 bushels; in 1879, elevator "D," capacity, 1,500,000 bushels; in 1882, elevator "E," with a capacity of 1,000,000 bushels. Elevator "A" was enlarged to 1,250,000 bushels in 1867. The present (1885) capacity of the four elevators still controlled by the firm, is as follows: Storage room, 6,350,000 bushels; receiving and shipping capacity, 700,000 bushels a day; shipping capacity, when not receiving, 1,500,000 bushels a day.

JAMES BARRELL, the manager of the great commission house of Armour & Dole, and who owns an interest in the business, was born in London, England, on September 28, 1834—the son of John and Elizabeth (Evans) Barrell. His early boyhood was passed in the academic schools of London. At the age of twelve years, he came with his father to Chicago, and with him was engaged in the grocery business for about four years. At the age of sixteen he was employed as a clerk in the post-office at Chicago, where he remained for ten years, the last half of the time occupying the position of chief clerk of the western distribution. Leaving the post-office, he engaged with Armour & Dole, and during the life of Mr. Armour, had charge of the office. After the death of Mr. Armour, he succeeded him as general manager, and has held that position until the present time. Mr. Barrell was married, January 5, 1864, to Miss Sue S. Finley, daughter of James W. Finley, of Chicago. They have three sons—James F., Stewart E. and Albert M. He is a member of Garden City Lodge, No. 141, A. F. & A. M.; of Lafayette Chapter, No. 2, R. A. M.; of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; and of Oriental Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S. He is also a member of the Chicago, the Calumet and the Washington Park clubs.

FLINT, ODELL & Co.—This firm was established, in 1854, under the firm name of Flint, Wheeler & Co. (T. J. S. Flint, Calvin T. Wheeler and Daniel Thompson). The firm name was changed to Flint & Thompson, in 1861; to Flint, Thompson & Co., in 1864; and to Flint, Odell & Co. (James W. Odell) in 1878, under which name the firm is now (1885) engaged in the business which it has followed consecutively for twenty-eight years. Their first elevator had a storage capacity for 160,000 bushels. Rock Island Elevator "A," with a capacity for 750,000 bushels, was completed in 1856. In 1863, Rock Island Elevator "B" was built, with storage capacity for 1,250,000. Elevator "A" was entirely re-built, with a capacity of 1,500,000 bushels, in 1884-85. The aggregate storage capacity of these two elevators, in 1885, was reported at 2,600,000 bushels; receiving and shipping capacity, 300,000 bushels a day; and for shipping alone, 650,000 bushels a day.

VINCENT, NELSON & Co.—This firm comprises B. B. Vincent, Murry Nelson and Enoch B. Stevens. They built the National Elevator in 1867, and continued in business until October 9, 1871, at which time their elevator was burned. They re-built in 1871-72. Their first elevator, built in 1867, had a storage capacity for 250,000 bushels; their new elevator, built in 1871, still (1885) known as the National Elevator, and operated by the National Elevator and Dock Co., has a storage capacity for 1,000,000 bushels, and is stated to be the only fire-proof grain elevator in Chicago, having been adopted by the National Board of Underwriters as the standard. No wood is exposed outside; there are brick and hollow-tile walls, while the roof, receivers, scale-hoppers, spouting, etc., are all of iron. Mr. Stevens retired from the firm in August, 1877. The B. B. Vincent estate, with Murry Nelson, continued the business until the present corporation was formed, and are now the largest stockholders.

MUNN & SCOTT commenced business in 1856, under the firm name of Munn, Gill & Co. The style of the firm was changed, in 1858, to Munn & Scott (Ira Y. Munn, George L. Scott). Under this name the firm continued until the great fire of October 9, 1871. Soon after they were succeeded by the firm of George Armour & Co. During the fifteen years of the firm's existence, it ranked among the most enterprising and trustworthy, and their business grew to excel in magnitude that of any other house in the city. Their warehouses received grain from the Chicago & Alton Railroad, the Chicago & North-Western Railway, besides much from other railroads and the canal. The growth and extent of their business was: 1858 to 1862, one elevator, with storage capacity for 200,000 bushels, capable of receiving and shipping 30,000 bushels a day, and of shipping 75,000 bushels a day; 1863, three elevators, with aggregate storage capacity for 1,500,000 bushels, capable of receiving and shipping 165,000 bushels a day, and of shipping, when not receiving, 370,000 bushels a day; 1864-71, four elevators, with aggregate storage capacity for 2,700,000 bushels, capable of receiving and shipping 300,000 bushels a day, and of shipping 675,000 bushels a day.

NATHAN HENRY WARREN was born in Concord, Mass., on December 9, 1827, and attended the public schools of that vicinity until thirteen years of age, when he went to the Concord Academy, then kept by John and Henry Thoreau, the latter of whom afterward became well known as a naturalist, lecturer and writer. He remained at school until he was eighteen years of age, and then took charge of a farm which his father had purchased near the center of the town, and selected as a special branch of business the breeding of Ayrshire stock, then coming into notice as superior for dairy purposes. After the passage of the fugitive slave law by Congress, in 1850, the section of the law which imposed a fine of $1,000 upon any person who should harbor, assist, or, when called upon, refuse to recapture, any fugitive slave, caused a deep feeling of opposition in Massachusetts, and Mr. Warren, with others, organized societies to assist fugitives. Until the War of the Rebellion, it was his duty, as conductor upon the Underground Railroad, to take to a secure place upon his premises, and keep until a party could be made up, such persons "fleeing from service" as arrived in Boston. These persons were forwarded from station to station until they reached Canada. In 1860, while serving in a "Wide Awake Club," Mr. Warren contracted so severe a cold that a bronchial affection was the result, and for several years the question whether he could live on the coast of New England remained unsettled. In the winter of 1863, he went to Hilton Head, S. C., bought one of the abandoned plantations, which were being sold by the Government for non-payment of taxes, and tried the experiment of raising a crop of cotton. With regular weekly wages as the incentive, instead of the lash, the experiment was a success, and he sold the plantation in the summer of 1864, with a fine crop of cotton nearly ready to gather, and came to Arlington, Ill., where his brothers and present partners were then doing a grain and lumber business. It was decided to open a grain commission house in Chicago, which was done in April, 1865, under the firm name of N. H. Warren & Co., composed of N. H. Warren, Cyrus T. Warren and Charles C. Warren. There has been no change in the firm since that time. They commenced building grain elevators on the line of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad in 1867, and, in 1872, built in Nebraska, and have continued doing so to this time. They have sold many of them, but their receipts of grain, principally from their own elevators, are about six millions of bushels a year. Mr. Warren has been twice married; first to Mary Prescott Barrett, in Concord, Mass., on April 26, 1849, and had the following children: Mary Elizabeth, Ella, George Henry, Alice and Charles. He was again married in July, 1879, to Mrs. Minerva T. O'Hara, and they have one child—Paul Livingston.

The working capacity of the elevators of the city were given in detail in the published reports for 1858 to 1863, inclusive, to which have been added estimates, based on that data, for succeeding years, in the following table:

YEAR.	Storage capacity, bush.	Capacity to receive and ship per day, bush.	Capacity to ship per day. Bushels.	Aggregate* amount of grain handled each year—bush.
1858-----	4,095,000	405,000	1,340,000	22,910,000
1859-----	4,095,000	545,000	1,385,000	18,195,000
1860-----	5,475,000	675,000	1,835,000	35,840,000
1861-----	5,915,000	675,000	1,795,000	51,545,000
1862-----	6,815,000	770,000	2,095,000	56,695,000
1863-----	10,010,000	1,110,000	2,520,000	56,819,000
1864-----	9,935,000	1,110,000	2,520,000	48,725,000
1865-----	10,055,000	1,110,000	2,520,000	53,555,000
1866-----	6,980,000	1,110,000	2,520,000	65,775,000
1867-----	10,680,000	1,180,000	2,670,000	57,130,000
1868-----	10,680,000	1,180,000	2,670,000	64,335,000
1869-----	11,580,000	1,290,000	2,800,000	60,285,000
1870-----	11,580,000	1,290,000	2,800,000	57,780,000
1871-----	11,375,000	1,260,000	2,840,000	81,360,000

GRAIN WAREHOUSING.—With the enormous increase in the volume of grain passing through the various warehouses, the business of the warehousemen increased in its importance, from year to year. With the gradual perfections of the system of inspection and grading, the warehouse receipts became as stable tokens of value as the bank bills that purchased them, and the responsibility of the warehousemen themselves came to be viewed as demanding as strict integrity, as accurate and unimpeachable business conduct, as the business of banking itself, and as involving even greater fiducial responsibility to the public. Indeed, the deposits of grain held in trust by these warehousemen often exceeded in value the money held in trust by all of the city banks. The warehouse receipts issued for grain were not, in their tenor, unlike certificates of deposit. An important element of difference, however, consisted in the fact that while the banker is, by consent of the depositor, free to use the funds left in his care, between the warehouseman and the storer of grain there is no such understanding; since the former received a specified sum for holding the property intact and ever ready for immediate delivery on payment of storage.

Nevertheless, under the somewhat crude State laws first passed for the regulation of the business, many and quite serious abuses grew up. Warehouse receipts for grain were issued by the warehousemen as soon as the elevators were built and grain began to be stored; the grain belonging to different parties being stored in separate bins and delivered in kind. Under this custom, no two bins were likely to contain grain of similar quality, and it was impossible to ship a cargo (unless drawn from a single bin) which approached in kind or quality the uniformity of any modern grade. There also was a marked difference in the quality of "Standard" wheat, as drawn from the different elevators, and much trouble and vexation prevailed among the wheat dealers, which increased in proportion to the increase of the grain trade, wheat, from the many diverse varieties, qualities and conditions in which it came to the market, being always the most difficult to manage. Each warehouse had its own inspector, who was selected generally for his honesty and known skill as a judge of the quality of grain, more especially wheat. In fact, there were no uniform or well-defined grades of wheat recognized in Chicago prior to 1856. During that year, the Board of Trade made the first move toward establishing grades of wheat, by the separation of the three leading varieties into three standard grades, to be known as "White Wheat," "Red Wheat" and "Spring Wheat," which grades were defined as to the weight of a measured bushel and general condition. The warehousemen generally sanctioned this first effort to classify the grain, co-operating with the Board, of which many of them were members. But the variable standard of inspection at the different warehouses still remained a constant source of discontent and disagreement. There was no statutory law, at that time, which defined the standard, or enforced its strict adoption upon all alike. The action of the Board of Trade, being unsanctioned by law, was advisory only, and this the warehousemen were free to adopt or reject. The measure was too imperfect to remedy the evil, although it clearly pointed out the way. Things grew from bad to worse; the mixing of good wheat with inferior grades, prior to its delivery, became so common a practice among buyers and shippers, as to seriously degrade the market of Chicago, and to divert much of the better wheat to other points, whence it might reach Eastern markets through channels whereby the Chicago warehouses, and the prevailing lax inspection, might be avoided.

* Exclusive of amount drawn from store by mills, and inclusive of amount remaining in store at the close of each year.

In 1858, a second and successful effort was made, through the joint efforts of the Board of Trade and the leading warehousemen of the city, to establish uniform grades. On May 1, 1858, the board of directors had under consideration the subject of reform in grain inspection, and presented a report to a meeting of the Board of Trade, in which they condemned the prevailing methods, as affording no uniformity and fixing no responsibility, recommending the employment of one chief inspector, with power to appoint deputies, subject to ratification by the directors. In consequence of this report, a committee was appointed to draft a new system of wheat inspection. The committee comprised Julian S. Rumsey, S. H. Butler and Charles S. Dole. They recommended the rejection of much of the wheat that had been, prior to that date, passed as "Standard," and proposed, after June 15, to make the inspection much more rigid than formerly; grading it as "Club wheat," "No. 1 Spring," "No. 2 Spring" and "Rejected." The assistance of the storage merchants in making the new rules effective was asked. This report was accompanied by an agreement, signed by the leading warehousemen, without whose co-operation the proposed reform would have been impossible, except through compulsory legal enactment.

The Board of Trade passed resolutions establishing the grades as recommended, and designating June 15 as the date when the new system should go into effect. During the season, several changes were found necessary in the grades as first established. "No. 2 Spring" was changed to "Standard," and test weights of the different grades of spring wheat were defined. Subsequently, "No. 2 Spring" was re-established, as an intermediate grade between "Rejected" and "Standard."

The first chief inspector appointed was George Sitts. The first Committee on Inspection, under the new rules, comprised Julian S. Rumsey (president), S. H. Butler and C. S. Dole.

Up to the close of 1858, the new system applied only to such grain as was received by the various railroads. At that time the Board of Trade voted to extend the system to cover grain received by lake and canal, if put in store. There being no law to enforce the resolution upon the warehouses receiving grain from the canal-boats, large quantities continued, for years afterward, to go into store uninspected. The proportionate amount of the grain received and inspected under the new rules, from June 15, when they first went into effect, to December 31, 1858, as shown by the inspector's books, was as appears in the following tables :

WHEAT.

GRADE INSPECTED.	RECEIVED. BUSH.	SHIPPED. BUSH.
No. 1 White Winter .....	112,800	151,568
No. 1 Red Winter .....	634,800	572,853
No. 2 Red Winter .....	360,600	329,222
Rejected Winter .....	59,300	-----
Club .....	2,100	38,079
No. 1 Spring .....	189,200	354,265
No. 2 Spring .....	2,120,500	2,959,399
Rejected Spring .....	648,500	345,744
Total inspected .....	4,127,500	4,712,030
Received by Canal and teams, not inspected .....	1,564,553	-----
Shipped—inspection not reported .....	-----	484,850
Total .....	5,692,353	5,206,880

CORN.

GRADE INSPECTED.	RECEIVED. BUSH.	SHIPPED. BUSH.
No. 1 .....	1,148,400	2,978,757
No. 2 .....	801,900	1,082,808
Rejected .....	551,100	394,947
Total inspected .....	2,501,400	4,456,512
Received by Canal and teams, not inspected .....	4,396,917	-----
Shipped and locally consumed—inspection not reported .....	-----	1,921,452
Total .....	6,898,317	6,377,964

OATS.

GRADE INSPECTED.	RECEIVED. BUSH.	SHIPPED. BUSH.
No. 1 .....	404,400	753,993
No. 2 .....	13,200	109,189
Rejected .....	116,400	-----
Total inspected .....	534,000	863,182
Received by Canal and from other sources, not inspected .....	671,512	-----
Shipped and locally consumed—inspection not reported .....	-----	74,595
Total .....	1,205,512	937,777

RYE.

GRADE INSPECTED.	RECEIVED. BUSH.	SHIPPED. BUSH.
No. 1 .....	17,500	5,000
No. 2 .....	7,800	1,269
Rejected .....	1,200	-----
Total inspected .....	26,500	6,269
Received by Canal and from other sources, not inspected .....	31,509	-----
Shipped and locally consumed—inspection not reported .....	-----	1,310
Total .....	58,009	7,569

BARLEY.

GRADE INSPECTED.	RECEIVED. BUSH.	SHIPPED. BUSH.
No. 1 .....	21,200	21,420
No. 2 .....	69,600	55,573
Rejected .....	14,400	3,349
Total inspected .....	105,200	62,342
Received by Canal and from other sources, not inspected .....	73,400	-----
Shipped, or locally consumed—inspection not reported .....	-----	2,119
Total .....	178,600	64,461

The system of inspection thus became established in 1858, although it was many years before the grades were allowed to remain unchanged a sufficient time to be recognized and relied upon in Eastern and foreign markets.

In August, 1859, the grades of wheat were for the first time defined fully as to required quality, condition and weight, as now. The grades were re-established at that time, and were defined as follows :

No. 1 White Wheat : The berry to be plump, well cleaned, and free from other grains.

No. 2 White Wheat : To be sound, but not clean enough for No. 1.

No. 1 Red Wheat : The berry to be plump, well cleaned, and free from other grains.

No. 2 Red Wheat : To be sound, but not clean enough for No. 1.

Rejected Winter Wheat : Unsound and unmerchantable wheat, and to weigh not less than forty-five pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 1 Spring Wheat : The berry to be plump, well cleaned, free from other grains, and to weigh not less than fifty-eight pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 Spring Wheat : To be sound, but not clean enough for No. 1, and to weigh not less than fifty-two pounds to the measured bushel.

Rejected Spring Wheat : All unsound, unmerchantable spring wheat, and to weigh not less than forty-five pounds to the measured bushel.

The above standard remained in vogue until January 1, 1860, when the minimum standard weight to the bushel of No. 1 Spring was increased to fifty-nine pounds, and of No. 2 Spring to fifty-three pounds.

It would be uninteresting to trace the inspection through all the comparatively trivial changes that subsequently occurred. No sweeping revision of grades has been made since 1859, and the prescribed standards of weight, quality and condition established by the Board of Trade and warehousemen of Chicago, during that year, have remained the essential tests to this day.

Laws regulating Warehousing.—Prior to 1851, there was no law in Illinois relating especially to the warehouse business, and each warehouseman was "a law unto himself," subject only to the penalties provided by the general statutes for the punishment of fraud or other business delinquencies or misdemeanors. In January of that year, the first special act to regulate the business was passed. It was designated "An act relating to Wharfingers and other persons, and to prevent fraud." It provided that no receipt should be issued for grain not actually in store, and none for money loaned; that no second receipt should be issued while the first was outstanding; that property in store should not be transferred without the consent of the party holding the receipt. Violations of its provisions were made felonies, punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years; these penalties being in addition to the right of an aggrieved party to maintain a civil action for damages. For sixteen years, grain-warehousing was conducted in Chicago under the provisions of this law. At the time the law was framed, the storage and shipping of grain was the least important feature of the warehouse business, there being at that time only three elevators in the city, with an aggregate storage capacity of not to exceed 100,000 bushels. The total amount of wheat shipped was but 437,660 bushels. Warehouse receipts for grain were seldom negotiated or passed, as they afterward were when speculation became rife, and the grain was usually stored, each lot in a separate bin, for immediate shipment, or for the account of the owner until such time as he might choose to sell it.

In 1867, the second "Warehouse bill" was passed. During the period intervening between the passage of the first and second bill, the business had grown to be the most important factor in western trade. In place of the three small houses were seventeen elevators, with an aggregate storage capacity for 10,680,000 bushels, which were filled during the winter months with wheat, corn, rye, oats and barley, divided in the aggregate into twenty well-defined and distinct grades, for which the warehousemen had issued warehouse receipts, current in all the grain marts of the country, and which they were pledged to redeem, on presentation, in full weight and exact quality as called for in the receipt presented. They were the favorite collateral security for loans in the city, and were often held by the banks on deposit in amounts far exceeding their capital. No class of Chicago business men had more weighty responsibilities, or more important trusts, thrust upon them than the warehousemen, and it is but simple justice to state that none endured so severe a test with less stain upon their reputation. Nevertheless, sufficient abuses were apparent, both in connection with the warehouse business and among the members of the Board of Trade, to call attention to the inadequacy of the existing laws to regulate a business which had developed many entirely new features since they had been enacted, and had, in its magnitude and importance, so entirely outgrown them. The subject became a matter of serious discussion in the newspapers, on the Board of Trade, among warehousemen and throughout the whole business community. In response to the generally expressed public sentiment, that a complete revision of the laws for the regulation of warehousing was a necessity, the Legislature, in February, 1867, passed a bill known as the "Warehouse Act." It contained twenty-two sections, and embodied the provisions of the former law, besides containing a multiplicity of new regulations, skillfully devised to meet contingencies not contemplated at the time of the passage of the earlier act.

The new law was accepted, and observed without any notable attempt to evade its provisions, although many complaints were made against what was deemed oppressive features. Among those thus condemned were: the forbidding of public warehouses to receive grain without inspection—considered an unwarranted interference with the property rights of citizens, since inspection was, in a manner, forced upon them by the alternative of being otherwise restricted or deprived of facilities for storage; the extreme and severe penalties prescribed for violations of the law, some of which were arbitrarily stated, leaving the courts no discretion in the matter. There was, however, contained in the act an attempt to prohibit entirely the evil of speculative trade in grain, which aroused the strongest opposition on the part of the speculative members of the Board of Trade, who, numerically, at that time, had control of the body. The obnoxious sections were treated as void and of no effect by many members, although some ineffectual efforts were made to prosecute offenders. As these provisions proved powerless to effect the desired reform (in some cases proving an actual hindrance to legitimate trade) and did not seem germane to a bill for the regulation of warehousing, the obnoxious sections were unconditionally repealed April 8, 1869. The law was not further amended until 1871.

The present Constitution went into force August 8, 1870. In this Constitution, warehouses were first recognized as of sufficient importance to come within the purview of the fundamental law, and several sections were devoted to the subject. In accordance with the spirit of this article in the Constitution, the Legislature, during the session of 1871, made a complete revision of the statutory laws concerning warehousing and the inspection of grain, and passed an act which took the entire control of the inspection of grain and the establishment of grades from the Board of Trade, and placed it under supervision of officers of the State, the whole warehouse business being put under the control of the same officers. The act was approved April 25, 1871, and went into effect July 1.

The great fire, which occurred on October 9, destroyed six out of the seventeen large elevators then in Chicago, besides a large part of the receipts for grain stored in those which remained. To rescue the business from the demoralization and confusion which ensued, an act was passed by the State Legislature, convened in special session, November 4, 1871, authorizing the delivery, by warehousemen, of grain stored prior to October 8, 1871, without the production of any receipt therefor, upon presentation of proof, under oath, that the receipt originally issued for the same was destroyed in the fire.

GRAIN-WEIGHING IN CHICAGO.—Before 1880, the method of weighing grain in bulk in this city, for transportation by rail to Eastern points, was in a very chaotic state, and gave rise to interminable disputes and complaints. There was, in fact, no arrangement for weighing grain not intended for the elevators, except such as the railroads themselves furnished. The railroad companies always weighed the cars, to obtain the basis for freight charges, and the dealer had no other data upon which to base his estimates than that furnished by them. The very wide margin for possible errors in their weight will be appreciated, when we consider the loose methods then in vogue among them, and the fact that they guaranteed nothing. They weighed the cars and contents for their own purposes, and buyers and sellers were welcome to take such figures as they had—or not; it was no affair of theirs. They were in the habit of weighing car after car, all coupled together in a train, as they ran them over the scales, and took the weight as marked upon the cars by the builders for the tare. It might be correct—might not—no one knew; it was about so much—more or less. But the public got tired of such methods, and the board of directors of the Board of Trade, in conjunction with the Grain Receivers' Association, resolved to find a remedy. Honest John Wade had been the weigh-master for the Board of Trade since April, 1872, and a more capable man, or one more satisfactory to the general public, than he, could not be found in Chicago. He was known all over the country, east and west, and everywhere liked; so John Wade it must be, and he was unanimously requested to take supervision of the whole matter—first, of the grain sent east over the great propeller lines, and, afterward, to take similar charge of all grain sent east by railroads. He at once instituted the most radical and thorough reforms. Capable and trustworthy men were now employed by him to attend to each road, and the whole is under his own careful superintendency. The railroad scales were all taken out, tested, repaired, put into perfect order, and each road bound itself to keep them so under his direction. The cars are uncoupled and each one weighed separately, and after they are unloaded, the empty cars are again weighed, and John Wade's certificate, when issued, is the end of all dispute, and the basis for every transaction in grain of the character we have indicated. Everything is done with accuracy and dispatch, and business not only greatly facilitated, but placed upon a reliable and satisfactory basis to all parties.

JOHN WADE, Board of Trade weigher, was born at Ipswich, Essex Co., Mass., on October 23, 1823. He is the son of W. F. Wade, who was the treasurer of Essex County for fifty years. His grandfather was Colonel Nathaniel Wade, who was next in command to Benedict Arnold, at West Point, at the time of Arnold's desertion to the enemy on the discovery of his treason. It is related in the traditions of the family that Colonel Wade was out with Arnold to supper that very night, and when returning met an aide, who spoke in Colonel Wade's ear the one word "Beware." The family still retain the autograph letter of General Washington to the colonel, directing him to assume command until relieved by his superior officers. John Wade fitted for college at New Haven, but left school at the age of twenty, and took a clerkship in a wholesale cotton house in New York, where he remained for four or five years. After an interval of two years spent in Boston, he returned to New York, and, in company with his brother, established himself in the grain commission business about 1850. In 1862, he came to Chicago, and opened an office in the same line, under the firm name of J. Wade & Co., and for some years was one of the heaviest, and at one time very much the heaviest, shipper in the city. For some years his annual shipment on Eastern account averaged several millions of bushels of grain, and at one time, before the fire, he sent forward one and a half millions of bushels in fifteen days. In April, 1872, he was appointed Board of Trade weigh-master for one year; and has been re-appointed annually ever since. His duties are in the nature of an arbitrator of disputes as to the weights of different lots of grain, etc., changing hands in the course of trade on the Board. Mr. Wade was united in marriage, at the old Park Street Church, to Miss Charlotte Augusta Dexter, daughter of Dr. Theodore Dexter, of Boston Mass. His children are John Wade, Jr., now in the commission business on his own account; Ella A. Wade; and J. Louise, wife of C. C. Swinbourne, cashier of the Corn Exchange Bank. When in New York, Mr. Wade united with the old Westminster Presbyterian Church, and has never transferred his membership, although he is an active attendant of the Sixth Presbyterian Church of this city. He is also an earnest member of, and worker in, the Citizens' League for the suppression of the sale of liquors to minors and drunkards. He donates liberally to the Chicago Relief and Aid Society and other charities, and is fully in sympathy and identified with every worthy enterprise in the city.

THE FIRST SUMMER PORK-PACKING was done in Chicago in 1858, by Tobey, Booth & Co. and by Van Brunt & Watrous. These firms stored up ice during the previous winter, and packed during the summer as follows: Van Brunt & Watrous, 25,826; Tobey, Booth & Co., 11,475—total summer packing 37,301 hogs. The experiment was looked upon with distrust by many packers and most provision dealers at that time. It proved, however, practicable, and to these two firms is due the credit of having successfully inaugurated this most important industry. Thenceforth, the hot weather ceased to be a restriction to the business, if it were otherwise feasible and profitable to continue packing during the summer months.

STATISTICS.

The following statistical tables show the extent of operations in grain, breadstuffs, provisions, farm products, etc., for a series of years:

TABLE SHOWING THE RECEIPTS AND SHIPMENTS OF BUTTER, SEEDS, SALT, LIQUORS AND HIGHWINES, AND COAL, FOR A SERIES OF TWENTY YEARS.

YEAR.	BUTTER—POUNDS.		SEEDS—POUNDS.		SALT—BARRELS.		LIQUORS AND HIGHWINES—BARRELS.		COAL—TONS.
	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.
1852	1,327,100	-----	618,000	12,853	91,674	59,333	7,441	16,242	46,233	1,441
1853	812,430	577,338	2,197,187	2,185,269	81,789	38,785	8,487	7,027	38,548	2,988
1854	2,143,569	609,449	3,947,949	2,109,832	169,556	91,534	17,331	8,013	156,775	5,068
1855	2,473,982	1,056,631	3,023,238	3,484,013	169,946	107,993	18,433	6,335	109,576	12,153
1856	2,668,938	297,748	2,843,202	2,828,759	175,687	83,601	30,000	6,266	93,020	16,161
1857	3,039,385	309,556	2,257,223	1,537,948	204,473	99,918	28,185	10,654	171,350	23,942
1858	3,166,923	512,833	4,271,732	4,027,846	334,997	191,279	38,664	28,007	87,290	15,611
1859	-----	-----	5,241,547	4,647,960	316,291	257,847	29,431	29,529	131,204	16,886
1860	-----	-----	7,071,074	6,055,563	255,148	172,963	62,126	65,223	131,080	20,364
1861	-----	-----	7,742,614	7,438,485	390,499	319,140	89,915	111,240	148,080	20,093
1862	-----	-----	8,176,348	6,165,221	612,003	520,227	61,703	100,170	218,423	12,917
1863	-----	-----	9,885,208	7,754,656	775,364	579,694	137,947	159,312	284,196	15,245
1864	8,819,903	5,927,769	10,180,781	11,782,656	680,346	483,443	102,032	138,644	323,275	16,779
1865	7,492,028	5,206,865	14,745,340	7,514,928	611,025	444,827	32,435	66,053	344,854	24,190
1866	9,126,825	8,503,321	13,618,858	13,316,210	496,827	452,537	60,202	65,995	496,193	34,006
1867	3,816,638	2,926,239	23,062,397	19,058,921	492,129	455,740	30,812	49,250	546,208	69,170
1868	5,503,630	3,972,021	25,503,180	15,870,950	686,857	524,014	61,933	69,535	658,234	83,390
1869	10,224,803	5,898,391	22,895,545	12,217,398	524,321	535,626	129,478	156,404	799,000	95,620
1870	11,682,348	6,493,143	18,861,148	6,287,615	674,618	571,013	165,689	176,508	887,474	110,467
1871	13,231,452	11,049,307	20,234,146	14,213,989	793,917	459,138	120,969	171,031	1,081,472	96,883

HISTORY OF CHICAGO.

COARSE GRAINS.

YEAR.	CORN.				OATS.
	Receipts. Bushels.	Shipments. Bushels.	Local consumption or left on hand. Bushels.	Opening and closing price for the year.	Receipts. Bushels.	Shipments. Bushels.	Local consumption or left on hand. Bushels.	Opening and closing price for the year.
1858	8,252,641	7,726,264	526,277	$0 44- 56	2,883,597	1,519,069	1,364,528	$0 25- 50
1859	5,401,870	4,349,360	1,052,510	58- 43	1,757,606	1,185,703	547,410	47- 34
1860	15,862,394	13,700,113	2,162,281	49- 30	2,198,889	1,091,697	1,107,191	35- 17
1861	26,369,989	24,372,725	1,997,264	30- 23	2,067,018	1,633,237	433,781	17- 18
1862	29,574,328	29,452,610	121,718	23- 41	4,668,772	3,112,366	1,556,406	18- 43
1863	26,611,653	25,051,450	1,560,203	41- 93	11,086,131	9,234,858	1,851,273	43- 66
1864	13,807,745	12,235,452	1,572,293	93-1 30	16,351,616	16,567,050	-----	66- 65
1865	25,952,201	25,437,241	514,960	90- 47	11,659,080	11,142,149	516,940	65- 26
1866	33,543,061	32,753,181	789,880	45- 80	11,340,264	9,961,215	1,179,040	42- 48
1867	22,772,715	21,267,205	1,505,510	75- 87	12,355,006	10,226,026	2,128,980	42- 56
1868	25,579,494	24,770,626	799,868	*87- 81	16,032,910	14,440,830	1,592,080	56- 40
1869	23,475,800	21,586,808	1,888,992	45- 79	10,611,940	8,800,646	1,810,294	46- 42
1870	20,189,775	17,777,377	412,398	72- 47	10,472,078	8,507,735	1,964,343	40- 40
1871	41,853,138	36,716,030	5,137,108	44- 41	14,789,414	12,151,247	2,638,167	40- 32

YEAR.	RYE.				BARLEY.
	Receipts. Bushels.	Shipments. Bushels.	Local consumption or left on hand. Bushels.	Opening and closing price for the year.	Receipts. Bushels.	Shipments. Bushels.	Local consumption or left on hand. Bushels.	Opening and closing price for the year.
1858	71,012	7,569	63,443	No. 1 $0 50- 66	413,812	132,020	281,792	No. 2 $0 50- 65
1859	231,514	134,404	97,110	66- 75	652,696	486,218	166,378	68- 60
1860	318,979	156,642	162,334	80- 46	617,619	267,449	350,170	66- 43
1861	496,981	393,813	97,168	46- 22	457,589	226,534	231,055	43- 34
1862	1,038,825	871,796	167,029	32- 60	872,053	532,195	339,868	34- 00
1863	865,508	651,094	214,414	60-1 02	1,280,342	946,223	234,119	1 00-1 35
1864	1,060,116	893,492	166,624	I 02- 1 12	1,018,813	545,208	673,605	1 35- 50
1865	1,194,834	999,289	195,545	I 12- 55	1,774,139	607,484	1,166,655	1 50- 00
1866	1,679,541	1,444,574	234,967	55- 98	1,742,642	1,309,821	441,821	1 00- 72
1867	1,201,821	1,213,389	78,432	98- 51	2,360,984	1,816,891	514,093	72- 74
1868	1,523,820	1,202,941	320,879	I 54- 10	1,915,056	901,183	1,003,873	1 74- 55
1869	952,201	798,744	156,457	I 14- 75	1,513,110	633,753	879,357	1 55- 80
1870	1,093,493	913,629	179,864	75- 76	3,335,653	2,584,692	750,961	80- 75
1871	2,011,788	1,325,867	685,921	76- 73	4,069,410	2,908,113	1,161,297	75- 61

* No. 1. † No. 2. ‡ Local consumption and excess of shipments drawn from surplus of previous year.

BREADSTUFFS.

YEAR.	WHEAT.				FLOUR.
	Receipts. Bushels.	Shipments. Bushels.	Local consumption, or left on hand. Bushels.	Average price. Per bushel. §		Receipts. Barrels.	Manu- factured Chicago. Barrels.	Total stock of flour. Barrels.	Shipments. Barrels.	Local sales, or left on hand. Barrels.	Average price per year. †
				Winter.	Spring.
1848	-----	2,160,800	-----	$0 70- 70	-----	-----	-----	45,200	-----	$3 75- 4 00
1849	-----	1,936,264	-----	82- 66	-----	-----	-----	51,309	-----	3 75- 4 00
1850	-----	853,644	-----	80- 78	-----	-----	-----	100,871	-----	4 50- 4 75
1851	-----	437,669	-----	62- 05	-----	-----	-----	72,406	-----	2 50- 4 00
1852	937,496	695,496	302,000	68- 40	93,337	70,979	124,316	61,106	63,120	2 75- 25
1853	1,687,465	1,206,163	481,302	85- 60	187,597	82,883	131,130	74,109	56,940	3 75- 25
1854	3,038,955	2,306,925	732,030	I 39- 09	187,585	66,990	224,575	107,627	116,648	6 98- 7 48
1855	7,535,097	6,298,155	1,236,942	I 55- 31	240,662	79,650	320,312	163,410	156,803	7 12- 8 14
1856	3,767,769	8,364,420	403,340	I 27- 05	324,021	86,668	140,980	216,389	193,600	4 91- 6 26
1857	10,554,761	9,846,052	798,709	I 17- 93	393,934	96,000	489,934	250,648	230,286	----- 5 06
1858	9,630,614	8,850,257	787,357	75- 10	57- 85	522,137	140,493	662,549	470,402	192,138	3 50- 4 75
1859	8,060,766	7,166,660	894,070	I 08- 10	81- 96	726,321	161,500	887,824	686,351	201,470	4 50- 4 80
1860	14,927,983	12,402,197	2,524,886	I 08- 02	1 00- 80	713,348	232,000	945,348	698,132	249,216	5 00- 4 30
1861	17,337,002	15,835,953	1,551,049	80- 69	80- 69	1,179,284	291,852	1,771,136	1,603,920	167,216	4 40- 3 75
1862	13,978,116	13,808,898	169,218	77- 103	71- 99	1,066,301	260,680	1,927,371	1,739,849	187,522	4 00- 5 00
1863	11,409,116	10,793,295	614,866	I 15- 19	1 00- 18	1,424,206	236,261	1,660,467	1,522,085	138,382	5 00- 5 50
1864	12,184,977	10,259,026	1,934,951	I 16- 81	1 18- 1 79	1,205,698	255,056	1,460,754	1,285,343	175,411	5 50- 8 75
1865	9,266,419	7,614,887	1,651,523	I 19- 31	1 79- 31	1,134,100	288,820	1,422,920	1,293,428	128,492	8 00- 8 00
1866	14,978,753	10,118,907	1,859,646	I 31- 20	2 20- 20	1,847,145	445,522	2,292,667	1,981,525	311,142	8 00- 12 00
1867	13,695,244	10,557,123	3,138,121	I 26- 07	2 20- 07	1,720,001	574,096	2,294,097	2,015,455	278,642	12 00- 9 25
1868	14,772,994	10,374,683	4,397,411	I 26- 86	2 07- 1 26	2,192,413	732,479	2,924,892	2,399,610	525,273	9 25- 6 75
1869	16,876,760	13,244,249	3,632,511	I 26- 86	2 21- 86	2,218,822	434,285	2,762,107	2,330,603	432,044	6 50- 5 25
1870	17,394,499	16,432,585	961,824	I 86- 09	1 86- 09	1,766,037	443,997	2,210,004	1,795,977	904,227	5 00- 5 75
1871	14,439,656	12,995,449	1,534,207	I 12- 11	1 12- 11	1,412,177	327,739	1,739,916	1,287,574	452,342	5 75- 6 75

§ For the year 1858, and subsequent years, in this column the prices cited are the 'opening and closing prices for the year,' for 'No. 1 Red Winter' and 'No. 1 Spring,' respectively. For the year 1858, and subsequent years, the first column indicates the 'local sale or barrels left on hand,' and the second column the 'opening and closing price for the year, for Extra Spring.'

PROVISIONS.

YEAR.	CATTLE AND BEEF.
	Range of prices per 100 pounds.	Number received.*	Number shipped.	Number packed for the season.†	Number of local consumption, and on hand.	Range of price of mess beef, per barrel.
1858.....	$2 00@ 3 50	140,534	42,638	45,504	52,393	$11 00@12 00
1859.....	3 50@ 3 25	111,694	37,584	51,666	21,504	10 00@14 00
1860.....	3 00@ 4 25	177,101	97,474	34,624	45,003	8 00@12 00
1861.....	2 50@ 3 00	204,259	124 145	56,703	23,351	7 00@10 00
1862.....	2 50@ 2 50	209,655	112,745	59,627	36,223	8 50@12 00
1863.....	2 00@ 5 25	304,448	201,066	70,086	33,296	9 00@12 00
1864.....	2 75@ 9 00	338,840	253,439	92,459	-----*	12 00@23 00
1865.....	2 50@10 00	330,301	301,637	27,172	1,492*	10 00@16 00
1866.....	2 50@ 8 25	384,251	268,733	25,966	85,904	8 00@22 00
1867.....	3 50@10 00	329,243	216,982	35,348	66,813	13 00@20 00
1868.....	3 00@ 9 50	323,514	217,897	26,950	78,667	12 50@19 00
1869.....	@-----	403,102	294,717	11,963	96,422	13 00@15 50
1870.....	2 50@ 8 00	532,964	391,709	21,254	126,001	10 00@14 50
1871.....	2 50@ 7 25	543,050	401,927	16,680	125,043	8 00@13 00

YEAR.	SWINE AND PORK.
	RANGE OF PRICES.		RECEIVED.		SHIPPED.		Number packed during the season.	Range of price of mess pork, per barrel
	Live.	Dressed.	Live.	Dressed.	Live.	Dressed.
1858.....	$1 00@ 5 40	$4 75@ 6 50	416,225	124,261	159,181	32,832	179,654	$12 00@17 00
1859.....	4 00@ 5 75	4 50@ 7 25	188,671	82,533	87,254	22,992	151,339	14 50@19 00
1860.....	4 60@ 5 70	5 00@ 7 00	285,149	107,715	101,931	35,233	271,805	14 50@20 00
1861.....	4 25@ 2 35	5 00@ 2 75	549,030	126,863	216,982	72,112	505,691	9 25@20 00
1862.....	2 70@ 3 00	3 20@ 4 30	1,110,971	237,919	446,506	44,629	970,264	8 25@11 50
1863.....	3 90@ 6 00	4 30@ 7 10	1 606,813	359,055	752,151	110,309	904,659	11 00@18 50
1864.....	4 25@13 00	6 50@15 12	1,285,571	289,457	501,277	69,115	760,514	17 50@43 00
1865.....	6 50@13 25	9 75@15 00	757,072	92,239	575,511	69,034	507,355	22 50@ 38 00
1866.....	5 30@10 50	7 00@11 50	933,233	353,093	484,793	91,306	639,332	17 00@ 33 50
1867.....	5 20@ 7 50	7 00@11 25	1,696,686	260,431	760,547	156,091	796,226	17 00@24 50
1868.....	5 95@10 75	7 20@11 50	1,706,592	281,923	1,020,812	226,901	597,954	21 00@30 00
1869.....	7 50@12 25	10 00@15 50	1,661,869	190,513	1,086,305	199,650	688,140	28 00@ 33 75
1870.....	6 25@10 30	6 75@11 50	1,693,158	266,214	924,483	171,188	919,197	18 00@ 30 00
1871.....	3 10@ 7 90	4 37@ 9 00	2,380,083	272,466	1,162,286	169,473	1,225,236	12 00@ 23 00

* The receipts do not include the cattle driven in and disposed of to private butchers or otherwise outside the principal stock yards.

† The number given as packed is for each season, extending from March 31 to March 31.

The receipts and shipments are for each year, from January 1 to January 1, hence the apparent discrepancy, where the spring packing absorbed the receipts given, up to the preceding January.

TABLE SHOWING, FOR A SERIES OF TWENTY YEARS, THE RECEIPTS, SHIPMENTS, AND LOCAL INCREASE IN THE MANUFACTURE OF LEADING MEAT PRODUCTS.

YEAR.	BEEF. TIERCES AND BARRELS.		PORK. BARRELS.		PROVISIONS AND CUT MEATS. POUNDS.		LARD. POUNDS.
	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.	Receipts.	Shipments.
1852.....	1,189	53,965	3,270	10,976	1,937,237	1,446,500	67,793	1,200,000
1853.....	207	64,499	11,250	29,809	8,993,993	9,266,318	888,568	1,847,852
1854.....	1,697	56,143	25,701	51,542	14,402,012	5,189,725	4,380,979	2,596,912
1855.....	12,427	55,790	29,265	77,623	9,628,445	6,401,487	471,062	1,803,900
1856.....	225	23,794	13,298	52,104	10,323,463	13,034,892	821,227	3,908,700
1857.....	481	44,402	8,918	30,078	6,252,228	3,463,566	2,170,200	-----
1858.....	605	49,530	26,570	80,859	8,007,064	-----	3,114,600	5,286,000
1859.....	6,223	123,932	24,533	92,218	6,700,612	9,272,450	3,916,251	7,232,750
1860.....	1,747	85,563	11,120	91,721	12,728,328	15,935,243	4,813,497	10,325,019
1861.....	3,113	50,154	32,495	65,196	15,254,013	59,748,388	6,841,940	16,406,822
1862.....	781	151,631	66,953	193,920	29,336,466	71,944,010	19,764,315	54,595,123
1863.....	2,806	137,302	97,113	449,152	36,756,281	95,300,815	25,683,722	58,036,728
1864.....	9,249	140,627	41,190	298,250	17,018,277	50,955,322	13,259,628	42,342,670
1865.....	19,791	103,064	53,198	284,734	10,866,118	55,026,600	7,501,805	28,487,407
1866.....	787	67,762	15,382	257,470	8,463,598	73,011,584	8,553,358	26,755,368
1867.....	3,475	84,622	35,922	176,851	14,693,767	82,325,522	11,030,478	27,211,525
1868.....	4,534	75,424	34,797	141,321	7,055,814	95,106,106	6,050,065	23,527,821
1869.....	1,478	48,624	45,248	121,635	20,930,202	86,707,466	6,804,675	17,278,520
1870.....	20,554	65,369	40,883	165,885	52,162,881	112,433,168	7,711,018	43,292,249
1871.....	53,289	89,452	68,949	149,724	30,150,899	163,113,891	17,662,798	61,029,853

The excess of shipments shows the increase in packing, from year to year. It does not, however, show the full amount manufactured, since no account is taken of the unknown amounts locally consumed.

LIST OF PERSONS AND FIRMS ENGAGED IN PACKING BEEF AND PORK, WITH NUMBER OF HOGS AND CATTLE PACKED BY EACH FOR THE SEASON OF 1858-59.

NAME.	CATTLE. No. Packed.	Hogs. No. Packed.	REMARKS.
R. M. & O. S. Hough.....	8,200	36,000	Built their first packing-house in 1850.
Cragin & Co.....	15,000	30,014	Commenced packing in 1854.
Van Brunt & Watrous.....	750	25,454	Resided in New York. Bought the Milward packing-house, and commenced packing in 1858.
Jones & Culbertson.....	-----	15,000	Built packing-house in 1857. Commenced packing in 1858.
G. S. Hubbard & Co.....	6,311	23,546	Commenced packing in 1834.
Tobey & Booth.....	-----	9,000	Commenced packing in 1852.
Leland & Mixer.....	-----	8,300	-----
George Steel & Co.....	-----	3,581	Commenced packing in 1843.
G. & J. Stewart.....	-----	5,139	Stewart & Co. in 1857.
Thomas Nash.....	-----	-----	Came from Baltimore. First packed in 1857, renting the slaughter house on the South Branch built by Henry Milward.
J. G. Law & Co.....	-----	2,500	Successors to Moore, Seaverns & Co., who had packed since 1854. They sold out to Law & Co. in 1858.
P. Curtis.....	-----	2,000	Packed with Andrew Brown in 1855.
Burt & Higgins.....	-----	1,000	Commenced packing in 1858.
Holden & Priest.....	-----	3,000	Succeeded S. Holden in 1858.
Andrew Brown & Co.....	-----	9,000	Commenced packing in 1853.
Louis Richberg.....	-----	550	Commenced packing in 1858.
Smith & Son.....	-----	400	Commenced packing in 1858.
Reynolds, Lunt & Co.....	-----	1,000	Prior to 1857, Reynolds & Hayward.
Xoyes.....	-----	1,000	Commenced packing in 1858.
Tobey, Booth & Co.....	-----	1,000	Succeeded O. H. Tobey in 1854.
Hayward, Bloomfield & Co.....	4,300	1,000	Prior to 1857, Reynolds & Hayward.
Charles Silver.....	-----	1,000	Commenced packing in 1858.
A. Brown & Co.....	4,800	-----	Commenced packing in 1853.
Clybourne & Co.....	6,143	-----	In slaughter business since 1827. Commenced packing in fall of 1833.
Total.....	45,504	179,484

TABLE SHOWING PRINCIPAL FIRMS ENGAGED IN PACKING BEEF AND PORK, WITH NUMBER OF CATTLE AND HOGS PACKED BY EACH FOR THE SEASON OF 1871-72.

NAME.	CATTLE. No. Packed.	Hogs. No. Packed.	REMARKS.
Allerton, Robertson & Co.....	-----	28,349	Commenced in 1871.
Armour & Co.....	3,812	68,033	Successors to H. O. Armour & Co. Established in 1867.
Botsford, H. & Co.....	-----	83,602	Established in 1869 or 1870.
Chicago Packing and Provision Co.....	-----	168,070	Succeeded Burt, Hutchinson & Snow. Established in 1866.
Culbertson, Blair & Co.....	4,623	111,347	Successors to Jones & Culbertson. Established in 1857.
Hale, F. M.....	-----	12,650	Commenced packing in 1871.
Hancock, John L.....	1,892	61,183	Established in 1860 or 1870.
Higgins, George W. & Co.....	-----	88,832	Successors to Burt & Higgins. Established in 1858.
Hough, O. S. & Sons.....	-----	32,345	Successors to R. M. & O. S. Hough. Established in 1850.
Kelley, Jacob & Co.....	-----	25,728	Successors to Kelley Brothers. Established in 1868.
Kent, A. E. & Co.....	5,753	133,487	Established in 1860.
Kriegh, D. & Co.....	-----	45,424	Successors to Kriegh & Harbach. Established in 1860.
Libby, A. A. & Co.....	-----	5,540	Commenced packing in 1871.
McKichan, S. & Co.....	-----	28,546	Successors to McKichan, Quirk & Co. Established in 1864.
Mitchell, J. C.....	-----	25,770	Successor to Turner & Mitchell. Established in 1862.
Morrill, John & Co.....	-----	26,587	Commenced packing in 1871.
Murphey, B. F. & Co.....	-----	37,167	Established in 1863.
Nash, John.....	-----	27,008	Successor to Thomas Nash. Established in 1857.
Nutting, S. S. & Co.....	-----	5,763	Established in 1869 or 1870.
Oliver & Pierce.....	-----	8,506	Established in 1869 or 1870.
Perkins, Dupree & Co.....	-----	20,250	Commenced packing in 1871.
Reid & Sherwin.....	-----	41,251	Established in 1862.
Ruggles, Crosby & Taylor.....	-----	29,963	Successors to Freeman, Ruggles & Crosby. Established in 1865.
Shoeman, S. & Co.....	-----	6,000	Commenced packing in 1871.
Tobey & Booth.....	-----	28,985	Established in 1852.
Williams & Davis.....	-----	17,620	Commenced packing in 1871.
Others packing less than 5,000 each.....	-----	48,150
Total.....	16,080	1,225,236

FEDERAL INSTITUTIONS.

MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI.

The history of the Military Division of the Missouri extends to the early part of the year 1865, some four months prior to the close of the Civil War. It was established by general order No. 11 of the War Department, January 30, 1865, and, at that time, included the departments of the Missouri and the Northwest. Major-General John Pope was assigned to the command, with headquarters at St. Louis. On March 21, 1865, by general order No. 44 of the War Department, the Department of Arkansas and the Indian Territory was transferred from the Division of the West Mississippi to that of the Missouri, and on June 27, 1865, by general order No. 118 of the War Department, the Division of the Missouri was merged into the Division of the Mississippi, and placed under command of Major-General W. T. Sherman. The name of General Sherman's command was changed, August 6, 1866, to the Military Division of the Missouri, and comprised the Departments of the Missouri, Platte, Dakota and Arkansas. The State of Arkansas was taken from the Division March 11, 1867, and the State of Illinois and the post of Fort Smith, Arkansas, added to it March 16, 1869. Fort Smith was discontinued as a military station in June, 1871. On March 24, 1869, Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan, who had been in command of the Department of the Missouri prior to its consolidation, with headquarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, succeeded General Sherman in command of the Division. The Department of Texas was added to the Division November 1, 1871, and the Department of the Gulf January 4, 1875; and in June, 1875, the limits of the Department of the Platte were extended to include a portion of the Territory of Idaho, embracing Fort Hall, which has since been discontinued as a military post. The Department of the Gulf was taken from the Division May 1, 1877.

The headquarters of the Military Division of the Missouri were transferred from St. Louis, Mo., to Chicago, on April 1, 1869, and the designation of the department was changed from Department of Missouri to the Military Division of the Missouri October 27, 1883.

The first military headquarters were located in the Merchants' Building, at the northwest corner of LaSalle and Washington streets. There they were totally destroyed in the fire of 1871, scarcely a record being saved. After the fire, the headquarters were established at No. 566 Wabash Avenue, from which floated the first flag raised after the fire. From there, they were removed to No. 588 Wabash Avenue in the same year.

This sketch would be incomplete without extended reference to the life and services of the distinguished general whose fame, in a great measure, belongs to Chicago; whose fighting qualities were demonstrated in many of the hardest-fought battles of the war; who was contemporaneous with Grant, Sherman, and the bearers of other illustrious names, in the grandest historical epoch of our Nation's history; whose ardor and valor were ever ready to meet the expectations and sustain the plans of the great commanders. His "Ride to Winchester" is indelibly graven on the annals of his country, and his nobility of character is an endearing association to the hearts of his countrymen.

PHILIP HENRY SHERIDAN was born at Somerset, Ohio, March 6, 1833. His early years were passed in the pursuits common to the country lads of the neighborhood, and after a common country school education he entered the store of his brother as a clerk. After graduating from West Point, his history is one of constant and active military duty, and his promotions were rapid. He co-operated intelligently with Grant and Sherman all through the war, and always forer the fighting. He scourged and discouraged the enemy by sudden cavalry dashes in their rear, destroying their railroads and bases of supplies. The word "retreat" is not in his military history. He came upon a charge with ten thousand mounted infantry from his successes in the Shenandoah Valley, and was in at the fall of Richmond. His attack on Pickett's troops, which formed the extreme right of Lee's forces, proved a complete success in the decisive action at Five Forks. It was the first dash at Lee's lines, which were shattered and broken, which led up to the complete victory and the end of the Rebellion, in which all of the great generals participated.

The following is the official record, showing General Sheridan's military history: Cadet at United States Military Academy, West Point, from July 1, 1853, to July, 1853, when he was graduated and promoted in the army to Brevet Second Lieutenant of Infantry July 1, 1853; served in garrison at Newport Barracks, Ky., 1853; on frontier duty at Fort Duncan, Texas, 1854; La Pena, Texas, 1854; Turkey Creek, Texas, 1854; promoted to Second Lieutenant of the Fourth Infantry, November 22, 1854; served at Fort Duncan, Texas, 1854-55; in garrison, Fort Columbus, N. Y., 1855; on frontier duty, escorting topographical party from Sacramento Valley, Cal., to Columbia River, Oreg., 1855; Gakina Expedition, 1855; Fort Vancouver, Washington Ter., 1855-56; scouting, 1856, being engaged in the defense of the Cascades, April 28, 1856; Grande Ronde reservation, 1856; Fort Hoskins, Oreg., 1856-58; Fort Yamhill, Oreg., 1859-61; promoted to First Lieutenant, Fourth Infantry, March 1, 1861; Captain of the 13th Infantry, May 14, 1861. Served through the Rebellion, 1861-66: As president of the Board for auditing claims, at St. Louis, Mo., November 18 to December 16, 1861; as chief quartermaster and commissary of the Army of Southwest Missouri, December 26, 1861, to March 12, 1862; in the Mississippi Campaign, April to September, 1862, being engaged as quartermaster of Major-General Halleck's headquarters on the advance to Corinth, Miss., April 18 to May 25, 1862; in command of brigade on raid to Booneville, Miss., as Colonel of 2d Michigan Cavalry Volunteers, May 28, 1862; pursuit of rebels from Corinth to Baldwin, Miss., May 30 to June 10, 1862, participating in skirmishes at Booneville, Blackland, Donaldson Cross Roads and Baldwin, June, 1862; action of Booneville, July 1, 1862; promoted to Brigadier-General United States Volunteers, July 1, 1862; in command of the 11th Division, Army of the Ohio, October 1, 1862, on the advance into Kentucky, being engaged in the battle of Perryville, October 8, 1862; march to the relief of Nashville, Tenn., October and November, 1862; in command of division in the Tennessee Campaign, Army of the Cumberland, November, 1862, and September, 1863, being engaged in the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862; Major-General of the United States Volunteers, December 31, 1862, to November 8, 1864; pursuit of rebels under Van Dorn to Columbia and Franklin, capturing train and prisoners near Eagleville, March, 1863; Tullahoma Junction, June 24 to July 4, 1863; capture of Winchester, Tenn., June 27, 1863; crossing the Cumberland Mountains and the Tennessee River, August 15 to September 4, 1863; battle of Chickamauga, September 19-20, 1863; operations in and about Chattanooga, December, 1863; battle of Missionary Ridge, November 23-25, 1863; in occupation of East Tennessee, December, 1863; skirmish of Dandridge, January 17, 1864; in command of Cavalry Corps, Army of the Potomac, April 4 to August 3, 1864; Richmond Campaign, being engaged in the battle of the Wilderness, May 5-6, 1864; combat of Todel's Tavern, May 7, 1864; capture of Spottsylvania Court House, May 8, 1864; cutting of the Virginia Central and Richmond & Fredericksburg railroads; action at Beaver Dam, May 10, 1864; battle of Yellow Tavern,

May 11, 1864; combat of Meadow Bridge, May 12, 1864; actions of Hanovertown and Tolopotomy Creek, May 27, 1864; battle of Hawes's Shop, May 28; action of Metadequin Creek, May 30; battle of Cold Harbor, May 31, June 1; raid toward Charlottesville and return to Jordan's Point on the James River; charting the Virginia Central and the Richmond & Fredericksburg railroads; battle of Trevilian's Station, June 11-12; action at Tunstall Station, June 21; skirmish at St. Mary's Church, June 24; action at Darbytown, July 28; in command of the Army of the Shenandoah, August 4-7, 1864, and of the Middle Military Division, August 7, 1864, to March 25, 1865; Brigadier-General of the United States Army, September 20, 1864; battle of Opequan, September 19, 1864; battle of Fisher's Hill, September 22; battle of Cedar Creek, October 19; action of Middletown, November 12; Major-General of the United States Army, November 8, 1864; raid from Winchester to Petersburg, February 27 to March 24, 1865; destroying the James River and Kanawha Canal; cutting the Gordonsville, Virginia Central, and Richmond & Fredericksburg railroads; combat of Waynesboro', March 2, 1865; actions of North Anna Bridge, Ashland, and innumerable minor actions and skirmishes in the Richmond Campaign; in command at the battle of Dinwiddie Court House, March 31, 1865; Sailor's Creek, April 6; Appomattox Station, April 8; minor cavalry engagements in pursuit of the enemy, April 2-9; capitulation of Lee at Appomattox Court House, April 9, 1865; raid to South Boston, North Carolina, returning to Petersburg, April 24 to May 3, 1865; in command of the Military Division of the Southwest, June 3 to July 17, 1865; of the Military Division of the Gulf, July 17, 1865, to August 15, 1866; of the Department of the Gulf, August 15, 1866, to March 11, 1867; of the Fifth Military District (Louisiana and Texas), March 11 to September 5, 1867; of the Department of the Missouri, September 12, 1867, to March 27, 1869. It is not alone in General Sheridan's military history all interest in his character and pursuits lies. While a brilliant fighter, he is essentially a man of peace. He took up his home permanently in Chicago upon his accession to the command of the Division of the Missouri, after his visit to Europe, where, in company with Bismarck and Von Moltke, he witnessed the strategical and bloody actions of Gravelotte and Sedan in the Franco-Prussian War. His civil history is a record of good deeds; of many acts of charity, hidden beneath a becoming cloak of modesty; while his genial qualities attract and make friends of all who meet him. In the advancement and prosperity of Chicago, he early took a warm interest, and his public spirit has many times been of advantage to the prosperity of the city.

THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY.

The history of the Federal Judiciary in Illinois dates back to the year 1819, when, under an act of Congress passed in March of that year, Nathaniel Pope was appointed judge for the district including the entire State. Vandalia was then the capital of the State, and it was there that Judge Pope, with William H. Braun as clerk, held court and dispensed justice until January 4, 1838, when Springfield was named as the pivotal point of the Federal district. Judge Pope removed to Springfield, and remained on the bench until the date of his death, January 13, 1850, when Honorable Thomas Drummond, subsequently judge of the Circuit Court, was appointed by President Taylor to the vacancy occasioned by Judge Pope's death. By an act of Congress, passed February 13, 1855, the State of Illinois was divided into two judicial districts, the Northern and the Southern.*

THE SECRET SERVICE.

The Chicago branch of the Secret Service was established in the fall of 1869 by Colonel Hiram C. Whitely, then chief of the Service. Thomas Lonergan was the first agent in charge at Chicago, having been appointed in November, 1869, and serving for several years. In October, 1874, Elmer Washburne, of Chicago, was made chief of the Secret Service, under whom Charles D. Townsend, an appointee of Chief Whitely, served for a few months, and was succeeded by Patrick D.

Tyrrell as the operative at Chicago. Captain Tyrrell served until January, 1878, when he was succeeded by Captain Wallace H. Hall, who assumed the office August 10 of that year. The Secret Service agents are allowed assistance when extra services are required. The duties attaching to the division comprise looking after counterfeiters and detecting frauds upon the treasury. The agents also extend their services to the attorney-general of the United States in any investigations coming within the sphere of his department. The first Secret Service office in Chicago was in the Lombard Block on Monroe Street, between Clark and Dearborn, and since 1870 it has followed the other government offices to their various locations. The Chicago operatives have been of great service to the government in ferreting out the secrets of the notorious "whisky ring" in 1875; the "straw-bond" cases of James Baxter and others in 1878; and the famous Brockway-Doyle counterfeiting case in 1880, besides innumerable minor cases of counterfeiting and frauds upon the government. The agents were formerly obliged to act as special examiners of pensions; but the frauds in this department became so numerous that their detection consumed all of the time of the Secret Service agents, and this branch of the government detective service was transferred to the Pension Bureau, and a corps of special examiners of pensions created, with headquarters at Washington.

CAPTAIN WALLACE H. HALL, chief of bureau of the Chicago District of the Secret Service Division of the United States Treasury Department, was born in Farmington, Trumbull Co., Ohio, November 9, 1836, the son of Thomas E. and Sarah (Viets) Hall. His boyhood days were passed in his native village, where he attended the primary school, and afterward the Western Reserve Seminary at Farmington, finishing at that institution in 1858. For nearly two years following, he traveled in the East and South, and in 1860 went to the Pennsylvania oil region, the attention of the whole world being attracted to that locality by the discovery of petroleum. He made his headquarters at Titusville, and invested in oil and oil-lands as a speculator, until 1868, when he parted with his entire interests, and for six years remained in Western Pennsylvania as a hotel proprietor. At that time he began to do his first work in the Secret Service, and was assigned to different duties, principally at the cities of New York, Boston and Philadelphia. His present commission was issued to him from Secretary Sherman in 1878, and the same year he took charge of the Chicago District, which at the present time comprises the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and the Territory of Dakota. Since receiving his commission, Captain Hall has taken an active part in all the principal counterfeiting cases with which his department deals. His first work was to assist in running down the notorious Ballard family, consisting of four brothers—Tom, Ben, John and Bill Ballard, engravers and counterfeiters—who were all sentenced to the penitentiary. Tom, being the most skillful and dangerous, was sentenced by Judge Wallace, at Buffalo, in January, 1875, to thirty years in the penitentiary at Albany, N. Y., the others being sentenced to ten years each; as also was Oscar Finch, who operated with them. Captain Hall made a brilliant capture, at Chicago, of James B. Doyle, in October, 1881, he having in his possession $204,000 in one thousand dollar counterfeit bonds. Doyle's sentence was twelve years in the Illinois Penitentiary at Chester. Another celebrated capture was that of Dow Crockett, one of the desperadoes of Southeastern Missouri. Another notorious counterfeiter, who is now in the Missouri Penitentiary, is Fred. Diebusch, arrested in St. Louis in 1874, receiving a ten years' sentence, having, but a few months previous to his arrest finished a like term at the same prison. Captain Hall has been interested in the capture of many of the most celebrated criminals in the United States; and through his vigilance and unremitting labors, dangerous counterfeit plates, dies, and other paraphernalia have been unearthed and destroyed, and their makers and possessors punished. He took part in bringing to justice a large number of counterfeiters and plate-dealers in New York, among whom were Tom and Charley Condon, Ransom Warner, Ed. Griffin, Eli Fields, George Craver; in Philadelphia, Tom Morretti, Bill Robinson, alias "Gopher Bill"; and in Washington, Ben. Hallock, who, being a clerk in the Treasury Department, stole $46,000 and was arrested in New York, tried and convicted at Washington, and sentenced to the Albany Penitentiary for four and one-half years. He was also a prominent motor in the case of the famous Winslow; whose arrest was of especial interest on account of being president of the Scandinavian National Bank of Chicago, before its failure in 1873. Winslow was employed in the cash-room at Washington, and stole a package of money containing $12,000, which was to be sent to the National Bank of Illinois, substituting a roll of tissue paper. Winslow was arrested, all but $100 recovered, and he was sentenced to two years at Al-bany, his age and previous respectability mitigating his crime. At Pittsburgh, the conviction of Dr. Frank and George Conner led to the arrest of Miles Ogle, who served eight years, and was lately re-captured at Memphis, Tenn., with fresh counterfeit plates. Pettis Holland was arrested by Captain Hall's operatives in Tennessee; also the following prominent criminals: "Big Jim" Kennelly, Bill Petit, John Clark and John Hill of St. Louis; Aleck Murpo, of Nauvoo, Ill.; Charley Chambers, of Duluth; and Jim McGovern—who is now doing time at Stillwater, Minn.; also Jim Holden and Bill Martin, of Peoria; and a number of criminals of less importance, making a total of several hundred who have been sentenced from this district through the vigilance and unremitting energy of this official. Mr. Hall was married in 1862 to Miss Harriet L. Andrews, of Centreville, Penn., who died in 1885. He has one son, William Lawtry Hall, twenty years of age, who is also employed in the U. S. Secret Service, and is one of the most promising and efficacious operatives in that department.

* For the further history of the Federal Judiciary, see the chapter on "Bench and Bar."

THE CUSTOM HOUSE.

The Chicago Custom House is rated as the most important of all the local branches of the Federal service. An account of its earlier years, the making of Chicago a port of entry, and the re-appointment of William B. Snowhook as collector, on March 18, 1853, appears at length in the first volume of this work. Mr. Snowhook was the first collector of the port, receiving his appointment direct from President Polk; and when the Democrats again came into power, he succeeded Jacob Russell, who has served under the Whig administration. The Custom office was at this time in the Starkweather Building, on LaSalle Street, near Randolph. Collector Snowhook remained in office until July 10, 1855, when he was succeeded by Philip Conly, who retained the office until the advent of President Buchanan's administration, when, on March 31, 1857, Jacob Fry was appointed his successor. Mr. Fry assumed possession of the office early in May, and served until June 15, 1858, when he was removed, and Bolton F. Strother, a lawyer, was appointed in his stead. Collector Strother managed the office until after the inauguration of President Lincoln in 1861. The business of the Custom House in 1857 was greater than that of any other government department, the value of exports being $1,585,096, the imports from Canada $326,325, and the total duties collected on imports $143,009.23. The collector of customs was formerly, ex officio, sub-treasurer, called a "depository," and had charge of all the government collections, being paid a percentage on the money handled. In 1854-55, the business of the port assumed such proportions as to demand much work in its management, and it was not until then that any clerical force aside from the collector and his deputy, were employed. Under Mr. Conly, Thomas J. Kinsella was deputy collector, and Frederick C. Russell under Mr. Strother. In 1866, four men performed the work of the office, but from that time forward it demanded extra force. On March 30, 1861, Julius White was appointed to succeed Mr. Strother as collector, but he resigned a few months afterward, to take the colonelcy of a regiment then formed in Chicago. From October 3, 1861, to March 9, 1866, the office was filled by Luther Haven, and from March 10, 1866, until June 30, 1866, the office was managed by Thomas J. Kinsella, as acting collector. During the last year of Collector Strother's management, the office was removed from LaSalle Street to the newly erected government building, at the corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets.

This building was known both as the Custom House and the Post-office. Portions of the site were purchased January 10, 1855, July 1, 1857, and January 26, 1865; the total cost being $68,600. The contract price of construction was $276,750, and the actual cost of construction $365,694. The total cost of the building up to June 30, 1871, including alterations and repairs was $505,618. It was almost destroyed in the great fire, only the walls being left standing. A short time prior to the fire, an appropriation of $11,956 was made for furnishing the building. This building was 80 by 150 feet in area, three stories and sub-basement, built of stone. It faced Dearborn and Monroe streets, and on the other two sides there were open courts. The Post-office occupied the basement and first floors—the remaining floors were occupied by the Custom House and other departments.

POST-OFFICE AND CUSTOM HOUSE.

Judge Walter B. Seates was collector from July 1, 1866 until June 30, 1869, and was succeeded by J. E. McLean, who served until July 17, 1872, when Hon. Norman B. Judd was appointed to the control of the department. In September, 1866, W. C. McElroy, of Baltimore, became deputy collector, and was succeeded by Charles M. Pullman as deputy.

Since 1869, the collector of customs has acted as the disbursing agent of the government, besides being the custodian of all public buildings in his district, including light-houses. In the latter part of 1871, or early in 1872, the United States Marine Hospital was taken out of his charge, and placed in that of the Surgeon of the Marine Hospital. In July, 1870, the "Immediate Transportation Act" went into effect, the law providing for immediate transportation of goods without appraisement at the port of entry. Prior to this, specific duties only were in effect, and not a great deal of skill was required on the part of the officials or employes to conduct the business of the Custom House. When the act went into operation the labor increased, and the work was of a character to demand careful and constant attention. Some forty employes were required, and the annual expenses of collection were upwards of $55,000. The effect of the act was to require the same methods of business, and proportionately the same number of employes, as the New York Custom House.

For the eleven months ending May 31, 1871, the schedule of warehouse transactions in the Chicago customs district were as follows:

Balance of bonds from last returns.....	$ 65,352 00
Warehoused and bonded.....	755 56
Re-warehoused and bonded.....	504,954 00
Constructively warehoused.....	266,168 00
Duties paid.....	665,222 00
Withdrawals for transportation.....	12,053 00
Withdrawals for exportation.....	4,810 00
Allowances and deficiencies.....	149,198 00
Balance of bonds not due.....	81,516 00

The penalties and forfeitures collected from July 1, 1870, to March 31, 1871, amounted to $4,159.

The number of merchant vessels and the tonnage in the Chicago Customs District, June 30, 1877, were as follows:

Sailing vessels.....	333	64,702.26 tons
Steam vessels.....	84	6,846.30 "
Unrigged vessels.....	233	23,735.39 "
Total.....	650	95,283.95 tons

The only lake ports at this date exceeding the customs tonnage at Chicago were Buffalo and Oswego, and their excess was derived from a greater number of unrigged vessels, such as barges and canal-boats.

John Hitt was appointed deputy collector under Collector Scates in 1867, and served under subsequent collectors in the same capacity. After the great fire, the Custom House business was transacted in temporary quarters in Congress Hall, a hotel at the corner of Michigan Avenue and Congress Street. Dry goods boxes were used in lieu of counters and desks, and Custom-house permits were made out on the printed menu cards of the hotel. After an experience of seven months in these cramped and inconvenient quarters, the business was removed to the Republic Life Insurance Company's building, in Arcade Court, the removal taking place May 2, 1872. There the Custom House remained until the completion of the new government building.

The annexed table shows by years the receipts at the port of Chicago from August 27, 1846, to June 30, 1871, an amount of duties on imports, tonnage duty, marine hospital collections, and the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs:

YEAR.	Duties.	Tonnage duty.	Marine Hospital collections.	Expense of collecting.
1847	$ 21 75		$ 259 74	$ 1,332 26
1848	1,104 90		640 47	1,784 83
1849	2,045 26		707 30	2,600 52
1850	4,256 07		1,060 55	4,935 21
1851	1,924 48		776 75	2,810 00
1852	10,610 85		577 89	2,400 00
1853	119,835 46		838 40	2,853 01
1854	332,814 28		1,119 50	5,017 75
1855	575,921 75		1,549 05	7,295 00
1856	298,195 00	$ 372 50	1,826 50	11,971 83
1857	143,009 23		2,151 97	14,536 00
1858	80,149 91		1,598 64	14,097 11
1859	23,151 89	277 00	1,044 67	12,723 00
1860	68,919 53		1,661 13	11,576 00
1861	45,149 35		2,137 32	12,252 00
1862	21,625 14		2,753 67	12,509 35
1863	65,980 59	9,760 13	3,432 10	12,317 45
1864	153,454 92	10,692 97	3,851 70	12,670 00
1865	127,931 74	28,006 60	3,910 02	17,213 00
1866	393,496 55	22,953 85	4,137 06	20,146 40
1867	511,681 89	32,842 78	3,763 55	31,585 40
1868	659,330 73	31,192 72	4,475 64	59,831 83
1869	533,835 71	32,859 07	4,370 50	70,019 82
1870	691,668 52	25,135 07	1,150 89	58,425 30
1871	827,964 91	7,922 93	1,384 42	65,942 00

The following table exhibits the imports of merchandise at the port of Chicago for the years ending June 30, 1856 to 1871, inclusive:

YEAR.	Direct from Canada.	Received in bond from other districts under warehousing acts.	Total imports.
1856	$ 277,404	No data	$ 277,404
1857	329,325	No data	329,325
1858	222,930	No data	222,930
1859	93,588	No data	93,588
1860	60,214	No data	60,214
1861	77,348	No data	77,348
1862	62,129	No data	62,129
1863	134,204	No data	134,204
1864	322,352	No data	322,352
1865	311,455	No data	311,455
1866	1,095,585	No data	1,095,585
1867	355,790	No data	355,790
1868	344,174	$ 1,110,508	1,454,682
1869	423,889	791,114	1,215,003
1870	735,894	951,947	1,687,841
1871	575,154	1,467,345	2,042,499

The value of merchandise exports from Chicago is taken from the record of direct and through business of the port for the following years:

YEAR.	Domestic.	Foreign.	Total.
1856	$ 1,345,223		$ 1,345,223
1857	1,585,090	$ 308 00	1,585,404
1858	1,713,077		1,713,077
1859	1,260,385		1,260,385
1860	1,165,183		1,165,183
1861	3,522,343		3,522,343
1862	2,303,275		2,303,275
1863	3,544,085		3,544,085
1864	3,529,034		3,529,034
1865	4,599,350		4,599,350
1866	2,636,539	7,936 00	2,644,475
1867	1,818,463	5,908 00	1,824,371
1868	5,052,062		5,052,062
1869	3,742,256		3,742,256
1870	2,611,678	1,394 00	2,613,072
1871	5,575,660	6,514 00	5,582,174

The number of vessels built, their tonnage, and the tonnage of vessels documented at the port of Chicago from August, 1847, to June 30, 1871, is given below.

YEAR.	Total number built.	Total Tonnage.	Registered Tonnage.	AGGREGATE.
1847	--			3,951.56
1848	--			10,488.62
1849	13	2,210.84		17,332.43
1850	13	1,691.21		21,242.17
1851	4	313.56		23,103.45
1852	17	1,217.28		25,209.30
1853	6	1,158.35		27,015.75
1854	12	3,255.08		31,041.04
1855	21	4,404.47		50,972.00
1856	12	4,404.47		57,407.30
1857	9	2,722.78		67,316.02
1858	7	586.42		67,001.23
1859	3	230.01	1,057.56	67,065.78
1860	--		1,624.00	78,816.05
1861	4	1,537.20		85,743.66
1862	5	1,411.83	1,100.89	108,357.42
1863	85	9,783.18	1,385.59	128,298.76
1864	96	11,468.01	9,682.37	150,558.65
1865	34	3,521.07	4,223.31	175,444.41
1866	12	942.39	2,560.50	188,685.33
1867	30	1,869.22	521.91	190,753.71
1868	29	7,153.80	3,313.61	204,314.58
1869	16	2,346.03	2,079.65	204,314.58
1870	15	1,676.67	956.04	93,625.49
1871	12	1,771.49	494.96	93,625.49

STATEMENT OF DUTIES collected at Chicago, Illinois, during the fiscal years, 1857-71, inclusive :

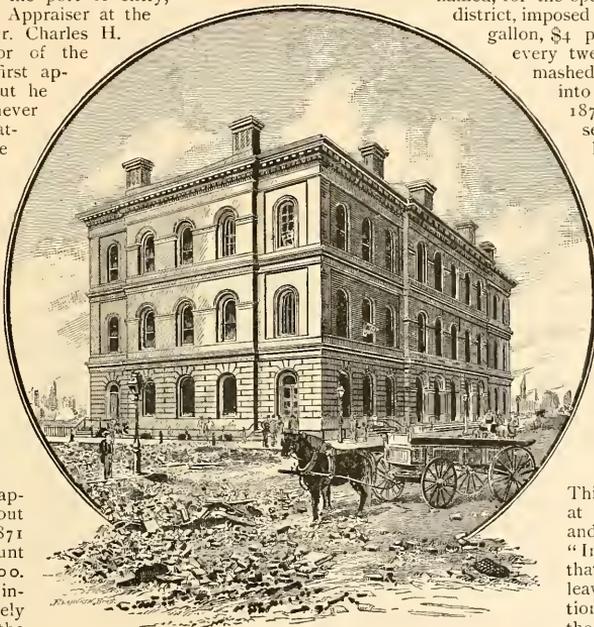

YEAR.	AMOUNT.	YEAR.	AMOUNT.
1857	$143,609 23	1865	$ 127,031 74
1858	80,149 91	1866	393,406 53
1859	23,131 89	1867	511,081 89
1860	68,919 53	1868	659,380 73
1861	45,149 35	1869	583,835 71
1862	21,627 94	1870	691,066 82
1863	65,980 59	1871	827,964 81
1864	158,454 92
		Total to 1871..	$4,491,091 61

THE APPRAISER'S OFFICE. — The "Immediate Transportation Act" of July 14, 1870, providing for the immediate shipment of merchandise to inland ports, without appraisal at the port of entry, created the office of Appraiser at the port of Chicago. Dr. Charles H. Ray, then the editor of the Tribune, was the first appraiser appointed, but he did not qualify and never served, being then attacked by the disease which in a few weeks resulted in his death. In August of the same year, Lincoln Ingersoll, an editor of the Evening Post, was appointed appraiser, and served one year. He was succeeded by Charles H. Ham, of the Inter-Ocean, who was subsequently removed by Secretary Bristow. In 1870, the value of merchandise passing through the appraiser's office was about $700,000, and in 1871 and 1872, the amount exceeded $1,000,000. The value has since increased proportionately with the growth of the business of the port; and at the date of this publication the value of merchandise appraised is upward of $5,000,000 per annum.

SPECIAL AGENTS OF THE TREASURY.—There is a department in connection with the Custom House and appraiser's office similar, in many respects, to the secret service. The Secretary of the Treasury has a number of staff officers, called Special Agents of the Treasury Department, who are assigned to duty in the various customs districts, to exercise watchfulness over the acts of collectors and employes, to guard against undervaluation by appraisers, and to prevent smuggling. It was formerly the custom to detail these agents from eastern ports, to make flying visits of inspection to the West. From 1860 to 1869, Special Agent LeFevre, of the Detroit district had supervision over the port of Chicago. In the spring of 1869, Albert M. Barney was appointed special agent in charge, and stationed at Chicago. He served for three years,

THE INTERNAL REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

Perhaps no branch of the Federal service in Chicago has grown with such rapid strides, and assumed business proportions of such magnitude in a comparatively brief space of time, as the Internal Revenue Department. It grew out of the war taxation-measures, and was first established in this city in 1862, with George Schneider as collector, the date of his appointment having been August 28 of that year. Since then, the office has followed closely in the wake of the other departments, undergoing their fiery privations and inconveniences. Prior to July 20, 1868, a taxation of $2 a gallon was collected from distillers in this district at stated periods, all such funds passing through the hands of the United States depository at Chicago to the department at Washington. An act, brought into force at the date named, for the special guidance of this district, imposed a tax of fifty cents per gallon, $4 per barrel and $2 for every twenty bushels of grain mashed. A later act, brought into effect in August, 1872, imposed a tax of seventy cents per gallon, to be paid by stamps bought of the Government, and affixed to the package; and on March 3, 1875, the rate was further increased, finally reaching ninety cents a gallon. Until July 20, 1868, inspectors of distilled spirits were paid in this district by fees direct from the distillery, the imbursements, however, being limited to $250 per month.

EXTERIOR RUIN OF POST-OFFICE.

This system was changed at the date mentioned, and the designation of "Inspectors" altered to that of "Gaugers," and leaving their compensation to the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They were first limited to $7 per day; next, to $6; and afterward, by law, to $5 per day, such fees being paid monthly by the Government. This system is said to facilitate the correct workings of the force in this district, and prevents collusion between the gauger and distiller.

During George Schneider's four years' administration of the Chicago collector's office, the collections showed a steady increase, and the district gave promise of being one of the most profitable to the Government in the entire country. In 1866, General O. L. Mann succeeded Mr. Schneider, and retained control for about eleven months. The next collector was General John M. Corse, who served during 1867, when he was superseded by Colonel Edmund Juessen, who also served a year, and then made way for Herman Raster; who, in turn, after a year's service, terminated his connection with the office in December, 1869. The incoming collector was S. A. Irwin, who died in October, 1875, and the balance of whose term was filled by I. F. Hoyt. All of the records of this department prior to 1871 were destroyed in the great fire, and the official figures were procured from the Internal Revenue Department at Washington. The expenses of assessing the revenue, which include payment of the gaugers, store-keepers, and the clerical force, for the year ending June 30, 1871, were $68,122.96, and for the same period the expense of collections, including salaries and commissions, amounted to $40,393.99. The collections for this year were $7,269,582.79. The following were the annual collections, from the date of the establishment of the district up to and including 1871:

Fiscal year ending June 30, 1863	$ 865,254 08
" " " " 1864	3 739,478 21
" " " " 1865	3,953,665 95
" " " " 1866	7,095,203 40
" " " " 1867	5,467,986 87
" " " " 1868	3,098,315 33
" " " " 1869	6,771,168 61
" " " " 1870	8,395,131 87
" " " " 1871	7,269,582 79
Total	$47,561,788 01

The list of collectors, assessors and deputy collectors is as follows:

COLLECTORS.—George Schneider, appointed August 28, 1862, service expired July 15, 1866; O. L. Mann, appointed June 26, 1866, service expired July 31, 1868; John M. Corse, June 18, 1868, service expired May 3, 1866; Edmund Juessen, appointed April 19, 1866, service expired March 31, 1871; Herman Raster, appointed March 17, 1871, service expired April 30, 1872.

ASSESSORS.—Phillip Wadsworth, appointed September 5, 1862, service expired October 4, 1863; Peter Page, appointed October 5, 1863, service expired July 31, 1866; M. R. M. Wallace, appointed July 17, 1866, service expired April 30, 1869; J. D. Webster, appointed April 9, 1869, service expired May 20, 1873.

CHIEF DEPUTY COLLECTORS.—Samuel D. Ward, 1864-65; Frank M. Thomson, 1866-67; J. C. Wilson, 1868; William W. Bell, to August 1, 1869; Theodore F. Swan, balance of the year; Samuel A. Irwin, 1871 to April 30, 1872.

THE PENSION AGENCY.

The agency for the payment of pensions was established in Chicago on September 1, 1862. The agency was an offshoot of the Springfield Pension Agency, which was established in 1849. The growth of the pension rolls, caused by the war, made it necessary to have an agency for making payments to pensioners in Illinois at Chicago; one in Salem, established in 1864, for Southern Illinois; one at Quincy, established in the early part of 1866, for those living in that vicinity; as well as the original Springfield agency, which, after these changes, continued only with residents of Central Illinois. The first pension agent at Chicago was J. W. Boyden; the second, L. H. Davis; the third, Colonel C. T. Hotchkiss, who retired June 1, 1869, and was succeeded by General B. J. Sweet, who held the office until May 1, 1871, when David Blakeley, now of St. Paul, received the appointment. At the time of the great fire in 1871, all of the books, papers and records of this great agency were destroyed. The pension rolls were duplicated, however, from the rolls in the Pension Bureau, at Washington, and the office was revived in a wooden building on the lake front, where Mr. Blakeley ministered. The office was shortly afterward removed to No. 85 Dearborn Street.

THE UNITED STATES SUB-TREASURY.

The United States Sub-Treasury is comparatively a recent addition to the Federal service in Chicago. It was officially established in the early part of 1873, in response to the demand of the Chicago banks for a place of exchange, and to meet the increasing importance of Chicago as a money center. As early, however, as 1834, shortly after the establishment of the post-office, the Government land agents were made custodians of public funds, and compelled to render weekly accounts to the Treasury Department at Washington. In February, 1853, Congress passed an act which provided for the stationing of a United States Depository at Chicago, to receive Government funds, and be a place of exchange of moneys. E. B. Williams was given the first appointment as receiver, and established himself in the old Post-office, on Clark Street, between Randolph and Lake streets, where the Sherman House now stands. His weekly remittance to Washington seldom exceeded a few hundred dollars. In April, 1855, the office of receiver was abolished, and Philip Conly, then acting as collector of customs, was made the receiver of public moneys, in addition to his other duties. The succeeding collectors, down to Norman B. Judd, continued to act as custodians of the public funds. In 1861, the collector of the port was assigned an assistant, whose special duty it was to look after the funds of the district, the assistant being accountable, however, to his superior, the collector. William Brooks was the head of this department from 1861 to 1864, when he was succeeded by H. H. Nash, subsequently cashier of the National Bank of Illinois, who remained in charge until February, 1873. The Sub-Treasury was located in the old Custom House and Post-office building, at the corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets. In the vaults, which were poorly constructed, over $2,000,000 of Government funds were destroyed in the great fire. Of this, some little of the gold and silver, which was melted down, was recovered from the basement after the fire, and re-coined at the mint in Philadelphia. After the fire, the Sub-Treasury was established, for a time, in quarters near Wabash Avenue and Thirteenth Street, where a number of the banks had located. With the other Federal offices it was moved into the Republic Life Insurance Building, in Arcade Court, after the completion of that structure.

INTERIOR RUINS OF POST-OFFICE.

THE POST-OFFICE.

There can be no better criterion of the intelligence and the commercial and industrial activity of a people than their postal statistics. The history of the Chicago Post-office is a fair indication of development of business enterprise and resources, unsurpassed in the history of the country. The Post-office antedates any other local branch of the Federal service, and the character of its business makes its history of more consequence than even the important transactions of the Custom House. In a preceding volume, the interesting earlier history of the Chicago Post-office is given. The contrast between the Post-office of to-day and that of twenty-five years ago, affords us ample food for contemplation in the variance between the semi-weekly pony-post to and from St. Joe, in 1834, and the vast augmentation of business in 1857, when fifty-four clerks were required to handle the mails.

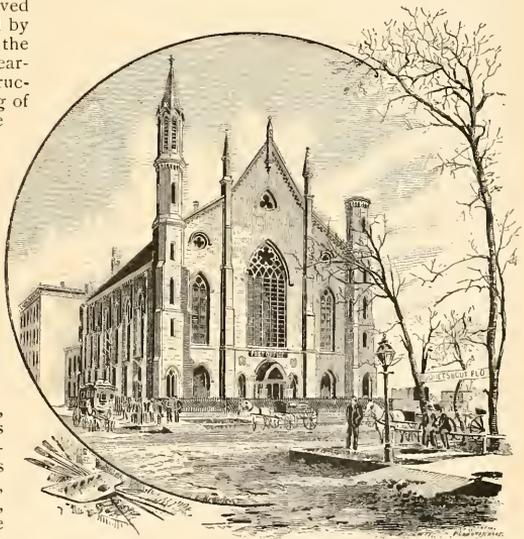

In the latter year the office was located at Nos. 84-86 Dearborn Street, and William Price, who was appointed March 18, 1857, officiated as postmaster. He in turn was succeeded by Isaac Cook, who had served in the same capacity in 1853, and was re-appointed by President Buchanan March 9, 1858. At this time the Government building at the northwest corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets, was in process of construction, the work having been commenced in the spring of 1855. From 1857 to 1860, the business of the office rapidly increased in volume, and when, in December, 1860, it was moved into the new building, the quarters were found none too large. Here the postal business of the growing city was conducted until the great fire of 1871. On April 22, 1861, Mr. Cook was succeeded by John L. Scripps, who retained charge until his death in March, 1865. During the administration of Mr. Scripps the business of the office increased until a working force of over two hundred employes was required. Samuel Hoard was the next postmaster, the date of his appointment being March 19, 1865, and his administration was marked by a continuance of the unprecedented increase of business. The next postmaster coming into office was Colonel Robert A. Gilmore, who was appointed December 1, 1866, and held the office until his untimely death by drowning, on September 11, 1867. Frank T. Sherman was appointed to fill the unexpired term on September 14, and he continued in charge until April 30, 1869, when he made way for Colonel F. A. Eastman, who managed the affairs of the office until February 15, 1873.

John L. Scripps

Prior to 1865, the Chicago Post-office was a distributing center for all western and eastern mails, but the distributing work had gradually grown less up to date, by reason of the perfection of the railway mail service. In 1871, the volume of business had grown to enormous proportions; and in 1872, in the matter of registered letters alone there was an increase of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent. over the preceding year. The total number of registered letters and packages sent and received was 591,391. The increase was proportionately great in the money-order division. In 1864 one man did all the work in this department, which was then just organized, while the orders for the quarter ending June 30, 1872, amounted to \$148,044.03, and the orders paid to \$732,935.12. For the year the sales of stamps and stamped envelopes amounted to \$176,876.44.

During Colonel Eastman's administration as postmaster the great fire of 1871 occurred; and the post-office made a hasty exit, and located in Burlington Hall, at the corner of State and Sixteenth streets, where the accommodations were found too limited for its vast business. A noticeable feature of this crisis was the preservation of the mails from destruction. The Post-office was not seriously threatened until 5:30 p. m., and at 8 o'clock it was entirely consumed; but not a letter or a paper was destroyed, not a mail kept back, and, so far as possible, not a delivery missed. All of the railway mail cars were called in by telegraph, and side-tracked; the sub-stations were organized as main deliveries for the three divisions, and collection boxes were speedily placed upon the street cars and in other convenient places. After the fire, the city was divided into 122 carrier districts, and there were, besides the chief and his assistants, 131 carriers and 27 clerks constantly on duty. Colonel Eastman lost upward of $60,000 of property in the fire, but he ignored the discomfort of his family and himself in his duty to the public interests in his charge.

WABASH AVENUE METHODIST CHURCH, USED FOR POST-OFFICE AFTER THE FIRE.

The Post-office remained in Burlington Hall until December 23, 1871, when it was removed to the Wabash Avenue Methodist Church, at the northwest corner of Wabash Avenue and Harrison Street, where it remained in comparative quietude until the second great fire of July, 1874. The rental of the church was $20,000 a year. It was the only South Side building, directly within the line of the 'right wing' of the first great fire, that escaped, with the exception of one house on Michigan Avenue. It was here that Mark Sheridan made his famous stand against the fire to save the church.

The annual statement of the business of the Chicago post-office for 1870 showed nearly 40 per cent. increase. In the matter of the sales of stamped envelopes alone the increase was $23,585.96. The total receipts from this source for the year were $626,273.97, and from the sales of stamps $445,568.78. The increase in the money-order department was 50 per cent. over the previous year, the total transactions amounting to $5,495,202.96, itemized as follows:

Number of orders issued 22,028, amounting to.....	$ 455,270 12
Number of orders paid 143,357, amounting to.....	2,539,330 84
Received deposits from postmasters on money orders sold.....	2,506,602 00

The registered letters and packages received for mailing and distribution during the year was 486,152, of which 74,261 were for city delivery. The number of papers and letters received from foreign countries was 1,281,613, and the number sent 2,116,560. The number of letters delivered from boxes and through the general delivery was 1,599,551, while the city carriers delivered 14,096,391 letters and papers, and collected $8,722,127. The total of letters collected and deposited in the office to be sent out was 25,844,324. Grand total received at Chicago office for distribution 57,510,700; total sent out from Chicago office, $3,928,580. The number of bags of newspapers and periodicals received was 223,600, making over 670,500 bushels. The number of letters returned to writers was 63,204, and number sent to the dead-letter office 99,087. There was 111,425 locked pouches and mail boxes received, and 129,575 dispatched. The business of this year made the Chicago office rank second to the New York office. Subsequently, the volume of office business was again reduced by the perfecting of the railway mail service. The following table shows the growth of the letter carrier system and the increase of revenue from local matter, by taking the work of January and July of each year from 1865 to 1871:

DATES.	No. Carriers.	Mail Letters Delivered.	Local Letters Delivered.	Papers, &c., Delivered.	Letters Collected.	Package on Local Matter.
Jan'y, 1865.	35	75,928	9,105	11,796	65,867	$ 737 29
July, "	39	121,095	9,724	20,069	108,700	762 12
Jan'y, 1866.	44	248,427	22,353	42,418	191,104	1,046 01
July, "	46	286,006	32,349	49,263	250,986	935 50
Jan'y, 1867.	51	323,139	41,102	70,066	292,537	1,347 67
July, "	55	390,227	49,405	86,068	341,497	1,354 21
Jan'y, 1868.	60	480,149	83,093	98,945	400,095	1,886 28
July, "	76	553,499	66,349	117,646	423,505	1,877 33
Jan'y, 1869.	86	666,687	80,607	136,598	495,995	2,021 04
July, "	106	751,119	79,269	164,143	656,972	2,047 65
Jan'y, 1870.	96	825,356	106,815	174,204	676,289	2,812 08
July, "	106	835,346	107,780	180,732	727,878	2,444 99
Jan'y, 1871.	166	949,781	126,654	192,415	893,669	2,806 12

The following list shows the names of the different postmasters with dates of their appointment and length of their term of service, from the first appointee in 1831 to 1871, at which latter date this volume closes:

Jonathan N. Bailey, March 31, 1831; John S. C. Hogan, November 3, 1832; Sidney Abell, March 3, 1837; William Stuart, July 10, 1841; Hart L. Stewart, April 25, 1845; Richard L. Wilson, April 23, 1849; George W. Dole, September 25, 1850; Isaac Cook, March 22, 1853; William Price, March 18, 1857; Isaac Cook, March 9, 1858; John L. Scripps, March 28, 1861; Samuel D. Hoard, March 9, 1865; Thomas O. Osborne, July 23, 1866; Robert A. Gillmore, November 16, 1866; Francis T. Sherman, August 27, 1867; Francis A. Eastman, April 25, 1869, to December 20, 1873.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.—The history of the Railway mail service prior to the year 1864 is so largely traditional as to leave its origin somewhat in doubt. There are many truths, however, going to show that the first practical and successful introduction of railway post-office, or mail-distribution, cars, was at Chicago, June 9, 1864, and that Colonel George B. Armstrong, then assistant postmaster, had conceived this valuable system of expediting the distribution of the mail in transit several years before. Frequently, through ignorance or carelessness, and sometimes by design, mail matter was needlessly subjected to double and treble distribution, entailing delays of from twelve to thirty-six hours, and the expense of extra commissions then allowed by law to distributing post-offices. For years previous to 1860 there had been some distributions of mail on railways. July 28, 1862, William A. Davis prepared a car for the distributions of the overland mails on the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad, as shown by his letters to the Post-office Department of that date. The plan was similar to that elaborated, and urged upon the Department for general adoption, by Colonel Armstrong in 1864. In February of the latter year Mr. Armstrong went to Washington, and there secured the active co-operation of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, A. N. Zevely in his plans. It is claimed by rivals of Mr. Armstrong, whom he made his enemies while a clerk in the Mail Equipment Division of the Department at Washington in 1854, that he elaborated the idea of Henry A. Burr, the topographer of the Department. During the period from 1864 to 1869, the railway postal service was under the double superintendence of Colonel Armstrong and Harrison Park. Mr. Park had charge of all east of the east boundary of Indiana, with headquarters at Washington, and Colonel Armstrong of all west of that boundary, with headquarters at Chicago. The first railway post-office out of Chicago ran upon the Chicago & North-Western railway, between Chicago and Clinton, Iowa, in an apartment improvised for the purpose, June 9, 1864. A. F. Bradley, later of Maplewood, was chief clerk, and P. A. Leeward his assistant. Mr. Bradley assisted Colonel Armstrong in drawing plans for postal cars; and the arranging of letter-cases in angles, instead of half-circles, was Mr. Bradley's idea.

The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy was the next railway post-office route established out of Chicago; and there soon followed the Chicago & Rock Island, Chicago & Centralia, and Chicago & St. Louis. The Chicago & Green Bay, subsequently the Fort Howard & Chicago, was established May 1, 1867, and the Chicago & Dunleith, and afterward the Chicago, Freeport & Dubuque, about September 1, 1868. The Clinton & Boone route was established in the fall of 1866; the Boone & Council Bluffs September, 1867; the Toledo and LaFayette and the LaFayette and Quincy, September 1, 1868; the Cincinnati and St. Louis, October 5, 1869; the Omaha and Ogden September 1, 1870; the Detroit and Chicago, October 1, 1870; the Cleveland and Indianapolis October 12, 1870, and the Toledo and Chicago night line January 23, 1871.

The first printed scheme was issued at the office of the Beacon, Aurora, Ill., in September, 1878. During 1869, distributing post-office packages were gradually lessened, more mail was made up for roads, and newspapers were made up, none being sent to Chicago as a distributing office. Facing slips were used in this division in 1869, for the first time in the United States.

The first full railway post-office car in the United States was built by the Chicago & North-Western Railway, and placed upon the Chicago and Clinton line in March, 1867, and the first schedule of connections issued in the country was printed in the Chicago Postal Record in March, 1872. "Mail Catchers" service was established May 15, 1869. The first serviceable lamps used in railway mail-cars were imported from Germany in 1869 for George S. Bangs, by Gustave Kuene, of Fond du Lac, Wis., and were sold to railroad companies for $7 each. The first examination of the work of railway postal clerks was at the Chicago post-office in the fall of 1868, and resulted in the removal of several inefficient employés.

When the service of the country was divided, that radiating from Chicago became the fourth division, and included Indiana and nearly all the Western and North-western States. The volume of business handled in the Chicago division is so tremendous as to almost be beyond accurate computation. Colonel Armstrong was called to Washington, and made superintendent of the entire system, in March, 1869, and George S. Bangs was made assistant superintendent, with headquarters at Chicago. After Colonel Armstrong's death, on May 5, 1871, Mr Bangs succeeded him at Washington. George W. Wood succeeded Mr. Bangs at Chicago, and served until November 20, 1871, when Captain James E. White became the superintendent of the division.

HON. GEORGE BUCHANAN ARMSTRONG was born October 27, 1822, at Armagh, Ireland. His parents soon after came to the United States, and settled in Newark, N. J., where he received his elementary education. In 1833, the family went to Virginia, where he spent a few years in school, and then entered a large commission house as clerk, into which he was soon admitted as partner. He, at this time, made frequent contributions from his pen, under the pseudonym of "Geoffrey Willow," which attracted much attention, and secured for the author a wide and enviable reputation. He engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1850, when he received an appointment from the Government, and resided in Washington, D. C. On March 12, 1854, he removed to Chicago, and again entered into mercantile life, associating himself with Rufus Hatch, in the commission business, under the style of Geo. B. Armstrong & Co. He afterward entered into governmental service again, accepting the position of assistant postmaster, in Chicago; and here his mind gave birth to the Railway Mail Service, and put into practice the ideas which have resulted so successfully. At, or about, this time Colonel Armstrong was appointed a postal commissioner, to facilitate the transportation of army mails in the West and Southwest; and for his services to the soldiers in the field, Governor Richard J. Oglesby appointed him inspector-general, with the rank of colonel. In 1864, Congress authorized the establishment of an experimental postal route on the line then known as the Dixon Air-line, traversing the country between Chicago and Clinton, Iowa. The new service operated like clockwork, and it was but a short time before its inestimable value was apparent over the old route-agent service. To Illinois belongs the honor of being the State wherein the efficiency of the railway mail service was first demonstrated, and for a time the Railway Postal Service (as it was then called) did not extend beyond its limits. When Colonel Armstrong ascertained that his project was entirely feasible, he resigned his position as assistant postmaster in Chicago, a position which he had occupied for ten years, and was appointed special agent of the Post-office Department, with the title of Superintendent of Railway Postal Service, with his office in Chicago. It was gradually placed upon all the leading lines of the country, but it was not until A. J. A. Creswell was appointed postmaster-general that the full measure of its resources was realized. Mr. Creswell fully comprehended the utility of the service, and soon after his appointment summoned Colonel Armstrong to Washington for the improvement of the system. During President Grant's administration, in the year 1868, a bureau was created in the Post-office Department. It was designated the "Bureau of Railway Mail Service of the United States," and Colonel Armstrong was called as its chief. Colonel Armstrong worked unremittingly day and night to develop the great ambition of his life, and by his assiduous application to his bureau he sowed the seeds that were soon the cause of his death. His constitution, weakened by the constant and severe strain made upon it, finally gave way, and, after a few months of intermittent illness, death overtook him on Friday, May 5, 1871. In 1882, the clerks in the Railway Mail Service erected a memorial monument, which adorns the northwest corner of the Custom-house square.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

As early as the year 1832, the port of Chicago had become of such importance as to demand Government aid for harbor improvements. The sum total appropriated up to the year 1871 was, however, insignificant, in comparison with the rapid growth and requirements of the commerce of the port. The first Government appropriation was made in 1833, and was expended in opening an outlet, protected by piers, from the Chicago River into the Lake; also the erection of a light-house on shore, and the building of an "angle" connected with the piers. A small light was placed at the extreme end of the North Pier, as then completed. Mr. Schlatter, the engineer in charge of the improvements, spent the winter of 1844-45 in repairing an old dredge-boat, to have it in readiness to dredge out the bar at the mouth of the river in the spring. His calculations were upset by the destruction of four dredge-boats, on which he depended for prosecuting the work; they were cast adrift and wrecked while on their way from Milwaukee, in tow of the steambot "Champion." The boats were so rotten that their bolts drew out, their timbers parted, and they were speedily wrecked by going ashore near Grosse Point. The following April the engineer had orders to build two more dredge-boats. At this time he reported that the shore line north of the North Pier had made out one hundred feet since the year before, and that where there had been twenty-three feet of water at the head of the pier, silt had collected until there were but seventeen feet. Mr. Schlatter recommended the extension of the North Pier ninety feet, to overcome this difficulty. The "angle" mentioned was not completed until 1839. In January, 1845, the light at the end of the North Pier was the only protection to vessels navigating the Lake at the southern end. It was kept in good order. The light on the mainland had been discontinued for several weeks. All of the timbers for the pier work at this date were cut in the woods on the North Branch of the river, and floated down to the mouth in the spring freshets.

In the month of July 1849, Engineer J. D. Webster, who succeeded Mr. Schlatter, reported to the lieutenant-colonel of engineers plans for a larger and permanent light-house at the end of the North Pier. These plans embraced a foundation forty-four feet square, a base twenty-five feet in height; an iron framework, sixty-five feet in height; for foundations, sunken stone cribs, containing large rubble with small stone and gravel, to make the whole a compact mass; piles to be driven inside and outside of the piers; cut stone or heavy masonry for the base, beginning two or three feet below low water, and carried ten feet above; eight cast-iron columns for the light house frame; superstructure of cast-iron columns twenty feet in length; height sixty-five feet to deck of lantern; weight of iron work 75,000 pounds. This work was undertaken with an original appropriation of $15,000. January 11, 1849, the Illinois Assembly passed an act to deed the light-house site to the Government, and the deed was signed November 27, 1849. In April, 1850, Engineer Webster proposed to overcome the difficulty of the constantly accumulating side bars of silt at the ends of the piers, by straightening the mouth of the river, getting a strong and regular current that would carry the deposits out into the Lake, making a single bar some distance out instead of allowing one to form on each side, and leaving the entrance free and clear to the north and south. We quote his own words in this connection :

"I want a natural force to bring about a natural result, and I propose to assist nature rather than attempt to retard the tendency of the currents to form these obstacles to a clear entrance."

To do this, required some dredging, some cutting away of the inner banks of the river, and the curves of the piers were changed slightly; but the improvements were eventually accomplished with beneficial and lasting results to the commerce of the greatest of lake ports.

In July, 1850, claimants to the accretions north of the North Pier put in an appearance, and they even laid claim to the pier itself, and the light-house as well; but Mr. Webster maintained the right of the Government to the land, and protected the interests in his charge. In the spring of 1850, the city made an appropriation for dredging a channel through the north bar, and when this work was carried out, the first pier for the light-house foundations, which had been in course of construction, was safely floated to its anchorage at the head of the North Pier, and the light eventually finished, but the original plans were amended.

The following table shows the date of the various appropriations for river and harbor improvements, and the net expenditures for the years 1833 to 1871 inclusive :

DATE.	AMOUNT OF APPROPRIATION.	NET ANNUAL EXPENDITURES.
March 2, 1833.....	$ 25,000 00	$ 17,360 00
June 28, 1834.....	32,801 00	31,770 00
March 3, 1835.....	32,800 00	37,770 91
July 2, 1836.....	32,000 00	34,500 00
March 3, 1837.....	40,000 00	41,200 00
July 7, 1838.....	30,000 00	15,000 00
" 1839..... (no appropriation).....		15,000 00
" 1842.....		3,000 00
March 3, 1843.....	25,000 00	-----
July 11, 1844.....	30,000 00	21,305 59
" 1845.....	-----	21,216 00
" 1846.....	-----	9,478 61
August 30, 1852.....	20,000 00	2,607 46
" 1855.....	-----	17,392 44
June 23, 1866.....	88,704 00	(1867) 40,000 00
" 1868.....	-----	15,000 85
" 1869.....	-----	32,000 00
" 1870.....	-----	1,531 06
July 11, 1870.....	150,000 00	-----
March 3, 1871.....	100,000 00	130,172 20
Total.....	$606,305 00	$486,305 12
Surplus balance.....	-----	$119,999 88

THE ENGINEER OFFICERS assigned to duty at Chicago between the years 1857 and 1871 have been :

Colonel J. D. Graham, in charge of improvements of works on Lake Michigan, April 7, 1854, to April 14, 1864; station, Chicago, Ill., to August, 1854; Detroit, Mich., to April 14, 1864. Major W. F. Reynolds, in charge April 14, 1864 to October, 1864; station, Detroit, Mich. Lieutenant-Colonel T. J. Cram, in charge October, 1864, to August 3, 1865; station, Detroit, Mich. Lieutenant-Colonel L. Sitgreaves, in charge August 3, 1865, to June 11, 1866; station, Milwaukee, Wis. Major J. B. Wheeler, in charge June 11, 1866, to February 11, 1870; station, Milwaukee, Wis. Captain A. Mackenzie, assistant to Major Wheeler, June 11, 1866, to November 10, 1863; station, Milwaukee, Wis. Lieutenant J. B. Quinn, assistant to Major Wheeler, September, 1866, to September 20, 1867; station, Milwaukee, Wis. Captain D. P. Heap, assistant to Major Wheeler, April 12, 1867, to February 18, 1870; station, Milwaukee, Wis. Captain J. W. Cuyler, assistant to Major Wheeler, November 10, 1868, to February 18, 1870; assistant to Colonel Houston, May 18, 1870, to February 15, 1874; station, Milwaukee, Wis. Major W. E. Merrill, chief engineer on the staff of the Lieutenant-General commanding the Military Division of the Missouri, March 27, 1869, to May 3, 1870; in charge of improvements of harbor at Chicago, February 18, 1870, to May 25, 1870; station, Chicago, Ill. Major D. C. Houston, May 25, 1870, to July 14, 1874; station, Milwaukee, Wis., to April 1, 1871; Chicago, April 1, 1871, to April, 1875. Captain A. M. Miller, assistant to officers in charge of harbor improvement on Lake Michigan, April 1, 1870, to August 12, 1872; station, Milwaukee Major J. W. Barlow, chief engineer on the staff of the Lieutenant-General of the Military Division of the Missouri, May 3, 1870, to July 14, 1874; station, Chicago, Ill.

LIGHT-HOUSE KEEPERS. — The keeper of the first Chicago Light-House was Samuel C. Lasby, who was followed by William M. Stevens and John C. Gibson, respectively. William M. Stevens then again held the post a second term. Silas Meacham was appointed Light-house keeper by President Harrison in 1844, James Long by President Polk, 1845 to 1849. The official list of Light-house keepers appointed subsequently, with their respective term of service, is as follows: Charles Douglas, appointed by President Taylor, in 1850, was retained July 25, 1853. Henry Fuller, appointed October 30, 1853; full term. Mark Beaubien, July 20, 1855; removed in 1859. M. Walsh, October 8, 1859. John Lobstein, May 21, 1860; full term. Leonard Miller, December 6, 1866; removed in 1869. Charles H. Boynton, September 28, 1869; transferred, in 1874, to Grosse Point light. Charles H. Rann, April 9, 1874; resigned in 1875. Antony Hagen, June 23, 1875; full term. During the terms of the above keepers, the first assistant keepers were Joel Westhrach, Mrs. Emily Boynton, Amasa J. Boynton, Oscar B. Gaedme, Amasa J. Boynton, Adilon Benoit, Charles F. Rann, promoted, and Antony Hagen, promoted.

JACOB HARRIS, one of the pioneer contractors and builders of Chicago, was born in the town of Seymour, Ontario, in 1814. His youthful days were spent in working on the farm in the summer and attending school in the winter. At the age of seventeen, he commenced an apprenticeship at the carpenter trade, serving three years' time, during which period he perfected himself in all the details of the business. In the spring of 1837, he made his way to Detroit, Mich., from which place he took a boat for Chicago, the passage occupying three weeks. His first employment in the city was upon the government pier. The following year he engaged in contracting and building for himself, which business he followed successfully for about thirty years. He erected a great many of our prominent buildings, prior to and after the fire—in fact, was closely identified with the growth of Chicago from the date of her incorporation as a village, in 1837, until the time of his death, in 1877. He held the office of alderman from the Fourth Ward under John Wentworth's administration. He was a member of Waubansia Lodge, No. 160. A. F. & A. M. His life was a busy and successful one, he having been one of the pioneer settlers who laid the foundation of this city of over half a million people.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The high winds and fogs of spring and fall, for many years prior to 1856, had been productive of much damage to shipping, and wrecks, accompanied by loss of life, were of frequent occurrence. In the spring of 1856, the Government sent a life-boat to Chicago, and it was placed in charge of the harbor engineer. The first boat was kept under Rush-street bridge, and, in case of service becoming necessary, volunteers were depended upon to man it. This boat was made to answer a variety of purposes, and was yet in fair condition, several years later, when the life-saving station was established, with Captain John Taylor in charge.

UNITED STATES MARINE HOSPITAL.

Next to the department of pensions, the United States Marine Hospital service is the most valuable and important of any of the Government beneficiary institutions. The thousands of sailors who are annually in need of medical treatment and hospital care have the satisfaction of knowing that they are not dependent upon bounty, but have paid for the service they require. The present hospital in the vicinity of Chicago is one of the largest, best appointed and most capably managed in the country.

In 1778, the first act was passed by Congress for the relief of sick and disabled seamen by the institution of hospitals expressly for them. In 1790, it was slightly modified and improved, and in 1843 it was made more comprehensive in its scope, by including as its beneficiaries seamen who were employed in the coasting trade, the designation coasting trade being construed so as to include those who were navigating rivers and inland waters. The hospital fund, from which the expenses of the various marine hospitals are paid, is derived from a tax of forty cents per month collector of the port, May 15, 1852. It was mainly due to the efforts of the Hon. John Wentworth in the Congress of 1848 that the first appropriation for the building of the hospital was secured. On September 5, 1864, the hospital and site was sold at auction to James F. Joy, for the Michigan Central Railroad, for $132,000.

THE MARINE HOSPITAL, LAKE VIEW.

levied upon all seamen employed "on board registered steamers and other vessels belonging to the United States, engaged in foreign trade; and all steamers, and other vessels, including boats, rafts and flats, licensed to carry on the coasting trade, except canal-boats without masts or steam power." The first Marine Hospital of Chicago was built upon the old parade-ground of Fort Dearborn reservation, the ground being set apart for this purpose about the year 1848, the building and enclosure being completed March 15, 1852, and first occupied in May of that year. Up to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1861, the total amount paid on account of the hospital was $57,712, and during the war the rule, that none but sailors should be received there, was impinged, for patriotic purposes, by the admission and treatment of soldiers. The boundaries of the old hospital lot were Michigan Avenue on the west, the Illinois Central Railroad on the east, a part of the Government reservation on the south, and the river and dockway on the north. Work on the building was delayed in the summer of 1849, owing to the prevalence of the cholera, but the basement was finished in the fall of that year. J. D. Webster, the harbor engineer, was the disbursing agent, and John H. Kinzie acted as banker for the Government.

On the Congressional appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1852, there was an item of $4,712 for the completion of the Marine Hospital at Chicago. The hospital was formally turned over to Jacob Russell,

On September, 1867, the present hospital at Lake View was commenced. The old hospital building was destroyed in the great fire of 1871. During the maintenance of the hospital, over seven thousand patients were treated. The hospital was organized by Dr. Ralph N. Isham, who had charge of it during General Grant's administration. The various physicians in charge were Drs. William B. Herrick, Charles A. Helmut, Daniel Brainard, Brockholst McVickar, Daniel

D. McVickar

Brainard (2d term) and Ralph N. Isham. In 1868, Congress appointed a commission to select a site for a new hospital. An available site was secured at Lake View, on high ground overlooking the lake, and the Government purchased ten acres here. Work on the new building was begun in 1869, and it was completed in 1872, at a cost of $452,000. Competent judges say the building could not now be reproduced for the same money. The structure comprises a central building and two wings, all four stories and basement in height. The entire building is built of Lemont stone, and handsome stone porches grace the various fronts. The main building, which is 350 x 60 feet in area, contains the offices, executive departments, dispensary, and administrative department. The wings each contain three wards, accommodating twenty patients to each ward, and they are thirty feet wide, interior measurement. The building was re-fitted in 1879, under the supervision of Dr. Truman W. Miller, at a cost of $45,000.

BROCKHOLST McVICKAR, M.D., was born at New York City in the year 1810, son of Archibald McVickar. His early education was obtained from private tutors under direction of his father, a man of learning; his academical tuition at Columbia College (Reverend and Professor John McVickar, of this college, was his uncle), and his medical training and diploma as doctor of medicine from Fairfield Medical College. After receiving his degree as Doctor of Medicine, he commenced practice at Trenton, N. J., entering the office of Dr. Guiteau, and while there married Miss Anna Sophia Mappa, the descendant of an old Knickerbocker family. After practicing in various eastern cities for some time, he came to Chicago in 1848, and entered into partnership with Dr. Philip Maxwell, and subsequently, in the year 1850, was associated with Dr. Levi D. Boone. Dr. McVickar was the first city physician under the primitive board of health, was surgeon of the Marine Hospital, surgeon of the Army Hospital, at Chicago, in 1863, surgeon of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, and member of the board of health for a number of years. He died at Buffalo, N. Y., the birthplace of his son, Brockholst L. McVickar, on October 14, 1883.

WILLIAM J. MAYNARD, M.D., was born at Ann Arbor, Mich., August 16, 1844. He received his primary education in the public schools adjacent to his birthplace, and subsequently entered the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, and graduated from its classical department in 1865. He then entered the Department of Medicine of that University, from which he was graduated in 1867; supplementing this with a year's study in Rush Medical College, from which institution he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1869. He then engaged in general practice in this city, giving special attention to diseases of the skin. From 1869 to 1871 he was resident physician to the Marine Hospital. He is now Professor of Dermatology in the Woman's Medical College; attending physician to the Central Free Dispensary; a member of the Chicago Medical Society, of the Illinois State Medical Society, and of the West Side Pathological Society. He was married in December, 1873, to Miss Maria Wicker, daughter of Joel C. Wicker, of Chicago, by whom he had one child—John Wicker Maynard. Mrs. Maynard died in August, 1875. In September, 1883, Dr. Maynard married Miss Nettie Hadley, of Albany, N. Y.

TRUMAN WASHINGTON MILLER, M.D., surgeon of the Marine Hospital Service, is a native of Seneca, N. Y., and was born on March 2, 1840. He received his early education in the preparatory and high schools of Waterloo, N. Y. In 1857, he matriculated at Hobart College, at Geneva, N. Y., remaining through the junior year, and then attending two full courses in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York City, and in 1862 he graduated as M.D. from the Geneva Medical College, New York. At the breaking out of the civil war, he entered the regular army as a medical cadet from New York State. He occupied this position for one year. In 1862, was appointed Acting Assistant Surgeon, U.S.A., and assigned to duty with the Army of the Potomac, with which he remained until after the battle of the Wilderness, when he was transferred to Chicago on account of ill-health, and assigned to duty as post-surgeon and examining surgeon, which offices he filled until the close of the war. He was then (1865) re-appointed examining surgeon for the recruiting service of the army, which position he held for four years. During this period he also was physician for Cook County, for two years medical inspector of the Board of Health of Chicago, and medical director of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of Chicago. In 1873, he was appointed assistant surgeon of the United States Marine Hospital Service, and in 1877, was promoted surgeon and assigned to duty as surgeon-in-charge of the Marine Hospital at this city. In 1878, he was made medical director for the northwest of the Continental Life Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., and consulting surgeon of this district for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. From 1873 to 1878, he was surgeon of the 1st Regiment, Illinois National Guards. Dr. Miller is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and in 1880-81 was surgeon-general of the same for the Northwest Encampments. He now fills the positions of surgeon for the Western Indiana Railroad, Chicago & Grand Trunk Railroad, North Chicago City Railroad, one of the surgeons of the Cook County Hospital, surgeon-in-chief of the Maurice Porter Memorial Hospital for Children, and surgeon-in-chief of the Augustana General Hospital. He is also a member of different City, State and American medical associations, and one of the judicial council of the latter. Dr. Miller came to Chicago in 1866, and has resided in Lake View since that date. On April 15, 1864, he married Miss Leonora Edson, daughter of Robert Edson, one of the early settlers of Lake View, and has two children—Emily E. and Flora E.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS.

A chapter on the diplomatic relations of Chicago has never before been written, yet not less than thirteen foreign governments are represented here by Consuls, Vice-Consuls and Consular Agents. The first representative of a foreign power at Chicago of whom there is any record in the files of the Department of State at Washington, was Henri Enderis, consul for Switzerland, who received his appointment in October, 1864, and was recognized by the Government of the United States, on December 19 of the same year. He served until September 25, 1865, when he was succeeded by Louis Baerlin as vice-consul, who, in turn, was followed, in 1880, by Theodore Schintz. The next establishment of a consulate at Chicago on record was that of Belgium—J. F. Henrotin being recognized as consul by this government May 27, 1865. In 1868, two consulates were established: Emil Dreier being recognized as vice-consul of Denmark, March 24, and Giovanni L. Cella, as consular agent for Italy, July 6. During the following year, William E. Daggett was appointed consul for Turkey, and H. Claussenius for the Kingdom of Prussia. After the confederation of the German Empire, in 1871, Mr. Claussenius was re-appointed to represent the German Government.

The rapid increase of the emigration from foreign countries to the Northwestern States in 1870, and during the succeeding years, rendered necessary the appointment of a number of consuls, to protect the interests of those who owed allegiance to the governments of their native lands. One of the principal duties of the consular representatives of foreign governments at Chicago, is to exercise a watchful care over, and extend needed assistance to, the citizens of the governments by which they are accredited—the preparation and acknowledgment of business and legal documents being a duty less frequently demanded. At the same time, as the business agent of his government, the consul is expected to watch, and (as far as may be needed) exercise supervision over, the trade between his home government and the Northwestern States.

All consulates at Chicago are sustained by fees, with the exception of that of Germany, to which is attached a salary of twenty-four thousand marks, or $6,000. It is the most important of any, owing to the large German population of the Northwest; the Austro-Hungarian ranking second. These two consulates cover all territory westward from Cincinnati to the Pacific slope, with the exception of Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota. The former State is included in the Cincinnati district, and the latter three in that of Milwaukee. Most of the other Chicago consulates cover practically the same territory, though some of the governments represented here have no agents at Cincinnati; in such cases, the Chicago consul is the only one between New York and San Francisco. The annexed statement shows the governments having consular representatives at Chicago, names of consuls, the date of their recognition and the duration of their respective terms of service.*

SWITZERLAND.—Henri Enderis, consul, December 19, 1864; Louis Baerlin, vice-consul, September 25, 1865; Theodore Schintz, vice-consul, December 27, 1880.

* Where no changes are noted, none occurred between date of appointment and the year 1885.

BELGIUM.—J. F. Henrotin, consul, May 27, 1865; Charles Henrotin, consul, December 4, 1876.

DENMARK.—Emil Dreier, vice-consul, March 24, 1868; Emil Dreier, consul, February 21, 1882.

ITALY.—Giovanni L. Cella, consular agent, July 6, 1868.
TURKEY.—William E. Daggett, consul, April 16, 1869; Charles Henrotin, consul, April 14, 1877.

NETHERLANDS.—J. P. V. Dorsselen, consul, April 13, 1870; L. J. J. Nieuwenkamp, consul, February 4, 1876.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.—P. Svanöe, vice-consul, October 24, 1871.

GERMANY.—H. Claussenius, consul, October 24, 1871; Friedrich Hinkel, consul, June 1, 1877; Dr. F. Meier, acting consul, April 7, 1885; M. Raschdau, consul, in July, 1885.

GREAT BRITAIN.—James Warrack, vice-consul, November 27, 1871; John Dunn, vice-consul, April 12, 1882.

FRANCE.—Edmond Carrey, vice-consular agent, December 18, 1873.

AUSTRO-HUNGARY.—Albert Pick, consul, November 5, 1875; H. Claussenius, consul, February 18, 1878.

VENEZUELA.—David V. Whiting, consul, November 10, 1882.

MEXICO.—J. A. Vargas, consular agent, January 1, 1885.

Among all the foreign representatives there were none more noted for kindly and generous instincts, and efficiency as a diplomatic agent, than Dr. Henrotin, who first represented the Belgian government at this point.

DR. JOSEPH FORTUNAT HENRO TIN was born at Tellin, Belgium, in 1811. He was the son of Dr. Clement Henrotin, an eminent Belgian physician, who practiced his profession in the province of Luxembourg for sixty-five years. Dr. J. F. Henrotin pursued his elementary studies in his native town; his professional education being obtained at the University of Liege, Belgium, from which institution he graduated, with the highest honors, at the early age of twenty-two. After three years of practice in the leading Belgian hospitals, he received a commission as surgeon in the army, he being then but twenty-five years of age. The revolution of 1848 having involved the continent of Europe in a general war, Dr. Henrotin, accompanied by his family, emigrated to the United States, arriving in Chicago during the autumn of that year. The date of his arrival was opportune, not only for himself, but for the hundreds who were soon to need his professional services during the progress of the terrible cholera scourge that soon followed. No physician, of those days of anxiety and anguish, did more to alleviate the sufferings of this city's stricken inhabitants, nor was any more successful in his combat with the terrible plague, than Dr. Henrotin. Day and night were alike to him when duty called; he recognized no distinction of social position or of wealth; and in his unremitting labors he probably visited more cholera-stricken patients than any other medical practitioner in Chicago. The German residents of the North and West sides were particularly the objects of his solicitude, and from them he received the sobriquet of the "French doctor." No man stood higher in their esteem than did he; his devotion to them was as deep as his charity was all-embracing. His sacrifices, however, did not go unrewarded, for, after nine years of professional labor, he had acquired a considerable fortune, and, in 1856, he returned to Belgium, accompanied by his family, which at that time consisted of his wife, Adèle, and seven children. In 1857, having been appointed, by royal decree, Belgian consul for the Northwestern States, he returned to Chicago, leaving most of his children at school abroad. In 1858, he was commissioned by the Belgian government to make a thorough inspection of the States of Illinois, Wisconsin and Minnesota, and report upon their suitability for Belgian immigration. So thorough was his investigation, and so complete and admirable was his report, that he was honored by a formal vote of thanks from the parliament of Belgium. It was translated and widely circulated through Germany, and was, perhaps, one of the most efficient causes in turning the tide of German emigration toward the great Northwest. He occupied the position of Belgian consul at this port until his death, and it is not too much to say, that his fidelity to the interests of his government was only equalled by his unremitting care of Belgian subjects who needed his assistance. The fire of 1871 deprived him of the hardy-earned fruits of his labor, he being a more than usually heavy sufferer by that calamity. His death occurred on March 17, 1876. His death bed was surrounded by his wife and his eight surviving children, his oldest son, Henry, having been killed at the siege of Vicksburg, while a member of Taylor's battery. Among the children whom he left are Charles Henrotin, the present Belgian consul, and Dr. Fernand Henrotin, one of the leading physicians of the city. Dr. Henrotin, although of a retiring nature, possessed a genial disposition, great intellect and marked professional ability. It was always a matter of great regret to himself, as it has been to his family, that his lack of familiarity with the language and habits of our people prevented his attaining, in this country, the eminence to which his comprehensive education and great talents entitled him.

DR. FRIEDRICH HINKEL was appointed consul of the German empire in Chicago in 1877, and held that position, under imperial commission, at the time of his decease. He was born July 10, 1826, at Hanau, in Electoral Hesse, and after a brief residence in that place, removed with his parents to Kinteln, in the same province. His preliminary education was received at the Gymnasium, at Kinteln, and in 1845, went to the celebrated University at Marburg, where he graduated four years later. In 1849, he came to America, accepting a tutorship at Savannah, Georgia. Later, he removed to New York City, where he continued his duties as a preceptor for several years. In 1855, Dr. Hinkel went abroad, and traveled through Europe, Egypt, and Asia Minor. He then began the study of law at the universities of Bonn and Heidelberg, from which latter institution he graduated with the degree of LL.D. in 1860. The ensuing year he returned to New York, and there practiced law for eleven years, when he entered the service of the German Empire, first as vice-consul, and then as consul, at New York. Later he was appointed to the same position in this city. His eminent intellectual qualities and broad culture won for him high literary distinction, and he was esteemed in official circles at Berlin for his efficiency and thoroughness in the consular service. He received from the German government the decoration of the Red Eagle. He died on April 7, 1885, leaving a large circle of friends to mourn the loss of one whose remarkable qualities of mind and heart gave him an international reputation.

CHARLES HENRO TIN, who has resided in this city since 1848, is one of the most prominent and successful financiers in the west. He is the consul here for Belgium and Turkey, and was appointed to the first named consulate in 1876, and to the charge of the affairs of the Ottoman Empire the year succeeding. He is the son of Dr. Joseph F. and Adèle Henrotin, of Brussels, Belgium, where he was born on April 15, 1843. A sketch of his father's life and services has been already given. Charles accompanied his parents to this city, but, in 1856, was sent to Tournay, Belgium, to complete his education and to fit him to enter the Belgium Polytechnic school, where he was to study military engineering. After graduating from the university at that place, he returned to Chicago in 1861, and entered the service of the Merchants' Loan and Trust Company. Here he first developed that remarkable insight into monetary affairs that has given him an almost national reputation. He succeeded Lyman J. Gage as cashier of the bank in 1868, and for ten years retained that position. In 1878, Mr. Henrotin entered the banking and brokerage business on his own account, laying the foundation of the enterprise he to-day conducts. His specialties became railroad first mortgage bonds and city and county securities. About the time that Mr. Henrotin started in business, the city became badly involved in debt, and its paper on the market was in such shape that municipal bankruptcy seemed imminent. For substantial aid rendered in this dire extremity, to no one man more than Charles Henrotin does Chicago owe a debt of lasting gratitude. The city scrip issue had been declared illegal, and the syndicate of capitalists depended on to take it had refused to take any more. Its value had fallen to eighty-five cents, and the city employes were seriously inconvenienced and local business interests badly affected. Mr. Henrotin had confidence in the municipality of which he was a citizen, and possessed the pluck and energy necessary to buy the depreciated scrip. He took every dollar's worth that was offered, and putting up the price to ninety-three cents at once, turned the tide in the city's favor, helped materially to restore its credit and to place its indebtedness on a basis that won for him the appreciation and the gratitude of the entire community. Since then he has taken nearly every issue of county bonds, and helped to negotiate them, being the first to do so at low rates. He has the reputation of being one of the best judges of investment securities in Chicago, and is regarded as one of most successful financiers in the West. Mr. Henrotin was one of the founders of the French Benevolent Society of Illinois, and was its president for two successive terms. He was also the principal leader in the organization of the Chicago Stock Exchange; he was unanimously elected its first president, was re-elected for a second term, and declined to serve a third term. He was also one of the principal projectors of the Chicago Opera House Company, and is now its vice president. His consular duties are important and numerous. His reports to the Belgian government on various subjects have made for him an enviable reputation. When the telephone was first put into practical operation, Mr. Henrotin, in connection with the French consul, made a lengthy report to his government on its application, which attracted much attention in Europe and led to large concessions being made to himself and his friends in introducing the instrument in France, and, ultimately, in the organization of a telephone corporation in Paris, which is now the largest in the world. His reports on commerce have been large and exhaustive. Mr. Henrotin has done much to encourage the emigration of skilled labor and well-to-do artisans from Belgium, thereby bringing to this country a class that has superseded the pauper element. In every sense he is a public-spirited man; and when he inaugurated the half-century celebration of the Belgian government in this city in 1881, he was thanked by the Belgium government for his fidelity to the interests he represented and the international benefits he had secured. He has been a life-long democrat, but his business duties have compelled him to keep from accepting any public offices of honor and trust. Mr. Henrotin was married September 2, 1869, to Miss Ellen M. Martin, of this city; they have three children—Edward Clement, Charles Martin and Noris Bates Henrotin. Scarcely more than a young man, standing at the threshold of business life where most men are 'but beginning to lay the foundation of their fortunes, Mr. Henrotin occupies a position and enjoys a reputation that time will only strengthen and enlarge.

HENRY CLAUSSENIUS, Austro-Hungarian consul at Chicago, was born in Eschwege, Nassau, February 1, 1825, the son of Anton William Clausenius, justice of the circuit court of that place. At the time of the present consul's birth, Nassau was an independent electorate, but is now a portion of Prussia proper. Henry commenced his education at the Gymnasium at Cassel. After a thorough course of tuition he traveled for a year, and then opened a most successful school at Bischhausen. Becoming objectionable to the government, however, on account of his liberal views, he, in 1850, immigrated to New York. There he engaged, first, with a paper-hanging establishment, and later in Col's map-publishing house. Here his geographical knowledge was of considerable service. He abandoned his employment, however, after a short time, to engage as a window-shade painter, but finally seemed to find congenial service in the wood-carving line. His mechanical skill and artistic taste soon gained him success in this business, which so prospered that he was compelled to employ as many as twelve assistants at one time. About this time, he married Miss Johanna VanTilly. Mr. Clausenius then procured employment in the banking-house of J. W. Schmidt & Company, of New York, the head of which firm was consul for Prussia, Saxony and Baden. The business of the consulate devolved upon Mr. Clausenius from 1855 to 1861, when, through the influence of Baron Von Gerolt, a warm personal friend of President Lincoln, he was appointed consul of Prussia at Chicago, by commission from Count Bismarck, minister of foreign affairs. Upon his arrival in Chicago, Mr. Clausenius opened a banking-house under the firm name of Clausenius, Canada & Schmitzler, from which his former partners have since retired, but which has been known for some time as one of the most conservative and reliable institutions of the kind in the West. In 1863, Mr. Clausenius was appointed consul of the North German Confederation, and in 1871, of the German Empire; his consular dignities and duties keeping pace with the political changes in Germany. For his able representation the following medals of honor have, from time to time, been bestowed upon him: Knight's Cross, First Class of the Order of Albrecht the Brave, from Saxony; Knight's Cross, First Class Order of the Emperor Francis Joseph, from Austria; Knightly Cross of the "Lion of Zaehring," from the Grand Duchy of Baden; a similar emblem from the Thuringen States, of the Order of the Ernestinian House; and the Order of Albrecht, "The Brave," Comthur Cross, from the kingdom of Saxony. Since the death of Mr. Schmitzler, Mr. Clausenius has performed the duties of Austrian consul. He has been identified with the school system in this city for many years. He is an enthusiastic lover and patron of music, at one time having been president of the Arion society and an honorary member of the Liederkrantz in New York. He was one of the organizers of the German Aid and Relief Society, of which association he was the first president, and of which he has been an officer and director up to the present time. In 1877, Mr. Clausenius resigned his position as German consul, the government prohibiting diplomats from engaging in other business when in its service. In October of the same year, however, he was appointed consul for Austro-Hungary, and, later, was made the general western agent of the North German Lloyd steamship company, of Bremen. His business is a very extensive one, and from its revenue he has provided a beautiful home for his family, costing $60,000. His wife is still living. They have six children—Gustavus A., Edward, George W., Henry, Minna and Bismarck.

AGOSTINO SCUITTI was appointed consular agent for the Italian government January 13, 1876, by Cavalier Ferdinando di Lucca, console-générale at New York, with control of the States of Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Illinois. Mr. Scuitti was born March 17, 1818, at Borzanasca, Genoa department, Italy, the son of John and Mary (Lagorio) Scuitti. He received his education at his native place. For some time after the completion of his studies, from 1840 to 1849, he served as a soldier; and when war was declared with Austria, he remained with Carlo Alberto, the king, until the latter's abdication after the battle of Navarra, and served with credit until peace was declared. He came to Chicago in 1856, and two years later was married to Miss Mary Veilla. By the great fire he was a serious financial sufferer. Mr. Scuitti has three children living, the eldest of whom, Emilia, is now a resident of South America. The other children are Adelaide and Mathilde.

DAVID V. WHITING, consul for Venezuela, was appointed to that position in 1880, by General Guzman Blanco, president of the Republic, with whom he was acquainted when a boy. His career has been a varied and interesting one, he having filled high positions of honor and trust under three different governments. Mr. Whiting was born in Caracas, the capital city of Venezuela, April 1, 1827, his father, Joseph P., having left Baltimore for South America three years previously, and located at Caracas, where he carried on a general merchandise business. David was educated at the military academy in his native place until 1844, when he came to Baltimore, and after a short time was appointed secretary of the Venezuelan legation in Washington, being left in charge of the legation on the return to South America of the minister in 1849. He then went to New Mexico, and held several important positions under the United States government until 1861; among them that of secretary of state, official translator of the territory, private secretary to the executive department, and chief clerk and translator in the general land office. He then removed to Kansas City, engaging in the forwarding and commission business for two years. At the expiration of that time, he visited Matamoros, Mexico, and became Spanish editor of the Ranchero. When the imperial troops vacated the northern frontier, Mr. Whiting accompanied them to the City of Mexico, and was there intrusted with several important commissions for the empire. His adventures while under the French representative, Maximilian, were thrilling and numerous, the Republicans seeking his life on several occasions. In 1867, he went to Galveston, and engaged in business until 1871, when he removed to San Antonio, Texas. In 1874, he had charge of the Spanish department of the general land office of the State of Texas, at Austin. In 1878, he came to Chicago, and organized and took to Mexico the famous Chicago expedition. In this enterprise, which left Chicago, January 6, 1879, not a life was lost, nor a connection missed, from the inception of the expedition until its safe return to this city. He then embarked in business in Chicago, and, in addition to his consular duties, started La Voz de Chicago, a monthly organ of the Spanish-speaking Americans, and natives of Mexico, Central and South America, and the West Indies, throughout the Northwest—a publication of rare excellence and value in the field it fills. He was married to Miss Anna Teresa Daly, a native of Venezuela, in 1847. They have had twelve children, only two of whom were born in the same city. Two sons, Joseph P. and William Clement, are engaged in business with Mr. Whiting in Chicago, and another, Emilio Paez, is engaged in the railroad business in Mexico. His remaining living children are Stella Regina, Dolores, Alvaro Maximilian, Alonzo Aguilar and Ruy Diaz Whiting.

RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The first volume of this history detailed the progress of the Catholic Church in this diocese, down to the year 1857. Reference has been made to the number and architectural grandeur of the church edifices dedicated up to that time. Others were even then projected which were designed to surpass in size, cost, and general magnificence the most imposing of those yet erected; and in every other respect of religious progress there was soon a still more marked advance. In the period with which we have now to deal, the system of parochial schools was established and placed on a permanent footing—the initiative in this work being, naturally, taken by the Jesuits. Institutions of charity, academies and convents were founded in every part of the city, and, in general, a new impulse seems to have been given for the propagation and extension of Catholic works.*

*The compiler is indebted to Wm. J. Onahan, the Catholic historian of Chicago, for important data presented in this chapter.

This new era is co-incident with the appointment of the Right Rev. James Duggan as Bishop of Chicago; which event dates from January 21, 1859.

Bishop Duggan had been raised to the episcopal rank on May 3, 1857, and was appointed co-adjutor to the Archbishop of St. Louis, his nominal title being derived from the See of Antigoné. Prior to his elevation, the bishop had labored in St. Louis in various positions, for many years as pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, and had endeared himself to all classes by his pleasing address and kindness of heart. In 1853, he was appointed administrator of Chicago, in the interregnum following the transfer of Bishop Van de Velde to Natchez. In this city he soon won the affection of priests and people; nor was his popularity limited to those of his own faith. Protestants of every sect and condition learned to respect and admire him for his benevolence, and for his taste and accomplishments as a scholar and virtuoso. He collected a large and valuable library, rich in theology and also in the classics and belles-lettres. By his taste for and encouragement of art, he gave an impetus to the liberal arts in Chicago at a period when the stimulus of patronage was most needed. But it is in the line of his ecclesiastical administration that we are to look for the greatest result of his labors and talents. Certainly the early years of his episcopate gave remarkable promise of great results to religion and education, and there was little to suggest the unhappy mental disorder which ten years later brought Bishop Duggan's episcopal career to so sad a close.

The first appointments made by the new Bishop were received with satisfaction by both the clergy and laity. These were Rev. Dennis Dunne, vicar-general; Rev. Thaddeus J. Butler, secretary; Rev. John McMullen, chancellor. Special encouragement was given to the different religious orders to found houses in Chicago and throughout the diocese.

The Jesuits had already gained admission, and, under the energetic lead of Rev. Father Damen, work was already far advanced on the great Church of the Holy Family, West Twelfth Street, and an immense congregation availed themselves of the religious advantages brought to their doors by the Jesuit fathers. The Franciscan order came in 1857; and St. Peter's Church and parish were assigned to their charge.

The Redemptorist Fathers arrived in 1860, and organized the German Congregation of St. Michael's, speedily commencing the erection of a vast church and capacious schools. The Benedictine Fathers were introduced in 1861, taking charge of St. Joseph's Church, likewise a German congregation.

The Ladies of the Sacred Heart, from St. Louis, were invited by Bishop Duggan to establish an academy for the higher education of young ladies in this city; and, accordingly, in 1859, Madame Gallway arrived with several religieuses of that community, and opened an academy in temporary quarters on Wabash Avenue, subsequently removing to the corner of Rush and Illinois streets, where the Ladies remained until the building of their convent and academy on West Taylor Street was completed. These and other works initiated by Bishop Duggan will find appropriate and fuller mention under their separate headings.

The outbreak of the civil war enlisted the zeal and sympathies of the bishop on the side of the Union, of which he continued to the end an ardent supporter. He encouraged Colonel Mulligan in the organization of the "Irish Brigade," as far as became his office, and lent his aid to every effort for the benefit of the war sufferers, the widows and orphans, and to sustain the funds of the Sanitary Commission.

Besides regularly preaching in his Cathedral and on the occasions of his visitations throughout the diocese, he lectured several times, by public invitation, in the city, always with general appreciation. On the occasion of the death of Senator Douglas, Bishop Duggan was invited to deliver the funeral oration—a duty which he performed at the grave of the dead statesman, in the presence of a vast multitude of people, including all the civil and benevolent societies of the city. The address was admitted to be a masterpiece of eloquence.

The bishop went to Rome in 1862, again in 1866; and in 1867, he made a protracted stay abroad, visiting the Holy Land during his travels, and on his return to Chicago was received with great popular demonstrations of welcome by both clergy and laity. This triumph was soon to be clouded by discords, by public controversies, and, finally, by physical and mental prostration of the bishop, whose reason, sapped by the insidious approaches of disease, gave way under the strain to which it was subjected, and he shortly became a sorrowful mental wreck. To enter into the details of the controversies during the last year of Bishop Duggan's administration, would now scarcely serve any useful purpose. Several widely respected clergymen were engaged in the discussion, and carried the matter to the authorities at Rome. It can now safely be assumed that Bishop Duggan acted with too great harshness, and, although in the end, he was apparently sustained by the Holy See, he was nevertheless enjoined to restore and receive into favor the clergy who, according to his view, had been contumacious and insubordinate. In view of the bishop's subsequent early prostration and crowning calamity, all parties to the unhappy feud, by common consent, have long ceased to dwell on it and its circumstances, and it is accordingly dismissed into the oblivion of unrecorded history. No change or improvement in his condition has ever given the smallest encouragement to the hope of his ultimate recovery. A sketch of his life may appropriately be supplemented.

BISHOP DUGGAN was born in the village of Maynooth, County Kildare, Ireland, in 1827. He attended the parish school of his native place, and, having shown from an early age the disposition to enter a religious life, he was subsequently sent to the Seminary at Ballaghaderen, County Mayo, in which he qualified himself, by a course of classical studies, for Maynooth College, where he pursued the course of theology and other branches essential to his admission to Holy Orders. Before completing the course, he emigrated to the United States, arriving in 1846. He was received by the archbishop of St. Louis, who assigned the young scholastic to St. Vincent's College, at Cape Girardeau, Mo., an institution then and since conducted by the Lazarist Fathers. Having finished his studies and received ordination as a priest, he was appointed chaplain to one of the convents of the Sisters of Charity, in St. Louis. In this and in other services in that city, Father Duggan gave such high evidences of zeal and capacity, that after a few years he was appointed president of the College at Carondelet, Mo.; subsequently was pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, St. Louis; and, later, vicar-general of the archdiocese. As narrated in our first volume, Father Duggan was appointed administrator of Chicago, in 1853, following the transfer of Bishop Van de Velde from this See to Natchez. This was prior to the appointment and arrival of Bishop O'Regan, so that he came, in 1859, not as a stranger to the priests and people over whom he was to reign during the next ten years.

Following the removal of Bishop Duggan, in 1869, Rev. T. J. Halligan was appointed administrator pro tempore, pending the nomination of a bishop to the practically vacant See. Father Halligan had already served in this capacity, during the last visit of Bishop Duggan to Europe, and was regarded by many as one of the principal causes of the unfortunate troubles that culminated shortly after the bishop's return. He did not long exercise his authority. The affairs of the diocese demanded the supervision of one vested with the functions and authority of the episcopate, and choice was soon made of Rev. Thomas Foley, of the Cathedral and Archdiocese of Baltimore, to fill the position. He was consecrated bishop in the Cathedral of Baltimore, on February 27, 1870, and was formally installed in this city in March of the same year. The first words of his address on that occasion will long be remembered. They were, "Peace be unto you," and formed the text of his discourse, as they evidently constituted the controlling principles of his episcopal career.

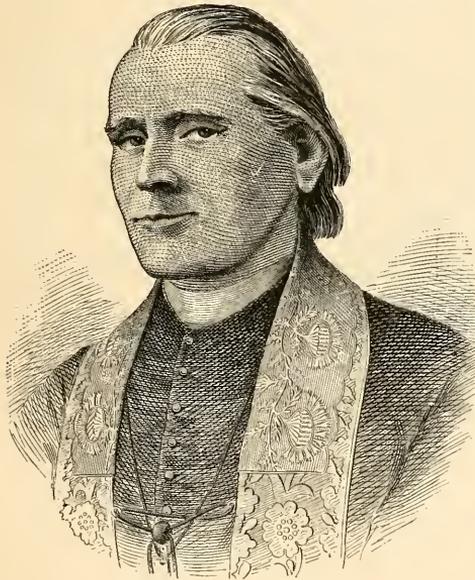

BISHOP FOLEY was a native of Baltimore, and was born March 6, 1823. He was educated at and graduated from St. Mary's College, and subsequently entered the Sulpician Theological Seminary in that city. After completing his ecclesiastical education, he was ordained in the Cathedral of Baltimore, on the 16th of August, 1846. His first mission was at Rockville, Montgomery Co., Md., about eighteen miles north of Washington, and included four churches within a circuit of fifty miles. The roads were primitive, and the conveniences for travel were, in those days, equally antiquated, so that much hardship was necessarily undergone by the zealous young pastor during the years in his first mission. From this field of labor he was transferred, in 1847-48, to St. Patrick's Church, Washington, as assistant to Rev. Father Matthews, a venerated and historic character in the history of the American Church. In 1849, he was called by Archbishop Eccleston to the Cathedral in Baltimore. Upon the death of the latter, in 1851, Most Rev. Francis Patrick Kenrick was promoted to the See of Baltimore, and, shortly after his accession, Rev. Thomas Foley was appointed his secretary, and remained attached to the Cathedral until the death of Archbishop Kenrick, in 1864. This great and lamented prelate was succeeded by Rt. Rev. Bishop Spalding, of Louisville, who was elevated to metropolitan rank and dignity as Archbishop of Baltimore, May 3, 1864. When, shortly afterward, the new archbishop left the country to visit Rome, he showed his confidence in Father Foley by appointing him vicar-general and administrator. He held the position of vicar-general until he was chosen to the See of Chicago—to the diocese which, as he declared in his first sermon, "holds so high a place; which exercises so vast an influence; which already has attracted the attention, not only of the people of this country, but of foreign lands; and which is destined to be, if not the first, at least the second in the country. This diocese, which will hold so high a place, with so large a number of souls within its limits—shall ever claim my careful attention, and whilst I live and am able to labor, whatever I can give shall be freely, entirely and cheerfully, given to Chicago."

It was in this spirit that Bishop Foley commenced his career in this city.

ST. MARY'S CHURCH.—The history of this church, in the preceding volume, closed with the pastorates of Revs. T. J. Butler and Thomas Burke, in 1857. Rev. Matthew Dillon was also priest here at the same time with them, but, on the 16th of August, 1858, he was transferred to Racine, Wis., by Bishop O'Regan. Soon after Bishop O'Regan resigned, and was succeeded by Right Rev. James Duggan, D.D. The pastors of St. Mary's, under this bishop, in 1859, were Revs. T. J. Butler, D.D., Dr. J. McMullen and Dr. Thomas Burke. They were succeeded, in 1861, by Rev. F. McKeon as pastor and Rev. T. McGivern as assistant pastor. In 1862, Rev. J. Macken became pastor and Rev. Thomas J. Halligan assistant, remaining two years. In 1864, Rev. Thomas J. Halligan became pastor, and remained in that position until 1870, when he was succeeded by Rev. Edward W. Gavin. In 1864, the assistant pastor of this church was Rev. Patrick T. Butler; in 1867, the assistant pastor was Rev. John Fanning, and Rev. Patrick T. Butler became chancellor; in 1868, Rev. M. M. McDermott became assistant pastor, and, in 1869, there were three pastors, Revs. Edward W. Gavin, H. M. O'Gara McShane and C. H. Gavin, D.D. In 1870, the assistant of Rev. Edward W. Gavin was Rev. Thomas L. Keating. These were the pastors at the time of the great fire. This fire burned everything perishable pertaining to the church property, except the records. The buildings lost were the bishop's residence, at the corner of Michigan Avenue and Madison Street. Next to the church-building stood the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, which was likewise destroyed.

RIGHT REV. JOHN McMULLEN, D.D., was born on March 8, 1832, at Ballinahinch, County Down, Ireland, the son of James and Alice McMullen. In 1833, his family emigrated to America, and finally settled in Chicago in 1843. The father, James McMullen, was always an earnest and devoted Catholic, and during his long and honorable career was remarkable for his devotion to the interests of his religion. His son John, under the pious influences of his parents and of Bishop Quarter, the first Bishop of

RT. REV. WM. QUARTER, D.D., FIRST CATHOLIC BISHOP OF CHICAGO.

Chicago, was early marked out for an ecclesiastical career, his own good disposition of course corresponding to the wishes and intentions of bishop and parents. His early studies were pursued in the University of St. Mary's of the Lake, from which he graduated with the highest honors in 1853. He was sent to Rome the same year, where he completed his course of theological studies, and, in 1858, was ordained priest, gaining also the degree of Doctor of Divinity, which in this case was something more than an unmeaning compliment; he had honestly earned the dignity by hard study and acknowledged acquirements. Returning to Chicago he preached his first sermon in St. Mary's—then the Cathedral. He was for a short time attached to the Bishop's Church—the Cathedral; later, for a brief period, to St. Louis' Church, and in 1863 he assumed charge of the re-organized University of St. Mary's of the Lake, which was then designed to fill the place of a theological seminary for the diocese. Here the Doctor seemed to be in his most congenial and fitting place and work. Needless to say he entered into it with great zeal and with his whole heart. But the University was not destined to prosper. Difficulties and misunderstandings arose between the diocesan and the faculty, which finally culminated in the closing of the University. Dr. McMullen was then assigned to a new parish (first formed on the West Side), St. Paul's; but it was not long until the widening breach between Bishop Dugan and several of the leading priests of the city, induced Dr. McMullen to go in person to Rome, there to lay the situation in Chicago before the Holy See. Throughout those difficulties the attitude of Dr. McMullen reflected in no respect on his character and loyalty as a Catholic ecclesiastic. When he returned, he accepted a country parish, that of Wilmington, Ill., where he labored with earnestness and endeared himself to the people of the neighborhood, Catholic and Protestant alike. One year after the installation of Bishop Foley Dr. McMullen was called to Chicago, to fill the post of vicar-general and pastor of the Cathedral. Here again followed fresh trials, but this time of a different character. The great fire of 1871 swept away the beautiful Cathedral, and in its desolating course razed many other Catholic churches and Catholic institutions of education and charity. It was a time to try men's souls. Dr. McMullen entered heroically into the work of restoring what had been destroyed. He proceeded, under the direction of Bishop Foley, on a mission to the East and to Canada, to solicit aid toward the re-building of the churches and institutions—a mission which was crowned with success. Dr. McMullen's self-sacrificing labors during this period will long remain in honored remembrance in the hearts of the Catholics of Chicago, those of the Cathedral parish especially. And so the Cathedral was re-built, more beautiful and more costly than before. A grand academy, under the charge of the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, was erected beside it, and soon after commodious parish schools were likewise provided. In the midst of this era, Bishop Foley to the dismay and sorrow of a mourning city, was suddenly stricken down by death. The lamented prelate's last words were a testimony and a charge to Dr. McMullen. He appointed him administrator of the diocese, thus showing the highest testimony to the character and qualities of his vicar-general. With what fidelity and high capacity the Doctor acquitted himself of the grave trust is best shown in his early elevation to the episcopal rank and dignity. Shortly following the appointment of Bishop Feehan, as first archbishop of Chicago, Dr. McMullen was chosen by Leo XIII. bishop of the newly created See of Davenport, Iowa. He was consecrated in the Cathedral of the Holy Name July 25, 1881, and in the following month Bishop McMullen proceeded to his new See, accompanied by a large escort of priests and laymen from Chicago. Davenport gave him a royal welcome; and in St. Margaret's Cathedral of that city he addressed his people in a sermon of great power and eloquence, which, with his known elevated qualities, soon won to him the affection and respect of all classes in his new home. There was work to do in the new diocese. The bishop entered into the spirit of that work with prodigious zeal. He visited every part of his diocese, and everywhere infused his own spirit and purpose into priests and people. But an insidious disease had seized upon him, and no human skill was able to arrest its fatal progress. His death occurred on July 4, 1883, transforming a day of rejoicing into one of gloom and sorrow for the city of Davenport, his last home. On the day of the funeral, the bells of the Protestant churches of the city pealed out in solemn union with those of the Cathedral, in testimony of sorrow for his decease, a generous and touching tribute to the dead prelate. The Pontifical Requiem Mass was celebrated by Archbishop Feehan of Chicago, and the funeral oration was delivered by the deceased bishop's warm friend, Bishop Spalding of Peoria. The bishop's remains, by his own request, were interred in his Cathedral in Davenport. His memory remains a precious inheritance to priests and people wherever he was known, and especially in the scenes of his labors, his trials, and his final vindication and triumph.

ST. LOUIS' CHURCH.—On October 1, 1855, Rev. John Waldron, at the present time pastor of St. John's Church, was appointed to this church. His first efforts were directed to the restoration of harmony between the French and Irish members of the congregation. In this he was very successful, and he remained with them as pastor until October, 1859. He was then succeeded by Rev. John McMullen, who remained there about one year. The subsequent pastors were Rev. Joseph P. Roles, 1860; Rev. John Macken in 1861; Rev. J. H. Grogan, 1862; Rev. A. Broderick, 1864; Rev. Patrick Conway, 1865, and Rev. Patrick

M. Noonan from 1866 to the time of the destruction of this church-building by the great fire of 1871, which also destroyed the school-house purchased some years previously of St. John's Church.

THE CHURCH OF NOTRE DAME DE CHICAGO is virtually the continuation of St. Louis' Church. It is located at the northwest corner of Halsted and Congress streets, was commenced early in 1864, and was dedicated March 5, 1865, by Bishop Duggan. It has a French congregation, and Rev. James Cote was pastor from 1866 to 1884. In 1884, Rev. A. L. Dergeron succeeded Father Cote. A new location for a church has been selected on Vernon Park Place, the old church property having been sold.

ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH.—The pastorate of Rev. Dennis Dunne in this Church commenced November 11, 1854, and continued until 1868. His assistants were, in 1858-59, Rev. John Magan; in 1860, Revs. John Magan and Andrew Eustace; in 1862, Revs. G. Prendergast and P. F. Glennow; in 1863, Rev. F. Keenan; in 1865, Revs. J. Brennan and S. O'Sullivan; in 1866, Rev. P. M. Flannagan; and in 1868, Revs. Stephen M. A. Barrett and P. Maloney. In 1869, Joseph H. Doyle succeeded to the pastorate made vacant by the death of Dr. Dunne; and he, in 1870, was followed by Rev. Thomas O'Gara, who remained until June, 1871. The assistant of Rev. Father O'Gara was Rev. Charles H. Gavin.

The church-building, which stands on the northwest corner of Adams and Desplaines streets, was originally erected without a basement, but in 1871, shortly after the appointment of Rev. P. J. Conway as pastor, the building was raised, and a stone basement built under it. The cost of this much-needed improvement was $20,000. At the time of the fire the building was standing on the screws used to elevate it to the grade, and the improvement was completed as soon as practicable after the excitement occasioned by that great calamity had died away.

REV. DENNIS DUNNE.

REV. REV. DENNIS DUNNE, formerly vicar-general of the Diocese of Chicago, and pastor of St. Patrick's Church, was born in February, 1821, in Queens County, Ireland. His father was Patrick Dunne and his mother Amelia (Maloney) Dunne. When quite young, he came with his parents to Chatham, New Brunswick, and thence he went to Quebec, and prepared for the priesthood. In 1848, he was ordained for the Diocese of Chicago by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Lefevre, Bishop of Detroit. For a few months he was professor in the University of St. Mary's of the Lake, and was then sent to Galena, Ill., where was his first mission. From Galena, he was transferred, in 1850, to Ottawa, his mission there including the towns along the canal. In 1854, he was transferred to Chicago, and became the successor of Rev. Father McLaughlin, who that year died of cholera. In this field he labored until in the summer of 1868, when he was removed by Bishop Duggan, on account of the attitude he assumed toward that prelate in reference to diocesan affairs. Rev. Dennis Dunne was a man of well-known rectitude of life and of great personal popularity. His influence over both laity and clergy was quite extensive and beneficial. In 1855, he was made vicar-general of the diocese, and filled that office almost to the end of his life. He was a man of great energy and decision of character, and considered no enterprise too great for him to accomplish. In August, 1862, he organized an Irish Catholic Regiment, to assist in the suppression of the Rebellion. This regiment was the 90th Illinois Volunteers, otherwise known as the Irish Legion. In 1865, the Sacred College at Rome conferred upon Father Dunne the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1863, he was attacked by typhoid fever, which left him in a comparatively enfeebled condition; and though, after his recovery, he continued to perform his duties until 1868, yet he never was strong, and at length, on the 23d of December, 1868, death terminated his career. His funeral occurred on Sunday, December 27, and was attended by the 90th Regiment, under command of Colonel Owen Stuart, and by all the Catholic societies in Chicago. The funeral address was delivered by Rev. Stephen M. A. Barrett, the present pastor of St. Stephen's Church.

REV. PATRICK TERRY, who was, at the time of his death, pastor of St. Patrick's Church, was born in County Waterford, Ireland. His education was obtained in his native country, and he was ordained there in 1850. Shortly afterward he came to the United States, and a little later to Chicago. He was appointed assistant pastor at St. Patrick's Church, in September, 1850, his superior being Rev. P. McLaughlin. He remained there until June, 1852, when he was appointed pastor of the Catholic Church, at Morris, Ill. From Morris he went, in 1867, to Ottawa, Ill., and took pastoral care of the dependent missions in the vicinity of that city, remaining until 1881. During that year he was appointed pastor of St. Patrick's Church, as the successor of Rev. P. J. Conway, at present vicar-general of the Diocese of Chicago. He remained in this position until his death in September, 1884. Rev. Patrick Terry was a fine scholar, being especially well versed in literature, history, science and theology. He was of pleasing address, generous to a fault, always ready to assist those in need, and was hence very popular with his parish and with the people. As an indication of the esteem in which he was held, it may be stated that he was of those chosen to give advice to the bishop on both general and special matters pertaining to the diocese. He was made a dean by Bishop Foley in the early days of his episcopate, and was popularly known as Dean Terry during the latter years of his life. The people of St. Patrick's parish learned to respect and love him more and more as the days of his pastorage increased, and at his death felt that their loss could not soon be repaired.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH.—Rev. Mr. Liermann, on June 17, 1860, was succeeded by Rev. J. B. Mager, who remained until November 27, 1864. Rev. Peter Fischer was the next pastor. During his term of service, the brick church building now standing at the southwest corner of Clark and Polk streets was erected. This building cost originally, without furnishing, about $45,000. The organ was purchased of the St. Louis' Church, in 1868. The school-house, erected in 1864, cost $7,000. The priest's house was built in 1865, and the choir was added to the church-building at that time, the total cost of both being about $12,000. During the pastorage of Rev. Mr. Fischer the great fire of 1871 occurred, but this church escaped destruction.

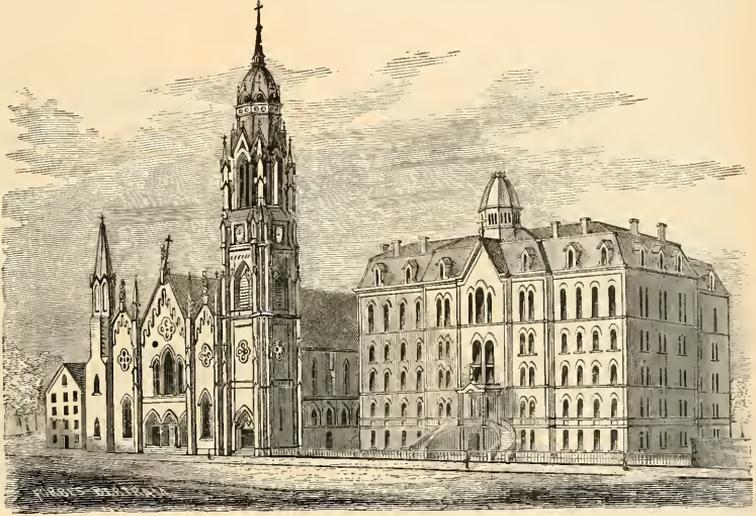

ST. JAMES' CHURCH was founded in 1857, by a few Catholics living in the vicinity of the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy. At first, the entire congregation of St. James' Church, and that portion of the community of Sisters located at Calumet Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, celebrated mass in the wash-room of the Convent. Rev. Thomas F. Kelly was appointed first pastor by Bishop O'Regan; and the principal lay promoters of Catholicism in this section, and sustainers of St. James' Church, were William Donahue, Robert Whalen, John Dorney and Timothy Flannigan. At first there were in all about twenty families connected with the Church. They held religious services in the convent about a year, but in 1858, commenced the erection of a frame church-edifice, on Prairie Avenue, between Twenty-sixth and Twenty-ninth streets. It was built under the superintendency of William Donahue, who donated, liberally, time, money and materials toward its construction. The total cost of the church was about $3,000. Rev. Father Kelly, who also had, at that time, the pastoral care of St. Bridget's Church, remained pastor until he was appointed chaplain of the 90th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, with which he went to the front, and remained until 1864. During his absence his place was filled by Rev. Father Carrigan and Rev. Peter O'Dowd. Upon his return from the War, Rev. Father Kelly resumed his labors at St. James' Church, and continued pastor until his death in 1865. Rev. Father O'Dowd then succeeded him, and remained until his death in 1866. Rev. P. J. R. Murphy then became pastor, and remained until superseded by Rev. P. J. Conway in December, 1866. During the pastorates of Revs. Murphy and Conway, the church-building was enlarged and a priest's residence erected. In 1871, Rev. Mr. Conway was transferred to St. Patrick's Church, and was succeeded at St. James by Rev. P. W. Riordan, now Archbishop of San Francisco. During his pastorate the present magnificent edifice on Wabash Avenue was erected.

MOST REV. PATRICK W. RIORDAN, the present Archbishop of San Francisco, was born at Chatham, New Brunswick, August 27, 1841. In 1848, his parents decided to emigrate to the West, and fixed on Chicago as their future home. Shortly following their arrival, the future archbishop entered the University of St. Mary's of the Lake, where he remained until 1851, gaining high honors and distinctions. Subsequently he attended a select school taught by Mr. Gleason; and in 1856 became a student at Notre Dame, Indiana, where he remained two years. In 1858, he proceeded to Rome, where he was enrolled in the College of the Propaganda. On the opening of the American College in the Eternal City, Mr. Riordan was one of the first twelve students to enter the institution; but the climate of Rome, and his failing health, compelled him to go elsewhere to pursue his studies, and he accordingly spent a year in the College of the Holy Ghost, Paris, and finally completed his course at the American College, Louvain, Belgium, from which he graduated in 1866 as a licentiate in Theology and Sacred Sciences. In the fall of that year, he returned to Chicago, where he was speedily assigned, by Right Rev. Bishop Duggan, to the staff of professors in his old college of St. Mary's of the Lake. as professor of Dogmatic Theology and Church History. Two years later, when the University was closed, Father Riordan was assigned to Woodstock, Ill., and shortly afterward transferred to St. Mary's, at Joliet, Ill., where he built a fine church. In 1871, Bishop Foley invited Father Riordan to take charge of the important parish of St. James', Chicago, where he remained, loved and honored by all his people, until his elevation to the archiepiscopal dignity in 1883. In the effort to raise the funds required for the erection of the costly St. James' Church, he courageously discarded the methods of "fairs and picnics," and raised the money by personal effort, in "subscriptions and collections from the people of the parish. Had Archbishop Riordan effected no other or greater work in his life than that which he accomplished in St. James' Parish, Chicago, from 1871 to 1883, he would have left splendid testimony to his zeal and ability as a pastor and his qualities as an administrator and teacher. Proud as the people of St. James' Parish were at the signal distinction conferred upon their beloved pastor, they were with difficulty reconciled to his removal, and so, when the time of his departure for San Francisco arrived, there was sorrow in every Catholic home and heart, not alone in the immediate parish, but throughout the city. On his arrival at the boundary line of his future archdiocese, he was warmly welcomed by Archbishop Alemany in person, by a large company of priests, and by a delegation of the leading citizens of San Francisco. Since then, Archbishop Alemany has formally resigned the archbishopric, and, after a long and heroic career of labor and toil, surrendered to his successor, the Sec of San Francisco. This was accomplished in 1885, and Most Rev. Patrick W. Riordan is now, accordingly, in full possession of the dignity and responsibilities of that great office. The solemnity of conferring and receiving the Pallium will occur in September, 1885.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY FAMILY.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY FAMILY.—In 1857, there were very few inhabitants in West Chicago, south of VanBuren Street. In this field, unpromising as it appeared, Rev. Father Arnold Damen, S. J., who was sent to Chicago by the Jesuits* of Missouri, in response to the invitation of Bishop O'Regan, determined to establish a parish and erect a church, and this, too, against the advice of Right Rev. Bishop O'Regan, who desired Father Damen to take charge of the Church of the Holy Name, then in course of erection, but nearly finished. Father Damen was also offered a fine site for his proposed church near Union Park, where, besides the ground being donated, money would have been subscribed to erect the church at once. But he purchased the lot bounded by Eleventh, May and Twelfth streets, in the spring of 1857, and immediately set to work to erect a large wooden, temporary chapel on Eleventh Street. This was completed, and opened for religious service on July 4, 1857, and in it mass was said and service held until the completion, in 1860, of the magnificent edifice known since as the Church of the Holy Family. Starting this church-building in 1857, the year of the financial crisis, seemed like in-

* As illustrating the reason for the selection of Chicago by the Jesuits, for the building up of a large church, the following well known dictum may be subjoined:

"Bernardus, valles, montes Benedictus amabat; Oppida, Franciscus, magnas Ignatius urbes."

C. F. Smarius, S. J., the great orator and missionary, by means of lectures and personal effort. It was built in Montreal, by Louis Mitchel. The formal opening of the organ took place October 21, 1870. The main altar and statuary of the chancel cost $25,000; the side altars of St. Joseph and B. V. Mary cost $6,000; and the total cost of the church was not less than $130,000. The stations of the cross are represented by valuable oil paintings, costing over $7,000, which were presented to the Church. The basement of the building is handsomely fitted up, and contains a chapel for the use of the various societies attached to the Church, and for the special instruction of candidates for first communion and confirmation. In 1865, the church was furnished with a new altar, built by Anthony Bucher, of Chicago, and dedicated October 15, 1865.

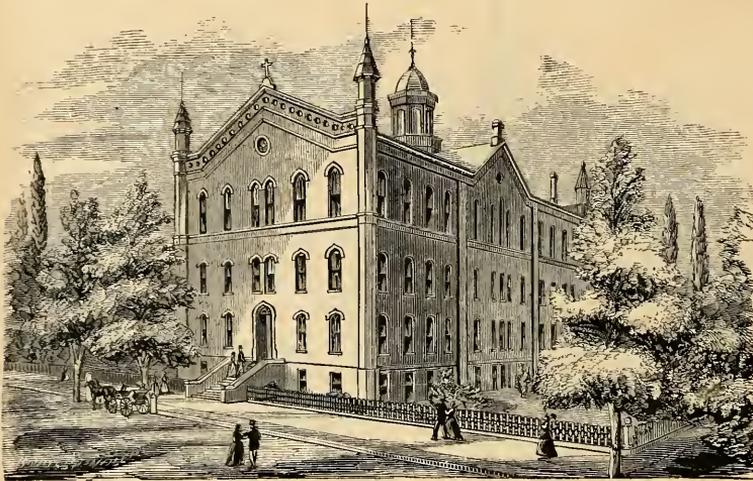

A building was erected, in 1862, west of the church, for the residence of the clergymen and priests of the order. This building is now used for society purposes. In 1864, Father Damen built a school for boys, a few blocks east of the church. The building is very large, is finished and furnished in an elaborate style, and is well attended by scholars. The teachers are members of the Society of Jesus. A school for the girls of the congregation is located a few blocks west.

Belonging to the church are several lay societies, of which the principal ones are the following: The Sodality for young ladies, St. Ann's Sodality for married ladies, the Gentlemen's Sodality, and a Sodality of the Holy Angels, composed of boys.

Rev. Arnold Damen, S. J., occupied the position of Superior in the Church of the Holy Family, from 1857 to October 10, 1872. The various pastors of this church have been the following: Rev. C. Truyens, from 1857 to 1859; Rev. Jacob Bouchard, 1857 to 1860; Rev. Michael J. Corbett, 1859 to 1862; Rev. Ignatius Maes, 1859; Rev. John Coveny, 1860; Rev. Peter Tschieder, 1860 to 1862; Rev. Maurice Oakley, 1861; Rev. Cornelius F. Smarius, 1861 to 1869; Rev. George Watson, 1861; Rev. James M. Converse, 1862 to 1865; Rev. Dominic Niederkorn, 1863 to 1876; Rev. Benedict Masselis, 1863; Rev. Michael J. Lawlor, 1863 to 1866; Rev. Andrew O'Neil, 1864 to 1884; Rev. John DeBlicke, 1864 to 1871; Rev. John F. O'Neil, 1866 to 1868; Rev. Florentine J. Boudreaux, 1865 to 1869; Rev. Maurice Oakley, 1866 to 1873; Rev. John Setters, 1868 to the present time; Rev. John Schultz, 1869 to 1877; Rev. John S. Verdin, 1869 to 1871; Rev. Michael Van Agt, 1869 to 1874; Rev. Van der Hayden, 1871.

REV. ARNOLD DAMEN, S. J., was born in the province of North Brabant, Holland, March 20, 1815. In 1837, Rev. Father DeSmet, the illustrious missionary among the Indians of the Rocky ving failure. Its completion would have been a feat impossible of accomplishment to the congregation without extraneous assistance. Subscriptions were taken throughout Chicago and other cities, and even in foreign countries. The building of the church was eagerly watched by the Catholic population; and in less than three years from the laying of the corner-stone, the consecration ceremonies took place. Ten bishops and thirty priests participated in the consecration; and the immense edifice was completely filled early in the day. The ceremonies were conducted by Right Rev. James Duggan, D.D., Bishop of Chicago; solemn pontifical high mass by Right Rev. Dr. Lafevre, Bishop of Detroit; Very Rev. Dennis Dunne acted as assistant priest, and Rev. D. Butler was master of ceremonies. The consecration sermon was delivered by Archbishop Kendrick, of St. Louis, who preached in English, and Bishop Henni, of Milwaukee, who preached in German.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOL, CHURCH OF THE HOLY FAMILY.

The church-edifice is of plain Gothic style of architecture, and has a pointed spire. The belfry contains a chime of three bells and a clock with four dials. The church, exclusive of the galleries, has a seating capacity of two thousand. In the rear are two galleries, the upper one being for the choir and organ. The organ is an instrument of great beauty and power, and cost $25,000, which sum was raised by the exertions of Rev.

Mountains, returned from Belgium to the United States, having made arrangements to accompany Rev. David Duparc, a secular priest, who was returning to the diocese of Bardstown, Ky. They were joined by Messrs. Arnold Damen, Francis D'Hope and Adrian Hendricks, all of whom made the journey through France to Paris, and thence to Havre, by stage-coach. At the latter place Rev. John S. Gleizal was added to the party. They were detained at the hospital at Havre du Grace five days, owing to the sickness

FATHER ARNOLD DAMEN, S. J.

of Father DeSmet; but though his physician forbade his attempting the voyage, he and Rev. David Duparc engaged a boat, and joined the others after the vessel in which they were to sail had weighed anchor. Father Damen and his young companions reached Florissant, Mo., and were admitted as novices November 1, 1837. After his novitiate, he was transferred to the St. Louis University, where he served as a teacher, and at the same time pursued his studies of philosophy and theology until 1844, when he was ordained priest. He was then assigned to parochial duties, and subsequently became the pastor of the College Church in St. Louis where he remained until 1857, and while occupying that position established sodalities for the young men and young women of the parish, and also built a hall for their special use. In 1857, Bishop O'Regan invited Rev. J. R. Druyts, provincial of the Jesuits in Missouri, to found a church and school in Chicago. The sagacious provincial perceived that the offer was one furnishing an opportunity full of future promise, and judged that a priest better qualified for the work than Rev. Arnold Damen was not at his disposal. Father Damen was, therefore, chosen for the mission, and, accompanied by Rev. Charles Truynens, reached Chicago early in May, 1857. The location selected for the new church was on Twelfth Street, between May Street and Blue Island Avenue. The corner-stone of the Holy Family Church was blessed by Bishop O'Regan August 25, 1857, and the church was dedicated August 15, 1860. A dwelling for the Fathers was located on the corner of Twelfth and May streets in 1861; the St. Ignatius College was begun in 1869, and classes were organized in it in September, 1870. Five parochial schools were erected, in which nearly five thousand children, each year, receive elementary education. When Father Damen first organized the parish, in 1857, almost all that portion of the city was unredeemed prairie, while there is now attached to the Holy Family Church a congregation of upward of twenty-five thousand souls. All that locality speedily was settled by a population, drawn thither by the piety and untiring zeal of Father Damen. His style of preaching and eloquence is peculiarly adapted to the tastes and understanding of the masses, who throng to hear him, and, whether as a missionary in the large cities of the East or in his own capacious Holy Family Church, he is equally powerful and indefatigable.

REV. CORNELIUS F. SMARIUS, the celebrated Jesuit missionary, was born at Thilburg, North Brabant, March 3, 1823. From his earliest years he was a model of piety to his fellow-students, whom he incited, not only by precept but also by example, to the love and practice of virtue. During those years he gave indications of the remarkable powers of oratory which in after life so distinguished him. In 1841, in company with four others, he embarked for America for the purpose of entering the Jesuit Novitiate in Florissant, Mo., and on the 13th of November, 1843, he took the usual vows of poverty, chastity and obedience. Prior to his ordination in 1849, he gave a course of Sunday evening lectures in St. Louis, which drew large audiences. For many years he was professor of rhetoric in St. Xavier College, Cincinnati and afterward held the same professorship in the St. Louis University. In 1852, he was sent to St. John's College, Fordham, N. Y., where he spent two years in close application to those studies which were deemed necessary to finish his entire course. In 1855, he returned to St. Louis, where he obtained great fame as a pulpit orator. In 1858, he was appointed pastor of St. Francis Xavier Church, in St. Louis, and, during a pastorate of about two years, he delivered a course of lectures on religious subjects remarkable for brilliant oratory and profound erudition. Several of these lectures were published in a volume entitled "Points of Controversy," of which a number of editions were issued. For the last ten years of his life, he was engaged as a missionary. During nine months of the year he was accustomed to preach, often three and four times a day, for weeks together, to immense audiences. The three remaining months of the year were occupied in giving retreats to the clergy of different dioceses and the inmates of religious houses throughout the country. It was doubtless owing to his exertions in the performance of these arduous duties that his death occurred at the early age of forty-seven. Rev. Cornelius F. Smarius was a very large man, weighing over three hundred pounds, was gifted with a commanding presence and with a voice of unusual depth and volume. He was an accomplished musician and remarkably talented in many ways. He died March 1, 1870, in Chicago, and was buried, on the 3d, in Calvary Cemetery. The funeral oration was preached by Rev. F. P. Garesche, S. J., of Milwaukee.

REV. MICHAEL J. LAWLOR, S. J., for many years a prominent member of the Society of Jesus, and treasurer of St. Ignatius College, was born in Dublin, Ireland, May 25, 1825. He studied for the priesthood at Maynooth College. After coming to the United States, and before receiving orders, he accepted a position as teacher in the Catholic schools of Cincinnati. He entered the Jesuit Novitiate in 1851, and was assigned to professor's work in St. Xavier College, Cincinnati, and at the St. Louis University. He belonged to the priesthood from that time until his death. His valuable services were divided between Cincinnati and Chicago. In this city he was treasurer of the order, and in the management of its financial affairs was remarkably successful, as their splendid structures testify. In the discharge of his duties as one of the pastors of the Church of the Holy Family he was zealous and generous. As a preacher he was clear, logical and persuasive, and his character was adorned with the highest virtues. He was for many years a patient sufferer from a painful malady, which finally shattered his vigorous constitution, and of which he died on June 18, 1879.

REV. MAURICE OAKLEY, S. J., one of the pastors of the Church of the Holy Family, was born December 21, 1814, in Grammont, otherwise Geertsbergen, East Flanders. His family was in affluent circumstances, and he received as good an education as could be obtained. He had just finished his Latin course, when, in 1830, the Belgian Revolution broke out. Notwithstanding his youth, he shouldered a musket, and fought in the war. The war ceasing, he cast about for a profession, hesitating for some time between jurisprudence and medicine. While thus in doubt, he met Father DeSmet, the famous Jesuit missionary, and at his instigation, entered the seminary in Ghent, having in view the secular priesthood. After studying two years, he came to this country, and landed in New York City December 21, 1834. He entered the novitiate of the Jesuit Fathers February 2, 1835, and received his first appointment in St. Louis, his journey from New York to St. Louis occupying about a month. He remained at this first mission until 1840, as professor in the Jesuit College, the only institution of the kind then in the West. He was then transferred to Cincinnati, as vice-president of the St. Xavier College, and on December 21, 1842, was ordained priest by Bishop Kenrick. In 1843, he was sent to take charge of the College of St. Charles, in Grand Coteau, La., and it was there he took the name of Oakley, to accommodate his French parishioners, to whom his name of Mauritius Van Den Eycken was too unwieldy. Soon afterward he was transferred to St. Louis, as professor and vice-president of the Jesuit College, where he remained until 1855; when he went to Bardstown, Ky., and thence to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he was made president of St. Xavier College, and served in that position until 1861. Upon the breaking out of the war, he was transferred to his present pastorate in connection with the Church of the Holy Family. Father Oakley is a musician of rare ability, and has educated numerous church choirs. Mozart's Twelfth Mass, for choir and orchestra, was his first great production in this city, at the dedication, in 1850, of the Holy Family Church. He is one of the oldest and most highly respected of the Jesuit Fathers of Chicago.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY NAME.—The history of this Church was given in the first volume, to the completion of the new and elegant brick edifice, and the first celebration of mass therein on Christmas day, 1854. The building there described was used for a Church, and most of the time as the Cathedral for the diocese, until destroyed by the great fire of October 9, 1871. The various pastors, with their assistants, from 1857 to 1871 were as follows: In 1857, Rev. Matthew Dillon, with Rev. Mr. Mahan as his assistant; in 1858 and 1859, Rev. Michael Lyons and Rev. William Edwards, assistant; in 1860, Very Rev. Dennis Dunne, S. J., was appointed pastor of the Cathedral; and, in 1862, Rev. J. P. Roles became pastor, and continued in that capacity until 1868, when he was removed by Bishop Duggan. His various assistants were as follows: In 1862, Rev. John H. Grogan; in 1863, Rev. T. F. McGivern; in 1864, Rev. Mr. Walsh; in 1865, Rev. P. M. Flannagan; in 1866, Rev. P. O'Neil; in 1868, Rev. Joseph H. Doyle. The successor of Rev. J. P. Roles was Rev. T. Quigley, CATHEDRAL OF THE HOLY NAME.

who acted as administrator of the Cathedral in the interval between the removal of Bishop Duggan and the beginning of the administration of Bishop Foley; and in 1870, the pastor in charge was Rev. Joseph H. Doyle

In 1870, Rt. Rev. Thomas Foley became adjutor-bishop of the diocese, and appointed Rev. John McMullen pastor, with two assistants, Rev. P. M. Flannagan and Rev. E. J. Guerin. During this administration came the great fire of 1871, inflicting a loss upon the parish of about $300,000.

RUINS, CATHEDRAL OF THE HOLY NAME.

ACADEMY OF THE HOLY NAME.—This institution was first opened in 1858, in a small building on Huron Street, near State. It was under the care of the Sisters of Charity, while Rev. Father Joseph P. Roles (then connected with the Church of the Holy Name) was chaplain, and exercised advisory control in matters temporal as well as spiritual. The attendance was good from the beginning, and the institution soon found its quarters too small to accommodate its increasing number of pupils. In 1861, through the efforts of Father Roles, an old college building, which had been moved from its former site, and located at Nos. 295-97 Huron Street, was obtained, and the Sisters transferred their school thither. The institution grew, year by year, in both numbers and influence, until the destruction of the building in the fire of 1871. The Academy was not re-opened after the fire, the present School of the Holy Name being an entirely distinct institution from the former, and under the charge of a different religious order.

REV. JOSEPH P. ROLES was born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, May 23, 1830. He is of mixed English and Irish ancestry—his father, Joseph Roles, being of English parentage, and his mother, Elizabeth (Burn) Roles, being of Irish parentage, though born in America. Rev. Joseph P. Roles was educated at St. Mary's College, Halifax, Nova Scotia, until he arrived at his seventeenth year. He then went to France to prepare for the Catholic ministry, and pursued the philosophical course of study at the Grand Seminary at Arras in the north of France, where he remained five years, studying the scriptures, the usual theological branches, the sciences and philosophy, and the Latin, Greek and French languages. From this seminary he graduated in 1852, and immediately returned to Halifax, where he was ordained. After his ordination, he was for two years president of St. Mary's College, at Halifax, and was then for seven years missionary among the Acadians, serving them at various churches. In 1860, at the invitation of Right Rev. Bishop Duggan, he came to Chicago and assumed the duties of the vice-presidency of the University of St. Mary's of the Lake. He was then for about one year pastor of St. Louis' Church, a parish which, since the great fire of 1871, has been fused with the parish of St. Mary's. During his pastorate at St. Louis' Church he preached to the French congregation in their own language. He was then appointed to the Church of the Holy Name, remaining until 1866. He was subsequently appointed pastor of St. Mary's Church, Rock Island, Ill., where he remained from 1872 to 1878, in which latter year he returned to Chicago, and became pastor of St. Mary's Church, a position he still retains. Rev. Mr. Roles was the editor and publisher of the first illustrated Catholic Sunday-school paper published in the United States, the publication of which was continued four or five years while he was pastor of the Church of the Holy Name. He was also a contributor to The Month, a periodical issued from the University of St. Mary's of the Lake. He also has some reputation as a lecturer on architecture, the catacombs and other subjects.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH.—The history of this Church was, in the preceding volume, brought down to the time it was taken charge of by the Redemptorist Fathers in 1860. The first of this order of priests to take charge of St. Michael's Church was Very Rev. Joseph Muller, C.S.S.R., and his ten assistants were Father Jacobs and Rev. George Roesch. In 1863, the latter became pastor of the Church, and had as assistants Rev. Albert Schaeffer and, in 1864, Rev. Charles Hahn. In 1865, Rev. Theodore Majerus was added to the number of assistants. In 1866, Rev. Peter Zimmer became pastor, and had, as assistants, Revs. Albert S. C. Stisebergen, John B. Kulhn and F. Wissel. In 1868, his assistants were Revs. Joseph Wissel, Charles Rosenbauer, Francis Oberle and Theodore Majerus. In 1869-70, the pastoral force was the same. In the latter year the church-building at the corner of North Avenue and Church Street (now Hudson Avenue) became too small for the congregation, and a new brick edifice was erected at the southeast corner of Hurlbut and Linden (now Eugenie) streets. This was a very large brick building two hundred feet long by eighty feet wide, with a tower surmounted by a low steeple containing a chime of bells, and costing $200,000. This building soon after its completion passed through the ordeal of the great fire; but, on account of the faithful manner in which the walls had been originally constructed, they remained substantially intact. The steeple, however, was burned, and the bells fell to the ground. Rev. Peter Zimmer remained rector of this Church until 1873. His assistants in 1871 were the Revs. L. Holzers, Theodore Majerus, Francis Van Emstede, Charles Hahn and Hugo Victor.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH.—This congregation was organized June 24, 1859, by Rev. John Waldron, who for some years had been pastor of St. Louis' Church. The building was erected at the corner of Clark and Old streets. It was at first a frame structure, which would seat about three hundred people, and cost $3,500. In 1864, and again in 1866, it was enlarged; and after the second enlargement it seated about fifteen hundred people and had cost $20,000, including the land and the organ. The latter was erected in 1864, and cost $2,500. The original building was dedicated October 30, 1859, the services being conducted by Right Rev. James Duggan, Bishop of Chicago, assisted by Revs. John Waldron, Dennis Dunne, Arnold Damen, Patrick Dillon and Very Rev. Father Higginbotham.

RUINS, ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH.

In 1864, a frame school-house was built at a cost of $4,000, which was afterward sold to St. Louis' Church. In 1869, a second school-house was erected on Clark Street, just north of the church, which is still standing. It is a four-story brick structure, and cost, including the land belonging to it, $75,000. It will accommodate fifteen hundred scholars. Previous to 1874, the boys in this school were taught by lay teachers; since that time they have been instructed by seven Christian Brothers. The girls have always been taught by Sisters of Mercy from the Academy of St. Xavier, now located at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street. Rev. John Waldron has been continuously pastor of this Church since its establishment. Up to 1868 he had no assistant, but in that year he was assisted by Rev. T. Leydon, and by Rev. P. H. McGuire from 1870 to 1873.

REV. JOHN WALDRON, pastor of St. John's Catholic Church, was born in 1830, in Ballyhannis, County Mayo, Ireland, and is the son of John and Mary (Sweeney) Waldron. He was educated at St. Jarlath's College, a theological seminary at Tuam, County Galway, Ireland, which institution was then in charge of the famous Archbishop McHale, the "Lion of the Fold of Judah," one

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH.

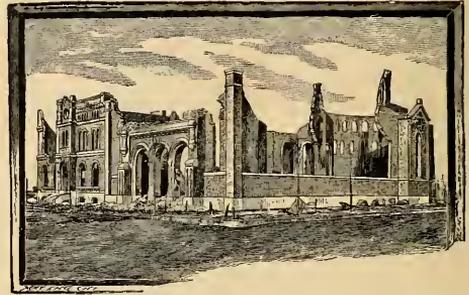

pletion passed through the ordeal of the great fire; but, on account of the faithful manner in which the walls had been originally constructed, they remained substantially intact. The steeple, however, was burned, and the bells fell to the ground. Rev. Peter Zimmer remained rec-of the ablest Catholic prelates of his time. Father Waldron came to America in 1846, and in 1849 entered St. Vincent College, Cape Girardeau, Mo., conducted by the Holy Fathers of the Mission. While in that institution his eminent abilities and saintly character won for him the respect, admiration, and the warm affection of professors and fellow-students. Having, in 1854, graduated from St. Vincent's College, he was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop O'Regan, in St. Mary's Church, Chicago, September 22, 1855, and was immediately appointed to the charge of St. Louis' Church, corner of Polk and Sherman streets. He remained pastor of that Church until October 30, 1859, at which time he commenced his pastorate of St. John's Church, having obtained permission of the Bishop to erect a church at the corner of Clark and Old (Eighteenth) streets. In 1860, with his characteristic zeal for the religious education of the children of the parish, he erected a fine school house, at a cost of $75,000, in which the children are now taught by eight Christian Brothers and nine Sisters of Mercy. In this school there is an average attendance of three hundred boys and three hundred and twenty-five girls. About 1870, Rev. Mr. Waldron preached a sermon on "Boots before Books," which was much talked about, and gave him a commendable notoriety. Father Waldron, although essentially a church man, has always been a public-spirited citizen. He became conspicuous by his opposition to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern and the Rock Island railroads, and it was mainly through his efforts that these roads were compelled to vacate Clark Street from Twelfth to Twenty-second Street, in 1876. On October 7, 1877, the cornerstone of the new St. John's Church was laid with much pomp and ceremony, and it was dedicated October 2, 1881. Father Waldron, one of the oldest priests in Chicago, is never happy unless engaged in some work for the benefit of his parish and the human race at large. His parish grew very rapidly until crippled by the Western Indiana Railroad, which cut a wide swath through it, causing the transfer and destruction of upwards of three hundred houses and the removal of at least that number of families. Many of his parishioners located in other parts of the city; but he has made his parish what it is, built its schools, erected its present substantial and elegantly finished church-édifice, which cost over $130,000, exclusive of the ground upon which it stands, and is the only priest in the West who has celebrated his twenty fifth anniversary in connection with the same parish.

THE CHURCH OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION was established by Rev. Father Edwards, early in 1859, at the corner of Franklin and Schiller streets. During that summer, at a cost of $17,000, he erected a church-édifice on lots he had purchased, which building was dedicated by the Right Rev. Bishop Duggan on March 25, 1860. Upon his death, in 1861, he was succeeded by Rev. Thaddeus J. Butler, now familiarly known as Dr. Butler, who remained pastor of the Church until 1870, when he was under the necessity of retiring from active duty, and of going abroad for the benefit of his sight. Most of the time during his pastorate he was without assistants. In the year 1867, he erected a school-house at a cost of $8,000. In 1870, he was succeeded by his brother, Rev. Patrick T. Butler, the present pastor. In 1871, the Rev. P. T. Butler made extensive improvements on the old church-building and erected upon it a steeple, at a total expense of about $3,000. Before the paint was dry, the great fire of October of that year destroyed the entire property of the parish, causing a loss of $33,000.

ST. JOSEPH'S CHURCH.—The history of this Church commences in this volume with the year 1861, at which time it was taken charge of by the Benedictine Fathers. The first member of this order to assume the pastorate of this Church was Rev. Louis Maria Fink, now Bishop of Leavenworth, Kansas, who took charge of the parish June 13, 1861, and remained until May 30, 1863. The next member of the order to come to the Church was Rev. M. Corbinian, who came also in the year 1861. During the pastorate of Rev. Louis M. Fink, a church-building was erected on the northeast corner of Chicago Avenue and Cass Street. It was commenced in 1862, and so far completed as to be used for public worship in the latter part of that year. On the 2d of November, during religious services, the gallery gave way, and its occupants were precipitated to the floor below, injuring many seriously, but none fatally. The building, when completed, would seat one thousand people, and cost $60,000. It was dedicated March 19, 1865. The successor to Rev. Louis M. Fink was Rev. Leander Schmeer, who remained until April, 1873. During his pastorate, the great fire destroyed the church, inflicting a loss on the parish of about $100,000.

RUINS, ST. JOSEPH'S CHURCH.

ST. BONIFACE CHURCH.—This Church was started, in 1865, by a number of Germans, before a priest was assigned them. They also erected a small church-édifice, in the spring and summer of that year, on land at the corner of Cornell and Noble streets, at a cost of $2,500. In the fall of 1865, Rev. Philip Albrecht was sent to this congregation as its priest. He remained until 1867, when he was succeeded by Rev. James Marshall, who, in November, 1869, was succeeded by Rev. Clement Venn. Father Venn remained sole pastor of the Church until 1878, when he had his first assistant.

During the first four years of the existence of the parish, it had increased in numbers to about one hundred and fifty families. The membership then steadily augmented until the great fire having destroyed business houses, residences and churches to the eastward and southward, many families moved into the neighborhood of the Church, and it received sudden and large accessions to its congregation.

Previous to the establishment of the Church itself, a school had been started on Chicago Avenue by a lady, with from fifty to sixty scholars. When, in 1865, the church-building was commenced, the school was moved to a small frame school-house erected contiguous thereto. This served the purposes until 1873, when it was enlarged by Rev. Clement Venn to double its capacity, and the number of the Sisters engaged in tuition was increased to eight—six of them thenceforth being engaged in the school and two at the "Sister's House."

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH was established in 1868, at the corner of Mather and Clinton streets, by members from the Church of St. Francis D'Assisium. Rev. John McMullen was pastor in 1869, and Rev. John Kilkenny in 1870-71, until the buildings were destroyed by the great fire occurring that year. The church-édifice cost $15,000, the priest's residence $3,000, and the parish school $5,000; the total loss was, therefore, $23,000. The organization of the Church, upon the destruction of the buildings, was suffered to lapse, and some years afterward, in order to keep alive the name, the Church now located at South Hoyne Avenue and Ambrose Street was organized and named St. Paul's.

REV. FERDINAND KALVELAGE, pastor of the Church of St. Francis d'Assisium, was born June 27, 1829, in Lohne, Oldenburg, Germany. In 1847, he came to America, landing in New Orleans on the 10th of November of that year, and arriving in Chicago on the 10th of the following month. He was received into the Seminary of St. Mary's of the Lake, by the Right Rev. William Quarter, first bishop of Chicago, and continued his studies in the University of St. Mary's of the Lake. His education was finished at the seminary at Carondelet, near St. Louis, Mo., and he was ordained priest by the Most Rev. Archbishop Kendrick, of St. Louis, June 10, 1851. His first mission was at Freeport, Ill., where he went July 20 of that year. He came to his present charge July 19, 1859. His parish is one of the largest in the city, and he has been unusually successful.

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S FEMALE ACADEMY. — In September, 1846, a small band of the order of Sisters of Mercy arrived in this city, to perform such duties as were necessary, under the auspices of Bishop Quarter. They came from Pittsburg, Penn., where the order was first established in this country, and their particular mission was to found schools for Roman Catholic children, a want then greatly felt. On the 24th of that month, work was commenced by the organizing of the St. Francis Xavier's Academy for Females, in a frame building on the corner of Michigan Avenue and Madison Street. They remained there but one year, moving the following September to a new brick building on Wabash Avenue, near Madison Street, which had been erected for the purpose at a cost of about $4,000, $3,000 of which sum was contributed by Bishop Quarter from the fund Propagandi Fidei. The lot upon which the building stood belonged to the Church, and did not come into possession of the order until 1856. When the Sisters first arrived, Bishop Quarter donated to them a large tract of land on the North Side, then comparatively valueless; but as the city grew, the Church found uses for this property, and so exchanges were made, and the order gained possession of the ground upon which the building stood.

In 1847, the Convent was incorporated by the Legislature. In 1859, the building was further improved and enlarged, at a cost of $5,000; and in 1865, the school had so increased in numbers that a new building was erected in the same block, at a cost of $32,000, and was devoted to the uses of the academy and the teachers, while the old building was occupied as the Convent and a House of Providence. When the school was first opened, the pupils numbered ten boarders, forty day-scholars; and a parochial school, having fifty members, was maintained in an old building, near to St. Mary's Church, corner of Wabash Avenue and Madison Street. In 1871, there were about forty-five boarders, eighty day-scholars, and the number of teachers had increased to ten, while twelve teachers had charge of parochial schools in the parish of St. John's Church, corner Clark and Eighteenth streets, — St. Louis', Clark Street, near Polk; St. Mary's, Wabash Avenue and Madison Street; and St. James', Prairie Avenue, near Twenty-sixth Street, all of which were well attended. The Mothers Superior of the Convent, who are elected for a term of three years, are, ex officio, principals of the Academy. The first Mother Superior was Sister Mary Agatha O'Brien, who served from May, 1846, to the time of her death, July 8, 1854. She was succeeded by Sister Mary Paula Ruth, who died in August, 1855, and was followed by Sister Mary Vincent McGirr, who retired at the end of her term, May 18, 1858, to give place to Sister Frances Mulholland, who remained in office till May, 1867. Sister Mary Scholastica Drum was then chosen, and served two terms. The Academy is not in the ordinary sense a charitable school, as board and tuition are charged; although, when it is shown that the applicant is worthy of assistance, the necessary instruction and help are furnished.

REV. JOHN CARROLL, the oldest Catholic priest in the United States, was born June 30, 1798, in Queens County, Ireland, and is the son of John and Catharine (Burke) Carroll. He was educated at the Maryborough Academy, kept by a Catholic priest named Gaynar; and when this priest moved to Athy, in the County Kildare, young Carroll followed him, and then enjoyed the benefits of his teaching. In 1817, he came to America, and attended the classical and theological school at Quebec. He was ordained June 29, 1820, and was pastor of St. Peter's Church at Halifax, Nova Scotia, until 1825. From that time to 1832, he was pastor of St. Malachi's Church, at St. John's, New Brunswick. He was then pastor of churches at Toronto, Niagara Falls and Suspension Bridge, until December, 1869, when he came to Chicago; and, in 1870, was assigned to the Catholic Church at Woodstock, McHenry Co., Ill., in which position he remained until 1877, when he became chaplain of the Catholic Orphan Asylum, at Thirty-fifth Street, Chicago. He was retained in this position until 1883, when, on account of an accident, he was crippled, and was then sent to Mercy Hospital, at the corner of Calumet Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, where he now resides.

THE EPISCOPAL DIOCESE.

In 1852, after the death of Bishop Chase, Rev. Henry John Whitehouse, D.D., succeeded to the jurisdiction of the Episcopate of Illinois, and remained in that position until his death, August 10, 1874. In 1858, at the opening of the period covered by this volume, there were seventy-eight parishes and sixty clergymen in the diocese. Twelve of these clergymen were residents of Chicago, only nine of whom were in active service in the city. The first regular visitation of Bishop Whitehouse in Chicago, for this year, was made January 17, when he preached in the Church of the Atonement, owing to the vacancy in the rectorship, caused by the resignation of Rev. Dudley Chase.

One question that troubled the diocese during the early years of the episcopate of Bishop Whitehouse was that of his residence. The diocese was poor, and found it difficult to raise funds to pay ordinary expenses; and the uncertainty as to whether the bishop would remove into the diocese and remain permanently at its head, rendered the parishes less hearty in responding to appeals for this purpose than would otherwise have been the case. The bishop in fact did, in 1855, tender his resignation, but the House of Bishops declined to accept it. For some years the diocese failed to provide a sufficient amount to meet current expenses.

In 1863, the sum due the bishop had increased to $7,232.14, and the trustees made provisions for its payment by the issuance of three-years' bonds, bearing six per cent. semi-annual interest. The next year the Convention, in order to provide for the payment of these bonds at maturity and for other purposes, resolved that a fund should be established, to be termed "The Endowment Fund of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Illinois." The plan adopted for raising the money was that of individual five-cent weekly contributions, which was pursued with success for a few years. In 1869, no money was collected for this fund, and the committee believed that the plan could not be successfully prosecuted so long as the bonded debt existed. The efforts of the diocese were, therefore, turned toward the liquidation of the debt; and in 1870, the amount still unpaid on the bonded debt was only $1,690, and the entire indebtedness amounted to only $4,805.

In 1855, two lots were deeded by Cyrenius Beers to Bishop Whitehouse, for the purpose of erecting upon them a "Bishop's Church" and a private residence.

These were Lots 2 and 3, in Block 8, Fractional Section 15, Addition to Chicago. On account of certain difficulties, the original intention of erecting a church-edifice in this locality was never executed. In June, 1860, an agreement was made between Bishop Whitehouse and Cyrenius Beers, according to which the former received $6,000 for the two lots. This transaction was a discretionary movement for the provision of a "Bishop's Church," which object was attained in 1862, by the purchase of the property of the Church of the Atonement for $4,000. The building was enlarged and improved in appearance, until it became one of the finest specimens of church architecture in the West. In 1868, the following gentlemen were appointed canons of the Bishop's Church, which had become the Cathedral: Rev. C. P. Dorset, Rev. J. H. Knowles and Rev. G. C. Street. During that year a fine organ, valued at $5,000, was placed in the church. In 1869, Rev. G. J. Magill took the place of Canon Dorset; and in 1870, Rev. Mr. Magill retired, leaving but two canons. In 1868, the total amount of money contributed by this Church was $7,575; in 1869, it was $3,496; and in 1870, $3,865. No report was made to the Convention in 1871.

The trustees of the diocese were incorporated in 1849, and in 1853 the bishop was empowered to hold property for religious and educational purposes. On the 21st of February, 1861, an act of the Legislature of Illinois was approved, by which certain additional powers were conferred upon the trustees, and duties were imposed upon them which the Convention thought would, if assumed and exercised, jeopardise a large amount of property, by confusing the chain of title, etc., and in its operation would wrest from the bishop rights and immunities which he possessed by virtue of his office, and of which he could not be deprived by any mere legislative action. In view of these facts, the act of 1861 was deemed unconstitutional and void; and as its passage was procured without the knowledge or sanction of the Convention, the bishop was advised to disregard it, and was assured that in so doing he would be sustained by the Convention and the diocese. The bishop and Standing Committee were appointed to memorialize the Legislature to restore the original provisions of the acts of 1849 and 1853 and to repeal the act of 1861. In 1865, this committee was obliged to report to the Convention that all efforts to secure the desired legislation had proved abortive, and adhered to its determination expressed in 1861. In 1866, the State and diocese maintained the same relations with regard to this question.

The most important event of the episcopate of Bishop Whitehouse was the trial of Rev. C. E. Cheney for violation of the canons, a full account of which may be found in connection with the history of Christ Church.

This account of the Diocese of Illinois may appropriately close, in this volume, with a summary of its progress during the first twenty years of the episcopate of Bishop Whitehouse. At the time of his election there were twenty-six clergymen connected with the diocese. The entire number connected with it, down to 1872, was two hundred and seventy-one, and there were ninety-one at that time in connection. Bishop Whitehouse ordained to the diaconate fifty-five persons, and to the priesthood fifty-four; of the latter, three had been priests of the Roman Catholic Church, and one of the National Church of Sweden—the Rev. Jacob Bredberg, of St. Ansgarius' Church. The parishes had increased from forty-nine to one hundred and eight, in union with the Convention. The humblest building in existence in the diocese in 1872, was superior to the best in 1852; and many of them in use, or to be in use as soon as they could be restored from the destruction of the great Chicago fire, were edifices which, for size and architectural beauty, were equal to any in the United States. During these twenty years, the bishop made eleven hundred and fifty-one visitations; confirmed nine thousand one hundred and sixty-seven persons; officiated at six hundred and ten baptisms, sixty-three marriages and fifty-five funerals; delivered twenty-five hundred sermons and one thousand confirmation addresses; and traveled two hundred and twenty-five thousand miles. The growth of the Episcopal Church in the diocese is shown by the simple statement that, in 1832, the communicants numbered one in six hundred and sixty-eight of the population, while in 1872, they were as one to four hundred and thirty, and the membership was as one to one hundred and thirty of the entire population. Besides the churches the histories of which are appended, four others—Calvary, Church of Our Saviour, Church of the Epiphany, and All Saints—were organized only shortly prior to 1871, and their histories will appear hereafter.

THE CHURCH OF THE ATONEMENT.—The lot referred to in the first volume of this history, upon which the society erected a tasteful house of worship in 1854, was located at the corner of West Washington and Peoria streets. Rev. Dudley Chase, the first rector of the parish, resigned his pastorate in December, 1857, and on Sunday, June 13, 1858, was succeeded by Rev. John O. Barton. He found the parish with three hundred members. The interest awakened by the advent of the new pastor was great, and large additions were made to the membership. On July 1, 1859, the pew rental system was abolished as an experiment. But, notwithstanding the brightness of the prospect at that time, the contributions at the offertory proved insufficient to meet the indebtedness of the Church as it fell due, and on March 4, 1861, the vestry, seeing no way out of their financial difficulties except by a sale of the property, transferred their title and interest in the building and land to Bishop Whitehouse. On Sunday following, March 17, Rev. Mr. Barton preached his farewell discourse, after which the bishop took possession of the church as his chapel, and thereafter supplied regular services.

On the 1st of April, 1861, a meeting of the parishioners was held, and the following officers were elected: Wardens, William B. Staunton and Watson Carr; Vestrymen, Henry Booth, Merrill Ladd, Edward H. Williams, B. F. Aldrich, H. H. Shufeldt, D. W. Page, H. H. Tappen and George P. Lee. This organization was effected for the purpose of establishing independent church work as the time should prove propitious; and meanwhile, the members, having neither church-building nor rector, continued, with few exceptions, to worship in the Bishop's Chapel, as the old Church of the Atonement was thereafter known.

About the 1st of August, 1865, Rev. S. Russell Jones, who had been for nearly two years pastor of the Church of the Ascension, accepted the pastorate of this Church. A fine lot was procured at the corner of Throop and Adams streets, and arrangements made for the purchase of a building. Services were resumed on Sunday, November 5, in a church on Monroe Street, between Aberdeen and Rucker streets, and the Sunday-school re-organized that day. About the 1st of May, 1866, Rev. Mr. Jones purchased a church-edifice of the Presbyterians, and commenced holding services without the certainty of support from more than three families; but soon the attendance increased to such an extent that it became certain that the building would be too small. This building, in the summer of 1866, was moved to the rear of lots leased by the congregation for forty years, on the northeast corner of West Washington and Robey streets, the intention being to use it for a parochial school when a new edifice was built. By the fall of 1866, the parish had become self-supporting.

About the middle of May, 1868, the church-building was destroyed by fire, incurring a loss of $4,000, with insurance of $3,000, which sum was absorbed in paying the remaining debts. This was a great calamity for both pastor and people. They were, however, full of hope, and at once set about re-building, and by the following fall had their new church ready for occupancy. During 1869, the general prosperity of the parish was quite satisfactory. At Easter, the pews, which had previously been rented as an experiment, were made free; and under this system, which was thought to be the true one, the congregation rapidly increased. But a difference of opinion arose between the Church and the rector, and he tendered his resignation, to take effect July 1. Rev. Oscar B. Thayer then became the rector, preaching his first sermon on August 8, 1869. He resigned in the fall of 1870, and was succeeded by Rev. Henry C. Kinney, who preached his first sermon December 4, 1870, and whose pastorate lasted until December, 1873.

RIGHT REV. HENRY JOHN WHITEHOUSE, Doctor of Divinity of Oxford University, Doctor of Civil Law of Cambridge University, and Doctor of Laws of Columbia College, New York, was born August 19, 1803, of English parents, in Park Place, New York City. He entered Columbia College, New York, in 1817, and graduated with honor in 1821. He entered the General Theological Seminary at once, and completed the course in 1824. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Croes of New York, and in 1827 was admitted to the priesthood by Bishop White of Pennsylvania, in which diocese he was rector of Christ Church, Reading, from 1824 to 1827. In the latter year he became rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, which became under his ministrations the largest and most prosperous parish in Western New York. There he remained fifteen years, when he accepted the rectorship of St. Thomas' Church, New York City. During his pastorate this church-edifice was destroyed by fire, but through his exertions it was re-built on the same site. In 1851, he was elected assistant bishop of Illinois, and was consecrated November 20, 1851, at St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square, N. Y. On September 20, 1852, Right Rev. Philander Chase, D. D., died, and Bishop Whitehouse became second bishop of Illinois, and performed the duties of that position with untiring zeal and fidelity until his death, which occurred in Chicago, August 10, 1874. The funeral services in the Cathedral were most impressive, and a memorial sermon was, on September 15, 1874, delivered before the Diocesan Convention by the Rev. Clinton Locke, D. D. The bishop left six surviving children. Bishop Whitehouse was a laborious worker, and during his entire ministry allowed himself no respite from toil in his Master's services. He was an accomplished scholar, versed in Greek, Latin and Hebrew, and conversant with French, German and Italian. He had very considerable skill as a poet, musician and painter, and was, besides, well versed in medical and other sciences. He had studied standard legal works, and in canon law and ecclesiastical jurisprudence had certainly no equal in America. He was a ready and finished speaker and logician, an eloquent reader, and a powerful pulpit orator. Especially as an extemporaneous speaker did he attract, his written discourses being of Illinois, by whom the opening sermon was delivered in 1867 in the Chapel of Lambeth Palace. Oxford and Cambridge Universities conferred degrees upon him; in Russia and Sweden he met with cordial welcome from the Patriarchs and Bishops, and in America he was the first Bishop to recognize Swedish orders and inter-communion and receive a Swedish priest into the American Church. The great work of Bishop Whitehouse was the foundation of the Cathedral system in the United States. Holding that a bishop was incomplete without his Cathedral Church he founded, amid great opposition and prejudice, a Cathedral Church in Chicago, which grew in size and beauty and extended influence. The Cathedral of Saints Peter and Paul thus became the pioneer fruit of this great idea, which has now culminated in the many Cathedrals established in this country, and which ensure the perpetual retention of the system. Bishop Whitehouse was what would be termed an Evangelical High Churchman. With defined ideas of the powers inherent in his great office, and which he derived by Apostolic Succession, he was yet exceedingly tolerant of all grades of churchmanship. As the overseer of his vast diocese, then contemporary with the State, which imposed great personal labor in visiting its distant parishes every year, he was strenuous that there should be no willful and persistent violation of the canons, which he and his clergy had alike vowed to obey. He accordingly brought to trial and deposed Rev. Charles E. Cheney, as will be perceived in the narrative of that event. In person, Bishop Whitehouse was of middle height but singularly erect, of commanding presence, and with a voice of great compass and power. He left large volumes of unpublished notes and valuable papers, which he had declined to commit to print, although they were of great value to all students of theology.

H. J. Whitehouse

ST. JAMES' CHURCH.—The history of this Church, which was the first Episcopal Church organized in Chicago, was given in the preceding volume to the time of the abandonment of the old building on the corner of ST. JAMES' CHURCH.

Cass and Illinois streets. The last sermon in the old edifice was preached on December 27, 1857, by Rev. Robert H. Clarkson; and in, the evening of the same day, the first sermon in the new building, on the southeast corner of Cass and Huron streets, was delivered by Rev. Dr. Littlejohn, afterward Bishop of Long Island. The new edifice was a handsome edifice of Athens stone. When taken possession of, as above narrated, there was a bonded debt of $30,000, bearing twelve per cent. interest, and a floating debt of $15,000. After a few years, the latter was paid, but the bonded debt continued a heavy burden, and there was danger of a foreclosure of the mortgage. On Easter Sunday, March 27, 1864, the pewholders were assessed exceedingly profound. A careful and critical student of Bible exegesis, he was "mighty in the Scriptures," and thus was at all times ready with a deep spiritual insight, which made his addresses to the clergy of exceeding value. His attainments caused him to be consulted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, by whom the Pan-Anglican Synod was summoned, after conference with the Bishop pro rata, for the amount to be raised. Every one assessed nobly responded, and the property was freed from incumbrance.

The church was consecrated on May 19 by Bishop Whitehouse, assisted by Bishops McKoskry and Kemper, of Michigan and Wisconsin, the sermon being delivered by Rev. Dr. Littlejohn. At that time the church had become one of the strongest in the Episcopal communion. Rev. Robert H. Clarkson remained rector until April, 1866. On the 15th of November, 1865, he was consecrated Missionary Bishop of Nebraska and Dakota. After Bishop Clarkson's departure, Rev. Edward C. Porter took temporary charge of the parish.

At Easter, 1867, Rev. Dr. Rylance assumed the rectorship, and in the following year the congregation entered upon the task of finishing the church-edifice. It was resolved to place a tower on the northwest corner of the building, and to carry a massive stone façade to the street line, forming a spacious vestibule, and over it a commodious chapel for Sunday-school purposes. For these improvements the parishioners contributed, in response to the first appeal, $22,642. More than this amount being expended the first season, a second appeal secured $20,000. A third effort raised about $15,000 more; and still the exterior was not completed, while nothing had been done to the interior, or towards providing accommodation for the school and the other work of the Church, there being still a debt for the work already finished. Building operations therefore ceased; and though a strong effort was made to raise $40,000 on the bonds of the Church, only $17,000 of this amount could be placed. The wardens and vestry met at the house of Julian S. Rumsey in the spring of 1870, and the first resolution they passed was that they would not adjourn or leave the room until all the bonds were placed, or agreed to be placed. The object of the meeting was accomplished forthwith by the officials assembled. Work upon the church was resumed, and pairs. The improvements made during Dr. Rylance's administration cost over $100,000, which, added to the original value of the church and lot, swelled its cost to nearly $200,000.

Rev. Dr. Rylance retired from the parish in January, 1871, and early in the summer Rev. Hugh Miller Thompson, D.D., succeeded to the rectorship. The beautiful church-edifice was destroyed by the great fire of 1871. The tower, however, remained standing, and almost intact.

Many of the young men of this parish entered the Union army during the Civil War. Rev. Dr. Clarkson made the promise from the pulpit that should any of them fall honorably in defense of their country, their names should be inscribed on a memorial tablet placed within the walls of the church. After the war, the vestry desired that this tablet, or soldiers' monument, should form a portion of the finish of the interior of the vestibule, and the erection of the monument was placed in the hands of E. B. McCagg and E. H. Sheldon, who employed Vaux, Withers & Olmstead, architects of New York City, to furnish a design for it. The cost of the monument was $5,500. Of this amount, Hon. Mark Skinner, David J. Ely and Mrs. Thomas Dyer contributed $400, Mr. McCagg and Mr. Sheldon, $3,400, and $1,700 was appropriated from the tower fund. The monument was erected at the north end of the vestibule, and inscribed upon it are the following names:

Lucius Sherman Larrabee, killed at Gettysburg, July 2, 1863; Edward Hanson Russell, killed at Shiloh, April 6, 1862; William D'Wolf, killed at Williamsburg, June 3, 1862; John Harris Kinzie, killed at Fort St. Charles, Ark., June 18, 1862; Thomas Orchard, died at New Albany Hospital, December 15, 1862; Frank M. Frome, died at LaGrange Hospital, December 27, 1862; Richard Skinner, killed at Petersburg, June 24, 1864; Peter Preston Wood, died December 13, 1865; Louis DeKoven Hubbard, died of consumption April 15, 1866; and Charles H. Hosmer, died January 1, 1867.

GRACE CHURCH.—The sketch of this Church in the first volume closes with a reference to a new edifice to be erected upon a lot secured in 1857, at the northwest corner of Wabash Avenue and Peck Court. For various reasons it was deemed advisable to abandon the building project, and, instead, the old edifice was moved to the new location, and enlarged.

Rev. John W. Clark remained rector until in June, 1859, when, after a successful pastorate of three years, he resigned, to accept a call from Calvary Church, at St. Louis. Rev. DeWitt Clinton Locke, of Joliet, preached his first sermon on Sunday following, August 7. Chicago is noted for long pastorates, and but few of them are more remarkable for length than that of Rev. Mr. Locke, who at the present writing (1885) still remains rector of this Church. In 1867, the demands for a larger building became imperative, and it was decided to carry out the design inaugurated eleven years before. A lot was purchased on Wabash Avenue, a short distance south of Fourteenth Street, upon which the new structure was erected. It was built in the style of architecture prevalent in the thirteenth century, the walls being of Athens stone, and the exterior ornaments of Iowa marble. The cost of the lot was $25,000, of the church itself $100,000, and of the furniture $25,000. The edifice was dedicated on Easter Sunday, March 28, 1869. The old church, on Wabash Avenue and Peck Court, was sold to a Jewish congregation—Kehilath Anshe Maarab.

In the summer of 1870, Rev. Clinton Locke on account of ill health was granted leave of absence and made the tour of Europe, his pulpit meanwhile being filled by Rev. Professor Pitts, Rev. Drs. DeKoven, RUINS, ST. JAMES' CHURCH.

on Christmas eve, 1870, the congregation assembled in the church to celebrate its completion. The chapel had been finished in the spring and the large basement early in the fall, and these were used for services and school purposes while the interior was undergoing re-

Ashley and Schuyler, and the bishops of Georgia and Wisconsin.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH.—In 1858, this Church, which had been organized February 22, 1856, owed but $200. In the latter part of the year a movement was set on foot for the erection of a new edifice, the ladies holding a festival at which they realized $300 toward that purpose. The Church owned a valuable property, was in

State and Randolph streets. The distinguishing feature of the policy of this Church was that it depended for its support entirely upon the voluntary contributions of those interested in the free-church cause. With no rich men among them, the contributions were surprisingly large at first. The great need was a house of worship of their own. A lot was leased by the vestry on the southeast corner of Wabash Avenue and Randolph Street, upon which a frame building was erected. On the 6th of February, 1859, it was ready for occupancy. It was a neat Gothic frame-structure, capable of seating five hundred people, and was dedicated February 6, by Bishop Kemper, of Iowa.

About this time, the rector, Rev. Henry B. Whipple, was made a Doctor of Divinity by Racine College, and in the following summer was elected Bishop of Minnesota. He delivered his farewell sermon to this Church on October 2, and on the 8th of November, with the consent of Bishop Whitehouse, Bishop Whipple held in this church his first confirmation. After the resignation of Rev. Mr. Whipple, the Church extended a call to Rev. J. S. B. Hodges, of Nashotah Seminary, who entered upon his duties Sunday, December 11, 1859, and remained until November 1860.

After his retirement, the pulpit was supplied by Bishop Whitehouse, Dr. Chase, Rev. H. B. Walbridge, of Toledo, and Rev. G. T. Dougherty, D.D.; and at length Rev. J. O. Barton, formerly of the Church of the Ascension, accepted the call of the Church, and entered upon his duties Sunday, April 8, 1861. About the first of January, 1863, a call was extended to Rev. Thomas Smith, formerly of Booneville, Mo. He did not long remain rector; and in the following August, Rev. Mr. Hager took charge of the parish, continuing as rector until Sunday, May 28, 1865. He was succeeded by Rev. John Gierlow, who preached his initial sermon on August 6. His pastorate was of only a few months' duration; and he was succeeded, in the early part of June, 1866, by Rev. William Greene, whose stay was likewise very short, and the Church was then without a pastor until in April, 1871.

In November, 1868, it was evident that a removal of the church from its location on Wabash Avenue and Randolph Street was imperatively necessary, and consequently lots were purchased on Burnside Street, between Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth streets, the new location being more than three miles from the old one. Over this entire distance the church-building was removed, at a cost of $2,000. Needed repairs were also made and a basement erected under the old building. Services were resumed in the new location on November 27, 1870. Rev. John Wilkinson, of Milwaukee, Wis., was called to the rectorship about this time, and there was a formal opening of the church on Sunday, April 9, 1871, services from November 27 having been conducted in the basement.

CHURCH OF THE ASCENSION.—At the time of the close of the first volume, the Church of the Ascension was worshipping in Westminster Chapel, on the corner of Dearborn and Ontario streets. Rev. J. W. Cracraft was the pastor. He remained not quite a year, being succeeded by Rev. Henry H. Morrell, who preached his first sermon March 21, 1858. A new church-edifice was then in process of erection on Oak Street, between Wells and LaSalle streets. This building was a frame one, cost $2,400, and was capable of seating three hundred persons. It was dedicated April 22, 1858, and by the fall of that year the Church was reported as self-sustaining. Rev. Mr. Morrell resigned on June 26, 1859, and was succeeded on October 16 by Rev. William a sound financial condition, and worked harmoniously. In 1861, a fine organ was purchased. In 1862, the Church celebrated the sixth anniversary of its organization, at which time it was shown that more than three hundred had been added to the membership, over five hundred members were on the rolls, and during the six years more than $26,000 had been raised. In 1863, two hundred and fifty sittings were added, at a cost of $3,500, and in 1865, the sittings were increased by two hundred. The year 1866 was remarkable for its additions to the membership, about fifty being added, thirty of whom were from the teachers and pupils of the Sunday-school. In the latter part of June, 1868, Rev. Mr. Bishop received a call from St. John's Episcopal Church, Cincinnati, and tendered his resignation, which the vestry accepted with much reluctance.

GRACE CHURCH.

The vestry extended a call to Rev. Horatio N. Powers, D.D., late the president of Griswold College, Davenport, Iowa. The call was accepted, and the new pastor commenced his labors on Sunday, November 1, 1868. During that year, the Church finished paying for a lot fronting on Union Park, on which to erect a permanent edifice. On September 15, 1870, ground was broken for a stone building on the northwest corner of Ashland and Ogden avenues. The edifice was intended to cost $100,000, to be of Athens marble, of the Gothic style of architecture, and surmounted by a tall spire. The furnishing of the interior was to cost $50,000. The work, though delayed by the losses sustained by the parishioners in the fire of 1871, was finally accomplished, except the erection of the spire.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY COMMUNION.—Previous to the settlement of Rev. Henry B. Whipple as rector of this Church, various clergymen preached for the organization, in different places obtained for the purpose. Their first place of meeting was at the Metropolitan Hall. The old St. James' Church building was also used, as was the hall in Garrett Block, at the corner of Fulton, from Fremont, Ohio. Rev. Mr. Fulton, however, did not remain long with this Church, being transferred to the ecclesiastical authority of Iowa; and after the services had been suspended for some months, Rev. William H. Cooper, of Waukegan, became rector in March, 1861, and held that position until July 1, 1863. A call was then extended to Rev. S. Russell Jones, of Greenfield, Mass., who commenced his labors in September, 1863.

At that time, the income of the Church from pew rents was only about $550, but by September, 1864, the revenue from this source had increased to $1,300. A chancel, belfry, bell and a new organ had been procured during the year, and arrangements made for the removal of the church-building to the corner of LaSalle and Maple streets. After the removal, services were resumed November 20, 1864. In a short time Rev. Mr. Jones resigned his rectorship, and Rev. H. W. Beers entered upon his duties as rector April 2, 1865. In the meantime, the church-edifice had been lengthened about thirty feet, the number of sittings having been increased by two hundred. In the early part of 1867, the church-edifice was removed to the corner of LaSalle and Elm streets, where it was re-opened on Whitsunday, June 9, 1867. Soon afterward Rev. Mr. Beers resigned his rectorship, and the pulpit was filled temporarily by Rev. H. H. Cole, of St. Luke's Church, and others of the city clergy, until January 8, 1868, when Rev. Thomas G. Carver, D.D., assumed charge of the parish, retaining it until July 1, 1869. Various clergymen then supplied the pulpit until October 3, when Rev. C. P. Dorset entered upon his duties as rector. On the 1st of January, 1870, the seats in the church were made free, and the immediate result was very gratifying to all concerned.

CHRIST CHURCH.—This Church was organized in 1856, with fifteen members, Rev. Charles V. Kelly being the first rector. Rev. J. W. Osborne preached at the Protestant Orphan Asylum, May 17, 1857, and on the 20th of that month Rev. Noah H. Schenck took charge of the parish. At the end of the diocesan year in October the number of communicants was eleven. One year afterward the society was in a flourishing condition, and had a new chapel on Monterey Street, between Michigan and Indiana avenues, which was opened May 25, 1859. In January, 1859, Rev. Henry Adams had accepted the pastorate, and officiated at the opening services. In November, Rev. E. B. Tuttle had charge of the Church, and about that time Rev. Charles E. Cheney was called, and shortly afterward became the pastor. In February, 1860, Rev. Mr. Fulton occupied the pulpit, and on March 11, Rev. Mr. Cheney preached his first sermon in this church.

By June, 1861, the church-building was enlarged and improved. Toward the latter part of the year a site for a permanent edifice was purchased, and a fair and festival was held in Bryan Hall December 17, 1862, to raise money to erect a new church-building.

In April, 1863, the following officers were elected: Wardens, A. C. Calkins and G. A. Sackett; Vestrymen, Charles Follansbee, R. A. B. Mills, D. W. Keith, J. G. Deven, J. B. Parsons, W. N. Woodruff, R. Benedict and W. D. C. Grannis. On February 28, 1864, the new building on Twenty-fourth Street was destroyed by fire, and the Church took prompt measures for the erection of another edifice. A meeting was held at the Orphan Asylum March 2, at which $3,400 was subscribed to this end. In the meantime Rev. Mr. Cheney conducted services in the Calvary Presbyterian Church on Sunday afternoons.

The new church was erected on Michigan Avenue. On August 25, 1864, the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid by Bishop Whitehouse. The church was dedicated in December, 1865, and in that month, twenty-two of the pews were sold for $11,965, and fifty-eight were rented at prices varying from $20 to $120. On June 8, 1866, the cupola of the church was struck by lightning and damaged to the amount of several hundred dollars. In February, 1868, the church was filled to overflowing to hear the Rev. S. H. Tyng, Jr., of New York, upon which occasion the new organ was played for the first time.

In the spring of 1869 commenced the controversy between Rev. Mr. Cheney and Rt. Rev. Henry J. Whitehouse, D.D., Bishop of the Diocese of Chicago. Mr. Cheney was accustomed to omit certain words from the baptismal service. This omission continued some time without coming to the knowledge of the bishop, and then he learned of it only by accident, and resolved to prevent, if possible, a deviation from the ritual. After collecting proof of the truth of what had been casually reported to him, the bishop notified Mr. Cheney that in thirty days he would be required to answer to the charges preferred against him, and that adhering to his "clear convictions of duty" must end in his deposition.

What was called the "Chicago Protest," was dated February 18, 1869. It was sent to various parties throughout the country, with a request that those who approved of it should append their names, and signify whether they were in favor of a meeting to be held in Chicago in June, for the discussion of questions involved in the protest. So many favorable replies were received that the Evangelical Conference was set for June 16. In the meantime, there was much discussion in all parts of the country on the questions of a revision of the prayer-book, and of a separate and Reformed Church. A committee of fifteen clergymen was selected in April, by the Clerical Association of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to inquire into the subject, with the view of harmonizing the action of that part of the Church for which they would act. It was thought that a report from such a committee would exert a vast influence on the counsels of the association and aid them in reaching satisfactory results. The following are the names of the committee: Rev. A. H. Vinton, D.D.; Rev. S. H. Tyng, D.D.; Rev. W. A. Muhlenberg, D.D.; Rev. J. S. Stone, D.D.; Rev. E. H. Canfield, D.D.; Rev. H. N. Powers, D.D.; Rev. John Cotton Smith, D.D.; Rev. Richard Newton, D.D.; Rev. D. R. Goodwin, D.D.; Rev. W. R. Nicholson, D.D.; Rev. L. W. Bancroft, D.D.; Rev. William Sparrow, D.D.; Rev. William Newton, Rev. Otis Kellogg, and Rev. Charles E. Cheney.

The Evangelical Conference, which was convened to hear the report of this committee, and to discuss the "Chicago Protest," met in the prayer-room of the Young Men's Christian Association Building, June 16, 1869. The Conference was called to order by Alexander G. Tyng, of Peoria, and, after devotional exercises by Rev. Mason Gallagher, of Paterson, N. J., Gurdon S. Hubbard was made temporary chairman. The protest was read by Rev. N. N. Cowgill, of State Line, Fulton Co., Ky. In the afternoon, there was an earnest discussion on the question: "What shall we do?" participated in by Rev. F. B. Nash, of Tiskilwa, Ill.; Rev. William H. Cooper, of Lockport, Ill.; John H. Kedzie, of Chicago; Rev. Dr. Newton, of Philadelphia; and Rev. Mr. Bourne. All expressed themselves as having no desire to leave the Church, but all maintained the "undeniable right of private judgment upon, which the Church and the Reformation were founded." Mr.

Cheney closed the discussion by a few remarks on the great importance of the subject. It was the great underlying one. Were they to go on using a prayer-book which many thought false doctrine, or which, in its ipsissima verba, conveyed to unlettered people an untrue meaning? He hoped the time would come when they could have a pure liturgy, reflecting the teachings of Christ the Master. In the evening, the revision of the prayer-book was discussed at length. On the 17th, the discussion of the revision of the prayer-book was continued. Rev. Mr. Cheney referred to the letter of Bishop McLvaine, in which the latter said the Reformers had no intention of teaching spiritual regeneration, and that if they had no such intention they had made a great blunder in language. Mr. Cheney urged immediate action on the question of revision. If they were to conquer they must not delay. As for himself, he was not going out of the Episcopal Church. No man could put him out. He would fight the battle in the Church; and if they all left him, he would climb to the mountain-top of communion with his God, and claim that he was the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The number of delegates from abroad in attendance at the conference had no influence on Bishop Whitehouse, so far as abandoning the trial was concerned. Mr. Cheney was arraigned for trial on July 21, 1869, in the chapel of the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul. The charges against him were three in number. The first was that he had violated Article VIII. of the constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which provides that in those dioceses which have adopted said constitution, the Book of Common Prayer, administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, when established by the General Convention, shall be used in the Protestant Episcopal Church. The second charge was that he had violated his engagement to conform to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The third charge was that he had violated the solemn promise made by him at his ordination, which was "always so to minister the doctrines and sacraments, and the discipline of Christ, as the Lord had commanded and as this Church hath received the same, according to the commandments of God."

The ecclesiastical jury was composed of Rev. Dr. Samuel Chase, of Jubilee College; Rev. Dr. Henry N. Pierce, of Springfield; Rev. Thomas W. Benedict, of St. Luke's Parish, Wyoming; Rev. J. Benson, of Peoria; and Rev. A. W. Snyder, of Chicago. The presentors were Dr. George F. Cushman, of Sycamore, Ill.; Rev. R. F. Sweet and Hon. L. B. Otis, of Chicago. Hon. L. B. Otis was the counsel for the prosecution, and Hon. Melville W. Fuller for the defense. The proctors for the defense were George W. Thompson and M. Byron Rich.

Upon the proper constitution of the commission for the trial, Bishop Whitehouse made a statement of the reasons why the trial was brought; that he had done all in his power, by explanation, argument and appeal, to induce Rev. Mr. Cheney to conform to the worship of the Church and the administration of the sacraments, to which he, on ordination and as a priest in the Church, had solemnly promised conformity; and that at the termination of the interview, Mr. Cheney had proposed to consider the matter for one week, at the end of which time decision should be made. At the expiration of the time agreed upon, Rev. Mr. Cheney had sent the following note:

"CHRIST CHURCH RECTORY,

"CHICAGO, June 3, 1869.

"Rt. Rev. and Dear Sir,—I regret the circumstances which compelled me to delay for a few hours the answer which I promised to send you in one week from our conversation on Monday, 31st ult. After the most serious and prayerful deliberation, I can only say that I have been able to arrive at no other conclusion than that already expressed to you.

"Very truly yours,

"CHAS. EDWARD CHENEY.

"RT. REV. H. J. WHITEHOUSE, D.D."

Bishop Whitehouse hence concluded, "that the said Rev. Charles E. Cheney, rector of Christ Church, Chicago, is under imputation of being guilty of offenses and misconduct for which he is liable to be tried, and that the interests of the Church require an investigation."

The 21st was spent in an attempt to prove that the court, as constituted, had no jurisdiction in the case, but the objections were overruled. On the next day, an injunction was granted against further proceeding of the assessors, by Judge John A. Jameson. The Court thereupon requested that the trial be postponed until Thursday, July 29, and the bishop, while denying the right of the civil tribunals to interfere in the administering of the ecclesiastical discipline of the Church in the trial of its ministers, postponed the Court until that day. On the 3d of August, a motion to dissolve the injunction was overruled by Judge Jameson, and it was then decided that the case be carried before the Supreme Court at the September term.

On the 5th of August, a supplemental bill was filed by Rev. Mr. Cheney, in which he called attention to the fact that there were two types of belief in the Protestant Episcopal Church, viz., the Evangelical and the Sacramentarian; and also stated that the bishop had, before the commencement of the proceedings against him, openly declared that he intended "weeding the low-church clergymen out of the diocese." The Ecclesiastical Court met on the same day, and made public the grounds of their complaint against the interference by the civil tribunal, and then Rev. Samuel Chase, as presiding officer, adjourned the Court until September 15; and upon its assembling on that day, it was again adjourned until November 16, the case having been taken before the Supreme Court on the 13th inst. The Supreme Court, on January 24, 1871, dismissed the bill and dissolved the injunction, the judgment of the Court being delivered by Judge Thornton, who held that presentment being made, with due service, the Ecclesiastical Court had power to take cognizance of and to decide the case.

The Supreme Court defended the right of the Church to establish and enforce its own laws, upon the ground that such a right is essential to religious liberty. It said:

"We have no right, and, therefore, will not exercise the power, to dictate ecclesiastical law. We do not aspire to become de facto heads of the Church, and, by construction or otherwise, abrogate its laws and canons. We shall not inquire whether the alleged omission is any offense. This is a question of ecclesiastical cognizance. This is no forum for such adjudication. The Church should guard its own fold; enact and construe its own laws; enforce its own discipline; and thus will be maintained the boundary line between the temporal and spiritual power."

The Ecclesiastical Court re-assembled February 1, 1871. In the afternoon, Rev. Mr. Cheney read a statement, unreservedly admitting that he had made certain omissions from the prescribed office for the ministration of infant baptism, but he denied the truth of the three charges made against him. He denied Charge I., on the violation of Article VIII., inasmuch as said Article has no relation to any omissions made by an individual minister, etc. He denied Charge II., inasmuch as the promise to conform to the doctrine and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church had never been regarded as involving the obligation to use the very words of every service under all exigencies that might arise in the work of the ministry. He denied Charge III., inasmuch as at his ordination he solemnly vowed that he would instruct the people committed to his charge, and teach nothing as necessary to eternal salvation but that which he should be persuaded by the Scripture, and he was not persuaded that the doctrine which connects regeneration inseparably with baptism might be concluded and proved from Scripture.

The Ecclesiastical Court having pronounced the guilt of Rev. Mr. Cheney, he gave notice of an appeal. The appeal was, however, given up on February 6, 1871, and on the 18th of that month, the bishop read the verdict of the Court, and then sentenced Mr. Cheney to be suspended from the exercises of all the offices and functions of the priesthood and ministry of the Church of God, until such time as assurances should be given of contrition for the past, and of conformity in the matter wherein he had offended for the future.

Mr. Cheney presented the following solemn protest to the action of the Court :

"I, Charles Edward Cheney, a Presbyterian of the Protestant Episcopal Church and rector of Christ Church, Chicago, do enter my solemn protest against the constitution, the mode of procedure, the rulings, and the verdict of the Ecclesiastical Court by which my so-called trial has been conducted. From its decision and verdict, and from the sentence this day pronounced, I appeal to the judgment of the Protestant Christianity and to that Supreme Tribunal before which all must appear.

"CHARLES EDWARD CHENEY.

"CHICAGO, February 18, 1871."

On the same day, a meeting of the wardens and vestrymen of Christ Church was held, at which it was unanimously resolved that Rev. Charles E. Cheney be requested to continue his services as rector. In response to this resolution, Rev. Mr. Cheney preached on February 19, 1871, in Christ Church. He read to the congregation the above resolution, and a letter to himself, signed by Wardens F. B. Phillips and Albert Crane, explanatory of the reasons which led to the adoption of the resolution. This letter was to the effect that Rev. Mr. Cheney had been singled out for trial and deposition, while others in the Protestant Episcopal Church were equally guilty with reference to omissions of portions of the offices; that nine bishops of that Church had signed a solemn declaration that the right should be granted to drop the troublesome word "regeneration"; that the Court which tried him, besides being prejudiced against him, had not been legally constituted, and hence its decisions were of no binding force upon him; and that a forcible separation of pastor and people would have a fatal effect upon the great work in which Christ Church was engaged.

Thus the congregation of Christ Church assumed as contumacious an attitude as its pastor, who for his defiance of the authority of the Ecclesiastical Court, was, on March 28, 1871, notified by Bishop Whitehouse of a new trial to take place May 3, 1871.

In the presentment to the Bishop of Illinois by the presentors,—Rev. William F. B. Jackson, rector of the Church of Our Savior, Chicago; Rev. George F. Cushman, D.D., rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Princeton, Ill.; and Lucius B. Otis,—there were four charges, the principal one being "Contumacious violation of the laws of the Church of God, in respect of the exercise of the offices and functions of the priesthood and ministry of the same, and in respect to ecclesiastical sentences and penalties"—the others, except the first, having reference to his violation of the ordination vow. The new trial commenced on the 3d of May, in the Cathedral, on the corner of Washington and Peoria streets, before the following Court : Rev. Clinton Locke, D.D., rector of Grace Church, Chicago; Rev. J. L. Townsend, rector of Trinity Church, Jacksonville, Ill.; Rev. F. M. Gregg, rector of St. Paul's Church, Springfield, Ill.; Rev. W. H. Williams, rector of St. Luke's Church, Dixon, Ill.; Rev. W. W. Estabrook, rector of Christ Church, Ottawa, Ill. M. W. Fuller, M. B. Rich and G. W. Thompson appeared for Mr. Cheney, and on his behalf objected to the jurisdiction of the Court.

As an incident in the history of this trial, it may be mentioned that, on Sunday, June 4, 1871, Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., of New York, preached both morning and evening in Christ Church, notwithstanding he had been the recipient of a note from Bishop Whitehouse, reminding him of the canon forbidding his participation in the services with a deposed clergyman. Among the evidences of the interest in the controversy and sympathy with the deposed clergyman, was a letter addressed to Mr. Cheney, signed by sixty-five influential members of Dr. Tyng's Church, among whom were the Tyngs, Rev. Cotton Smith, Jay Cooke, and Columbus Delano, urging him to go on with his preaching, discipline or no discipline.

Thus matters continued for some time, until, on July 8, the bishop notified the wardens of Christ Church that on the 13th of August he would make a visitation of that Church, for the purpose of examining the state of the Church, administering the rite of confirmation, ministering the word, and administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and requested them to secure the services of a minister in good standing to assist him (the bishop) in the ceremonies, "inasmuch as the parish of Christ Church is now without a rector." To this communication the wardens responded at considerable length, saying, in substance, that their Church had a rector in good standing; that all epistolary correspondence, to insure attention, should be addressed to Rev. Charles E. Cheney, rector, whose contract with the Church still remained in full force; that the day selected by the bishop would not be a convenient one for them to see him, but that upon any other day they would be glad to receive him, and to assist him and their rector in the ceremonies referred to, and suggested the selection of the tenth Sunday after Trinity.

The attitude of Right Revs. H. B. Whipple, Bishop of Minnesota, and Henry W. Lee, Bishop of Iowa, is shown by their visit to Bishop Whitehouse, with the view of obtaining, if practicable, a mitigation of the sentence, or at least a postponement of its infliction until after the General Convention should assemble. Bishop Whitehouse, in deference to the views of these two bishops, deferred final action for a few days, conferring meanwhile with friends and advisers, and then carried out the decision of the Court, degrading Mr. Cheney from the ministry of the Church of God.

The bishop, in reply to the note of the wardens, authorized them to name a later day for his visitation. Subsequently a letter was sent to the bishop by the wardens, in which they said they took that mode of disobeying the mind of the bishop of any possible impression that Rev. Mr. Cheney would not officiate as rector of Christ Church whenever the bishop should hold a visitation; the understanding previously being, on the part of the bishop at least, that on that occasion the Rev.

C. V. Kelley would officiate, as he had done on the 17th of July. The letter also stated that an official notice from the bishop of his intended visit, addressed as previously to the pastor of the Church, Rev. Charles E. Cheney, would insure the attendance and presentation, by him, of such candidates for confirmation as might be in the city on the 10th of September. The assumption of this attitude by the wardens was a great surprise to Bishop Whitehouse; but he was not to be dismayed, and, in accordance with his purpose, he wrote to the wardens these words:

"I am sure, gentlemen, you do not suppose, as your bishop, I shall shrink from my duty of visitation, nor in any way sanction the presence or interference of Mr. Cheney, should you or he persist in so bootless an assumption. No authority exists in a congregation to determine the expediency of a visitation, nor prescribe conditions for its exercise. Welcome or unwelcome, the bishop must visit his churches, and the congregations under his jurisdiction must receive him."

The visitation was accordingly made, and the church was filled to its utmost capacity. The candidates for confirmation all declined to be presented to the bishop except by their own pastor, and as the bishop would not so receive them, the main purpose of the visitation was frustrated. The vestrymen declined to allow Mr. Cheney to vacate his place in the chancel, and the bishop declined to officiate by the side of a deposed rector, and, as the time of the opening services drew nigh, he withdrew by a side-door. The services were then conducted as usual by Rev. Mr. Cheney, the sermon being from the text: "I must work the work of Him that sent me while it is yet day. The night cometh in which no man can work."

The case of Rev. Mr. Cheney and Christ Church was referred to by Bishop Whitehouse in his address to the Episcopal Convention which met in September, 1871; and this portion of the address was referred to the committee on legislation. This committee reported on September 15, recommending that certain preambles and resolutions be adopted. The main resolution was:

"That legal proceedings shall be taken to prevent the further diversion and mal-administration of the property and revenues of said parish of Christ Church, Chicago, and to effect the rescue of the same from their legitimate and godly uses."

The case of Rev. Mr. Cheney was submitted to the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which met in Baltimore in October, 1871. A canon was passed by the Convention, early in its session, by which Dr. Cheney could have removed temporarily into another diocese, and, by the consent of two bishops, chosen by lot, could have been restored upon simply renewing his promise of conformity. Afterward, another canon was passed by both the houses, having the sanction of the Bishop of Illinois, leaving the question of the restoration of Rev. Mr. Cheney almost entirely in his hands.

In May, 1872, a bill in this case was filed on behalf of three of the pew-owners of Christ Church, to injoin Rev. Mr. Cheney from officiating in the church-building of that parish, and the wardens and vestrymen from employing and paying him for so doing. To this bill a demurrer was opposed, which, after elaborate argument, was overruled by Judge E. S. Williams, who, however, refused to grant the preliminary injunction asked for, as not being required under the circumstances of the case. Answers were then filed, denying, among other things, that Rev. Mr. Cheney had been deposed, which deposition constituted the gravamen of the bill. A large amount of testimony was taken in the case, and upon the ecclesiastical side of it the depositions were many and elaborate. The following persons testified for the complainants: Hon. Murray Hoffman; Bishops Whitehouse, Odenheimer, and Kipp; Drs. Fulton, Seymour, Dix, Locke, Chase, and Deene, and Revs. Stocking, Hopkins and Kinney; and for the defendants, Bishops Whipple, Vail, Cummins; Dean Stanley; Drs. Goodwin, Newton, Tyng, Nicholson and Powers, and Rev. T. W. Mossman.

The hearing and arguments of the case covered a period of about thirty days. After a careful examination of the testimony, of authorities, and the views of counsel, the case was decided in favor of the defendant, and the bill dismissed by Judge Williams for want of equity.

A statute was then in existence, or supposed to be, making the Bishop of Illinois a corporation sole, and some feeling adverse to the vesting of church property under that act had grown up among some Episcopalians in Chicago and especially among the congregation of Christ Church. Feeling strongly opposed to the vesting of title to church property in any one man, several, perhaps many, of the contributors to Christ Church strenuously insisted that the property should be vested in a board of trustees, to be elected by the congregation, and not in the bishop as sole trustee. Legal advice was had as to the proper method of conveying property, and it was at length conveyed to the Trustees of Christ Church, as being the designated grantees in the deed of the property.

Judge Williams, in giving his decision, said:

"I can not avoid the conclusion that the Board which the Standing Committee of the Diocese had selected for the trial of the defendant Cheney, was, in view of his express stipulation and their election under the well-settled rules of law, a Court of five presbyters, and their presence and action was necessary at all stages of the trial; although not all present at the rendition of the verdict, the verdict of the majority was sufficient; and that the action of four assessors (no one of them having willingly withdrawn) in finding said Cheney guilty was unauthorized and void."

REV. CHARLES EDWARD CHENEY, D.D., was born at Canandaigua, Ontario Co., N. Y., February 12, 1836. His father, E. Warren Cheney, was a native of Western Massachusetts, and his mother was a daughter of Hon. Lemuel Chipman, one of the early settlers of New York, and she was also a niece of Hon. Nathaniel Chipman, an honored Chief-Justice of Vermont. Charles was obliged to provide in part for himself in his preparation for college, also during his college course and in the theological seminary. He was graduated in Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., in 1857, and entered the middle class in the Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church, at Alexandria Va., in the fall. In December, 1858, he was ordained deacon by Bishop Delancey of Western New York, and commenced his ministry in Havana, N. Y. In August, 1859, he was called to the rectorship of Christ Church, Chicago, but declined the position on account of being yet in deacon's orders. In November, 1859, the call was renewed and accepted, the Church offering to wait until Mr. Cheney was ordained to the priesthood. He was ordained a presbyter in February, 1860, and preached his first sermon in Christ Church on March 11, 1860. The congregation grew strong in numbers and influence and Rev. Mr. Cheney became recognized as one of the most successful and popular pastors in the city. This satisfactory condition of affairs in the Church continued until the spring of 1860, when the difficulty, which is fully detailed in the history of the Church, arose, and was one of the causes leading to the establishment of the Reformed Episcopal Church in this country. Rev. Mr. Cheney continued his pastoral work in the Church which had stood by him from the beginning of its trials to his victory. Upon the death of Bishop Cummins, on June 26, he was senior bishop of the denomination, and at the meeting of the General Council of the Church, held at Ottawa, Canada, July 12, he was elected the presiding Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church. Rev. Mr. Cheney was married April 25, 1860, to Miss Emma Griswold, of Chicago, daughter of Alexander and Clarissa B. Griswold, of Summit County, Ohio.

TRINITY CHURCH.—The history of this Church was given in the preceding volume to include the epoch covered by the present. Its history after the fire will be treated of subsequently.

ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH was commenced in January, 1862, by Grace Church, as a Mission, at the corner of Desplaines and DeKoven streets. In August, Rev. C. H. Van Dyne became assistant minister of Grace Church, with special charge of this Mission. In 1863, the Mission was erected into St. Stephen's Parish. Rev. L. N. Freeman became rector March 29, 1864, Rev. Marcus Lane in 1865, and Rev. Albert W. Snyder in the summer of 1865. A church-building was purchased, moved upon the lot on Forquer Street, near Blue Island Avenue, and put in complete repair. It was capable of seating nearly three hundred people. In 1869, Rev. Mr. Snyder was succeeded by Rev. C. P. Dorset; who was followed, in 1870, by Rev. March Chase, whose pastorate lasted until 1872.

ST. MARK'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH was started as a Mission in 1864, by Rev. E. B. Tuttle, who had for some years been city missionary at St. Ansgarius' Church, and for about one year post-chaplain at Camp Douglas. The first sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Tuttle, to what afterward became St. Mark's Church, was in the latter part of 1864, or very early in 1865; for one of the daily papers of January 29, 1865, contained the following notice: "This Church meets in the Erie street Mission House, Rev. E. B. Tuttle, rector. He also holds services at White Oak Chapel, at Camp Douglas, as post-chaplain." After his services as chaplain were no longer required, Mr. Tuttle labored zealously in the old camp chapel, which was removed to a new site a little outside the camp, and added a Sunday-school to his Church. It soon became necessary to erect a new building. The location was determined by the donation of lots by the Langley heirs, at the corner of Cottage Grove Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street. Hon. William B. Ogden subscribed $300 toward the erection of the edifice, on the condition that $5,000 additional be obtained. By March 16, 1866, Mr. Tuttle had raised $2,200, and in one year a handsome Gothic building had been completed, at a cost of $8,000.

The new edifice was opened for service March 10, 1867, the dedicatory sermon being delivered by Rev. Clinton Locke. At that time the parish had about twenty-five families and thirty communicants, and the Sunday-school contained about forty scholars. After Rev. Mr. Tuttle, Rev. Mr. Wood was pastor, and was succeeded by Rev. Brockholst Morgan, who remained till 1872.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—The history of this Church closed in the preceding volume with the pastorate of Rev. Harvey Curtis, who resigned to accept the presidency of Knox College, at Galesburg, Ill. His farewell sermon was preached on September 1, 1858. Rev. S. S. Smith, of Warren, Mass., succeeded temporarily to the pulpit. Rev. Z. M. Humphrey, of Milwaukee, was called to the pastorate, preached his first sermon on April 10, 1859, and was installed on June 7. In July, 1859, Sylvester Sexton donated $500 toward the establishment of a "pastor's library," and in the following December, raised the amount to $1,000. The pastorate of Rev. Dr. Humphrey lasted until 1868. Of his work in Chicago, Rev. Dr. Barrows, in an historical sermon, delivered June 24, 1883, at the semi-centennial anniversary of the Church said: "Dr. Humphrey came to you from the Plymouth Congregational Church, Milwaukee, in May, 1859. He found the Church strong and united, and he discovered everywhere the fidelity of Dr. Curtis's ministry. During his nine years' pastorate Dr. Humphrey witnessed the building, at the cost of $22,000, of a spacious and convenient chapel attached to the church, the addition to the church-building of two beautiful towers, the erection on Griswold Street, at a cost of $21,000, of a mission-school capable of seating one thousand scholars, $250,000 raised for general benevolence and the work of the Church, an annual accession of from sixty to eighty members, nearly one-half on confession, and the remarkably fine organization of this people, younger and older, for spiritual beneficence and for Christian efficiency in Sunday-school and mission enterprises. Dr. Humphrey's ministry covered the dark and exciting years of the Civil War. Members of this Church were enrolled among the Nation's defenders and among the Nation's martyrs. Much energy and thought were given to public affairs, and yet rarely has a pastorate witnessed a steadier flow of spiritual activity and life. It was with many tears that, on February 3, 1868, this ministry was ended."

Z. M. Humphrey

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

After the retirement of Dr. Humphrey, the pulpit was supplied by Professor Franklin W. Fisk, of the

Arthur Mitchell

Chicago Theological Seminary, for six months. Then followed the long pastorate of Rev. Arthur Mitchell, from November 10, 1868, until August 9, 1880. Just before the close of his third year, the fire of 1871 swept away the elegant church-edifice, Sunday-school house and mission-building, and the homes of many of the members.

SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—The growth of the membership of this Church in 1858 was especially memorable, there having been added to the church-roll nearly one hundred persons, making a total of five hundred and eighty-seven since the organization of the Church. The church-building, on the corner of Wabash Avenue and Washington Street, was regarded at that time as one of the finest in the West. It was constructed of bituminous limestone, and was known as the "spotted church," on account of the exudations from the stone of the dark-colored, crude petroleum. By the profane, it was known as the "Church of the Holy Zebra."

The condition of the Church, at the commencement of the second period of our history, can best be shown by extracts from a sermon delivered on June 1, 1862, the twentieth anniversary of its organization, by Rev. Robert W. Patterson, who was its pastor continually during the first thirty-one years of its existence.

"Our internal history has been marked by many dispensations of God's special providence and grace. Under the guidance of an eldership of extraordinary wisdom and faithfulness, the movement of the Church has been steady and self-consistent. We have seen among us few developments of inconsiderate impulse, few attempts at hazardous experiment, few departures from the evangelical faith. Our peace and unity have not been seriously interrupted, even when storms raged without. Threatening clouds have at times hung over us, but they have given place to the rainbow of hope and promise. Our growth by enlargement from hopeful conversions has been quietly continued from year to year. * * * It has been our painful duty to excommunicate, or suspend from church privileges, twelve persons, eight of whom have come to us by letter from other churches. We have dismissed to other churches, almost entirely to new churches in the city and its vicinity, or to churches abroad, two hundred and ninety-four members. * * * The religious activity and benevolence of the Church and congregation have been, and are, deserving of high commendation. We have borne a good relative share in the tract, Sabbath-school, educational and general missionary enterprises of the city and the country. Besides sustaining the Sabbath-school immediately connected with the Church, our working membership has established and long kept in operation two or three of the best flourishing and useful mission-schools in the city, one of which has been in successful operation more than seventeen years. And in addition to the expenses incurred in the erection of church-edifices by way of the ordinary annual outlays, amounting to about $120,000, we have contributed to the cause of general benevolence nearly $80,000."

At the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization of this Church, the pastor said that no other people had contributed more liberally to the cause of caring for the poor and neglected classes. For the immediate benefit of the Church there had been spent from $150,000 to $200,000, and for other purposes from $125,000 to $150,000. The first Mission Sunday-school was organized and carried on for twenty-five years by members of this Church, and other churches had sprung up from this one—namely, Olivet, Westminster and Lake Forest Presbyterian churches, and it has given material strength to the North, Calvary and Hyde Park Presbyterian churches. In February, 1869, the propriety of selling the church property began to be discussed, but no action was then taken. However, the discussion was not without its results, and on October 1, 1871, the congregation assembled in their old building designedly for the last time. Rev. R. W. Patterson, in his sermon on that day, said that in 1860 the movement of the people was southward, and business was encroaching on the Church. The problem, therefore, presented itself, "How shall the congregation be kept from extinction?" A removal farther south was determined upon; and, in order not to have too many Presbyterian churches in the same locality, the Olivet and Second Presbyterian churches united, as is related in connection with the history of the former in the first volume. But had not the change of location been determined upon as early as October 1, 1871, it would have been settled by the great fire of one week later, which destroyed all that was combustible of this "queer-looking, mottled church-building." The church destroyed cost about $45,000, and the loss was estimated at $55,000. Up to this time, the Second Presbyterian Church had contributed to benevolent purposes from $150,000 to $175,000, besides what had been expended within the Church.

SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AND RUINS.

The constitution of the Session was given in the first volume up to 1862. In January of that year, Zuinglius Grover and Hiram F. Mather were added to it. In April, 1866, John S. Gould, Mark Skinner and George E. Purington were added. George M. High and Henry J. Willing were elected and ordained elders in April, 1869; and in October, 1871, by the union of this Church with the Olivet Presbyterian, Oscar F. Avery and Dr. F. Crumbaugh were added to the Session.

REV. ROBERT W. PATTERSON, D.D., was born January 21, 1814, in Blount County, Tenn., the son of Alexander and Sarah (Stevenson) Patterson. His parents emigrated to America about the middle of the eighteenth century, and removed to Tennessee from South Carolina soon after 1800. Shortly after the birth of Robert, his parents removed to the neighborhood of Maryville; but being very strongly opposed to slavery they determined to leave Tennessee and come to Illinois which was a free State. At the early age of four to five years, Robert W. had learned to read at home, his mother being his teacher, while his elder brothers and sisters were at school. She exerted a strong influence upon all her children by religious instruction and example. The removal to Illinois occurred about the close of 1821, and a settlement was made in Bond County, where Mr. Patterson died in 1824. Robert W. Patterson began to attend school at the age of nine, but only went six months. At the age of eighteen he taught school two or three terms. He became a member of a Presbyterian Church in 1832. In the same year he entered the preparatory department of Illinois College, and the college in 1833. He graduated in 1837. While in college he fell in with Garrison's Liberator, and became a zealous abolitionist. Upon becoming convinced that Garrison was tending toward infidelity, he revised his views somewhat and became a moderate anti-slavery man. Upon graduating from Illinois College he went to Lane Theological Seminary, where his professors were Drs. Lyman Beecher, Calvin E. Stowe, Baxter Dickinson and Thomas J. Biggs. In 1838, when the Presbyterian Church was divided into the Old and New Schools, he took sides with the latter, as did the ministry of his parents in Tennessee and his professors in college. The conflict in the Seminary on the slavery question occurred a year or two before he went there, and on that question he took ground midway between the professors and the seceding students. In the spring of 1839, he became tutor in Illinois College, where he remained one year; and the summer of 1840, he spent in supplying the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church of Chicago, in the absence of Rev. Flavel Bascom, pastor elect. He returned to the Seminary in the fall, and spent the next winter there. In 1841, he went East, and made the acquaintance of Rev. Albert Barnes, Dr. William Adams, and many other ministers of Philadelphia and New York, and also of Dr. George Duffield, of Detroit, whose pulpit he supplied for a few Sundays that summer. While at Detroit, he encountered and combated the pre-millennial theories. The succeeding fall and winter he spent in the church at Monroe, Mich., and had calls from Monroe, Adrian, Ann Arbor, and other places but declined them all to accept one from the Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, which was organized June 1, 1842. Many efforts were made to withdraw the Presbyterians of Northern Illinois from the General Assembly, in which Mr. Patterson always took conservative ground, though disapproving slavery as an institution, for which it was contended that all Presbyterians were responsible through their connection with the General Assembly. This he disputed, and held that the secession from the General Assembly was not the true remedy for the evil. He was one of ten involved in controversy on account of his position on this subject. He was one of two members of the General Assembly of 1857, at Cleveland, Ohio, who drew up the report, which was adopted by the majority of the Assembly, having been previously approved by leading ministers of Eastern cities. This was the signal for the secession of the Southern members. From this time onward there was peace in the New School Church on this question. During all these years the Second Presbyterian Church continued to grow, and took its place among the most influential in the Northwest. In 1856, the great National conflict arose about the extension of slavery into the Territories, in which Dr. Patterson was active as to the moral aspects of the question; and when, in 1860, Mr. Lincoln had been elected, he took the side of the Government, and throughout the War preached and prayed on the side of liberty and righteous government in no uncertain tones.

From 1865, onward, the drift of the population in Chicago was from the center in all directions. Seeing the impossibility of keeping the church in its location, corner of Washington Street and Wabash Avenue, Dr. Patterson privately expressed this conviction, which was not well received by all. The removal, however, was agreed to by a majority, and on the evening of the first Sunday after, the services were removed to the Olivet Church, corner of Wabash Avenue and Fourteenth Street. The great fire destroyed the church-building just vacated. The union of the Second and Olivet churches was one cause of the resignation, two years later, of the pastor. The Church acted generously in providing for his support on his election as Professor of Apologetics in the Presbyterian Seminary of the Northwest, a position to which he was chosen before resigning the pastorate. He remained professor until the spring of 1881, when he resigned and engaged to lecture for three years in Lane Theological Seminary, in the Department of Apologetics. In June, 1867, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the church was held, and immediately afterward a turlough was granted to Dr. Patterson to visit the Old World, his salary being continued by the Church, and his expenses being paid by a friend. On January 21, 1884, a notable reception was given Dr. Patterson and his family in the Second Presbyterian Church, at which a large number of old and new friends were present, it being the seventieth anniversary of his birth. He is still vigorous and able to perform ministerial work. Much of his time is given to Biblical and Apologetical studies, and his interest in the welfare of the Church and in public affairs has not abated. Dr. Patterson was married in May, 1843, to Miss Julia A. Quigley, of Alton, Ill. They have had eight children, seven of whom are living—three sons and four daughters. The three sons are John C., who is engaged in practicing law; Robert W., Jr., managing editor of the Chicago Tribune, and Raymond A., who is a journalist. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on Dr. Patterson in 1856, by the trustees of Hamilton College. Dr. Patterson's theology has always been of the moderate Calvinistic, or New School, type, and in relation to church government he has ever advocated Presbyterianism generously administered, having little sympathy with high-churchism in any form. In 1873, when charges were preferred against Professor Swing by Dr. F. L. Patton before the Presbytery of Chicago, Dr. Patterson was against the prosecution, not believing that Professor Swing had then distinctly developed views inconsistent with his ministerial standing in the Presbyterian Church, whatever may be said in regard to his later teachings. He regarded the prosecution as at least premature and adapted to create an antagonistic interest in the community against Presbyterianism, which might have been avoided without any sacrifice of principle or any real detriment to the evangelical faith; and he now believes that his position then was the wise and truly Christian one, and that the results have fully justified his opinion in relation to this matter, which has been the occasion of so much division and strife. At the same time he has never sympathized with extreme liberalism either in theology or religious practice. He expects to die, as he has tried to live, a moderate, charitable Presbyterian—not a sectarian, but a Christian.

THE THIRD PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—The history of this Church closed, in the preceding volume, with the completion of the new building at the corner of Washington and Carpenter streets. The edifice was a very fine one, and was considered a great credit to the city. The pews were sold March 15, 1858, and in June, an organ, made by Mr. Jardine, of New York, was put in the building. On the 28th of August, Rev. A. L. Brooks indicated his intention of resigning, but the Church voted against accepting the resignation; it was, however, accepted later, and Mr. Brooks became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, at Indianapolis. His pastorate with the Third Presbyterian Church had lasted three years, terminating November 17, 1859. At its beginning, there were about twenty members, and they were worshipping in a small building on Union Street, near West Market Street; during its continuance, the new stone edifice had been erected, and the membership had increased to upwards of two hundred, while the congregation had become large and influential. After the retirement of Mr. Brooks, the pulpit was supplied by various pastors, among them being Rev. R. W. Henry, Rev. Willis Lord, and Rev. Daniel Lord, of New York.

In February, 1860, a call was extended to Rev. Arthur Swazey, who was then preaching at Galena, Ill. He accepted the call, and was installed February 19. Between the retirement of Rev. Mr. Brooks and the installation of Rev. Mr. Swazey, about fifty persons were added to the Church. Rev. Mr. Swazey's pastorate lasted until 1870, and was eminently successful. He was followed by the present pastor, Rev. Abbott E. Kittredge, who was installed in October, 1870.

In the summer of 1871, the church-building was re-modeled and very much improved, after which the audience-room compared favorably with any in the city. A chapel was also erected, adjoining the church on the west side, for the use of the Sunday-school, and cost $50,000.

REV. ARTHUR SWAZEY, D.D., was born on June 22, 1824, at Bucksport, Me. His father, Hon. John N. Swazey, was a prominent merchant and a leading citizen of that State, and was State senator for a number of years. His mother, Mrs. Sarah (Buck) Swazey, was a descendant of General Sewell, of the staff of General Washington. Dr. Swazey was educated at Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me., graduating from that institution in 1844, and from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1847. His honorary degree was conferred by Hamilton College. He was ordained to the ministry in October, 1847, at Brighton, a suburb of Boston, where he was pastor of the Congregational Church ten years. In March, 1856, he was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, at Galena, Ill., and remained there until 1860. On the 1st of April of that year, he assumed charge of the Third Presbyterian Church, Chicago. His pastorate continued until 1870, and during these ten years he succeeded in building up a large and very influential congregation. In 1870, he established The Interior, a Presbyterian newspaper, the success of which, from the start, was very remarkable, being second only to the Independent, of New York City. During the first year of its existence the circulation reached twelve thousand. Dr. Swazey had charge of this paper two years, when the controlling interest in its stock was purchased by Cyrus H. McCormick, in the interest of another style of theology in the Presbyterian denomination. After his retirement from the editorship of The Interior, Dr. Swazey preached at Ashland Avenue Presbyterian Church four years, retiring from the latter in 1883. He has also been a regular contributor to the press for many years, and during the last ten years has made a special study of astronomy, with what zeal and success may be inferred from the fact that with his own telescope, of four-inch aperture, he was second only to the Cambridge Observatory in the accuracy of his observations of the initial and secondary contacts of Venus with the Sun at its late transit. The Cambridge Observatory gave the time of contact within one-half a second, and Dr. Swazey within one and a half seconds of the average time. The West Point observatories were third on the list of accuracy, and those of the Naval Observatory, at Washington, D. C., fourth. Dr. Swazey was married, October 7, 1847, to Eliza Ann Wells, of Brunswick, Me. They have four children—Ella Maria, Emeline Rice, Lousia Wells and Sarah Buck.

REV. ABBOTT ELIOT KITTRIDGE, D.D., pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, was born at Roxbury, Mass., July 20, 1834. After attending the district schools for some years he entered Williams College in 1850, and graduated therefrom in 1854. He was then admitted to Andover Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1859. In September of that year he was installed pastor of the Winthrop Congregational Church, Charlestown, Mass., resigning the pastorate there in 1863. During six months of the next year, while making a visit to the Pacific Coast, he occupied the pulpit of Howard Street Presbyterian Church. In January, 1865, he was installed pastor of the Eleventh (now Memorial) Presbyterian Church, New York City, remaining there until 1870, resigning in June, to assume the pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church, Chicago, where he was installed the following October. At that time the church-building was situated on the corner of Washington and Carpenter streets and there was a membership of two hundred and forty. By his energy and zeal there was a continual and rapid increase in the membership, until, in 1875, it became necessary to procure a larger edifice. The elegant edifice erected, in 1871, by St. John's Episcopal Church, was purchased and enlarged, and was occupied until partially destroyed by the fire of October 10, 1884. The success of Dr. Kittredge, as a pastor, is attested by the remarkable growth and prosperity of the Church to which he has ministered since his installation in Chicago. The Third Presbyterian Church has received over twenty-two hundred communicants. The secret of Dr. Kittredge's success is his great executive ability and his sympathetic nature. He is a little below the average stature and of fine physique. In manner, he is affable and pleasant; he adapts himself to persons in all conditions of life; his genial nature brings him into personal relations with each member of his congregation; and as a consequence he is held in high esteem. In the pulpit he affects no style of oratory, but aims to present the Gospel in its simplicity and purity; and he does this with an earnestness and freshness which makes it always new. His sermons are well written and practical, and his delivery is forcible and eloquent. His congregations are always large, and his influence extends to all parts of the country, through the medium of the secular press. The greatest feature of his church work is the conduct of his prayer-meetings. Previous to the assembling of each meeting, he chooses a few interesting speakers, and this, with his zeal and earnestness, has caused his prayer-meetings to become renowned, the average attendance being about five hundred. Dr. Kittredge has always been active in promoting every proper kind of evangelistic movement, and his long pastorate over this great Church, which is second in size to any in its own denomination in the United States, sufficiently indicates the esteem in which he is held.

SOUTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—After the resignation of Rev. R. W. Henry, this Church, on April 23d, 1860, elected as his successor, Rev. T. M. Cunningham, who, June 17, preached his first sermon to this congregation. In April, 1861, the total number of communicants was one hundred and ten, and of children in the Sunday-school and Bible-class, one hundred and twenty. In 1861, Rev. T. M. Cunningham was succeeded by Rev. L. J. Halsey, D.D., who remained a few months. His successor, was Rev. W. W. Harsha, who became pastor in September 1862. On the 3d of July, RUINS, NORTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

1863, C. M. Howard was elected elder and ordained October 2, 1863. In November, 1864, the Session was enlarged by the election of N. D. Hunter, J. H. Knapp and John Forsythe. In December, a Board of Deacons was ordained and installed, consisting of William Wisdom, John Buchanan and Somerville Thompson. In October, 1866, S. M. Moore was elected elder, and on the same day J. Whitney Farlin was elected deacon. On January 15, 1867, W. G. Holmes, who had been for nine years an elder and clerk of the Session, was, with his wife, dismissed to join a new religious enterprise then being organized on the West Side under Rev. Dr. Patterson. John Forsythe was then elected clerk of the Session.

Shortly afterward, the dissolution of the church organization occurred. This was the result of the union of the Old and New School Presbyterian churches throughout the United States, and the proximity of the First Presbyterian Church, which had always belonged to the New School branch. The South Presbyterian Church then stood on the McCormick lot, at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Congress Street, having been removed from the lot at the corner of Jackson Street and Edina Place in 1863, soon after Rev. W. W. Harsha became pastor. Rev. Mr. Harsha, upon his resign-nation of the pastorate, advised the members to unite with the Twenty-eighth Street Presbyterian Church, then recently organized. This advice was quite generally followed, and the Session of the South Church met in the Twenty-eighth Street Church, for the first time, September 11, 1869. Letters were given to thirty-three members from September 11, 1869, to March 25, 1870. Fifty-eight other members of the South Church, by the terms of the union, became members of the Twenty-eighth Street Church. The property thus vacated was rented.

The Sunday-school of this Church was organized soon after the organization of the Church, and was always in a prosperous condition. The list of its superintendents is as follows: Charles A. Spring, Sr., William G. Holmes, C. M. Howard, George B. Dunton and Judge S. M. Moore.

The South Presbyterian Church, though its history was brief and somewhat troubled, claims to have given from its membership more ministers than all the other Presbyterian churches in Chicago. This is a remarkable fact, and the list of these ministers is here appended: Henry E. Lippert, who died early in his ministerial life; Charles M. Howard, a noted evangelist; John Miller; Robert Mackenzie, pastor of Howard-Street Presbyterian Church, San Francisco; J. Garnis Hunter, pastor of a Church in Georgetown, Ky.; Robert K. Wharton, of Waukegan; Maurice Waller, of Manchester, Ohio; and William Justin Harsha, son of Rev. W. W. Harsha, of Omaha, Neb.

THE CENTRAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—This Church was organized January 29, 1865, with twenty-three members, most of them having previously been members of the North Presbyterian Church. A few days previous to the organization, the Chicago Presbytery met in the South Presbyterian Church, for the purpose of attending to the request of those who desired the organization of a new Church, to be styled the Central Presbyterian Church of Chicago, and resolved that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, and appointed Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., Rev. F. Seymour and Hon. Lincoln Clark as a committee to consummate the organization.

On the 29th of January, 1865, the committee met in the Central Presbyterian Church, when Judge E. S. Williams and A. H. Hoge were elected elders. Dr. Lord then said that, as the elders elect had been ordained elders in the North Presbyterian Church, all that the committee had to do was to declare them ruling elders in the Central Presbyterian Church. After the charge to the elders and the people, the Central Presbyterian Church was declared duly organized and under the care of the Chicago Presbytery. The original members were as follows: Judge E. S. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Hoge, Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Wadsworth, Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Dickinson, Mr. and Mrs. John Woodbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Blaikie, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Fauntleroy, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh McLennan, Mrs. A. Welch, Miss Olive Collins, Mrs. Thomas Dixon, Mrs. A. D. F. Bruner, Mrs. D. F. Burt, Mrs. A. Jones, Walter Butler, and Miss Elizabeth A. Blaikie.

Rev. Frederick T. Brown was the first pastor, and remained until October 10, 1866, when, very reluctantly, the Church accepted his resignation. The first meeting of the Session was held April 1, 1865. During that year eight members were added to the Church. The Central Presbyterian Church, in which the committee met January 29, 1865, to complete the work of organization, was the original St. James' Episcopal church-building, the first brick church-edifice erected in Chicago, and stood on the west side of Cass Street, thirty feet south of Illinois Street. After the close of the war, and after the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Frederick T. Brown, the property was sold to Albert Smith, and was finally destroyed in the great fire. The members gradually found their way into other churches, the family of John Woodbridge being the last to go. Mr. Woodbridge was the last elder of the Church, and as such gave letters to the different members of his family, and finally to himself, to the New England Congregational Church, into which they were received.

A Sunday-school was organized soon after the establishment of the Church, of which John Woodbridge was the first and only superintendent. It was well attended as long as it was in existence.

THE FIRST SCOTCH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Previous to the organization of this Church, eight churches had already been established in Chicago to provide religious homes for that part of the Scottish element in the city who did not attend the American churches. These were the Reformed Presbyterian Church, the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, the American Presbyterian Church (O. S.), three United Presbyterian churches, one in each of the three divisions of the city, and all Old School, the South Side Scotch Presbyterian Church (N. S.), and the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, all in American connection. The principal reasons for their failure to provide a religious home for the Scottish element were that the leaders in their establishment omitted to lay sufficient stress upon the importance of securing pastors from Scottish schools, and upon the fact that many of the Scotch people were opposed to innovations of every kind. They preferred the "Psalm Book" to the "Hymnal," and were not favorably inclined to the introduction of instrumental music into the services. Hence, when such innovations were made, while American families were attracted and gratified, many Scotch families were displeased and repelled.

Several Scotchmen determined to organize a Church in which the forms of worship that their forefathers had established should be observed, and of which the pastors should be of Scottish birth and education. The leaders of this movement were George McPherson, George Drysdale and James F. Mackie. On December 3, 1865, these gentlemen met to consider the organization of a purely Scotch Presbyterian Church. On January 6, 1866, a paper was circulated in which this purpose was set out, and which received signatures to the number of one hundred and fifty families of those favoring the project. Soon after, the services of Revs. John Fraser, of Thamesford, and John Scott, of London, Ontario, were procured, a temporary organization was effected, a public hall rented, and funds were raised to carry on the work. An application was made for an ecclesiastical organization and connection with the Synod of the Canada Presbyterian Church, because many of its ministers were Scotchmen and consequently familiar with Scottish forms.

On June 7, 1866, the Synod of Canada instructed the Presbytery of London to proceed to the organization of said congregation in Chicago, according to the rules and forms of the Church. The Presbytery of London assembled at Hamilton, Canada, on the 11th of June, during the meeting of the Synod, and appointed Rev. John J. A. Proudfoot to attend to the duties of organizing the said Church. Rev. Mr. Proudfoot came to Chicago, and on Sunday, July 1, gave notice that on July 8 the Church would be organized and four elders elected.

The Church was organized, and was named the First

Scotch Presbyterian Church of Chicago. Following are the names of the forty-six original members :

Mr. and Mrs. D. Gillespie, Mr. and Mrs. R. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. A. Barnet, Mr. and Mrs. D. Pyott, Mr. and Mrs. T. Haddow, Mr. and Mrs. J. Turner, Mr. and Mrs. G. Maurer, Mr. and Mrs. P. McEvan, Mr. and Mrs. T. Gillespie, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Cowan, Mr. and Mrs. J. Whyte, Mr. and Mrs. G. McPherson, Mr. and Mrs. A. Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. George Drysdale, Mr. and Mrs. James Barnett, Mr. and Mrs. G. Key, Mr. and Mrs. J. Leslie, Mr. and Mrs. A. Drysdale, Mrs. Isabella Clark, John Fraser, Alexander McMillen, Miss C. Fleming, Sarah Gairns, Margaret Wright, Mrs. Isabella Belford, Mrs. Jessie Cavanaugh, Mrs. Susan Mortimer and Miss Ferguson.

On the same day, George McPherson, Andrew Drysdale, Alexander Barnet and Robert Watson were elected elders and on the 17th, George McPherson, previously ordained in the First United Presbyterian Church of Chicago, was inducted into the office of elder and the other three were ordained, and on the 18th, the Session met and was constituted under the moderatorship of Mr. Proudfoot. Services were held in St. George's Hall, on South Clark Street, near Jackson, for about eighteen months, during which time the pulpit was supplied by the Canadian Presbytery. A call was then extended to Rev. R. F. Burns, D.D., of St. Catharines, Ontario, and his acceptance awakened considerable enthusiasm among the members. His induction occurred March 20, 1868, in Music Hall, on State Street. This Church, which was self-sustaining from its commencement, increased in membership quite rapidly, and it became necessary to seek a more commodious house of worship. Metropolitan Hall was next occupied, until the congregation completed a church-edifice at the corner of Adams and Sangamon streets. This was dedicated August 16, 1868, Rev. Dr. Ormiston, Rev. Dr. Brown, and Rev. Dr. Robert Burns, of Knox College, Canada, father of the pastor, preaching on that occasion.

R. F. Burns

Rev. Dr. Burns labored in Chicago three years, cheerfully and successfully. He was a preacher of exceptional ability and rare pulpit eloquence, and these qualifications, combined with eminent scholarship and the novelty of hearing the Word expounded by an Old Country divine, sufficed to attract large congregations to St. George's Hall, Metropolitan Hall, and to the new church-edifice. But during this time, his venerable father had died, and he longed to be again among his relatives in Canada. Receiving a call from the Cote Street Presbyterian Church, Montreal, he therefore accepted it. He took his departure amid many expressions of regret. During his ministry, the Church had steadily increased in membership, and at the close of his pastorate, the rolls contained the names of three hundred and nineteen members.

ROBERT FERRIER BURNS, D.D., was born at Paisley, Scotland, December 23, 1826. His father was Rev. Robert Burns, D.D., pastor, for a number of years, of Laigh Kirk, Paisley, and was the successor in that church of Rev. John Witherspoon, afterward elected president of Princeton College, New Jersey. Dr. Burns, Sr., was generally spoken of as the father of Canadian Presbyterianism, and was a professor in Knox College, Toronto. Robert F. Burns was educated at the high school of his native town. He then attended the Glasgow University four sessions, and afterward studied at Edinburgh one session, under the celebrated Dr. Chalmers and Dr. Cunningham. He then emigrated to Canada, and attended Knox College during the sessions of 1845-46 and 1846-47. He was ordained minister in the Presbyterian Church, July 1, 1847, at Kingston, Ontario, where he remained eight years as pastor of Chalmers' Church. In July, 1855, he was called to the charge of Knox Church, St. Catharines, Ontario, where he remained until March, 1867; when he was called to the First Scotch Presbyterian Church, of Chicago, as its first pastor, by which he was enthusiastically received, and with which he remained until April, 1870. While in Chicago, he was an active and efficient worker, in connection with D. L. Moody, B. F. Jacobs and D. W. Whittle, in the organization and labor of the Young Men's Christian Association and of the Illinois Sunday-school Association. Upon leaving Chicago, he went to the Cote Street Church, Montreal, where he remained five years, and where, also, he was very active in the work of the Sunday-school. In 1875, he accepted a call to the Fort Massey Church, Halifax, Nova Scotia, of which he is still pastor. Rev. Mr. Burns was married, July 1, 1852, to Miss Elizabeth Holden, daughter of Dr. Rufus Holden, of Belleville, Ontario. They have had nine children, eight of whom are living—four sons and four daughters.

CALVARY PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (N. S.), was organized July 20, 1859, at the Protestant Orphan Asylum, by the Presbytery. Thirty members united with the Church. The first elders were Ebenezer Jenkins, Bennett B. Chambers and James Otis. Rev. F. W. Graves, of Corning, N. Y., was the first pastor, and he remained until April, 1860. The pulpit was then supplied by various preachers, among them Rev. B. Van-Zant, of Freeport, N. Y., and Rev. Thomas Sherard. In 1860, a chapel was erected on Indiana Avenue, south of Ringgold Place, with a seating capacity of three hundred, and costing $2,500. In September, Rev. Edward Anderson, of St. Joseph, Mich., accepted a call from this Church. The church-building was ready for occupancy in October, and was dedicated on November 13. Rev. Mr. Anderson remained about a year, and was succeeded by Rev. James H. Trowbridge, of Dubuque, Iowa, who entered upon his duties in June, 1862. Toward the latter part of the year, the church-building was removed to the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-second Street, and enlarged. On December 3, 1865, Rev. Edward A. Pierce preached his first sermon as pastor, and he was installed on December 22. He remained as pastor until his death, March 8, 1868. He was succeeded by Rev. Daniel Lord, who was pastor until the union of this Church with the First Presbyterian, which occurred soon after the great fire of 1871; when the latter Church erected a building at the northeast corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-first Street.

THE ASSOCIATE REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized in 1855. The first pastor was Rev. Archibald Nisbet. For some time the Church was quite prosperous, but, in purchasing a lot and erecting a church-building, a debt was incurred which became quite a burden to the society. A portion of the members, including the pastor, in order to liquidate the debt, favored uniting with a wealthy congregation, and in this way obtain assistance. A majority, therefore, withdrew from this Church, and formed the American Presbyterian Church (O. S.), retaining, however, the church property.

Some time after this, another division of the Church ensued. Those who remained were unable to pay off the indebtedness, and in due time the church property was sold by the sheriff, the Church became extinct, and its members, with the exception of a mere handful, became scattered among other churches. After some years, the minority, who had held together, formed the First United Presbyterian Church.

THE FIRST UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—This Church was organized in 1860, by a number of members of the Associated Reformed Church (Rev. Mr. Nesbit's) upon a division of the latter Church. This minority being few in numbers and of limited means, accomplished but little, became discouraged, and distributed themselves among other churches, with the exception of Robert Livingston and George McPherson, who corresponded with the United Presbyterian Denomination, and in due time procured preaching from the United Presbyterian Assembly. Rev. Benjamin Waddell was the first supply, being succeeded by Revs. Ormstead Reed, of Pittsburgh, Mr. Bigger, and others. Most of this work was previous to the organization of the Church.

At the time of the organization, three elders were elected: Robert Livingston, George McPherson and T. G. Spriggs. Afterward, Hugh Alexander and Alexander Ferrier were elected elders. Rev. W. C. Jackson was the first regular pastor. For some time the Church was not self-sustaining, but was assisted by the General Assembly. At the time of its organization the members were Scotch, but soon Americans joined the congregation, and in five or six years the membership was composed of some forty families, about equally divided between Americans and Scotch.

Rev. W. C. Jackson commenced preaching for this Church May 5, 1861. At that time the congregation was worshipping at the corner of Washington and Jefferson streets in the morning, and at old Trinity Church, on Madison Street, in the afternoon. In May and June, 1862, Rev. W. B. Truax, superintendent of missions of the American Sunday-school Union for the Northwest, preached for this Church, and at the annual meeting of this year the finances were reported to be in good condition. In 1864, the Church removed to Green Street, between Madison and Monroe, where it remained until 1871, when it erected its present handsome edifice at the corner of Monroe and Paulina streets. In 1867, Rev. Mr. Jackson retired from the pastorate, and, after a vacancy in the pulpit for about two years, Rev. J. M. Baugh was called.

THE EDWARDS PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized late in the year 1861, its first elders being ordained on the 13th of December. On the 15th, services were conducted by Rev. Arthur Swazey in the morning, and by Rev. Z. M. Humphrey in the evening. Rev. A. L. Brooks was ordained pastor on the 20th of the month, and installed June 24, 1862. The church was located at the corner of Halsted and Harrison streets, in a portion of the city containing nearly twenty thousand people, neglected, up to that time, by the Presbyterians. In the fall of that year the church-building was enlarged, and was dedicated October 12, 1862. In August, 1865, the name was changed from the Edwards Presbyterian Church to the Seventh Presbyterian Church, and Rev. J. W. Larimore was elected pastor on September 21, 1865. In 1866, the building was again enlarged. Rev. Mr. Larimore was installed on April 16, 1866, the services being conducted by Revs. R. W. Patterson, Z. M. Humphrey, Alfred Eddy, E. A. Pierce and Glen Wood. He remained pastor until October, 1867, when, on account of differences of opinion between himself and the Church, as to the management of its temporal affairs, he resigned, and was succeeded by Rev. Mr. McLeish, who remained two years, and was the last pastor of the Church under the name of the Seventh Presbyterian. During his pastorate, this Church exchanged its property on the corner of Harrison and Halsted streets for that of the Free-Will Baptist Church, on the corner of Jackson and Peoria streets, which, seen in the light of the present, was a grave mistake. At the end of the pastorate of Rev. Mr. McLeish, the Seventh Presbyterian Church practically disbanded, but existed for some years as a mission, sustained by the Third Presbyterian Church, and was, in later years, revived as the Westminster Presbyterian Church.

THE EIGHTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized by a committee from the Presbytery of Chicago, December 20, 1864. The original membership was twenty-five. The Church was the outgrowth of a neighborhood prayer-meeting, commenced on Thanksgiving evening, November 23, 1863, through the instrumentality of Rev. Glen Wood, S. R. Bingham, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Whitney, Thomas Hood and others. The meeting was held in the thinly-settled region west of Union Park, and continued weekly until the Church was organized and a place of worship completed. In September, 1864, Mr. Bingham secured a lot at the northwest corner of Washington and Robey streets, upon which to build a house of worship. A neat chapel was erected, and dedicated February 9, 1865, the entire cost of land, chapel and furnishing being $5,600. The congregation increased so rapidly that the chapel was soon too small to meet the wants of the prosperous society, and it was sold to be removed, and the building of a new edifice commenced. The basement was finished and occupied for worship in December, 1866, and the main audience room in June, 1867, the entire building costing about $32,000. The building is a tasteful structure, and is surmounted by a steeple containing a bell furnished by children's contributions, and bearing the inscription "The Children's Bell."

At the organization of the Church, Rev. James T. Matthews was elected pastor, and served between two and three years, but owing to feeble health, which, at length, compelled him to resign, he was never installed. He was succeeded by Rev. Lewis H. Reed, from Syracuse, N. Y., who was installed July 7, 1868, and resigned April 1, 1874.

THE FIFTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was formed by the union of the South Presbyterian and the Twenty-eighth-street Presbyterian churches. Early in 1867, a number of people in the Second United Presbyterian and Calvary Presbyterian churches, thinking there was need of a Church in the south part of the city, where pew rents and church expenses generally would be within the reach of people of moderate means, decided upon attempting to supply the want. Rev. Ebenezer Erskine, then editor of the Northwestern Presbyterian, raised funds necessary for starting the work. A lot on Twenty-eighth Street, between Michigan and Wabash avenues, was purchased, and services were begun April 8, 1867, by Rev. Dr. Erskine. An organization was effected June 7, with members from the two churches above referred to. Though Dr. Erskine declined a call to the Church, he continued to supply the pulpit until September. A building was erected on the lot, capable of seating four hundred persons, and costing $5,000. Rev. William McConnell was installed pastor on November 17, but assistance expected from various sources was not rendered, and the small congregation becoming smaller, Rev. Mr. McConnell was dismissed September 20, 1868. Occasionally supplies were provided by Rev. Drs. Patterson, Erskine and Marquis until the following May, when Rev. W. W. Fairs was appointed to take charge of the pulpit for six months. His labors closed September 11, 1869. About a year before, the South Presbyterian Church made overtures to the Twenty-eighth-street Church for a union with them, which resulted successfully, as elsewhere shown.

THIRTY-FIRST-STREET PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH had its origin January 15, 1868, in a meeting held at the house of Joseph Meeker, for the purpose of organizing a corporate society under the above name. A constitution was adopted, and the following persons elected trustees: H. H. Cooley, James L. Otis, Henry Mallory, Elijah Smith and Joseph Meeker. On the 27th, the contract was signed for the erection of a frame building on Wabash Avenue, near Thirty-first Street. Rev. G. W. Mackie was engaged to secure subscriptions from people in the neighborhood, and the new and beautiful edifice was dedicated November 22, 1868. About the 1st of April, 1869, Rev. G. W. Mackie accepted a call to the pastorate. His installation occurred on April 27, 1869; but, after serving the Church about a year, he resigned.

About this time negotiations were commenced which resulted in the union of the Twenty-eighth-street with the Thirty-first-street Church.

The old South Presbyterian Church owned a building on Wabash Avenue, the rent of which and the property of the Twenty-eighth-street Church were transferred to the new organization, which was known as the Thirty-first-street Church. After this union, which occurred July, 1870, a call was extended to Rev. John H. Brown, D.D., of Springfield, Ill., who entered upon his pastorate almost immediately. He remained until February 23, 1872, when he died.

REV DAVID SWING, pastor of the Central Church, was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, August 23, 1830, the youngest son of David and Karinda (Gazley) Swing. The Swings were a German family, and came to America in 1726. David Swing, Sr. was for many years engaged in steamboating on the Ohio River. He was a man of ability and of sterling character. He was honored for his manhood rather than for his doctrinal Christianity. He died of cholera in 1832, leaving two sons to the care of their mother, who was a devoted Christian, and who inculcated into the minds of her children the fundamental principles of the Christian life. In 1837, Mrs. Swing married the second time, and removed to Reading, Ohio, and in 1840 settled on a farm near Williamsburg in the same State. On this farm young David lived eight years, attending the public school in the winter season and at such other times as it was possible. Farm labor gave him a vigorous constitution, and contact with nature developed in him, to an unusual degree, the observing and reflective faculties, and also that originality and independence of thought which characterize all his utterances and writings. At the age of eighteen, having prepared himself by private study, he entered Miami University, at Oxford, Ohio, from which he graduated as Bachelor of Arts in 1852.

David Swing

He then commenced his Divinity studies under Rev. Dr. N. L. Rice, of Cincinnati, with whom he remained one year. In 1853, he returned to Miami University as Professor of Ancient Languages, and remained in that capacity thirteen years. In 1866, he was invited to the pastorate of Westminister Presbyterian Church, Chicago. In this Church his sermons were characterized by liberality of thought, and by a want of dogmatic teaching respecting certain doctrines which underlie Calvinism, and which were believed by some to be essential to Presbyterianism. Large congregations listened to his sermons, and his popularity became so great that the North Presbyterian Church was led to seek a consolidation with Westminister Church, which was effected February 6, 1871, and the united bodies named the Fourth Presbyterian Church. The church-building was soon afterward destroyed by the great fire, as were also the residences of all but two of his parishioners. Rev. David Swing himself saved nothing, and with his wife and two daughters spent the night on the open prairie. On the second Sunday after the fire, October 22, he commenced preaching in Standard Hall, on the southwest corner of Michigan Avenue and Thirteenth Street. There he preached nearly a year. But when the hall became too small to accommodate the increasing congregation, the services were transferred to McVicker's Theatre; but upon the completion of the new Fourth Church edifice, he resumed the pastorate of this Church. This building also was soon filled to overflowing by members and strangers temporarily sojourning in the city, all anxious to hear Professor Swing, whose fame had become widely extended. Professor Francis L. Patton, then pastor of Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, and professor in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the Northwest, believing the teachings of Professor Swing to be heretical and subversive of true Christian doctrine, inaugurated the trial which has since been so famous, and which resulted in Professor Swing's withdrawal from the Presbyterian Church. His friends then inaugurated the movement resulting in the organization of the Central Church. His relations as pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church terminated December 1, 1875, and he commenced preaching for the new organization in McVicker's Theatre in April, 1876. This theatre was used until the fall of 1880, when the services were transferred to Central Music Hall, which continues to be used until the present time. His fame, and the intrinsic merit of his powerful sermons, have rendered his name one of the most celebrated in the country, and the vast auditorium of Central Music Hall is weekly filled to hear him. Professor Swing was married, on July 3, 1855, to Miss Elizabeth Porter, daughter of Dr. James Porter, of Oxford, Ohio. Mrs. Swing died on August 3, 1879, leaving two daughters—Mary, now Mrs. Jewett E. Ricker, of Cincinnati, and Helen, who lives at home with her father.

THE METHODIST CHURCH.

FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. — The history of this Church in the preceding volume closed with the change of name from the Methodist Episcopal Church of Chicago to the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Chicago. At that time, Rev. James Baume was pastor. The building erected in 1845 was still in use, but the city was growing in wealth as well as size, and the members saw their building being surpassed by other churches. On February 6, 1858, a meeting was held to consider plans for a new edifice "which should be fully up to the grade of modern architecture." A committee of fifteen was appointed to take charge of the matter. Soon after the old building was torn down and work on the new one commenced. In the meantime the congregation worshiped in Mechanics' Hall, on the southwest corner of Clark and Washington streets. The corner-stone of the new building was laid August 4, 1858, by Rev. D. D. Kidder, of Evanston.

M. E. CHURCH BLOCK, COR. CLARK AND WASHINGTON STREETS.

The new building was an elegant marble structure, presenting the appearance of a fine business block, four stories high. The lower or main floor was given up to stores, the second to offices, and the two upper stories to the purposes of the Society. The main audience room was the height of both stories. It had a gallery, and would seat two thousand people. The congregation commenced worshipping in the lecture-room on Sunday, December 5, 1858. Rev. James Baume preached his last sermon to them two weeks later, before starting to India as a missionary. The new church was dedicated April 28, 1859. The cost of the entire structure was about $70,000. After the departure of Rev. Mr. Baume, there were various supplies, among whom were Rev. E. M. Boring and Dr. Kidder; and on October 21, 1860, Rev. O. H. Tiffany preached his first sermon as pastor. Dr. Tiffany resigned in May, 1862; after which the pulpit was supplied by Rev. T. M. Eddy, D. D., from 1st of June until the following fall, when Rev. Francis D. Hem-inway was appointed. In 1864, he was succeeded by Rev. C. H. Fowler, who remained three years. The next pastor was Rev. W. C. Dandy, who was succeeded by Rev. John A. King, and he by Rev. W. H. Daniels, who was pastor at the time of the great fire of 1871, which destroyed the building.

In 1865, an appeal was made to this Church by the West Indiana Street Church for pecuniary aid, and a resolution was passed that this application should be first on the list, after the lot on Indiana Avenue, which was purchased for what is now Trinity Methodist Church, should be paid for. Nearly every Methodist Church in the city, organized since that date has received assistance from the First Methodist Church, which before the great fire had given away over $70,000. The loss occasioned by the great fire was $130,000, but as the insurance on the building and organ had been placed in solvent companies, the Church realized from that source $65,501.68. From funds collected from abroad, in excess of chapel fund, there were $10,000. So that the net loss was a little in excess of $50,000.

TRINITY METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH had its origin in the summer of 1855, when Clark-street Mission was organized in the Orphan Asylum, on Michigan Avenue, near Twenty-second Street. In August, 1856, the school was removed to the school-house on Indiana Avenue, near Twenty-second Street, and organized as St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Sabbath-school. The building was removed in December, 1859, and the school was temporarily disbanded. In 1862, it was re-organized in Calvary Presbyterian Church, at the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-second Street, as the Trinity Methodist Church Sabbath-school, with John Hayward, superintendent, and Frank Carley, secretary. In 1863, a church-building was erected on Indiana Avenue and Twenty-first Street, which being completed, was dedicated April 10, 1864, by Rev. T. M. Eddy, D. D. During that year, Rev. C. H. Fowler had official oversight of the new society. In the fall of 1864, Rev. John H. Vincent was appointed pastor, and, in 1865, he was succeeded by Rev. William August Smith. In 1866, Rev. S. A. W. Jewett was appointed, and was succeeded, in the fall of 1868, by Rev. T. M. Eddy, D. D. In March, 1869, Rev. E. B. Snyder was transferred to this Church from the Pittsburgh Conference. In the following fall, Rev. J. H. Bayliss became pastor.

About that time the project of erecting a new building began to be discussed, but work was not begun before the summer of 1870. The property at the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-first Street was sold to

RUINS, M. E. CHURCH BLOCK.

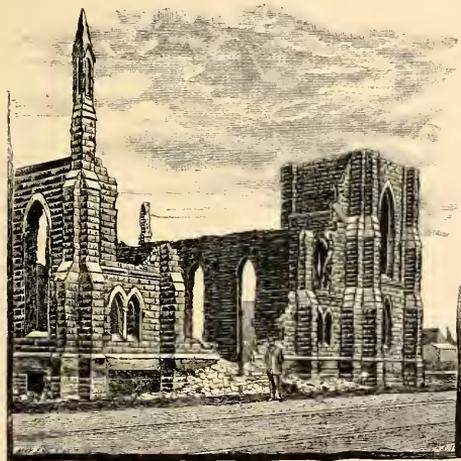

Calvary Presbyterian Church and the lot at the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street was purchased. The corner-stone of the new edifice was laid October 5, 1870, the exercises being conducted by Bishop Janes, of New York. The work was actively pushed forward until the fire of 1871, which to a great extent cut off the resources of the members. Notwithstanding this, however, the lecture-room of the new building was dedicated in January, 1872.

GRACE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. — After the loss of the lots at the corner of Erie and Wolcott (State) streets, this Church, as has already been recounted, was roused to renewed efforts in the direction of purchasing lots for a new location and erecting suitable buildings thereon. Lots were purchased at the northwest corner of LaSalle Street and Chicago Avenue, costing over $9,000, the money being raised by the ladies of the Church. At a meeting held June 8, 1863, the Society was re-organized, and, at the suggestion of the ladies present, the Church was named Grace Methodist Episcopal Church. The following trustees were then elected: Abner R. Scranton, Andrew J. Brown, Oliver S. Goss, Alfred L. Sewell, Alfred L. Scranton, W. F. Moss, Jr., and F. N. Gould. The trustees were instructed to procure title to the lots, and to erect a chapel on the northeast corner. The corner-stone of this chapel was laid by Dr. Bugbee, in the fall of 1863, and the chapel dedicated by Bishop Simpson July 3, 1864. The building, which, including the organ, cost $25,000, was completed without incurring a debt.

Rev. Dr. L. H. Bugbee, who had been appointed in the fall of 1861, was succeeded, in 1863, by Rev. J. C. Stoughton, who was followed, in 1864, by Rev. O. H. Tiffany. During his ministry, large additions were made to the membership, mainly by conversion, and the congregation became so large that it was deemed necessary to commence work on the main building, the foundations of which were laid in the fall of 1866. The superstructure was completed in 1867, and in the spring of 1868 the entire building, with the exception of the tower and spire, was finished. It was dedicated in the summer of that year by Rev. A. J. Jutkins, who had succeeded Rev. O. H. Tiffany in the preceding fall. The debt of the Society at the time was $37,000, but on the day of the dedication, subscriptions were given for the entire amount. During the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Jutkins and that of Rev. M. M. Parkhurst, which commenced in the fall of 1870, the increase in membership was steady. The church-building was a source of pride to the members. It was of stone, rock-faced, of the English-Gothic style of architecture and capable of accommodating one thousand persons.

This elegant structure, on the night of October 9, 1871, was swept away, and nothing remained but ashes and smouldering ruins. For a time despair seemed to possess the hearts of all; but the pastor, Rev. Mr. Parkhurst, was perhaps less discouraged than any member of the Church.

RUINS, GRACE M. E. CHURCH.

On Sunday, October 15, a considerable number of the widely separated members assembled upon the ruins of their temple, and there resolved to stand by the Society. On Sunday, November 5, a second meeting was held upon the ruins, the pastor and a majority of the trustees being present, and it was resolved to immediately erect a temporary structure. The latter was so far completed that, on Sunday, December 3, religious services were held therein. This was fifty-six days after the fire. The Church, during the succeeding winter, sold the old site, purchased that of their present building, at the corner of LaSalle and Locust streets, and prepared plans for the erection of the new edifice.

REV. MATTHEW M. PARKHURST, D. D., pastor of Grant Place M. E. Church, was born at Mexico, Oswego Co., N. Y., July 13, 1834, the son of Simeon and Mary Ann (Henry) Parkhurst. His mother was a communicant of the Roman Catholic Church, and young Matthew M., was, when a babe, baptized by a Roman Catholic priest. Both father and mother were converted to Methodism in 1844. Matthew M. was kept constantly in the public schools until he was seventeen years of age, when he became an apprentice to a coach-maker. During the second year of his apprenticeship he was converted; and within one year from the time of his conversion, under a conviction that it was his duty to preach, he commenced studying Greek and Latin, placing his grammars in the tool-rack before him while at work. After serving three years in the shop, he commenced his classical course of study at Fally Seminary, at Fulton, Oswego Co., N. Y., where he prepared for college. Afterward he attended the Concord Biblical Institute (now the Boston Theological School), graduated therefrom in 1859. He is an alumnus, by honor, of the Syracuse University, located at Syracuse, N. Y., which, also, conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts in 1866. In April, 1860, he joined the New England Conference, and was located at Barre, Mass., where he remained one year. Upon the breaking out of the Civil War, in 1861, he enlisted and went to the front as first lieutenant in command of Co. "K," 21st Massachusetts Infantry, and was stationed in Lower Maryland, for the purpose of intercepting contraband trade between Baltimore and Richmond, Va. In 1862, by request of Governor John A. Andrew, he engaged in holding war meetings throughout the State, for the purpose of enlisting soldiers to fill up depleted regiments and to organize new ones, and continued at this work during most of the year 1863, enlisting many soldiers and taking them to the front, in the meantime supplying a pulpit in Warren, Mass. In the battle of Roanoke Island, he was exposed to great danger during the storming of a battery on that island, having his clothing riddled with bullets and his sword scabbard shot away. In 1864, he returned to the regular work of the ministry and was stationed at Laurel Street M. E. Church, Worcester, Mass. In 1865, he became pastor of the Woburn M. E. Church, where he remained until 1867, and then went to Stoneham, where he remained until 1870, being thus for six years virtually pastor of Boston churches. In 1867, he was elected Grand Worthy Chief Templar of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Massachusetts. In 1868, he was appointed chaplain of the International Lodge of North America, and in 1870, he was appointed chaplain of the Massachusetts State Prison, which he served, in connection with the Church at Stoneham, until the fall of 1870, when he was called to the pastorate of Grace M. E. Church, Chicago. After one year of successful work in this pastorate, the church edifice and every home occupied by members of the congregation was destroyed by the great fire. Of the nine hundred and sixty-three scholars belonging to the Sunday-school, not one had a home the next day. On Thursday following the fire, Rev. Mr. Parkhurst was re-appointed to the Church by Bishop Ames, and on the same day he telegraphed to Gilbert Haven, of Boston, for $2,000, to build a temporary structure in which to gather the people. Before one week had elapsed he had arrangements made for commencing to build. Early on the Sunday morning succeeding the fire (October 15), Rev. Mr. Parkhurst preached on the ruins of the church to several hundred of the congregation, who there met for the first time after the great calamity; and this prompt action undoubtedly saved Grace Church from disorganization. In the week following he left for New England to raise money toward re-building their church edifice, and in sixteen days returned with $20,000 pledged by generous-hearted people in the Eastern States for that purpose. Rev. Mr. Parkhurst was married May 3, 1860, to Miss Theresa Monroe, daughter of Barnabas Monroe, of Oswego County, N. Y. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church. While living in Woburn, Mass., they buried their first child born to them, Herbert Monroe, who died in 1865. Mrs. Parkhurst died March 31, 1872, leaving a little son eight days old, Gilbert Fowler, who died in October, 1882. The loss of his family and the arduous labors attendant upon the re-building of the church broke down Mr. Parkhurst's health, and he was unable to do any work before August, 1873. At this time he went to California, and continued on, westward, around the world, through Japan, China, India, Arabia, Egypt, the Holy Land, Greece, Italy, etc., to Scotland where he arrived in May, 1874. While assisting Moody and Sankey in their great revival in Scotland, he was a guest with Mr. Sankey, as his pastor (Mr. Sankey having united with Grace Church early in the spring of 1873), at the house of Mrs. George Thomson, at Sterling, Scotland. While there he became engaged to her youngest daughter, Mary A. C. Thomson, to whom he was married August 5, 1874, having in the meantime visited Ireland, England, the Rhine, Switzerland and France. On the 17th of September following, Rev. and Mrs. Parkhurst were given a reception by the congregation of Grace Church. In October, he was appointed pastor of the Michigan Avenue M. E. Church, and two years later was transferred to the First M. E. Church. After three years successful work here, he went to Scotland where he remained one year, engaged in settling up an estate and holding revival meetings, and also in speaking to crowds in England in connection with the Robert Raikes Sunday-school Centennial celebrations. Returning to America he was appointed to the pastorate of the First M. E. Church at Elgin, Ill., remaining until October, 1853, when he entered upon his present pastorate. During the trial of Rev. H. W. Thomas, Rev. Mr. Parkhurst was prosecutor for the Church in the preliminary trial, an account of which will be given hereafter. Dr. Parkhurst has been actively connected with the Lake Bluff Sunday-school Assembly since 1876. During his ministerial career, he has built five churches—one each in Warren, Woburn and Stoneham, Mass., Grace M. E. Church, Chicago, and one at Elgin, Ill. Dr. Parkhurst has four children by his present wife: Mary Ann, Isabel Catharine Thomson, George Thomson and Jane Margaret Drummond.

PARK-AVENUE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—This Church had its inception in 1858, when a few Methodist families, among them those of John Skelton, John Scribner, William Dockrell and Charles Radcliff, living west of Union Park, commenced holding weekly prayer-meetings. These meetings were continued nearly two years, at which time the City Mission Society made arrangements by which there was preaching on each Sunday afternoon.

The Church Extension Society soon afterward purchased a lot on the corner of Robey Street and Park Avenue, upon which the Society erected a building, under the direction of Rev. William F. Stewart. This edifice was dedicated in the spring of 1861, by Bishop Simpson, and the Society took the name of the Park-avenue Mission.

In the fall of 1862, an addition was made to the church-building. Rev. Mr. Chadwick was then in charge of the Society, as city missionary, having been appointed in 1861. In 1863, he was succeeded by Rev. Henry Whipple. On account of the continual growth of the Society in numbers, a still larger building was necessary; and Bishop Hamline leased a lot on the southeast corner of Robey Street and Park Avenue, for a term of ninety-nine years, without rent for the first ten years, and an annual rental thereafter of one hundred dollars a year, to be paid to the American Bible Society. Upon this lot a building was erected at a cost of $10,000. It was dedicated in 1865, as the Park-avenue Methodist Episcopal Church.

After the transfer of Rev. Henry Whipple, Rev. Luke Hitchcock and Rev. Dr. Hardin supplied the pulpit until the fall of 1866, when Rev. J. H. Bayliss became its first regular pastor. Rev. Mr. Bayliss remained three years, during which time the membership was greatly increased. A parsonage was also erected, an addition made to the church-building, an organ purchased, and other improvements made, at a total expenditure of $10,000. Dr. Bayliss was succeeded by Dr. H. W. Thomas, who, also, remained three years. Immediately after the great fire of 1871, the church-building was surrendered to the uses of the Relief Society, and was used by them until permanent arrangements were completed for the relief of the destitute.

THE WABASH-AVENUE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—In the preceding volume the history of this Society as the State-street Methodist Episcopal Church was traced to the erection and dedication of the new building on Wabash Avenue. The cost of the church was $65,000. This edifice* was completed just before the panic of 1857 began to be severely felt, but at the time of its completion the Society was in debt about $40,000. Through the exertions of the pastor, Rev. William M. D. Ryan, nearly one-half of this sum was paid.

In 1859, Rev. Mr. Ryan was succeeded by Rev. William Krebs, of Baltimore, and he, in 1860, by Rev. Henry Cox, from Portland, Maine, whose time expired in the fall of 1862. In the latter part of 1861, and the earlier part of 1862, the burden of debt was still oppressively felt, and the necessity of liquidating it clearly recognized. The difficulties encountered by the trustees were in part occasioned by the financial crisis of 1857 having rendered unavailable a considerable portion of assets relied upon, and the debt now aggregated about $25,000. In December, 1861, eight members pledged themselves to raise $17,000, provided the remainder should be procured. Rev. Mr. Cox, by personal appeals, succeeded in increasing the subscription to $20,000, and on Sunday, December 22, 1861, the question of completing the subscription being before the congregation, the remainder was subscribed.

In 1862, Rev. Robert Laird Collier was appointed pastor, and the Church, during his pastorate, was very prosperous. He remained three years, and was succeeded, in 1865, by Rev. Robert M. Hatfield, from Brooklyn, N. Y., who, in 1867, was succeeded by Rev. C. H. Fowler. In 1870, Rev. Mr. Hatfield again became pastor, and was succeeded, in 1871, by Rev. S. McChesney.

HALSTED-STREET METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was started as early as 1863, by certain individuals holding cottage prayer-meetings and open-air services. These were members of what was then Bridgeport Methodist Church, and they were assisted by students from Garrett Biblical Institute. In August, 1866, a Sunday-school was organized and a room rented at the corner of Halsted and Twenty-second streets. The membership increased to four hundred. In the fall of 1867, a lot was purchased on Halsted Street and a chapel was completed, under the superintendency of Rev. S. G. Lathrop, city missionary. This chapel was enlarged in 1869. Rev. Mr. Lathrop was succeeded, as pastor, by Revs. Thomas Craven, Alexander Youker and Samuel Paine.

ADA-STREET METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—A brief sketch of this Church, as the Owen-street Methodist Church, is in the preceding volume of this History. The sketch closed with a reference to the edifice erected in 1863, during the pastorate of Rev. W. D. Skelton. This had a seating capacity of five hundred, was finished August 1, 1865, and cost $9,500. In 1866, Rev. Robert Bently was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Skelton, who remained until 1868. In the fall of that year, Rev. J. Hartwell was appointed, and was followed in 1869 by Rev. W. F. Stewart. During his pastorate the church-building was sold to the Norwegian Methodist Episcopal Church, and the present large brick edifice was erected on Ada Street, between Fulton and Lake streets, since which time it has been known as the Ada-street Methodist Church. In 1870, Rev. T. R. Strobridge became pastor, and remained three years.

WESTERN-AVENUE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH had its origin, in 1867, in a Mission Sunday-school, started by Park-avenue Methodist Church, on Seymour Street, near Lake Street. This Mission was named the Central Park Mission Sunday-school. John Freeman was the first superintendent, and he was succeeded, in 1869, by B. W. Ellis. In the fall of 1870, preaching began to be sustained. Joseph W. Sparling, then a student at Garrett Biblical Institute and since a prominent minister of the Canada Wesleyan Conference, supplied the pulpit from October, 1870, to June, 1871, when he was succeeded by A. W. Patten, then a student, and who remained until the fall of 1871, when Rev. Alexander Youker took his place.

* A view of this church will be found in the article on the Post-office, the building having been used for that purpose after the fire of 1871.

THE INDIANA - AVENUE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—This Church was organized as a Mission in 1867, under the auspices of the Chicago Mission and Sunday-school Society. The First Methodist Church donated a lot on Indiana Avenue, between Thirty-second and Thirty-third streets. Upon this lot a building was erected by the contributions of different churches throughout the city, the money being raised mainly through the efforts of Rev. S. G. Lathrop, city missionary. The services were conducted in both English and German, under the pastoral direction of Mr. Lathrop. These services were first held in a small room in the rear of the building, which was furnished and dedicated by Rev. C. H. Fowler, about the last of the year 1867. The main part of the chapel was completed by the next spring, and was dedicated by Rev. C. H. Fowler.

During 1868-69, the German services were dispensed with; and in the summer of 1869 the City Missionary Society turned over the property to the members then worshipping there, and they organized the Indiana-avenue Methodist Episcopal Church on August 1, 1869. The first board of stewards was elected as follows: Messrs. S. W. Smith, D. Pride, Wicoff, Rose, Breasted, Hoffman, Elliot and McGrew. The property was, however, still held by the trustees of the First Methodist Episcopal Church. By the next Conference Rev. Hooper Crews was appointed pastor. On August 31, 1870, the organization was completed by the election of a board of trustees as follows: S. W. Smith, Amos Mansfield, Lemuel Richards, Frank B. Everett, Henry S. Towle, Andrew H. Reeves and Charles Busby. At the close of the conference year of 1870, there were ninety-four members. Rev. Mr. Crews was succeeded by Rev. Robert B. Sheppard.

In the spring of 1871, it was determined to erect a large edifice. A lot was purchased on Michigan Avenue, and the chapel on Indiana Avenue was sold. A new edifice was commenced on the Michigan Avenue lot, which was being erected at the time of the great fire of 1871. Pending the construction of this new edifice this Church worshiped in the First Presbyterian Church, at the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-first Street. In December, 1871, they occupied the basement of their new building, which was completed and dedicated February 5, 1872, Rev. C. H. Fowler again officiating.

LANGLEY-AVENUE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH originated in 1868, in the united efforts of Rev. S. G. Lathrop, city missionary, and Rev. S. A. W. Jewett, then pastor of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church. Religious services were begun by those interested in founding a new Church, and were held on Sunday evenings at the house of William H. Rand, from October, 1868, until about the middle of February, 1869, when Cleaver Hall, at the corner of Brooks Street and Drexel Boulevard was rented for the same purpose. On March 7, 1869, the Church was organized with twenty-one members, with the name Oakland Methodist Episcopal Church. Rev. Mr. Lathrop was succeeded by Rev. C. E. Mandeville, of Connecticut, as pastor, in May, 1869, and his pastorate continued until October, 1871.

At the Quarterly Conference, held in July, 1869, a legal organization of the Church was effected, and the following trustees were appointed: William H. Rand, A. F. Brown, T. G. Otis, T. Priest and C. DeWolf. In the spring of 1871, the lot on the corner of Langley Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street was purchased at a cost of $10,000, which was paid by the First Methodist Episcopal Church. The work of building the church was commenced on February 25, 1870. On the 6th of August following, the completed edifice was dedicated. The entire cost of the building was $12,000, all of which sum was paid at the time of its dedication, except $5,500, and it was subscribed on that day, but, owing to the effects of the great fire, a portion of the subscriptions could not be collected. The debt, however, was gradually reduced, and on January 1, 1878, only $2,000 remained unpaid. In the fall of 1871, Rev. C. G. Truesdell was appointed pastor and left the church to engage in relief work, rendered necessary by the great fire of that year.

HENRY WHITEHEAD, who died April 10, 1885, and who for forty-five years was known, in Chicago and the West, as "Father Whitehead"—a father, indeed, to the distressed and unfortunate, and an earnest Christian and unselfish servant of Methodism—was born at Chatham, England, June 17, 1810. When twenty-one years of age he came to America, bearing a local-preacher's license and letters of introduction from Richard Reese to Dr. Nathan Bangs and Dr. Cowles. He tarried briefly in New York City and Troy, N. Y., in which latter place he became associated with a mission to the Indians at Fort Mackinac, where he preached three months. With the currents of migration he came to Chicago in 1832, where he preached to the soldiers and the trader population. After erecting the first Methodist church-building in Chicago, he was admitted on probation in 1840, and sent to Root River mission; continued in 1841, and returned to the same work; admitted a full member, ordained a deacon, and sent to Troy, Wis., in 1842, and returned to that place in 1843; ordained, and sent to Sylvania, Wis., in 1844; appointed to Elk Grove, Wis., in 1845, and superannuated in 1846—this last event being caused by ill-health, induced by too close application to work and exposure to the elements, while pursuing his ministerial duties. Previous to preaching, Mr. Whitehead followed the trade of builder, but when he was superannuated he engaged in the book business, founding the Methodist Book Concern. He had the warm friendship of Orrington Lunt, Grant Goodrich, and other prominent citizens, and remained with the depository until 1871. After the fire he began the sale of Church and Sabbath-school singing books, a business he followed, with occasional preaching, until he died. As the oldest Methodist minister in Chicago—as the man who first located the site of the original local church of that denomination, and erected its first edifice—as a faithful servant to its principles, and a practical worker for the good of humanity—Mr. Whitehead has left behind him a record of good deeds that will never die. His children, four in number, inherit their father's sterling integrity, and are all well-known members of the community. William H. is president of the Chicago and Erie stove company; Edward J. is a lawyer; Carrie is the wife of Dr. Arthur Edwards, editor of the Christian Advocate; and Jennie, the remaining sister, who is unmarried, is connected with the Methodist Church as a useful worker and member. The highest encomium bestowed upon Mr. Whitehead among the many eulogies given, is the one which says: "This good man's splere, though he was often in the pulpit, was in the class and prayer-room, or by the bedside of some tried human being who hungered to be consoled by one who knew of God's dealings with men."

REV. ARTHUR EDWARDS, D.D., was born at Norwalk, Ohio, on November 23, 1834, the son of John and Mary Ann (Adams) Edwards. He was educated by an uncle, after whom he is named. It is beautifully said: "That the hand of Susannah Wesley rings the bell of every Methodist Church in the world"; it may be said, with equal truth, that the hand of Mary Ann Edwards writes those articles that have cheered, invigorated and comforted the thousands of readers of the Northwestern Christian Advocate. The later and academic education of Dr. Edwards was obtained at the Albion Seminary, Michigan, which he entered in 1850, and at the Ohio Wesleyan University from 1852 to 1858, where he determined on devoting himself to the ministry. In 1858, he graduated, and three months later he entered the Detroit Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and commenced his ministry at Marine City, Mich., where he remained for one year, and was then assigned to Detroit and Saginaw, Mich., remaining a year in each place. From Saginaw, he entered the army as chaplain of the 1st Michigan Infantry, which position he occupied for some three years, and from whence he went to a pastorate at Trenton, Mich., where he remained until he was appointed associate editor of the paper he at present edits. In the selection of Dr. Edwards for the position he has occupied so long, the Conference certainly chose the best possible man therefor. A genial, courteous Christian gentleman, a graceful yet forcible writer, a fluent and accomplished orator, a liberal and happy believer in Him whose religion he champions, Dr. Edwards has filled his position to the credit and honor of Methodism. In 1866, Dr. Edwards married Miss Carrie M. Whitehead, daughter of Rev. Henry Whitehead of the Rock River Conference. At his home, Dr. Edwards is at his best; possessing a wife in whom are centered Christian virtues and those qualities that make a perfect lady, his home atmosphere is one of harmony, purity and restful happiness. They have three children—Robin, Grace and Alice. Dr. Edwards is chaplain of the Illinois Commandery of the Loyal Legion of the United States.

PORTLAND-AVENUE GERMAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was opened, July, 1869, as Tyng Mission, at the corner of Wentworth Avenue and Archer Road. The VanBuren-street Church gave the Mission two lots at the corner of Twenty-eighth Street and Portland Avenue, and in the following fall the Mission itself purchased the mission-building on the corner of Indiana Avenue and Thirty-second Street, which belonged to the Michigan-avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, paying therefor $1,500. The Tyng Mission was then organized into a Church, under the above name, with thirteen members. The first pastor was Rev. George H. Simons, who commenced his labors in July, 1870, and remained until September, 1872, under whom the membership increased to seventy, and the property became worth $6,000.

REV. GEORGE L. MULFINGER, pastor of the First German Society of the German Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Nuremberg, Bavaria, November 4, 1810, the son of John and Anna Margaret (Kramer) Mulfinger. They came to this country in 1834, and settled in Hamerton, Ohio. Previous to coming to America George attended school in Germany; and after arriving in Ohio, went to the Hamerton School three months, where he studied the English language. He then learned the trade of baker and confectioner. In 1839, he established himself in business in Lawrenceburg, Ind., and continued it until 1845. In 1839, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1842 he was licensed as a local-preacher in Lawrenceburg until 1845. He then joined the Ohio Conference, and was ordained deacon in 1846. He was made elder in 1849. From 1845 to 1847 he had charge of the Fort Wayne Mission. He was then stationed on the circuit containing Ripley, Switzerland, Franklin and Dearborn counties, from 1847 to 1849. From 1849 to 1851, he was stationed in St. Louis, Mo. In 1851, he was chosen presiding elder of the Wisconsin district, then the largest in the West. In 1854, this district was divided into the Wisconsin and the Chicago districts, Rev. Mr. Mulfinger being then chosen presiding elder of the latter. From 1855 to 1860, he was presiding elder of the Iowa district, and in the latter year was stationed at Quincy, Ill., as preacher in the German Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1864, he was again made presiding elder of the Chicago district, and in 1868 he was stationed at the Clybourn-avenue German Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1870, he was sent to Aurora; in 1872 to the Ashland-avenue Church, Chicago; and in 1874 to the Maxwell-street Church. In 1876, he was made presiding elder of the Milwaukee district; in 1879, again of the Chicago district; and in 1883 was appointed pastor of the First German Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago, his present charge. Rev. Mr. Mulfinger was married August 11, 1839, to Miss Anna Maria Schathauer. They have had eleven children, five of whom are now living: Anna Margaret, now Mrs. William Bach, Dr. John Mulfinger, Rev. Julius Augustus, Mary, now Mrs. Henry Apffelbach, and George Abraham, at present a theological student in the Northwestern University.

REV. C. A. LOEBER, presiding elder of the German Methodist Episcopal Church was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, January 27, 1832, the son of C. and Catherine (Rieger) Locher. His education was received in the public schools of his native place until he was fourteen years old, when he attended the high school one year, graduating in 1847. At this school he studied the English language, Latin and French. For two years he attended Giesen College, and in 1849 he came to the United States. He then went to Albany, N. Y., where he remained a short time, and came to Chicago in 1850. Here he took charge of the German Department of the Methodist Book Concern, remaining in that position two years, and in 1852 joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, being licensed as a local-preacher. He was at first engaged in establishing Sunday-schools in different parts of Chicago, and has since been engaged in various places in the Western States as preacher and presiding elder, up to the present time, as follows: Peru, Ill., 1854-55; Michigan City, Ind., 1855-56; LaPorte, Ind., 1857-58; Burlington, Iowa, 1859-60; Milwaukee, 1861-62; Watertown, Wis., 1862-63; Aurora, Ill., 1864-65; VanBuren-street Church, Chicago, 1866-67; he was presiding elder of the Milwaukee district during the year 1868-69, and of the Chicago district from 1869 to 1872; he then had charge of the VanBuren-street Church four years, from 1872 to 1876, and of the Maxwell-street Church, three years, 1877 to 1879. He was then presiding elder of the Milwaukee district four years, 1880 to 1883 inclusive; and then of the Chicago district again, the duties of which position he is now performing. Rev. Mr. Loeber was married, in 1854, to Miss Louisa Waller, by whom he has had eleven children—nine of whom, four daughters and five sons, are still living.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—In 1858, this Church had recently occupied its new edifice at the corner of Washington and Green streets, and its pastor was Rev. W. W. Patton. About the time of the beginning of Dr. Patton's ministry, the First Congregational Society became a body distinct from the Church, adopted a constitution of its own; and a compact was entered into between the Church and the Ecclesiastical Society, which may be found in the manual of the Church for 1875. On the 1st of January, 1864, on beginning the eighth year of his pastorate, Dr. Patton reviewed the progress of the Church during the seven years immediately preceding. The debt of $25,000, which existed in January, 1856, had been paid, and during the thirteen years of the existence of the Church it had paid on its lots, edifice, organ, etc., $40,000; for current expenses, $45,000, and for charitable purposes, $65,000. Seven hundred and fifty-five members had been received, two hundred and fifty-one on profession of faith, and there were then about five hundred in regular standing.

The war record of this Church is worthy of recital. Starting out as an anti-slavery organization, when the Civil War came, believing, as it did, that slavery was its cause, it passed various resolutions upon that subject, and sent copies of its resolutions to the President of the United States. It urged enlistments into the army, and its roll of honor bears the names of sixty-nine who fought in that struggle. Dr. Patton was from the first a warm advocate of emancipation. He was chairman of a committee chosen by the citizens of Chicago to go to Washington and to present an address to President Lincoln regarding the freeing of the slaves, and met with a most kindly reception.

About the close of 1865, Dr. Patton made a tour of Europe and of Palestine. He returned in March, 1867, and was given a noteworthy reception. Within a year, he retired from the pastorate, having been with the Church almost eleven years. During that time, there had been received into the Church seven hundred and seventy-six persons—three hundred by profession and four hundred and seventy-six by letter. The number of enrolled members at the close of his pastorate was five hundred and forty-two. After the retirement of Dr. Patton, Rev. Edward Payson Goodwin was called, and was installed January 5, 1868. Soon afterward it became necessary to erect a new church-edifice, which was accordingly done, at the corner of West Washington and Ann streets. The corner-stone of the new building was laid July 10, 1869, and the completed edifice was dedicated June 5, 1870. The audience-room had a seating capacity for two thousand persons, and was approached by seven distinct entrances. A gallery extended around the four sides of the room, and seated seven hundred persons. One of the largest and finest of Hook's organs was erected in the Church, in July, 1870. The entire cost of this magnificent temple of worship, including furniture and organ, was $180,000. At the time of the dedication, there was a debt of $80,000, to which fact attention was called by T. M. Avery, and in a few minutes $72,000 were raised. This church-building, on the next day after the great fire, became the headquarters of the city government and Relief Society, an account of which is given in the history of the Fire, together with a view of the building.

NEW ENGLAND CHURCH.—The New England Congregational Church, at the opening of the second period of this history, was in charge of Rev. Samuel C. Bartlett, as pastor. Having been appointed to a professorship in the Chicago Theological Seminary, Rev. Mr. Bartlett resigned his pastorate, and, after a few months, was succeeded by Rev. Samuel Wolcott, of Providence, R. I., who was installed September 27, 1859, and remained with the Church two years. Rev. William B. Clarke preached three months of 1862, and on October 1, of that year, Rev. Starr H. Nichols entered upon his duties as stated supply, resigning in May, 1865. From that time until November, 1865, the pulpit was supplied principally by local ministers, Rev. John P. Gulliver, of Norwich, Conn., preaching during August. Rev. Mr. Gulliver entered upon his duties as pastor in November, and was installed in February, 1866. He resigned on the 22d of July, 1868, to accept the presidency of Knox College. Until October, 1869, the pulpit was filled by transient clergymen, and of these Rev. S. Hopkins Emery remained about six months. Sometime during the summer of 1869, a unanimous call was extended to Rev. Leander T. Chamberlain, at the time a student in Andover Theological Seminary. On October 27, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church, and remained until September 1, 1877.

Notwithstanding the numerous changes in pastors, the Church continued steadily to increase in numbers and completed house of worship was dedicated on February 7, 1867. It was located at the corner of White and Dearborn streets. The building was of massive rough Athens marble, with cut trimmings, in the cruciform shape and Gothic style. On each side of the doorway was a pillar of highly polished Scotch marble, and above were three niches, with the following contents and inscriptions: The first niche to the left contained a piece of stone from the first church in Scotland where the Congregational polity was adopted, with the appropriate inscription, "Scrooby Manor, A. D. 1606"; the second contained a fragment of rock from the spot where the Puritans last worshipped in the Old World, and bore the inscription, "Delft Haven, July, 1620"; and the third niche contained a fragment of the stone upon which the feet of the Puritans first rested in the New World, and was inscribed, "Plymouth Rock, December 22, 1620." The interior of the building was very attractive, the wood-work being of black walnut, handsomely carved and ornamented. This elegant church-edifice was destroyed by the great fire of 1871.

RUINS, NEW ENGLAND CHURCH.

THE PLYMOUTH CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—This period of the history of this Church opens under the pastorate of Rev. Joseph E. Roy, who remained until July 1, 1860, when his resignation went into effect. During the remainder of this year, and the spring of 1861, the pulpit was supplied by Rev. J. L. Corning of Milwaukee, who, on account of ill health, was unable to continue to supply the pulpit, and, for a considerable period, the Church depended upon the professors in the Chicago Theological Seminary. Rev. Mr. Shipherd was installed pastor on June 9, 1862, and resigned in February, 1864. Rev. Harvey D. Kitchel, D. D., of Detroit, commenced his labors in this Church on November 24, 1864, and remained until July 1, 1866. The period of his pastorate was a peculiarly trying one. The old house of

NEW ENGLAND CHURCH.

in strength. In 1858, its building was enlarged. In 1863, an organ was purchased, another church lot bought, and the church-building removed to the new location. The corner-stone of the new church-building was laid with appropriate ceremonies on August 10, 1865, and the worship on Third Avenue was exchanged for the new church-edifice at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Eldridge Court; but for some time after leaving the Third Avenue building, the Church was temporarily accommodated with a place of worship in Smith &

Nixon's Hall, at the corner of Clark and Washington streets, holding its first meeting there December 25, 1864, and its last, May 28, 1865. Arrangements were then made for the use of the basement of the First Unitarian Church, near the corner of Wabash Avenue and Hubbard Court, until the completion too dear to the members to be surrendered, and when they saw that in jeopardy, they made a strenuous effort to save it. On April 24, 1859, Rev. Mr. Bartle retired from the pastorate, and about a dozen of the members separated themselves from communion with the South Congregational Church for the purpose of forming the nucleus of a new church organization.

On May 24, 1859, a call was extended to Rev. James H. Dill, of Spencerport, N. Y. He began his pastorate on May 29, and the work of the Church became a matter of more deep concern to all of the members. The church debt had up to this time rested upon it like an incubus. Rev. Mr. Dill determined that it should be removed, and it was mainly through his persistent efforts, and in part owing to his individual contributions, that its liquidation was finally effected. But the most generous donations were made toward this object by Colonel C. G. Hammond and Deacon Philo Carpenter. Rev. Mr. Dill resigned his pastorate on May 11, 1862, to enter the army as chaplain, and soon afterward he was of the basement of their own new church-edifice. The corner-stone of the latter was laid in July, 1865, and the lecture-room and parlors were completed and dedicated April 15, 1866. The main audience room was completed about October 1, 1867, and on the 13th of that month it was formally dedicated by Rev. Lewis E. Matson. This stately edifice was of stone, and substantially built, tastefully and richly finished, and was capable of seating fifteen hundred persons. The entire cost of the building was $100,000.

SITE OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH, CORNER OF MADISON AND DEARBORN STREETS.

The dedicatory sermon was the initial sermon of Rev. Lewis E. Matson, who had been called May 21, 1866. On account of ill health, Rev. Mr. Matson preached only four additional sermons. Being granted leave of absence, he sailed for France, February 28, 1868, and died in Lyons, June 21, of the same year, at the age of twenty-nine. He was a man of remarkable intellectual gifts. His death was a great disappointment to the Church, and was mourned by its members with heart-felt sorrow.

On the 25th of November, 1868, an invitation was extended to Rev. William Alvin Bartlett of Brooklyn, N. Y., to become pastor of Plymouth Church. The call was accepted, and, after preaching a few sermons in December and in January, 1869, he entered upon his stated labors in February. On April 22, 1869, he was regularly installed, and the Church at once began to increase its attendance, revenues and membership and to materially decrease its debt. In the spring of 1871, a fine organ was built at a cost of $10,000.

SOUTH CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.—The opening of the year 1858, found this Church financially embarrassed. The original organization of the Church was commissioned chaplain of the 89th Illinois Infantry. He served in that capacity until his duties were terminated by death January 14, 1863.

Rev. William B. Wright of Cincinnati, was invited to succeed Mr. Dill, and commenced his labors with the Church on the 2d of November. On the 2d of December he was ordained, but, although after a satisfactory engagement of one year, he was requested by both Church and Society to become settled pastor, he was never installed. Five years of active labor made marked inroads upon his health, and, in July, 1867, at his own request, his labors terminated, in order to seek a change of climate. During his ministry the debt of the Society was entirely cancelled, the church-building enlarged and re-furnished, and sixty-six members added to the roll.

During the remainder of the year 1867, the pulpit of this church was occupied by various persons; and in December a call was extended to Rev. Charles M. Tyler, of Natick, Mass., who entered upon his duties January 19, 1868, and was regularly installed on the 6th of February. Toward the latter part of the year, on account of having labored ten years in the ministry, Rev. Mr. Tyler felt the need of a vacation, and the Church and Society granted him a four months' leave of absence to travel in Europe. During his absence, Prof. F. W. Fisk supplied the pulpit.

In 1868, the new church-lot, at the corner of Indiana Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, was paid for, and preliminary steps taken toward the erection of a new church-edifice, the congregation having steadily increased in numbers. In the summer of 1869, a commodious house of worship was erected on the new lot, costing, including the furniture, $26,800. It was first used August 29, 1869, and dedicated September 12, 1869, Rev. William A. Bartlett preaching the dedicatory sermon.

EDWARDS CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized by the action of an Ecclesiastical Council, on May 11, 1854. Its house of worship, which was at the corner of Desplaines and VanBuren streets, was dedicated May 13. The church-building was small but neat, and the seats were free. Rev. Mr. Nichols remained pastor until early in 1857, when he was succeeded by Rev. W. C. Foster, who preached his first sermon August 9, 1857. In 1858, the Church extended a call to Rev. Jeremiah Porter, who was the first Presbyterian minister in Chicago, and who had just closed an eighteen years' pastorate at Green Bay, Wis. His first sermon was preached July 11. In the following September the chapel was removed to the corner of Harrison and Halsted streets. Under Rev. Mr. Porter's ministrations, the membership of the Church rapidly increased, and the Church resolved to erect a new edifice.

Washington A. Nichols"

Rev. Jeremiah Porter remained pastor until 1861, and was succeeded by Rev. A. L. Brooks, who had been pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church. Rev. Mr. Brooks commenced his labors with this Church March 16, 1862. By July, the church-building was enlarged to double its former capacity, this plan being finally decided upon instead of the erection of a new edifice. It was decided to change the connection of the Church from the Congregational to the Presbyterian denomination, and its name was consequently changed to the Edwards Presbyterian Church, q. v.

THE UNION PARK CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized May 22, 1860, but previous to this time there had been services and a Mission Sunday-school looking toward this event. This Mission Sunday-school was started by the First Congregational Church, on West Washington Street, near Wood Street, in June, 1858, and in the following fall, a plain frame building was erected, with reference to its future use as a church. In 1859, an agreement was made between the officers of the First Church and the Chicago Theological Seminary, by which the building was removed at the expense of the latter, to the corner of Reuben Street (now Ashland Avenue) and West Washington Street, a part of the agreement being that the ownership of the building should be transferred to a Congregational Church, whenever one should be established in that neighborhood. The Seminary took possession of the building in October, 1859, and on Sunday, January 7, 1860, regular services commenced to be held therein by Professors Haven, Fisk and Bartlett, of the Seminary. The council for the organization of the Church met in the Seminary chapel May 22, 1860, and nineteen persons then entered into covenant with the Church, as follows: Rev. Joseph Haven, Mrs. Mary E. Haven, Rev. Samuel C. Bartlett, Mrs. Mary L. Bartlett, Rev. Franklin W. Fisk, Mrs. Amelia A. Fisk, E. B. Rockwell, Mrs. E. B. Rockwell, Charles H. Cushing, Mrs. Harriet D. Cushing, Mrs. Frederika Thomas, James Thomas, Barnard Thomas, Mrs. Sarah McKee, Charles H. Stoughton, Mrs. Harriet A. Singer, Mrs. Ellen M. Tweedale, Abraham Voorhees and Mrs. Camilla Voorhees.

The professors of Chicago Theological Seminary

continued to supply the pulpit until October 7, 1866, with the exception of the summer of 1862, when the pulpit was filled by Rev. Norman A. Millard.

In 1865, the church-building was removed from the north side of Washington Street to its present location, and, after being remodeled and enlarged, it was reopened in January, 1866. On the first Sunday of the following October, Rev. C. D. Helmer commenced his labors as pastor with this Church. The church-building was again enlarged in 1867, and was burned on February 21, 1869. By April, the Society had determined to erect a new edifice, on the site of the one destroyed, which should be one of the finest in the city. The corner-stone was laid on August 7, 1869, and the new building was dedicated November 12, 1871. It is of Lake Superior sandstone, is capable of seating two thousand persons, and its cost was about $125,000.

THE TABERNACLE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized May 27, 1866. In 1857, two schools were established by the First Congregational Church. One was named the Industrial Mission, and was located on North Union Street, near the river, and had for its object the teaching of plain sewing and reading to girls, holding week-day sessions, conducted by Mrs. Julia A. Warner. A Sunday-school was soon connected with it. In the same year, North Mission was opened, on Rucker Street, near Fourth. These two schools were ultimately consolidated, and named the Tabernacle Mission, and permanently located at the corner of Indiana and Morgan streets. Dr. J. H. Hollister, T. T. Gurney and Major D. W. Whittle were successively in charge of the enterprise, and, finally, the Tabernacle Congregational Church was organized. A church-building was erected at a cost of about $20,000, with a seating capacity for fifteen hundred people, and Rev. J. W. Healey was called to the pastorate. He remained with the Church until October 16, 1868, when, on account of failing health, he tendered his resignation. Rev. E. F. Williams then became pastor, and remained in that relation until October 16, 1873.

BETHANY CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized October 11, 1868. It was the outgrowth of a Sunday-school established March 28, 1858, by fifteen teachers from the Union Park Baptist Church, in the school-house on Rose Street, near Chicago Avenue, and was known as the Rose street Mission. The name was afterward changed to the Chicago-avenue Mission, and, still later, to the Hope Mission. In 1862, the school was disbanded, but many of the teachers and scholars became members of a school which Curtis L. North had previously organized on Reuben Street.

In 1864, the North Mission was established by the First Congregational Church, which was sustained by teachers from that Church and students from the Chicago Theological Seminary, until it was transferred to the present Bethany Congregational Church, on Huron Street. On July 23, 1867, the officers and teachers formed a religious society. The original members of the society were Henry W. Rice, John C. Wiswall, L. P. Lyman, Edward A. Moseley, K. M. Bissell, Robert J. Jeneson, Elijah Rathbun, James F. Bradley, Ezra A. Cook and Theodore B. Wells. In December following, the Society purchased three lots on Huron Street, and in July, 1868, completed the building in which Bethany Church now worships, at a cost of $3,050. In May, 1868, James Harrison was regularly engaged as missionary for this field, and, in October, the Church was formally organized by a council, of which Rev. C. D. Helmer was moderator. On Sunday, the 11th, the Church was recognized, Rev. E. P. Goodwin preaching the sermon. James Harrison was ordained December 17, 1868, and remained pastor until near the close of 1871.

CHICAGO THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—In the first volume of this History the struggles of the Seminary, with reference to its property, were recounted until, in 1862, it had come into possession of an unincumbered site facing Union Park. The second period of the history may be properly introduced although it is not in strict chronological order, by the continuation of its successes in the accumulation of property and the erection of buildings.

The inadequacy of its grounds fronting on Union Park, soon led to further efforts to secure a more suitable location. In April, 1862, Philo Carpenter offered to take the lots on the corner of West Washington Street and Ashland Avenue, and give the Seminary, in exchange, the ground on the northwest corner of Ashland and Warren avenues, also fronting on Union Park. This exchange involved a gift by Mr. Carpenter of $7,000, and was in lieu of a previous conditional donation of $5,000 to the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History. The Board, recognizing the continued liberality of Mr. Carpenter, resolved to name the main building to be erected "Carpenter Hall."

The first building occupied by the Chicago Theological Seminary was the First Congregational Church, the parlors of which were used at the opening of the Seminary, October 6, 1858, as the chapel, lecture and recitation rooms. In 1859, the First Congregational Church offered to the Seminary, for five years, the use of an unfinished mission-building, standing a few blocks west of Union Park. This was removed to the corner of West Washington Street and Ashland Avenue, and enlarged to meet the necessities of the Institution.

The first permanent building erected was that known as Keyes Hall, which was completed in the fall of 1865. It was named after Willard Keyes, of Quincy, Ill., who had given a block of land in that city toward endowing the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History, the avails of which were, with his consent, diverted to the purpose of erecting this hall. It contained studies, rooms for general use, and dormitories for thirty-eight students. But when completed it was found inadequate to meet the wants of the Seminary.

The next building erected was "Carpenter Hall," the north wing of which was begun in 1868. In 1869, this wing was ready for use. It contains a chapel, lecture-room and twenty suites of rooms for students.

After four years of preparatory struggle, the Chicago Theological Seminary was formally opened October 6, 1858, in the parlors of the First Congregational Church. A portion of the board of directors, two professors, and ten students were in attendance. The professors at the time were Rev. Joseph Haven, D.D., and Rev. Samuel C. Bartlett, D.D. The examination of students was assigned for the next day, and when the Seminary's work was fairly begun there were twenty-nine students enrolled.

The inauguration of Rev. Joseph Haven, as Illinois Professor of Systematic Theology, took place on the 20th of October, and that of Rev. Samuel C. Bartlett as New England Professor of Biblical Literature on the 21st. Thus was the Seminary fairly started on its mission. But notwithstanding many difficulties had been overcome, there yet remained numerous trials with which the Seminary must contend, numerous practical questions to be put to the test and settled.

Proposed Union with Oberlin.—The informal attempt, made in 1857, to effect a union with Oberlin has been referred to. No further movement was made in this direction until June, 1869, when Hon. C. G. Hammond, Revs. A. S. Kedzie and H. Foote, members of the board of directors, were sent to Oberlin with a formal proposal for the transfer of the Theological Department of Oberlin College, with its funds and professors, to Chicago. The chief reason for the proposed transfer was that many of the churches of the Northwest felt a warm interest in Oberlin, and were at the same time officially connected with the Chicago Theological Seminary, through the Triennial Convention. The trustees of Oberlin College declined the proposal for several reasons, principal among them being their doubts as to the legality of such a transfer, and that the Oberlin Seminary had a peculiar work to do in training ministers for the opening fields in the Southern States.

The Seminary's Funds.—The endowment of the Seminary was begun in 1855 by Rev. Stephen Peet, the first president and financial agent of the Seminary. After his death it was augmented by the labors of his successor, Rev. Adam S. Kedzie. Previous to the opening of the Seminary in October, 1858, several scholarships had been endowed. The professorships did not become productive, and the scholarships only partly so, during the first five years of its existence, and the expenses of the Seminary, including the salaries of the professors, were paid from the general fund.

The net nominal assets of the Seminary, on October 20, 1858, amounted to $149,474.21. Of this sum $82,132.10 was in real estate, and most of the remainder in subscription notes to the general fund and to professorships and scholarships. But very little cash was in the treasury with which to meet current expenses. Many of the subscription notes became due in five annual installments. When they matured, many of the makers of them found it beyond their power to pay them, the country not having yet recovered from the commercial crisis of 1857. A few years later came the Civil War, and among the volunteers for the defense of the Union were many who had signed obligations to the Seminary. Some of these volunteers never returned. And though an admirable system of collections was persistently pushed by the Treasurer, collections could not be made, and, in 1861, there were due the Seminary $101,980.59.

To avert the failure which seemed impending, strenuous efforts were made. The three members of the faculty voluntarily reduced their respective salaries, and the treasurer, L. D. Olmsted, having died in the winter of 1862-63, and the general agent, Rev. A. S. Kedzie, having resigned, the two offices were combined by the appointment of Rev. H. L. Hammond, at a salary of $1,000. A proposition was made to the General Associations of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa that, by special contributions for three years, they should raise sufficient to pay the salaries of the professors, $6,000. The proposition was cordially received, but, through all these efforts, only $4,000 per annum were raised. In the summer vacation, the professors, by request of the board of directors, went to New England, and by appeals to friends there, secured relief to the amount of $4,000; and thus, by various means, notwithstanding prophecies of failure, the Seminary was kept alive. During this year the indebtedness of the Seminary was reduced from $28,000 to $8,000.

Endowments.—The professorships, already mentioned as having been secured during the agency of Rev. A. S. Kedzie, did not become available. The donation by Willard Keyes, of Quincy, Ill., for endowing the Chair of Ecclesiastical History was diverted to the erection of Keyes Hall; and the donation by Philo Carpenter of land in Chicago, the avails of which were to have been used in endowing the Chair of Biblical Theology, was, with his consent, devoted to other uses of the Seminary. In April, 1863, Philo Carpenter, recognizing the necessity of such endowments, made a proposition to the board of directors, to himself give $5,000 toward the endowment of each of three professorships, on condition that the board raised $20,000 additional for each professorship. Professor Fisk being called to labor in Plymouth Church, Milwaukee, made such a favorable impression upon its members, that they heartily undertook the task of endowing his professorship, and raised the $20,000—Professor Fisk himself raising $3,000 among his friends in Boston, Mass. Thus was the "Wisconsin Professorship of Sacred Rhetoric" endowed.

The Professorship of Biblical Literature was assigned to New England. After $5,000 had been subscribed in Illinois, $3,000 by the New England Church, of Chicago, $1,000 by Rev. W. A. Nichols, of Chicago, and $1,000 by Moses Pettingill, of Peoria, Professor Bartlett made three trips to the East, and succeeding in raising, in notes and cash, $25,000. Thus was endowed the "New England Professorship of Biblical Literature."

Professor Haven undertook the work of raising the $20,000 needed to complete the endowment of the Chair of Systematic Theology. New England contributed toward this endowment $2,050; St. Louis, Mo., $500; and Terre Haute, Ind., $300, while Illinois contributed $14,000. Previous to the meeting of the Third Triennial Convention, April 27, 1864, $1,450 additional had been secured by the labors of Revs. E. N. Lewis, J. W. Case, H. M. Daniels, C. A. Leach, J. C. Roy and others—thus endowing, within $1,700, the "Illinois Professorship of Systematic Theology."

By the year 1867, each of these endowments had been raised to over $30,000. In 1868, the Churches in Michigan began to vigorously push the work of endowing the Chair of Ecclesiastical History. Their work would doubtless have met with success had it not been rendered unnecessary by a legacy to this Chair of $30,000 by Mrs. Mary J. Sweetzer, whose death occurred October 7, 1870.

The Iowa Professorship of Pastoral Theology and Special Studies was partly endowed by that State in 1869.

So, in 1871, there were four endowed Professorships in the Seminary and one partially endowed.

The scholarships endowed since 1858, at the opening of the Seminary, are as follows: The Tilson scholarship of $1,500, founded by Joseph Tilson, became productive April 1, 1864; the Depew scholarship, by Mrs. Margaret Depew, became productive at the same time; the Billings scholarship, of $1,500 by Horace Billings; the Deer Park, of $1,500, by the Deer Park, Ill., Congregational Church; and the Olivet, of $1,500, by the Olivet, Michigan, Congregational Church,—were all established prior to April, 1864, and the total productive scholarship fund was then slightly in excess of $7,500. By the year 1867 there had been established twenty-two, and in 1870, twenty-six—the aggregate of scholarship endowments being $31,114 82, of which $18,623.04 had become productive.

Thus, when the great fire of 1871 came upon the city, the Seminary had become possessed of a valuable site on the corner of Ashland and Warren avenues. Its original cost was $36,000, and in 1871 it was valued at $60,000. On this lot, two buildings had been erected—Keyes Hall, valued at $25,000, and Carpenter Hall, at $40,000. A library of five thousand volumes had been accumulated, valued at $6,000, and the total assets of the Seminary had reached the sum of $275,587.53, while the net assets were $254,036.72.

The Seminary started with two professors—Joseph Haven in the Chair of Systematic Theology, and Samuel C. Bartlett in that of Biblical Literature. On April 28, 1859, Rev. Franklin W. Fisk was inaugurated professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Homiletics. On September 21, 1869, Rev. James T. Hyde was elected professor of Pastoral Theology and Special Studies; and in 1870, Professor Haven, while absent in Europe, resigned the professorship of Systematic Theology, which remained vacant until September 14, 1871, at which time Rev. George N. Boardman, D.D., was inaugurated.

Including the eleven students who graduated in April, 1871, there had been graduated from the regular course of study one hundred and six students, and from the special course, twenty. The total number of students in attendance in the regular course up to this time was three hundred and seventy-seven, and in the special course seventy-six.

The smallest number of graduates in the regular course was in 1860, when there was but one, while the largest number was in 1869, sixteen. In the special course there had been graduates in only six years.

REV. FRANKLIN WOODBURY FISK, D.D., professor of Sacred Rhetoric in the Chicago Theological Seminary, was born in Hopkinton, N. H., February 16, 1820. On his father's side, he is descended from an ancient English family, which traces its genealogy back to Symond Fiske, Lord of the Manor of Stradhaugh, parish of Laxfield, County of Suffolk, England. Symond Fiske lived in the reigns of Henry V. and VI., and was entitled to a coat-of-arms. Several of his descendants gained a reputation for piety and liberal culture, and, during the protracted period of the Reformation, and more especially during the days of Queen Mary, suffered severe persecutions on account of their firm adherence to evangelical principles; and one of them, to escape being burned at the stake, was concealed many months in the dark obscurity of a cellar, where he labored diligently by candle-light for his own support. Robert Fiske was fourth in descent from the above mentioned Symond, and was the father of John and William Fiske, who, together with their mother and two sisters, embarked for America in 1637. They settled with their families at Wenham, then part of Salem, Mass., in 1640. The former had been ordained in the English Church, and became a noted and influential minister in the colony. William Fiske was also a man of mark, and was the progenitor, in this country, of that branch of the Fiske family to which Rev. Franklin W. Fisk belongs. The change of the mode of spelling the name was made between 1728 and 1765. His father was Ebenezer Fisk, who was the son of Deacon Ebenezer Fisk, of Amherst, Mass. His mother was Hannah (Proctor) Fisk, daughter of Deacon John Proctor, of Henniker, N. H. At an early age he left home and worked one or two years with his brother, John Proctor Fisk, in the factories of the Merrimac Corporation, at Lowell, Mass. In the fall of 1835, he entered, in company with his brother, Phillips Academy, at Andover, Mass. Having no pecuniary means, he was obliged to teach school alternately with his study in the Academy, until he had completed his course at Andover. He taught in Methuen and East Abington, Mass., and in Fairton, Bridgeton and Burlington, N. J. In September, 1845, he entered Yale College, from which institution he was graduated in 1849, with the highest honors, being valedictorian of his class. He then entered the Theological Department of Yale College, and was graduated from it in 1852. He was licensed to preach July 19, of that year; was a tutor in Yale College from 1851 to 1853; and, from January to May, 1853, he was a student in Andover Theological Seminary. From May until November, 1853, he traveled in Europe. While abroad, he was appointed professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in Beloit College, Wisconsin, and entered upon his duties there in April, 1854, having abandoned, for a time, the idea of entering the ministry on account of disease of the eyes. He remained in Beloit College until July, 1859. In April, 1856, he was elected to the Chair of Sacred Rhetoric in the Chicago Theological Seminary, and was one of the first three professors that accepted appointments in this institution.—Rev. Joseph Haven, D.D., and Rev. Samuel C. Bartlett, D.D. being; the other two. He was inaugurated as professor April 28, 1859, and was at the same time ordained to the gospel ministry. He entered on his duties in connection with his present professorship in the fall of 1859, a year after the Seminary was opened for the reception of students. His professorship, which thus extends over a period of twenty-six years, has been eminently successful, and satisfactory to the authorities and friends of the Seminary. Professor Fisk received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Olivet College, Michigan, on June 29, 1865. He was elected president of the Chicago Congregational Club for 1884, and is one of the authors of a work entitled "Current Discussions in Theology." He has published a work on Homiletics, entitled a "Manual of Preaching." Professor Fisk was married March 9, 1854, to Mrs. Amelia A. Austin, formerly Miss Amelia Allen Bowen, daughter of the late George Bowen, of Woodstock, Conn. They have three children—Franklin Proctor, who graduated at Beloit College in 1878, and was married to Miss Kate L. Tanner, of Rockford, Ill., December 27, 1881; Emelia Maria; and Henry E., who graduated at Yale College in 1883.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.—In the first volume, the history of this Church closes with the pastorate of Rev. W. G. Howard, D.D., who resigned in 1859. In May of that year he was succeeded by Rev. W. W. Everts, D.D., of Louisville, Ky. Within six months after his arrival, he paid off a debt of $14,000 on the old building at the corner of LaSalle and Washington streets. During 1860, the New-street Mission Sabbath-school was removed to a more eligible field of labor, and was thereafter known as the Shields' Mission Sabbath-school of the First Baptist Church, being named after the noble Christian lady who donated most of the $5,000 which the lot and the improvement of building cost. In 1869, this Mission was removed to Twenty-fifth Street, near Wentworth Avenue. It was afterward organized into an independent Church, under the name of the Twenty-fifth-street Church.

During the same year the Bremer-avenue School, which was also under the care of this Church, was removed to the corner of Division and Sedgwick streets. Lots were purchased, and a beautiful and commodious house erected, combining the purposes of school-house and church, at a cost of $30,000. The name was changed to the North Star Mission. The building was dedicated in 1862. In 1863, this Church erected a brick structure on Indiana Avenue, near Ridgely Place, at a cost of nearly $8,000. The building was dedicated April 12, 1863, and the Church was named the Indiana-avenue Baptist Church.

In the meantime the site occupied by the First Baptist Church had become the center of trade, and it was deemed advisable to change the location of their church-edifice. On February 15, 1864, it was voted to sell the property on the corner of LaSalle and Washington streets for the sum of $65,000; not less than one-third of which should be devoted to the aid of other Baptist churches, and the other two-thirds, with other property and contributions of the Society, should be devoted to the erection of a new building on Wabash Avenue. The offer of the Chamber of Commerce of $65,000 for the property, exclusive of the church-edifice, was accordingly accepted, and the following distribution made: To such members of the Church as should unite with others in forming the Second Baptist Church in the West Division of the city, the building and the fixtures of the former house of worship, valued at $10,000; to the North Baptist Church, $6,500; to the Union Park Church, $4,000; to the Wabash-avenue Church, $3,000; to the Berean Church, $1,000; to the Olivet (colored) Church, $5,000. This adjustment left in the hands of the First Baptist Church $50,000 of the money received for the lot; and on April 3, 1864, the date of the last services in the old church-building, $17,000 more was raised toward the erection of the new building, together with $500 to erect a monument to the memory of Rev. Allen B. Freeman, the first pastor.

REV. LUTHER STONE, D.D.

With a portion of the money thus remaining, a lot was purchased at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Hubbard Court, and immediate steps were taken to erect upon it an elegant and commodious house of worship, to cost $100,000. The corner-stone was laid September 13, 1864, Rev. W. W. Everts, D.D., delivering the address. The lecture-room was dedicated on January 1, 1865, and the children's chapel on March 26. The church-building itself was dedicated on March 18, 1866. Instead of costing but $100,000 as was first anticipated, the actual cost was $175,000; which was in consequence of the large and unexpected advance made in the prices of labor and material. The indebtedness of the Church at the time of the dedication was about $75,000. Dr. Everts announced that $110,000 had been collected and that $50,000 more was needed to complete the tower. In response to this announcement $46,000 were contributed in half an hour. In December following a new organ was erected, costing $10,000. At that time the First Baptist Church was the largest in membership and had the largest edifice of any Protestant denomination in the West. The great fire of 1871 burned out and dispersed the membership; and the second great fire of 1874 destroyed their universally admired church building, causing a loss of at least $150,000.

REV. WILLIAM WALLACE EVERTS, D.D., for twenty years intimately identified with the religious and charitable institutions of Chicago, was born at Granville, Washington Co., N. Y., March 13, 1814. His father was Samuel Everts, a school-teacher by profession, who was a brigadier-general of militia in the War of 1812. His mother, whose maiden name was Phoebe N. Spicer, was a native of New York, and also a school-teacher. In 1826, the family removed to Michigan; and the same year Dr. Everts's father died. His mother successfully reared a family of five sons and four daughters, two of the former becoming ministers, and one daughter a noted missionary in India. Dr. Everts joined the Baptist Church when fourteen years of age, and he early gave evidence of great energy of character. When he was fifteen years old, Rev. Henry Davis, D.D., of Brockport, N. V., invited him to become a member of his family. In 1831, young Everts entered the preparatory department of Hamilton Literary and Theological Seminary, now Madison University. Eight years afterward he graduated with high honors. He first preached in several vacant pulpits, and in 1832, he was licensed by the Brockport Church. Soon afterward he was engaged permanently by the Baptist Church at Earlville, Madison Co., N. Y., and in 1837 he was ordained. After completing his studies, he accepted a call to the Tabernacle Church, New York City, as the successor of the noted Archibald Mackay, D.D. Through his efforts, a series of revivals began in New York, which against slavery, he resigned his pastorate, although a majority of the Church sustained him. It was due in a great measure to the efforts of his friends in this Church that Kentucky was prevented from seceding from the Union. The First Baptist Church of Chicago once more extended a call to Dr. Everts, which he accepted in August, 1859. After twenty years of service in Chicago, during which the University of Chicago and the Morgan Park Theological Seminary made heavy drafts upon his time and sympathy, Dr. Everts returned to the vicinity of his former field of work, and settled with the Baptist Church in Jersey City, N. J. He entered upon the pastorate with his usual zeal, and met with his accustomed success. Having passed the age of seventy years, in 1885 he retired from pastoral services, to devote the remainder of his life to lecturing and literary labor. Dr. Everts has been married three times. His first wife was Miss Maria Wycoff, who died after a brief union. He was married the second time to Miss Margaret Burtis, who shared his labors for twenty years. His present wife is Miss Naomi Townsend.

THE NORTH STAR MISSION was organized in October, 1859, as the Bremer-avenue Mission, which, after about two years, was consolidated with the Chicago-avenue Mission, the new organization taking the name of the North Star Mission. A new chapel was erected at the corner of Division and Sedgwick streets, and dedicated on Sunday, December 29, 1861. Rev. G. L. Wren was installed pastor in October, 1862. A new church-building was soon required, and, as a preliminary step toward its erection, a lot at the corner of Division and Sedgwick streets was purchased in August, 1865.

In June, 1866, the Rolling-Mill Mission, which had been for some time suspended, was re-established under the auspices of this Mission, and a new chapel, erected for its use, was dedicated in November, 1866. Early in 1867 two other mission stations were established—one on Bremer Street, the other west of Lincoln Park. During that year, the building occupied by the North Star Mission was remodeled and enlarged, and was dedicated December 14, 1867. The membership was at that time one hundred and thirty, and the average attendance at the Sunday-school was seven hundred and twenty-five, taught by fifty teachers. Rev. George L. Wren, who had been pastor seven years, preached his farewell sermon on Sunday, October 3, 1869. The building of this Mission was destroyed by the great fire of 1871, causing a loss of about $10,000.

THE SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH was organized in 1864, a full account of which is given in the history of the Tabernacle Baptist Church in the first volume of this work. The building so long used by the First Baptist Church, on the corner of Washington and LaSalle streets, having been accepted by the new Church, was re-erected on the southwest corner of Monroe and Morgan streets, in almost precisely its former style and arrangements. The outer walls were raised above the window cornices, the ceiling was divided into six panels, instead of twenty-four, the columns supporting the gallery were in green and bronze, and the entire wood-work was grained in oak. The lecture-room was occupied for the first time on Sunday, October 30, 1864, and the dedication occurred Sunday, January 8, 1865. The dedicatory sermon was delivered by Rev. Nathaniel Colver, D.D., who had resigned the pastorate December 1, 1864, and he was assisted by Rev. J. C. Burroughs, D.D., by Rev. S. M. Osgood, and by the newly-elected pastor, Rev. E. J. Goodspeed, formerly of Janesville, Wis.

Such was the success of Rev. E. J. Goodspeed that, in the summer of 1867, it became apparent that the church needed to be enlarged to accommodate the increasing congregations, and it was decided to extend it westward across the twenty-seven-foot lot bought some time previously for a parsonage. This work was in-

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.

were the beginning of an era of prosperity never before experienced by the Baptists of that city. During three years, seven hundred members were received into the Church, and its missionary spirit became developed, so that the members purchased a house of worship of another denomination, which became known as the Laight-street Church. The membership increased from less than one hundred to over six hundred in a few years. Dr. Everts's health becoming impaired, he traveled abroad for a season, and upon his return, took a quiet pastorate at Wheatland, Monroe Co., N. Y. His health soon recovered, and his energetic spirit was again aroused. Churches were organized in surrounding villages, and his labors met with great success. His fame extended to the West, and a call was tendered him by the First Baptist Church of Chicago, but his unfinished work in Wheatland forbade its acceptance. After his special supervision was no longer essential to its progress, he accepted a call to the Walnut-street Baptist Church, Louisville, Ky. In 1853, he entered upon that field with characteristic zeal. He pursued the evangelistic and church-extension policy which he had inaugurated in former fields, and made it as great a success. The war coming on, and his sympathies being with the North and trusted to, and performed by, John M. VanOsdel, at a total expense of about $14,000. On Sunday, January 5, 1868, the pastor reported that this Church, during the year 1867, expended $45,493.79, and during the three years just closed it had spent $100,000, in defraying their own expenses, in contributing to other churches and for missionary purposes. At that time the Church had seven hundred and sixty active members, and a very large Sunday-school, its Bible classes alone numbering three hundred. During the first six years of Rev. Mr. Goodspeed's pastorate, the membership grew from two hundred to nearly eleven hundred, and its home Sunday-school increased to upward of one thousand, with sixty teachers, besides which the Church sustained a flourishing Mission Sunday-school in the northwest portion of the city, one at Bridgeport, and one at the Stock-yards.

THE UNIVERSITY-PLACE BAPTIST CHURCH had its origin in 1859. At that time there was no Baptist Church south of Harrison Street, and no Church south of Twelfth Street, except the Salem Congregational Church, at Cleaverville, and the South Congregational Church, on the lake shore, at the foot of Rio Grande (now Twenty-sixth) Street. A weekly prayer-meeting was established at the house of Deacon C. T. Boggs, which was led by Rev. J. A. Smith, D.D. Not long afterward, to meet the wants of the students, a service was established on Sunday afternoons in the chapel of the University building, at which preaching was maintained by Rev. J. C. Burroughs, D.D., president of the University. A Sunday-school was also begun, which soon had upward of one hundred scholars.

Soon after this, the First Baptist Church, designing to establish a Mission on Indiana Avenue, at Thirtieth Street, proposed to those connected with the work at the University to transfer their efforts and means to the proposed Mission; and accordingly, in the summer of 1863, upon the opening of the chapel on Indiana Avenue, the congregation and Sunday-school that had been gathered at the University were transferred, and many entered into membership with the Indiana-avenue Baptist Church. These members had, however, not ceased to appreciate the importance of the field at the University, which they had temporarily abandoned, and, in 1867, they re-organized the Sunday-school in the chapel of the University, and, on September 22, 1868, the Cottage Grove Baptist Society was organized, with Rev. J. A. Smith, D.D., as pastor, the meetings being held in the chapel of the University.

On Sunday, December 6, 1868, a Church was constituted, with a membership of ninety-four, adopting the name of the University-place Baptist Church, as they intended to secure a site on that street. The first deacons were N. H. Hovey, Jesse Clement and H. B. Brayton. Rev. J. A. Smith, D.D., was unanimously chosen pastor of the new organization, which, on May 23, 1869, was publicly recognized as a Baptist Church, the sermon of recognition being preached by Rev. E. J. Goodspeed. The Church was induced to forego its original design of locating on University Place, and, instead, purchased lots on Thirty-fifth Street, at the head of Rhodes Avenue. These lots cost $11,000, and upon them a brick chapel was erected, which cost $14,814. The dedication took place Sunday, June 25, 1871, Rev. G. W. Northrup delivering the dedicatory sermon. A statement was made of the financial condition of the Society at that time. A collection was then taken up of $2,761, leaving the indebtedness somewhat over $16,000.

Rev. J. A. Smith remained with the Church until April, 1869. Rev. J. B. Jackson, D.D., occupied the pulpit from April to October, 1869, when he was succeeded by Rev. William Hague, whose pastorate closed in November, 1870. From that date until February, 1873, the Church was without a regular pastor.

THE WABASH-AVENUE BAPTIST CHURCH. — The history of this Church was traced in the previous volume, as the Edina-Place Baptist Church, until August 31, 1862, when its name was changed to the Wabash-avenue Baptist Church. The removal, alteration and repairs of the building created a debt, the semi-annual interest of which was $250. The year 1863 opened with a series of revival meetings, after which over forty were added to the church membership. Rev. Robert Boyd, who had been pastor of this Church since its organization, tendered his resignation in July, 1863, to take effect at the close of August. This course was rendered necessary by his failing health. Action upon the resignation was postponed until Sunday, September 6, in order to prove the effect of cessation from labor upon the pastor's health. On this day, the result not having been what was hoped, the resignation was reluctantly accepted, and, on September 13, Rev. Mr. Boyd preached his farewell sermon.

During the interval between the acceptance of the resignation of Rev. Robert Boyd and the procuring of his successor, the pulpit was supplied by Rev. E. J. Goodspeed, of Janesville, Wis.; Rev. Jesse B. Thomas, of Waukegan, Ill.; Rev. J. A. Wight, Rev. Nathaniel Colver, Rev. J. S. Dickerson, of Wilmington, Del.; Rev. Mr. Coleman, of Ottawa, Ill., and Rev. Edward G. Taylor, of Cincinnati, Ohio. A call was extended to Rev. E. G. Taylor, who accepted it, and preached his first regular sermon February 14, 1864. The event of this year, among the Baptist churches, was the sale of its property by the First Baptist Church, at the corner of Washington and LaSalle streets, to the Chamber of Commerce, and a distribution of a third of the proceeds among the various Baptist congregations of the city. The Wabash-avenue Church received $3,000, which it used in the liquidation of its debt. But the subject of main interest to this Church was the future location of the First Church. A remonstrance was made against its removal so far south as Eldridge Court, as they would thereby seriously interfere with the field of labor of the Wabash-avenue Church. The First Church located on Wabash Avenue, just south of Hubbard Court. On October 23, 1865, Rev. E. G. Taylor resigned his pastorate.

A unanimous call was then extended, October 29, to Rev. Samuel Baker, D.D., of Williamsburgh. Dr. Baker preached his first sermon in this Church November 5, 1865. At a meeting held April 15, 1868, the Church almost unanimously favored selling their property on Wabash Avenue for not less than $35,000, and building a new house of worship further south. Before this was accomplished, however, a proposition was made to the Indiana Baptist Church that the two churches unite, but the proposition was rejected by the latter Church. On the same day this action was made known Rev. Samuel Baker resigned. A call was then extended to Rev. Jesse B. Thomas, D.D., who, in March, 1869, gave his formal acceptance.

In February, 1869, lots were secured on Michigan Avenue, just south of Twenty-third Street, for the purpose of erecting thereon a church-building. Work upon the new edifice was soon afterward commenced, and in July the trustees were authorized to negotiate a loan of $50,000 to complete the building. In March, 1870, the Church property on Wabash Avenue and Old (now Eighteenth) Street, was sold for $38,000. On January

SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH, CORNER OF MORGAN AND MONROE STREETS.

25, 1871, the name of the Church was changed to the Michigan-avenue Baptist Church. On Sunday, January 29, the new church-edifice was dedicated.

THE NORTH BAPTIST CHURCH was organized in 1858. Services were first held in Rush Medical College on August 29. By the 1st of November arrangements were made for the erection of a church-building at the corner of Dearborn and Ohio streets, and on January 16, 1859, religious services were held in this building. On the 11th of January, a council met to consider the propriety of organizing and recognizing this body as a Baptist Church. I. E. Kenny, Lyman Bridges, J. J. Knott and L. B. Rundell were appointed the committee to which the subject was referred, and, in accordance with their recommendations, the council recognized the Church. On the 10th of October following, a council convened for the purpose of considering the propriety of ordaining A. A. Kendrick to the work of the Gospel ministry, as the pastor of the North Baptist Church, he having commenced to preach for them in September previous. In 1864, a lot on the corner of Dearborn and Superior streets was purchased, to which the church-building was moved.

On October 10, 1865, Rev. A. W. Tousey was ordained, and succeeded to the pastorate, remaining about two years, when he was succeeded by Rev. Reuben Jeffries, D.D., who was installed October 24, 1867, on the occasion of the first occupation by this Church of the old Unity Church building, on the corner of Dearborn Street and Chicago Avenue. This edifice cost the Church $16,500, and they gave their old building to the Lincoln Park Mission. The North Baptist Church occupied its newly-acquired property until it was destroyed by the fire of 1871, entailing a loss of about $20,000.

THE FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH was organized in 1864. In the previous year, three families of this religious belief came from Boston to Chicago, and Rev. Professor R. Dunn, discovering that they had been in his pastorate in the East, exerted himself to extend the Society. After a time, regular services were held in the Seventh Presbyterian Church. Before the close of the year, a site was selected at the corner of Jackson and Peoria streets, and early in 1864 a small chapel was erected and a church organized with thirty-seven members. Soon after they commenced the erection of a church-building, which was completed and dedicated on Thursday, December 7, 1865. Previous to that time the following ministers had preached for this Church: Rev. W. G. M. Stone, May 14, 1865; and Rev. J. B. Page, August 27, 1865. The dedicatory services were conducted by President Fairfield of Hillsdale College. Immediately after the termination of the evening services the building was found to be in flames, the fire originating from defective furnace flues, and the new edifice was burned to the ground. The aggregate loss was $18,000, which was reduced to $7,000 by the insurance collected. They were offered the use of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, at the corner of Halsted and Harrison streets; which offer was accepted, and almost immediately the work of rebuilding was commenced.

On Sunday, December 9, 1866, the new edifice was dedicated. Rev. R. M. Graham, about then, succeeded to the pastorate, and was installed January 30, 1867.

The second church-building was not long satisfactory to this congregation, and, in 1869, a lot was purchased, at the corner of Loomis and Jackson streets, upon which a new structure was erected at a cost of about $18,000. On September 18, 1870, the new building was dedicated, Rev. Dr. Dunn again officiating.

The financial statement was read by Rev. J. B. Drew, who had succeeded the Rev. Mr. Graham as pastor. The statement showed that every dollar of the expense of building the church, which amounted to $25,000, had been paid.

THE CHICAGO BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—As early as 1858, the question of founding a Baptist Theological School in the Northwest was somewhat discussed but no conclusive action was then taken. In 1860, a meeting was held in the First Baptist Church, to consider the importance of establishing such a Seminary in connection with the University of Chicago. Among those present were J. B. Olcott, financial agent of the University, J. A. Smith and Edward Goodman of the Christian Times (now the Standard), and Rev. W. W. Everts. After deliberation, all agreed that such an institution should be founded. To facilitate organization the rough draft of a constitution was presented, and referred to a committee for consideration and report next year. But so fearful were some lest premature action should imperil the University, that during the next two years little was done. In 1863, a large meeting was held at the First Baptist Church, where a perfected constitution was reported, and the Baptist Theological Union formally organized, but the charter of the Society was not obtained until February, 1865.

Rev. Nathaniel Colver, D.D., pastor of the Second Baptist Church, looking forward to the opening of the proposed Theological School, taught a class in theology during 1865-66, D. L. Moody being one of his students. In the autumn of 1866, the school was opened at the University, with Dr. Colver professor of Biblical Theology and Rev. G. C. Clark professor of Hebrew and Exegesis. Fifteen students were enrolled. Dr. Colver was persuaded to resign his work in Chicago, to organize the Freedmen's Theological School at Richmond, Va. This led to the resignation of Rev. Mr. Clark, and the breaking up of the classes. Early in 1867, Dr. G. W. Northrup, professor of Church History in the Rochester Theological Seminary, accepted an appointment to the presidency, and re-opened the school with a new faculty and a modified course of instruction. In 1867, Rev. A. B. Jackson, from Albion, N. Y., was associated with the president in opening the classes; and in 1868, G. W. Warren, a graduate of Harvard, and Rev. A. N. Arnold, formerly missionary to Greece, became members of the faculty. On July 1, 1869, two students were graduated, and the seminary-building was dedicated on the same day. The report of 1870 shows an enrollment of forty-six students and a change in the faculty, Drs. C. E. Mitchel and R. E. Paterson taking the places of Professors Jackson and Warren. Later professors have been J. R. Boise, LL.D., T. J. Morgan, Edgrin, Hurlbut, Sage, Harper and Dr. J. A. Smith.

G. S. Bailey, after several years of service as financial secretary, was succeeded by T. G. Goodspeed, who has continued in that position to the present time. Before any considerable donations had been obtained in Chicago, Rev. W. W. Everts, while in New York on business connected with the University, procured a Greek Chair for the University, obtaining from the Colgate family an acre of ground in Chicago, to be deeded to the University unless a Seminary should be soon established. This property, from its rental, furnished an immediate income, and has since risen in value to $15,000. Dr. Everts also obtained in New York $1,200 toward the purchase of a site for a building.

The largest early cash subscription was one of $7,500, resultant upon Dr. Everts's labors, from L. Barnes and Mial Davis, of Burlington, Vt., and Mr.

Cook, Whitehall, N. Y. The Theological Union thereupon purchased the Seminary lots, and soon after erected buildings, costing $30,000, the furnishing of which cost $8,000. Meantime, D. Henry Sheldon moved from St. Louis to Chicago, and at once became one of the most efficient supporters of the enterprise. He gave it its first $1,000 subscription, and added to it until his gifts amounted to $15,000. James E. Tyler was first subscriber of $5,000, and, besides several other subscriptions, added a final one which brought the entire amount up to nearly $30,000. Mr. Goodyear's subscriptions amounted to $30,000, and C. N. Holden's to nearly $15,000. E. Nelson Blake has subscribed, in the aggregate, $40,000. W. W. Everts Jr., who was in Germany at the time of the death of the distinguished Hengstenbergh, appealed to his father to raise means to purchase this remarkable library for the Seminary. The library was purchased, and placed in the University. J. Young Scammon became its principal creditor. At the time of the sale of its effects, this literary treasure would have been lost to Baptists but for the management of D. Henry Sheldon and the munificence of E. Nelson Blake, who purchased it and bequeathed it to the Seminary. After the death of George B. Ide, through the same parties who procured the Hengstenbergh library, attention was called to the value of the Ide library, and measures were proposed which secured it also for the Seminary. In 1885, through the munificence of Rev. Mr. Colwell and Captain Ebenezer Morgan, the rarest Biblical library in this country has been added to its literary treasures.

About eight years ago the board of the Seminary, feeling themselves compromised by the vicinity and trials of the University of Chicago, and encouraged by the munificent offers of real estate and liberal subscriptions in money, removed to Morgan Park, and there erected a new seminary-building and residences for the professors. The name of the institution then became the Morgan Park Seminary.

THE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

THE FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH.—Rev. George F. Noyes was the last regular pastor of this Church, as mentioned in the preceding volume. For more than two years the pulpit was filled by temporary supplies; but in June, 1861, a call was extended to Rev. Charles B. Thomas, of New Orleans. The church-building, after having been repaired and renovated, was re-opened July 23, 1861. In June, 1862, a lot upon which to erect a new edifice was selected on Wabash Avenue, north of Hubbard Court, and the corner-stone of this building was laid on April 9, 1863, by Rev. Robert Collyer.

About the middle of May, 1862, the old building of this Society was destroyed by fire, and the congregation worshipped in St. Paul's Universalist Church. The new church-building was so far completed that services were commenced therein on Sunday, November 22, 1863, and it was soon after completed and dedicated. In May, 1864, Rev. C. B. Thomas was dismissed from the pastorate, after which the pulpit was vacant for some time. On January 7, 1866, Rev. Robert Laird Collier preached for the Society, and was installed pastor April 17, 1866. On January 26, 1868, $30,625 were subscribed to pay off the debt of the Church, which was afterward in sound financial condition, and enjoyed a high degree of prosperity until the great calamity of 1871. Their building, however, was not destroyed. It stood on the very verge of the burned district, but was saved by the use of gunpowder in blowing up other buildings.

UNITY CHURCH was the result of a desire on the part of members of the First Unitarian Church, living on the north side of the river, to have place of worship near their homes. The First Church property, at this time, consisted of an eighty-foot lot on Washington Street, between Clark and Dearborn, upon which stood the frame church-edifice which was afterward destroyed by fire.

Preliminaries being arranged, a meeting of those members living on the North Side who retired from the First Church to form the new Church, was held May 11, 1857, in the office of William M. Larrabee. The following persons were present at this meeting: Benjamin F. Adams, William M. Larrabee, Eli Bates, Nathan Mears, Gilbert Hubbard, Samuel S. Greeley, William H. Clark, Captain Samuel Johnson, Benjamin F. James, Samuel C. Clark, Henry Tucker, George Watson, Augustus H. Burley and Edward K. Rogers.

From time to time, meetings were held, and finally, on December 23, 1857, a constitution was adopted, and the name of Unity Church, suggested by Benjamin F. James, chosen. The first officers were elected at the same meeting, as follows: Trustees, William M. Larrabee, Benjamin F. Adams and Benjamin F. James; Secretary, Samuel S. Greeley.

In June, 1858, one-fourth of the old church lot on Washington Street was conveyed to the trustees of Unity Church. Business meetings were held occasionally at the house of Eli Bates and elsewhere, but it was not until the spring of 1859 that the active work of the Church began. At that time, the little frame building of the Baptist Church, standing at the corner of Ohio and Dearborn streets, with a seating capacity of about one hundred and fifty, was rented for use on Sunday afternoons. Rev. Robert Collyer, who was at the time in the services of the First Church as minister-at-large, was engaged to preach at the new church for a few months, until a regular minister could be procured, and preached his first sermon under this arrangement on the last Sunday in May, 1859.

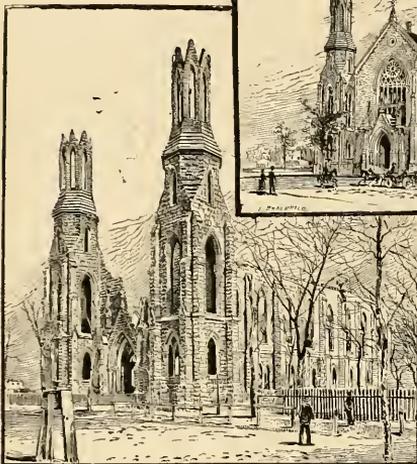

A subscription paper was circulated, for the purpose of raising money with which to purchase a lot and erect a church-building. On the 20th of August of the same year, a lot on the corner of Chicago Avenue and Dearborn Street was purchased, and the erection of a church-edifice at once commenced. Under the energy and economy of the first board of trustees, which continued in office, this building was completed before the expiration of the year. It was small, with a seating capacity of four hundred and fifty, and cost $4,000. It was dedicated on Christmas eve, 1859, the sermon being preached by Rev. Dr. Hosmer, of Buffalo.

Early in its history this Church attempted to formulate a creed, but found its belief too inclusive, and so abandoned the attempt. The only article of faith upon which all could unite was, that each member might entertain his own belief.

During the War, Unity Church performed its share of the work of suppressing it; the young men entered the army, and Rev. Mr. Collyer, throwing the American flag over his pulpit, and announcing to his congregation that the church was closed, and that he was going to the war, he went to the Potomac, and afterward to Fort Donelson and Pittsburg Landing, to minister to the necessities and comforts of the wounded, the sick, and the dying. Many of the women of the Church became members of the Sanitary Commission, and they, and others, where equally devoted in attendance in the hospitals and at the Soldiers' Rest.

In December, 1866, the Liberal Christian League was formed, with Rev. Robert Collyer for its first president. It was composed mainly of members of Unity Church. Notwithstanding the War, the Society continued to grow, and it became necessary to find more room for the congregation. Mr. Collyer's vacation was, therefore, taken advantage of to enlarge the church-building. At first it was the design to add a wing to each side, but subsequently it was decided to buy a lot on the corner of Walton Place and Dearborn Avenue, and to erect a stone edifice, to cost not more than $60,000. The corner-stone was laid August 29, 1867, Rev. Robert Collyer delivering the address.

UNITY CHURCH AND RUINS.

The resolve to limit the expense of the erection of this building to $60,000 was either lost sight of or designedly disregarded, for, after it was completed, the accounts of the Church showed that its total cost, including lot, edifice, furnishing and organ, was $210,000. The lot on Chicago Avenue, together with the frame church-building standing upon it, were sold for $16,662 to the North Baptist Church.

Unity Church enjoyed this new and costly temple of worship from the time of its dedication, June 20, 1869, to October 8, 1871, a period of nearly two years and four months, when it was swept out of existence by the fire of that and the next day. Only its massive walls and towers remained as monuments to the honesty and good faith of the builder. Together with the church-building the homes of most of the members were destroyed. At the time of the fire there were one hundred and seventy pew-holders in the Church, only nine of whom entirely escaped loss. The aggregate direct loss by individual members of this Church was estimated to be $2,350,200.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER was born December 8, 1823, at Keithley, near Bolton Abbey and the River Wharfe, Yorkshire, England. When Robert was about four weeks old, his parents moved to Fewston parish, and the necessities of the family were such that every member of it that could do so had to labor; hence, young Robert, in his eighth year, was put to work in a factory. There he remained until he was fourteen, at which time he was apprenticed to a blacksmith at Ilkley, in Wharfedale, at which trade he worked until his emigration to America, in 1850. During the years of his labor in the factory and at the forge, his brain was employed as well as his hands.

Very early he developed a taste for books, and can not remember when he could not read. After his conversion he became, in 1848, a local Methodist preacher, being licensed to preach in that year. While working at the forge, he had practiced declaiming in the woods and to the brook; and then his ready gift of speech, his culture, appearance, and behavior, drew to him interested auditors, won him friends, and made him a favorite with the public. In 1850, he came to the United States, and settled in Shoemakerstown, a suburb of Philadelphia; there he entered upon the business of hammer-making, and continued his work as an exhorter, while he labored at the forge, always earning his own living with his hands. Happening to hear a lecture delivered by Lucretia Mott, he became dissatisfied with the pro-slavery conservatism of the Philadelphia Conference, and, hearing Dr. Furness preach, he became dissatisfied with the Methodist theology, and for his denial of certain theological tenets, he was arraigned, and, by the Philadelphia Conference, deprived of his license to preach. This was in January, 1859.

He then united with the Unitarian Congregationalists, and, under their auspices, soon afterward came to Chicago to take charge of the "Ministry-at-Large." In May, 1859, he began to preach for Unity Church, and for three years performed the work of both positions, when, resigning the former, he devoted himself entirely to his Church. His success as a minister with this Church was very remarkable. It was through his influence that the elegant Unity Church building was erected in 1867, and the present one erected on the ruins of the first in 1872. Besides his work in connection with the Sanitary Commission, referred to in the history of Unity Church, he was intrusted with the disbursement of large sums of money contributed by the citizens of Chicago to the relief of the survivors of the Quantrill massacre, at Lawrence, Kas. He remained pastor of Unity Church until May, 1879, when he resigned, to accept the pastorate of the Church of the Messiah, in New York City, of which he is still (1885) pastor. A just estimate of his character and power as a pulpit orator would be especially valuable, but within our limits it is not easy to present such an estimate. He is certainly no common man. Entering the ministry without the advantages of collegiate education and discipline, he has wielded an extraordinary influence and acquired a world-wide fame.

Robert Collyer

THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

THE FIRST UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.—The history of this Church was continued in the first volume down to the pastorate of Rev. William W. King, who preached his farewell sermon June 26, 1859. The pulpit was vacant about six months, and during this time the Society made efforts to pay off its debts. In October, $18,500 were raised in three days, and a short time afterward $2,500 additional. In December, a call was extended to Rev. W. H. Ryder, of Roxbury, Mass., to become pastor of this Church, which he accepted, and entered upon his duties January 8, 1860. He was installed on the 7th of February, following, the installation sermon being preached by Rev. J. S. Dennis, and the hymn that was sung being composed for the occasion by Mrs. Mary A. Livermore. The pastorate of Rev. W. H. Ryder was one of the longest and most successful of any in Chicago, extending from the date given above to 1882. A summary of its results, therefore, is necessarily deferred.

During the first four years of Dr. Ryder's pastorate, the sum of $37,000 was subscribed, and in May, 1866, the Society purchased a lot on the corner of Wabash Avenue and VanBuren Street, adjoining the church-lot on the north, and donated the larger part of it to Dr. Ryder, who erected thereon a pastoral residence, and during the six years that had elapsed, $80,000 had been subscribed for Society purposes. On April 26, 1868, Dr. Ryder delivered his farewell address, previous to his departure to Europe for the benefit of his health. During his absence, his pulpit was supplied by Rev. Sumner Ellis. On June 11, 1869, Dr. Ryder returned, and was given a warm reception by his Church. The work of the Church went on steadily and successfully until the 9th of October, 1871, when the building, which had so long been the pride of the Society, was reduced to a heap of ruins. The loss thus occasioned amounted to about $75,000.

REV. WILLIAM HENRY RYDER, D.D., was born on July 17, 1822, at Provincetown, Mass. His ancestry, on both his father's and mother's sides, were English. Having exhausted the educational opportunities he found near his home, he entered Pembroke Academy in 1840. He studied Greek and Hebrew in Clinton Liberal Institute, Clinton, N. Y., under that rare scholar, Dr. Clowes. When only nineteen years old, he preached his first sermon in Manchester, N. H. During the year following he preached frequently in Concord, doing much to revive the languishing parish. Early in the fall of 1843, he accepted a call to settle in Concord, N. H., and in the following December he was duly ordained. After two and a half years of successful ministry in Concord, he accepted an urgent call to the Universalist Church in Nashua, N. H. While he served the Church at Nashua with very general satisfaction, he was dissatisfied with his own imperfect preparation for the work upon which he had entered, and he determined to make the tour of Europe, and at Berlin make a speciality of the study of the German language—a language replete in Biblical learning and criticism, in exegesis and in the principles of philosophy. After his course of study and reading at Berlin, he completed the tour of Europe and the Holy Land. His entire tour consumed about eighteen months. Upon his return to America he was called to the pastorate of the Church in Roxbury, Mass., of which, for sixteen years, Rev. Dr. Hosea Balton, second, had been the esteemed pastor. With this Church he remained ten years—from February, 1850, to January, 1860. On January 1, 1860, he removed to Chicago, to assume the pastoral duties of St. Paul's Church. His first sermon was preached for this Church, January 14, following, and his last sermon as pastor April 16, 1882—a period of twenty-two years and three months. For five years immediately succeeding that in which he came to Chicago were the years of the War of the Rebellion, and during that trying time Dr. Ryder was never wanting, never faltering in his support of the Union cause; on the contrary St. Paul's pulpit was famous for its strenuous advocacy of the duty of the Government to suppress the Rebellion. And not only by his sermons and printed discourses did he do valiant service, but in various other and efficient ways. He was sent to Richmond in aid of the Chicago Sanitary Fair, and while there discovered the famous letter used by the Government in the assassination trial. The great fire destroyed St. Paul's Church, also his beautiful residence, on an adjoining lot. The great responsibilities imposed upon him by this appalling calamity were undertaken and discharged with consummate ability and skill.

Visiting New England, he returned to Chicago with $40,000 with which to assist in repairing the fortunes of St. Paul's Church; and such has been the success of his subsequent labors that the Church property, now worth $200,000, is entirely without incumbrance. Upon resigning his position as pastor of St. Paul's Church, the congregation of the parish unanimously invited him to accept the relation to them and title of pastor-emeritus. To decline this proffered honor cost him a great struggle, but the self-sacrifice was made with the determination not to place any embarrassment in the way of subsequent pastors; but the congregation, determined to honor him in some fitting way, had cast a life-size medallion bust, which, enclosed in a marble frame, is inserted into the walls of the church to the right of the pulpit. At the first commencement after his removal from the vicinity of Boston, Harvard University conferred upon him the honorary degree of Master of Arts, and in 1863, Lombard University conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Dr. Ryder was married November 5, 1843, to Miss Caroline

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH AND RUINS

F. Adams, daughter of Benjamin F. and Rebecca (Ryder) Adams. Dr. and Mrs. Ryder have one child—Caroline Collins Ryder, now Mrs. John F. Morrill, of Campton Village, N. H.

THE SECOND UNIVERSALIST CHURCH, or Church of the Redeemer, was organized in February, 1854, but did not begin to hold regular meetings until the spring of 1858. They then rented the old church-building of the Third Presbyterian Church, on Union Street, in which they held services until the completion of their own edifice. The first pastor was Rev. D. P. Livermore, then editor of the New Covenant. He was followed by Rev. A. Constantine Barry, from Racine, Wis., who preached his inaugural sermon March 14, 1858. After one year, he retired, on account of ill-health. He was succeeded by Rev. James H. Tuttle, from Fulton, N. Y., who remained six years.

The new building, at the corner of Washington and Sangamon streets, was dedicated January 23, 1861. Nine members of the largest Bible-class in the Sunday-school of this Church enlisted in the army. During July, 1862, and in the week ending August 9, fifteen more enlisted, including the superintendent of the school and between thirty and forty members of the Church.

After the retirement of Rev. Mr. Tuttle, there was a vacancy in the pulpit for a few months, during which time Rev. E. G. Brooks, of New York City, and Rev. George W. Montgomery, of Rochester, preached. The next regular pastor was Rev. T. E. St. John, who was called in April, 1866, and installed on September 17. He remained with this Church until Rev. G. T. Flanders, D.D., from Nashua, N. H., assumed pastoral charge, on January 6, 1869. Rev. Mr. Flanders remained pastor of the Church until 1872.

MARY H. (OTIS) TALCOTT was born in Watertown, Jefferson Co., N. Y., May 23, 1819, the daughter of Seth and Chloe (Taylor) Otis. Her early life was spent in the common schools of Watertown and she afterward became a pupil at the ladies' seminary, of that city. At the age of eighteen, she entered Mrs. Willard's School, at Troy, and, in 1838, moved West with her parents, settling near what is now Park Ridge, Ill. In 1841, she married Manuel Talcott. She shared with her husband in the noble element of public munificence, and his most bounteous gifts to public benefactions were concurred in by her. Since his death she has continued the noble work, and many are the gifts she has bestowed. She has given to three institutions—the Nursery and Half-Orphan Asylum, the Orphan Asylum, and the Hospital for Women and Children—$13,000 each; and to the Home for the Friendless $5,000, the interest of which is to be expended in the purchase of fruit for the inmates. She has given to the Humane Society $6,000, and to the Old People's Home $10,000; and to each of four institutions—the Home for the Friendless, Orphan Asylum, Half-Orphan Asylum, and Old People's Home—$150 each, for specific purposes. Her gifts have mostly been confined to local charities, her open hand being always ready to assist the poor and unfortunate. Since she was sixteen years of age, she has been a devout member of the Universalist Society, and, during the early part of the year 1885, purchased and presented to her Church—the Second Universalist—the lot at the corner of Robey Street and Warren Avenue, costing $10,000. Such a noble and public spirit as is possessed by Mrs. Talcott is found in few women, and her remembrance will not be for a day, but for all time.

EVANGELICAL CHURCHES.

FIRST GERMAN EMANUEL CHURCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.—The history of this Church is contained in the first volume down to the time of the erection of its new edifice on Polk Street and Edina Place (Third Avenue) in 1855. At that time the pastor was Rev. L. H. Eiterman, who, in 1856, was succeeded by Rev. George Messner. In 1864, about twenty-seven members withdrew, in order to establish a place of worship nearer their homes. They organized the Salem's Church, on the corner of Twelfth and Union streets. Rev. Mr. Messner remained with the First Church until the spring of 1858. The following pastors succeeded him:

Rev. G. M. Young, 1858 to 1859; Rev. C. Augenstein, 1859 to 1860; Rev. J. P. Kramer, 1860 to 1861; Rev. Jacob Himmel, 1861 to 1862; Rev. W. F. Walker, 1862 to 1864; Rev. G. W. Lecher, 1864 to 1866; Rev. Enoch Von Freedlen, 1866 to 1867; Rev. Jacob Himmel, 1867 to 1868; Rev. William Strasburger, 1868 to 1869; Rev. Michael Heyl, 1869 to 1871; Rev. J. W. Moore, six months from the spring of 1871; Rev. Martin Stramm, the balance of the year.

THE SECOND CHURCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION was started, in 1852, by a portion of the members of the First Church, who, in 1856, erected a building near the corner of Wells Street and Chicago Avenue. In 1867, a division occurred in this body—one portion going to the corner of West Huron and Noble streets, and organizing St. John's Church; and the other, selling their property at the corner of Wells Street and Chicago Avenue for $17,000, purchased six lots at the corner of Sedgwick and Wisconsin streets. The church-building erected on the latter location cost about $8,000, and was in use at the time of the fire of 1871, when it was destroyed.

From its organization, in 1852, to the destruction of the church-edifice in 1871, the ministers have been as follows, the year of the beginning of their pastorate being given:

Revs. J. P. Kramer, 1853; Christopher Koff, 1854; J. G. Esher, 1855; John Kiegel, 1856; Elias Musselmann, 1857; William Strasburger, 1858; George Velter, 1859; G. W. Lechler, 1861; A. S. Heilman, 1863; W. F. Walker, 1864; J. G. Esher, 1866; Jacob Himmel, 1868; John Miller, 1869; Henry Hintze, 1870.

GERMAN UNITED EVANGELICAL ZION'S CHURCH.—Rev. Mr. Hartmann founded this Church with half of his Society members, when he had been called to serve the city from the Southwest. In February, 1862, twenty-seven members of St. Paul's Church formed a new Society. On Mr. Tegtmeier's land, a school-house was built on Union Street, and a society and school organized, of which the first teacher was Mr. Enderis, once consul for Switzerland. Religious services were held also in the school-house. In the same year, the building was removed to the corner of Clinton and Wilson streets. The first board of trustees consisted of Christopher Tegtmeier, Frederick W. Baerfeld, John Hitzemann, John Sillmann, Henry Wendheim, William Hering, Henry Bonser, Henry Braumueller, Conrad Teigler and William Bartels.

In June, 1863, it was resolved to purchase the block on Union Street, between Liberty and Fourteenth (once Mitchell) streets. At that time Pastor Keuchen resigned, to labor in the Seminary at Elmhurst, where he now is. Rev. Mr. Kuenzler was elected pastor in July, 1863, and the new church was built which stands to-day on the corner of Fourteenth and Union streets. It was consecrated on February 7, 1864. During this year, Rev. Mr. Boesch was recalled from Switzerland to assume charge of the Church; and during his three years' administration, the Society flourished. In 1868, Mr. Schabeborn succeeded to the pastorate. He induced the Society to erect a large brick school-house, in which he was to found an imposing German high school. The Society fell in with this plan and burdened itself with a great debt. At one time it owed $12,000, and its assets were $1,000. In 1870, Mr. Schabeborn was charged with having embezzled money, and was expelled from office. The High-school company, after two years, leased the beautiful school-house to the city, but subsequently resumed control of their own school, which now is in a prosperous condition. Rev. Mr. Hausen was appointed pastor in February, 1871, but only remained until Easter, 1873.

THIRD GERMAN UNITED EVANGELICAL SALEM'S CHURCH.—Salem's Church was founded early in 1862, at the suggestion of Adam Sohn and William Kohlmann. Going among the German Protestants of Bridgeport, they found about one hundred and seventy-five favorable to the enterprise. They then reported the success of their search to Pastor Hartmann. On the corner of Twentieth Street and Wentworth Avenue was an English school, the use of which Mr. Hartmann was given gratuitously. There the first meeting was held, and the first Church council elected: Adam Sohn, chairman; William Holz, treasurer; George Martin, Gottlieb Holz, John Beierlein, A. Diessell, Fred. Rebel, Peter Metzger and George Kolbe, elders and directors. Mr. Hartmann, for a half year, preached every Sunday in the school-house. Then a regular pastor was obtained, Rev. Mr. Menzel, from Green Garden, Ill., and a church was also built. The Society leased a lot on the corner of Twenty-first Street and Archer Avenue, and erected a building, which was consecrated November 16, 1862, and called the Third German United Evangelical Lutheran Salem's Church. Later, Lutheran was dropped from the name. Rev. Mr. Menzel remained with the Church until 1865, and was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Guntrum. In 1868, a lot on the corner of Wentworth Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street was purchased, to which place the church was removed.

During the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Guntrum, the Church became divided. His faction was strongest in the Society, while the opposition had the majority in the Church council. The Synod decided against the Guntrum faction. Those of the Society who did not wish him to act longer as pastor had called a student of the Seminary, Carl Warkowski, to preach; and thus it happened, that each Sunday the Church was used in the forenoon by one party, and in the afternoon by the other. Finally, in February, 1871, the Synod gave Mr. Guntrum his office as pastor of Salem's Church, and founded, with his adherents, who composed the greater number of the Society, the Evangelical St. Stephen's Church, on the corner of Twenty-fifth Street and Wentworth Avenue. From this Church developed later the Evangelical Lutheran St. Stephen's Church (Rev. Mr. Koehler).

FOURTH GERMAN UNITED EVANGELICAL ST. PETER'S CHURCH.—The Society of St. Peter's Church is the last one founded by Rev. Mr. Hartmann upon the constitution of the Prussian National Church. It was established in the winter of 1863-64. The project met with great favor among the scattered Germans, so that the required money was soon raised, and about thirty-five families signified their intention of joining the new organization. Four lots, on the corner of Chicago Avenue and Noble Street, were purchased, upon which a church-edifice and school-house were built. It soon became necessary to add to the building. During the first year, the Synod sent the first regular pastor to the Church from Switzerland, who remained half of a year. Pastor Albert was then called, and held the office for three months.

In 1866, Rev. Mr. Bond, of Palatine, became pastor. Under him the Society prospered, and the elegant church-edifice was erected where it stands to-day, while the school-house was removed to lots purchased of Jacob Brauch. But disagreements arose in the Church, and the members favoring their pastor separated from St. Peter's Church, and followed him. They at first rented a school-room, and founded the Evangelical Lutheran Trinity Church. Because of the quarrel with Pastor Bond, who was four and one-half years in office, the Society threatened to be ruined. A debt of $15,000 burdened it, and there was little prospect of relief. After Pastor Schoeppe, of Berlin, had temporarily supplied the pulpit, in October, 1870, Rev. Gottlieb Lambrecht, of the town of Hanover, was called to the pastorate. When he arrived, he found only sixty regular members, while the school had an attendance of about one hundred children; but an era of prosperity then began, and was successfully continued.

REV. GOTTHELF LAMBRECHT was born July 13, 1841, at Bernsee, Prussia. His father, Carl Lambrecht, was by trade a shoemaker; his mother was Wilhelmine (Prochnow) Lambrecht. Until his fourteenth year, he attended the common schools, and then, for two years, the Schloppe Gymnasium, graduating therefrom in 1862. After spending two years in teaching school, he came to America, landing in New York City October 27, 1864. From New York he went to Detroit, where he taught school eight months. He then attended, and graduated, in 1866, from Melancthon Theological Seminary of the United Evangelical Lutheran Synod, then at Lake Zurich, now at Elmhurst, Ill. He then commenced to preach at Hanover, Ill., remaining four years, and came to Chicago, in October 1870, to assume the pastorate of the United Evangelical Lutheran St. Peter's Church. At that time there were thirty-six families connected with the Church, and the success of Rev. Mr. Lambrecht has been such that there are eight hundred families connected with it, and one hundred and fifty voting members. Rev. Mr. Lambrecht was married September 15, 1864, to Miss Charlotte Heidenfeldt. They have had eleven children, five of whom are living.

SALEM'S CHURCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION was organized in 1864, by members of the First Church of this Association. Upon their formation of a separate organization, they erected a small frame church-building on the southwest corner of Twelfth and Union streets, which served their purposes until 1880. The first trustees of this society were C. Bartels and Jacob Alt, and the first minister was Rev. G. W. Lechler, who remained one year. The subsequent pastors, to the time covered by this volume, have been:

Rev. J. G. Esher, 1865 to 1866; Rev. Christian Ott, 1866 to 1868; Rev. J. G. Esher, 1868 to 1870; Rev. John Miller, 1870 to 1871; Rev. Amos Gackley, 1871 to 1873.

ST. ANSGARIUS' CHURCH.—At the close of the sketch of this Church, in the preceding volume, it was stated that the society was divided into two portions—one Swedish, the other Norwegian. The separation was occasioned by disagreements between the two nationalities, and was made in 1858. The Norwegian portion called Rev. J. G. Gasman, and the Swedish portion called Rev. Henry B. Whipple, to take temporary charge of their religious services. The Norwegians occupied the church in the morning and the Swedes in the evening. This arrangement was, however, of short duration, neither Society being strong enough to maintain an organization.

In 1859, it became a Mission Church. Services were held therein by various clergymen, among them Rev. E. B. Tuttle, Rev. R. H. Clarkson, Rev. H. N. Bishop and Rev. J. C. Richmond, of Milwaukee. St. Ansgarius' Church was opened as a free church on Sunday, December 4, 1859, and one week thereafter the name St. Barnabas was given to the Mission. While this church was advertised in the papers as the Protestant Episcopal Free Church, the name St. Ansgarius has continued to be used, in the parochial reports, to the present time. On February 17, 1861, Rev. E. B. Tuttle became rector of the Mission.

After being without an organization and without a pastor nearly four years, the Scandinavians, both Norwegians and Swedes, determined to re-organize the Church and call a pastor. In 1862, Rev. Jacob Bredberg was called and conducted services in the afternoon of each Sunday. The church-building was held for nearly two years, conjointly, by both the City Mission and St. Ansgarius' Church. While it was the hope that both Norwegians and Swedes would unite in resuscitating the St. Ansgarius' organization, yet the movement was finally carried on solely by the latter people, who, after securing an injunction against Rev. Mr. Tuttle and the Norwegians from disturbing the worship of the Swedes, finally secured legal possession of the church-property, and, on June 20, 1864, regularly called Rev. Mr. Bredberg to the rectorship. Rev. Mr. Tuttle then leased Erie-street Mission Chapel for the use of the City Mission. The difficulties being removed, the parish largely increased in membership, and by the fall of 1864 was in a more flourishing condition than ever.

On Friday, February 3, 1865, occurred the celebration of the one-thousandth anniversary of the death of St. Ansgarius (Anscharius), styled the Apostle of the North on account of his labors to introduce Christianity into North Germany, Denmark and Sweden. The services were partly in Swedish and partly in English. Bishop Whitehouse presided, and Rev. Mr. Bredberg delivered the address. In 1868, the church was re-fitted, re-arranged and enlarged. Rev. Mr. Bredberg remained rector until 1874.

OUR SAVIOR'S NORWEGIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH was organized by Rev. Gustav F. Dietrichson, January 18, 1858, when fifty-two persons signed the constitution. In the same year this congregation commenced to build a church—a frame building—on the corner of West Erie and May streets. Shortly afterward a parochial school was established. In 1871, the Society sold their old building and commenced the erection of the present structure, which is one of the largest and most costly Norwegian Lutheran church-buildings in America. It will seat twelve hundred people, and cost $40,000. A fine organ was placed in the church at a cost of $1,200. Together with the four lots on which this edifice stands, the Church property is worth $50,000.

Rev. Gustav F. Dietrichson remained with this Church only a short time. He was succeeded by Rev. A. C. Preus, who officiated as pastor until 1863, being very successful in his labors. His successor in Our Savior's Church was Rev. J. J. Krohn, who served faithfully for thirteen years, and it was under his administration, that, in 1871, the new church-building already described was erected.

Knud Iverson's drowning.—In connection with the history of this Church, it is proper to give a brief account of the drowning of Knud Iverson, the son of Thomas Knudson, who was about ten years old at the time of his death. The drowning occurred on Tuesday, August 23, 1853, in the North Branch of the Chicago River, near the residence of Mr. Elston, which stood near where Division Street crosses the North Branch.

At that period of the city's history, boys of various ages were in the habit of bathing in the river in this vicinity, and the larger boys occasionally, in a spirit of mischief or to show their power over their smaller companions, enticed or forced them into the water. According to the first published reports, the rough handling of young Iverson was for the purpose of compelling him to enter Mr. Elston's garden and steal fruit for the larger boys to eat, which he had refused to do because of the consciousness in his own mind that to steal was wrong. By plunging him into the river, the larger boys, it was said, hoped to overcome his opposition, and it was the general opinion for some time that Knud Iverson died a martyr to the cause of honesty. An extract from a letter by P. T. Barnum, who contributed $200 toward the monument fund, will serve to illustrate the general sentiment:

"I trust that every citizen of our common country may have the privilege of contributing towards the monument of the immortal child, Knud Iverson, and that this enduring memorial of his honesty, erected by those who appreciate this great cardinal virtue, and may it be for ages the Mecca to which pilgrims from every quarter of this great continent will gladly flock with their little ones, who may thus be fully impressed with the important and glorious principle so feelingly taught in the cruel death of this infantile martyr, that 'it is better to die than to steal.'"

But the evidence that young Iverson was actually killed because of his refusal to steal was not sufficiently conclusive to convince every member of the community of its truth. The opinion became general that the boy was not purposely drowned. The coroner's verdict was as follows:

"At an inquest taken for the people, in said Cook County, this 10th day of August, A.D. 1853, before me Austin Hines, Coroner in and for said County of Cook, upon the view of the body of Knud Iverson, then and there being dead, upon the oath of twelve good and lawful men of the people of said State, into the circumstances attending the death of said Knud Iverson, and when and where and in what manner the said Knud Iverson came to his death, we the jury do say:

"We the jury of this inquest of the above child have concluded from the testimony before us that it was accidental, so far as the design for the murder of the child, but that some wicked boys unknown, are accessory to his death, through thoughtless imprudence, and whose names are not before the jury.

"Daniel Elston, Philey N. Gould, C. F. Elston, John Oleson, John Holdergren, S. Gunderson, W. G. Noahgton, Niles Garrone, Joseph Marke, Andu Evanson, A. Amundson and O. G. Auston."

Both before and after this verdict, money in considerable quantities continued to be sent to Chicago from all parts of the United States, for the purpose of erecting a monument to him. But the doubt existing as to his actual martyrdom caused a committee to be appointed, who closed their report in these words:

"It is not impossible, perhaps not improbable, that the story is true even now, yet that there is not sufficient evidence to challenge undoubted belief must be universally admitted. The cause of truth and liberty can not be subserved by erecting a monument that may be an embodied falsehood, and, in view of the facts, the undersigned unanimously recommend that the money be returned to the donors."

REV. NELS O. WESTERGREN, presiding elder of the Chicago District of the Swedish Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Gammastorps Parish, Blekinge, Sweden, July 25, 1834. His father was Olof Westergren, a school-teacher, and his mother, Mrs. Hannah (Jacob's daughter) Westergren. The former is dead, but the latter is living with her son. His early scholastic training was received in his father's school. Upon arriving in this country with his parents in 1852, he remained in Maine and Massachusetts until 1853; he then came to Chicago. In order to prepare himself for the ministry, he attended Knox College at Galesburg, Ill. from 1856 to 1857, and Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston, Ill., in 1855. In 1857, he was appointed to preach at Victoria, Ill., where he remained one year. Since then he has preached in the following places: Leland, Ill., from 1858 to 1860; from 1860 to 1862, at Beaver and Donovan, Ill., and Attica, Ind. In 1863, he once more attended school at Evanston, Ill., and from 1864 to 1865 was a student at Knox College, also supplying the pulpit there. He came to Chicago in 1865, remaining until 1868, when he went to Galesburg, Ill., where he stayed until 1872. He was then editor of the Sandebadet from 1873 to 1876, and in the latter year was appointed to the two churches at Geneva and Batavia, Ill. At the end of one year he became presiding elder of the Galesburg district, retaining that office from 1878 until 1881, in which year he came to Chicago to occupy the position he still holds.

REV. ANDREW T. WESTERGREN was born in Nasum, Sweden, July 7, 1842. His father was Olof Westergren, a teacher by profession, and his mother was Hannah (Jacobson) Westergren. They came to America in 1852, arriving in Chicago the same year. The rudimentary education of Andrew T. was received at the public schools of this city, he attending first the old Kinzie school. He then attended Knox College at Galesburg, Ill., and afterward Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston, Ill. In order to fit himself for preaching the Gospel among the Swedish population of the country, he then attended the Swedish Theological School at Galesburg, Ill., where he made a thorough study of the Swedish language and literature. After completing his course of study, he was appointed, in 1872, to the pastorate of the Swedish Methodist Episcopal Church in Rockford, Ill. The next year he was sent to Geneva and Batavia, Ill. In 1874, he was sent to Galva, in 1876 to Swedena, in 1878 to Bishop Hill, and in 1882 to the Fifth-avenue Swedish Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago, where he is at present located. Rev. Mr. Westergren was married, September 28, 1876, to Miss Selma, daughter of A. P. Hanson, of Keokuk, Iowa. They have two children—Edmond Theodore and Alfred Wesley.

THE RAILROAD CHAPEL.—In May, 1857, Rev. Brainard Kent, more generally known as "Father Kent," collected fifteen scholars in a passenger car of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company, which was standing on their track between Jackson and Van Buren streets. The next Sunday, thirty-five scholars were present and five teachers, and on that day, May 17, the Railroad Mission Sunday-school was organized, classes formed, and teachers assigned. Attendance increased, until four and sometimes five cars, the use of which was furnished free by the railroad company, were filled. Most of the scholars were gathered from the streets, and were from the most disorderly classes of society. But the spirit of rebellion, occasionally manifested, was soon subdued by music, kindness, and the rare exercise of the necessary authority.

The school prospered to such an extent, that it soon became evident a building would be required for its accommodation. Friends promptly subscribed $1,800, and the railway company granted the free use of a lot on Griswold Street, south of Van Buren, upon which to erect a chapel. This building was called the Railroad Chapel, and was dedicated July 4, 1858, Rev. Harvey Curtis delivering the dedicatory sermon. It accommodated three hundred scholars, and was used six years, when it became too small for the demands upon it. In 1863, its capacity was increased by the erection of galleries, and soon afterward more room was needed. A lot was purchased opposite the chapel, and a brick building erected, capable of seating one thousand scholars. This building, together with lot, furniture, and organ, cost $21,000, and was dedicated March 27, 1864. It was used until the fire of 1871, when it was burned to the ground. Up to this time there had been no intermission of the sessions of this school, but the Sunday following the fire passed without a meeting.

THE BETHEL.—In the preceding volume an outline of the history of the Bethel was presented down to the revival of the spring of 1858. Rev. J. H. Leonard was the chaplain. In March, 1859, very successful revival meetings were held, and the chaplain continued with zeal his labors among the families of the sailors. Bethel Chapel, on the corner of Wells and Michigan streets, was a very poor one. In January, 1860, however, it underwent thorough repairs, and was made an inviting place of worship. There was a revival in February, 1861, and also in March, 1862. In August, 1863, efforts were made to erect a new and permanent Sunday-school and Bethel building, to reach the sailors and to accommodate the North Market-street Mission School, the building to be called the Bethel Church.

The subscription lists were placed in the hands of Dwight L. Moody, a lot was purchased, and plans for a building adopted. This movement was distinct from the Seamen's Bethel, of which Rev. J. H. Leonard was the chaplain, and it was thought, by its promoters, best to effect a union between the two enterprises. The committee appointed for that purpose was composed of George Armour, J. V. Farwell and W. H. Bradley.

The effort to effect a union failed. But as the small chapel was altogether inadequate to accommodate the families of the seamen living in Chicago, a new building had to be provided. This was erected on Michigan Street, just east of Market. On January 25, 1864, Dr. H. O. Tiffany delivered a lecture in aid of the new "Mariner's Church," which was first opened for divine services April 11, 1869. Addresses were delivered on that occasion by Rev. Arthur Mitchell, Dr. W. W. Patton, Rev. Robert Collyer and Dr. R. M. Hatfield. It was formally dedicated on Sunday, June 25, 1871, and these services were the first held in the new auditorium, which was capable of seating eight hundred persons. Addresses were delivered on the day of dedication by Rev. Dr. Fowler, Rev. L. T. Chamberlain, Rev. R. L. Collier, Rev. H. N. Powers, Rev. J. H. Leonard and Rev. Mr. Westover. The cost of the enterprise was $25,000. The congregation had but just become accustomed to assembling in the new Mariners' Chapel, when they were deprived of its use by the fire of 1871.

THE CHICAGO BIBLE SOCIETY.—When the report of the Executive Committee was made in December, 1858, the results of the commercial disaster of that and the previous year were manifest. During that year the sixth visitation and supply of the city was made by H. K. Walker, R. B. Guild and E. Hedstrom. In 1859, in view of the decreasing receipts of the past two or three years, the question was raised as to the expediency of securing the services of an agent whose whole time should be devoted to the interests of the Society. It was thought that under the supervision of such an agent, the work of city distribution might be efficiently accomplished by voluntary aid.

In 1861, at the twenty-first anniversary of the Society, held December 30, it was resolved to give special attention to work among the soldiers. In accordance with this resolution over 6,000 Testaments were placed in the hands of the soldiers, and in 1862, 14 Bibles and 5,979 Testaments were distributed among the Illinois volunteers, 20 Bibles and 5,498 Testaments among Rebel prisoners, and 1218 Testaments among Harper's Ferry paroled prisoners. The seventh canvass and supply of the city was commenced in that year, and was completed in 1863. During that year there were distributed 12 Bibles and 1,896 Testaments among Union Volunteers in camp and in the field, and among Rebel prisoners 56 Bibles and 1,764 Testaments. During 1864, there were distributed among Union soldiers and Rebel prisoners 210 Bibles and 4,023 Testaments; and in 1865 there were furnished to the soldiers in Camp Douglas and Camp Fry and to Rebel prisoners a total of 105 Bibles and 2,959 Testaments.

In 1866, the eighth canvass of the city was commenced, and completed in 1867, by R. Kohlsaas. In 1867, Mr. Kohlsaas visited 5,480 families; and in 1870, the canvass was continued by Messrs. Torgerson and Paxton, they being employed a portion of the time. The canvass was nearly completed at the time of the fire, only a small part of the business portion of the city being left unfinished. As a total result of the ninth canvass, 46,824 families were visited, 10,491 of which were found destitute; 3,810 families and individuals were supplied; and 4,652 families refused to receive the Bible.

The year 1857 closed with seventeen branch societies organized. In 1858, there were five more organized, making twenty-two. In 1859, there were 25; in 1860, 27; in 1861, 28; in 1863, 29; in 1865, 30; in 1867, 31; in 1868, 32; in 1869, 33; in 1871, 35.

The following table shows the number of Bibles and Testaments distributed, with their value, and the total receipts of the Society from 1858 to 1871, inclusive:

YEAR.	Bibles Distributed.	Testaments Distributed.	Value.	Receipts.
1858.....	11,372*	-----	$1,975 13	$ 3,839 44
1859.....	10,550*	-----	2,342 13	3,027 71
1860.....	9,165*	-----	1,805 45	3,436 70
1861.....	2,079	15,657	2,808 57	3,320 48
1862.....	2,396	27,639	3,834 48	4,888 05
1863.....	2,553	15,234	3,062 09	5,949 43
1864.....	2,716	16,060	5,083 43	8,136 53
1865.....	4,066	15,566	7,954 77	9,853 72
1866.....	2,872	13,702	6,323 17	9,393 55
1867.....	23,463*	-----	8,059 19	10,738 37
1868.....	20,048*	-----	-----	11,117 09
1869.....	22,954	-----	-----	9,544 26
1870.....	19,752	-----	-----	10,709 16
1871.....	29,328†	-----	-----	8,000 00

THE JEWISH CONGREGATIONS.

Reference to the brief sketch of the Jews, in the first volume, will show that in 1849 they erected a synagogue on Clark Street, between Adams and Quincy streets. According to Rabbi Felsenthal, in a paper written for the Chicago Historical Society, this synagogue was located between Quincy and Jackson streets. In 1855, they moved to the corner of Adams and Wells streets, and in 1868 to the corner of Wabash Avenue and Peck Court. Previous to 1860 other congregations were organized; the B'nai Sholom (Sons of Peace), whose members were mainly from Prussian Poland; and the Sinai Congregation, from Kehilath Anshe Maarab. The B'nai Sholom worshipped for some time in a rented hall on Clark Street, and the Sinai Congregation, in 1861, bought a building on Monroe, between Clark and Wells streets, which they used as a temple until 1863, when they bought a church-edifice on the northwest corner of Fourth Avenue and VanBuren Street. Educational matters have not been neglected by the Jews. Among the teachers for both young and old in the synagogue and in the school-room were the Revs. Ignatz Kunreuther, Godfrey Snyder, G. M. Cohen, L. Levi, M. Manser, L. Adler, B. Felsenthal, and Dr. S. Friedlander.

Previous to the organization of the first Jewish congregation in Chicago, the Kehilath Anshe Maarab, the Jews bought a piece of land of the city in the old cemetery for a burial-place for their dead. In 1857, they purchased another burial-place beyond the city limits to the north, and the Hebrew Benevolent Society also acquired a piece of ground about half a mile from that of the Kehilath Anshe Maarab. Adjoining this, the Polish Congregation laid out a cemetery.

Early in the history of the Jews in Chicago, a number of charitable societies were instituted, among them the Hebrew Benevolent Association, the Hebrew Relief Association, the Hebrew Ladies' Benevolent Society, Ramah Lodge, etc. It was soon felt that it was for the interest of all to unite these organizations, and, as a result, the United Hebrew Relief Association was formed in 1859. This was exceedingly efficient in bringing relief to hundreds of sick and distressed widows and orphans, and generally the poor among Jews.

THE KEHLATH ANSHE MAARAB was organized in 1845, and a constitution was adopted. This organization was strengthened October 3, 1847, by the addition of about twenty members. Among these were the following: A. Kohn, L. Rosenfeld, Jacob Rosenberg, S. Cole, Isaac Ziegler, A. Frank, Benedict Shubart, L.

* Bibles and Testaments.

† Including those destroyed by the fire.

M. Leopold, Philip Neuberger, Jacob Fuller and B. Brunneinan. Soon after it became evident that the interests of this Congregation and those of the Jewish Burial-Ground Society would conflict, and thus prove detrimental to both. A council was accordingly held, the result of which was a consolidation of the two. In 1848, a charter was obtained for the new organization and the name Kehilath Anshe Maarab given to it, and this is still its legal designation. But singularly enough, through the carelessness of the founders, who intended to name themselves the Congregation of the Men of the West (Kehilath Anshe Maarab), being then the most westerly Congregation of Jews in existence, they named themselves the Congregation of the Men of Obscurity (Kehilath Anshe Maarab). As time passed on, the members of the Congregation desired a better site for a burying-ground. Agreeably to the report of a committee appointed for the purpose, the present ground situated at the corner of Clark Street and Belmont Avenue was bought in 1856 for $2,400.

In the first volume a list of the principal ministers of this Congregation will be found. A complete list is here given to the limits of time covered by this volume, together with term of service of each. The first minister was Rev. Ignatz Kunreuther, who became rabbi in 1849, and remained until 1855. He was succeeded by Godfrey Snyder, who was engaged as teacher, officiated as reader, and delivered an occasional sermon. In 1853, Mr. Snyder established a day-school where Hebrew, English and German were taught in addition to the common branches. He taught about two years, and was succeeded by three teachers. This school was in successful operation for twenty years, but in 1873, it was discontinued and a Sabbath-school established in its stead. Mr. Snyder was succeeded by Rev. G. M. Cohen in 1856. Rev. Isidore Lebrecht then occupied the pulpit, and was himself followed, in 1858, by Dr. Solomon Friedlander, a talented and promising young man, who died during the first year of his incumbency. Following Dr. Friedlander were Revs. L. Levi, Dr. Manser, of Dublin, and Marx Moses. In 1861, Dr. Liebman Adler was called, and remained with the Congregation most of the time until 1883, when he retired with a pension.

REV. LIEBMAN ADLER was born in 1812, at Stadt-Lengsfeld, Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, now a state of the new German Empire. His father was Juda Adler, a teacher by profession, and his mother was Bess (L6b) Adler. Young Liebman, up to his thirteenth year, attended his father's school, and also a preparatory school presided over by a clergyman in the vicinity. He continued his studies in the rabbinical educational institutions at Gelnhausen, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and in the teacher's seminary at Weimar. From the time of completing his education he was active as a tutor in Fulda and Buedingen, until he was installed by the government as a teacher of secular branches in the Jewish public school of Stadt-Lengsfeld. After the consolidation of this school with the Christian city school then in existence, and the formation in this manner, of an unsectarian public school, he was employed, in the latter, as teacher of history and natural philosophy until his emigration to America in 1854. After a few weeks' rest in Cincinnati, Ohio, and at Lawrenceburg, Ind., he accepted a call to Detroit, Mich., as minister of the Beth El Congregation, where he remained until 1861. He then accepted a call to the Kehilath Anshe Maarab, of Chicago, for which he officiated as reader, teacher, and preacher, with the exception of four years, until 1883. On account of his long, active and distinguished services to the cause of Judaism, Rev. Mr. Adler was then, at the advanced age of seventy-two, retired and pensioned by the Congregation Kehilath Anshe Maarab.

THE SINAI CONGREGATION was organized in 1860, as an offshoot from the Kehilath Anshe Maarab, by about twenty young members of the latter Congregation. Previous to the secession, these young men had constituted a Reform Association within the Kehilath Anshe Maarab, for the purpose of introducing into the services and doctrines of the Congregation certain changes which they considered more in accordance with the spirit of the times. Following are the names of the young men: B. Schoeneman, Godfrey Snyder, Henry and Elias Greenebaum, Gerhard Foreman, Leopold Mayer, Isaac Greensfelder, Michael Greenebaum, Sigmund Heyman, H. Foreman, Meyer Hirsch, A. Rubel, Joseph Liebenstein, A. Liebenstein and H. Liebenstein.

One of the objects attempted to be accomplished by this Reform Association, was to expunge from the liturgy that portion of it which expressed the hope that the Jews would some day return to Jerusalem; they desired that the Jews should cease to be a nation, and become simply a religious people. With this proposed reform movement the majority of the Kehilath Anshe Maarab were not in sympathy and would give it no encouragement. The members of the Reform Association therefore seceded, and formed a new body, which they named the Sinai Congregation, after the Mount from which the Law was given to the ancient Hebrews, and not without the hope that the Sinai Congregation might become the modern Mount Sinai, to which the Reformed Jews would look back as the origin of a great modern reform. One of their own number, Rev. Bernhard Felsenthal, was chosen as their first minister.

Temporary quarters were secured by purchasing a small frame church-building on Monroe Street, between Clark and Wells streets, for about $750, which had been used for some time by the First English Evangelical Lutheran Church. This served as a synagogue until the spring of 1865. At that time the Congregation purchased the Plymouth Congregational Church property, on the corner of VanBuren Street and Third Avenue, paying for it $7,500. The edifice was remodeled and improved so as to fit it for a Jewish temple, and a new building was erected for the accommodation of the day and Sabbath schools. The day-school was continued until 1869, when it was closed, on account of the excellent facilities for obtaining a secular education afforded by the public schools of the city. The VanBuren Street property was under contract of sale in 1871 for $62,500, when the great fire of that year destroyed the buildings. The purchaser then refused to consummate his purchase, and after protracted litigation the title reverted to the Congregation.

Dr. Felsenthal remained rabbi until 1864, when he retired to accept a call from Zion Congregation, then recently organized on the West Side, and which was an offshoot from Sinai. From that time to 1866, Sinai was without a regular minister. In the latter year, Dr. Chronik, of Berlin, Germany, was called, his services being secured by B. Schoeneman who was then traveling in Europe and who was president of the Congregation. Dr. Chronik remained until within two weeks of the great fire, and, in November following, Rev. Dr. Kohler was called from Detroit to fill the vacancy. The following is a list of the presiding officers of the Sabbath-school from its organization to the limit covered by this volume: B. Schoeneman, 1860 to 1867; Elias Greenebaum, 1867 to 1870; B. Lowenthal, 1870 to 1878.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE WESTERN HEBREW CHRISTIAN BROTHERHOOD had its origin, in 1868, in the desire of members of various Christian churches to convert Jews to Christianity. The first meeting to form a Mission for this purpose was held on the 13th of May. Rev. D. C. Marquis was chairman, and Rev. C. E. Ryder secretary. This Brotherhood was to be auxiliary to the Hebrew Christian Brotherhood of New York. Rev. G. R. Lederer, editor of the Israelite, made a brief statement of the origin of that Brotherhood. He said that it had been organized thirty-five years, and that then there were sixty-five thousand Jews in New York and Brooklyn, and only one missionary, himself, among them. Mr. Lederer had accepted Jesus as the Messiah for twenty-five years, and during that time he had suffered imprisonment in, and banishment from, his native country, Hungary, for seeking to propagate his faith among the Catholics of that Austrian dependency. He had converted sixty Jews since 1865. Another speaker, after presenting statistics with reference to the number of Jews in the world and its various portions, said there were twelve thousand Jews in Chicago, for the conversion of whom not one cent had been expended, except what was being done by the Protestant Episcopal Church.

A meeting was held on June 1, in the Second Presbyterian Church, at which a resolution was adopted, recommending that a public meeting be called to consider the feasibility of putting forth special efforts to Christianize the Jews of Chicago. The first annual meeting of this Society was held on May 11, 1869. The secretary, Rev. E. Van Noorden, reported that within the year four Jews had been converted, that one hundred and fifty visitations had been made, and that a large number of tracts had been distributed. The treasurer, John Creighton, reported that the receipts of the Society for the year had been $1,395.17, and the expenditures, $1,457.78. Resolutions were adopted to the effect that the evangelization of the Jews was a duty resting upon the whole Church of Christ. The second annual meeting of this Brotherhood was held February 15, 1870, in the North Presbyterian Church. The treasurer, John Creighton, reported the receipts of the Society to have been $2,375.23, and the expenses the same, but no converts had been made during the year.

THE BROTHERN OF THE UNITED FAITH.—This sect was started in Chicago in 1866. Their first meeting was held on Sunday, May 13, 1866, in the hall of the American Protestant Association, on the southeast corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets. They attracted but little attention until 1869. On Sunday, July 4 of that year, they held a convention in the same hall, when a statement of their peculiar views was made. The sentiment of this sect was against man-made creeds. On the 5th of July they formed a permanent organization, which they named the Northwestern Christian Association, and announced as their object the advancement of the cause of truth.

THE INTERNATIONAL CHURCH.—On the 14th of July, 1868, a meeting of ministers and others was held in the Second Presbyterian Church to consider the question of taking steps toward the erection of an International Church in London, England. Lieutenant-Governor Bross was made chairman, and explained that the movement was designed to afford leading American ministers the opportunity of preaching to the English people, and thus promote a better understanding between the two great Protestant nations of the world. Rev. Dr. Tompkins, of London, said that the movement was not intended to conciliate Americans, but that the English people desired American ministers to give their views on questions that were agitated from time to time. Dr. Haven then offered the following preambles and resolutions:

Whereas, The union of clergymen and Christian laymen of the United States and Great Britain upon common ground is calculated, under the Divine sanction, to promote the interests of both nations; and.

Whereas, A public hall connected with a church-edifice would provide a permanent place for American gentlemen visiting England to confer with gentlemen in that country upon questions connected with the interests, peace, etc., of both; Therefore,

Resolved, That this meeting cordially recommends the erection of an International church and hall by the united efforts of both countries, and that the gentlemen whose names are hereto annexed do constitute an association to be called the International Union of Illinois, to act in concert with similar associations formed in other States of the Union and with the trustees of the International church and hall in Great Britain.

The following officers were then named: President; Lieutenant-Governor Bross; treasurer, B. W. Raymond; financial secretary, E. D. L. Sweet; corresponding secretary, B. F. Jacobs. There were five vice-presidents, a committee of twenty-three prominent citizens, and an executive committee of seven.

THE SPIRITUALISTS.—From the founding of the Harmonists in 1856, but little of moment in connection with Spiritualism occurred for several years. Lectures were delivered from time to time by Spiritualists from different parts of the country. Among the speakers may be mentioned S. H. Brittan of New York, editor of the Spiritualistic Age; Andrew Jackson Davis and his wife, Mary Davis; S. C. Hewitt, of Boston; Thomas Gates Forster, editor of the Banner of Light; Father Phillips, of Cleveland; F. N. White, F. L. Wadsworth and J. P. Greenleaf, trance-speakers; Miss Ada L. Hoyt, rapping and writing test-medium; Hon. Warren Chase; and E. V. Wilson, the noted inspirational speaker.

The great event of the year 1864 was the National Convention of Spiritualists, which met in August. This was the first ever held in this or any other country. A preliminary meeting was held on the 8th, and on the 9th the convention was permanently organized by the choice of the following officers: President, S. S. Jones, of St. Charles, Ill.; vice-president, Dr. H. F. Gardner, of Boston; Mrs. Laura Cuppy, of Dayton, Ohio; Ira Porter, of Michigan; and Miss Lizzie Doten, of Boston; secretaries, F. L. Wadsworth, of New York, H. B. Storer, of Boston, Miss L. Patterson, of Dayton, Ohio, and Mrs. Buffum, of Chicago. The president, in his salutatory, said he had no creed, believing that creeds were no effectual bar against error. A general discussion followed, in which almost every member participated. On the second day, the subject of Spiritualism was largely discussed, as was also that of a permanent organization of Spiritualists. On the last day of the convention, this question was settled by the adoption of resolutions in opposition to a general or national organization and in favor of local organizations. On Sunday, the 14th, resolutions were adopted expressive of the sense of the convention on various topics, after which the convention adjourned.

On Sunday, February 20, 1865, Miss Emma F. Jay Bullene lectured in Bryan Hall, and on the 21st also, this time on Special Providences. On January 7, 1866, Charles A. Hayden, one of the ablest of Spiritualistic speakers, spoke in Crosby's Music Hall; and during the summer of that year, Miss Sarah A. Nutt lectured in the same place before the First Society of Spiritualists. On April 5, 1867, Robert Dale Owen lectured in this city on "Spiritualism; Its Aspect as a Phase of Religious Sentiment." On the 10th of April, 1868, Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Augusta J. Babbitt, both trance-speakers, delivered addresses.

CHICAGO CEMETERIES.

Let us turn for a time from the few brief years, crowned with riant life and activity, which have made up the wonderful past of Chicago, to that other great city where reigns voiceless silence and eternal peace. The virtues and achievements have been sounded of many who were identified with the city's rapid rise to prosperity; whose very bones have been crowded from their resting-place by the encroachments of the queenly city of their pride and early hopes, to find anew some distant, still abode, that now again lies almost within sound of her busy, restless life. This chapter must be limited to a mere recital of facts regarding the burial of the city's dead, for space will not admit of any extended description of the natural beauties and artificial improvements of the many cemeteries adjacent to Chicago.

An account of the laying out, by the town authorities of Chicago, in 1835, of two cemeteries—on the North and South sides, respectively—is given in the first volume of this history.* The northern half of the plat so set apart on the North Side was used as a place of sepulchre by the Protestants, while the southern portion became the first Catholic burying-ground in the city.

THE FIRST GRAVE-DIGGER in Chicago was Henry Gherkin, one of the early settlers.

HENRY GHERKIN was born in Hanover, near Bremen, in Prussia, September 15, 1787, and educated in Bremen. In 1823, he was married, in England, to an English lady, who died in New York, as also did their three children, of cholera. During the following year, Mr. Gherkin moved west to Buffalo, where, in 1834, he was married to Miss Mary Speicher. In 1836, he came to Chicago, where he was of great use, to both Germans and Americans, as an interpreter. He made a business of grave-digging, and, as has been said, was the first regular grave-digger in Chicago. In addition to this occupation, Mr. Gherkin was a market-gardener, supplying vessels and steamers on the lake, and was popularly known as "Dutch Henry." He died in July, 1877, at the good old age of ninety years, having ceased to dig graves in 1854.

* See vol. I, page 141.

THE FIRST UNDERTAKER in Chicago was an Englishman, named A. J. Bates, and he also owned the first hearse. He was succeeded by the firm of Gavin & Gehr, one an Irishman and the other a German.

No interments were made in the South-side grounds after 1842. About 1847, the city authorities re-interred the bodies from the South-side burying-ground in the Lincoln-park tract, known as the Chicago Cemetery.* The Chicago Cemetery tract contained altogether three thousand one hundred and thirty-six burial lots, and was designated, under the old survey, as the "Milliman" tract. By a decision of the Supreme Court, the city lost the title to the Milliman tract, and, not being able to perfect or obtain the title, the Common Council, in 1865, ordered the vacation of the tract, authorizing lot-owners to exchange their lots for lots in any of the new cemeteries, of equal size and of their own selection. Graceland, Rosehill and Oakwoods had, at this date, been established.

When the time allowed the city to vacate the tract (two years) had expired, a special committee, appointed by the Common Council, consisting of Aldermen Woodard, Wicker and Lawson, made the selection for about two hundred lot-owners who had not made any selection and could not be found. The committee selected lots, of equal size and in the best obtainable location, in that portion of Oakwoods known as the "Third Division, Section B," where the bodies were re-interred in precisely the same order as they had been in the Chicago Cemetery. The city holds the title to the whole tract purchased in Oakwoods, and any of the owners of the lots so exchanged were given the privilege of obtaining a deed to the new lot upon execution of a release of the old one. After several years of litigation, the portion of the old Chicago Cemetery included in the present limits of Lincoln Park passed under the control of the park commissioners. Joseph H. Ernst, of No. 271 North Avenue, was the sexton of the Chicago Cemetery for a number of years and had charge of the exhumation of the bodies.

* As a matter of interest in this connection, it may be mentioned that Thomas B. Bryan secured the South-side tract and sub-divided it into lots, the principal street being Calumet Avenue. On every deed of lots along this street, Mr. Bryan incorporated a provision that the houses should be built one hundred feet back from the street line.

THE ROSEHILL CEMETERY COMPANY was chartered February 11, 1859, the incorporators being William B. Ogden, Charles G. Hammond, John H. Kinzie, Hiram A. Tucker, Levi D. Boone, Benjamin W. Raymond, Charles V. Dyer, James H. Reese, John Evans, Jonathan Burr, Levi B. Taft, E. K. Rogers, Robert H. Morford, Andrew T. Sherman, William Turner, George Schneider, C. H. Diehl, Andrew Nelson, James V. Z. Blaney, Henry Smith, Philo Judson, E. C. Jansen and Francis H. Benson. Dr. Blaney was the first president of the association. The land bought for the cemetery was five hundred acres lying six and a half miles north of the city. Improvements were at once begun. The cemetery was dedicated by the laying of the corner-stone of the chapel with Masonic ceremonies July 28, 1859, M. W. I. A. W. Buck, Grand Master, officiating. The first interment was of the remains of Dr. J. W. Ludlam, July 11, 1859.

Rosehill has a magnificent entrance arch, a capacious receiving vault, and a spacious chapel. A steady flow of clear water is obtained from an artesian well; a number of artificial lakes have been formed; there are large and handsome greenhouses and conservatories; the avenues, drives and walks are constructed to be durable and permanent; and the grounds are well tended. About two hundred and fifty acres of the grounds are thus improved, and the interments up to date number nearly 30,000. By an amendment to the charter, the company is required to pay ten per cent. of all proceeds to a perpetual care fund, which now amounts to about $35,000. The trustees of this fund are Charles B. Farwell, Orrington Lunt and Henry F. Lewis. The present officers of the company are Frederick Tuttle, president; William H. Turner, vice-president and auditor; Van H. Higgins, treasurer; and Joseph Gow, secretary and superintendent.

GRACELAND CEMETERY was founded in 1861, by Thomas B. Bryan, who purchased eighty acres of land, five and a half miles from the center of the city, on rising ridges near the lake shore. Since then, various additions of land have been made, until the cemetery is larger than any other in the country except Greenwood Cemetery, New York. The first board of managers was composed of William B. Ogden, Sidney Sawyer, E. H. Sheldon and George P. A. Healy. The grounds are improved in much the same manner as those at Rosehill—there being several natural springs, from which water for irrigation and supplying the artificial lakes and fountains is drawn by steam pumps. The grounds are superbly ornamented with rare vases, beautifully designed statuary, noble monuments and handsomely kept walks, terraces and flower beds. The cemetery is reached by steam and street-cars and the lake shore boulevard drive. There have been 40,000 interments to date. The same charter provision as in the case of the Rosehill company, for a perpetual improvement fund, applies to the Graceland Corporation. Ten per cent. of the gross receipts from the sale of lots is set apart, and draws compound interest, and insures the perpetual maintenance and preservation of the cemetery. The trustees and managers of the fund are William Blair, J. M. McGennis, Daniel Thompson, Marcus C. Stearns, E. W. Blatchford, Hiram Wheeler, George C. Walker, Jerome Beecher, Edwin H. Sheldon, A. J. Averill, John DeKoven and Henry W. King. Bryan Lathrop is the president of the company, and T. E. Patterson secretary.

OAKWOODS CEMETERY, already mentioned in connection with the transfer of the bodies from the old Chicago Cemetery, lies three and a half miles due south of the city limits. It is reached by the boulevard drives through the North Park, and Illinois Central Hyde Park trains stop at 67th Street, from whence a broad walk leads to the cemetery entrances. The cemetery was laid out in 1864, by M. A. Farwell, who at that time, owned one hundred and sixty acres of land, and has since added forty acres more to the site. The cemetery is conducted entirely upon the lawn plan, and has many beautiful and attractive features. There are some splendid vistas of waterscape from different points about the four ornamental lakes, and the lawns are well kept and inviting. Four greenhouses supply flowers for the purpose of decoration, and portions of the grounds are shaded by native oaks. Two new lakes and two greenhouses are under process of construction. There is an artistically constructed house for the use of the superintendent; a chapel 18x30 feet in area, and vault of large capacity. The Soldiers' Home has a burial plat here and a handsome monument, surrounded by cannon and stacks of balls. There have been 19,000 interments since the cemetery was established. The corporation is subject to the same regulations regarding the creation of a special maintenance fund as the other cemetery associations. The incorporators were Joseph B. Wells, William B. Herrick, John Evans, Norman B. Judd, William B. Egan, Ebenezer Peck, J. Young Scammon, R. K. Swift and Charles N. McKubbin. The present officers are Marcus A. Farwell, president; W. C. D. Grannis, treasurer; George M. Bogue, secretary; and William Dennison, superintendent.

FOREST HOME CEMETERY lies on the banks of the Desplaines River, four and a half miles west of Chicago, on Madison Street. It is reached by the Chicago and Western Dummy, and the Chicago & North-Western steam-cars to Oak Park. The cemetery comprises a part of the beautiful Haase's Park, once a noted pleasure resort. There are now nearly eighty acres under improvement. The cemetery is provided with an elegant entrance, commodious waiting rooms, a chapel and a vault of sufficient capacity for all demands. The lawn system of keeping the cemetery was adopted from the start, and its superior beauty can be seen at a glance. The company is incorporated and has a permanent improvement fund. The officers of the company are Ferd. Haase, president; E. S. Dreyer, treasurer; Emil R. Haase, secretary. Mr. Haase founded the cemetery in 1876. The Concordia Church Society bought forty acres of land near by, facing Madison Street, in 1870, and the grounds are now handsomely improved. There have been about 10,000 interments in both cemeteries. Seven Evangelical Lutheran Churches bury their dead here.

WALDHEIM CEMETERY.—Directly opposite Forest Home Cemetery, to the south, and lying between Harrison and Twelfth streets, on the Desplaines River, is Waldheim Cemetery. Its distance from the city is four and a half miles. It is owned by a corporation re-organized in 1881 under the law of 1879, and is subject to the same provisions as to maintenance as the other cemeteries. The Odd Fellows, Musicians' Union, Sons of Hermann, St. Peter's German Lutheran Church, and other societies, have burial-plots here. The cemetery is beautified with fine lawns, flowers, shrubbery, and well-kept walks and drives. There are two ornamental lakes, one containing natural springs, and a system of water-works distributes the water where needed. The cemetery is, also, well severed, over 10,000 feet of tile having been laid during the past two years. There is a neat brick chapel on the grounds, and one of the largest receiving vaults in the country. The interments number about 15,000 up to date. The officers of the association are: Phillip Maas, president; Jacob Heisler, vice-president; John Buhler, secretary; John M. Faulhauber, treasurer; and C. Schwartz, superintendent.

WÖNDER CEMETERY.—A German cemetery was laid out, near Waldheim, in 1860, at which time it consisted of four and a half acres. It was called "Wönder" Cemetery, in honor of Henry Wönder, a noted German Lutheran divine. In 1866 it was increased to fourteen and a half acres. There were no burials here after 1872.

ST. BONIFACE, a German Catholic Cemetery, consisting of about thirty acres, is located on the Green Bay road, three and a half miles north of the city.

CALVARY CEMETERY is the favorite burial-place of the Irish Catholic Churches. It lies nine miles north of the city, near Evanston. It was consecrated shortly after the date of the opening of Graceland, although prior to this some of the bodies taken from the consecrated ground in the old Chicago cemetery were re-interred here. The office of the cemetery was formerly located on Franklin Street, in the city, but it is now at the grounds. The cemetery is a large one, well kept, and beautified by many costly improvements. The interments number upward of 20,000.

THE HEBREW CONGREGATIONS have a cemetery five miles north of the city, on the Green Bay road. They formerly had a plot of ground in the Chicago Cemetery. The Hebrew Benevolent Society established a burial-ground here in 1855. The grounds are high and overlook the lake, and contain a number of fine monuments. Sinai and Zion congregations have an extensive plot reserved at Rosehill.

As nearly as can be ascertained, the total number of Chicago's dead, buried in cemeteries near the city, is one hundred and fifty thousand.

C. H. JORDAN, an old citizen of Chicago, and to-day one of the oldest undertakers in the city, was born in Piqua, Ohio, in 1826. His father, David J. Jordan, was a prominent dry-goods merchant of that place, in which business the younger Jordan was trained. He was, however, given a liberal education. After completing his academic course, he entered Woodward College, at Cincinnati, Ohio, from which institution he graduated as a member of the class of 1845. Immediately on leaving college, he entered upon a mercantile career in Piqua, Ohio, afterward connecting himself with a wholesale house in Cincinnati. In these two places he remained for several years, and, in 1854, he came to Chicago as the general western agent for Crane, Breed & Co., manufacturers of metallic burial cases. Making this city his headquarters, and carrying a large stock of goods in his store, he spent some years in traveling, selling and introducing his goods in the West. At the same time, too, he established himself in the undertaking business, at No. 134 Clark Street, remaining there until he was burned out in the great fire in October of 1871. Immediately thereafter, he resumed business on the West Side, where he remained until the summer of 1872, when he removed to No. 112 Clark Street, in the old Exchange Building, the site where now stands the new Chicago Opera House. His next removal was to No. 114 Monroe Street, where he remained until 1881, when he removed to his present location. In 1854, when Mr. Jordan came to Chicago, there were but three firms besides himself in his line of business; these were Wright & McClure, located on LaSalle Street, John Gavin, on Market Street, and W. T. Woodson, on Washington Street. Of these firms, none are now in existence but a son of Mr. Wright, of the first mentioned house, who is still in this line of business. It is, no doubt, safe to assert that Mr. Jordan has officiated in his capacity as undertaker on the occasions of the deaths of more of Chicago's old and leading citizens than any other funeral director in the city. He was married, in 1856, to Miss Mary Scott, daughter of William Scott, formerly president of the First National Bank, of Piqua, Ohio; and has had two children, one of whom, Scott Jordan, is now connected with his father in business.

JAMES WRIGHT was born in England, in 1816. While young, he emigrated to America, and learned the trade of carpenter and cabinet-maker in this country. In 1846, he came to Chicago, and soon after reaching this city, formed a partnership with Andrew McClure, under the firm name and style of McClure & Wright. This firm succeeded A. J. Bates, the first undertaker in Chicago. At Mr. McClure's death, William A. McClure succeeded him, the firm name being Wright & McClure. In 1864, George P. Wright succeeded William A. McClure, as a member of the firm, when the firm name was changed to James Wright & Son. James Wright died on February 16, 1880. To accurate and systematic business habits he united sterling integrity and rare social gifts. His many friends deplored the loss which they incurred by his removal to a life upon which he entered without fear. Mr. Wright was married, in 1855, to Annie E. Hood, of this city. Mr. and Mrs. James Wright had six children, only three of whom survive—George P., Margaret and Mary.

GEORGE P. WRIGHT, who succeeded his father in business, was born in Philadelphia, on August 11, 1839. In 1864, as has been already said, he entered into partnership with his father, since whose death he has successfully conducted the business alone. In the same year of the formation of his partnership with his father, he married Miss Mary A. Brown, of Beldo, Wis. Five children have been born to them—George James, Charles P., Clara, Addie and Walter.

JOSEPH ROGERSON is a son of John and Agnes (Parkinson) Rogerson. He was born in England, in December, 1833. At the age of sixteen, he came to the United States, and settled in Chicago. For ten years he was employed in a carriage-shop. In 1859, he started in business as an undertaker, at No. 115 West Randolph Street, and was, for a number of years, the only undertaker on the West Side. His success has exceeded his expectations. He soon purchased the property which he first rented, and now owns real estate in various portions of the city. In 1857, he married Miss Eliza Daro, a native of England, whose parents had come to this country while she was a child. They have had three children, only one of whom is living—Edward J., born in 1860. He married Miss Fannie Dayton, and is at present engaged in business with his father. Mr. Rogerson, Sr., and his wife have been members of the Baptist Church for more than thirty years. He is a member of Fort Dearborn Lodge, I. O. O. F., and for four years has been president of the Undertakers' Association. He enjoys the esteem, not only of his own guild, but of the community at large.

F. H. HILL & Co.—This firm was first organized in 1866, by J. H. Boyd and F. H. Hill, for the purpose of manufacturing coffins and caskets, and continued until 1874, when Mr. Boyd withdrew, and a partnership was formed by F. H. Hill and Mortimer Goff, under the present firm name. They were first located at Calhoun Place, and then removed to No. 292 South Franklin Street, and erected a large brick building, which was destroyed in the great fire of 1871, and partly re-built and running within thirty days after. The building they now occupy is 105 by 120 feet, and has an area of about 126,000 square feet. During the first year of their business they employed about ten hands, and their gross sales amounted to about $15,000, while last year they gave employment to about one hundred and fifty hands, and their sales amounted to over $300,000. They are among the largest houses in their line of trade in the West, and are an important factor in Chicago's industries. Francis H. Hill was born in Canal Dover, Tuscarawas Co., Ohio, in 1835, and is the son of Edmund and Mary (Rupp) Hill. At an early age he went to Pittsburgh, Penn., where he received a good common-school education. After completing his studies he learned the cabinet business, and was employed in it until 1864, when he became associated with Mr. Algeo in the manufacture of coffins, under the name of Algeo & Hill. This continued for six months, when a joint-stock company was formed, the business being carried on until 1866, when Mr. Hill came to Chicago, and during that year permanently settled here. He soon became associated with Mr. Boyd in the manufacture of coffins, and continued with him until 1874, when the firm changed to the present style of F. H. Hill & Co. Mr. Hill was married in Columbus, Ohio, to Miss Caroline Griffith of that city, in 1856.

THE BENCH AND BAR.

From 1857, the Chicago Bar greatly increased and began to assume the characteristics of a metropolitan Bar. With the growth of the city the field of litigation grew wider, and the interests involved became of greater import. The rapid extensions of railroads and telegraphs, the vast enlargement of commerce and shipping, the growth and methods of the Board of Trade, and all the various efforts in business that an industrious and ingenious people could devise for the satisfaction of their physical wants and augmentation of their wealth, gave rise to legal questions which had hardly been considered by the early Bar. Up to 1858, the reports of the Supreme Court of the State were contained in twenty volumes, embracing a period of forty years. In 1871, the numbers had grown to sixty volumes, or forty volumes for the fourteen years from 1858 to 1871. Nor does this adequately show the real increase in litigation, for, prior to 1858, the business of the Federal courts was but trifling comparatively, while after that period it grew rapidly in importance and extent.

To these new demands the Judiciary and Bar easily responded, and the second period of our history presents a galaxy of names which will long remain the pride of Chicago. It would be difficult to find a more honorable, high-minded and well-informed Bar than that of Chicago, the older members manifesting an unvarying kindness to their juniors, and betraying no jealousy of each other. The Bench has always been able, and in some cases great; and many of the decisions of Drummond, of Manierre, of Wilson, and of McAllister have been accepted by the Bar as final, or have been adopted in totidem verbis, by the Supreme Court. The judges of all the courts, Federal and State, in 1858, numbered six, and the Bar about three hundred and sixty. In 1871, the judges were eleven and the Bar about one thousand.

THE UNITED STATES COURTS.

The seventh judicial circuit of the United States in 1858 embraced the States of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Ohio. The Judge was John McLean, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

JOHN MCLEAN was one of the foremost of American jurists, which high position he attained by an indomitable will. He was the son of a poor man, and was born in New Jersey, on the 11th of March, 1785. When he was still young, his father removed to the West, first settling in West Virginia, afterward in Kentucky, and finally in what is now Warren County, Ohio. There, young McLean labored on the farm, acquiring what occasional schooling he could, until he was eighteen years of age, when he went to Cincinnati, to write in the clerk's office of Hamilton County. This employment enabled him to support himself, and at the same time gave him opportunity for pursuing the study of the law, which he had long resolved should be his vocation in life. He was admitted to practice in 1807, and commenced his professional life at Lebanon, Ohio, where he soon rose into a lucrative practice. He was married the same year, and entered upon political life. Identifying himself with the Democratic party, and heartily supporting the administration of Madison in its war policy, he was, in 1812 elected to Congress, and unanimously re-elected in 1811. His career in Congress added greatly to his reputation, but the position was not entirely congenial to him, and he declined a re-election, after serving two terms. In 1816, he was chosen to the Supreme Bench of Ohio, where he served until 1822, when he was appointed, by President Monroe, Commissioner of the General Land Office. He remained in this station only a few months, when he was appointed Postmaster-General. This position he held through the remainder of Monroe's term and throughout that of John Quincy Adams. When President Jackson came in, McLean declined a re-appointment, as well as the offer of the war or navy departments. The President, however, wishing to avail himself of abilities which had been so long exerted for the public welfare, tendered him the place of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and on his signifying that he would accept, he was immediately nominated, and the nomination confirmed by the Senate. Here he became the associate and peer of Marshall and Story, and the opinions he delivered rank with those delivered by these eminent jurists. When on the circuit, also, his charges to the grand juries are distinguished for their ability and eloquence. One of the most noted of these was delivered in December, 1838, at the time of the Canadian insurrection, in regard to aiding or favoring unlawful military combinations by our citizens against a foreign government with whom we are at peace. He was frequently mentioned as a candidate for the Presidency, but he never sought to achieve it by carrying favor with the populace at the expense of principle. His name was before the Free Soil Convention, at Buffalo, in 1848, when Van Buren was nominated; and again, at Philadelphia, in 1856, in the Republican Convention, he received one hundred and ninety-six votes to three hundred and fifty-nine for John C. Fremont. He also received some votes in the Republican Convention in 1860, at Chicago, when Lincoln was nominated. In 1857, he delivered his celebrated dissenting opinion in the Dred Scott case, in which, against the majority of the court, he took the ground that slavery had its origin in power merely, was against right, and in this country was sustained only by local law, and that Congress had entire control over it in the Territories. The reports of his decisions on the circuit are contained in six volumes, entitled McLean's reports. They are largely cited, and rank high as authority. He died in Cincinnati, April 4, 1861. A large meeting of the members of the Chicago Bar was held on Saturday, April 6, 1861, to give expression to their sentiments in relation to his death. Thomas Hoynes was made chairman, and a committee of twelve was appointed to draft suitable resolutions.

Noah H. Swayne was appointed the successor of Judge McLean on the 4th of January, 1862, and consequently became Judge of the United States Circuit Court at Chicago, but he never presided at that court. The seventh judicial circuit, comprising the States of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Ohio, had been organized under the act of Congress of March 3, 1837. This act was amended by the act of July 15, 1862, in which the States of Michigan, Wisconsin and Illinois were made to form the eighth judicial circuit. This was again amended January 28, 1863, under which Ohio and Michigan formed the seventh circuit, and Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin the eighth circuit. This arrangement lasted until the act of 1869 establishing circuit courts, subsequently to be mentioned.

On the 8th of December, 1862, David Davis was appointed an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and was assigned to the eighth judicial circuit. He held his first term, as Judge of the United States Circuit Court, at Chicago in July 1863.

DAVID DAVIS was born in Cecil County, Maryland, on the 10th of March, 1815. He received a careful education, first at an academy in Delaware, and subsequently at Kenyon College, in Ohio, where he graduated in 1832. Choosing the law for his profession, he commenced his studies under Judge H. W. Bishop, at Lenox, Mass., and after two years there, attended the law school at New Haven, Conn., and in 1835 he was admitted to practice.

Determined to settle in the growing West, he first opened an office at Pekin, Ill., but a few months later changed his location to Bloomington, which ever afterward continued to be his home. Shortly after, he married Miss Sarah Walker, of Pittsfield, Mass., and found in her a companion who contributed in no small degree to his future success in life. An ardent admirer of Henry Clay, Mr. Davis soon found himself engaged in political life, and in the great Clay campaign of 1844, he was elected to the Legislature, and in 1847 to the Constitutional Convention. By the Constitution adopted by that convention, a new judiciary was created, to be elected by the people. Although a circuit in which Mr. Davis lived was strongly Democratic, he was the choice of the Bar and the people for circuit judge, and was elected without opposition. This position he held until transferred, by his life-long friend, President Lincoln, to the Supreme Court of the United States. Although not a strong partisan, Judge Davis acted with the Republican party from its formation, and, in 1858, actively supported Mr. Lincoln in his great Senatorial campaign with Judge Douglas. He was most intimately in the confidence of the Republican leader, and was so recognized; and in 1860, when the delegates were chosen to attend the Republican convention at Chicago, Judge Davis was appointed a delegate at large. He labored for Mr. Lincoln's nomination, and, though it would be too much to say that the nomination was due to him, his influence was undoubtedly a large and important factor in securing it. At the beginning of the secession movement, in the winter of 1860-61, Judge Davis advocated a conservative course, hoping to avert the war, and accompanied Mr. Lincoln to Washington, and was present at his inauguration. Moderate counsels could not prevent war, and Judge Davis retired to his home ready to give his active and hearty support to the administration. In December, 1862, he was appointed to the Supreme Bench of the United States, although almost unknown to the Bar of the country at large. But as a judge he soon gained the respect of his associates and all who had business in that great tribunal, for his learning, his clearness of reasoning, and his independence. In February, 1877, he was elected to the United States Senate, by the Legislature of Illinois, and resigned his seat upon the Bench. In all the service he has given to the public and to his country, he has always been earnest, faithful, zealous and unostentatious, and he has commanded the respect of those opposed to him, and the confidence and admiration of his friends. Through early and fortunate investments in lands in Chicago, and elsewhere in Illinois, Judge Davis is now the possessor of a handsome fortune. In his retirement he resides at Bloomington, admired and respected by all who know him.

By Act of July 3, 1866, the judicial circuits were again changed by Congress—Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin becoming the seventh; and on April 10, 1869, Congress enacted a law providing for the appointment of a circuit judge for each of the nine existing judicial circuits, who should reside in his circuit and possess the same power and jurisdiction as the justice of the Supreme Court allotted to the circuit. Under this law, and with the universal approbation of the Bar and the people, Judge Thomas Drummond, so long the Judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, was appointed Circuit Judge by President Grant.

THOMAS DRUMMOND was born October 16, 1809, in Bristol, Lincoln Co., Maine, to which place his grandfather, a native of Scotland, had removed prior to 1776, a settlement having been made near the headland called Pemaquid Point, afterward Bristol, very early in the seventeenth century. James Drummond, father of Thomas, like most of the early settlers on the coast of Maine was a sailor as well as a farmer, and the early life of his son was spent amid surroundings that eminently fitted him for the admiralty practice in which he later gained such marked distinction. James Drummond was a member of the Maine State Legislature several years, and died in 1837. The mother of Judge Drummond was a daughter of Henry Little of Newcastle, Maine, who died while her son was yet young. After mastering the preliminary studies at the common schools and at the academies at New Castle, Monmouth, Farmington and Gorham, the young man entered Bowdoin College, at Brunswick, Maine, from which, after a full course, he graduated in 1830, being then twenty-one years of age. He immediately commenced the study of law in the office of William T. Dwight of Philadelphia, a son of President Dwight of Yale College, with whom he remained until Mr. Dwight abandoned the law and entered the ministry, when he finished his legal studies with Thomas Bradford, Jr., and was admitted to practice at the Philadelphia Bar, in March, 1833. In 1835 he removed to Galena, Ill., and there built up a most honorable and lucrative practice in the course of the next fifteen years. His reputation as a sound, skillful and honorable jurist was not confined to his adopted county or State; and on the death of Judge Nathaniel Pope, of the United States District Court of Illinois, in February, 1850, he was appointed by President Taylor his successor, and held his first term of court in Springfield in June, and in Chicago in July, of the same year. In 1854, Judge Drummond removed to Chicago, in which city or its vicinity he has continuously resided since that time. In 1855, the Northern District of Illinois was organized, of which he became judge, and over which he presided many years, performing the duties of district judge until, in December, 1860, he was appointed judge of the Circuit Court of the United States for the seventh judicial district, comprising the States of Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin. That position he held until July, 1884, when he resigned. In the olden times, Judge Drummond was an earnest, energetic member of the Whig party, and as such was elected to the Illinois State Legislature in 1840-41. This was the only elective political office he has ever held, although since the formation of the Republican party he has been in close sympathy with its principles. For more than thirty-four years Judge Drummond occupied the bench of a United States court in Chicago; for nearly fifteen he performed the responsible duties of judge of the Seventh Judicial Circuit, maintaining his position with the most eminent jurists of the day, commanding universal respect for his firmness and integrity and gaining the love and admiration of his cotemporaries by his gentle dignity and constant courtesy. Judge Drummond was married, in 1839, at Willow Springs, Lafayette Co., Wis., to Miss Delia A. Sheldon, daughter of John P. Sheldon. His family consists of two sons and four daughters. His eldest son, Frank, is a farmer, living in Decatur County, Iowa. His youngest son, James J., was educated as a dynamic engineer at the Yale Sheffield School.

HENRY W. BLODGETT qualified as a judge of the United States District Court on the 26th of January, 1870, having been appointed to succeed Judge Drummond. He was born at Amherst, Mass., on July 21, 1821, and when he was in his tenth year his parents moved to Illinois. His mother was a woman of superior refinement and education, and under her instruction Henry was fitted to enter the Amherst Academy, which he did at the age of seventeen. Completing his studies, he returned to Illinois, where he engaged in school teaching and land surveying, which he pursued for several years. In 1842, he entered the law office of Scammon & Judd, in Chicago, and was admitted to practice in 1845. He commenced business at Waukegan, then called Little Fort, and had the usual experience of a youthful barrister, meeting with the success his industry and application deserved. In 1852, he was chosen to the lower house of the Legislature, and in 1858, became a member of the senate. From its beginning he became largely interested in the North-Western Railway, and subsequently in the Milwaukee & St. Paul road, and served them in the various capacities of attorney, director, and president. He soon became noted as one of the best railroad lawyers in the West. He was for a time solicitor for the Michigan Southern, the Fort Wayne, the Rock Island, and the Chicago & North-Western railroads. In 1870, President Grant appointed him as judge of the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, with the entire approval of the Bar of the Northwest. His ability, his learning, his memory and power of concentration all abundantly qualify him for his high position. Judge Blodgett is a tireless student of the law, and a wide reader in other fields of learning. He possesses the entire confidence of the Bar, and it is not often that his judgments are overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. Like his predecessor, Judge Drummond, he has for a number of years transacted almost the entire business of the Circuit Court in common-law cases, the other judges being largely occupied in chambers, and in other branches of the vast litigation that has occupied the Federal courts since the extension of jurisdiction by Congress in 1866. In private life, Judge Blodgett is generous, charitable, and of great purity of mind. In 1850, he married Miss Althea Crocker, of Hamilton, N. Y., and has had five children, three of whom are now living.

Hon. Thomas Hoyno was district attorney on February 13, 1855, when the division of the State into two districts occurred; and, together with Judge Drummond and Ira Nye—the latter then just appointed United States Marshal—was transferred to the Northern District, with headquarters at Chicago. About a month prior to the division, Philip A. Hoyno was appointed United States Commissioner for the District of Illinois, the date of his commission being January 9, 1855, and he was transferred, with the other attachés of the district court, to the northern division. William Pope was the clerk of the Court at this time.

In March, 1857, upon the accession of President

Buchanan, A. M. Herrington, of Geneva, was appointed to succeed Thomas Hoyne as district attorney, and James W. Davidson, of Monmouth, to the position of marshal. When the political differences between President Buchanan and Stephen A. Douglas arose, Davidson, being an adherent of Douglas, was removed, and Charles N. Pine, of Princeton, appointed in his place. District Attorney Herrington was also superseded at the same time, and for the same reason, and Henry N. Fitch, son of G. W. Fitch, then United States Senator from Indiana, was appointed to the office. Pine turned out a defaulter in the office of marshal, and for this cause was removed before the expiration of his term. A lively contest for the place ensued, joined in by upwards of a dozen aspirants, and ultimately the office was turned over to the care of Thomas Hoyne, who was one of Pine's unfortunate bondsmen. Mr. Hoyne conducted the affairs of the office in a highly satisfactory manner for a period of about twelve months, or until the expiration of the term. Shortly after President Lincoln's inauguration, in 1861, Hon. J. Russell Jones, of Galena, received the appointment of marshal, and at this time E. C. Larned proved the successful competitor for the office of district attorney. Mr. Jones retained the office of marshal until 1869, when he resigned, and his brother-in-law, B. H. Campbell, was appointed in his stead. Mr. Larned resigned the office of district attorney in 1864, and Mr. Bass was appointed to the vacancy. When President Johnson succeeded to the administration, in 1866, Mr. Bass was removed and Jesse O. Norton appointed. Mr. Norton held the office until April 5, 1869, when Judge Joseph O. Glover succeeded him. B. H. Campbell served as marshal until April 15, 1877, when the appointee of the new administration came in. Hon. William H. Bradley was appointed clerk of the Circuit and District courts March 22, 1855, and is still (1885) an occupant of that office.

LOCATION OF THE COURTS.—The first law administered from the Federal Court in Chicago was by Judge Pope, in 1837. The scene of Judge Pope's judicial dispensation in those days was George W. Meeker's store, on Lake Street, between Clark and Dearborn streets. Judge Drummond also held court in "Meeker's store." From there, the court was removed to the Saloon Building, at the southeast corner of Clark and Lake streets, where it remained several years, and from whence, in 1857, it was removed to more commodious quarters in the Larmon Building, corner of Clark and Washington streets. Upon the completion of the Government building, at the corner of Dearborn and Monroe streets, the courts and appendant offices were removed to it, where they remained until the destruction of the building in the great fire. Immediately after the fire, the courts, with the Custom House and other Government institutions, went to Congress Hall, at the corner of Michigan Avenue and Congress Street, where they remained until overtaken by the fire of July, 1874, when they were transferred to the Republic Life Building.

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.—Annexed to the courts are the masters in chancery, proper and additional, and the register in bankruptcy. The office of Master in Chancery was in existence during the early days of Judge Pope and was conducted for upward of twenty-five years by Tilden Moulton, who was succeeded, in 1863, by Henry W. Bishop, Jr. E. B. Sherman and John F. Bennett are the additional masters.

The bankrupt law of 1867 created the office of Register in Bankruptcy. Lincoln Clark was the first register, and he held the office until January, 1870, when he resigned, and Homer N. Hibbard was appointed to fill the vacancy.

HOMER NASH HIBBARD was born November 7, 1824, in Bethel, Windsor Co., Vt., the son of Samuel and Edith (Nash) Hibbard. Mr. Hibbard is descended from Robert and Joan "Hibbert," who were members of the Congregational Church at Salem, Mass., in 1635. He is of the sixth generation, thus: Robert (2d), Nathaniel, Zebulon, Zebulon (2d), Samuel and Homer N. Through his mother, a daughter of Phineas Nash—he is in the same degree removed from Thomas Nash—a member of Rev. John Davenport's colony of Quinnipiac, now New Haven, Conn. In 1846, Mr. Hibbard entered the University of Vermont, and graduated in the class of 1850. He then became principal of the Burlington High School for two years, when he entered the Dane Law School of Harvard University, remaining until the spring of 1853. He continued his law studies for six months longer at Burlington, when he was admitted to the Bar. Coming to Chicago, he was admitted to the Bar, in Illinois, November 7, 1853, and formed a partnership with John A. Jameson, with whom he removed to Freeport in 1854. In 1856, he formed a partnership with Martin P. Sweet, of that city, and took an active part in its educational interests, being president of the Board of Education. He was appointed master in chancery, and elected city attorney, and in this latter capacity drafted its charter and codified its ordinances. In 1860, he returned to Chicago, to re-join his former partner in the firm of Cornwell, Jameson & Hibbard, which was dissolved in 1865, by the election of Mr. Jameson to the Bench; he afterward formed the firm of Hibbard, Rich & Noble, which was dissolved during 1871. In January, 1870, Mr. Hibbard was appointed by Judge Drummond register in bankruptcy for Chicago, a position he has since held. In 1860, he took up his residence in Hyde Park, where he has been a member of the Board of Education for ten years, and its president many times. He married Miss Jane Noble in 1855 (born in 1828, a daughter of Hon. William Noble, a lawyer and postmaster of Burlington, Vt.).

CLERK OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS.

WILLIAM HENRY BRADLEY, clerk of the United States District Court and of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, was born at Ridgefield, Conn., November 29, 1816. His grandfather was an officer in the Revolutionary War, holding the rank of colonel, and during the administration of Washington and Adams was United States marshal for the District of Connecticut. His father, a graduate of Yale, was a lawyer of prominence in Connecticut, and became one of the judges of Fairfield County. Young Bradley was educated at Ridgefield Academy, and was about to enter Yale when his father died, in 1833. This event changed his career, and he commenced his business life as teller in the City Bank of New Haven. In 1837, at the age of twenty-one, he removed to Galena, then one of the most stirring and promising cities in the Northwest. There he became clerk of the County Court, and, in 1840, clerk of the Circuit Court of Jo Daviess County. This position he held, by repeated appointments and re-elections, until 1855, when, Congress having created the Northern District, Judge Drummond, with the concurrence of Judge McLean, appointed Mr. Bradley clerk of the United States Circuit and District courts for the new district; and on March 22, 1855, he entered upon his duties. This position he has held for thirty years, to the entire satisfaction of the courts, the Bar, and the community, winning their regard and commanding their respect. He has also held other positions of trust and confidence. He is one of the trustees of the Newberry estate; was at one time president of the Young Men's Christian Association, director and president of the West Division Railway, and deacon in the New England Congregational Church. He has been a member of the Church since 1831. In May, 1841, he married Miss Ada Sophomore Strong, of Roxbury, Litchfield Co., Conn.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER.

PHILIP AUGUSTUS HOYNE is a native of the city of New York, born on November 20, 1825. He came to Chicago in 1841, and entered the office of his brother, Thomas Hoyne, who had preceded him about five years, and began the study of law; but in the course of a year went to Galena, and remained until 1844, when he returned to Chicago as agent of a St. Louis fur company, which position he relinquished after a trial of a few months, and returned to Galena. Mr. Hoyne settled permanently in Chicago in 1851, where he engaged in real estate business with the late Colonel J. B. F. Russell. He was elected clerk of the Recorder's Court of the City of Chicago in 1853, and held that office five years. During his leisure moments he resumed the study of law, and was admitted to the Bar early in 1855, and to the Supreme Court of the United States on February 3, 1858. While acting as clerk of the Recorder's Court of Chicago, he was appointed United States Commissioner for the District of Illinois, by Hon. Thomas Drummond, judge of the United States District Court, January 9, 1855. He is the oldest in the service in the Northwest. Mr. Hoynes has held numerous public positions, having been a member of the Board of Education of Chicago nine years, acting as its president two successive terms. In early times he was connected with the fire and military departments, having been a member of the old Chicago Artillery years prior to, and at, the breaking out of the Civil War. In connection with Hon. John Wentworth, E. G. Keith, Judge Bradwell, and others, he was instrumental in starting the Union League Club in the winter of 1850. In connection with M. E. Stone, of the Daily News, D. K. Pearson, and others, he took the initiative in the movement for a memorial of the great fire. He is usually foremost in all the enterprises of the day, and is widely and familiarly known. He was a member of the Republican State Central Committee of Illinois from 1876 to 1881. He was married, on April 29, 1849, to Miss Teresa C. French, daughter of the distinguished grammarian, D'Arcy A. French. They have two sons, William A. and John Thomas. Mr. Hoynes is an Odd Fellow, and has held some of the highest offices in that fraternity. He is a life member of Waubansia Lodge, No. 160, A. F. & A. M.; Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.; Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T.; and of Oriental Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S.

THE STATE COURTS.

THE JUDGES OF THE CIRCUIT COURT.—Cook and Lake counties constituted the seventh judicial circuit until the re-organization of the courts of Cook County by the Constitution of 1870.

In 1855, Hon. George Manierre was elected judge of this court, and re-elected in 1861. He served until his death, in May, 1863.

GEORGE MANIERRE was born in New London, Conn., in 1817. He was of Norman-French extraction, his great grandfather having emigrated from Normandy with a colony of Huguenots about 1680 and settled in New London. There, the father of Judge Manierre was born, bred and married, and there he died in 1831, leaving four children. In 1831, immediately after the death of her husband, the widowed mother, with her two sons, George and Benjamin, moved from New London, and made a home in New York City, where George entered the law office of Judge John Brinkerhoff. In 1835, young Manierre left the city of New York and settled in Chicago, to which place his half-brother, Edward Manierre, and his half-sisters, Mrs. George W. Snow and Mrs. J. B. Gray had preceded him. He at once entered the law office of J. Young Scammon, to pursue those studies which he had begun in the city of New York. He also identified himself with such literary efforts as were then being made by the citizens of the young town, being elected vice-president of the Chicago Lyceum during his first year's residence. He was appointed deputy clerk of the Circuit Court in 1836. On July 15, 1839, he was admitted to the Bar. At the opening of 1840 he formed a partnership with George W. Meeker, the firm being Manierre & Meeker; office No. 118 Lake Street. In 1841, he was placed in charge of the Chicago Democrat, Hon. John Wentworth being absent attending the Harvard Law School. The extensive reading and diligent study of Mr. Manierre made his editorial labors a marked success. He was elected city attorney in 1841, and served one year, was again elected in 1843, but resigned in July, Henry Brown being appointed his successor. During 1844, he commenced the revision of the charter (passed in 1837) and the laws and ordinances, afterward completing and publishing the work in a single volume, which constituted, until about 1853, the basis of all amendments to the municipal organization. In 1841, when the Young Men's Association absorbed the Chicago Library Association, Mr. Manierre became identified with the former, being one of the lecturers before the association and serving as its president in 1846. He was also one of the founders of the present Law Institute and Library, in which he was warmly interested up to the time of his death. In 1843, he was elected alderman from the First Ward, to promote some beneficial legislation with respect to the public schools;—in fact, he was ever a warm and able friend to the cause of education, serving as school commissioner from 1844 to 1852; becoming a member of the first board of regents of the Chicago University in 1850; continuing in that capacity and upon the board of counselors of the Law Department up to the time of his death; and receiving other substantial tokens from the public of the appreciation in which he was held. During his term as school commissioner he devoted himself sedulously to the establishment of schools, the re-organization of the school system, and the management of the school fund, which had, since the panic of 1837, been endangered, both principal and interest. Under his supervision, school affairs were placed on a safe footing and the common schools of the county put in successful operation. Judge Manierre was ever active in furthering all public and private improvements bearing upon the material prosperity of Chicago, being one of the most prominent of the leaders whose efforts resulted in the calling of the River and Harbor Convention, which met in this city in June, 1847. In 1853, he was appointed master in chancery of the county by Hon. Hugh T. Dickey, judge of the circuit court, which office he filled up to the time of his own election as judge of the same court in 1855. His term commenced upon the 25th of June, of that year. He was re-elected in 1861, as the unanimous nominee of both parties, and held the office at the time of his death, May 21, 1863. As an instance of the prodigious industry and executive ability of Judge Manierre, it may be stated that, during the thirty years' previous existence of this court, twenty-two thousand cases had been filed, and of this number seventeen thousand were disposed of by him during his eight years' occupancy of the Bench. When it is remembered that he was one of the most energetic men in Chicago in educational and political matters and works relating to the material improvement of the city, some idea may be gained of his great ability and mental activity. It will be inferred, as was the case, that Judge Manierre was a powerful champion of freedom in every form. The record of his life proves this statement most forcibly. Commencing with the first anti-slavery meeting held in Chicago, January 16, 1840, up to the time of his death, Judge Manierre was a bold and consistent defender of personal liberty. As a young man he acted as vice-president of that meeting that denounced the "Black Code" of Illinois. In 1848, with Isaac N. Arnold, William B. Ogden, Thomas Hoynes and Daniel Brainard, he called a Free-soil Convention at Ottawa, which nominated a Van-Buren and Adams electoral ticket and inaugurated the first formal anti-slavery movement in Illinois. Cook County was triumphantly carried for the ticket in the election which followed in November. This was the starting point of the revolution in American politics which made Lincoln president in 1860, and finally abolished slavery. Again, in 1854, with E. C. Larned, he was counsel for the first colored man who was arrested under the fugitive slave act. The trial of the case before the United States Commissioner, George W. Meeker, created the most intense public excitement. The negro was discharged, and the colored people of the city publicly acknowledged their appreciation of Judge Manierre's services. At the breaking out of the Rebellion, Judge Manierre, who had abandoned the Democratic for the Free-soil party, in 1848, became one of the most earnest supporters of the Union cause, a member of the Union Defense Committee, and in every way actively identified with the opponents of slavery extension. At that time he joined the Republican party, with which he acted forever afterward. It was no cause for wonder that the death of such a man should be looked upon as a public calamity. His funeral was attended by the members of the Bar in a body, all the officers of the various courts, the Mayor and Common Council, and the most prominent men in the city in many walks of life. Amid the tolling of the city bells the funeral cortege moved toward Graceland Cemetery. Here, the most graceful and heartfelt tributes were laid upon the grave of this kind friend, good citizen, just judge, and earnest and brilliant man. Judge Manierre was married in 1841 to Ann Hamilton Reid, daughter of William Reid, barrister of Glasgow, Scotland. At his death he left a widow and four sons, who still survive him. His children are George, William K., Edward and Benjamin Manierre.

On the death of Judge Manierre, an election for judge of the seventh circuit was held on the 30th of June, 1863, and resulted in the election of Erastus S. Williams, republican, over Benjamin F. Ayer, democrat.

ERASTUS SMITH WILLIAMS was born in Washington County, New York, on May 22, 1821. His father was a lawyer and a man of superior attainments. In 1836, he took up his home in Illinois. Young Williams passed his early years in attending school and receiving instruction from his father. When he was about twenty years of age he commenced the study of law in Chicago, under the direction of Messrs. Butterfield & Collins, and was admitted to the Bar in 1844. From that time until his election as judge he pursued the successful practice of his profession, holding a high position, though not ranking among the foremost of his contemporaries. He had a reputation for conscientiousness in adherence to duty and for a breadth of learning in his profession that largely commended him to his brethren of the Bar when a successor to Judge Manierre was to be chosen; and his whole career on the Bench amply vindicated their choice. Elected in 1863, he was re-elected in 1867 and again in 1873, serving until 1879. During these sixteen years, though subjected to a bitter hostility from certain quarters, he deserved and maintained the reputation of a learned and just judge. As an illustration of his ability to hold with even hand the scales of justice, may be mentioned the libel suit of Judge Van H. Higgins against The Times, in 1865. The suit was commenced to recover damages, laid at $55,000, for a publication in The Times, charging Judge Higgins with malfeasance in office, by using his position as judge of the Superior Court to influence a chancery suit wherein he was plaintiff. The fact was that Judge Higgins had commenced the foreclosure of a mortgage in the Superior Court, of which he was judge, but not a judge on the chancery side. He certainly had no wrong motive, and probably thought, that as there could be no contest over the suit, and as he could by no possibility hear the case himself, one court was just the same as another. In the trial of the libel, the case turned on the admissibility of certain evidence which, if admitted, tended to exonerate the defendants. After a long and patient hearing, Judge Williams admitted the testimony. The plaintiff was taken greatly by surprise and before the case was given to the jury, dismissed it, the attorneys, and plaintiff as well, showing a good deal of exasperation against the judge. Judge Williams took occasion to say, that as far as his feelings were concerned, they were far more friendly to the plaintiff than to the defendants; that his associations had been with the plaintiff and his friends and not at all with The Times people; but that he believed the law to be according to his ruling, and that he must follow it irrespective of his feelings. The truth was, The Times had been very hostile to him, as it continued to be to the close of his judicial career. In private life Judge Williams was highly respected. He was twice married. His first wife (1850) was Rebecca Woodbridge, a daughter of Rev. Dr. Woodbridge, of Massachusetts. This lady died during 1864. In 1869, he married Mrs. Sophia H. Morton. After his retirement from the bench, Judge Williams resumed the practice of the law, in which he continued to do a lucrative business until his death in 1884.

George Manierre

In 1870, the courts of Cook County were re-organized by the new Constitution. Section 23, Article VI., of that instrument provided that the County of Cook should be one judicial circuit; that the Circuit Court should consist of five judges, until further increased as therein provided; and that the judge of the Recorder's Court of Chicago, and the judge of the Circuit Court, should be two of said judges.

The judge of the Recorder's Court was at that time William K. McAllister, who was elected in the fall of 1870 to the Supreme Court of the State; he accordingly did not serve as circuit judge at that time. William W. Farwell, Henry Booth and John G. Rogers were elected as the additional judges under this constitutional provision, and during December, 1871, Lambert Tree was elected to the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge McAllister.

WILLIAM WASHINGTON FARWELL is a descendant, in the sixth generation, from Henry and Olive Farwell, who emigrated from England and settled in Concord, Mass., in 1635. He is a son of John and Almira (Williams) Farwell, and was born January 5, 1817, at Morrisville, Madison Co., N. Y. He entered Hamilton College in 1833, and graduated in the class of 1837. In 1838, he began the study of law, under the direction of Otis P. Granger, Morrisville, N. Y.; and in the autumn of 1840, entered the office of Potter & Spaulding, of Buffalo, where he completed his studies and was admitted to practice, in 1841, at the fall term of the Supreme Court, held in Rochester. He returned to Morrisville, where he began to practice, continuing it successfully for seven years. In May, 1848, he came to Chicago, remaining here until the spring of 1849 when he joined a small party, and set out, by the overland route, for California. Nearly six months were consumed in the weary journey. He remained in Sacramento and San Francisco until the summer of 1850, when he returned to New York, by way of the Isthmus of Panama. On February 12, 1851, he was married to Mary E., daughter of Otis P. Granger. He resumed practice in Morrisville, and remained there until the fall of 1854, when he returned to Chicago. In spring of 1855, he became a member of the law firm of Goodrich, Farwell & Scoville. In 1856, Mr. Scoville retired, and Sidney Smith entered the firm. Mr. Goodrich was elected judge of the Superior Court, and retired, re-entering the firm on the expiration of his term. The firm continued until 1870, at which time Mr. Farwell was elected one of the judges of the Circuit Court. He held that position for nine years, being re-elected in 1873. His official duties during his term of service were mainly in the chancery department. Upon retiring from the bench he resumed the practice of his profession, which he still continues. In 1880, he was chosen professor of equity jurisprudence, pleadings and practice in the Union College of Law, of this city, which position he still holds. In politics, he was from the first an abolitionist, but he voted for the Free-soil candidates, and has always acted with the Republican party. He has, from his youth, been a member of the Congregational Church. His only living children are Granger Farwell and John William Farwell.

JOHN GORIN ROGERS, chief-justice of the Circuit Court of Cook County, is a marked illustration of the force of heredity, as for two hundred years, both his paternal and his maternal ancestors have been prominent and often illustrious members of the learned professions. His father, George Rogers, who died in Glasgow, Ky., in March, 1860, was the leading physician in that part of the State. There, on the 28th of December, 1818, was born John G. Rogers. He received his preliminary education at Centre College, graduating from the law department of the Transylvania University, at Lexington, in 1841, as Bachelor of Laws. Immediately commencing the practice of his profession in his native town, he continued to labor successfully in that field for eighteen years. So great a love did he have for his chosen work that, although repeatedly urged to enter the province of politics, he steadfastly refused, only receiving those marks of public esteem which would temporarily distract his attention from the great world of legal action. During his early manhood he was a Whig, but after the Bell-Everett contest, in 1860, he identified himself with the Democratic party. In 1848, he was on the Taylor electoral ticket; in 1852, was chosen to the same position on the Scott ticket, and in 1856, was a member of the convention that nominated Fillmore for the presidency. Judge Rogers came to Chicago in December, 1857, and his career here has also been one of steady progress in the respect, confidence and admiration of the public. As a lawyer, he became famous for his knowledge of real estate law. Furthermore, he was an eloquent pleader and a keen debater, his remarkable memory furnishing him with a wealth of precedent and citation. In July, 1870, upon the adoption of the new Constitution, he was chosen an associate judge of the Circuit Court, his commission being dated August 11, 1871. He was again elected in 1873, in 1879, and in 1885, and has served as chief-justice of the Court since June, 1879. Judge Rogers is an Odd Fellow of high standing. In 1849, he joined Glasgow Lodge, No. 65, and on his removal to Chicago, connected himself with Excelsior Lodge, No. 22. After having represented that body in the Grand Lodge for several years, he was, in 1863, elected Grand Master of the State of Illinois, and in 1869 was chosen grand representative to the Grand Lodge of the United States, at Baltimore. In 1876, he was again called to the same high post of honor. During the great fire, Judge Rogers was treasurer of the Relief Committee appointed by the Odd Fellows, and disbursed some $125,000 to the grief-stricken people of Chicago. The work of that body, during the calamity, did much to lift the whole city from its threatened depression, and all who served upon it are entitled to the lasting gratitude of its people. Judge Rogers has ever been an ardent supporter of the cause of temperance as distinguished from fanaticism, having been chosen Grand Worthy Patriarch of the Sons of Temperance while yet a resident of Kentucky. He was married on December 17, 1844, to Miss Belle Crenshaw, of Glasgow, Ky., a daughter of B. Mills Crenshaw, a former chief-justice of that State. They have four children, two boys and two girls.

HENRY BOOTH, one of the founders of the law department of the University of Chicago, and for nine years a judge of the Circuit Court of Cook County, was born in Roxbury, Litchfield Co., Conn., August 19, 1818. In 1836, he completed his studies at the Roxbury Academy preparatory to entering Yale College, graduating from the latter institution in 1840. After leaving college he took charge of the Wellsborough Academy, Penn., teaching one year, and then returned to his home to study law. He pursued his studies under Origen S. Seymour, at Litchfield, during the winter of 1841-42, but his health breaking down, he returned to the old farm-house to recuperate. Entering the law school at New Haven in the fall of 1842, he graduated two years thereafter, and was admitted to the Bar, at New Haven, in May, 1844. He removed to Harrisburg, Penn., but remained there only a few months, finally locating at Towanda, Bradford County, where he engaged in the practice of his profession for twelve years. During that period, he was prosecuting attorney for three years, and during the latter portion of his stay an earnest exponent of anti-slavery principles. In May, 1856, he accepted a professorship in the State and National law school at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and removed to that city, where he remained until the fall of 1859. He then came to Chicago, upon invitation of its board of regents, to assist in the organization of a law department of the University of Chicago. In 1873, under the name of the Union College of Law, the Northwestern University was admitted to an equal interest with the parent institution, and the college was placed under the control of a joint board of management, composed of members from each University. At this time, Judge Booth was the dean of the faculty, and still holds that position. In 1880, he was elected treasurer of the joint board of management, and so continues. In 1870, under the new Constitution, he was chosen one of the judges of the Circuit Court of Cook County, and was re-elected in 1873 for a full term of six years. For the first two years of his residence in Chicago, Judge Booth paid no attention to the practice of his profession, giving his entire time to the law department, but in the spring of 1862, he formed a partnership with H. B. Hurd, in the practice of law, continuing with him over six years. Judge Booth was married, in October, 1846, to Miss Ellen Morris, daughter of Samuel W. Morris, of Wellsborough, Tioga Co., Penn. His three sons, Hervey W., Samuel M. and William M. are practicing lawyers and his three daughters, Anna M., Rachel M. and Lemira E. are unmarried and live at home. During his long residence in Chicago, Judge Booth has been actively engaged in the promotion of various institutions of public interest. He was one of the earliest members of the Chicago Christian Union, now known as the Chicago Athenaeum, of which he is a life-member, was for five or six years its president, and still is one of its board of management. He is a member of the board of management of the Washingtonian Home, and is chairman of its committee on loans and investments. He was one of the founders of the Philosophical Society of Chicago, has been its president during two successive years, and has furnished a paper for one of its meetings nearly every season since it was organized. As one of the founders of the Society for Ethical Culture, of this city, he was elected its first president, and has been re-elected to that office each succeeding year. He is also president of the Chicago Guaranty Fund Life Society, a life insurance association on the mutual assessment plan. Though now in his sixty-seventh year, Judge Booth shows no marked signs of waning strength, either mental or physical. He believes in work, and wishes to leave behind him some evidence that he has not lived in vain.

Anna Booth

THE SUPERIOR COURT.

The name of the Cook County Court was changed, by act of the Legislature of 1849, to the Cook County Court of Common Pleas, and under this title continued until February, 1859. At that time, the Legislature again passed an amendatory act, a part of which is as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled, "An act to establish the Cook County Court," approved February 21, A.D. 1845, and for other purposes.

Section 1. Be it enacted, etc., that the court known as the Cook County Court of Common Pleas is hereby continued with all its powers, jurisdictions and authority, and with the additional jurisdiction conferred by this act. It shall be composed of three justices, and shall be hereafter known as the Superior Court of Chicago. The present judge of said Cook County Court of Common Pleas shall, during the time for which he has been elected, be one of the judges of said court.

Section 2. On the first Tuesday of April, 1859, an election shall be held for two judges of said Superior Court. The person having the greatest number of votes shall hold his office for six years, and the person having the next highest number shall hold for four years, and on the first Tuesday of April, 1861, and every two years thereafter, there shall be elected one judge of said court, who shall hold his office for six years.

Section 3 provided for the election, at the same time, of two additional clerks, to be styled deputy clerks. At the time of the passage of this act, John M. Wilson was the judge of the Court of Common Pleas, to which position he had been first elected in April, 1853, and again re-elected in 1857.

JOHN M. WILSON was born on the 12th of November, 1802, at Hillsborough, N. H. He was the son of James Wilson and Mary (McNeil) Wilson. In his fourteenth year, young Wilson attended an academy to prepare for Dartmouth College, where he was entered in 1819, but ill health compelled him to relinquish his studies while yet in the freshman year. The next year he entered Bowdoin College as a sophomore, but again failing health obliged him to abandon all hope of taking a classical course, and he returned to his home. A few years employed in mercantile pursuits so far restored his health that he was able to resume his studies, and he entered upon the study of law, which he pursued for several years, taking a course at the law department of Yale College, and in 1831, he was admitted to the Bar. He began practice at Lowell, Mass., but, attracted by the field offered to young men at that day in the West, he removed, in 1835, to Joliet, Ill. There he remained until 1847, during which time he gained the leadership of the Bar. He removed to Chicago, where he formed a co-partnership with Norman B. Judd, and at once engaged in an extensive and lucrative practice. The partnership lasted until his election to the Bench. Judge Wilson was re-elected judge of the Superior Court of Chicago in 1861, and served until 1867, when his judicial career terminated. Though often solicited to become a candidate for election to the Supreme Bench of the State, he uniformly declined. As a judge he stands foremost among all those who have adorned the Bench in Chicago. His opinions were, in a number of cases, adopted by the Supreme Court as its own. Added to a wide reading in jurisprudence, he had an active mind, which enabled him always to have complete command of all his faculties, and which gave him mastery over every question presented. In his later years, he was somewhat slow in the dispatch of business, a fault shared by many another able judge. The great fire completely ruined his fortune, and his declining years were passed in narrow circumstances. In 1878, he accepted an appointment as Justice of the Peace for the North Division of Chicago. Finally, in the fullness of years, beloved and honored by many friends, he passed away December 7, 1883. He was married in 1838 to Miss Martha A. Appleton, of Lowell, Mass. One son and one daughter survive this union.

In pursuance of the law of February, 1859, above referred to, Grant Goodrich and VanHollis Higgins were elected judges of the Superior Court as associates with Judge Wilson, the former to serve for four years, and the latter for six years.

VAN HOLLIS HIGGINS, one of the oldest and most respected lawyers in Chicago, was born in Genesee Co., N. Y., February 20, 1821. Coming to this city in 1837, he was admitted to the Bar of Iroquois County six years thereafter, and then commenced the practice of his profession. Remaining there two years, he removed to Galena, where he formed a partnership with Judge O. C. Pratt, which continued until 1849. For two years Judge Higgins was city attorney of Galena. Returning to Chicago in the autumn of 1852, he opened an office and practiced alone for some time, forming a partnership in 1853 with Corydon Beckwith and B. F. Strother, under the firm name of Higgins, Beckwith & Strother. In 1858 he was sent to the Legislature, and the next year was elected judge of the Superior Court, which position he held a little more than six years. In the autumn of 1865, he resigned the judgeship, and at the same time formed a connection with Leonard Sweet and Colonel David Quigg, under the firm name of Higgins, Sweet & Quigg, which continued until the fall of 1872, when Judge Higgins was elected to the presidency of the Babcock Manufacturing Company. On January 1, 1876, he retired from the active management of that company to accept the financial agency of the Charter Oak Life Insurance Company for the Western States. In 1880, Judge Higgins was elected to the presidency of the National Life Insurance Company of the United States; and the affairs of that corporation and the management of Rosehill Cemetery, of which he is the principal proprietor, have since fully occupied his time. It will be seen from the bare statement of the foregoing facts that his entire career has been marked by unusual energy and ability. During the War he was one of the most prominent of those patriotic citizens who, by their brains, money and untiring zeal, contributed largely to the success of the Union arms. As a member of the Union Defense Committee, he cheerfully shouldered his share of the burden, and did much to establish Chicago's reputation for patriotism. Among the other institutions of this city whose usefulness is widespread is the Chicago Historical Society, of which Judge Higgins was one of the incorporators. He is a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. O. U. & M.; Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; and Oriental Consistory 32, S. P. R. S. In 1847, he was married to Mrs. E. S. Alexander, of Jacksonville, Ill., who died in 1882.

JOSEPH E. GARY, the successor of Judge Goodrich, was born at Potsdam, N. Y., July 9, 1821, the son of Eli B. and Frances O. (Easton) Gary. After receiving a common school and academic education, he removed, in 1843, to St. Louis, and was admitted to the Bar in 1844. The same year he opened an office in Springfield, Mo., and commenced the practice of law. In 1849 he settled in Las Vegas, N. M., where he mastered the Spanish language. He removed to San Francisco, where he practiced his profession until 1856, when he settled in Chicago. Here he engaged in business first with Murry F. Tuley for two years, and then with E. and A. Van Buren, for the next three. In November, 1863, he was chosen judge of the Superior Court of Chicago, and has been re-elected for three successive terms. Judge Gary is noted for the rapidity of his decisions and for his great dispatch of business, evidently holding with Emerson that it is more important to the public that cases should be decided, than that they should always be decided correctly. A nisi prius judge, who delays the great column of suitors while he is trying to decide every case exactly right and beyond cavil, is not a good judge, nor well fitted for his position, and is apt to do more harm than good. Business must go forward, or the courts will get immediately clogged. That Judge Gary has given satisfaction to the Bar and to the public in his methods of business, is abundantly manifested by his repeated re-elections. Of unvarying good temper, he will not listen either to prosy or flowery advocates, and clips the wings of young orators remorselessly. He has a very incisive way of getting at the gist of the issue to be decided; and he permits no wandering, but holds the older as well as the younger members of the Bar strictly to the point in question. In his court room good humor abounds, for he loves a keen encounter of wit, and is himself a most incorrigible punster. He is a favorite with the juniors of the Bar for he will listen as patiently to one of them, if he talks to the point, as he will to the most learned of the seniors; nor are the most eminent advocates secure from being halted, if they attempt to soar into latitudes not belonging to the case.

JOHN ALEXANDER JAMESON, for eighteen years a judge of the Superior Court of the city and county, is a native of Irasburg, Vt., where he was born January 25, 1824. His father, Thomas Jameson, was sheriff of his native county for many years, and a member of the State Constitutional Convention. His mother's maiden name was Martha Gilchrist. Judge Jameson fitted for college at Brownington, Orleans County, and in 1842, entered the University of Vermont, at Burlington, graduating from that institution four years thereafter. Subsequently, his alma mater conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. After graduating in 1846, he taught school four years, at the Academy in Stanstead, Canada, and for two years was a tutor in the University of Vermont, studying his profession during all his spare moments. He first entered the office of Governor Underwood, at Burlington, attended the Dane Law School at Cambridge, in 1852, and, in November, 1853, was admitted to the Bar. He came at once to Chicago, but, after investigating the field, decided upon Freeport as the proper place in which to locate, and from 1854 until 1856 practiced in that city. Returning to Chicago, he entered into a partnership with Paul Cornell and Perkins Bass, under the firm name of Cornell, Jameson & Bass. This continued for one year, when Mr. Bass retired, and Charles B. Waite was admitted to the firm, business being continued under the firm name of Cornell, Waite & Jameson. In 1860, Mr. Waite retiring, Honer N. Hibbard, now United States register in bankruptcy, was admitted to the firm, which was then styled Cornell, Jameson & Hibbard; and in 1862, Mr. Cornell retired. The well-known law firm of Jameson & Hibbard was continued until 1865, when the former was elected judge of the Superior Court of the City of Chicago. This position, and, under the Constitution of 1870, the judgeship of the Superior Court of Cook County, he held until December 3, 1883. Soon after retiring from the Bench he formed the partnership of Jameson, Marston & Angur, which has already established a position among the strong law firms of the city. His length of service as judge speaks for itself. Judge Jameson has made a record for himself outside the practice of his profession, having, in 1866, published a work on the Constitutional Convention, as a political institution in the United States; its history, powers, and modes of proceeding, which ran through three editions. He was also, for many years, an assistant editor and part proprietor of the American Law Register, of Philadelphia; and is at present a member of the Chicago Literary Club, which he assisted in forming. Judge Jameson was married in October, 1855, to Miss Eliza Hyde, of Royalton, Vt. Some two years later he removed to Denys Park with his wife, where he built one of the first houses in that section of the city. Here his younger children, John A. Jr. and Rebecca, were born.

WILLIAM A. PORTER was born in 1825, in Philadelphia, where the first few years of his life were passed. When he was ten years of age his parents removed to New York, where he received his education. At nineteen years of age he went to study law with his uncle, Judge Hogeboom of Albany, and in 1846, was admitted to the Bar. When twenty-seven years of age, he was elected attorney-general of the State of New York. In 1856, he settled in Chicago, where his recognized ability soon brought him a successful practice. In 1861, he married Miss Abigail Boise, of Northampton, Mass., an estimable lady, who died in 1871, leaving one daughter. In 1867, Mr. Porter was elected judge of the Superior Court, to succeed Judge Wilson. He gave great satisfaction to the Bar, and at the close of his term was nominated for re-election. But it was not to be. On the morning of October 27, 1873, he was found dead, alone in his room. He had died suddenly, shortly after partaking of his breakfast. Judge Porter belonged to an intellectual family. His brother, Professor John A. Porter, of Yale College, was long distinguished for his ability and erudition. Judge Porter had a fine personal presence, which gave dignity and grace to his appearance on the Bench. He was a member of the Third Presbyterian Church of Chicago, an earnest Christian, an exemplary citizen, and a laborious and conscientious judge.

The Constitution of 1870 changed the name of the Superior Court of Chicago to that of the Superior Court of Cook County, and made the following changes in the Recorder's Court:

Section 26, Article 17. "The Recorder's Court of the City of Chicago shall be continued, and shall be called 'The Criminal Court of Cook County.' It shall have the jurisdiction of a circuit court in all cases of criminal and quasi-criminal nature, arising in the county of Cook, or that may be brought before said Court pursuant to law. * * * It shall have no jurisdiction in civil cases. * * * The terms of said Criminal Court shall be held by one or more judges of the Circuit or Superior Court of Cook County, as nearly as may be in alternation, as may be determined by said judges or provided by law. Said judges shall be, ex-officio, judges of said Court."

RECORDER'S COURT.

Robert S. Wilson was the first judge of this court, elected in 1853 and re-elected in 1858, serving until the spring of 1863, the close of his second term.

ROBERT S. WILSON was born at Montrose, Penn., November 6, 1812, but when still young his parents removed to Allegany County, New York. Until the age of fifteen, Robert lived on his father's farm and attended the district schools. He then entered the printing-office of his brother, who was publishing a paper at Angelica, a town in Allegany County. There he remained for three years, when he commenced the study of law. At the age of twenty-one he was admitted to the Bar, and practiced his profession in Allegany County until 1836, when he removed to Ann Arbor, Mich., where he resided until 1850, holding a number of public stations, being justice of the peace, probate judge, and a member of the State Senate. He was also a delegate to the Democratic Convention at Baltimore, in 1844, which nominated James K. Polk for the presidency. In 1850, he removed to Chicago and engaged in the practice of law, and in 1853, was elected judge of the Recorder's Court. As a judge, he was a shield to the innocent, but a terror to the guilty, and his administration gave great satisfaction to the public. When he first came to the office, crime had become rampant and criminals almost defiant, but he soon overawed them and vindicated the law. It was necessary for the peace and safety of the city that a severe judge should be on this Bench, and Judge Wilson fully met the requirement. In his two terms he sent about one thousand criminals to the penitentiary, and it is said that but three of his judgments were ever reversed by the Supreme Court. Upon leaving the Bench, Judge Wilson resumed the practice of his profession, which he continued with more or less attention until 1882, when he retired and moved to Michigan. He died in February, 1883.

Judge Wilson was succeeded by Evert Van Buren, who served one term.

EVERT VAN BUREN, deceased, was one of the leaders of the Bar, both of New York and Illinois. He was born in Kinderhook, Columbia Co., N. Y., on November 3, 1803. After receiving an academic education, he read law in the office of J. & A. Vanderpoel in his native town, and in 1827 was admitted to the Bar. Locating in Penn Yan, Yates County, his practice rapidly increased, and in 1836 he went to Buffalo. From the first his success was marked in that city, but in answer to the earnest request of his friends he returned to Penn Yan in 1840, and resumed his practice. In 1833, he represented his congressional district in the National Anti-Masonic Convention, and was appointed a member of the committee on resolutions. During 1836 and 1840, he supported Martin Van Buren for the presidency, and as a rule voted the Democratic ticket. In 1856, he removed to Chicago. In April, 1862, he was elected judge of the Recorder's Court, and both as a member of the Bench and Bar maintained the well-deserved reputation which he brought with him from the Empire State. His death occurred February 12, 1885, and of his children the following are alive: James, in the real estate business, and Augustus, the lawyer, both residents of Chicago; Barrent and Fred, of Rantoul, Ill., and Evert, of Hooper, Neb. The members of the Bar Association passed appropriate resolutions upon the death of Judge Van Buren, and Judge Rogers reported the following brief and just memorial: "In the death of Judge Van Buren the community has lost an honored citizen, and the Chicago Bar an eminent lawyer. He was an earnest worker and a skilled practitioner. His client's cause was his own, and in its advocacy he concentrated all of his energies with admirable devotion and marked success. He was a strong advocate, a safe counselor, and an upright judge. For half a century he battled ably and manfully in the first rank of his profession, undismayed by the infirmities of age or the burdens of labor, and in peace he spent his honorable career amid the sweet remembrances of a well-earned life."

WILLIAM K. McALLISTER has been a resident of Chicago for over thirty years, having won a name not only as a judge of unimpeachable character, but as a profound scholar and a lover and patron of all the fine arts. His advancement to his present office has been merely the result of his eminent appropriateness for the position. In public and private life his urbanity and rectitude have ever retained him the host of friends who, for over a quarter of a century, have delighted to honor and admire him. Judge McAllister was born in Salem, Washington Co., N. Y., in 1818. Until he was eighteen years of age he worked upon his father's farm, then entered college, and in 1839, under a private tutor, commenced the study of law. He completed his education in Wayne and Yates counties, and subsequently removed to Albion, where, for ten years, he practiced his profession, and speedily was placed in the front rank of the leading lawyers of the State. He removed to Chicago in 1854, engaging with the same decided success in the practice of law in this city. Thus he continued for a period of fourteen years, until, in 1868, he was elevated to the judgeship of the Recorder's Court. Under the Constitution of 1870, Cook County was formed into a judicial circuit, over which five judges were to preside for a term of six years. Judge McAllister was to be one of the five, by virtue of his position as recorder, but in the meantime was elected to the Supreme Bench of State. This position he held until 1875, when he resigned to accept an election to the Circuit Bench of Cook County, succeeding Judge Lambert Tree. He was re-elected in 1879 and in 1885, the last time without opposition. Upon the constituting of the Appellate Court, he was appointed by the Supreme Court to serve as one of the appellate judges, and has filled that position since 1880.

THE COUNTY COURT.

WILLIAM T. BARRON was elected County Judge in November, 1857, and served four years. He was born in Windsor County, Vermont, in 1824. He received a liberal education and adopted the profession of law. Soon after his admission to practice, he became State's attorney for his native county, in which position he gained the esteem and respect of all who knew him. In 1852, he removed to Chicago, where he soon rose to an honorable position at the Bar, and when he became judge of the County Court he had the entire confidence of the Bar, maintaining the reputation of an intelligent, just and honorable judge. He resided at Kenwood, and was suddenly killed in a railroad collision, while the suburban train was standing or just starting from the station of Kenwood. He was the only person on the train instantly killed, his head having been completely severed from his body. Judge Barron was unmarried.

The successor to Judge Barron was James B. Bradwell, long and favorably known at the Chicago Bar, who served two terms.

JAMES B. BRADWELL was born in Loughborough, Leicestershire, England, April 6, 1828, the son of Thomas and Elizabeth Bradwell. His parents came to this country in 1829, and settled at Utica, N. Y., remaining there until 1833, when the family moved to Jacksonville, where they resided nearly a year. Then they removed to Cook County, to what is now known as Old Wheeling. James B. Bradwell received his primary and grammar school education in Wheeling and Chicago, completing it in the sophomore year at Knox College. In his early manhood he chose the profession of law, and while at school he practiced in the justice courts of Cook County and Galesburg. On May 8, 1852, he was married to Miss Myra Colby, of Shamburg, Ill., founder and editor of the Chicago Legal News, and soon after went to Memphis, Tenn., where he and his wife taught school for a year. During this year he was admitted to the Memphis Bar. Returning to Chicago, he opened a law office, in 1853, and soon had a good practice. In 1861, he was elected county judge for four years, and was re-elected, by a very large majority, at the expiration of his term, to serve another four years. He was for years regarded by the profession as the ablest probate lawyer in the country. In 1872, at the earnest solicitation of his friends, he became a candidate, on the Republican ticket, for a seat in the lower house of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, and was elected. In 1874, he was re-elected to the Legislature, where he became identified with many important acts of that body, especially those that were beneficial and opened a larger field of usefulness to women. Among these were the acts making women eligible to election for all school offices in the State, and allowing them to become notaries-public; these he drew up and introduced. He introduced a bill allowing foreign corporations to loan money on real estate security in this State, and also a bill incorporating the fire patrol of this city, taking an active and prominent part in both sessions of the Legislature. His head, heart and hand are always ready to do some kindly deed for the benefit of mankind.

In 1869, Martin R. M. Wallace was elected successor to Judge Bradwell.

MISCELLANEA.

LINCOLN'S LAST CASE.—The last case that Mr. Lincoln ever tried was the case of Jones vs. Johnson, in April and May, 1860, in the United States Circuit Court at Chicago, before Judge Drummond. The case involved the title to land of very great value, the accretion on the shore of Lake Michigan. During the trial, Judge Drummond and all the counsel on both sides, including Mr. Lincoln, dined together at the house of Hon. Isaac N. Arnold. At the conclusion of the dinner the toast was proposed "May Illinois furnish the next President of the United States," and it was drunk with enthusiasm by the friends of both Lincoln and Douglas.

THE ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE AND THE BISSELL CASE.—The bridge at Rock Island was the first railroad bridge ever built across the Mississippi, and was the cause of a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of the river men and steamboat owners. Suits were brought, to have it abated as a nuisance, in the United States Courts. In the month of May, 1857, the steamer "Effie Afton" collided with the draw-pier, caught fire and was burned to the water's edge. The owners of the boat libeled the bridge in the United States District Court at Chicago. The cases were tried before judges McLean and Drummond, and in all the suits the river men were defeated. In 1860, an attempt to burn the bridge was discovered, and some suspicious characters being arrested, they declared that a conspiracy to burn the bridge had been formed at St. Louis, and that a well-known civil engineer, named Josiah W. Bissell, was the prime mover in it, having been employed by the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce for that purpose. Mr. Bissell was arrested at Chicago in August, 1860, at the instance of John F. Tracy, at that time superintendent of the Rock Island Railroad. He was not immediately taken before any court, but was kept in a private room, and subjected to considerable indignity. He was finally indicted in the Recorder's Court, and gave bail for his appearance. One trial was had, which resulted in a disagreement of the jury. Finally, in February, 1864, the case was dismissed. Meantime Mr. Bissell got service on John F. Tracy at Rochester, N. Y., and sued him there for false imprisonment, and obtained a verdict of $2,000 against him. Colonel Bissell served with distinction in the civil war as a colonel of engineers in the West, and was prominent in the capture of Island No. 10, in the Mississippi, April 7, 1862.

FIRST DECISION OF THE LEGAL TENDER QUESTION.—On the 11th of July 1863, C. B. Farwell tendered to the county treasurer [Michael Keelley] gold to the amount of $150 in payment of his State taxes, and treasury notes, to the value of $210, for county and town taxes. The treasurer declined to receive the latter, and brought an action in the county court to recover the amount due. Hon. Joseph Knox, State's attorney, appeared on behalf of the treasurer, and, in asking for judgment, stated that his opinion of the law was that the United States treasury notes were a legal tender for county and town taxes. He did not think they could be used in payment of State taxes, because the law of the State stipulated that State taxes should be paid in gold. The court (Judge Bradwell) decided that the tender was good.

GOVERNMENT LICENSES.—In 1862, the General Government passed a law requiring attorneys to take out a license to practice, costing $10. At the opening of the October term of the United States Circuit Court in 1862, Judge Drummond intimated that although the court could not attempt to see the law enforced unless a question should be raised which would bring it properly before the court, yet, in the event of such a question being raised, he should be compelled to decide that, in the absence of the required Government license, the party was not a practicing attorney.

THE STAMP ACT.—By the revenue law of 1862, stamps were required to be affixed to any writ or other original process by which any suit is commenced in any court of record, either law or equity. In February, 1864, a motion was made before Judge Drummond, to dismiss an action because no stamp had been affixed to the declaration. Judge Drummond held that the declaration was a process within the meaning of the act, and no stamp having been affixed to it, it was afterward too late to do so, and the action must be dismissed.

THE CITY CEMETERY CASE.—In 1850, the city purchased from the administrator of Milliman between twelve and thirteen acres adjoining the old cemetery on the North Side, to be incorporated in the cemetery. It was laid out into appropriate lots, a large number were sold, and many interments made there. In 1865, a short time before that, the heirs of Milliman discovered that the sale by the administrator was irregular and legally void. An action was accordingly brought against the city, and, after some litigation and an appeal to the Supreme Court, the heirs won. The city, in 1850, had paid $2,500 for the land, and in 1865 it was valued at $90,000, for which sum the heirs agreed to settle with the city. After considerable negotiation and a number of meetings of the lot-owners, it was deemed advisable to surrender the land and remove the bodies already buried, inasmuch as it was probable they would have to be removed eventually.

BAR DINNER.—The first annual dinner of the Chicago Bar was given at the Tremont House, under the auspices of the Law Institute, January 21, 1863. William H. King, president of the Institute, presided. All the judges of the various courts and one hundred and fifty members of the Bar were present, and participated. Toasts were responded to by W. H. King, Judge John M. Wilson, Judge Drummond, Joseph Knox and John Young Scammon.

It was intended that these dinners should be held annually, but after the second one, which occurred at the Briggs House, February 8, 1864, it was a number of years before another one took place.

AN EFFECTIVE BUT WRONG APPLICATION OF THE STATUTES.—In the case of Rigney vs. Rawson, tried in the Superior Court some time in November, 1861, Judge Walter B. Scates appeared for the plaintiff and George Herbert for the defendant. Much hard feeling had been engendered in the cause, and Mr. Herbert, in his opening to the jury, charged the opposing counsel with falsehood and with purloining important papers from the files. Judge Scates jumped up, and said, "You rascal, do you make such a charge against me?" and, seizing a volume of Scates's Statutes, applied it, vi et armis, to the back of his opponent's head. Mr. Herbert, stunned by this singular mode of applying the laws of the State, sank down fainting, while the presiding judge promptly fined Judge Scates $100 for contempt of court, which he immediately paid. Mr. Herbert brought an action for assault against Judge Scates, laying his damages at $35,000, alleging that his life had been endangered and his health permanently injured. The case was postponed from time to time, but finally was tried in April, 1867, occupying nearly a week. The jury awarded $1,000 damages.

CASE EXTRAORDINARY.—The well-known character of the participants will justify our reproduction of the following extraordinary case: A remarkable trial took place before Justice DeWolf on February 18, 1863, which attracted a large number of interested spectators, including bankers, railroad-men, hotel-keepers and operators generally. The plaintiff was Frank Parmelee, the well-known omnibus proprietor, and the defendant was Dick Somers, the jolly and rubicund proprietor of the City Hotel. The suit was based upon a promissory note, which read as follows:

'CHICAGO, Dec. 8, 1862.

"Sixty days after date, I promise to pay, for value received, to J. H. McVicker, one dollar, with ten per cent. interest per month.
"R. SOMERS."

Mr. McVicker's account at the Western Marine and Fire Insurance Company's Bank being somewhat short, he deposited this note to his credit. It was afterward sold by the bank, for its face, to Mr. Parmelee, the plaintiff. Not being paid at maturity, suit was brought to recover; McAllister, Jewett & Jackson appearing for the plaintiff, and D. D. Driscoll and George W. Thompson for the defendant. The defense was that the note was given under duress. The following was the principal testimony:

FRANKLIN PARMELEE: "I am between eighteen and forty years of age; know the nature of an oath; am plaintiff in this suit; my name is Franklin, and I was named after that Franklin who ate one roll and carried the other under his arm as he walked through the streets of Philadelphia some years ago. I live on the Avenue, forty rods from the 'Patch.' I am sorry to acknowledge that I know the defendant, Somers. He is clever enough, but he won't pay what he owes; I have had a world of trouble with him. I bought the note in suit for one dollar cash; was afraid to dun Somers for it for fear he would lick me. [Somers here shook his fist at the witness.] Somers declared to me that he would never pay it, as it had been obtained by working on his fears. The note was given to McVicker, who deposited it with the Western Marine and Fire Insurance Company, and I bought it of them and paid in greenbacks; did not borrow the money to pay for it. I do not fight myself, but have a fighting partner, whose name is Isaac Anderson. I know McVicker. He runs a theater down below Canterbury Hall. It is first-class, and more too. Think Somers keeps a good hotel, and know he sets a good free lunch. His reputation is that of a brick."

J. H. McVICKER'S testimony: "I do not keep a theater, the theater keeps me. Have lived in Chicago upward of several years, off and on; can't say which the most. Sorry to say I do know Dick Somers. Think he would be pugnacious if he was mad. Somers gave me the note in suit for money borrowed of me to give a widow as charity. I would not advance the money until he gave me the note. Don't know whether the widow ever got the money or not. Somers seemed excited when he signed the note, and afterward went out of the box-office using what I thought was profane language. My bank account was short, and I gave the note to Waite, who passed it to my credit. I know D. A. Gage, J. S. Newhouse, Isaac Anderson, Matthew Laflin and Phil. Hoyme. They are all 'dead-heads' at my theater. Newhouse and Hoyme were present on the night when the note was signed."

PHIL A. HOYNE'S testimony: "Think the note was signed under duress. Somers had no friend with him at the time. He was all alone. It was between eight and twelve o'clock in the evening, at the box-office of the theater. Can't say whether it was fear or a desire to help the widow which induced him to be so liberal. Don't know whether the widow ever got the dollar or not. Am quite sure there was a widow in the case somewhere. J. S. Newhouse gave a dollar for the widow, and I gave fifty cents."

UNION COLLEGE OF LAW.

When the testimony was closed, counsel proceeded to sum up the case to the jury. The defense relied upon five points: 1st, the note was not negotiated. 2d, there was an alteration and erasure on it. 3d, it was obtained under duress. 4th, usury. 5th, a conspiracy to extort money.

Mr. Driscoll graphically described the condition of the defendant Somers, as he found himself, without friends, in the lonely box-office of the theater, on a dark night in December. Who would not, he said, have signed the note under similar circumstances? The case was given to the jury, who returned a verdict for the defendant, plaintiff to pay the costs.

AN ABSCONDING SHERIFF.—On December 15, 1869, Gustav Fischer, sheriff of Cook County, absconded, leaving a family and a large number of creditors to mourn for him. Some legal complications were the result. The coroner, Benjamin L. Cleaves, claimed the vacant office, by virtue of the statute, and so did the chief deputy-sheriff, Timothy Bradley. Judge Williams of the Circuit Court, in a very elaborate opinion, held that the office was not vacant within the meaning of the statute, and that Cleaves was not entitled to the succession, while Judge McAllister, in an equally elaborate opinion, held that the office was vacant, and accordingly recognized Cleaves. The Superior Court agreed with McAllister, and as, in the meantime, Mr. Cleaves obtained actual possession of the sheriff's office, he became acting sheriff for the unexpired term.

CHICAGO LAW INSTITUTE.

THE CHICAGO LAW INSTITUTE was organized under a charter granted by the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, on February 18, 1857; amended by acts of February 14, 1863, and February 23, 1867. At the time of the fire this was the only organization of lawyers which had been in existence since 1858. It was chartered and organized mainly for the purpose of collecting a law library, which object was steadily pursued from the first, so that by October 8, 1871, it had acquired seven thousand volumes of law books, valued at about $30,000. The library was the property of the shareholders, and freely used by them, and also by all judges and lawyers living outside of Cook County. It had always been kept in rooms in the court-house, furnished by the county of Cook, and was in charge of a librarian and assistant. It was insured for $20,000 at the time of the fire, and had $1,318 in the hands of the treasurer. All the books, records, vouchers and papers of the Law Institute were destroyed, thus losing nearly everything but its name and legal organization.

At the annual meeting, on November 6, 1871, the members voted to collect an assessment of $25 on each share of stock, and to sell new shares on the original terms, in order to collect a fund for the establishment of another library. The city provided two rooms for the use of the Institute and library, receiving generous and valuable donations of money and books. The first gift was a draft for $500 sent by Hon. Joel Parker, of Cambridge. Julius Rosenthal was at that time librarian.

This institution was originally organized in September, 1859, as the Law Department of the University of Chicago. It was indebted to the liberality of the late Hon. Thomas Hoyne, who took a deep interest in the subject of legal education, and contributed $5,000 toward the endowment of a law professorship. The school opened with an attendance of twelve students, occupying a room in the fourth story of the building known as the Larmon Block, on the northeast corner of Clark and Washington streets. The present dean of the law faculty, Hon. Henry Booth, was elected to the professorship, and during the first year was assisted by the late Hon. John M. Wilson and Hon. Grant Goodrich—the last two gentlemen then occupying places on the bench of the Superior Court, and devoting to the school only such time as they could spare from their judicial duties. During the succeeding ten years, until the fall of 1870, the chief burden of conducting the school devolved upon Professor Booth, assisted to some extent by Hon. H. B. Hurd, but much of the time without any assistance.

After the election of Professor Booth to the Bench of the Circuit Court of Cook County, in 1870, Van-Buren Denslow, Colonel R. Biddle Roberts, Mr. Wilder and John A. Hunter (the latter an alumnus of the school, and a lawyer of fine attainments), whose rising fame was obscured by his early death, were, at different times and for short intervals, associated in the direction of the school, until the close of the collegiate year, June, 1873.

At that time, the Northwestern University having expressed its desire to engraft a law department on its foundation, an arrangement, altogether novel in its character, was entered into between the two universities, whereby the Northwestern was admitted to a joint and equal interest with the University of Chicago in the Law School, which thereupon assumed its present appropriate name of Union College of Law. Under this plan, each institution appoints three members from its board of trustees, to whom is added its president, and the eight gentlemen thus chosen compose a joint board of management for the election of professors and the decision of all questions affecting the interests of the Law College. Each University publishes the Union College of Law, its faculty, students, rules, curriculum, etc., in its catalogue and circulars, as its law department, and the affairs of the institution, under this plan, are conducted with the utmost harmony.

The joint board, at present, is composed of the following gentlemen: On behalf of the University of Chicago, Galusha Anderson, D.D., LL.D., president; Hon. J. Y. Scammon, LL.D., Ferd. W. Peck, A.M., LL.B., and Frederick A. Smith, A.M., LL.B. On behalf of the Northwestern University, Joseph Cummings, D.D., LL.D., president; Oliver H. Horton, LL.B., Henry A. Towle and James Frake, A.M., LL.B. The diplomas, admitting to the Bar of the State, by rule of the Supreme Court, are awarded by the board of trustees, and bear the seal and signatures of the president and secretary of each of these universities. This arrangement is believed to be altogether unique and unparalleled in the history of educational institutions.

A graded course of study is offered in this college, requiring two collegiate years, of thirty-six weeks each, for its completion. The instruction is thorough and comprehensive, scientific and practical, designed to fit the student for the Bar as far as possible within the time allotted. Students are admitted free of charge to the fine library of the Law Institute, which contains over seventeen thousand volumes.

The Union College of Law has no endowment or outside support whatever—the gift of Mr. Hoyne, already referred to, being lost in the financial embarrassments of the parent university. The faculty receive no compensation for their services, except what remains of the tuition fees paid by students after defraying the cost of room rent and other necessary expenses. If this fact has the effect of stimulating the professors to greater zeal and fidelity in the discharge of their duties, the school enjoys that benefit in full. Meanwhile, all parties interested have the satisfaction of feeling that the institution is self-supporting, and at the same time is doing the State some service.

The following gentlemen compose the faculty at the present time (1885): Hon. Henry Booth, LL.D., dean, who has been connected with the school constantly since its organization in 1859; Hon. Harvey B. Hurd, who has taught, with some intermissions, since 1863; Hon. Marshall D. Ewell, LL.D., Hon. William W. Farwell, and Hon. Nathan S. Davis, M.D., LL.D. The average attendance in both classes during several years past, has been from one hundred to one hundred and forty. The members of the faculty are gratified by the fact that the attendance has continued to increase, notwithstanding the standard of attainment required from the students has been steadily advanced.

STATE'S ATTORNEYS.

CARLOS HAVEN was born in Chautauqua County, New York, August 29, 1823. When a lad, his parents removed to Will County, Illinois, and pursued the occupation of farming. He was brought up to labor, but enjoyed ample facilities for his education, which he completed at Knox College, Galesburg, graduating in his nineteenth year. Immediately after completing his college course, he came to Chicago, where he commenced the study of law with James H. Collins. After his admission to the Bar, he entered upon practice, and was soon in the possession of a lucrative business. In 1840, he made an overland expedition to California, then in the excitement of the gold discovery. He returned to Chicago the next year, having obtained a very handsome return for the time spent in the gold region. He resumed the practice, and in 1856 was elected State's attorney, and in 1860 was re-elected. As a lawyer, he was possessed of strong common sense and great tenacity of purpose. His moral perceptions were acute, and he was distinguished for his conscientiousness. He was by nature deliberate and not easily roused to excitement, but when he was thoroughly stirred his eloquence became almost irresistible. In his practice he never allowed himself to defend a wrong, nor would he espouse a cause that did not seem entirely just. As a State's attorney, he became the terror of criminals, and he was esteemed the most successful prosecuting officer that had hitherto filled that position. As a man, he had no enemies, was of genial and sunny disposition, of frank and cordial manners and of fine social qualities. He was a prominent and useful member of Plymouth Congregational Church, and illustrated his Christian profession in his daily walk and conversation. He died of typhoid fever on the 3d of May, 1862, after an illness of a week. A large meeting of the Bar was held, and appropriate resolutions adopted. He was buried at his old home in Will County.

JOSEPH KNOX, who occupied the position of State's attorney for Cook County from May, 1862, until December, 1864, was born in Blanford, Mass., in 1805. He was bred to the law, and admitted to practice in 1828. After practicing some years in his native State, he removed to Illinois and settled at Rock Island, then called Stephenson. There he became associated with Hon. John Wilson Drury, and engaged in an extensive practice in that part of Illinois embraced in the Rock Island Circuit, and in Iowa. In almost all the great criminal cases of the time he was engaged on one side or the other. He prosecuted and convicted the murderers of Colonel Davenport, at Rock Island, in 1845; he successfully defended Captain Irish, of Iowa City, who, with a number of others, was charged with the murder of Boyd Wilkinson, at Iowa City, in 1857; prosecuted, at Chicago, Hoppes for the murder of his wife, in 1862, a noted case of the time, in which, at the first trial, he secured a conviction, in spite of the strong testimony supporting the insanity of the defendant. A second trial was afterward had, in which the defendant was acquitted on the ground of insanity. As a criminal lawyer, and as an advocate before a jury, he had few, if any equals, and no superior, at the Bar of Illinois. In 1860, he removed to Chicago, and was associated in business with Charles H. Reed. On the death of Carlos Havens, Governor Yates appointed him State's attorney, and he filled out the unexpired term of his predecessor. On leaving the State's attorney's office, Mr. Knox resumed general practice, in which he continued for a number of years.

CHARLES H. REED, the next incumbent of the State's attorney's office, was born in Wyoming County, New York, October 27, 1834. His early life was passed on a farm and in attending the district school. Afterward, he spent some time at an academy in Western New York, and subsequently at the Hopkins Grammar School, in New Haven, Conn. In 1857, he commenced the study of law, first in Erie County, New York, and afterward at Kewanee, Ill. There he was admitted to the Bar, and in 1859, he removed to Rock Island, where he formed a partnership with Joseph Knox. In 1860, the firm removed to Chicago, and when Mr. Knox was appointed to the office of State's attorney, Mr. Reed became his assistant. In 1864, he was elected State's attorney and was re-elected two successive terms, holding the position for twelve years. He was a very able and successful prosecutor, bringing to the discharge of his duties abundant learning and great energy and industry. After his retirement from office, he resumed the practice of his profession at Chicago. In 1879, he was a candidate on the Republican ticket for circuit judge, but was defeated. In the winter of 1882, he was associated in the defense of the assassin, Charles Guiteau, at Washington, and since that time has practiced in Washington and New York. Mr. Reed was married, in 1861, to a daughter of J. J. Beardsley a well-known lawyer of Rock Island.

THE BAR.

ROBERT S. BLACKWELL, one of the most distinguished members of the Chicago Bar, was born at Belleville, Ill., in 1823. His father was a lawyer of prominence, a member of the State Legislature, and took an active part on the anti-slavery side in 1823-24. Young Blackwell received a common school education, and first engaged in mercantile business at Galena, and afterward at Monmouth. Desiring to study law, he became a student under C. H. Browning, at Quincy. After his admission to the Bar, he commenced practice in Schuyler County, where he was very successful. In 1852, he removed to Chicago, and assumed a high rank as an able lawyer, eloquent advocate and brilliant scholar. He, at first, formed a partnership with Corydon Beckwith, and subsequently established the law-firms of Blackwell & Roberts and Blackwell & Cummings. Mr. Blackwell was then author of a work on Tax Titles, which became, and has continued to be, the standard work on that subject. Associated with Judges Scates and Treat, he also edited the Revised Statutes of Illinois, which was published in 1858. His talents were of a high order, his energy indomitable, and he attained a high position at the Bar. He died May 16, 1863, leaving a wife and two children.

DANIEL MCILROY, for a long time identified with the Chicago Bar as a successful practitioner, died at his residence, in Chicago, on August 25, 1862. He was a native of Tyrone County, Ireland, emigrating to America with his family when very young. For some two or three years he kept school in Boston, several of his old pupils afterward residing in Chicago. Mr. McIlroy was a graduate of Cambridge University, and afterward studied law with Judge Story, of Boston, whose office he left to settle in the West. He came to this city in 1844, and commenced the practice of law, in which he was eminently successful; so much so, that he was elected State's attorney, serving for eight years from April, 1849. He was an accomplished scholar, a ready debater, and one of Chicago's really eloquent orators. Mr. McIlroy made his greatest legal effort during the celebrated trial of George W. Green for the murder of his wife. He succeeded in convicting the defendant, who committed suicide in his cell. As a criminal lawyer he ever stood in the front rank of practitioners.

RICHARD T. MERRICK was born in Charles County, Maryland, in 1828. He came from a well-known Maryland family, his father, William D. Merrick, having served in the United States Senate from 1838 to 1845. When the war with Mexico broke out, Mr. Merrick, although not of age, raised a company in his section, and under his command it did gallant service during the war. Before the conclusion of his services in the field he began the practice of law, and was also sent to the State Legislature. Shortly before the late war he moved to Chicago, and formed a co-partnership with a personal friend who was a leading member of the Bar. He was a delegate from Illinois to the Democratic National Convention of 1860, and supported Stephen A. Douglas. In 1864, Mr. Merrick married a daughter of James C. McGuire, of Washington, having removed from Chicago to Washington. In the twenty years that he practiced in Washington he held an eminent place at the Bar, and had been engaged as counsel in some of the most important cases before the Bench of the District of Columbia as well as the Supreme Court of the United States. He was one of the principal counsel before the Electoral Commission, and in recent years was for months daily before the public in his able prosecution of the star-route cases. Mr. Merrick was also frequently applied to, to conduct important cases before the committees of Congress. He had never since the War been a candidate for any political place, except when he ran as the Democratic candidate for Delegate to Congress from the District of Columbia under the territorial form of the government. He always maintained a controlling influence in the politics of Maryland, while his extended acquaintance with the public men of the day gave him prominence in national politics. He died at Washington on June 23, 1885.

ALFRED W. ARRINGTON was born in Iredele County, North Carolina, September 17, 1810. When he was still young his father moved Arkansas, and there, when he was eighteen, Mr. Arrington commenced his career as an itinerant Methodist preacher. This, however, he abandoned and commenced to study law. He was admitted to the Bar in Missouri in 1835, and for the next twelve years practiced his profession in Missouri, Arkansas and Texas. He then spent two years in the North, principally in New York and Boston, where he engaged to some extent in literary pursuits. He wrote "Sketches of the South and Southwest," an essay entitled "The Mathematical Harmonies of the Universe," and some fugitive pieces of poetry. The sketches contained the celebrated "Apostrophe to Water," which John B. Gough afterward adapted and declaimed with great power. He returned to Texas in 1849, and was a judge of the Circuit Court, which position he held five years. His health giving away, he sought a change of climate, and removed to New York City, where he again engaged in literary pursuits, and, among other things, wrote a novel entitled "The Rangers and Regulators of the Tanaha." He now determined to engage in the practice of his profession, and, upon looking over the field, chose Chicago as his future home. Here he settled in 1856, and soon rose to the foremost place at the Bar. He was engaged in most of the great causes in the Federal and State courts up to the time of his death. He was, for a number of years, associated with Thomas Dent, under the firm name of Arrington & Dent. Judge Arrington possessed in no uncommon degree two faculties not often united in the same person. He had the power of reasoning upon a legal proposition with the cold exactness of mathematics, so that his premises once admitted, there was no escape from his conclusion. He also had a lively fancy, and a power of persuasive eloquence rarely equaled. During the late years of his life, he was an avowed skeptic, but he was always a curious and anxious student of religion. Like many another such investigator, he found at last peace of mind in the Roman Catholic Church, and in the communion of that faith he was received and baptized when on his dying bed. He died on December 31, 1867. A wife and three children remained to mourn his loss.

SAMUEL W. FULLER was born in Caledonia County, Vermont, April 25, 1822. His father, Samuel Fuller, was a farmer of limited means. His mother, Martha (Worcester) Fuller, was a sister of Joseph E. Worcester, the lexicographer. Young Fuller led the ordinary life of a New England farmer's son up to the age of twenty, when he entered the office of Judge Bartlett, a leading lawyer of Vermont, to commence the study of law, maintaining himself meanwhile by teaching school. He was admitted to the Bar in 1847, and commenced practice in Claremont, N. H., but in 1850 removed to Pekin, Ill. There his learning and abilities soon won the attention and respect of the community, and the friendship of such distinguished men as Judge Purple, Judge Davis, Mr. Lincoln and O. H. Browning. In 1867, he removed to Chicago, and became associated in business with Scammon & McCagg, and at once gained a commanding position at the Bar. In addition to a large and varied knowledge of jurisprudence, he possessed an extensive acquaintance with general literature, poetry, the drama and belles-lettres. He brought to the trial of his cases great precision of statement and clearness of thought, nor did he ever seek to wrest the law to unjust purposes nor gain causes by oblique methods. He died in October, 1873, while still in the prime of life, but ill health had pursued him nearly all his days. The last argument he made was delivered while sitting in a chair, being too weak to stand erect.

HORATIO LOOMIS WAIT, one of the ablest members of the legal profession, was born in New York City, August 8, 1836. He attended Trinity School, in New York, until seventeen years of age, and then entered Columbia College grammar school, where he remained several years, receiving a fine education. In 1858, he removed to Chicago and entered the office of Hon. J. Young Scammon, where he continued until the Civil War broke out, when he entered the United States Navy as paymaster, serving under Admiral Dupont in the South Atlantic blockading squadron, in which service he was engaged until 1863. In that year, he was detailed for service in the West Indies, but, after a short cruise, was ordered to the fleet which, under Farragut, was in the siege of Mobile. He was attached to Admiral Dahlgren's flag-ship off Charleston harbor, in 1864, and took part in all of the operations there until the fall of Charleston. After the close of the war, he made a cruise with the European squadron. In 1860, he returned to Chicago, entered the office of Joseph N. Barker, and was admitted to the Bar in 1870. He was then associated with Mr. Barker in a law partnership, under the firm name of Barker & Wait. In 1876, Mr. Wait was appointed master in chancery; and, the duties of his office demanding all his time, the firm of Barker & Wait was dissolved. In 1860, he was married to Miss Chara C. Long, daughter of the late James Long, of Chicago. It is an unusual thing, in the hurry of American life, for a man to become complete master of his profession; but when Mr. Wait was appointed to the office which he holds, it became evident that the severe training to which he had been subjected and his natural abilities, had given him the power of grappling with and conquering the difficulties of a subject. He has given perfect satisfaction to the Bench and Bar in his quasi-judicial office; for a master in chancery comes between the Bench and the Bar; to him are referred intricate matters of dispute between parties, and his reports are laid before the judges in the subsequent trial. The office is principally of a judicial nature, and the training a man receives in the position tends to prepare him for the less arduous office on the Bench; and of the members of the Chicago Bar, the one who is most directly in the line of promotion to a judicial office, by proper fitting, training and habits of thought, is Horatio Loomis Wait.

NORMAN B. JUDD was born at Rome, N. Y., January 10, 1815. There he received his education, entered upon the study of law, and was admitted to practice. Hon. John D. Caton, who had been his school-fellow and friend, had already commenced practice in Chicago, and invited Mr. Judd to engage in practice with him. He accepted the invitation, and, in 1836, removed to Chicago and entered upon the practice of his profession in partnership with Mr. Caton. This partnership was dissolved in 1838, because of Mr. Caton's removal from Chicago, and Mr. Judd formed another with Jonathan Young Scammon, which lasted until 1847. He then formed a partnership with John M. Wilson, which continued until Judge Wilson's elevation to the Bench, in 1853. During these years, Mr. Judd was actively engaged in politics, was elected State Senator in 1844, and re-elected continuously until 1860. Originally a Democrat, he separated from that party, in 1854, on the Kansas-Nebraska question, and was one of the active promoters of the election of Lyman Trumbull to the United States Senate, in 1855. After the formation of the Republican party, he actively supported it. He was a steady adherent of Mr. Lincoln, and nominated him for the presidency in the Convention of 1860. He accompanied Mr. Lincoln on his journey to Washington, in February, 1861, and after Mr. Lincoln's inauguration and the completion of his cabinet, Mr. Judd's name was sent to the Senate as minister to Berlin. This position he held four years, when he was recalled by President Johnson. On his return to Chicago, Mr. Judd was elected to Congress, and continued a member of that body until 1871, when he declined a re-election. In 1872, he received from President Grant the appointment of collector of the port of Chicago, which position he held until his death. While it thus appears that for a large part of Mr. Judd's life he was actively engaged in politics, during the same period, except when absent from the United States, he was also largely employed in his profession. He was particularly eminent as a railroad lawyer, and had extensive practice in that department of the law. At various times he was attorney for the Michigan Southern, the Rock Island, the Pittsburgh & Ft. Wayne, and was connected, as director or president, with other railroads. Mr. Judd was married, in 1844, to Miss Adeline Rossiter, of Chicago.

CHARLES HITCHCOCK was born April 4, 1827, in Hanson, Plymouth Co., Mass., and died at his home in Kenwood, Cook Co., Ill., May 6, 1881. He was descended from Luke Hitchcock, who came over from England and settled in New Haven in 1644. The public-school education of young Hitchcock having been supplemented by a partial course at Phillips' Academy, in Andover, he entered Dartmouth College in 1847, and graduated in the class of 1851. Having studied law one year under Daniel Blaisdell, treasurer of the college, he went to Washington, D. C., to fill the position of professor in an academy, which he held one year. He used his leisure time to continue the study of law, under the guidance of Hon. Joseph Bradley. In the fall of 1853, he entered the senior class of the Dana Law School, of Harvard College. After further initiation in the practice of law under Harvey Jewell, of Boston, he was admitted to the Bar in 1854. Coming to Chicago, he entered the office of Williams & Woodbridge, and was enrolled a member of the Bar of Illinois October 10, 1854. In 1856, he was of the law firm of Hitchcock & Goodwin for about a year, and, later on, of Gallup & Hitchcock, which terminated in 1862. Hitchcock & Dupee, 1862 to 1866, by the accession of Mr. Everts, became Hitchcock, Dupee & Everts, 1866 to 1872, and by his withdrawal became again Hitchcock & Dupee. In 1875, it was changed to Hitchcock, Dupee & Judah, continuing until the death of the senior member. Mr. Hitchcock was president of the State Constitutional Convention of 1870—"the best yet adopted of American State Constitutions"—and besides his well-known services as presiding officer, was author of some of its more important new provisions. He was elected one of the county commissioners after the fire, and was largely instrumental in securing the remission by the State of the city's debt, and the appropriation of the amount to build its bridges. On July 10, 1860, Mr. Hitchcock married Miss Annie McClure, of Chicago, a daughter of James and Julia (Rodgers) McClure. The general estimate of the Bar ranked him as an accurate and able lawyer in commercial and corporation cases, if indeed he had an equal in argument before the court, while his personal worth was recognized by a still wider circle.

W. Lloyd Garrison

USHER F. LINDER, more widely known throughout the State as General Linder, was a member of the Chicago Bar from 1860 until his death in 1876. He had gained considerable celebrity in the early days on the "Wabash circuit," where he practiced with Messrs. Trumbull, Lincoln, Gillespie, and other noted men of the time. He was born in Kentucky on March 20, 1809, received a somewhat limited education, studied law, and was admitted to the Bar of Hardin County. There he practiced several years, but in 1835, removed to Illinois. In 1837, he was elected attorney-general of the State, which office he held two years. After his removal to Chicago, his business was never very extensive. He rendered good service to the cause of the Union in the opening years of the Civil War, as a strong War Democrat, canvassing a large part of the State on several important occasions. He died June 5, 1876, leaving a wife, who survived him but a year, and five children. He was a man of great talent, and had a large circle of admirers and friends, among whom Mr. Lincoln was one of the warmest. He left a volume of reminiscences, which have since been published, containing sketches of many prominent members of the Illinois Bar.

EDWIN CHANNING LARNED was born in Providence, R. I., July 14, 1820. His father was a prominent and influential merchant of that city. Mr. Larned was educated at private schools in Providence, and graduated from Brown University in 1840. After leaving college, he taught one year as professor of mathematics in Kemper College, St. Louis. He then returned to Rhode Island, and commenced the study of law with Hon. Albert C. Greene, who was afterward Senator from that State. On admission to the Bar, he practiced in Providence for several years, and in 1847, came to Chicago, and commenced practice in partnership with Cyrus Dently. Subsequently, he had business partnership with John Woodbridge, with Isaac N. Arnold and George W. Lay, and, in 1857, with Stephen Goodwin. In April, 1861, Mr. Lincoln appointed him as United States district attorney for the Northern District of Illinois, and he continued in that office, until impaired health compelled him to resign in November, 1864. He had previously, with the consent of the attorney-general, appointed Mr. Goodwin to act in his place. He visited Europe, where he remained from April until December, 1863, returning with restored health. Mr. Larned married, in 1849, Frances, a daughter of Hon. A. C. Greene, in whose office he had commenced the study of law. He died at Chicago, September 18, 1884.

ARTHUR W. WINDETT was born in Norwich, England, November 11, 1828. During his boyhood he received a good education in his native city, which he completed in Chicago, where he settled in 1846. Here, also, he commenced his legal studies, and was admitted to the Bar of Illinois in 1850. For the next twenty years Mr. Windett was actively employed in general professional labors, being engaged in many of the great and important causes of the times in the Federal and State courts. He always held a leading position at the Bar during his active practice. In recent years, Mr. Windett has abandoned general practice, giving his attention almost entirely to real-estate law, and to the management of his own extensive real-estate operations.

THOMAS HOYNE was one of the ablest and grandest men who have figured in the history of Chicago. Warm-hearted, broad-minded, honest, brilliant, impulsive yet stable, few men have lived in this city whose death was more universally or deeply mourned. Born in New York City, February 11, 1817, the son of a poor, hard-working man, Thomas received his early education in a Catholic school attached to St. Peter's Church, and at the age of thirteen was left an orphan. He was then apprenticed to a manufacturer of fancy goods, with whom he remained for four or five years. During this period his mental activity showed itself by the leading part he took in a literary association, of which George Manierre was a member. There the young men laid the foundation of that friendship which continued strong and unvarying up to the death of Mr. Manierre, in 1863. He also joined two night schools, and assiduously studied Latin, Greek, English grammar and elocution, and when his apprenticeship expired, in 1835, he obtained a situation in a law office, with the design of prosecuting his legal studies. His mind was further enriched and trained by contact with one of the most brilliant Baptist divines in America, Rev. Archibald Maclay, D.D., in whose family he boarded. In 1836, then only nineteen years of age, he studied with John Brinkerhoff, an old lawyer of New York. In the meantime his fast friend, George Manierre, had removed to Chicago, and wrote such enthusiastic letters to him, that, in August, 1837, he started for the city himself. As assistant to the deputy of the clerk of the Circuit Court, at a salary of ten dollars a week, young Hoyne made his start. In the autumn of 1838, he took charge of a public school near the north-west corner of West Lake and North Canal streets, but resigned after four months' trial, as it was taking too much time from his law studies. Here it was that he first met John Wentworth, then school inspector. He next entered the office of J. Young Scammon, where he completed his law studies. In 1840, the Democrats elected Alexander Loyd mayor, and Thomas Hoyne city clerk. While acting in this capacity, he had the honor of drawing up the first Thanksgiving proclamation ever issued in the State, appointing December 3, 1840, as the day of celebration. He was married on September 17, 1840, to Leonora M., the daughter of Dr. John T. Temple, one of the old and respected citizens of Chicago. In 1842, Mr. Hoyne removed to Galena, where he resided two years, and then returned to Chicago, commencing practice in December, 1844. He was elected probate justice of the peace, and held this position until the court was abolished by the new Constitution of 1848. In 1847, he formed a partnership with Mark Skinner, which remained unbroken until 1851, when the latter was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas. In 1848, and through all the excitement caused by the passage of the Wilmot Proviso and the Cass-Van Buren campaign, Mr. Hoyne was a vigorous opponent to the further extension of slavery, and a bold and manly member of the Free-soil Democracy. Principally through the influence of Mr. Wentworth, in 1853 he was appointed United States attorney for the district of Illinois. In his first case—the prosecution of a mail robber,—Abraham Lincoln conducted the defense; but the prosecuting officer was successful, and this trial alone did much to fix his reputation. During his administration as United States attorney and marshal, not a single prosecution or arrest occurred under the fugitive slave law. In 1854, Mr. Hoyne supported Senator Douglas in his position on the Kansas-Nebraska troubles. President Buchanan having been elected in 1856, he withdrew his claims for a re-appointment to the district-attorneyship, but seeing that a compromise with the Douglas wing of his party was impossible, supported the National administration and the President's recommendation for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Charles A. Pine, United States marshal, became a defaulter in 1850, and Mr. Hoyne, one of the sureties on his bond, was prevailed upon to accept the position, entering upon the duties of his office in April of that year. The marshalship was Mr. Hoyne's last political office, and yet his career of usefulness may be said to have just commenced. His connection with the University of Chicago and the College of Law, his valuable efforts to establish a stable currency in the community, his patriotism during the War, a boulevard system for the poor as well as the rich, and his persistency in ever upholding municipal honor, have endeared him to the people of Chicago, and stamped him as a man of high and broad character far more than any acts, however able, which he performed as office-holder or lawyer. "As a preventer of corporated encroachments upon individual rights," says Mr. Wentworth, in an eloquent tribute to his friend, "Chicago has not had an abler man than Thomas Hoyne. He was always a man for an emergency, abounding in moral courage, and having public confidence at his back. The people could ever trust Thomas Hoyne, and he never abused his trust." In 1856, the Baptists accepted Judge Douglas's offer of ten acres of land at Cottage Grove, to be devoted to university purposes. Judge Douglas was elected president of the board of trustees, of which Mr. Hoyne was a member, the corner-stone of the new building being laid July 4, 1857. In 1859, Mr. Hoyne subscribed $5,000 for the endowment of a Chair of International and Constitutional Law, the college being opened in September of that year. For fourteen years the College of Law remained under the control of the University of Chicago, and Mr.

Hoyme was its inspiring spirit throughout, acting as the chairman of its board of counselors. In 1862, in recognition of his invaluable services, the college conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. To his efforts, also, is largely due the possession of the great Lalande telescope. In May, 1866, the glass was placed in position, and Mr. Hoyme was elected the first secretary of the astronomical society, which office he held for several years. In June, 1873, when the University of Chicago and the Northwestern University formed the Union College of Law, Mr. Hoyme was chairman of the board of trustees, in behalf of the University of Chicago, for 1873-74, and in 1877 he was chosen president of the joint board of management, which position he held up to the time of his death, in July, 1883. During the War, Mr. Hoyme was one of the most steadfast and prominent of the War Democrats of the Northwest, being placed upon the Union Defense Committee, and contributing by his means and strength to uphold the Northern cause. He was a life-member of the Chicago Mechanics' Institute and of the Chicago Historical Society, being not only a member in name, but in deed, and was first vice-president of the latter organization at the time of his death. To him, as much as to any one else, does Chicago owe the prosperity of her public library. He was not only the associate of such men as Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas, but their intimate and honored friend; and when the remains of the martyr President were being borne from Washington to Springfield, Mr. Hoyme was one of the committee of escort from the State of Illinois. In 1876, Mr. Hoyme was elected mayor of the city, but owing to a technicality, a special election was called, on July 12, and Monroe Heath was elected to the position. The manner of his selection for this office was the highest compliment that could be paid to his integrity and ability. He was nominated at a mass-meeting of forty thousand citizens, irrespective of party, held in the Exposition building, to protest against the corruption and usurpation of the city administration, which claimed an extension of its tenure of office under the new law. He was unanimously chosen as the man pre-eminently fitted to make the contest, and was elected by the overwhelming majority of thirty-three thousand votes. He held the office for three months, and during that time instituted many reforms, and put an end to the abuses which had been complained of. He abolished the practice of borrowing money upon certificates, which was a bold measure in the face of the declaration that such action would destroy the credit of the city. But the result was, as he had anticipated, that the credit of the city was established upon a firmer basis than ever before, when it became known that the administration proposed to pay its debts, to be governed by the law, and not extend its credit beyond the limit fixed by law. The present financial standing of the city, in fact, may be traced to the policy adopted by Mr. Hoyme, although he has not always been credited with it. The City Council did, however, some time after Mr. Hoyme had ceased to be mayor, adopt the following resolutions, recognizing the service he had rendered to the city, and giving him credit for his financial policy:

"Resolved, That to Thomas Hoyme, our excellent mayor, de facto, for the month of May last, belongs the credit of starting our municipal reform.

"Resolved, That we tender to the Hon. Thomas Hoyme our thanks for the bold and statesmanlike inaugural address delivered before us, and believe that the sentiments therein contained, have tended to guide this Council in measures of reform; and while we are not able, legally, to return him a compensation in money for his good advice, we do tender him our sincere thanks as members of this Common Council."

The question of law as to the validity of Mr. Hoyme's election was submitted, by agreement, to the five judges of the Circuit Court, and it was decided by a divided court, three to two, that Mr. Colvin's term had been extended by operation of law, and that Mr. Hoyme was not mayor. As Mr. Hoyme had no desire for office for the sake of office, he concluded to abide by the decision of the court, and in the interest of peace and harmony declined to make a contest. From that time until the date of his death he confined himself to the practice of his profession. He had early associated with himself Benjamin F. Ayer, since then the noted railway lawyer; and in January, 1864, Oliver H. Horton entered the partnership, with whom and his son, Thomas M. Hoyme, he practiced with pre-eminent success in all the higher and lower courts. Although his love for out-door exercise and his temperate habits had been the means of maintaining the vigor and freshness of his constitution, Mr. Hoyme, in the summer of 1883, feeling the need of rest and a change from his professional labors, decided upon an eastern tour to Niagara Falls and down the St. Lawrence River. On Thursday afternoon, July 26, he left Chicago, and on Friday evening, while a passenger on a well-crowded excursion train, he met with that accident, by collision, which resulted in his violent death at a small station called Carlton, Orleans Co., N. Y. On Monday evening his remains reached Chicago, and his funeral obsequies were held the next day at St. Mary's Church, and were attended by the lowly, who loved him, his professional brethren of the Bench and Bar, and representatives of the county, municipal, civic and educational organizations. Thus passed away, as remarked by one of his most intimate friends, "One of the brightest ornaments of Chicago's early history. His personal activity and strength of mind increased with age, and he has left to his seven children (of every one of whom any parent could be proud) a rich legacy in his doctrine, illustrated by example, that personal, professional, corporate, religious, financial and political honor is identical and inseparable. As an impromptu orator to miscellaneous crowds suddenly met in public places, Chicago has had no equal to Thomas Hoyme, and no man has ever lived to question the sincerity of his motives in his unstudied efforts to arouse the masses to a sense of the injustice inflicted upon them."

JESSE O. NORTON, who stood for many years in the front rank of Chicago lawyers, was born at Bennington, Vt., December 25, 1812, and died at his home in Kenwood, on the 3d of August, 1875. After graduating from Williams College in 1835, he taught school at Wheeling, Va., and Potosi, Mo.; studied law; married Miss P. S. Sheldon, of the latter place, in December, 1837. About a year later they removed to Illinois, and in 1839, settled in Joliet. Previous to 1848, Mr. Norton had been chosen city attorney and county judge. His subsequent course so established public confidence in his ability and honesty that, in 1852, he was sent to Congress, having two years previously served a term in the Legislature. His career in Congress as an earnest and effective opponent of the Missouri compromise earned him a re-election, and he served in that body until March 4, 1857. From that time until 1862, he filled the position of circuit judge, and, during the latter year, was again elected to Congress, serving until March 5, 1865. While a member of that body, during those troublous times, Judge Norton steadily maintained that the union of the States was not broken by rebellion; that the Constitution was still the supreme law, and binding upon Congress as well as the States, and therefore that Congress had no more power to expel States from the Union than the States had power to withdraw. In 1866, he was appointed United States district attorney for the Northern District of Illinois, and held this position until April, 1860, when he honorably retired from the office, and, coming to Chicago, associated himself in the practice of his profession with Judge James R. Doolittle. After the great fire, he practiced alone, a portion of the time as corporation counsel. He thus continued until his death, leaving at his decease a widow. The Bar Association took appropriate action, and resolutions of condolence and affectionate remembrance were presented in all the courts by his friends and associates.

Some of the more prominent lawyers who died during the period covered by this volume (1858 to 1872) are,—Bolton H. Strother, 1862, at one time collector of the port of Chicago; Andrew D. Harvie, 1863; Lorenzo D. Wilkinson, 1863; George W. Roberts, killed at the battle of Murfreesboro', January, 1863; John A. Boss, killed at the assault on Petersburg, July 30, 1864; Benjamin Morris Thomas, 1864; John C. Miller, 1865; Charles M. Willard, 1866; Edward P. Towne, 1866; Henry L. Rucker, 1867; and Solomon M. Willson, a brother of Judge John M. Willson, 1867.

SKETCHES OF PROMINENT LAWYERS.

It might perhaps be invidious to say which one of some dozen members of the Chicago Bar should be called the chief, since there are so many lawyers in this city who have achieved not only State, but National, reputation, and whose eloquence in debate or oration has made their names "familiar in our mouths as household words." The various testimonials of public esteem and honor that have been received by members of the Bar in this city, would demonstrate that that department of the civic population was hydra-headed. One lawyer is distinguished for power and brilliancy of advocacy, another for profound learning, another for lucidity of statement, another for strength and solidity of logical reasoning, and others for some particular quality in which their pre-eminence is recognized; but it is probable that if the suffrage of the entire Bar were taken as to who should stand at the head, the choice would almost unanimously fall upon Corydon Beckwith. He possesses, in a marvelous degree, all the qualities which go to make the great lawyer,—profound learning, great logical power, brilliancy of statement, and aptitude for affairs.

CORYDON BECKWITH was born in Caledonia County, Vermont, July 24, 1823. He acquired his rudimentary education in the common schools in the vicinity of his home; afterward pursued a scientific and classical course at Providence, R. I., and Wrentham, Mass. He then devoted three years to legal studies, and, in 1844, was admitted to the Bar at St. Albans, Vt. The two succeeding years were spent in the practice of his profession in his native State, and in 1846 he removed to Maryland, and was admitted to the Bar of that State, at Frederick City. In 1847, he returned to St. Albans, Vt., where he formed a partnership with Frederick A. Schley, a distinguished lawyer of that place, and remained until his removal to Chicago in the spring of 1853. During the latter year he became associated with Van H. Higgins and Bolton F. Strother, under the firm name of Higgins, Beckwith & Strother, being also associated with other prominent members of the profession. Mr. Beckwith occupied the Bench of the Supreme Court for a time, under the administration of Governor Vates. He became counsel for the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad in 1864; and in 1873, was made general solicitor of the same company, retiring at that time from the firm of Beckwith, Ayer & Kales. He has also been concerned as counsel for other of the great corporations, and is usually engaged on one side or the other of the great cases involving corporate rights and liabilities.

BENJAMIN M. MUNN is a native of the Green Mountain State, and was born in West Fairlee, Orange County, Vt., on February 11, 1826. After being educated in the district schools and in Williams College, Mass., he went to Boston to study law with Colonel Stickney, completing his course with William S. Holman, the well-known Indiana congressman. Mr. Munn was admitted to the Bar in 1852, but did not practice for a number of years, being principal of the Rising Sun (Ind.) Female Seminary and of the Charleston (Ill.) Academy. He then engaged in the practice of law in Central Illinois until 1861, having as his co-workers in the circuit such men as Abraham Lincoln, Governor Palmer, S. L. Logan and Ben. Edwards, of Springfield, and argued important cases in the Federal Court before Judge David Davis. At the breaking out of the War he entered the army, and was elected captain of Co. "D," in the 7th Illinois Infantry, being with General Grant during the first year of the war. He now holds the oldest captain's commission in the volunteer service. Captain Munn settled in Chicago in 1869, was deputy collector of internal revenue in 1872-73, assistant counsel to the corporation under Judge Jesse O. Norton, and acting counsel for several months. For several years prior to 1880, he made a specialty of internal revenue practice with his partner, Theodore E. Davis, of Washington, D. C. He has now an extensive practice, and is widely known for the ability with which his cases are prepared and conducted.

THOMAS DENT, senior member of the law firm Dent, Black & Cratty Bros., was born in Putnam County, Illinois, November 4, 1831. His father, George Dent, was one of the early settlers in that part of the State, and during his residence of nearly half a century in Illinois was a man of political influence. While frontier life, in the westward march of settlement, ruled with the older members of the families with which Mr. Dent is connected, each generation took its part in the development of the country, and shared in local reputation and honors, corresponding with educational advantages, which in the case of Mr. Dent were well improved in his youth. At the age of fifteen, he became a permanent assistant of his father in the public offices at Hennepin, Ill., where he was engaged for several years, during which time he pursued the study of the law. He was admitted to the Bar in his twenty-third year, and immediately began the practice of his profession in the circuit of his residence. Desiring a larger field of labor, he moved in 1856, to Chicago, and was associated for a time with Martin K. M. Wallace, under the firm name of Wallace & Dent. Retaining, however, some connection with the practice at his old home, he attended the courts there, and in other counties. In 1857, he made arrangements to take up his residence in Peoria, Ill., but, receiving encouragement to maintain his residence in Chicago, returned for a permanent residence in the fall of 1858. About two years thereafter, he became associated with Alfred W. Arrington, under the firm name of Arrington & Dent. This partnership continued until the death of Judge Arrington in December, 1867. Soon afterward, Mr. Dent associated with himself William P. Black, who had formerly been a student in the office of Arrington & Dent, and this association has since continued, though recently two other gentlemen have become connected with them in the practice of the law, the firm now being Dent, Black & Cratty Bros. The practice of Mr. Dent has not been confined to any specialty. His cases have therefore been carried into all the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, and courts outside of Illinois. The opinion of Mr. Dent on the Mayoralty question, when the late Thomas Hoynes had been so generally voted for to fill that office in the spring of 1876, was sought for, and had considerable publicity at the time. On the question of submitting to a vote of the people the proposition to abolish township organization in the county, he was also prominently associated with eminent counsel. He has occasionally prepared literary essays or lectures, among which may be mentioned his essay on the "Law of the Grain Exchange," read before the State Bar Association in 1883, for the preparation of which, he was selected for his practical knowledge of the subject. He has been favorably named, as well in the city of his chosen home as in his former place of residence, for judicial office especially, but has pursued his professional work in preference to entering upon a political career. Mr. Dent was married in 1857, to Miss Susan Strawn, of Putnam County. Their only child, Mary, was taken with typhoid fever while traveling abroad, and died at Milan, Italy, in February, 1882.

MELVILLE W. FULLER, son of Frederick A. and Catherine M. (Weston) Fuller, was born in Augusta, Maine, February 11, 1833. After fitting for college in his native city, he entered Bowdoin College, from which he graduated in the summer of 1853, and after studying law in the office of his uncle, George M. Weston, at Bangor, and attending lectures at Harvard University, he commenced the practice of his profession in Augusta, in the spring of 1856. Although his residence in his native city at this time was quite brief, he was, during the year, elected city attorney and president of the Common Council; and to these duties was added journalistic work, he being one of the editors of The Age, the Democratic organ of the State. Resigning these positions, he removed in June, 1856, to Chicago, where he again engaged in practice, and where he has since resided. His devotion to his profession has been rewarded by the attainment of an honorable and distinguished name as an attorney and counselor, and a competency of this world's goods. Among the notable cases in which he has been engaged, one of the more conspicuous was the defense of Rev. Charles Edward Cheney, on the charge of canonical disobedience and violation of rubric. This case, which was tried before an ecclesiastical tribunal, and in which litigation extended from 1869 to 1878, proved by the severest tests the profound and accurate knowledge of ecclesiastical law possessed by Mr. Fuller, and his power of presenting his points in the most forcible and convincing manner; and brought into the civil courts it involved the discussion of the delicate question of when, and under what circumstances, the latter may interfere with church tribunals. In 1862, he was a member of the Constitutional Convention in Illinois, and the following year was a member of the Legislature, being elected, in both cases, from the Republican districts, although a staunch Democrat from his youth. He was a delegate to the National Democratic Conventions of 1864, 1872, 1876 and 1880; a friend of Stephen A. Douglas, delivering the address of welcome to that distinguished statesman on his visit to the city in 1860, and a eulogy on him, after his death, in 1861. Among his other addresses, that on the life and character of Judge Sidney Breese, delivered before the State Bar Association, in 1879, is noteworthy as a brilliant and scholarly production. Mr. Fuller was married, in 1858, to Calista O. Reynolds. His second wife, to whom he was married in 1866, is Mary Ellen, daughter of the late Hon. William F. Coolbaugh. He has nine children, eight daughters and one son, and has lost one child by death.

LEONARD SWETT, one of the most prominent lawyers of the Northwest, and one whose reputation is national, was born in Turner, Oxford Co., Me., on the farm of John Swett, or on Swett's Hill. His parents John and Remember (Berry) Swett, believed so thoroughly in giving their children good educations, that, when twelve years of age Leonard commenced the study of Latin and Greek, as a preliminary for a ministerial course of study. He afterward took a two years' course at North Varmouth Academy, and when seventeen, entered Waterville College. Having determined upon the study of law, he left school before he had finished his fourth year, and entered the law office of Howard & Shepley, Portland. After remaining with them two years, he traveled in the South, seeking a favorable location, but came West, and reaching Madison, Ind., determined to enlist for the Mexican War. Joining the 5th Indiana Infantry, in 1848, commanded by General James H. Lane, he was made orderly-sergeant, and placed in command of a company which was detailed to guard trains from Vera Cruz to Jalapa, Pueblo and Cordova. It is said that his service was one prolonged picnic, or excursion, and that, during all his stay in Mexico, he never saw the balance of his regiment. He was taken sick at Vera Cruz, and, after remaining in hospital one month, was sent up the Mississippi River to Jefferson Barracks, Mo., where he was discharged. Before they reached that point, however, nearly one-third of the passengers had died of complaints incident to the Far South. Although greatly shattered in health, Mr. Swett survived his severe attack of sickness, and subsequently located at Bloomington, Ill., where he was admitted to the Bar, and commenced the practice of law. His first and most steadfast friends were David Davis and Abraham Lincoln, his seniors by some years. With them, and such men as Stephen T. Logan, John T. Stuart, U. F. Linder and Edward D. Baker, he traveled a circuit of fourteen counties on horseback, building up a large practice and a strong constitution. From 1840 to 1861, Mr. Swett made Bloomington his home. During the War, his legal business took him to Washington, New York and California. In the latter State his time was chiefly occupied with the litigations which for many years involved the Quicksilver Mining Company, or the New Almaden Mine. In 1865, he located permanently in Chicago, where he has earned a substantial reputation, both as a civil and a criminal lawyer. He at first formed a partnership with Van H. Higgins and Colonel David Quigg, which continued up to the time of the fire. In 1879, he associated Pliny N. Haskell with himself. Mr. Haskell died on July 26, 1884; P. S. Grosscup, E. R. Swett and E. S. Bottom have in the meantime become members of the firm. Mr. Swett was married, on July 20, 1854, to Laura R. Quigg, sister of his former law partner, his wife being a native of Chester, N. H. They have one child—Leonard H.

EMERY A. STORRS was born in Hinsdale, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., on August 12, 1835, the son of Alexander Storrs, who was a lawyer of some prominence. He commenced the study of law with his father and with Marshall B. Champlain, who was for two terms attorney-general for the State of New York. He thence went to Buffalo, and became a law student at that city in the office of Austin & Scroggs, the senior member of that firm then being district attorney. Thus, it will be seen that Mr. Storrs pursued his legal studies with exceptional advantages, and, his ability being apparent to his preceptors, immediately after his admission to the Bar, he became a partner of Mr. Austin and his son, under the firm name of Austin, Storrs & Austin, and continued the practice of law in New York until April, 1859, at which time he removed to Chicago. Since that time, the fame of Mr. Storrs has become not only local, but national. Possibly much of the success which he has achieved at the forum and on the rostrum may be ascribed, as much as to any other one cause, to his analytical power and his keen discernment of the temperament of his auditors. On numberless occasions interruptions have occurred among his audiences which would have disconcerted, and possibly routed, any one else; but with his quickness of repartee and store of anecdote and reminiscence, he would utter some pungent witicism or stinging sarcasm, that would discomfort his interruptor and prove to be the best possible utterance that could have been made. Some of the prominent cases in which Mr. Storrs has been engaged, in his discursive legal experience, are as follows: In 1860-61, he was engaged on the celebrated cases for E. S. Smith; he tried the first "stump-tail" (or wild-cat) cases before juries in Judge Drummond's court; he also argued the noted State House case, the P. S. cases, the railroad taxation cases, and the case wherein the liability of common carriers was fixed as to their delivery of grain to the elevator to which it was consigned. In 1876, he tried the celebrated Babcock case, in St. Louis; and shortly afterward, argued the cases involving the legality of an election for the incorporation of a city under the general law. Among the capital cases in which Mr. Storrs has been engaged, may be mentioned his prosecution of the Cook County Commissioners; his defense of Alexander Sullivan; of Cochrane, the Wisconsin bank cashier; of Kansom, the Mayor of El Paso; and of Jere Dunn. And during the intense activity and research necessitated by his professional duties, he found time to take the stump in behalf of Abraham Lincoln; to prepare the resolutions indorsing the Emancipation Proclamation reported at the great meeting in Chicago; to take an active part in the campaign of 1864; to be especially interested in the reconstruction measures of Andrew Johnson, in 1866; in 1868, to be a delegate to the National Convention from the State-at-large, and subsequently to take the stump through New York and New England; to be delegate-at-large to the National Convention, at Philadelphia, in 1872, and to perform the duties of one of the vice-presidents; to prepare the constitution and by-laws for the Citizens' Association, of Chicago; to be one of the three original incorporators, and one of the most active promoters, of the Citizens' League for the suppression of the sale of liquor to minors; to argue the question relative to the transportation of live-stock before the House Committee; to argue the question relative to the reduction of the duty on steel rails, before the House Committee; and to make arguments relative to Keagan's Inter-State Commerce Bill, on the question as to the amenability of checks and bank deposits to taxation, and, in the winter of 1884-85, to make arguments on the pleuro-pneumonia, or Animal Industry, bill. In the convention of 1880, Mr. Storrs was a delegate from the State-at-large, and was a member of the committee on resolutions, as a member of which committee he drafted that part which related to the enforcement of the Constitutional amendments. Among other adjuncts which may be cited as feasible reasons for his deserved literary reputation, are his lectures before the Law School on the English Constitution and Trial by Jury, his lecture on Municipal Government, his lecture before the Historical Society, and his address at the opening of the new Board of Trade, in 1885; while his contributions to the North American Review have stamped him as an able essayist.

MURRY F. TULEY was born in Louisville, Ky., March 4, 1827. His education was obtained at the common schools, and was completed when he reached the age of thirteen, at which time he went into a store as a clerk. His father died when his son was five years of age, and his mother, after eleven years of widowhood, married Richard J. Hamilton, and removed to Chicago. Here young Tuley commenced the study of law with Colonel Hamilton, and in the spring of 1847 was admitted to the Bar. It was the time of the Mexican war, and Mr. Tuley enlisted in the 5th Illinois Regiment, Colonel Newby commanding, and was ordered to service in New Mexico, under the command of General Sterling Price, afterward a Confederate general. At the conclusion of the Mexican war, Mr. Tuley settled in Santa Fé, where he commenced practice, and remained there until 1854. During that period he was attorney-general of the Territory for two years and a member of the Legislature for 1853-54. In 1854, he returned to Chicago and engaged in practice, first with Andrew Harvie, then with Joseph E. Gary and J. N. Barker. In 1860, he became corporation counsel, and after several years in that position organized the firm of Tuley, Stiles & Lewis, of which he remained the head until elected to the Circuit Bench in June, 1870. At the Bar, Judge Tuley's career was marked by great success. Prudence and care for the interests of his clients, rather than brilliance of display for himself, were among his strongest characteristics. Of solid judgment, widely read in the learning of his profession, of calm and patient mind he was admirably fitted for the Bench, and found his congenial place there. He holds an enviable rank among his fellow-judges, and has the respect and confidence of the Bar and the public.

HON. WILLIAM H. KING, LL.D., has practiced his profession in Chicago for thirty-two years, and commands the confidence and respect of not only the Bench and Bar, but of all who know him. He has a thoroughly logical and legal mind, and has the rare ability to present his case to the court and jury in the clearest and most logical and forcible manner. The result of his practice has been an honorable name and a pecuniary competence. His professional brethren know him best and are most competent to express an opinion concerning him. One of the judges of the Supreme Court said of him: "I have known well, for many years, William H. King of this city. I regard him a gentleman of high moral worth and of rare purity of character. He is a learned, ripe and discriminating lawyer. A man of well balanced and impartial judgment, of very agreeable urbanity, yet of great decision of character and moral courage." Mr. King was born in Clifton Park, Saratoga Co., N. Y., October 23, 1817. He was graduated from Union College, at Schenectady, N. Y., in 1846, and in 1849, that college conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.D. He studied law in the office of Hon. John K. Porter, at Waterford, N. Y., and was admitted to the Bar in 1847. He then commenced the practice of law at Waterford, where he remained until 1853, when he removed to Chicago, arriving here on the 4th of February of that year. Mr. King has since been honored with many offices of public trust. He has been president of the Chicago Law Institute, president of the Chicago Bar Association, president of the Chicago Board of Education, president of the Union College Alumni Association of the Northwest; and member of the Illinois State Legislature. In 1874, one of the schools of the West Division was named by the Board of Education the "King School, in honor of the Hon. William H. King, president of this Board, and in acknowledgment of the services rendered by him to the cause of popular education and of his devotion to the best interests of our public schools." Mr. King has, annually for eleven years, presented prizes to nine of the pupils of that school whose averages were highest in attendance, deportment and scholarship. In December, 1854, the school had been in successful operation eleven years, when Mr. King was surprised by a graceful testimonial presented to him by the pupils. During the two years in which Mr. King was a member of the Illinois Legislature (1871-72), he was chairman of the Committee on Fees and Salaries, and a member of the Committee on Judicial Department and Education. After the fire of 1871, when all the records of Cook County were destroyed, it was absolutely necessary that the Legislature should enact a law, by which the owners might be enabled to protect their titles to their real estate. Mr. King was then a member of the Legislature and was appointed chairman of a committee to draft a bill for that purpose. He prepared a bill, which was passed by the Legislature and became a law, and has proved to be entirely satisfactory and efficacious. In the Legislature, he was noted for ability and honesty, and, after the expiration of his term, he was urged to accept other political preferences, but he decided to continue the practice of his profession. Mr. King was married, at Orange, Mass., September 1, 1847, to Mary, daughter of Levi and Plotina (Metcalf) Cheney. They have two children—Mary, wife of Tappan Halsey, and Fanny, who graduated at Smith College in 1882. Mrs. King is a lady of rare ability and culture, and her husband heartily acknowledges that he is indebted to his wife for much of his success in life.

EZRA BUTLER MCCAGG, for many years a leader in his profession, was born at Kinderhook, N. Y., November 22, 1825, and is the son of Isaac and Louisa Caroline (Butler) McCagg. He pursued his literary studies and became very efficient under the tuition of a neighboring clergyman. He read law several years with Monell, Hogeboom & Monell, of Hudson, N. Y., and was admitted to the Bar in 1847. The following summer he came to Chicago, when he entered into a partnership with Hon. J. V. Scammon, under the firm name of Scammon & McCagg. In 1849, Hon. Samuel W. Fuller was associated with them, and, in 1872, Mr. Scammon withdrew from the firm, and Mr. McCagg's present partner, W. I. Culver, was admitted into the partnership; with the exceptions above mentioned, the original partnership was the same until the death of Mr. Fuller in 1873. The firm is now McCagg & Culver. The business of this firm has been very extensive throughout all of its changes. During the Civil War, Mr. McCagg was very influential in promoting the interests of the United States Sanitary Commission, and filled acceptably and with marked ability the arduous position of president of the Northwestern Branch of that organization. He was formerly a trustee of the University of Chicago, and is yet a trustee of the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and president of the board of trustees of the Eastern Hospital for the Insane. He lost his law library in the great fire of 1871, and a magnificent miscellaneous library, the accumulation of years. His collection of writings and letters of the early Jesuits and settlers of the Northwestern States and Territories was one of the best extant. Mr. McCagg is a public-spirited gentleman, and has given much time to philanthropic and charitable affairs. According to the modern idea of politicians, Mr. McCagg does not belong to that class, but he is in principles a Republican.

CHARLES B. HOSMER is among the oldest members of the legal profession in this city, being admitted to the Chicago Bar in the fall of 1830. He at once removed to Naperville, DuPage County, where he practiced nine years, and returned to Chicago in 1848. In the following year he formed a partnership with the well-known Ebenezer Peck, and this connection continued twelve years, when the latter was appointed judge of the Court of Claims, Washington. From 1861 to 1871, Mr. Hosmer practiced alone, since which time he has been in partnership with his son, the firm making a specialty of real estate law. Mr. Hosmer was born in Columbia, Conn., September 26, 1812, being the son of Stephen Hosmer, a substantial merchant of that place. He graduated from Yale College in 1833, and studied law, first in New Haven with Silas Mix, and then with General James R. Lawrence, of Syracuse, N. Y. In the fall of 1830, he removed to Chicago, and as stated was admitted to the Bar.

E. D. HOSMER, who is associated with his father, was born at Naperville, Ill., in November, 1843. After graduating from Harvard College in 1865, he traveled throughout Europe for three years. He then took a course in the law department of the Northwestern University, from which he graduated in 1870, and was soon afterward admitted to practice.

ROBERT HERVEY is one of Chicago's earliest and most prominent lawyers, coming to this city from Ottawa, Canada, in 1852, and forming a partnership with Buckner S. Morris and Joseph P. Clarkson. In 1853, Hugh T. Dickey having resigned, Mr. Morris was elected to complete his term as circuit judge, and the senior member of the firm of Morris, Hervey & Clarkson, therefore, withdrew from it. The law firm of Hervey & Clarkson continued successfully in the practice of their profession four years. In 1857, Mr. Hervey formed a partnership with Elliott Anthony, now on the Bench of the Superior Court, and three years thereafter A. T. Gall was admitted to the firm. The connection continued unbroken for seventeen years. As a lawyer, Mr. Hervey has no specialty. His broad education and wide experience, his courteous and affable manners, his business ability, and his eloquence, have combined to make him remarkably successful in criminal cases as well as in suits which involve large property interests. In 1872, he assisted in the defense of the nineteen aldermen indicted for bribery, and only one was convicted. He was retained by the State in the Hopp's murder case, in the defense of the county commissioners, in the Arthur Devine murder case, and in many other important criminal trials. It is certainly a remarkable "coincidence" that none of his clients ever suffered the extreme penalty of the law. His firm were the attorneys for the non-content stockholders of the Galena & Chicago Union Railway Company, and filed a bill to break up the consolidation with the Chicago & North-Western Road, and the Court decreed full payment of the market value of the stock at the time of the consolidation, which was paid. Mr. Hervey was one of the originators of the Chicago Bar Association, and his good, hardy Scotch blood has been repeatedly recognized by the St. Andrew's Society and the Caledonian Club, of which organizations he has been a member for many years, and often president. He was born in Glasgow, Scotland, on August 10, 1820, his father, Alexander, being proprietor of a plantation in Trinidad. After graduating from the University of Glasgow in 1837, he emigrated to Bytown, now Ottawa, Canada, and studied law with Henry Sherwood, attorney-general of the province of Canada. He was admitted to the Bar in 1842, and the next year married his first wife, Miss Maria Jones, daughter of Dunham Jones, collector of the port of Maitland, Ontario. For ten years he practiced his profession with good success, and, in 1852, came to Chicago, as the city which promised the fairest for young men of energy and ability. That the promise has been realized is clearly shown by the record which he has made as lawyer and citizen for the past thirty-three years. In 1861, Mr. Hervey was married to his second wife, Miss Frances W. Smith.

WILLIAM H. STICKNEY was born in Baltimore, Md., November 9, 1800. He was a student of Transylvania University, of Lexington, Ky., and read law in the office of Este & Haines, one of the most prominent legal firms of Cincinnati. He was admitted to the Bar in 1831, and in that year, became the partner of the Hon. Robert T. Lytle, then a member of Congress from the district; the law firm was Lytle & Stickney. In 1832, Mr. Stickney was nominated on the Democratic ticket for State's attorney of Hamilton County, but that ticket met a defeat that year. In February, 1834, Mr. Stickney came to Shawneetown, Illinois, and in company with the Hon. Henry Eddy, one of the most classic scholars and learned lawyers of this State, at that time, traveled on horseback to Vandalia, then the seat of Government, and his certificate of admission to the Bar of Illinois was issued there, dated the 4th of March, 1834, and antedates that of any lawyer now residing in Chicago. In this connection, the Chicago Legal News of December 15, 1883, stated: "SCATES & STICKNEY.—A correspondent, reading our answer to the letter in our last issue, that Walter B. Scates and William H. Stickney were the two oldest Illinois lawyers in commission, living at this time in Chicago, says, it is a strange coincidence, that Hon. Walter B. Scates, who was appointed by the Legislature, about the year 1836, circuit judge for the Third Judicial District, composed of fourteen of the southern counties of the State, and that Hon. W. H. Stickney, who was appointed by the Legislature, in 1830, State's attorney for the same Judicial District, and rode the Circuit with Judge Scates, should both, after the lapse of nearly fifty years, be living in Chicago, and practicing law here. We are told that this Circuit was composed of the following counties: Marion, Jefferson, Perry, Franklin, Jackson, Union, Alexander, Pulaski, Massac, Johnson, Pope, Hardin, Gallatin and Hamilton. This circuit reached from Cairo to the Wabash River, and extended as far north as the northern part of Marion County. Mr. Stickney was admitted to the Illinois Bar, on the fourth day of March, 1834, and to the Bar of Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the State of Illinois, on the third day of June, 1839." He was editor and proprietor of the Gallatin Democrat and Illinois Advertiser, 1835-36, at Shawneetown. In 1839, he was elected by the Legislature of Illinois, State's attorney for the Third Judicial District, composed of thirteen counties, extending from the Wabash to the Mississippi River. In 1846, he was elected a representative from Gallatin County; and was a prominent, laborious and useful member of the session of 1846-47. He married at Carni, White County, February 11, 1837, Elizabeth Weed, daughter of Hugh M. Weed, a young lady of extraordinary intellectual power, pleasing manners and generous character. She died at Chicago July 30, 1849. In 1852, he was married to Cornelia, eldest daughter of the Hon. Judge Henry Brown, deceased, of Chicago. Mrs. Stickney is still living. Mr. Stickney was elected alderman of the city from the Eighteenth Ward, in 1854, and appointed by Mayor Milliken, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He was city assessor of the North Division, appointed by Mayor Wentworth, in 1860. He was elected by the Council, police justice of the city in 1860, and held the office of justice of the peace for thirteen years, with other offices to which he was elected by the people. In November, 1875, he was elected, on the Reform ticket, a member of the House of Representatives from Cook County, and served his term at Springfield in the session of 1875-76. In the first volume, it is mentioned to his credit, that he refused an office, the commission for which was granted him, on a technical exception to the misnomer of the office of police magistrate, the opposing ticket to that on which his name was contained, being printed "For police justice," instead of Police Magistrate. Years afterward, in 1871, he was elected a police magistrate by a large majority, but was refused, with others, a commission by Governor Palmer, in whose opinion the office of police magistrate, in the City of Chicago, had been abolished by the Constitution of Illinois in 1870. After the argument of an agreed case, to test the question, the Supreme Court of Illinois held with Governor Palmer. Since that decision police magistrates have been selected from the justices of the peace by the mayor and Council. Mr. Stickney has now retired from public life and the active practice of his profession, but still retains, at the age of seventy-five years, full vigor of mind and unusual energy, continuing occasionally to make his appearance in special cases in our courts.

SIDNEY SMITH, chief-justice of the Superior Court of Cook County, dates his term of six years from November, 1870. No judge upon the Bench is more respected for the solid qualities of knowledge of the law and broad judgment in arriving at the motives of men. He was born in Washington County, N. Y., May 12, 1829. At the age of twenty he completed his academic studies, when he began the study of law with Messrs. Church & Davis, among the ablest lawyers of New York City. Two years thereafter he was admitted to the Bar at Albion, where his present associate upon the bench, William K. McAllister, practiced law for so many years. Judge Smith came to Chicago in 1856, and a few months later joined Grant Goodrich and W. W. Farwell, forming the firm of Goodrich, Farwell & Smith, whose fame soon extended over the Northwest. From 1857 until the spring of 1859, Mr. Goodrich traveled abroad because of ill health, and served as one of the judges of the Superior Court of Chicago from that time until 1863, when he returned to his position in the firm which he had founded. In 1870, when Mr. Farwell was chosen a judge of the Circuit Court, the partnership was dissolved. Judge Smith then resumed the practice of his profession, and for nine years continued to build up the substantial reputation which he had made during his previous labors of nearly a quarter of a century. In November, 1879, he was elected to his present position, performing his arduous and complex duties with the facility which only comes to a mind thoroughly trained in the principles of common law and possessed of great stamina.

JOHN VAN ARMAN was born in Plattsburgh, Clinton Co., N. Y., March 3, 1820, the son of John and Tamar (Dewey) Van Arman. He was the youngest of fourteen children, and having lost his mother when he was only five years of age, went to live with a farmer. When he grew older, not liking either his master or his occupation, he ran away, to shift for himself. He taught the district school, obtained some Latin and Greek through his own efforts, and commenced the study of law at his old home, when seventeen years of age. He first studied under William Swetland, and finished at Troy, under George Gould, the son of Judge Gould, principal of the Litchfield Law School. In 1840, Mr. Van Arman was admitted to the Bar in New York City, and immediately commenced practice in Marshall, Mich. There he became the attorney for many of the leading lumber firms, being also the legal representative of extensive manufactories at Muskegon. In 1842, his business in the United States courts of defending his clients for alleged trespasses upon Government lands, and in the conduct of other suits, frequently brought him to Chicago, where he soon attained a good standing and a wide acquaintance. In 1851, on behalf of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, he prosecuted forty men for throwing cars from the track, of whom twelve were convicted and sent to the penitentiary, and three of them died during trial. They were defended by William H. Seward and others. In May, 1858, he located permanently in Chicago, and became a member of the firm of Walker, Van Arman & Dexter, largely engaged in business connected with railroads. From 1858 to 1862, Mr. Van Arman was the attorney for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. During the latter year he raised the 127th Illinois Infantry, bearing the bulk of the expense, and was commissioned its colonel. Ill health, however, obliged him to resign, and go to California, where he remained some time, resuming practice in the beginning of 1865. He at once entered into a partnership with Henry G. Miller, with whom he remained up to the time of the fire, when he lost property worth $25,000, and a fine library, not yet placed upon the shelves. Since that time he has practiced mainly alone. Since coming to Chicago, Colonel Van Arman has had a very important and lucrative practice, principally of a civil nature. He has, however, been engaged in several of the most important criminal cases of early times, such as the Jumpert murder (better known as the "barrel case") and the Burch divorce case. He was married, in March, 1841, to Amanda Convis, daughter of General Ezra Convis, who, at the time of his death, was speaker of the Michigan House of Representatives. They have had three children; the one now living is the wife of James Bradish, of Grand Crossing, Col.

SIDNEY THOMAS was born October 3, 1837, in Calhoun County, Mich. He is a son of Rev. David and Melissa (Rhodes) Thomas, both of his parents being of New England descent. His father was, for four years, a missionary among the Pottawatomies in Grand River Valley, Mich., and was for thirty years a member of the Michigan Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His early educational studies were pursued under the disadvantages attending the itinerant life of his father; but at the age of seventeen he began a more regular course of study, teaching during the winter months and attending school during the spring and fall—first, at Olivet, Mich., and, later, in the State University at Ann Arbor, Mich. In 1858, he began the study of law in the office of Brown & Greenough, of Marshall, Mich. In 1859, he graduated from the law department of Michigan University, and, having passed his examination before the Supreme Court, was, that year, admitted to the Bar of Detroit. In 1860, he commenced practice in Marshall, Calhoun Co., Mich., and for about one year was associated with Hon. Henry W. Taylor, formerly one of the judges of the Court of Appeals, of New York, and afterward he served two terms as county judge. Subsequently, he formed a co-partnership with William D. Adams, a former law student in his office, which continued until he came to Chicago, in 1865, where he rapidly established a varied and lucrative practice. Among the many important civil suits in which he has been successful, may be mentioned that of the Kenosha County Bank, in which Mr. Thomas defended the stockholders, many of them citizens of Chicago, against the attempt of the president to charge them with fictitious liabilities involving a large amount. In this long litigation, Mr. Thomas was associated with Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter. In criminal practice he successfully defended Miss McKee, indicted for the murder of Constable McElligott, whom she shot while, in the performance of his official duty, he was attempting to distraint her household goods. He published, in 1871, a treatise entitled "Outlines of Practice in the Supreme Court," which received very favorable comment. In the fire of 1871, he was entirely burned out. Subsequently, he traveled quite extensively, and, in 1879, went abroad, visiting, during his absence, London, Paris and other places of interest. In 1872, he was the candidate of the Liberal Republicans for State's attorney. He was a delegate to the National Convention at Cincinnati, which nominated Horace Greeley for the presidency, and stumped the State for him in the ensuing campaign. Mr. Thomas is a member of the Law Institute and of the Philosophical Society, being president of the latter association. He married, in 1860, Miss Alice Carrier, of Calhoun County, Michigan, a sister of Professor O. M. Carrier, of Olivet College.

GENERAL JOHN L. THOMPSON was born in 1835, in Plymouth, N. H., the son of William C. Thompson, a noted lawyer of that place. His grandfather, Hon. Thomas W. Thompson, was formerly speaker of the House of Representatives of New Hampshire, and United States Senator from that State. His father practiced law in Salisbury, N. H., the birth-place of Daniel Webster, and it was in his office that Webster studied law. John L. Thompson took a preparatory course at Meriden, N. H., entering Dartmouth College in 1852, and remaining two years; after which he entered Williams College, where he continued his studies one year. He commenced the study of the law in the office of the Hon. F. H. Dewey, in Worcester, Mass., attending the law school at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., for a brief period; and in 1856, he entered Harvard Law School, from which he was graduated in 1858, and during that year was admitted to the Bar in Worcester. He then went to Europe, continuing his studies at the universities of Berlin, Munich and Paris, and returning to America in 1860. During that year he came to Chicago, and entered the office of Scammon, McCagg & Fuller, as a clerk and student. At the breaking out of the Civil War, he enlisted as a private in the Chicago Light Artillery, in which he was afterward corporal. Returning to the East in 1862, he was commissioned lieutenant in the 1st Rhode Island Cavalry, and was subsequently transferred to the 1st New Hampshire Cavalry, of which he became colonel, and was afterward brevetted brigadier-general. Among the many engagements in which General Thompson took an active part, were the battles of Front Royal, Cedar Mountain, second battle of Bull Run, Chantilly, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg (where his command captured a portion of the rear guard of Lee's army). These battles were fought under Generals McDowell, Pope, Burnside and Hooker. Under General Mead, who then commanded the Army of the Potomac, he participated in the fights at Bristow's Station and Auburn, and was with the raids made under Generals Stoneman and Wilson. In the valley of the Shenandoah, under Sheridan, he took part in the battles of Fischer's Hill, Waynesboro' and Cedar Creek. He was mustered out of service in 1865, and resumed his studies in the office of Scammon, McCagg & Fuller. In the spring of 1866, he commenced the practice of his profession on his own account, and in the following October formed the partnership, which still continues, with Norman Williams, under the firm name of Williams & Thompson. General Thompson traveled over the Rocky Mountains and on the Pacific Coast for his health in 1832, and was materially benefited by the trip. He was alderman of the city from 1876 to 1878. In 1870, he was the Republican candidate for the State Constitutional Convention, and is now prominently connected with the work of the Citizens' Association of Chicago. He was married, in 1866, to Miss Laura Chandler, daughter of Samuel C. Chandler, of Peacham, Vt. They have two children, Leverett and Susan, both of whom are now being educated in this city.

HENRY S. MONROE, a practising lawyer of long and high standing in Chicago, was born in Baltimore, Md., February 9, 1829, the son of Dr. Henry and Sylvia (Thomas) Monroe. He passed his early boyhood in Broome County, and prepared for college at Oxford, N. Y. At the end of three years he entered the junior class of Geneva College, N. Y., graduating, in 1850, as valedictorian of his class. He studied law in the office Henry R. Mygatt, of Oxford, for a time, and, after teaching school for a few terms, was admitted to the Bar in 1853. Mr. Monroe purchased a few books, and at once came to Chicago, where he was acquainted with Stephen A. Douglas. Encouraged by him, he opened an office early in 1854, his first case being entitled Martin O. Walker vs. John Frink, his client being successful. Of late, Mr. Monroe has been largely interested in real-estate litigations. He formed a partnership with William J. Tewkesbury in October, 1882. Mr. Monroe has been quite unfortunate in the matter of loss by fires. In 1871, he possessed one of the largest law libraries in the Northwest, which was destroyed in the great fire. He was also a sufferer by the Grannis Block fire in 1885. Mr. Monroe was married in 1856, to Miss Mattie Mitchell, daughter of William B. Mitchell, of Akron Ohio.

EDWARD S. ISHAM, of the prominent firm of Isham & Lincoln, was born in Bennington, Vt., January 15, 1836, the son of Pierre-pont and Samantha (Swift) Isham. On account of ill health, he spent several years prior to 1852 in South Carolina. During that year, he went to Groton, Mass., where he prepared for college at Lawrence Academy. While attending Williams College he commenced to read law, and after his graduation, in 1857, he continued his studies in his father's office. He next took a course in the law school at Cambridge, Mass., and was admitted to the Bar at Rutland, Vt., in 1858. In October of that year, he came to Chicago, and commenced practice, forming a partnership with James L. Stark, a Vermont acquaintance. The firm of Stark & Isham was dissolved in 1863, and Mr. Isham was elected to the Legislature the next year. While thus serving, he was a member of the judiciary committee. Soon afterward he went to Europe, remaining abroad about two years. Upon his return he practiced alone until 1872, when, with Robert T. Lincoln, the present firm of Isham & Lincoln was formed. Mr. Isham's practice has always been of a high grade, being mostly confined to the chancery and Federal courts, and he has established a reputation as one of the safest counselors and ablest lawyers at the Bar. He was married, in 1861, to Miss Fannie Burch, of Little Falls, Herkimer Co., N. Y., and has four children, two sons and two daughters.

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, the only surviving son of Abraham Lincoln and Mary (Todd) Lincoln, was born at Springfield, Ill., on August 1, 1843. From early childhood his parents gave him a thorough education. When seven years of age he was sent to the academy of Mr. Estabrook, in Springfield, and after remaining there three years, entered the Illinois State University, at Springfield. He also attended Phillips' Academy, Exeter, N. H., and Harvard College, graduating from the latter institution in 1864. Entering the Harvard Law School, he left in February, 1865, to accept a commission in the United States army, as captain and assistant adjutant-general on General Grant's staff. Shortly after the surrender of General Lee, he resigned, and commenced the study of law in Chicago, being admitted to the Bar in 1867. As the junior member of the firm of Scammon & Lincoln, he at once commenced the practice of his profession, but the partnership being soon dissolved, he continued in practice alone until 1872, when he went to Europe for six months. Upon his return he formed the partnership with Edward S. Isham, which has continued ever since. In 1876, Mr. Lincoln was appointed supervisor of South Chicago, and in 1880, represented Cook County in the Illinois State Convention at Springfield, which nominated delegates to the Chicago National Convention. He was chosen one of the electors on the Republican ticket for the State. Early in the year, he was appointed by the governor one of the trustees of the Illinois Central Railroad. His greatest honor, however, came to him upon the accession of James A. Garfield to the presidency, when, as a tribute to his ability and sterling qualities, and as a graceful acknowledgment that his father's memory was still green in the hearts of the people, he was appointed Secretary of War. His administration of the affairs of the department was marked by decision and breadth of view. During the choice of President Arthur's successor his name was repeatedly mentioned for second place upon the National ticket. Not alone for the sake of his beloved father, but for his own worth, is Mr. Lincoln esteemed and honored by his associates, his clients and his friends.

OLIVER HARVEY HORTON is senior member of the firm of Horton, Hoyne & Saunders. He removed to Chicago from New York, in May, 1855, when nineteen years of age, and, after engaging in various commercial pursuits for the succeeding five years, commenced the study of law with Hoyne, Miller & Lewis, in June, 1860. From that time until the present, as law student and partner, he has been connected with Thomas M. Hoyne and Thomas M. Hoyne, in the same office in which he is now located. It is doubtful whether as much can be said of any other lawyer in the city of Chicago. Mr. Horton was born in Cattaraugus County, New York, October 20, 1835, his father, Harvey W. Horton, being a Baptist clergyman and a native of Vermont. He received his education at home and in the academy at Kingsville, Ohio, soon after which he came to Chicago. He was admitted to the Bar in 1862, and, in 1863, having taken a partial course in the University of Chicago, he graduated from that institution with honor. Mr. Horton was associated with Thomas Hoyne and Benjamin F. Ayer from January, 1864, until 1865, the firm name being Hoyne, Ayer & Horton. During the latter year, Mr. Ayer withdrew and the partnership of Hoyne & Horton was formed, which continued until January 1, 1867, when Thomas M. Hoyne became the third member of the firm. For twelve years, Burrows M. Saunders has been connected with the firm, and in 1881 became a member of it. Since the death of Thomas Hoyne, in July, 1883, the firm has consisted of O. H. Horton, Thomas M. Hoyne and Mr. Saunders. Mr. Horton has for many years been acknowledged to be among the leading members of his profession, and has been honored with important positions. He was for many years, and still is, an active trustee of the Northwestern University and president of the joint board of management of the Law School; also a prominent member of the Bar Association and Law Institute, having been president of the latter, treasurer during the trying period of the fire, and for many years a member of the executive committee. Mr. Horton has been actively and prominently identified with the Young Men's Christian Association, of which he has been vice-president, a member of the board of management, and chairman of the lecture committee. For fifteen years he was a trustee of the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, and is now an officer of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1880, he was sent as a lay delegate to the General Conference at Cincinnati, and, in 1881, to the Ecumenical Conference held in London. Mr. Horton being one of the twenty laymen who represented this country in that grand body.

THOMAS MACLAY HOYNE, the second son of Thomas and Lenora (Temple) Hoyne, was born at Galena, Ill., July 17, 1843. During the next year, his parents returned to Chicago. He graduated from the high school, and, in 1866, from the law department of the Northwestern University. Mr. Hoyne at once commenced practice, and, in 1867, became a member of the firm of Hoyne, Horton & Hoyne. He is still connected with Mr. Horton, the firm being Horton, Hoyne & Saunders. Mr. Hoyne was the first president of the Chicago Democratic Club, which subsequently was transformed into the Iroquois. He has never been an active politician, the only position to which he has ever been nominated (and that was an unwelcome surprise to him) being the supervisorship of the South Town, which office had formerly been held by Robert T. Lincoln. Mr. Hoyne married Miss Jeannie T. Maclay, daughter of Moses B. Maclay, a prominent lawyer of New York. The family was originally one of the most substantial in Scotland, and among its representatives in New York City was William B. Maclay, an uncle of Mrs. Hoyne, and a member of Congress, who greatly assisted Thomas Hoyne as a struggling youth. In the family of Rev. Archibald Maclay, one of the most brilliant Baptist divines who ever preached in America, Thomas Hoyne resided for a time. It was in grateful remembrance of this early friendship that Mr. Hoyne received from his father the name Maclay. While Mr. Hoyne has not confined his practice to any special branch of the law, he has, perhaps, been better known in real estate law and chancery practice.

HON. FRANCIS A. HOFFMAN was born in Herford, Westphalia, Prussia, in 1822. He received a classical education and training at the Royal Frederick William Gymnasium. Emigrating from Prussia he arrived in New York in September, 1840. He shortly afterward came to Chicago, and found employment as a teacher of a German school, at Downer's Grove. While thus engaged, he studied theology under the auspices of the German Lutheran Synod of Michigan, and was subsequently ordained and placed over the congregation at Dunkly's Grove. While pastor, he was also for a time editor of the Illinois Staats Zeitung, then a weekly paper. Mr. Hoffman also edited a missionary monthly, published at Ann Arbor, Mich., and frequently wrote for the Chicago Democrat, published by John Wentworth. In 1842, he was a delegate from Du Page County to the celebrated river and harbor convention at Chicago. In 1847, he was placed in charge of the German Lutheran Church at Schaumburg, Cook County. He removed to Chicago in 1852, entering the law office of Calvin DeWolf as student. Soon he became active in local politics, and was elected alderman for the Eighth Ward in 1853. After being admitted to the bar, he opened an office for the practice of law, and entered into real estate operations, in which he greatly prospered. He published, annually, a report of the mercantile, industrial and financial interests of Chicago, and had thousands of copies distributed in Germany and Switzerland. He was appointed consul for several of the governments of Germany. In 1854, he opened a banking house, meeting with great success, but owing to the panic caused by the Rebellion, in 1861 the house of Hoffman & Gelpecke, like numerous others, was forced to make an assignment. In 1856, he was elected lieutenant-governor. He filled that office from 1861 to 1865, and worked hand in hand with Governor Yates in the military preparations and the multitude of other public services of those momentous years. Mr. Hoffman was nominated as a candidate for Lincoln presidential elector, by the Republican Convention, in 1864. He was intrusted with the chief management of the campaign, as far as the Germans were concerned, and traveled many miles, making a host of speeches. He was commissioner of the foreign land department of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, from 1862 to 1866, and was instrumental in inducing thousands of German families to settle in the central part of the State. At the request of German capitalists, the International Bank of Chicago was organized by Mr. Hoffman, and he was its president and cashier for several years. After the fire, he was president of the bankers' committee, and greatly through his labors the plan was adopted by which accounts were to be opened and deposits received. By this prompt action, a general panic was undoubtedly averted. In 1875, Mr. Hoffman retired from business, and is now residing on his model farm in Jefferson, Wis. He there conducts his agricultural operations with the same system and ability which have marked his efforts in so many walks of life. His contributions to agricultural journals are also considered of great practical value. Mr. Hoffman was married in 1844, to Miss Cynthia Gilbert, an American lady. Their children, now living, are Francis A., Jr., of the law firm of Brandt & Hoffman, Chicago; Julius C., who was educated in the best medical universities of Berlin and Vienna, and at Rush Medical College, but now retired from practice, and living at Jefferson; and Adolph, physician in charge of the Cook County Infirmary; and Gilbert, a farmer of Jefferson.

GEORGE W. SMITH was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., January 8, 1837. At the Albany (N. Y.) Academy he attended school from 1851 to 1854, with the exception of a year which he spent in the office of the Benton & Albany Railroad Company. In 1854, he went to Helena, Ark., to teach school. The enterprise was abandoned, but Mr. Smith, not to be out-done, established a school of about fifty scholars, twelve miles out in the country, and taught it about one year. In the spring of 1856, he returned to Albany and commenced the study of law in the office of John H. Reynolds; he also took a full course at the Albany Law School. He removed to Chicago in 1855, and opened a law office at No. 10 South Clark Street. In 1862, he raised a company, in which he enlisted, and which was recruited largely in Tonia, LaSalle County, and along the Illinois Central Line. He was elected captain, the company, "A," being assigned to the 85th Illinois Volunteer Infantry. Captain Smith served with that organization until he was mustered out, being absent only when wounded, and not missing one of the engagements in which it participated. He was promoted major in 1863, and lieutenant-colonel in 1864; was breveted colonel for meritorious services at Franklin, and brigadier-general for the fine record he made during the War. When his regiment was mustered out, Colonel Smith returned to engage in the practice of his profession, to which he has since confined himself, with the exception of the years 1867 and 1868, when he served as State treasurer of Illinois.

EDWARD G. ASAY, son of John and Eliza Asay, was born in Philadelphia, on September 17, 1825. He received his education in the private schools of his native city. He was, in his early manhood, an active minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was engaged in itinerant work in the South for some time prior to 1852, at which time, although in good standing, he resigned his ministry, and began the study of law in New York, where, at the same time he engaged in literary pursuits, contributing to the leading periodicals, and becoming favorably known among the litterateurs of the city. Early in the spring of 1855, he was admitted to the Bar, and, in 1856, removed to Chicago and entered into the practice of his profession, where he soon attained high rank as an advocate and pleader, especially in criminal cases, in which department he has few superiors among the members of the Chicago Bar. He has, in later years, confined himself largely to office work in commercial law cases. For thirty years he has been in continuous and successful practice in Chicago, except while abroad. He has throughout his long period retained his literary tastes, and, as a bibliophile, is widely known, both in this country and in Europe. His library is one of the best and largest private collections of rare books in the country. He is the pioneer book-collector of Chicago, and is an unerring judge of rare books, for which he still keeps up an untiring search. His collection contains upwards of one thousand eight hundred volumes, many illustrated and printed on vellum. Among his pet books may be mentioned a set of Robert Burns in twelve volumes, profusely illustrated with portraits and views, and containing twenty of the originals of as many of his songs, and ballads, besides forty-seven letters of various members of the Burns family. Mr. Asay visited Europe in the spring of 1871, and remained abroad two years. He re-visited Europe in 1882, making an extended tour through Russia and Spain. He has been an Odd Fellow for thirty years, and has taken all the Masonic degrees to the thirty-second. He is at present a member of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., and of Oriental Consistory, 32°, S. P. R. S., of Chicago. He married, in 1840, Emma C. Oliver, daughter of James C. Oliver, of Pottsville, Penn. They have four children,—one daughter, Madeleine; and three sons, W. C., a lawyer, in partnership with his father, and E. G. and James F., engaged in manufacturing pursuits in Chicago.

GEORGE E. ADAMS was born in Keene, N. H., in June, 1840, the son of Benjamin F. and Louisa (Redington) Adams. In 1853, his parents removed to Chicago. Prior to this date he had received a common and high school education, and when he was sixteen years of age he entered Harvard College, and after pursuing a full course was graduated in 1860. He studied at the Dana Law School, Cambridge, Mass., and, after graduating, was admitted to the Bar in 1865. Since that date, Mr. Adams has built up an exceptionally good practice in his profession. Not alone has he achieved distinction in the legal profession, but, in November, 1880, he was elected by the voters of the Sixth Senatorial District to represent them in the Legislature. This position he occupied until March 3, 1883, when he resigned, in order to avail himself of his election to the forty-eighth Congress. He was elected on the Republican ticket; and this election testifies, as nothing else probably could, his popularity, as his opponent on the Democratic ticket was Judge Lambert Tree, who is without doubt as personally popular and of as high legal standing as any citizen of Chicago. But the election was a question between two contending forces, probably of equal legal and personal merits, but the politics of Mr. Adams decided the question in his favor. In November, 1884, he was elected, without the least difficulty, for a second congressional term. In 1871, he was married to Miss Adele Foster, daughter of Dr. John H. Foster, for many years one of the most prominent and honored citizens of Chicago. They have three children—Franklin Everett, Isabel and Margaret.

HARVEY B. HURD was born February 14, 1828, in Huntington, Fairfield Co., Conn. Until he was fourteen years of age, he lived upon his father's farm, picking up such scraps of knowledge as he could, and, in May, 1842, he entered the office of the Bridgeport Standard to learn the mysteries of the art preservative. In the spring of 1844, he went to New York, working for a time with Gould & Banks, the law-book publishers. The boy had the honor of "setting up" Daniel Webster's brief in the famous Girard case, and it is thought that in this way he obtained his first inspiration to become a lawyer. He returned to Bridgeport in the fall of 1844, and the same fall, with ten other young men, he started for Jubilee College, Peoria Co., Ill. He removed to Chicago, arriving on January 7, 1846, the possessor of only fifty cents in cash. The proprietor of the Illinois Exchange sheltered him until he obtained employment with the Evening Journal. He afterward worked in the office of the Prairie Farmer, and then studied law with Calvin DeWolf, being admitted to the Bar in 1848. The next year he formed a partnership with Carlos Haven, afterward State's attorney; then with Henry Snapp, late a member of Congress; and in 1850 associated himself with A. J. Brown, their business being principally in the real estate line. Becoming proprietors of two hundred and forty-eight acres of land, they laid it out as a part of Evanston, Mr. Hurd being among the first to locate there, in the fall of 1855. At this time, and long afterward, he was a vigorous anti-slavery agitator. He was a member of the Buffalo Convention of 1856, and of the committee that formed the plan of organization. In 1862, Mr. Hurd formed a partnership with Henry Booth, late judge of the circuit court and lecturer in the law department of the University of Chicago. In 1868, he withdrew from the firm, with the intention of retiring from practice. In April, 1869, he was appointed one of the three commissioners to revise the general statutes of the State. One of his co-workers was soon thereafter sent to the Legislature, and the other, after serving for a time, withdrew from the laborious task, leaving Mr. Hurd to finish it alone, which he accomplished with the adjournment of the XXXVIII General Assembly, in April, 1874. This Assembly appointed him to prepare and edit the State edition of 1874. He has since edited the four editions published by the Legal News Company. In 1875, he was elected to a Chair in the Union College of Law, as Professor of Pleadings, Practice, and Common and Statutory Law. He continues in the general practice of his profession. Mr. Hurd was married, in May, 1853, to Cornelia A. Hilliard, daughter of Captain James H. Hilliard, of Middletown, Conn. In November, 1860, he was married a second time to Sarah G., the widow of George Collins, of Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Hurd have two living children—Eda L., the wife of George S. Lord, and Nellie, the wife of John Comstock.

ELLIOTT ANTHONY is by birth a Quaker, and is descended from a long line of ancestors of that faith. He was born in Onondaga County, New York, June 10, 1827. In 1845, Elliott went to Cortland Academy, where he fitted for college, and, in the fall of 1847, entered Hamilton College. There he spent three years, graduating in 1850, with high honors. He immediately commenced the study of law with Prof. T. W. Dwight, now the head of the Columbia College Law School in the city of New York. In May, 1851, he was admitted to the Bar of New York. In June he came West, and spent one year at Sterling, Ill. He returned East in July following, and on the 14th of that month was united in marriage to Mary Dwight, a granddaughter of President Dwight, of Yale College, and sister of Prof. T. W. Dwight above mentioned. In November, he took up his abode in Chicago, with the outfit of a brave and noble wife, a copy of Blackstone's Commentaries, and eight dollars in his pocket. With the aid of his wife, in two years, he prepared and published a Digest of the Illinois Reports. In four years after, he was elected city attorney and then corporation counsel. He was one of the principal promoters of the Law Institute, drawing up the charter, and taking it to Springfield, and having it passed; and largely through his efforts the Bar of the City of Chicago is indebted for the magnificent library to which hundreds now resort. In 1853 or 1850, he was appointed general solicitor of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, which position he held until that corporation became consolidated with the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company. When that took place, Mr. Anthony was employed by the non-consenting stockholders and bondholders, and engaged in a litigation to break up the consolidation. He prepared a work embodying the law upon the subject of Consolidation of Railroad Companies, which was a masterly presentation of the subject. The case was argued before Judge Davis of the United States Supreme Court and Judge Treat of Springfield, and resulted in favor of Mr. Anthony's clients. Mr. Anthony early took a part in the formation of the Republican party, and for more than a quarter of a century has been a leader in that organization. He has twice been elected to constitutional conventions called by the people to revise the Constitution of the State—the first time in 1862 and the last in 1869-70. In the last he took a conspicuous part, and was chairman of the executive committee that framed the article in our present Constitution relating to the executive department. In 1880, he engaged in the great contest in this State over the election of delegates to the National Republican Convention, was selected a delegate to that convention, and aided in the nomination of General Garfield to the office of President. In November of that year he was elected judge of the Superior Court of this city by a large majority. From the very first day that he took his seat upon the Bench until the present time, he has devoted himself to the duties of the office with the most unflinching zeal and constant study. Judge Anthony has been identified with many of the public improvements of Chicago, such as the establishments of graded streets, water works, public parks, public library and cemeteries. In 1876, he was called again to the position of corporation counsel under Mayor Heath, and took a conspicuous part at that time in the great reform movement in connection with the late lamented Thomas Hoynes. At the time of the great fire he had, in addition to a large library, a choice miscellaneous library of over three thousand volumes, about one-half of which he saved by burying them in his garden, although most of his illustrated books and encyclopedias were burned. Judge Anthony has been twice married—his first wife dying in the year 1862, and his second wife, who was a sister of his first, dying in May, 1870. By his first wife he had four children—a daughter of rare accomplishments, who died while on a visit to Europe when grown to womanhood, and three sons, one now a practicing lawyer in Chicago, one a student of medicine at the Berlin University, Germany, and the youngest a member of the class of 1885, in Amherst College. Judge Anthony belongs to the second generation of pioneers in Chicago, whose progress has been aided so much by the energy and enlightened wisdom of her settlers.

CHARLES A. DUPEE, son of Jacob and Lydia (Wetherbee) Dupree, was born May 22, 1831, in West Brookfield, Mass. Having received his preparatory education at the academy in Monson and at Williston Seminary, East Hampton, Mass., he entered Yale College in 1850, and graduated, with honors, in the class of 1854. He came to Chicago in November of the same year, and became principal of Edwards Academy, where he taught six months. He then spent some months in travel. On his return to Chicago, in the fall of 1855, he was appointed principal of one of the public schools, holding that position one year. When the Chicago High School was established in 1856, it was placed in charge of Mr. Dupee. Under his supervision the institution was organized, and a course of study inaugurated which has stood the test of twenty-five years, with only slight changes. In addition to the faithful performance of the duties of principal, he wrote and published much on educational topics, and was the editor of the Illinois Teacher, a monthly periodical devoted to educational interests. He also began his preliminary law studies. In 1860, he resigned, and entered the Harvard Law School at Cambridge, Mass., subsequently completed his studies in the office of Gallup & Hitchcock, Chicago, and was admitted to the Bar, by the Supreme Court of Illinois, in 1861. At that time he was tendered the presidency of the State Normal School of Illinois, and also the Latin professorship in Chicago University, both of which situations he declined. Immediately after his admission, he began the practice of his chosen profession. In 1862, he formed his first law partnership with Jacob A. Cram, under the firm name of Dupee & Cram. This firm was dissolved in 1864, and Mr. Dupee became a member of the firm of Hitchcock, Dupee & Evarts. On the retirement of Mr. Evarts in 1872, the firm became Hitchcock & Dupee. In 1876, Noble P. Judah was admitted, and the style changed to Hitchcock, Dupee & Judah. On the death of Mr. Hitchcock, which occurred May 6, 1881, the business was continued by the surviving partners under the name of Dupee & Judah, afterward as Dupee, Judah & Willard. In his professional career, Mr. Dupee has attained high rank as an able lawyer and safe counselor. He married, in December, 1863, Miss Jennie Wells, daughter of Henry G. Wells, an early settler of Chicago. She died January 22, 1881. On March 27, 1883, he married Miss Bessie B. Nash, of Mack-ackee, Ohio. He has five children.

CHARLES CARROLL BONNEY, son of Jethro May and Jane C. (Lawton) Bonney, was born September 4, 1831, at Hamilton, N. Y. His father owned a fertile and beautiful farm in the vicinity of the village, situated on what is still known as Bonney Hill. There, young Bonney spent his youth, working on the farm, and attending the public schools, Hamilton Academy, and lectures at Madison University. He subsequently taught common and academic schools in New York and Illinois until he was twenty-one. He studied law while engaged in teaching, and was ready for admission to the Bar before attaining his majority. He came to Illinois September 28, 1850; located at Peoria on October 15 of that year; was admitted to the Bar of Illinois September 23, 1852; and to that of the United States Supreme Court January 5, 1866. From 1850 to 1854, he took a leading part in the work of establishing the present educational system of Illinois, delivering many addresses, and actively participating in the proceedings of more than twenty educational conventions and societies in that period. Through his instrumentality, the first State educational convention was called. He was one of the officers in a State Teachers' Institute, and a frequent writer on educational topics. Immediately after his admission to the Bar, he commenced the practice of his profession, which he has continued, with increasing success, until the present time. On September 12, 1860, he removed to Chicago, where he rapidly attained high rank at the Chicago Bar, both for his ability and extraordinary knowledge in the varied departments of law embraced in his extensive practice. Space does not permit even a cursory mention of the many important cases in which he has been engaged. In the midst of his arduous professional duties, Mr. Bonney has found time for the performance of much meritorious literary work, in legal, political, financial, and general literature. The following is but a meagre list of his published works: Treatises on "The Law of Railway Carriers" and "The Law of Insurance"; essays on "The Rights of Married Women to Hold Personal Property," "The Doctrine of Insanity in the Criminal Law," "The Powers of Courts and Legislatures over the Railroad Question," "Characteristics of a Great Lawyer," "The True Province of Government," "The True Doctrine of the Tariff," etc. etc. He also edited the poetical works of the late Judge Arrington. Mr. Bonney was elected president of the Illinois State Bar Association in January, 1882, and, in the following August, was elected vice-president of the American Bar Association, for Illinois, succeeding Hon. David Davis in that position. Mr. Bonney has never sought or held political office, but has, since 1852, taken an active interest in State and National politics, and has won a reputation in the various campaigns in which he has taken part, as an eloquent, logical and convincing speaker. Prior to the Rebellion he was a Democrat; during the War, an ardent "War Democrat"; and, since the close of the War, an Independent. He has been president of the Chicago Library Association, and was the author of the agitation which resulted in the establishment of the Chicago

Free Public Library. He was, for several years, one of the managers of the Chicago Athenæum, and was one of the founders of the Chicago Literary Club. Mr. Bonney has been for several years an active member and officer of the Chicago Law and Order League for the enforcement of the laws forbidding the sale of liquors to minors, and has also taken active part in other departments of temperance work. In religious faith, Mr. Bonney is a New Churchman, and has been active as a Bible-class teacher and as president of the State Sunday-school Association. He married, August 16, 1855, at Troy, N. Y., Miss Lydia Pratt; they have four surviving children—two sons and two daughters. Mr. Bonney's public services will be further noticed in our next volume, in connection with the important public movements in which he has been engaged, and which will there be treated.

WILLIAM FITZHUGH WHITEHOUSE, for over twelve years a member of the law firm of Judd & Whitehouse, is a son of the late bishop. He is a graduate of Columbia College. Afterward, he became a member of the firm of Walker & Dexter, and, in January, 1873, associated himself with S. Corning Judd. The partnership continued until May, 1885, when, on account of Mr. Judd's appointment as postmaster, it was dissolved. Of late years, Mr. Whitehouse's headquarters have been in New York City, where, on behalf of his firm, he has built up a large business among railway companies, also represented important foreign interests in this line of corporate practice.

FREDERICK HAMPDEN WINSTON was born in Liberty County, Georgia, November 21, 1830, being the son of Rev. Mr. Winston, a Presbyterian clergyman, and a graduate of Hamilton College and the Princeton Theological Seminary. On account of ill-health, his father removed to Georgia, where he married Miss Mary McIntosh, daughter of General McIntosh. In 1836, Mr. and Mrs. Winston removed to Kentucky, where they both died soon afterward, leaving their son to carve out his own career. There he remained until his eighteenth year, when he returned to Georgia, and engaged in the manufacture of cotton. This occupation not being congenial to his active mind, Mr. Winston decided to study law, and received his preliminary training in the office of William C. Dawson, United States Senator. He afterward took a course in the Dana Law School of Harvard University, from which he graduated in 1852, and completed his legal education with William M. Everts. During the early portion of the next year, he was admitted to practice, and removed to Chicago in the spring, forming a partnership with Norman B. Judd. The firm of Judd & Winston continued in successful practice until Mr. Judd was, by President Lincoln, appointed United States minister to Berlin. He next became associated with Judge Blodgett, who remained his partner until he was elevated to the Bench. The firm of Lawrence, Winston, Campbell & Lawrence was then formed. In December, 1879, F. S. Winston, Jr., and Chester M. Dawes associated themselves with F. H. Winston; but when Mr. Dawes was elevated to the judgeship of the United States District Court, he withdrew from the firm, and R. N. Rhodes became a member. Mr. Winston's practice has been remarkably successful, most of his professional labors being with large corporations, especially railroads. For fifteen years he was general solicitor of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad. He is president of the Lincoln Park commissioners, and largely interested in real estate. Mr. Winston is considered one of the ablest men in his party in Illinois, having repeatedly been urged to allow his name to be used on the Democratic ticket for congressional and municipal honors, but he has steadfastly declined to accept any reward for his effective services. He was married, in 1854, to Maria G. Dudley, daughter of General Ambrose Dudley, of Frankfort, Ky. They have six children—Frederick S. Jr., the present corporation counsel; Lillie, the wife of Thomas W. Grover; Dudley W., a student at Yale College; Bertram, Marie W. and Ralph.

JOHN MATTOCKS, a well-known lawyer, is a man of strong intellect and broad views. Inheriting a comprehensive mind from a family of professional men in the Green Mountain State, and possessing the advantages of early training, he stands high in his profession. He is the son of Rev. John and Mary Elizabeth (Brewer) Mattocks, and was born at Keeseville, Clinton Co., N. V., August 13, 1839. He obtained a classical education at Keeseville Academy, and at seventeen entered the office of Hon. George A. Simmons, a celebrated lawyer of that place, and applied himself to study until 1859, when he came to Chicago and was admitted to the bar in that year. In 1866, a law partnership was formed with Edward G. Mason, under the firm name of Mattocks & Mason, which continued until 1881, when Mr. Mattocks became associated with his brother and present partner, Walter Mattocks. His business is of an extended character, embracing that of Eastern estates and corporations, all of which have the utmost confidence in him, as evidenced by the large sums that pass through his hands without other security than his high personal honor. He is a safe counselor, with a well-balanced judgment and a keen foresight. As a jury lawyer, Mr. Mattocks is earnest and logical, and, when aroused, vehement and eloquent. As a judge of human nature, he is rarely mistaken; and, while usually communicative and congenial, is at times unceremonious and abrupt. In politics a Democrat, he has friends in both parties. To his perseverance and friendship, many are indebted for the offices they now fill, and scores from his native county occupy positions through his aid and influence. Mr. Mattocks has twice been a candidate for public office: in 1880, when he was defeated for Congress in the First District (overwhelmingly Republican), and the following year, when he was elected to the board of Cook County commissioners, which for many years had no Democratic representation. During his tenure of the latter office he made a vigorous battle in behalf of hospital reform—involving the present extensive additions to the County Hospital for the Treatment of Infectious Diseases—the present jury system, and the new Insane Asylum, now being erected (with a capacity for one thousand patients). All these measures originated with Mr. Mattocks, and potently attest the public services rendered by him while, for three years, a county commissioner. Mr. Mattocks is now solely engaged in the practice of his profession. His financial ability is indicated by the fact that he has accumulated a handsome property. He was married, March 15, 1868, to Sarah F. Harris, daughter of the late Jacob Harris, of Chicago. They have three children—John, Elizabeth and Esther.

JOSEPH W. MERRIAM, of the firm of Merriam & Whipple, was born in Coos County, N. H., June 14, 1828. After receiving an academic education, and reading law with Messrs. Burns & Fletcher, in Lancaster, for three years, he was admitted to the Bar in 1854, and started for Kansas, by way of Washington. This, however, is as far as he then got toward the West; for he received an appointment in the Post-office Department, which he held for about three years, returning to New Hampshire in 1857, and connecting himself with the New Hampshire Patriot, the leading paper of the State. He found his Washington experience and acquired knowledge of men and affairs of great value to him, and displayed rare talents as a political writer. In the fall of 1859, he was solicited by E. G. Eastman, a former friend and native of New Hampshire, then a resident of Nashville, Tenn., and principal editor and proprietor of the Union and American, the leading Democrat paper in Tennessee, to go with him to Nashville for the purpose of buying the interest of one of his partners; but the plan miscarried, and the young man at once connected himself, as one of its editors and proprietors, with the Memphis Avalanche. In 1860, however, on account of its secession proclivities, he severed his connection with this paper, and commenced the practice of his profession at Memphis, where he continued until in April, 1861, when, finding secession flags were too plentiful, he started for the North, embarking on board the very last steamer allowed to pass Columbus. Stopping at Grinnell, Iowa, for one year, he removed to Chicago in 1862, and formed a partnership with Solomon M. Willson, under the firm name of Willson & Merriam, afterward associating himself with Amos S. Alexander. The partnership of Merriam & Alexander continued fourteen years, after which, Mr. Merriam practiced alone until 1880, when he formed, with John H. Whipple, the present firm of Merriam & Whipple. Previous to 1880, Mr. Merriam's practice had been mainly general in its character, but, since that time, and especially within the past three years, he has made patent law the leading feature.

WIRT DEXTER was born in Dexter, Michigan, about 1833, and is a descendant of distinguished ancestry. His grandfather, Samuel Dexter, of Boston, Mass., was one of the greatest lawyers of his time, and was Secretary of the Treasury during the last year of the presidency of John Adams. Wirt Dexter's father, Samuel, was at one time territorial judge of Michigan, and a good lawyer, as was Samuel's brother, Franklin. Wirt Dexter commenced his education in the common schools of his vicinity, and attended, for some time, the Ann Arbor University, after which he became a student in an eastern college. From there, he returned to Michigan, and engaged in the lumber business in the northern part of the State, but, deciding that Chicago was a better arena for his abilities, he came to this city in 1865, and entered the office of Sedgwick & Walker, attorneys. He was admitted to the bar in 1866, and subsequently formed a partnership with Mr. Walker,<sup>26</sup> the firm name being Walker & Dexter. After Mr. Walker's death, he formed a partnership with Herrick & Allen, the firm name being Dexter, Herrick & Allen; which co-partnership has existed until the present time. After the death of Mr. Walker, Mr. Dexter became general solicitor of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, and he still retains that position. Coming into a large and lucrative practice early in his professional life, he had not time to devote to wide and general reading in the learning of his profession that less fortunate students often have, but his natural legal mind and fine reasoning powers easily made him the master of all the learning belonging to any special case. His mind belongs to the order of statesmen rather than of lawyers, which, with his superior business qualifications, renders his advice and assistance of great value in the wide-reaching and multiplex interests of great corporations. Mr. Dexter has been the president, for a number of years, of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society, and has given much of his time and assistance to it. He has never held political office, and, with Republican bias, has been independent in his political actions.

<sup>26</sup> See Railroad History.

HENRY SEYMOUR AUSTIN, son of Thaddeus R. and Bethia (Fairman) Austin, was born in Otsego, Otsego Co., N. Y., August 29, 1811. Henry received his preparatory education at Hamilton Academy, N. Y., and graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1831. He commenced the study of law in the office of James Clapp, of Oxford, and continued his studies with Charles P. Kirkland and Judge Bacon, of Utica. He was admitted to the Bar in New York, in July, 1834, and began the practice of his profession in Otsego County. In 1835, Mr. Austin located at Farmington, Ill., where he resided until the spring of 1837, when he was appointed agent of the Des Moines Land Company, which owned a large part of what was known as the half-breed lands, located in Southern Iowa, and including the site and grounds of old Fort Des Moines. Mr. Austin took his residence at the fort immediately after his appointment. In June, 1837, the United States troops left the fort, leaving him and his young wife the only whites remaining. He was custodian of the Government property and supplies for the Sac and Fox Indians after the garrison left, until the Indians were removed up the Des Moines River. As agent of the land company, he laid out the town of Montrose and the town of Keokuk, afterward being the first practicing attorney in Keokuk. As evincing the estimation in which he is still held, it may be stated that, at a very recent date, he received a memorial from the citizens of Keokuk, petitioning for a portrait of himself, to be placed in the city hall, and a biographical sketch of his life, to be preserved in his remembrance as father of the city, which he founded nearly half a century ago. In consequence of the declining health of his wife, he gave up his agency in 1839, and removed to Farmington, Fulton Co., Ill., where he resumed the practice of his profession. There he lived thirteen years, and gained a wide reputation as a successful and skillful lawyer. During this period, he was for several years a civil magistrate, and in 1846-47, represented the counties of Fulton and Peoria in the State Legislature. In 1852, he removed to Peoria, where he continued law practice fourteen years. In 1866, he came to Chicago, continuing his practice until 1870, at which time he was appointed justice of the peace for the town of West Chicago, being one of the first appointees under the new Constitution of that year. He served four years, but declined to petition for a re-appointment. He is an Odd Fellow and a Mason of high standing. He was representative in 1854-55, to the Grand Lodge of Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the United States; and, as a Mason, he held the office of Thrice Potent of the Lodge of Perfection, in the A. & A. S. R., from 1860 to 1875. He is now a member of Hesperia Lodge, No. 411. He is identified with the Episcopal Church, and for twenty years was a delegate to various Episcopal Conventions. He married, in May, 1837, Miss Mary Aiken, of Peoria, Ill., who died in 1839. In 1840, he married Miss Catharine J. Barnard, of Troy, N. Y. They have three sons and one daughter.

GEORGE W. STANFORD was born February 21, 1833, at Wheeler, Steuben County, N. Y., his father, Charles Stanford, being a farmer. When he had reached his majority, he left the old homestead, going to St. Paul, Minn., where, in 1854, he commenced the study of law. In 1855, he removed to Kenosha, Wis., continuing his studies in the office of Orson S. Head, until June, 1856, being then admitted to the Bar. After practicing alone for two years, he entered into partnership with Jasper D. Ward, since elected a member of Congress. When Mr. Ward removed to Colorado, in 1876, the partnership was, of course, dissolved. Mr. Stanford was, for years, closely and prominently identified with the park and boulevard system, being president of the West Chicago park commissioners from 1860 to 1877. During all of this period he was also their attorney. In 1857, Mr. Stanford was married to Martha P. Allen, of Herkimer County, N. Y. She died in 1869, and he was married to Lydia C. Avery.

JAMES H. WARD, a prominent lawyer of this city and representative in the XLVIII Congress from the Third Illinois district, was born in Chicago, November 30, 1853, at the paternal homestead, located at the corner of Halsted and Madison streets, which is now the site of Cole's Block. His father, Hugh Ward, an early settler and one of the largest builders and contractors in the city, died January 30, 1850; while his uncle, James Ward, was, for over twenty years, building and supply agent for the Board of Education. Young Ward was educated in the public schools of Chicago, and afterward pursued a classical course at the University of Notre Dame, graduating from the latter institution in 1873. Shortly thereafter, he went abroad, spending nearly a year in his travels through Europe. Returning, he entered the Union College of Law, in this city, and completed his course in June, 1876, being admitted to the Bar on the succeeding 4th of July. Mr. Ward has since enjoyed a lucrative practice, devoting himself mainly to probate and chancery matters. In April, 1879, he was elected supervisor and treasurer of the West Town of Chicago, his plurality being eighteen hundred and seventy-eight. He at once inaugurated a series of reforms in cutting down unnecessary expenses in the offices of the assessors and collectors. He took up $300,000 of the West Town bonds, which were bearing eight per cent. interest, and refunded them in five per cent. bonds, thus making an annual saving of $9,000. He was also the means of having a clause inserted in the bonds by which the town could redeem them at any time when there were sufficient funds in the treasury. In fact, his administration of the office was marked by such ability that he won from all, regardless of party, the warmest commendation. In 1884, he was earnestly solicited to become a candidate to represent his district (the Third Congressional) in Congress, and, accepting, was easily elected in the fall of that year, his plurality being four thousand eight hundred and ninety-four. At the State Convention of of his party, held in Peoria, in June, 1884, he was nominated as one of the Cleveland and Hendricks' electors. During the last session of the Illinois Legislature, he was the choice of many of the members for senator, and, although he persistently declined the honor, several votes were cast for him. It is a fact also worthy of mention, as illustrating more forcibly the high esteem in which he is held, that Mr. Ward has, in the offices he has filled, as well as in the honored position he still occupies, been elected from the district in which he was born and in which he has always lived. In January, 1885, he associated himself in the practice of law with Robert B. Kirkland, a gentleman who stands high in the legal profession, having formerly been district attorney of Jefferson County, Wisconsin. Mr. Ward married, October 25, 1877, Miss Agatha St. Clair, daughter of the late Alexander St. Clair, of Chicago, a prominent railroad man, connected, for many years, with the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company. They have one child—Hugh St. Clair Ward.

JAMES H. WARD.

L. C. PAINE FREER is one of the most venerable and highly respected members of the Chicago Bar. He was born in the town of North East, Dutchess Co., N. Y., a son of Elias and Mary (Paine) Freer. His father was a tanner and agriculturist, who settled in Will County, Illinois, in 1836, where he lived and died, non-ored and respected for his intelligence, upright dealing and philanthropic deeds. The history of the Freer family discloses that they were all people of the highest esteem in the community among whom they lived, and celebrated for their great moral worth. Mr. Freer is pre-eminently a self-made man; his early advantages were none too abundant, and his preliminary education was mostly obtained before he was fifteen years of age, in the schools such as the county afforded in those early days. He read law in the office of Henry Brown, an early Chicago lawyer, long since deceased, and was admitted to the Bar of Chicago in the spring of 1840. He took no part in politics, merely as a politician; but, in 1844, he espoused the cause of the abolition of slavery; and was a pioneer in the anti-slavery cause with Calvin DeWolf, Philo Carpenter and others, but he had no personal ends in view. He commenced practice, in 1840; and so honorable was he in all of his professional dealings, that he succeeded in obtaining a choice clientele, and his business, though not large, was very profitable. Being a man of excellent judgment and business capacity, his investments and management were of that order that they redound greatly to his honor and pecuniary advancement. He was appointed master in chancery by the late George Manierre, judge of the Circuit Court of Cook County, and an immense amount of business was transacted in that capacity by him; an extensive amount of land litigation came before him; and the great length of time in which he was retained in that position, and the universal satisfaction given by him in the discharge of these duties, indicate how ably he performed the requirements of his office. He continued the practice of the law up to 1880, when he retired. In 1882, he traveled over Europe. He now rests upon the laurels he has won, enjoys the fruits of a life of labor, and the veneration, respect and good will of all who have the honor of his acquaintance. He was married in December, 1835, to Miss Esther Marble, who died in 1879, and six of her children survive her. In 1880, he was married a second time, to Miss Antoinette Whitlock.

L. C. Fairer Freer

EDMUND JUSSÉN was born in Germany, in 1830, and received a classical education at the Jesuit College of Cologne, and, in 1847, emigrated to America. His first settlement was at Columbus, Wis., where he arrived totally ignorant of the English language, although conversant with the Latin, Greek, French and German. Working with his hands for his livelihood, but devoting every spare hour to study, he soon succeeded in mastering the language of his adopted country, and, in 1854, after a residence of seven years in Columbus, he commenced reading law in the office of Hon. William T. Butler, then judge of Jefferson County, Wis. In 1857, he was admitted to the Bar, and, returning to Columbus, commenced the practice of his chosen profession. Removing to Madison, Wis., in 1860, he became law partner of Hon. James Hopkins, subsequently United States district judge; and, in the fall of 1861, was elected to the Legislature from the Madison district—a decided compliment at that time, when the growing dimensions of the War made the coming session a most important one. In the spring of 1862, Mr. Jussen entered the army as major of the 23d Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. With his regiment he participated in Sherman's expedition against the northern defenses of Vicksburg; and at Chickasaw Bayou, in December, 1862, was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 23d. He also took part in the battle of Arkansas Post, in January, 1863, but was compelled to resign his commission because of physical disability. On March 23 of that year, Colonel William F. Vilas succeeded him. In 1864, Colonel Jussen settled in Chicago, and resumed the practice of law, since which time he has won a high reputation for his successful prosecution of prominent offenders against Government and against public and private rights. Among the notable suits in which he has been engaged are the so-called "whiskey-ring cases," the "German Savings and German National Bank of Chicago vs. Henry Greenebaum," etc. Colonel Jussen was collector of Internal Revenue for the Chicago District in 1869-71, during which time ineffectual attempts were made by members of the ring to connect him with the subsequent conspiracy. His firm resistance to such advances resulted in his removal from office, and left his record for integrity untarnished. Colonel Jussen was married, in 1856, to Antonie Schurz, sister of Hon. Carl Schurz. They have four children, of whom two are married—Nancy, wife of Francis Lackner, and Anna, wife of H. H. Anderson, both sons-in-law being lawyers.

KEPES KING was born in Ithaca, N. Y., December 24, 1822, his father, John King, being one of the first settlers of that part of the State, and his mother, Irene (Ely) King, daughter of a pioneer resident of Hector, N. Y. After studying medicine and graduating from the University of the City of New York, in the spring of 1847, he practiced that profession for a few years, but, finding that his tastes inclined him toward the law, he entered the office of F. O. Rogers, of Elmira, N. Y., and was admitted to the Bar in 1855. Removing, in 1855, to Prairie du Chien, Wis., he there remained until 1862, when he enlisted in the 31st Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. Early in 1864, he was appointed by President Lincoln commissary of subsistence, with the rank of captain, and assigned to duty at Stephenson, Ala., where he remained from May 1 until February, 1865. He was commissary for the army in the field from Knoxville to Greenville, Tenn., where Joe Johnston's army surrendered; keeping also a depot of army supplies at Knoxville, through the fall of 1865, and then returning to Chattanooga. Captain King was mustered out of the service and arrived home in February, 1866. It is an unusual statement to make—as unusual as it is true and flattering to his ability and probity—that during his long term of service as commissary, he never had an account disputed. After paying his parents a short visit, he removed to Chicago, where he has since resided, with the exception of about a year, which he spent in Beloit, erecting a block of stores. In the fall of 1868, he formed a partnership with Allan C. Story, which continued for five years. Since 1873, he has been alone. He has been admitted to practice before the Bar of the United States Supreme Court. Mr. King has been twice married; the first time to Catherine Gardiner, daughter of George Gardiner, of Chenung County, New York, who died in 1863. She left one son and two daughters, one daughter having since died. In 1871, he married Lillie Cogswell, daughter of W. A. Cogswell, of Halifax, Nova Scotia. In politics, Mr. King is a staunch Republican, and in religion he is an Episcopalian.

JOHN V. LEMOYNE was born in Washington County, Pennsylvania, November 17, 1828. His ancestors, both paternal and maternal, emigrated from France to America, at the time of the revolution of 1792-93. They first came to Ohio where they founded the town of Gallipolis. His paternal grandfather, who was a physician, moved to Washington County, Pennsylvania. There, his father, F. Julius LeMoynes, was born; he was educated as a physician, and graduated at the University of Philadelphia. He married a daughter of Colonel L. P. R. Bureau, of Gallipolis, Ohio, an old friend; they had eight children, one of whom is a physician in Pittsburgh, Penn. Dr. LeMoynes was a leader in the early anti-slavery movement, and was vice-presidential candidate on the Abolition ticket, with James G. Birney, in 1844. After the War, he endowed the LeMoynes Normal Institute at Memphis for educating the colored people, which is still in successful operation, and also a professorship in Washington College, and was widely known as an advocate of cremation and the builder of the first crematory in the United States. He is now deceased. John V. LeMoynes entered Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1842, graduating in the class of 1851, of which Hon. James G. Blaine was also a member. He studied law at Pittsburgh, and was admitted to the Bar in February, 1852. Soon after his admission he came to Chicago, where he has since been engaged in successful practice. Mr. LeMoynes is, in political faith, a Democrat. In 1872 (the Greeley campaign), he received the unanimous nomination of the Independents for member of Congress for the Third Congressional District of Illinois. His opponent was Hon. Charles B. Farwell. He shared the general defeat, although leading his ticket in the canvass. In 1874, he was re-nominated for the same position, as was his successful opponent of two years before. At this election, his previous adverse majority of three thousand seven hundred and forty was, in the official count, as declared, reduced to one hundred and eighty-six. In the election contest with Mr. Farwell for the seat in Congress, Mr. LeMoynes was declared elected by a majority of one hundred and six votes. Mr. LeMoynes has a great fondness for music, and has been identified with its advancement to the high standard it has attained in Chicago. He was one of the founders of the old Philharmonic Society and other musical associations. He was also president of the National Sportsmen's Association. He married, in 1853, Miss Julia Murray, a niece of Judge William Wilkins, who was United States senator in 1831, minister to Russia during President Jackson's administration, and secretary of war under President Polk. Mr. LeMoynes has eight children. He and his family are influential members of the Episcopal Church.

DAVID QUIGG, senior member of the leading law firm of Quigg & Tuthill, was born in Litchfield, N. H., December 17, 1834. He was prepared for Dartmouth College at the Gilmanston Academy, and entered the former institution in 1851. Graduating, after taking the full course, he removed to Bloomington, Ill., in 1855, and studied law with Sweet & Orme, of that city. For four years previous to the opening of the War he successfully practiced his profession. During the early part of the War he entered the army, and, until the summer of 1862, served as second lieutenant of his command; in February, 1863, he was promoted major of the 14th Illinois Cavalry, and in May, 1865, became lieutenant-colonel. His principal service was with the Army of the Tennes-sec. In August, 1864, he was taken prisoner, during one of Stone-man's raids upon Athens, Ga., and remained in the prisons of Charleston, S. C., and Columbia, S. C., until exchanged in March, 1865. Colonel Quigg was mustered out of service in July, 1865, and at once entered the law office of Higgins & Sweet, becoming, during the next year, a third member of the firm. The partnership continued until 1873, when Judge Higgins retired and the firm was thus dissolved. Colonel Quigg then associated himself with Cyrus Bentley, the connection continuing until 1877. In 1878, Colonel Richard S. Tutill became a member of the present firm. On April 7, 1865, Mr. Quigg was married to Miss Francena Pike, of Bloomington, Ill. They have one child, a daughter.

WILLIAM M. JOHNSTON, member of the firm of Snowhook, Johnston & Gray, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, February 10, 1839. His parents removed to St. Charles, Kane Co., Ill., in 1845. His father was a prosperous farmer and a large contractor for public works, being at one time engaged in the construction of a section of the old Galena & Chicago Union Railroad. William was educated in Kane County, and worked upon his father's land until the War broke out, when he became at once active in the raising of volunteers, and was the organizer of a portion of a company which afterward formed Waterhouse's battery. Before the battery had been equipped, however, he was taken ill with malarial fever, and did not enter the service. In the fall of 1863, he commenced a regular course of law in the University of Michigan, having previously studied with Judge Botsford, of Elgin, Ill. He graduated in the class of 1865, was admitted to the Bar, in the summer removed to Chicago, and practiced his profession alone until after the fire of 1871. During that year he joined Colonel W. B. Snowhook, Patrick W. Snowhook and George W. Gray, under the firm name of Snowhook, Johnston & Gray and has continued in this connection since. His practice has been largely confined to the trial of cases, and he is consequently among the best known lawyers in the city, having probably had charge of as many suits as any one of his length of practice in Chicago. One of the most celebrated cases in which he has been engaged was that of Fox vs. Long, involving the mental capacity of one Patrick Egan, a well known property owner. Mr. Johnston, in connection with his firm, has established a large general law business. He is noted for his ability in the trial and management of cases, and he brings to the conduct of his business a comprehensive knowledge of the law and a wide practical experience. Mr. Johnston was married in 1870, to Miss Lizzie Sanders, a native of Otsego County, N. Y., having been born at Plainfield Centre, the youngest child of Spicer and Harriet (Dwight) Sanders. They have four children, three sons and one daughter—William Sanders, John Andrews, Frederick Dwight and Helen.

MASON B. LOOMIS, ex-judge of Cook County, and one of the most substantial practitioners at the Bar, was born at Harrisville Township, Medina Co., Ohio, on April 14, 1838. In 1854, both his parents died. During the next year he entered Oberlin College, in which institution he took a partial course. He came West for a brief season, in 1857, but returned to Ohio, and, in April, 1859, married Miss Mary E. Ainsworth. At about the same time, he commenced to read law in Wooster, Ohio, and, in the spring of 1861, was admitted to the Bar in Medina County. In September of that year, he commenced the practice of his profession in Kankakee, Ill., and there continued until June, 1870, when he removed to Chicago. In the fall of 1868, he had been elected State's attorney of what was the twentieth judicial circuit, his term of office being four years; but discovering a more promising field for the exercise of his abilities, he resigned, and came to this city, as stated, in 1870. He at once became a member of the law firm of Kunyan, Avery, Loomis & Comstock, which connection continued until January, 1874, when he formed a partnership with Charles H. Wood, late judge of the former twentieth judicial circuit. Upon his election as judge of Cook County, in the fall of 1877, the law partnership was dissolved. By an amendment to the State Constitution the four years' term to which Judge Loomis had been elected was extended one year, so that he continued to occupy his seat upon the Bench until December 1, 1882. He then resumed private practice, after being associated for about a year with Charles W. Needham.

COLONEL ROBERT RAE is an accomplished gentleman, who is not only a lawyer of broad comprehensive views and learned in his profession, but a versatile genius with excellent literary talents. He ranks high as a lawyer; and, as a citizen, he is universally esteemed. He was born in Philadelphia, on October 3, 1830, and prepared for college at the academy of David Stroud, Westchester, Penn. He commenced the study of Latin at eight, Greek at eleven, and at eighteen years of age was an accomplished Greek and Latin scholar, entering Lafayette College in 1844. He was a volunteer in the Mexican War, and served as lieutenant in a Washington regiment from the time General Scott took command until the close of that contest. He was a brave soldier, and always prompt in the performance of every duty. He read law in the office of Hon. John Cadwallader in Philadelphia, and was admitted to the Bar in 1851. He commenced practice in that city, continuing two years, and then removed to Erie, Penn., where, in addition to his law business, he was editor of the Erie Chronicle, in the interest of the Sunbury & Erie Railroad. He removed to Chicago in 1855, and resumed practice, giving special attention to insurance and admiralty practice. He successfully prosecuted the case of Walker against the Western Transportation Company; a leading case reported in the 5th Wallace, involving the right of Congress to limit the liability of ship owners. In the case reported by Wallace, of Aldrich vs. the Etna Insurance Company, the decision, based on his argument, established the doctrine of the exclusive right of Congress to legislate over the paper titles to vessels engaged in inter-State commerce. This case was taken from the New York Court of Appeals, where the right had been denied, and Mr. Rae succeeded in having the decision of the New York Court reversed, establishing the present rule governing all similar cases. He was also counselor for the Galena Packet Company against the Rock Island Bridge Company. It was owing to his efforts that the United States courts abolished the twelfth rule in admiralty, that denied the jurisdiction in rem of the Admiralty Court in cases of supplies furnished domestic vessels; which overruled a series of decisions from the time of the decision of the case of the "Gen. Smith" until this change in the rule. At the October term of 1884, of the United States Superior Court, he won the case of Slanson vs. the barque "Elizabeth Jones," the Court adopting his printed argument as the opinion of the Court. This was a compliment never before paid by that Court to a practitioner. He also took part in the argument before the same Court in the case of Boyer et al., at the same term. The decision of this case extended the admiralty jurisdiction over canals and artificial waters in the several States of the Union. He organized the Chamber of Commerce for Chicago, obtained its charter from the State, acted as its secretary one year without remuneration, and took an active part in the purchase of the land and the erection of its buildings. He entered the army as colonel at the opening of the War, was in command of the Douglas Brigade in Chicago, and of Camp Douglas until 1863, when he resigned. In October, 1873, he called a meeting to deliberate upon building a new rail route from Chicago to Charlestown; over three hundred delegates attended, and the result of their deliberations was the organization of the Chicago & South Atlantic Railroad Company, of which Mr. Rae was vice-president. Mr. Rae was burned out in the fire of 1871, losing heavily, including a large and valuable library. He went to London, in 1882, and argued a case before a Commission of Arbitration, involving one hundred thousand pounds sterling and interest. He appeared in the interest of the American Board of Underwriters. He won his case, and received high encomiums for his effort. Mr. Rae is a literary man of considerable note; he has been a correspondent to some of the leading periodicals and magazines in this country; and, among his other writings, we find a play written by him, in 1877, called "Newport," in six acts; it is more of an idyl than an acting play, and has received high compliments from dramatic critics for its pure English. Mr. Rae is considered the leading maritime lawyer in Chicago, and his practice in the United States Supreme Court exceeds that of any lawyer in the Northwest. He was married in 1850, to Miss Sarah Moulson, of Philadelphia; she died in 1852. He married the second time in the year 1857, Harriet Cockburn Percy, of Northumberland, England, by whom he had five children:—Robert, Mortimer Percy, Arthur Atheling, Walter Raleigh, Clarence and Sallie Jane.

WILLIAM L. MITCHELL, admiralty lawyer, was born in Monroe County, New York, his parents removing to Janesville, Wis., when he was quite young. His father, John Mitchell, M.P., afterward known as the "War Mayor," was a man of decided ability; he was for some time proprietor and editor of the Democratic Standard, and has contributed much poetry to the current literature of the day; his death occurred at his home in Janesville, May 23, 1885. William L. Mitchell also has obtained a decided reputation as a writer of polish and originality, both in prose and poetry. His temperance lecture, "Chicago by Gaslight," was well received. He is the author of a play entitled "Conscript"; also of "Humors of the Times," a satire upon the election contest of 1876-77. Since 1866, he has been engaged in the practice of admiralty law in Chicago. The fire of 1871 burned him out, and seriously crippled him financially. Mr. Mitchell was admitted to the Janesville Bar, and when the War broke out was one of the most vigorous War Democrats of that part of the State, being secretary of the only Democratic war convention ever held in that city, and was also an active worker, both as a speaker and in the urging of enlistments. While a resident of that city he came within a few votes of being nominated for the mayoralty, and was one of the most popular men in Janesville. Since practicing in Chicago he has been engaged in several noted admiralty cases. His argument in the "Kate Hinchman" case (United States District Court), being a review of Justice Bradley's opinion in the case of the "Lottawana" in the United States Supreme Court, is quite celebrated. In the matter of Graham vs. the propeller "Favorite," being a suit for damages brought by the father of a child who was drowned in a collision, his schooner being run down by the former craft, the argument attracted much attention, both from the clearness with which the principles of law were stated and from the pathos of the peroration. After instancing the fact that the parents of a child obtained five thousand dollars for its loss in the Ashabula disaster, he concluded as follows: "The parents of that child recovered five thousand dollars for its loss. Do you think it paid them? What will you say the child is worth, or, in the language of the law, What damages are we entitled to? The sworn libel alleges the damages to be five thousand dollars. The only proof is that of the father, who swears that no sum of money could compensate him for the loss of the child. This is but human. This is the love of the father, which outweighs all the gold of the Indies. Justice is represented blind, with no feeling, no sentiment, no love. But in her courts the pendulum of time is ever swinging—the arrow of judgment is ever pointing—and the thunderbolts of justice are ever striking. What is the child worth? The poet, standing by the shores of old ocean, and looking down into its depths, where lie dead men's bones and the treasures and the wrecks of a world gone by, says:

"Keep thy red gold, thou stormy grave, Give back the true—give back the brave."

"The father, standing by the shore of the great lake, and looking out upon its dark waters, says:

"Keep thy red gold, thou stormy sea, Give back—give back my boy to me."

AREA N. WATERMAN, of the law firm of Boutell, Waterman & Boutell, was born in Greensboro', Orleans Co., Vt., February 5, 1836, the son of Loring F. Waterman, who was a prominent business man and mill-owner of that place, and of Mary (Stevens) Waterman. He received his academic education at Johnson, Montpelier, Georgia, and at Norwich military school. After teaching one year at the Georgia Academy, he studied law at Montpelier and in the Albany (N. Y.) Law School, being admitted to practice in the spring of 1861. Coming West, he at once opened an office in Joliet, Ill., but, in 1862, enlisted as a private in the tenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. In the Army of the Cumberland he followed the fortunes of his regiment at Chickamauga, Resaca, Dalton, and Allatoona. At Chickamauga, Mr. Waterman had his horse shot from under him, and was afterward shot through the right arm and side. He was mustered out of service as lieutenant-colonel, in August, 1864, and then opened a law office in Chicago. He has been engaged in a number of most important litigations, having charge of the cases brought by the assignee of the Great Western Insurance Company against the stockholders, in which the liability of owners of unpaid stock, notwithstanding agreements had been made with those who took the stock that they should never be called upon to pay anything more, was settled by the Supreme Court in the cases of Upton vs. Carver, Dobbins, Webster and Pullman. Mr. Waterman also has been much engaged in the settlement of cases relating to mechanics' liens, as in the matter of Crowle vs. Nagle and Batchen vs. McCord. His chancery practice is very extensive, some of his most noteworthy cases being litigations growing out of the settlement of the estate of Rogers, Peck, Gilmartin and others, the cases of Minor vs. Jackson, Bissell vs. Cary, Wells vs. Miller, Allen vs. Hawley, Paxton vs. Marshall, and many others. Aside from his success in his professional life, Mr. Waterman established a reputation as a polished writer. He was one of the founders of the Chicago Philosophical Society, before which he has read many papers which have met with a very favorable reception, such as "Codification of the Law," "Amendment to the Law," "Liberty and Government," "Origin and History of the Art of Writing," "Charles the First," and a series of lectures on the "Geological History of the Earth." He is president of the Irving Literary Society, before which he delivered a lecture on "Public and Private Opinion as Modified by the War." As a member of the Loyal Legion, his paper on "Chickamauga" met with an enthusiastic reception. In 1873-74 Mr. Waterman was alderman of the Eleventh Ward, which is the only political office he has ever held, his professional, social and literary duties and pleasures giving him little time for other labors. He was married, in 1862, to Ella Louise, daughter of Samuel Hall, formerly a merchant of Brooklyn.

MARTIN BEEM was born near Pittsburgh, Penn., November 14, 1843. His parents, Andrew and Margaret (Hope) Beem, were German, immigrating to America at an early day, and settling in that state, where they were married. Soon after the birth of their son they removed to Alton, Ill. There he received his early education. When the War broke out, although he was then but eighteen years of age, he was determined to enter the service. He was slender and remarkably youthful in appearance even for one of his years, and was therefore rejected as an Illinois volunteer. But not to be thwarted in his purpose, he went to St. Louis, and enlisted in the 4th Missouri Infantry, then organizing under General Lyon. In two days after his enlistment, he participated in the capture of Camp Jackson. His term of three months' service having expired, he enlisted for three years in the 12th Missouri, under command of Colonel C. J. Wright. With this command he participated in the battles of Fort Henry, Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Iuka, Vicksburg, and other battles of the West. In Shiloh, he won distinction by saving a flag from the enemy by wrapping it around his body. The flag now hangs in the trophy-room at West Point, with the history of its preservation printed upon it. At the same battle, when the center of the line had yielded, and there was a momentary danger of a disgraceful retreat, he seized a battle-flag which had just been shot down, and, in a moment of thrilling danger, advanced toward the enemy's lines, and by his heroic example inspired the men, who rallied around him and drove back the enemy. For this gallant conduct he received official mention, and was promoted on the field to the second lieutenancy, receiving, moreover, the thanks and congratulations of Generals Sherman, Worthington, and others. At Corinth, he rose from a sick bed, where he had lain since the battle of Iuka, a fortnight before, had himself lifted into the saddle, his feet lashed around his horse, and in this way fought through the two days' battle. For this he was soon after promoted to be first lieutenant, and after the War was breveted captain by the President, for "gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Shiloh." At the conclusion of the War his health was greatly impaired; exposure, privations and wounds had, in fact, almost shattered his constitution. He therefore traveled quite extensively, visiting the West Indies, Central America, Mexico, California, Oregon and Montana. He spent most of his time in the latter territory, and, while a resident of Virginia City, was placed in command of the volunteer troops called out to defend the frontier against the Indians. There he was given the title of major-general. While in the army he commenced the study of the law, and in 1867 was admitted to the Montana Bar, and began to practice. After recovering his health, he accepted a position as a reporter and correspondent at Washington, and then pursued the study of the law at Columbia University. During 1869, he entered the Union College of Law, Chicago, and was graduated therefrom during 1876, with the degree of LL.B. He then opened an office in Chicago, and has been in successful practice up to the present time. From 1870 until the great fire, General Beem practiced alone. He then formed a partnership with Judge R. H. Forrester, the latter remaining in fact eight years. After 1879, he has had no partner. Since he has resided in Chicago, he has been brought before the public in various prominent capacities. He was the first president of the Chicago Union Veteran Club, the largest organization of ex-soldiers and sailors in the United States, and filled that office three terms. During the great riots of 1877, he was made commander of the veterans by the different company commanders, for his tireless energy and devotion in that emergency, as well as for his character as a citizen and soldier. General Beem is a member of Post 28, G. A. R., also of Apollo Lodge, No. 642, A. F. & A. M. In 1878, he was prevailed upon to change his determination not to hold office and to allow his name to be used as a candidate for Congress from the Second District, and, although he made no personal canvass, came within two votes of receiving the nomination. In October, 1880, General Beem was married to Miss Lula Stoughton Case, daughter of DeWitt C. Case, of Neenah, Wis.

ABIAL R. ABBOTT, the senior member of the firm of Abbott, Oliver & Showalter, was born in Cobleskill, Schoharie Co., N. Y., in 1833. After studying law in the office of Daniel S. Dickinson, he was admitted to the Bar of Elmira in 1855, coming to Chicago in July of the next year. At first Mr. Abbott practiced alone, but subsequently formed a partnership with O. R. W. Lull, which continued until the breaking out of the War. He then joined the Chicago batteries, being attached to "A" and "E" in the latter of which he served as first lieutenant. Mr. Abbott was with the Army of the Tennessee, being severely wounded in the shoulder in the battle of Shiloh. After the War he resumed practice in Chicago, and was alone until after the great fire, when he formed a partnership with John M. Oliver, under the firm name of Abbott & Oliver. In 1882, John W. Showalter was admitted to the firm. Mr. Abbott was married, in 1871, to Miss Alice Asbury, of Quincy, Ill. They have two children, both daughters.

WADE ABBOTT was born in Windsor, Berkshire Co., Mass., November 24, 1834, his grandfather serving in the Revolutionary War, his father, Samuel, in the War of 1812, and Mr. Abbott himself in the Civil War. Mr. Abbott was educated in the common schools and the high school at North Hampton, Mass., settling in the town of Jefferson, Ill., in 1855. He lived in that town until the breaking out of the War, when he enlisted in Co. "I," 1st Illinois Cavalry, an organization raised in Champaign County, serving three years and three months under General Grant, at Paducah, Columbus, Fort Henry, Fort Donelson and Vicksburg, and with General Banks in the Red River Expedition. Soon after being mustered-out of the service, Mr. Abbott connected himself with the business department of the Evening Post, and remained with that establishment twelve years, under six changes of administration. He studied law for several years prior to the time he severed his connection with the Evening Post, and was admitted to the Bar in 1868, practicing, principally, as a commercial lawyer. Mr. Abbott is quite active as a member of social and benevolent societies, being connected with the A. F. & A. M., K. of P., I. O. O. F., and several temperance organizations. He was married in November, 1857, to Cornelia C. Scott, daughter of Ira Scott, who died in 1885, and who, for more than twelve years, was identified with the American Tract and Bible Society.

HON. E. A. OTIS was born August 2, 1835, at Marengo, Calhoun Co., Mich., the son of Hon. Isaac and Caroline (Curtis) Otis. He was raised on a farm until nineteen years of age; received his education at Albion, Mich., and later at the Michigan University, and studied law at Kalamazoo, with Hon. Joseph Miller. After completing his legal course, he was admitted to the Bar and entered into the practice of the law at St. Paul, Minn., in company with his brother, Hon. George L. Otis, one of the leading lawyers of that State, and prospered there in his profession until the War of the Rebellion. He was commissioned lieutenant in the 2d Minnesota Infantry Volunteers, which he assisted in organizing, and joined the Army of the Cumberland in October, 1861. He was at once detailed on the staff of General R. W. Johnson, with whose command he served until after the battle of Shiloh, in which he participated. At the request of Brigadier-General Van Cleave, the old colonel of the 2d Minnesota, Mr. Otis was assigned to duty on his staff as assistant adjutant-general, in which capacity he served until the close of the War, through all of the campaigns of the Army of the Cumberland, participating in the battles of Shiloh, Murfreesboro', Perryville, and Chickamauga. In December, 1864, he retired from the army. In 1865, he opened a law office in Nashville, Tenn., taking an active part in the re-construction of that State. He was commissioned chancellor in the Nashville chancery district of Tennessee in 1868, being the youngest man, up to that time, who had ever held that office in that State. He filled the position, with great ability, about one year. On June 10, 1869, Judge Otis arrived in Chicago. Judge Otis assisted in organizing the Republican party in Tennessee and was one of the few northern men in the South, who came away retaining the friendship of the Confederate soldiers and late rebels. During his practice in Nashville, the constitutionality of the Tennessee franchise law, whereby Confederate soldiers were excluded from voting, was assailed, and he was employed by Governor Brownlow to defend it, which he did successfully in every instance where a decision was rendered. Judge Otis has a large amount of chancery practice, and does much business for National Banks in Chicago and in the East.

HENRY G. MILLER, one of the pioneer Chicago lawyers, was born in Westmoreland, N. Y., in 1824. His father Abner Miller, was descended from an old Puritan family, and one of the first residents of Oneida County, New York. In 1843, Henry graduated from Hamilton College, studied law with Judge Hunt of Utica, and in the spring of 1851 was admitted to the Bar. He removed to Chicago in June of that year, and entered into successive partnerships with Alexander Prentiss, Thomas Hoynes and Hiram L. Lewis, John Van Arman and Thomas Y. Frost. His present partnership with Messrs. Hiram L. Lewis and Charles R. Judson was formed in 1885. Mr. Miller was for some time attorney of the Chicago & Atlantic Railway Company. He married the daughter of Colonel Roswell B. Mason, formerly mayor of Chicago.

HON. HENRY WALLER was born on November 9, 1810, at Frankfort, Ky., the son of Henry S. and Catharine (Breckinridge) Waller. In 1820, he entered the United States Military Academy at West Point, from which he graduated, with high scholastic honors, in 1833. Resigning his position as lieutenant in the army, he began the study of the law, under the instruction of Hon. C. S. Moorehead, afterward Governor of Kentucky, and continued his studies at Transylvania University, Lexington, being admitted to the Bar in 1835. He commenced the practice of the law with Thomas V. Payne, at Maysville, Ky., their partnership continuing six years. He was chosen a representative of the Whig party in the State Legislature, retaining his seat during the years 1845-46-47, and serving on several important committees. He then withdrew from active politics, and has never been a candidate for a political position since 1847. In 1852, he associated himself in partnership with John G. Hickman, and, in the same year, he was unanimously elected president of the Maysville & Lexington Railroad Company. In 1855, he removed to Chicago, and established the law firm of Waller, Caulfield & Bradley, afterward Waller & Caulfield, which continued nine years. In 1864, he formed another partnership, under the firm name of Waller, Sterns & Copeland, which continued until the demise of Mr. Sterns, in 1867; since which time Mr. Waller has withdrawn from the active practice of the law. His constant application to his profession having impaired his health, he journeyed over Europe during a portion of the years 1860-70, partially regaining it. In July, 1876, he was appointed master in chancery by Judges Williams, Farwell, Rogers, Booth and McAllister, which office he still holds. His great experience as a lawyer, and his intimate acquaintance with adjudicated cases, render him particularly fit for the position; his decisions are universally approved by the best legal minds on the Bench, and he is deservedly popular in this position. Mr. Waller has a wide reputation as an orator, and his life, as a Christian, has always been beyond reproach. He was married, on May 3, 1837, to Miss Sarah B. Langhorne. They have nine children living, among whom are Rev. Maurice Waller, Henry, Jr., and Edward C., real estate agents, and J. Duke Waller, M.D.

LESTER LEGRAND BOND was born in Ravenna, Ohio, on October 27, 1820. He studied law in his native place, and in October, 1854, commenced his practice in Chicago, having been admitted to the Bar during the previous year. Mr. Bond's mind always showed a decided leaning towards mechanics and the applied sciences, which his friends and admirers were not slow to discover. After a hard and brave struggle to obtain a foothold in Chicago, in 1859, several parties induced him to take charge of their patent business, and from that period his success was assured. In 1864, he became a member of the law firm of West, Bond & Driscoll, but confined his efforts to his speciality. Mr. Driscoll withdrew during the following year, having been elected city attorney, and the partnership of West & Bond has continued in its career of success ever since, and in which Mr. Bond has attained an enviable reputation. He has also held several prominent political positions, having been alderman from the Eleventh Ward from 1863 to 1866, a member of the Legislature from 1867 to 1871, acting mayor of the city during the latter portion of 1873, a member of the Board of Education four years, and he has also represented the Second Congressional District as a presidential elector. He received his degree as Master Mason in September, 1856, the Chapter and Commandery degrees in 1873, the Council degrees in 1870, a part of the A. & A. S. R. degrees in 1866, the 32<sup>d</sup> in 1872, and is at present a member of Wm. B. Warren Lodge, Washington Chapter, Siloam Council, Chicago Commandery (of which he was E. C.), and Oriental Consistory. Mr. Bond was married, October 12, 1856, to Amie Scott Aspinwall, daughter of Rev. Nathaniel W. Aspinwall, of Peacham, Vt.

THOMAS B. BRYAN is a native of Virginia, and of his early life we have but little information. We find him associated in the practice of the law with Judge Hart in Cincinnati, under the firm name of Hart & Bryan, and later, in Chicago, he was the senior member of the firm of Bryan & Borden. His partner, John Borden, was for many years the ablest real-estate lawyer in Chicago, but, having acquired a handsome competence, he has retired from general practice. Mr. Bryan has founded many extensive public enterprises, which have been crowned with success. Upon the urgent request of the friends of law and order, he was appointed one of the United States Commissioners to govern the Capital of the Nation, following Governors Cook and Shepherd and joining Governor Denison, of Ohio. His administration was characterized by ability, honesty and prudence in the expenditure of money, and it was only by the force of his own will that he was allowed to retire from office. Mr. Bryan first became identified with this city over thirty years ago, and has ever since taken a deep interest in everything that related to its welfare. When the growth of the city was pressing the borders of the old cemetery, he bought land, founded the beautiful cemetery of Graceland, and for years was its owner and president. When the old Metropolitan Hall became inadequate to the wants of the city, Mr. Bryan built Bryan Hall, where the Grand Opera House now stands. This was the best and largest public hall in the city, for many years, in which first-class entertainments were given, and was where the great War meetings of Chicago were held. He was the president of the great Northwestern Sanitary Fair of 1865. The success of this great enterprise was largely due to his ability, the confidence the public had in his integrity, and his happy faculty of harmonizing the conflicting interests of the various officers and committees. The Soldiers' Home, in this city, was built under his direction, advancing money out of his own funds to aid it, and he was several years its president. He was the founder of the Fidelity Safe Depository, of this city, which passed through the great fire of 1871, with all the treasures in its vaults, saving millions of dollars to our citizens. From this brief resumé of what he has done, it is evident that it may justly be said that he is one of the most patriotic and public-spirited of our citizens.

E. F. COMSTOCK is the son of Theodore F. and Mary (Fitch) Comstock, and was born December 20, 1842, about seven miles north of Saratoga Springs, N. Y. He received a good academic education; after which, in October, 1864, he came to this city and entered the law office of Runyan & Avery. In June, 1867, he graduated from the law department of the University of Chicago, was admitted to practice in July of the same year, and formed a partnership with Messrs. Runyan & Avery. Subsequently, Mason B. Loomis was admitted to the firm, the name being then changed to that of Runyan, Avery, Loomis & Constock. After the retirement of Judge Loomis, in 1873, and Mr. Runyan, in 1876, the firm name was changed to that of Avery & Constock, which firm and business association continued until a dissolution of the partnership was made, in 1877. Since that time, Mr. Constock has practiced alone, and has maintained the reputation he has borne since his entry into the legal profession in this city. This reputation is that of a lawyer alike distinguished in the general practice of his profession, eminent as a trial jurist and an advocate before a jury, while thoroughly versed in the intricacies of real estate and chancery law and proceedings. He is a member of the Bar Association and of the Law Institute, and studiously avails himself of the advantages accessible through these institutions to enhance his forensic erudition. Although the suggestion has frequently been made to him, that he should enter the political arena, he would never sacrifice the time which he devotes to his profession to hold office; in fact, Mr. Constock may justly be described as a lawyer whose time, interest and attention is entirely absorbed by his legal practice, the studies incident thereto, and its utilization in the courts in behalf of his clients. Mr. Constock was married in September, 1872, to Miss Carrie F. Greenleaf, of Chicago. They have three children—Robert G., Bessie E. and Leland E.

WASHINGTON IRVING CULVER, the partner of E. B. McCagg, in the practice of law, was born July 19, 1844, in New Market, Rockingham Co., N. H., the son of Adna Bryant and Hannah H. (Sanborn) Culver. When Irving was eight years old, his father first came West on business connected with his railroad contracts, and the boy completed his education in the Tippecanoe Battle Ground Academy, near Lafayette, Ind. He did not finish his course; and after obtaining a little experience in teaching and rail-roading, entered the office of Scammon, McCagg & Fuller as a law student in January, 1862. During his four years' training in this office, he acquired those habits of care and thoroughness which have made him one of the safest of the attorneys and counselors in civil cases. He was admitted to practice before the State Supreme Court in April, 1866, and, in 1870, became the junior partner in the firm of McCagg, Fuller & Culver. The partnership continued until the death of Mr. Fuller, in 1873, when the firm of McCagg & Culver came into existence. Outside of his profession, Mr. Culver is best known as trustee of the Northwestern Aid Association, of which he is also the attorney, and as treasurer of the Illinois Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary. He is a prominent member and librarian of the Chicago Law Institute. He is connected with the Masonic fraternity as past master of Landmark Lodge, No. 422, A. F. & A. M., and as a member of Fairview Chapter, No. 161, R. A. M., and Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T. Mr. Culver was married February 24, 1869, to Sarah T. Barnes, daughter of Samuel Barnes, of Battle Ground, Ind.

PATRICK W. SNOWHOOK is the son of William B. Snowhook, one of the most active of Chicago's pioneers. The latter, after having been a successful business and public man until middle age, commenced the study of law, and, with the exception of his time of service in the Civil War, practiced up to the day of his death, in May, 1832. His son, Patrick, was born in Chicago, September 25, 1844, his place of birth being on Kinzie Street, near State. The boy was educated in the grammar and high schools of Chicago, graduating from the latter institution in 1864. For two years he was a deputy in the county clerk's office, under the administrations of L. P. Hilliard and Ed. S. Salomon, and, in 1866, entered Bryant & Stratton's business college, taking a course of about one year. In 1867, he graduated from the Union College of Law, being admitted to the Bar during that year. He at once formed a partnership with his father, who, in 1868, had associated George W. Gray with himself. William M. Johnston was subsequently admitted into the firm, which continues as Snowhook, Johnston & Gray. Mr. Snowhook is an expert in real estate law, his practice in the Probate and Chancery courts being large and remunerative. He was married, May 17, 1870, to F. E. Aurand, of Chicago, who died April 20, 1879, leaving three children. Mr. Snowhook was married a second time to Alice E. Gordon, in May, 1881, there being also three children by the second marriage.

WILLIAM VOCKE, one of the most prominent German-American lawyers in Chicago, is a native of Westphalia, where he was born April 1, 1829. His father, also William Vocke by name, was government secretary in the Prussian service, and, after his death, the son emigrated to America. Landing in New York in 1856, after a short business experience, he removed to Chicago in 1857. Here he held various positions until the breaking out of the Civil War in 1861, when he joined the three months' service, after which he enlisted as a private in the 24th Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He served with the Army of the Cumberland during most of its engagements, and was mustered out of service in August, 1864. His record, and that of his regiment, may be traced in the history of the "Hecker Jäger" organization, the pride of the Germans of Chicago and Illinois. Returning to this city, Captain Vocke became city editor of the Illinois Staats Zeitung, which position he held nine months. From April, 1865, to November, 1866, he was clerk of the Police Court. Meantime, he had commenced a course of study in the Union College of Law, and was admitted to the Bar in 1867. Entering into the practice of his profession, he also indulged in literary pursuits, which brought him a well-merited reputation. He contributed to both the German and the English press, and, in 1869, published a volume of translations from the poems of Julius Rodenberg. The book was received with the greatest favor, and was eulogized by the press, both American and European. In 1869, Mr. Vocke dropped literary pursuits and devoted himself exclusively to his profession. The result was, that he soon had built up a most lucrative practice, especially among his German clients. In the fall of 1870, he was elected to the Twenty-seventh General Assembly, and the life insurance bill which he introduced, was spoken of by the Chicago Tribune as "the soundest and most judicious measure ever proposed to a legislative body" concerning that subject. The fire of 1871 rendered it necessary to call an extra session of the Legislature, and Captain Vocke, as a leading member of the insurance committee, was instrumental in framing what is known as the "Burnt-record act." He continued in the practice of his profession alone until February, 1873, when he formed a partnership with Joseph B. Leake, which continued unbroken until the latter was appointed United States district attorney. Mr. Vocke was also a member of the Board of Education from 1877 to 1880. In addition to the regular labors of his profession, Mr. Vocke is attorney for the German consulate, and president of the German Society of Chicago for the aid of emigrants. He was married in 1867, to Elsie Wahl, and they have seven children, four daughters and three sons. The success of the great Martin Luther celebration, held in Chicago on November 9, 1883, is more due to Mr. Vocke than to anyone else. He met with opposition from the first, especially from the German Socialists. The movement originated with him as a member of the Mitra Lodge, No. 410, A. F. & A. M., which is entirely composed of Germans. Seventeen societies and lodges sent delegates to a preliminary gathering, which arranged for a general citizens' meeting. The committee, as finally appointed to arrange the celebration, consisted of William Vocke, Arthur Erbe, Ernst Ammond, Carl Sehner, Carl Winkler and Rudolph Anbach. Still, the German social organizations stood aloof. Notwithstanding this fact, on the evening of November 9, Central Music Hall was completely filled by Germans of all religious convictions, and by non-believers. The great assemblage was addressed by William Rapp and Dr. E. G. Hirsch, the celebration of the hero's birthday being pronounced one of the most complete successes of that kind ever witnessed in Chicago.

JACOB R. CUSTER, son of David Y. and Esther F. (Rambo) Custer, was born May 27, 1845, in Lawrenceville, Chester Co., Penn. He received his preparatory education at Washington Hall, Trappe, Penn., and entered as sophomore, in 1864, Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Penn., from which he graduated in August, 1867. He studied law in Philadelphia, graduated from Albany Law School in 1869, and was admitted to the Bar of New York. He commenced practice in Chicago in the fall of that year, continuing alone until June, 1879, at which time he formed a co-partnership with his present partner, Hon. William J. Campbell. On May 1, 1885, Ex-Governor John M. Hamilton, became a member of the firm. Mr. Custer was appointed master in chancery of the Superior Court in 1880, and has held that position up to the present time. He married, in December, 1871, Miss Ella A. White, of Chicago. They have one child living.

PAUL CORNELL was born August 5, 1822, in White Creek, Washington Co., N. Y., the son of Hiram K. and Eliza (Hopkins) Cornell. He received his early education in the public schools of Adams County, which he attended during the winter months, working, during the summer seasons, on the farms in the vicinity of his home. This preliminary education was supplemented by several terms in select schools, after which he taught school for a season, and began meantime his preliminary law studies. After the close of 1843, he devoted his entire time to the study of law. In May, 1847, he was admitted to the Bar, and immediately after started for Chicago, via Frink & Walker's stage line. At that time his capital consisted of a suit of clothes, a package of cards, on which was printed, "Paul Cornell, Attorney at Law, Chicago," and $1.50 in money. The cash was stolen from him while a temporary sojourner at the Lake House, where he put up on his arrival in Chicago. He first found employment in the law office of Wilson & Judd, John M. Wilson, the senior member of the firm.

being his old law instructor at Joliet. Subsequently he was employed by James H. Collins, as an assistant in trying cases, receiving for his services a moderate monthly stipend. He next entered the employ of Skinner (Hon. Mark) & Hoyne (Hon. Thomas) who, at the time of his engagement, were doing a very extensive collection business for Eastern firms. Subsequently, when Mr. Hoyne became probate judge, he appointed young Cornell his clerk, and he performed the clerical duties of the position at nights, while still doing his duty as outside collector for the firm during the daytime. Subsequently, the election of Mr. Skinner as judge of the Court of Common Pleas, dissolved the firm of Skinner & Hoyne, and Mr. Cornell started for himself, forming a co-partnership with Hon. William T. Barron. The new firm succeeded in retaining a large part of the collection business of the old firm. Through the energies of the partners, their business grew to be immense; frequently they had as high as two hundred cases on the docket at one time. In 1856, Mr. Barron was elected probate judge, and a change in the firm occurred. John A. Jameson (afterward judge of Superior Court) and Perkins Bass associated themselves with Mr. Cornell under the firm name of Cornell, Jameson & Bass. Subsequently, Mr. Bass (afterward U. S. district attorney) retired from the firm, and H. N. Hibbard took his place, the style of the firm being changed to Cornell, Jameson & Hibbard. As early as 1853, Mr. Cornell began to invest what money he had saved in real estate. His purchases were confined largely to the section lying south of the city. In 1852, he employed John Boyd to make a topographical survey of the region now embracing Hyde Park and vicinity, and, the result being favorable, he bought, in 1853, a tract of three hundred acres on the lake shore, and invested money in other tracts as far south as Fifty-ninth Street. In 1854, a collision occurred at what is now known as Grand Crossing, in which many lives were lost, and at that time it was decided that "all trains should come to a full stop before crossing the intersecting roads at that point." Mr. Cornell saw, in this decision, a possible village in the far future, and, on November 10, 1855, bought a section of land at that point, and subsequently added thereto, and named the region Cornell. Of his first-mentioned purchase, he sold sixty acres to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, a part of the consideration therefor being an obligation on the part of the railroad to run regular suburban trains to the embryo village of Hyde Park, which Mr. Cornell had platted on the remainder of his purchase. Mr. Cornell was the originator of that village. He owned the land on which it stands; he secured for it perpetual transportation facilities, built a large hotel there during 1857 (the Hyde Park Hotel, burned September 12, 1877), became a resident of the village in 1857, and was supervisor of the town from the time of its incorporation in 1861, until 1864, being re-elected every year. His property at Grand Crossing is the present site of the manufacturing town of that name. It was originally subdivided as "Cornell" in February, 1872 (when he built a large watch factory), and then the name was changed to Grand Crossing, by Mr. Cornell, in the succeeding March, it being found that there was already another town of the same name in Livingston County, Illinois. In 1866, Mr. Cornell had become one of the largest owners of suburban real estate in Chicago, and during that year, with others, inaugurated the present park and boulevard system of the city. He spent the entire winter of 1867 in Springfield, in the interest of the South Park bill, securing the passage against strenuous opposition. He was appointed by the governor one of the first commissioners, and held the office fourteen years, having been three times re-appointed. He married, in July, 1856, Miss Helen M. Gray, of Bowdoinham, Maine, the ceremony being performed at the residence of his brother-in-law, Orrington Lunt, of Chicago. Their children are—George, John, Paul, Jr., Lizzie and Helen.

WILLIAM FREDERICK DEWOLF was born on April 21, 1811, at Bristol, R. I., being the eldest son of Henry and Anne Eliza (Marston) DeWolf. He completed a course of study in Brown University, receiving the degree of Master of Arts in 1831, and then began the study of law in the office of Hon. Josiah Randall, the father of the well known Samuel J. Randall, ex-speaker of the House of Representatives. In 1834, he was admitted to the Bar, and became the partner of Mr. Burgess in the practice of his profession. On June 10, 1835, Mr. DeWolf was married, in Providence, R. I., to Miss Margaret Padelford Arnold, a daughter of George R. Arnold, a merchant of that city. In September, 1835, his Alma Mater conferred on him the degree of Bachelor of Laws. In the fall of 1836, he settled at Alton, Ill., where he entered on the practice of his profession in partnership with George T. M. Davis. He was elected to the Legislature in 1846. In September, 1847, he came to Chicago, and engaged, for a time, in the commission business, and, in 1851, became a member of the firm of J. B. F. Russell & Co., land agents. In those days, Mr. DeWolf, being an earnest Whig and a leader in the party, was frequently mentioned as a suitable person for the offices of lieutenant-governor and secretary of state. Being elected city treasurer in 1855, he relinquished his real estate business; but on his retirement from office he resumed it, as senior member of the firm of DeWolf, Maclay & Quimby. Later, he filled the office of justice of the peace for about four years, but since 1878 he has lived in retirement. On January 5, 1877, Mrs. DeWolf died. Of this lady, Hon. I. N. Arnold, in an eloquent tribute to her memory, affirmed, "It could be most emphatically said, 'none knew her but to love her, none named her but to praise.'" Of their eight children, only three survived her; Henry, now assistant treasurer of the Illinois Central; Edward P., a merchant of this city; and Cecelia, the widow of General Albert Erskine. In the summer of 1853, Mr. and Mrs. DeWolf, with their children, went to pay a visit to their relatives in Rhode Island. On their return, in September, four daughters, ranging from childhood to youth, were so severely injured by the explosion of the steam cylinder of the steamer "Bay State," that they all died within the month—an appalling calamity, which the bereaved parents bore with exemplary patience. The oldest son, William, who fell in the service of his country, is thus honorably referred to by his commander, now General Gibson U. S. A.: "In the battle of Williamsburg, one of my subalterns (a handsome, gallant boy, from Chicago, named DeWolf) was wounded, and, I regret to say, has since died. I was much attached to him, and if your friends know his family, assure them of my sincere sympathy with them in their bereavement, and my high appreciation of his coolness and gallantry in the midst of no ordinary danger. Poor fellow! He joined my battery on the 4th of April, was wounded on the 4th of May, and on the 4th of June was dead!" The Chicago Tribune, of June 5, 1862, contained an eloquent eulogy of the young hero, as well as the following appropriate official recognition of his services: "Deserved compliment.—We notice that, by order of Col. H. G. Gibson, commanding the defenses on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, the post at Shepherdsville has been named DeWolf, in honor of Lieutenant William DeWolf, of the 3d U. S. Artillery, who died in June, 1862, of wounds received at Williamsburg, Va. This is a deserved compliment to a gallant officer, son of our fellow-citizen, William F. DeWolf, Esq." Despite the severe shocks of these many sad bereavements, owing to a vigorous constitution and a well-spent life, Hon. William F. DeWolf is, both physically and mentally, remarkably well preserved, and is not alone beloved for his many virtues, but also for kindness of heart and his unostentatious charity and philanthropy.

THEODORE SCHINTZ, one of the most substantial and hard working lawyers in the profession, was born in Zurich, Switzerland, May 1, 1830. His father, Henry Schintz, was a lawyer of life-long practice in that city. Young Schintz was educated in the common schools and the polytechnic school of his native place, taking a full scientific course. He had, however, imbibed the prevailing belief in his native country, that the only truly noble pursuit is to endeavor to draw one's sustenance direct from the soil, whatever the education or leanings of the individual. With this idea, the young Swiss, well educated, ambitious and intellectually alert, came to America, during 1850, and went to work on a farm near Oconomowoc, Wis. He also labored as a common farm-hand in Green County, and afterward removed to New Ulm, a Swiss settlement in Winnebago County. There he farmed for several years, and at leisure hours industriously examined into the political institutions of his adopted country. He was chosen chairman of the town board of supervisors; taught school one year in the old log-school-house, and in 1854 located in Oshkosh, Wis., where he commenced the study of law. Admitted to the Bar in 1856, he soon acquired a good general practice. In 1862, Mr. Schintz located in Chicago, where he has since resided, honored by his professional brethren and by the people of the city, whom he has served in several important positions. From 1867 to 1872, he was an alderman, and in 1869, while John B. Rice, mayor of the city, was absent in Europe, he became the acting mayor of Chicago. In 1869, he was appointed a member of the Board of Education, serving two terms and resigning his position soon after the fire. He has since devoted himself exclusively to the practice of his profession, his business being principally in the Probate and Chancery courts. In September, 1851, Mr. Schintz married Barbara Zentler, also a native of Switzerland. They have one son, the elder child, and one daughter. Theodore H. Schintz was educated in the Chicago University, studied law with his father, and was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the State, at Mount Vernon. Josephine, the daughter, is a graduate of the Cook County Normal School.

AUGUSTUS VAN BUREN, associated with his father, Evert Van Buren, for over twenty-seven years in the practice of law, was born in Penn Yan, Yates Co., N. Y., in March, 1832. He was educated at Kinderhook, at the age of sixteen he entered his father's office at Penn Yan, and commenced the study of his profession, being admitted to the Bar at Rochester before he had attained his majority. Soon afterward, he went to California, and dug for gold, kept store, practiced law, and followed other occupations necessary to self-sustenance. His first case was the defense of an Indian for murder, whose cause he assumed upon the promise of $800 in gold, which his dusky chief agreed to pay over as soon as he could dig it up. Unfortunately, the Indian himself was killed, almost immediately after Mr. Van Buren secured his acquittal, before the treasure could be unearthed, and consequently Mr. Van Buren lost his fee. After an experience in California of more than one year, he returned to Penn Van, soon thereafter locating at St. Clair, Mich., and in 1858 settled in Chicago, where, with his father, he commenced the practice of law. In this city he has made his greatest reputation as a successful criminal lawyer, having, in all probability, had as many celebrated cases intrusted to his care as any other attorney in the State. He defended Joseph Crawford for the murder of William Shanley, and saved him from the gallows. He was also the leading attorney for the defendants in the case of Joseph St. Peter and Mrs. Annie Clarke, tried for the murder of Alvaro Clarke. Although John Van Arman assisted the State's attorney, both of Mr. Van Buren's clients were acquitted, and he obtained a great reputation for the skill shown in the conduct of the case. It must not be inferred, however, that the bulk of the firm's practice was of a criminal nature, but cases of that kind draw the attention of the public more generally than civil causes. Their practice was always general, but Mr. Van Buren's remarkable success as a criminal lawyer almost overshadowed his other practice.

THOMAS SHIRLEY was born October 22, 1827, in Charlotte County, Va., the son of Allan and Sarah (Anderson) Shirley. He received his preliminary education at a select and then in a classical school; after which he entered Washington College, Va., in 1840, from which he graduated with honor in the class of 1843, receiving the degree of A.B. In 1846, his Alma Mater conferred on him the degree of A.M. Mr. Shirley studied law in the University of Virginia, under the instruction of Professor Miner, graduating in 1848. Immediately after the completion of his law studies, he was admitted to the Virginia Bar, by virtue of his diploma, and, the following year, sought his fortune in the West, arriving in Chicago October 5, 1849. The young Virginian hired a small office over Tinkham & Co.'s bank, on Clark Street, put out his sign, and waited for his first client. He heard him approach, as he climbed the stairs, with a noise proportionate to the size of his feet. He proved to be a stalwart negro, who, having been arrested on the charge of stealing a pair of boots, was in search of a legal defender. Although the young lawyer did not expect to meet such a client, yet he gladly defended the negro and gained his acquittal, receiving his first fee, amounting to seven dollars. From this unique beginning Mr. Shirley's practice rapidly increased. During the earlier years of his practice, he incurred, at one period, much popular displeasure, having, in 1852, in his professional capacity, conducted the prosecution of a case under the fugitive-slave law of the United States. The ephemeral reproach of those exciting times was long since buried in oblivion with the institution which occasioned it. In politics, Mr. Shirley has always been a Democrat, and is at present a member of the Iroquois Club, and one of the Democratic Central Committee of Cook County. He is a Freemason, and has served as Master of Oriental Lodge, No. 33; High Priest of Lafayette Chapter, No. 2; and Eminent Commander of Apollo Commandery, No. 1. He has also been Orator of the Grand Lodge, and Scribe of the Grand Chapter, of the State of Illinois. He has been president of the School Board of District No. 1, of Lake View, since that district was created. Mr. Shirley was married, in September, 1859, to Miss Carrie Rasbon, daughter of John Rasbon, formerly of Maine, and in the lumber trade there. They have seven children—four sons and three daughters.

JOHN M. ROUNTREE, son of Hon. John H. Rountree and Mary Grace (Mitchell) Rountree, was born February 13, 1836, at Platville, Grant Co., Wis. After acquiring a preliminary education in the common schools and the academy in his native town, John M., in 1853, entered Hamilton College, N. Y. Finishing a course of study at that institution, he entered the office of Hon. John N. Jewett (who married his sister), at Galena, Ill., with whom he completed his law studies, and was admitted to the Illinois Bar in 1856. He then went to Milwaukee, Wis., and commenced practice in the office of Hon. Henry L. Palmer, remaining until October, 1857, when he removed to Chicago, and, after practicing in the office of Scammon, McCagg & Fuller, until the spring of 1858, formed a partnership with Alexander C. Coventry, which continued until 1865. During this time, Mr. Rountree was retained in many important cases. In 1862, he conducted the defense in the case of "Kingsbury vs. Chicago & North-Western Railway Company," which settled the title to a large amount of property fronting on the North Branch of the Chicago River, including the site of the North-Western depot. The suit was decided in favor of the railroad company. He also, in 1865, conducted to a successful issue, for his clients, the "Clinton Bridge Case," a suit growing out of efforts of steamboatmen to remove the bridge across the Missisissippi River at Clinton, Iowa, which they claimed impeded navigation. Mr. Rountree was president of the Chicago Law Institute in 1864-65, and continued a laborious and increasing practice until 1867, when his health became so seriously undermined that he was compelled to suspend his professional labors entirely, and travel for rest and recuperation. On the re-establishment of his health he returned to Chicago, and resumed his practice. In 1872, he was elected to the State Legislature, and during the session was appointed one of a joint committee of five for the revision of the Statutes of Illinois, a work completed during his term. In the fall of 1873, he was elected attorney for Cook County for a term of four years. At the expiration of his official term, he again resumed practice, devoting himself more especially to corporation law, his clientele among large corporations, railroads, banks, etc., being important and influential. Mr. Rountree was married, in January, 1862, to Mary H. Bancroft, a lineal descendent of Samuel Huntington, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. In January, 1877, he married his present wife, Virginia, daughter of N. H. Wolfe, one of the most prosperous shipping merchants of New York City. He has one daughter living.

JOHN A. J. KENDIG was born December 14, 1834, at Bloomsburgh, Penn. In 1709, Martin Kendig, a Mennonite bishop, led a colony of three hundred of his countrymen to Lancaster County, in that State, where he purchased two thousand acres of land for himself. He was the means of establishing a flourishing settlement, which, by 1799, had grown to such importance that it became the capital of the State. This was the first Mennonite colony in America; and from the Kendigs, who were a part of it, have come five or six thousand descendants, now scattered throughout the country, many of whom have followed the bishop's example and become clergymen of note. What is quite singular, also, is the fact that, so far as is known, no Kendig has ever entered politics or held an office under the Government. Mr. Kendig's maternal grandfather was Colonel John Wertman, a cavalry officer in the War of 1812. Mr. Kendig mastered the common branches of education, and commenced to teach at a very early age. He entered Kenyon College in the senior class of 1859, was soon appointed superintendent of the college buildings, and as a member of President Andrews's family, met many of the ablest men of the country, including Salmon P. Chase. During that year he commenced the study of law under Dr. Francis Wharton, the well-known author, and then a member of the college faculty; came to Chicago, continued his studies with Jesse B. Thomas, and was admitted to the Bar in 1861. In the autumn of that year he was married to Abby E. Gates, sister of the widow of President Andrews, and daughter of the late Simon S. Gates. About this time, he received from his Alma Mater the degree of Master of Arts. In the spring of 1853, was elected president of the Kenyon College Alumni Association, and in June, 1855, was chosen vice-president of the association and trustee of the college. Since coming to Chicago, Mr. Kendig has been prominent in several fields of labor outside of his profession. For three years he was superintendent of a Sunday-school, and has been a delegate to various diocesan conventions. In the celebrated Cheney case, he prevented a conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities by an eloquent speech. Through the influence of Professor Joseph Haven, his intimate friend, he joined the English literature class, and after the death of that gentleman was chosen its leader, being re-elected to that position for seven years thereafter. In this connection, he wrote a pamphlet entitled "Intellect or Character," which was published by a resolution of the class, and attracted much attention. He has also delivered several lectures on literary and philological subjects, which have been most favorably commented upon by the daily press. In June, 1878, in company with his wife, Mr. Kendig took a tour around the world, and enriched current literature by many productions of his pen.

D. HARRY HAMMER was born in Springfield, Ill., December 23, 1830, the son of John and Eliza (Witner) Hammer. In 1842, his parents removed to Ogle County, where young Hammer subsequently attended the district schools of the neighborhood, worked on a farm and learned his trade as a harness-maker and saddler. At the age of seventeen, he entered the Rock River Seminary, Mount Morris, Ill., graduating, with honors, in 1863. He then entered the law department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor. Graduating in 1865, he looked around for a favorable location in which to commence practice. He decided, in the fall of that year, to locate in St. Louis; but the unsettled condition of the country, coupled with the incursions of the cholera, drove him, with thousands of others, from the city. In the meantime he had formed the acquaintance of a man ever ready to hold out a helping hand, thoroughly awake to the activities of the age and, therefore, a thorough admirer of Chicago. Benjamin F. Taylor, the eloquent war correspondent of the Chicago Evening Journal, and who has since gained a world-wide reputation, was then traveling through the West on a lecturing tour. The young man seeking a career and the one who had already made his mark met, and became friends at once, and it was through Mr. Taylor's representations that Judge Hammer came to Chicago, in October, 1866. Judge Hammer entered at once into the practice of his profession, and soon built up an enviable reputation for ability and probity, as well as being remarkably successful financially. In April, 1879, Governor Cullom appointed him a justice of the peace for the town of South Chicago. At the expiration of his term, in 1883, his course had given such general satisfaction that he was re-appointed by Governor Hamilton. From the first he has been an earnest Republican. He is an active member of many of the leading secret and benevolent societies of Chicago, having been connected with the Masonic fraternity since 1863. He is at present connected with S. H. Davis Lodge, No. 96, A. F. & A. M.; Chicago Chapter, No. 127, R. A. M.; Chevalier Bayard Commandery, No. 52, K. T.; Oriental Consistory, 32<sup>d</sup>, S. P. R. S.; Court Energy, No. 19, I. O. F.; and Delphus Lodge, No. 2507, K. of H. He is also a member of such leading political and social organizations as the Calumet, Union League and Indiana clubs. Mr. Hammer married Emma L. Carpenter, of Athens, Ohio. They have three children—Maud, Hazel Harry and Fay.

Engr. by Z. B. ... 1883

William H. King

JOHN CLARKE BARKER was born March 1, 1833, at Windsor, Kennebec Co., Me., the son of Oliver C. and Caroline L. Barker. In 1844, his parents located in Lee Center, Lee County, where a farm was purchased, and on which their son, John C., learned to be a good farmer, subsequently attending Rock River Seminary and Rockford Commercial College. He was a teacher in district, select and graded schools for a few years and obtained his education chiefly by his individual efforts and under many difficulties. His tastes inclined him to the profession of law or medicine. He read the different systems of medical science for a year, then read the elementary authors in law. After thorough reading, while a teacher, and subsequent practical experience in different law offices and a course of one year at the Chicago Law School, he passed a highly creditable examination before the State Board of Examination, in August, 1865, at Chicago, where he commenced practice. For eighteen years he successfully followed his calling in this city, building up a lucrative practice. By his straightforward and able course, he was recognized as a lawyer of established reputation, both as a special pleader and as an advocate before the court or jury, as well as a citizen of culture and high moral character. During the first six years of his residence here, he accumulated a fine library, which, with his home and all its effects, was swept away by the fire of 1871. There was no insurance on his property, and Mr. Barker was thus left penniless. He bravely commenced the battle of life again, and soon placed himself in comfortable circumstances. From the first he has been a prominent member of the Law Institute and Bar Association. Mr. Barker was a lieutenant in the military service in the last War. He represented North Chicago as a legislator in the Twenty-ninth General Assembly with credit to himself and his constituents. In the fall of 1882, when Mr. Barker's prospects looked the brightest, he was afflicted with a dangerous attack of sciatica, and, upon the advice of physicians, abandoned the active practice of his profession. In May, 1883, Governor Hamilton appointed him a justice of the peace for North Chicago, a position he still holds. Mr. Barker is a member of many secret and benevolent societies, being connected with Waubansia Lodge, No. 160, A. F. & A. M., of which he was master for two years; with Lincoln Park Lodge, No. 2620, K. of H., of which he is past dictator, and was a member of the last Grand Lodge and alternate representative to the Supreme Lodge. For many years he has been a leading official of the Methodist Church, being president of the Board of Trustees of the Grant-Place Methodist Episcopal Church. In October, 1869, he was married to Elizabeth E. Vaughn, of Chicago. They have two children—John V. and Sarah Louisa.

COLONEL HENRY FRANKLIN VALLETTE was born at the old Vallette homestead, in Stockbridge, Mass., on November 1, 1821, the son of Jeremiah and Abiah (Mott) Vallette. His father was a man of broad views and varied information, as is exhibited by the fact that Theodore Sedgwick, while preparing his work on political economy, frequently sought the opinions of Mr. Vallette, who was also a highly respected farmer. When Henry was seventeen years of age, he removed to Illinois with his father's family, and settled near the present town of Wheaton, in DuPage County. He attended the public schools and Stockbridge Academy before leaving his native State. The scholastic facilities of the West were limited at the time, but, by persistent effort on his own part and the aid of a private tutor, he mastered the English branches and the science of surveying. In 1848, he resumed his studies at Monnt Morris Academy, and that year he began the study of the law.

During that year he married Miss Abbie A. Dinsmore, a daughter of the eminent divine, Rev. Alvin Dinsmore, of DeWitt, Iowa. She has been a noble and devoted wife and mother; to them have been born four children. Mr. Vallette was elected treasurer of DuPage County, to which office he was re-elected four times. In 1851, he was admitted to the Bar, and has devoted his attention to the practice of his profession since that time, with the exception of the time spent in the army. He was in partnership with Judge H. H. Cody for seventeen years. In 1862, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 105th Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He was a brave officer, and was much loved by the men under his command. He resigned in 1864, and, in 1867, he resumed the practice of the law in Chicago, in company with General B. J. Sweet and Judge Isaac Wilson. Since the dissolution of this partnership, Colonel Vallette has continued in the practice of his profession, and has been very successful. In politics he is a Republican, but has never sought political preferment. In religion he is a Universalist, and has always given that denomination his hearty support.

GEORGE SCOVILLE, attorney-at-law, was born in the town of Pompey, Onondaga Co., N. Y., October 10, 1824. In early life, his parents removed to the woods of Ohio, where the rudiments of education were acquired by him in a log house by the light of a tallow dip. At the age of eighteen he commenced attending school, working his way as best he could. Entering Yale College, in 1846, on account of a stress of finances he was obliged to abandon his educational course at the end of the second term, and turned his attention to the study of law. After pursuing his studies in the office of Hammond, King & Barnes, at Albany, N. Y., he was admitted to the Bar in August, 1848. The succeeding three years he spent in traveling through the West, and in April, 1851, came to reside and practice in Chicago. Mr. Scoville formed a partnership with Grant Goodrich in 1852. The partnerships of Goodrich & Scoville, Goodrich, Scoville & Seelye (Henry E.), and Goodrich, Farwell (William W.) & Scoville, continued until 1857. In 1869, the firm of Scoville, Bailey & Brawley was formed, consisting of Mr. Scoville, J. M. Bailey and F. W. S. Brawley, which continued until the great fire. In 1872, the firm of Scoville, Corwin (John A.) & Bayley (Edward F.) was formed, and continued four years. Since then, Mr. Scoville has practiced alone, having been brought prominently before the country as the counsel of Giteau. He assumed the responsibilities and unpleasant notoriety of the defense, however, only at the request of Giteau, through Colonel Corkhill, and the earnest solicitation of his wife. His only ambition is to fill such a place in life as ability, honest labor and perseverance have fitted him for, and at his death to leave the world somewhat better for having lived in it.

GEORGE A. MEECH was born at Norwich, Conn., on January 19, 1824, receiving his preliminary education in the academy at that place, where he remained until twelve years of age. Next removing to New Haven, he graduated at Yale College, in the class of 1843, and then contented himself with teaching school for several years. He first taught at Bozrah, Conn., at a compensation of $12 a month and board. In 1844, he became principal of the Norwich Academy, where he had received his early schooling. In the fall of 1845, on account of ill health, he was obliged to resign his position and remove to the South, locating in Demopolis, Ala. In 1847, he repaired to Boston, to complete his law studies, which he had already commenced with Lafayette S. Foster and Frank Lyon. In Boston, he studied in the offices of Hubbard & Watts and of Robert Rantoul, whose reputation was of a national character. In the fall of 1848, he was admitted to practice law in Connecticut, and the next year received his appointment as justice of the peace. He gave such general satisfaction, that the citizens of the Norwich District, in 1853, elected him to the position of probate judge. On account of his wife's falling health, however, he was obliged to resign his place upon the Bench, and removed to the West. On reaching Chicago, he opened an office at No. 117 Lake Street, and soon formed a partnership with Joseph N. Barker, a lawyer of established reputation. In 1862, after continuing in private practice for about nine years, Judge Meech was elected city attorney, which position he held during the administration of Hon. Francis C. Sherman. He was chosen assessor of the South Town in 1864, continuing in the successful practice of the law until his selection, in the spring of 1875, as justice of the peace for the South Town. In the winter of 1879, and again in 1883, the judges of the courts of record unanimously re-nominated him to his former position, being recommended by the bankers, merchants, lawyers and business men of the city. Notwithstanding the manifold judicial duties which have fallen upon his shoulders for years, he has found time to retain the reputation which he earned during his younger days of being remarkably proficient in belles-lettres. During much of the period from 1847 to 1853, he was quite a constant contributor to the New York Tribune, and is now recognized as a fine Latin scholar. He is a Mason, and a life-member of Waubansia Lodge, Washington Chapter and Apollo Commandery. Judge Meech was married, in 1850, to Sarah H. Dorchester, daughter of Rev. Daniel Dorchester, of Norwich, Conn. His first wife died in February, 1859, and in October, 1860, he was united in marriage to Celia Addie Hunt, daughter of Hon. Milo Hunt, of Chenango County, New York, for many years State senator, and a man well known in that section of the State. His second wife dying in the fall of 1878, he was married, in October, 1880, to Florence W. Story, daughter of Captain William Story, of Norwich, Conn. Judge Meech has but one child—Harold Appleton.

JAMES ENNIS (deceased) was born on March 27, 1837, at Enniscorthy, County of Wexford, Ireland. His father was what was termed a gentleman farmer, and in such affluent circumstances as enabled him to bestow upon his children the advantages of a good education. His death occurred on March 27, 1882, it being the fiftieth birthday of the subject of this sketch; and, soon after, the remaining family, consisting of James, his mother and four sisters, emigrated to America, and settled in Lake County, Illinois, where his mother purchased a farm. In company with a farmer, who drove a loaded ox-team, he made his first trip to Chicago, on foot, on a bitterly cold day, in the winter of 1854. He first obtained employment as a clerk in a clothing store, but, shortly afterward, engaged as a clerk with Mr. DeWolf, and immediately entered upon his duties, and commenced the study of the law. He also applied himself to the study of German, which, in after years, resulted in a fluency of speech, rarely acquired in a foreign tongue.

He was admitted to the Bar January 11, 1856, being, at the time, not quite twenty-one years of age. He immediately commenced the practice of his profession, in which he rapidly achieved success. His unimpeachable integrity, combined with his acknowledged ability, brought him a lucrative practice, which constantly increased up to the time of his death—a period of nearly a quarter of a century. In 1871, he located a new office at No. 145 Madison Street, where he was scarcely established when everything was swept away by the great fire. He lost, in addition to his offices, his homestead, with all it contained, and his houses on the North Side. Out of his property, nothing was saved, except a horse and buggy, and a small house, on West Randolph Street, into which he moved his family, and, within one week, resumed his practice—the parlor of his house serving as his office. In 1872, he removed his office to the newly erected Metropolitan Block, Room 22, which continued to be his place of business up to the time of his decease. He died of heart disease, November 9, 1880, after a brief illness of two days and was buried, November 11, in Calvary Cemetery. In politics, Mr. Ennis was a Democrat of the Douglas school, and, after the breaking out of the Rebellion, was known as one of the most pronounced and ardent War Democrats of Chicago. In religion, he was a firm believer in the Catholic faith. As a lawyer, his ability as an advocate was excelled by few of his contemporaries, while his general success before the Supreme Court, as shown in the Reports, evinces his profound knowledge of the abstract principles of law. Mr. Ennis was married, November 3, 1858, to Miss Mary A. Sexton, a native of Chicago, and a daughter of Stephen Sexton, one of the early settlers, and who built the first school-house in Chicago. She died August 11, 1876, leaving nine children (the eldest being sixteen years old, and the youngest a babe), at the time of her death. He was married, again, two years after the death of his first wife, and left one child by his second wife. His children, still living, are Lawrence M., James I., Callistus S., Lullus J., Felicia A., Stephen F., Agnes M., Laura G., and Juven-tius T.—all residents of Rogers Park, a suburb of Chicago.

HENRY J. FURBER, of the firm of Higgins & Furber, lawyers and capitalists, was born in Rochester, Stafford Co., N. H., on July 17, 1849, being the son of Benjamin and Olive (Hussey) Furber. He fitted for college at the Great Falls High School and entered Bowdoin College in the fall of 1857. In the spring of 1860, before the graduation of his class, Mr. Furber accepted a call from Green Bay, Wis., to become superintendent of the public schools of that city. Subsequently, the faculty of Bowdoin College conferred on him the regular college degree, and enrolled his name among the graduates of the class of 1861. Mr. Furber continued in charge of the public school of Green Bay for two years, devoting all his leisure moments to the study of law. In July, 1862, he was admitted to the Wisconsin Bar, and, in August, formed a partnership with E. H. Ellis, a leading corporation lawyer of Green Bay. Becoming interested in the subject of fire and life insurance, through his professional labors, he was, in the spring of 1864, appointed special agent for Wisconsin of the Metropolitan Fire Insurance Company. In January, 1865, he became general agent for the Northwestern States, and, in the succeeding April, general manager of the Western and Southwestern States. His law connection with Mr. Ellis continued until July, when he removed to Chicago, determining that this city was the proper locality in which to make his headquarters. In October, Mr. Furber was chosen vice-president of the Universal Life Insurance Company of New York, and went to that city to reside, where he remained until the spring of 1870, having entire charge of the great business interests of that corporation. Returning to Chicago, in May of that year, he associated himself with Judge Van H. Higgins and Judge Cothran in the practice of law. Judge Cothran retired in April, 1882, and since that time the firm have given their entire attention to the care of their extensive business interests. Messrs. Higgins, Laflin and Furber are virtual proprietors of the National Life Insurance Company, and they are largely interested in other corporations of a like character. Mr. Furber is a Mason in high standing, being past master of Astor Lodge, New York, and a member of Republic Chapter, Palestine Commandery and New York Consistory. He was married at Green Bay, Wis., on January 7, 1862, to Miss Elvira Irwin. They have three sons.

JOHN H. MUHLKE (deceased) was born in Germany, November 23, 1826. His parents emigrated to America in 1842, and, after a short stay in Buffalo, located in Chicago. John then worked for Grant Goodrich, about his house, and remained with the family two or three years. He then obtained a situation in the store of Isaac Strahl, a merchant on Clark Street, and also worked a long time for Hamlin, Day & Co. Upon the failure of Mr. Bigelow, a dry goods merchant, by whom he was employed, he was appointed assignee, and afterward formed a co-partnership with his brother and son. This was about the year 1855. A few years thereafter, he took charge of the property of Carl G. Uhlich, who had become involved financially. After the death of Mr. and Mrs. Uhlich, in 1867, Mr. Muhle did not return to active business, but spent his time in managing his valuable estate. Aside from his business interests, his energies were devoted to his Church, of which he was secretary for over a quarter of a century, and to the Uhlich Orphan Asylum, connected with it. Of the latter noble charity he was president from the time of its organization up to the time of his death, August 26, 1879. Mr. Muhle left a widow, formerly Catharine C. Kunst, and eight children. Louisa, the eldest child, is the wife of Jacob H. Tiedemann; Anna, now Mrs. Phillip Henric; Henry C. Muhle, George F. Muhle, Joseph H. Muhle, Katie C., the wife of Charles J. Harpel; Wallie G. and Adelaide A.

John A. Jamison

CALVIN DEWOLF, probably the oldest lawyer of continuous practice in Chicago, is one of its strong local characters—a bond between the early and the present city. He was a pioneer abolitionist, one of the fathers of the municipal laws, and a popular and respected justice of the peace for over a quarter of a century. Mr. DeWolf was born February 18, 1815, at Braintrim, Luzerne Co., Penn., being the oldest son of a family of thirteen children. Soon after his birth, his parents removed to Cavendish, Vt., but when he was five years old, returned to Braintrim, and, in 1824, settled in Bradford County, Penn. Up to his majority, Calvin passed his time working upon his father's farm and in obtaining an education. With the assistance of a private tutor and his father, he gained a fair knowledge of Latin, higher mathematics and surveying. He also taught school for a time previous to 1836, when he left home to pursue a course at the Grand River Institute, a manual labor school in Ashtabula County, Ohio. On October 31, 1837, he arrived in Chicago, poor, friendless and courageous; was unable to obtain employment as a teacher, and after making application, on foot, at different settlements along Fox River, finally located as a teacher, in Hadley, Will Co., Ill. He returned to Chicago in the spring of 1838, and engaged in various occupations, before he was able to obtain a chance to study law in the office of Spring & Goodrich. After teaching two years longer, he was admitted to the Bar in May, 1843, and commenced practice. For eleven years he held closely to the duties of his profession, obtaining a large business and hosts of friends. In 1854, Mr. DeWolf was elected justice of the peace and continued to strengthen himself in the public regard by the manner in which, for a quarter of a century, he performed the duties attaching to that position. He was elected alderman in 1856, and, as chairman of the committee which revised the city ordinances during his term, he accomplished very much toward framing the municipal government as it now exists. He also was alderman from 1866 to 1868, and has been twice a member of the board of supervisors of Cook County. From early manhood he was an earnest and honest abolitionist, secretary of the first society ever formed in Chicago to spread anti-slavery views, and one of the founders of the Western Citizen, established by the State society as an anti-slavery organ. At the October term of the United States Court for the northern district of Illinois, in 1860, an indictment was found against Mr. DeWolf for the alleged crime of "aiding a negro slave, called Eliza, to escape from her master," one Stephen F. Nuckolls, of Nebraska. He gave bail in the sum of $2,500; but in December, 1861, upon the motion of the United States District attorney, the case was dismissed. After the expiration of his office as justice of the peace, in 1870, Mr. DeWolf resumed the practice of his profession, in which he is still actively engaged. In June, 1841, he was married to Frances Kimball. They have had five children—Ellen L., wife of Robert B. Bell, of Normalville, Cook County; Anna Spaulding, who in 1877 went to New Orleans a teacher of colored children, and died at Bay St. Louis, Miss., in September, 1878; Mary Frances, wife of Milo G. Kellogg, of Chicago; Wallace L.; and Alice, wife of L. D. Kneeland, who died at Kokomo, Col., in March, 1882. Mr. DeWolf and his wife are members of the Sixth Presbyterian Church.

Calvin DeWolf

THE LITERATURE OF CHICAGO.

The great fire may have been to Chicago a blessing in disguise, so far as her material prosperity is concerned, yet the calamity entailed losses for which there can be no compensation, among them being that of her archives. The records of the early settlers and the evidences of the growth of literature that accompany the increase of individual fortunes were swept away so completely that no trace of them remains, except such as may be found in some chance allusion in books, stray newspapers, public documents that escaped the flames, or in the memory of our oldest citizens. Such a loss is a disaster, not only to Chicago but to the country generally. When future historians of the marvelous progress of the United States come to seek for the records and explanations of the unparalleled development of the West, they will lack the materials which the burned archives of this city, civic as well as private, might have furnished. True, many citizens who were active participants in the social and intellectual progress of Chicago long before the fire, survive; but time casts a mist over memory, and, even for the period between 1857 and 1871, few can recall, with exactitude, the literary condition of the metropolis of the West. A full list of publications during that period can not be obtained, and the records and proceedings of the most important literary and scientific societies were either badly mutilated or entirely destroyed. The Historical Society of Chicago is still seeking to complete its records up to the fall of 1871. By carefully examining old newspapers, stray legal and other documents, and by searching for chance references to the proceedings of the Society in contemporary literature and the records of contemporary associations, much has been accomplished.

In this period, the greatest literary activity was developed during the War of the Rebellion. From the time the first shot was fired at Fort Sumter until the fall of Richmond, Chicago had her share of pamphleteers and bookmakers upon all the important topics of the day. The bulk of that literature was naturally partisan and ephemeral. Fergus Brothers, the old Chicago publishers, on Illinois Street, have rendered valuable services to the future historian, by re-publishing an important series of tractates and lectures that were given to the public in the years before the fire. But these are necessarily incomplete, and furnish imperfect pictures of the progress of thought or science in this city between 1857 and 1871. They suggest how great a loss to the annals of Chicago was caused by the fire, and serve to show the vast interest then taken in historical researches, more particularly concerning the State of Illinois and the City of Chicago; also, the gradual formation of public sentiment on the grave political issues pending between the North and South, ultimately settled by the arbitration of arms.

The population of this city between 1857 and 1871 increased from ninety-three thousand to about three hundred and fifty thousand, and literary and scientific societies increased in proportion. Many of them, however, were of a dilettante character, having social aims, and cultivated a taste for literature by much dancing and feasting, perhaps remembering Sidney Smith's suggestion that the motto of the Edinburgh Review should be "the cultivation of literature on a little oatmeal." The principal literary and historical societies of this city have been the old Chicago Lyceum and the Historical Society. Both of these existed with a serious purpose; and to them we owe much of our information as to Chicago's early literary progress. The former society expanded gradually into the Young Men's Association, and then into the Chicago Library Association, which may be regarded as the fons et origo of our present Public Library. The Lyceum promoted lectures on such useful subjects as Joseph N. Balestier's "Annals of Chicago"; while the kind of work done by the Historical Society is indicated by the lecture by Mr. Brown on the early pro-slavery sentiment in Illinois. As with the valuable records of the Historical Society, so with those of the Young Men's Association—the fire left them sadly incomplete, yet such as remain are invaluable aids to the historian.

Before 1857, Chicago's publishing firms were few, and without facilities for extensive publication. Their principal operations consisted of the sale of books and stationery. Subsequently, S. C. Griggs & Co. and Fergus Brothers did the greater part of the purely local publishing, Keen, Cooke & Co. did a portion, and George Sherwood & Co. published a series of school-books, although it may be remarked that Griggs & Co. was the first firm in the State of Illinois that brought out an elementary educational work.

S. C. Griggs was a member of a New York firm from 1848 to 1864, and, after buying out the interest of his partners, he conducted the publishing business alone. It was not until after the year 1871, that Mr. Griggs established a strictly publishing business on his own account, and the firm of Jansen, McClurg & Co. was placed upon its present basis. General McClurg is of the opinion that there was very little publishing done in Chicago before 1871, and that the stimulus which the business has since received had its origin in the intense vitality which that disaster developed. It was to the

BOOKSELLERS' ROW.

East that the reading public looked for their chief sources of intellectual enjoyment.

Perhaps the most ambitious scientific work published in this city was Foster's "Mississippi Valley; its Physical Geography, including Sketches of the Topography, Botany, Climate, Geology, and Mineral Resources; and the Progress of Development in the Population and Material Wealth," from the press of Church, Goodman & Donnelley. Almost simultaneously with its publication by S. C. Griggs & Co., in 1869, it was produced by Messrs. Trübner, of London. Dr. Foster was president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and lecturer on Physical Geography and Cognate Sciences in the University of Chicago, and his work was highly commended in scientific circles for its theories concerning the formation of the mountains and plains of the Mississippi valley, as well as for its account of the prairies of the West and the llanos and pampas of South America.

The book, par excellence, that Chicago has produced, in the estimation of Dr. William Frederick Poole, librarian of the Chicago Public Library, is Mrs. J. H. Kinzie's "Waubun." This volume was originally published before 1857, and has been republished in several cities of the United States—a New York edition appearing during 1856, and two editions a little later in Philadelphia. As a picture of early settler's life among the aborigines of the West, Mrs. Kinzie's book is as much appreciated in the Eastern States as it has been in the West.

Shortly before 1871, G. P. Upton, the musical critic of the Chicago Tribune, published a series of letters in book form, which were written over the nom de plume of "Peregrine Pickle." These letters treated social subjects in a light and pleasant fashion. The Western News Company were the publishers, and when they were burned out, the plates of Mr. Upton's book were lost. Mr. Upton was also author of the "Gunnybags Letters," and attained reputation as a translator. About this time Franc B. Wilkie, of the Chicago Times, printed a very popular volume, written under the pseudonym of "Poliota."

Chicago was too deeply immersed in business during those early days to be a congenial atmosphere for poetry, although in the newspapers and magazines of the day were many effusions. The Chicago war-songs, for sudden popular effect, were equal to those produced in any other part of the country, and those published by Messrs. Root & Cady did much toward keeping alive the enthusiasm which ultimately crushed the Rebellion. Many a soldier has been nerved to duty by the chorus of "Marching through Georgia"; many a man has gone into battle, whose soul had just been cheered for the fray by the strains of the "Battle Cry of Freedom"; and when not shouting "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching," many a soldier, thinking of home, has found the asperities of camp-life softened by George F. Root's song of the "Vacant Chair." The songs of a nation are sometimes more potent than battalions, and Chicago, by her martial songs, must have been worth to the Union cause many a veteran brigade. Henry Clay Work, the author of "Grandfather's Clock," was associated with Messrs. Root & Cady in their labors. Mr. Lewis, of the Chicago Music Company (Lewis, Newell & Gibbs), was with Root & Cady when "The Battle Cry of Freedom" was written by Mr. Work, and he can scarcely tell the tale yet of its first public reception, without betraying, in voice and eye, the unextinguished fire of the old enthusiasm. Another famous song of those days was Root's "Lay me down and save the Flag," the well-known last words of Colonel Mulligan.

S. C. Griggs bears testimony to the cordial reception extended by scholars to the works of Professor J. R. Boise, of the Chicago University. His edition of Homer's Iliad is now a recognized text-book, and his

RUINS, BOOKSELLERS' ROW

"Greek Lessons" is considered by teachers scarcely less valuable.

The plates of Arnold's "Lincoln and Slavery" were destroyed, but the author had, fortunately, preserved material which enabled him to produce his very complete "Life of Abraham Lincoln," which was of such excellence that it secured a ready welcome from the public for other historical works by the same author. Following in the same field, though not covering so wide a range, came Edward G. Mason, who occupied a prominent position in local literary circles. Of the "History of the Army of the Cumberland" there are probably now extant very few copies, although the edition was three thousand.

J. W. Sheahan, author of the "Life of Stephen A. Douglas," for twenty-nine years identified with journalism, was also well known as a pamphlet writer. While furnishing valuable matter for the Times, the Morning Post, the Republican and the Tribune, he still found time and energy, to produce his "Atlas of General History," which, for carefully prepared comparative chronological tables and general scope, received universal praise.

Elias Colbert, commercial editor of the Tribune, compiled a careful history of Chicago up to 1868, which has been a vaude mecum for students in local history. In addition to his reputation as a local historian, Mr. Colbert attained an enviable prominence as a scientist, based upon his "Astronomy with the Telescope," "Star Studies," and other works. He is a man of versatile acquirements. To an acquaintance with the classics, he adds a fair knowledge of Hebrew, a little of Sanscrit, a great familiarity with the modern languages, and a scholarly acquaintance with mathematics, political economy, general literature, and the natural sciences. The publisher of his "History of Chicago" was Patrick T. Sherlock, deceased, who was a well-known Irish patriot, and a member of the famous Irish Directory in the Rebellion of 1848.

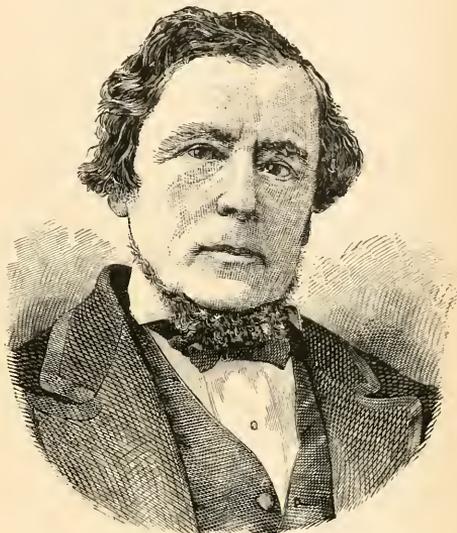

Benjamin F. Taylor contributed to the Chicago Journal, and also wrote many charming poems and stories before he retired to Michigan, where he now resides, full of years and honors. Rev. Robert Collyer wrote ably upon religious matters, and distinguished himself by his liberal views. William H. Bushnell, now in the Government Printing Office at Washington, entertained Chicago readers by his stories and poems before he went East. T. R. Dawley wrote and published many of his own works, and is remembered as having been always willing to lend a helping hand to younger aspirants for literary honors. John Wentworth, and a score of others, might be mentioned, who have published writings, fugitive and otherwise, on the topics of the hour.

In the list of the publishing houses from 1857 to 1871 appear the names of Culver, Page & Hoyne, the American Tract Society, S. C. Griggs & Co., Robert Fergus, D. B. Cooke, Rand, McNally & Co., Sherwood & Co., E. B. Myers, Callaghan & Co., C. S. Halsey, Clarke & Co., and Church, Goodman & Connelley. All these were doing business in a comparatively small way, and, as a rule, combining the publication business with the sale of books and stationery.

The "art preservative" is as essential to the perpetuation of the author's genius as is the marble to the sculptor, or the builder to the architect. No history of literature can offer any claim to completeness which fails to mention the vast array of publishers, booksellers, printers and lithographers, whose artistic skill and patient effort have done so much to supply the reading public with sources of intellectual culture. Many of Chicago's old publishers and "book-men" have passed away, but it is a pleasant task to recall and perpetuate their memories, as well as to chronicle the results attained by those who have followed in their footsteps.

ROBERT FERGUS, the historic printer of Chicago, and practically the pioneer of publishing, arrived in this city on Monday, July 1, 1839, by the old-time side-wheel steamer "Anthony Wayne," of the Buffalo and Chicago line, commanded by Captain Amos Pratt. He was born on August 14, 1815, in the Gallowgate of Glasgow, Scotland, and was the fifth and youngest son of John and

Yours sincerely
Robert Fergus.

THE HISTORIC PRINTER OF CHICAGO.

Margaret Patterson (Aitken) Fergus. Four miles northwest of Glasgow Cross, at the village of Maryhill, William Leckie presided over a small school, and to his charge Robert was committed. After being grounded in the rudiments, Robert was sent, at the age of fourteen, to William Lindsay's Commercial School, Brunswick Street, Glasgow, and a year later found him apprenticed to Robert Hutchinson and George Bookman, proprietors of the University Printing Office, Villafield. The firm also contained Alexander Fullerton, John Blackie and William Lang, the former two of whom were well-known Scotch publishers, while Mr. Lang earned a very excellent reputation as a printer. The firm was dissolved three years after Robert commenced his apprenticeship, and he then was transferred to George Bookman, with whose son he worked at the case and finished his apprenticeship. It is with no little pride, in recalling those early days, that Mr. Fergus remembers how he worked on Sir Walter Scott's "Marmion," "Lady of the Lake," and "Lay of the Last Minstrel," about the time when the Wizard of the North was beginning to excite the wonder of the world. He also helped to set up Sturm's "Reflections" and Professor F. Meadows's French, Italian, and Spanish dictionaries. A regular apprenticeship to the printing business means, in Scotland, a thorough grounding in the craft of Caxton; and when Mr. Fergus set forth as a journeyman, he possessed a knowledge of his business such as qualified him to earn a good livelihood in any part of the civilized world. In 1839, Mr. Fergus's career in this country was decided by his accidental meeting with a young Englishman named Francis Metcalf, for whom he had formerly done certain favours. Metcalf had just returned from Milwaukee, and he gave the young journeyman such a glowing account of the capabilities of the West that, on the 4th of May, 1839, Robert set sail from Glasgow on the paddle-wheel steamer "Commodore," and passed the first iron steamer ever built on the Clyde, the "Royal Sovereign," which was then on the stocks. Four days later he set out across the Atlantic from Liverpool, in the packet-ship "Orpheus," of the old Black Ball line, and arrived in New York on the 1st of June. After calling on the Rev. Orville Dewey, of the Unitarian Church of the Messiah, and, presenting a letter of introduction, he started for the West. Taking the steamer "New London" to Albany, he transferred himself to the Erie Canal packet "William Hildreth," which landed him in Buffalo seven days later. In due course he arrived in Milwaukee on the side-wheel steamer "Illinois." He vividly remembers how, at that time, a scow came out of the river, and took off both freight and passengers. The business arrangements proposed by his friend Metcalf did not suit him, and so he concluded to try something for himself. He met Harrison Reed, the editor and proprietor of the Milwaukee Sentinel, who offered to let him have a half-interest in the paper for $800. Mr. Fergus did not buy, as his friends advised him that "the amount asked was more than the office was worth," and then Mr. Reed offered him the charge of the establishment at an annual salary of $520. Mr. Fergus thought he could do still better in Chicago, and, in spite of the warnings he received, of what he quaintly called "sure death-diseases," he proceeded to this city, with which his name has ever since been associated. In February, 1836, he was married to Margaret Whitehead Scott, in the Independent Relief Chapel (southeast corner of John and Cochrane streets), of which Rev. William Anderson was then chaplain. Margaret was the eldest daughter of James Scott, a merchant weaver, and a burgess and freeman of the city of Glasgow, a position held in very great esteem by the "Glasgow bodies." Mr. Fergus's children are—George Harris, John Bowman, Walter Scott, Benjamin Franklin and Jessie Margaret; and it is worth observing how both his nationality and his love of his craft appear in the names of his boys. It is difficult to say whether Mr. Fergus is a printer first and a Scotchman last, or a Scotchman first and a printer last; for he appears to be just as devoted to his profession as he is to the literature and recollections of his native country. Nothing delights him more than to meet a congenial friend who can talk to him about Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd," and discuss the beauties of "Habbie's Howe" or the character of Patsy and Meg, the lovers whose presence has made that glen famous in Caledonian literature. The poems of Robert Burns he has at his tongue's end, the works of Walter Scott are familiar to him as household words, and there are few of the older Scotch authors about whom he does not know something. His library is very full and curious; and what of old-time local affairs can not be found on his book-shelves may generally be looked for in his vigorous and well-stored mind. Excepting a slight deafness, Mr. Fergus enjoys a stout and hearty health, in spite of his weight of years, of which forty-six (1885) have been spent in this city.

DAVID BRAINERD COOKE was born in Northampton, Mass., February 10, 1826, and when only twelve years of age commenced his business career in the book-store of Derby & Co., of Cincinnati. In November, 1852, he came to Chicago and opened a little store under the Tremont House. Soon afterward, he established himself in a more extensive way at Nos. 113-115 Lake Street. At this time he was an active and enterprising man, and for several years published the celebrated "Blackwell's Reports." Subsequently, becoming financially embarrassed, he entered the service of the American Express Company, in 1862. He remained in that position four years, and, in 1866, connected himself, in the book business with S. C. Griggs. With him he continued for three years, at No. 39 Lake Street, next entering into partnership with W. B. Keene, at No. 115 State Street, remaining with him until the great fire of 1871. After that calamity, they were located, for a short time, on the lake front and Wabash Avenue, but finally returned to their old site on State Street. In 1876, the firm again became deeply involved, the store was closed up, and Mr. Cooke returned to the employ of the American Express Company, acting in the capacity of purchasing agent up to the time of his death, which occurred October 21, 1884. His decease was occasioned by heart disease. Few men left a larger circle of friends, or more sincere mourners at the taking-off of so warm-hearted a citizen. His widow, Augusta (Parke) Cooke, still survives him, she being formerly the wife of Philip B. Ayer.

The name of Jansen, McClurg & Co., are pre-eminent in the West as booksellers. The firm is identified with the spreading of the highest class of literature, and their imprint has grown to be recognized as a guarantee of the excellence and wholesomeness of a book. The firm is the outgrowth of the old house of S. C. Griggs & Co., which, in 1865, comprised Samuel C. Griggs, Egbert L. Jansen, David B. Cooke, Alexander C. McClurg, and Frederick B. Smith. In 1868, D. B. Cooke retired from the firm, and, in 1872, the firm was divided, S. C. Griggs retiring from all connection with the general book and stationery trade, and devoting himself only to the publishing business, under the old firm name, while the remaining three partners, under the style of Jansen, McClurg & Co., continued the large general business. They very speedily built up, in addition, a publishing business of the highest character. The firm is now constituted as originally formed, the members being Egbert L. Jansen, Alexander C. McClurg, and Frederick B. Smith.

EGBERT L. JANSEN, the son of Dr. John T. and Clarissa (Dolsen) Jansen, was born near Goshen, Orange Co., N. Y., on January 5, 1833. He attended the public schools, and afterward became a pupil at the Chester Academy. At the age of twelve years he was left an orphan, and soon afterwards came to Chicago. In August, 1848, he entered the house of S. C. Griggs & Co., as an office boy, and, upon attaining his majority, was received as a partner, and so continued until 1872, when, on the retirement of S. C. Griggs, he became the senior partner in the present firm of Jansen, McClurg & Co. He was married, in 1856, to Mary L. Buckbee, of Ypsilanti, Mich., daughter of Walter Buckbee, one of the leading lawyers of Michigan at that early day. They have four children.

RICHARD ROBERT DONNELLEY was born in Hamilton, Canada West, November 15, 1836. At the age of thirteen, he entered a printing office, to learn the business. At sixteen, he was made foreman of the office where he served his time. He subsequently became a partner of William Pigott, who shortly afterward removed to Chicago, and established the Evening Post. Mr. Donnelley continued in business with John J. Hand, at present one of the proprietors of the Galveston News, until the depression which followed the panic of 1857. He went to New Orleans, to take charge of the job department of the True Delta, where he remained until the breaking out of the War, when he returned to Canada, and again established himself in business. In 1864, he moved to Chicago, to become a partner in the firm of Church, Goodman & Donnelley, which, in a few years, became one of the largest book and periodical publishing houses in the West—no less than twenty-three weekly, monthly and quarterly journals being regularly issued from its presses. In 1870, the Lakeside Publishing and Printing Company was organized, with a capital of $500,000, and Mr. Donnelley was appointed manager. This corporation was established for the purpose of successfully competing for the Western book-trade. The machinery, material and business of Church, Goodman & Donnelley were purchased and made the nucleus of the new enterprise. The company commenced the erection of an elegant Gothic structure, at the corner of Clark and Adams streets, known as the Lakeside Building; but when only four of the six stories had been completed, the great fire swept away their first efforts. Before the smoke had blown away, Mr. Donnelley had set about to restore his business; and, on the Friday following, leased the third story of Nos. 103 and 105 South Canal Street, and started for New York, to secure new material. He commenced on his own account, pending the decision of the Lakeside Company as to its future course. That corporation had lost everything they possessed; but there were, among its stockholders, men who believed it could be resuscitated. He accepted their propositions, continuing his own business, and also acting as manager of the Lakeside Company, until the completion of their new building, in June, 1873. He then merged his own establishment into that of the company. In 1874, he associated with A. J. Cox, in book-binding, under the style of A. J. Cox & Co. In 1877, on account of the great and continued commercial depression, the Lakeside Company closed business, disposing of the building to the estate of P. F. W. Peck, and the machinery and printing material to R. R. Donnelley and A. T. Loyd. It was this firm who originated and gave to the American people the style of cheap, good literature, known as "Libraries," by issuing the "Lakeside Library," in 1875. In 1878, Norman T. Gassette became interested in the concern, and a corporation, under the firm name of Donnelley, Gassette & Loyd, was organized, with a capital of $75,000 and surplus of $20,000. In 1879, Mr. Donnelley purchased the interests of Mr. Gassette and Mr. Loyd, and re-organized the company, as at the present, R. R. Donnelley & Sons. Mr. Donnelley was married, November 14, 1863, to Naomi A. Shenston, of Brantford, Ont. Their children are Reuben Hamilton, Thomas Eliot, Benjamin Shenston and Naomi. Mr. Donnelley's aim, for twenty years, has been to make Chicago a book-making center. Any person acquainted with the magnitude of that branch of business at present, and a knowledge of its condition at that time, can readily see how much may be achieved by the persistent efforts of one person, in an intelligently-selected line of trade; and while this business has become great, far-reaching and many-handed, Mr. Donnelley deserves the credit of having brought about this condition beyond that of any one man in the trade. The present capacity of his well-appointed establishment may be estimated, when it is stated that his firm has been selected as printers of the United States Official Postal Guide.

RUINS, LAKESIDE BUILDING.

RAND, McNALLY & Co., the well-known printers, engravers, electrotypers, and map and book publishers, take their origin from a printing establishment opened, in 1856, at No. 148 Lake Street, by William H. Rand, the senior member of the firm. Mr. Rand, in 1860, consolidated with the Tribune job department, at No. 51 Clark Street, and assumed the superintendence. In this capacity he continued, for eight years, when he and A. McNally, with others, formed a partnership, to establish a printing and publishing house under the firm name of Rand, McNally & Co. In 1873, the firm was incorporated as a stock company, with a capital of $200,000, under the same name, and has since assumed such large proportions, that it is now one of the largest printing houses in this country, with a surplus capital of over $300,000. October 9, 1871, when located at No. 51 Clark Street, the establishment was burned out, but business was resumed temporarily at No. 108 West Randolph Street, until 1873, when the company moved into their own quarters at Nos. 79 and 81 Madison Street. This building becoming too small, they erected a five and six story building, ninety by one hundred and ninety feet, at Nos. 148 to 152 Monroe Street, which the company has occupied since January, 1881. William H. Rand is president and treasurer, A. McNally is vice-president and general manager, and the superintendents of the various departments are as follows: John Reid, ticket department; T. C. Haynes, job work; R. A. Bower, map and atlas publications; James McNally, book publications and school maps; R. B. Marten, wood engraving; C. R. Williams, Bankers' Directory, Bankers' Monthly, and Business Directory; John Ludwig, stationery and blank books. Among some of their celebrated publications may be mentioned the Atlas of the World, Business Atlas of the United States and Canada, large scale-map of the United States, Bankers' Directory, Lumbermen's Guide, and a map of every country on the globe. The Rand-McNally Railway Guide is known and used the world over.

Prior to 1857, there were few, if any, manufacturers of printers' materials beyond the Chicago Type Foundry Company and Rounds & Langdon. A few years later the well-known firm of Marder, Luse & Co., came into existence, and still flourished in 1871, while S. P. Rounds had become senior partner in the firm of Rounds & Kane. In view of the comparatively small population of Chicago at that time, and the severe results of the financial panic, this review clearly suggests that Chicago, even then, had a fair proportion of publishing houses, booksellers and printers.

CULVER, PAGE AND HOYNE'S BUILDING.

From a lithograph.

THE CHICAGO TYPE FOUNDRY (Marder, Luse & Co.) was established in 1855, as a branch of a New York City foundry. The foundry changed hands in 1863, and it was reorganized entirely, both firm and business. The company was composed of David Scofield, John Marder and H. A. Porter. The last named partner remained in the firm but a short time, and, in 1865, John Collins was admitted as a partner. The firm name was then changed to Scofield, Marder & Co. After four years of successful business, Mr. Collins retired, and, in January, 1869, A. P. Luse purchased his interest, when the firm name was changed to Marder, Luse & Co., and afterward was incorporated under the laws of the State by the old partners, John Marder and A. P. Luse. Mr. Marder is president and treasurer, and Mr. Luse is vice-president and secretary.

CHARLES McDONNELL (deceased), son of Augustine and Elizabeth (Byrne) McDonnell, was one of the most widely known and beloved, especially among the Catholics, of the early residents of Chicago. He was born in Clonagall, County Wexford, Ireland, December 4, 1809. He received a thorough education, his brother Nicholas, a professor in St. Peter's College, Carlow, personally supervising his studies. In Dublin, he also obtained a good business training, and engaged in business in Wexford for a time. Previous to coming to New York City, on July 4, 1834, he passed into Canada West, near Chatham, which was then scarcely a settlement. There Mr. McDonnell taught a school in the woods, then resided for a short time in Detroit, and, finally, on April 3, 1836, located in Chicago. His brother James accompanied him from Detroit, and resided near him until his death in 1870. His wife, Annie Charles, of Dublin, had preceded Mr. McDonnell to Chicago during the previous year. They were married on September 20, 1836, and, up to the time of her death by cholera, in 1851, she was a helpmeet in the most beautiful and Christian sense of the word. Mrs. McDonnell was greatly beloved for her charity to the poor and sick emigrants, who came in large numbers during those years. Soon after coming to Chicago, Mr. McDonnell purchased a large tract of land on Market Street, near Randolph, and there erected a building, in which he carried on a hotel and general store and the first Catholic book establishment in Chicago. Later, he added to his building, in which he resided and conducted his business. In March, 1845, with the approbation of Bishop Quarter, he published the "Rosarist's Companion," the first devotional book printed in the city. He was one of the first and principal members of St. Mary's Church. He was one of the originators of St. Patrick's Society, the Catholic Young Men's Association of St. Mary's Church the Union Catholic Library, and was a generous patron of the University of St. Mary's of the Lake. In fact, he did not confine himself to the encouragement of denominational education, for at the State Common School Convention, which was held in Chicago, in October, 1846, he stood prominent amid a number of public-spirited citizens as an earnest advocate of a pure system of education. He was one of the earliest members of the Board of Education of the city, and made a record there for probity, high-mindedness and ability. Mr. McDonnell was alderman in 1842, 1847, 1848, 1852 and 1853, representing the Fourth Ward; justice of the peace from 1862-64, being admitted to the Bar in 1867. This, in connection with the fact that he had become the possessor of much property in different sections of the city, induced him to spend the later years of his life in the real estate business and the practice of law. In 1857, he retired, temporarily, from active business, but was obliged to resume the book-trade again, and continued his store until 1866, being assisted by his daughter. Mr. McDonnell was of an unusually robust constitution, but it is supposed that an injury, which he received upon the head by being thrown from a buggy, brought on the stroke of paralysis which he suffered in February, 1867. He seemed, however, to have quite recovered his good health, and many years of continued usefulness seemed in store for him, when he suddenly was stricken a second time, and died on April 16, 1865. In his life, he took a very active interest in the emigration of his countrymen to the West, and was elected a member of the Emigration Convention, which was held in Buffalo in 1856, and, later, in St. Louis in 1868. It is not too much to say that few men have been more generally or sincerely mourned, or that were more thoroughly deserving of the regard and regrets of their fellow-citizens. Mr. and Mrs. McDonnell had three children—all daughters. Julia died in 1849. Elizabeth and Harriet are still living.

A. J. COX, who has the largest book manufacturing establishment west of New York City, was born at Isleworth-on-the-Thames, Middlesex County, England, January 22, 1835. He lost his father at an early age, and lived in England until thirteen years old, when he came to America with his mother, and landed in New Orleans, in the winter of 1847-48. Soon afterward they moved to the North, residing in various towns until they settled, in 1850, in Columbus, Ohio. There he learned the bookbinder's trade, with Messrs. Scott & Bascom, publishers of the State Journal. In the following year he kept the books of the Ohio Statesman, a newspaper of Columbus. In 1855, he came to Chicago for the first time, working for several months at his trade with Mr. Scott, his instructor and employer in Columbus. Then he removed to Milwaukee, and worked as a journeyman. While there he married Miss Jane E. French, who was formerly a resident of Columbus. Shortly after his marriage he returned to Chicago, at the urgent request of Mr. Scott, who had taken a large contract for printing and binding the municipal laws of Chicago, one copy of which work was given to every city in the Union. The years 1860-61, he spent in Milwaukee, returning to this city in the fall of 1861. Entering into partnership, he continued the book-binding business, purchasing a small bindery on the corner of Lake and Clark streets. The business grew until it was necessary to seek more extensive quarters, and the firm moved to Nos. 51 and 53 LaSalle Street, where they remained five years. Again they were forced to have larger quarters, and removed to No. 164 Clark Street. In August, 1871, they purchased the interests of another bindery, which they consolidated with their own, making it the best equipped establishment of the kind west of New York City, a reputation which has since been maintained. The great fire consumed the larger part of their accumulations, but they resumed another partnership, this house binding the first book printed after the fire, "Campbell's Shippers' Guide." In the following year Mr. Cox formed a third business connection, under the firm name of A. J. Cox & Co.; they removed to the New Lakeside Building, where they remained ten years. During this period they had built up a business greater even than the one before the fire, and were forced to seek more spacious rooms, removing to Nos. 140 to 146 Monroe Street, where they have the largest and most conveniently arranged bindery, on one floor, in America. Mr. and Mrs. Cox have five children—Alexis J., Wilkie A., Charlotte E., Alfred W. and Almir C.

SHUBAEL DAVIS CHILDS (deceased) was the son of Josiah and Beulah Childs, and was born at Westborough, Mass., on December 10, 1799. He learned the trade of wood engraver, in Boston, and thence removed to New York, where he remained seven years. He came to this city in November, 1837. Prior to his departure, he married Miss Eliza W. Aiken, on April 27, 1831. He entered into business immediately upon his arrival here, but there being comparatively little wood engraving to be done in the city in 1837, he combined, with that business, sign-painting, wood-carving, etc., and occasionally printing. Mr. Childs was the first wood engraver in Chicago, and several of the engravings in the first volume of this History are reproductions of the originals made by him. He remained in the business until his death, which occurred at Evanston, on January 9, 1870. His son, Shubael Davis Childs, has continued the business since his father's death, and was associated with him, since 1850, in the business. He was born on December 19, 1833, in New York City, and came to this city with his father. He attended the school at the garrison in Fort Dearborn, and also a school on the southwest corner of Madison and State streets, having Justice Sturtevant and Joseph K. C. Forrest as preceptors. Since 1860, he has managed the business, his father being sick and unable to give him time and attention to it. Soon after his father's death, he became associated with J. A. Smith in its continuance, which was principally a general engraving business, their location being at No. 117½ Randolph Street. They were there burned out, and re-established the business at the corner of Kinzie and King-bury streets, where they remained until the erection of their building at No. 135 Franklin Street, which is now their workshop. At the time of the building of this house they considered that they were in the center of the business portion of the city, but the growth of the city, and the change of the commercial center, necessitated the opening of another house at No. 163 Dearborn Street, where it still remains. Within the last few years they have added printing to the engraving and stationery business, and this, the oldest house in the city doing business here, ranks among the extensive and flourishing houses in Chicago. They run eight steam presses, and do the metal and wood engraving at the Franklin Street house, both the printing and stationery branches being conducted at the Dearborn Street house. Mr. Childs was married, on November 7, 1855, to Miss Mary A. Wright. He is a member of Lincoln Park Lodge, No. 611, A. F. & A. M.

STEPHEN F. GALE, the first stationer in Chicago, and afterward one of the most active and public-spirited of her citizens, was born at Exeter, Rockingham Co., N. H., March 8, 1812. At an early age he went to Boston, attended the public schools, and when fifteen years old, entered the leading book establishment of the city, Hilliard, Gray & Co. There he remained a number of years, becoming a resident of Chicago in May, 1835. At this time he established the first general book and stationery store in the city, on the south side of South Water Street, between Clark and LaSalle streets, exhibiting on his shelves also musical instruments, cutlery and wall paper. As schools were then being generally established throughout Northern Illinois, Mr. Gale soon acquired a good trade in educational books, his store becoming the source of supply for quite an area of the surrounding country. Another store in the village carried a small stock of religious books and a small supply of stationery, but made few pretensions to compete with Mr. Gale. His establishment gradually drifted into an exclusive book and stationery store, and in a few years a very large stock (or at least so considered at that time) was laid into this one-story frame structure. As trade increased, help became necessary, and A. H. Burley, Mr. Gale's half-brother, was installed as salesman. In the spring of 1842, he was taken into partnership and under the firm name of S. F. Gale & Co., the business was conducted until 1845, when Charles Burley, the brother of A. H. Burley, took the remaining interest of Mr. Gale. Under the management of A. H. & C. Burley the business was continued quite successfully. In 1844, Mr. Gale was nominated and elected chief of the Fire Department, while it was a volunteer organization; and from 1844 to 1847, while he was at its head, the whole machinery of this branch of the city government moved like clock-work. In February, 1848, he was urged to allow his name to be used for a re-nomination, but, on account of ill-health, he was obliged to decline, and Charles E. Peck became his successor. When the enterprise of building the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad was revived in 1846, Mr. Gale at once took his place among the leaders of the new work. The great liberality of the old charter, together with the desire for immediate action, caused a favorable feeling in regard to its purchase. William B. Ogden, John B. Turner, and Stephen F. Gale pledged themselves in the sum of $5,000 each toward the purchase, but, finding difficulty in obtaining the fourth name for the same sum, the three entered into an agreement to furnish the entire sum in equal parts, provided, better terms could not be made. After correspondence and interviews, Mr. Townsend, who, with Mr. Mather controlled the franchise of the road, submitted a proposition, which was, that he was authorized to make a conditional offer of the charter and assets, and receive therefor the entire amount in full paid stock of the company, as follows: $10,000 immediately after the completion of the new organization, and $10,000 additional upon the completion of the road to Fox River, or so soon as a dividend should be named of 6 per cent.; reserving to himself the privilege of naming, or having submitted to himself, for his approval, the names of the persons who should constitute the first board of directors. The proposition was accepted, and on the 15th of December, 1846, individual subscriptions were made to defray the expenses of a preliminary survey, and the work was put in charge of Richard P. Morgan, civil engineer. In February, 1849, a mass meeting was called by the citizens of Chicago to place in nomination some one for the mayorality who could be supported by both parties. Mr. Gale received the nomination, but declined to allow the use of his name, he being at this time busily engaged in the preliminary steps for the incorporation and construction of the Aurora Branch Railroad, which was to be a line running from Aurora to the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, in DuPage County. An incorporating act was passed in February, 1830, and Mr. Gale became its first president. After the completion of the Aurora branch it was decided to extend the road to Mendota, there to connect with the main line of the Illinois Central. In 1855, the various roads were consolidated which now form the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad in Illinois. Mr. Gale remained president of the Chicago and Aurora line until its completion to Mendota, and thus he played no mean part in the establishment of a great railroad system. He also took an active part in the resumption of the work for the completion of the Illinois & Michigan Canal. When W. H. Swift and David Leavitt, trustees on the part of the bondholders, returned from Europe, it was ascertained that no money would be forthcoming from a foreign source until Illinois subscriptions to the amount of $16,000 were all paid. William B. Ogden, Thomas Dyer and Mr. Gale were appointed to canvass the city and offer to the trustees a bond guaranteeing the prompt payment of every Illinois subscriber. This bond was executed and accepted, and every dollar paid to the trustees on the day agreed upon. Since retiring from the stationery business in 1855, Mr. Gale has not engaged in any mercantile pursuit, but has been interested in many enterprises of magnitude.

J. M. W. JONES is the head of the corporation known as the J. M. W. Jones' Stationery and Printing Company. He was born in Petersburg, Kentselaer Co., N. Y., on January 22, 1821. The first eighteen years of his life he spent on his father's farm and in receiving a good public school education. At the age of eighteen, he went to Troy, N. Y., serving as a grocery clerk five years, then accepting a position in a book and stationery house, where he went through all the gradations of an employe until he became a proprietor. There he remained seventeen years, nine years of which he was proprietor of "The Troy Book Store," where he acquired experience and capital for his broader field of labor in this city. In 1857 he came to Chicago and soon after his arrival purchased the interests of A. H. Burley & Co., who were engaged in the blank book and stationery business at No. 122 Lake Street. Burley & Co. were the successors of Stephen F. Gale, who founded the house in 1835, making it the oldest house of its kind in this city and in the Northwest. Mr. Jones continued the business at the old stand until 1866, where it had been conducted for thirty-one successive years, when he moved to Nos. 42 and 44 Dearborn Street, as the old quarters had become too limited to supply the demands upon its capacity for work. Three years after this removal his business had so increased that he again sought more commodious quarters at Nos. 105 and 110 Randolph Street. There, the fire of October 9, 1871, consumed not only his store but his house, and he lost the greater portion of the accumulations of his earlier years; but he resumed his business at No. 68 South Canal Street, and soon after started a branch at No. 507 Wabash Avenue and one on Clark Street. As soon as the building of No. 104 and 106 Madison Street was completed he consolidated his three stores there, where he continued until his removal to his present large and commodious store, where he is conducting one of the largest houses of its kind in the West. He was one of the originators of the Fourth National Bank of Chicago and was a member of the board of directors, but soon afterward resigned. He is a communicant of the St. James Episcopal Church, joining the society soon after his arrival in this city. He married, in 1857, Miss Harriet Snow, the daughter of George W. Snow a settler of 1832.

PAUL SHNIEDIEWEND, a member of the Shniedewend & Lee Company, was born in the city of Wismar, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, September 4, 1846, from which place he emigrated to America, and settled in Chicago in 1857. The first ten months he worked in a cabinet manufactory, and at the same time attended evening schools. He next went to Addison, DuPage Co., Ill., and remained three years. Returning to Chicago, he served an apprenticeship of three years at stereotyping and electrotyping with S. P. Ronnds, and then was foreman of the office seven years, after which he became manager of the mechanical department of A. Zeese & Co. He remained one year with this firm, and then formed a partnership, in 1870, with Mr. Lee, in the type founding and stereotyping business. Mr. Shniedewend was married May 6, 1872, to Fredrica Kaiser, a native of Germany. They have had seven children, five of whom are living—Agnes, Alma, Paul, Cora and Walter.

JOHN ANDERSON, a printer and publisher, was born in Voss, Norway, on March 22, 1836, and is the son of Andrew and Laura (Sampson) Anderson. He emigrated to America with his parents in 1844, when only eight years old, and, at fourteen years of age, he left school to prepare himself for his life's work. He became printer's devil with Alfred Dutch, publisher of the Chicago Commercial Advertiser. From there he went to the Argus, and when that closed its publication he went over to the Democratic Press, where he worked as compositor, until it was merged into the Tribune, and was connected with that paper for sixteen years. In 1865, he left the composing rooms of the Tribune, and started the weekly Skandinaven, which is now published daily and weekly.

It also has a European edition, and the only one published in this country. The Skandinaven not only goes to every State and Territory in the Union, but to the Canadas, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Australia, Sandwich Islands, France, Russia and Germany. In connection with the above he runs a large job office, in which he does printing in four languages. He has also a large bindery, and in all his departments he employs from eighty to one hundred and twenty-five people. He is a publisher of both English and Scandinavian books, and is a large importer. He was married, in 1859, to Maria C. Frank, daughter of William and Betsey (Johnson) Frank. She died in April, 1874, and left one child. He was again married in May, 1875, to Julia Sampson, daughter of Peter and Sara (Nordheim) Sampson. They have two children.

BAKER & Co., are wood-engravers and designers, and dealers in engravers' tools and supplies. William D. Baker established the house in 1857, coming to Chicago from Philadelphia in 1856. Mr. Baker was a native of Philadelphia, being born in 1828, and living in New York and Philadelphia until he made his home in Chicago. He learned his trade of John Frost, of Philadelphia, receiving his education in the schools of his native city. He was a prominent Mason, a Knight Templar, and was buried, with Masonic ceremonies, in Rosehill Cemetery, Chicago.

Sylvanus H. Fallis, who succeeded to the house of Baker & Co., was born in Peru, Ind., March 12, 1842, where he lived nineteen years, receiving his education in the public schools of his native town. When nearly twenty years of age he came to Chicago, and commenced learning the wood-engraver's trade with William D. Baker, in the fall of 1862. He was then made foreman, and succeeded to Mr. Baker's business, on the death of the latter on August 23, 1871, preserving the firm name. After the fire of 1871, the business was re-established at No. 50 West Randolph Street, and on January 15, 1873, he moved to the southwest corner of Monroe and Clark streets. Mr. Fallis is an author, and is now writing an interesting series of articles in the Inland Printer, giving the history of wood-engraving from its earliest discovery and use to the present time.

J. F. LAWRENCE.—The printing house of J. F. Lawrence was founded in 1869, by Samuel Mitchell, J. F. Lawrence and O. C. Fordham, under the firm name of Mitchell, Lawrence & Fordham, on the northwest corner of Lake and LaSalle streets. They remained there until the great fire of 1871, in which they were burned out, losing about $8,500. Immediately after the fire, Messrs. Mitchell and Fordham retired, and Mr. Lawrence took the business, and carried it on at No. 359 West Randolph Street up to 1873, when his eldest son, T. F. Lawrence, purchased the business, carrying it on ever since under the old name of J. F. Lawrence. Mr. Lawrence settled in Chicago in 1843. He here learned the trade of mason, and became afterward one of the prominent contractors of Chicago, continuing in that business, with the exception of the years 1860 to 1864, when he resided at Northfield, Ill., when he entered into the printing business, retiring from it, as before stated, in 1873. His son, Theodore F. Lawrence, was born in Chicago, March 8, 1846, and in 1869 became a partner in his father's firm. He married Lizzie L. Barker, daughter of John Barker, of England; they have one child, a daughter, Agnes K.

LOUIS KURZ, of the firm of Kurz & Allison, and one of the founders of the Chicago Academy of Design, was born in Salzburg, Austria, November 23, 1835. In 1852, he came to Chicago, where he pursued his studies and acquired a reputation as a scenic artist, specimens of his handiwork being observed at Crosby's Opera House, McVicker's Theatre and all the early and popular places of amusement. Louis Kurz continued to follow his profession, with fair success, until 1860, when he engaged in the business of lithographing. In 1863, with Jenne A. Floto, M. Kurz and Edward Carpenville, he organized the Chicago Lithographing Company. Their place of business was at Nos. 150-154 Clark Street, and the firm acquired a high reputation for the excellence of their work, but the great fire destroyed their establishment. Shortly afterward, Mr. Kurz founded the American Olograph Company, with headquarters at Milwaukee. In 1878, he returned to Chicago to reside permanently, and, in 1880, formed his present partnership with Alexander Allison. Their business consists in designing for large establishments of all kinds, and in originating and placing on the market artistic and fancy prints of the most elaborate workmanship. Mr. Kurz was married, in 1857, to Mary Erker, of Jefferson, Wis., and they have ten children, five sons and five daughters. His oldest son, Louis O. Kurz, has lately returned from Munich, Germany, where he spent six years at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, and has opened a studio and established himself as a portrait painter in this city.

WILLIAM BURGESS, a newspaper printer, was born in London, England, May 1, 1824. He received his education at Exeter, England. His parents came to America, settling in Cincinnati, where they lived several years; thence they came to Chicago where they died. Mr. Burgess came to America ten years later than his father, and visited his parents in Cincinnati. After remaining there a few months, he concluded to come to Chicago, and arrived here in October, 1856. From shortly after his arrival here, he has been connected with the Times, and is still drawing a salary from its management. He commenced as a carrier of the paper to its patrons, and four years afterward, was transferred to the mailing department. His income being small, he purchased a cart, by which he could transfer forms from one office to another, and also do any kind of errands that would help him to make a living. His business so increased, that he purchased a horse and wagon, and the extra work involved was done in the daytime, after he had finished his work in the mailing department. In this way he mailed the first issue of the Journal of Commerce, and has continued its mailing ever since. His mailing business increased yearly until the fire of October 9, 1871, which consumed the gains of his previous years, leaving him nothing but pluck and credit to commence the battle of life anew. He opened up his business again, in connection with the mailing of the Times, receiving all the credit he asked for in replacing machinery and furniture. On May 5, 1877, he added printing to his business, and placed in position two cylinder presses and three folding-machines. He now runs ten cylinder presses, night and day, except Sundays. He prints a large number of publications, a few of which are the Breeders' Gazette, Journal of Commerce, The Living Church, The Swedish Tribune, The Farmers' Review, The Shipping Gazette, Religio-Philosophical Journal, The Emerald, with many others. He was first married in October, 1846, to Eliza Dawson, in London, England, who died there in the summer of 1848, leaving one child, Charles, who is still living, assisting his father in his business.

SAMUEL SIMONS, manufacturer of printers' furniture, engravers' and railroad supplies, was born in London, England, January 9, 1837, and is a son of William and Martha (Smith) Simons. At fourteen, he was apprenticed for two years to learn the carpenter and joiner trade, at the expiration of which time he emigrated to America. Landing in New York, in 1853, he worked at his trade until 1855, when he moved to Chicago and was employed as carpenter and joiner here till 1861. Wilbur F. Storey was the means of starting him in his present business. He was in the old Times Building one day when Mr. Storey accosted him, and asked him about his business, knowing he was a builder. Mr. Simons replied that building was dull and unprofitable. This was during the War, when it was difficult to secure male compositors, and Mr. Storey was contemplating the instruction of women and girls in the art of type-setting. "Now you," said Mr. Storey, "take rooms in my building, and manufacture type-cases, and I one million dollars to the city treasury. He is a member of three committees, Gas, Markets, and Streets and Alleys.

JOHN BUCKLE, JR., manufacturer of printer's rollers, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, December 1, 1838, and is a son of John and Barbara (Vaughn) Buckle. His father, a printer, learned his trade in Glasgow, and sold one of the largest job offices there, when he left with his family for America, in 1851. The family stopped in New York three years, and the father took charge of the printing office of Oliver & Bro., at that time the largest job office in that city. While in New York, John, Jr., was bound out, under articles of indenture, to Oliver & Bro., but not having served his time when his family moved to Alton, Ill., his employers surrendered the articles, and thus released him. His father took charge of the Alton Courier, for its proprietor, George E. Brown, and the year after John came to Chicago, and completed his education in the art of printing with Robert Ferguson, an old acquaintance of his father's. His next engagement was with William H. Rand, who was running a book and job office. There he remained one year, afterward, working in the Evening Journal, and, in 1858, he engaged with Simeon Farwell, now of the firm of J. V. Farwell & Co., as foreman of the printing, and finally took charge of the whole business. At the end of his four years' service with Mr. Farwell, he became foreman of the press-room of Dunlop, Sewell & Spalding, with whom he remained eight years. In 1870, he opened business on his own account on Dearborn Street, opposite the Masonic Temple. A few months before the great fire he sold his business to William Piggott, and traveled for the Chicago Taylor Press Company and S. P. Rounds, till October 9, 1871. After the fire they had no use for traveling men, as they could not manufacture presses and type as fast as they received orders by mail. He then aided, and took an interest in establishing the Phoenix Printing Company, and opened their business on Canal Street, in the Gates Building. Afterward he sold his interest in the printing company, and established his present business. He was married, September 19, 1857, to Annie E. Duffie; they have nine children living—John F., Minnie Annie, William B., Tessie, Barbara, Bella (Henry A., deceased), Harriet, Bella and Beatrice.

The following table (compiled from the census reports of 1860 and 1870) affords a view of the growth of the various departments of the publishing and printing business during the ten years preceding the fire. The figures given, are for the entire County of Cook, but may be accepted as relating substantially to Chicago.

TRADES.	Number of establishments.		Capital invested. (Dollars.)		Cost of raw material. (Dollars.)		Number of employes.		Wages paid. (Dollars)		Value of manufactured produce. (Dollars.)
	1860.	1870.	1860.	1870.	1860.	1870.	1860.	1870.	1860.	1870.	1860.	1870.
Printing and publishing.....	--	2	-----	68,000	-----	210,440	---	53	-----	37,000	-----	324,000
Book.....	--	8	-----	271,000	-----	205,620	---	181	-----	114,700	-----	452,500
Newspaper.....	--	16	-----	203,000	-----	329,075	---	341	-----	232,200	-----	945,450
Job.....	--	34	-----	293,400	-----	151,900	---	333	-----	156,200	-----	431,000
Total printing.....	*19	60	*307,700	835,400	*199,716	807,935	*356	905	*154,428	530,100	*525,022	2,177,950
Type founding.....	1	1	25,000	14,000	6,250	5,000	16	12	4,824	7,000	24,000	25,000
Inks.....	--	2	-----	28,000	-----	35,000	---	16	-----	3,320	---	54,000
Book-binding.....	1	19	1,000	135,300	3,350	636,365	7	260	1,872	105,800	9,300	888,400

* The distinctions recognized in the census of 1870 were not followed in that of 1860.

will furnish the power and furnish work, more than enough to pay a small nominal rent." He accepted the proposition of Mr. Storey, and commenced operations in the rear of the Times Building, continuing eighteen months, when he removed to Calhoun Place, between Clark and Dearborn streets. In this place he was burned out by the fire of 1871. He leased a lot at No. 272 West Lake Street, and built, where he continued his business until May, 1884, when he removed to the rear of Nos. 13, 15, 17 and 19 North Elizabeth Street, where he probably has the largest manufactory of the kind in the West, and in which he employs thirty-five men. On January 19, 1858, he was married to Elizabeth A. Williams, who was born in Ulster, N. Y., in 1836. She died on January 3, 1859, and left three children—Samuel, Charles and William. He was again married, on February 16, 1862, to Frances Geddings. On April 10, 1853, he was elected, on the Republican ticket, a member of the City Council, to represent the Eleventh Ward. He represents the reform element in that body, and was a staunch supporter of the high-license reform movement which has brought

HISTORY OF THE PRESS.

In 1858, the leading newspapers of Chicago were The Democrat, The Daily Journal, The Tribune, The Democratic Press, The Times, and the Illinois Staats

B. A. Washburn

Zeitung. There was also The National Democrat, an administration paper, succeeded later by The Herald, and the Union, an evening paper. They were all party papers, depending on party for maintenance, and yielding in return unhesitating party allegiance. The Democrat, the Journal, the Tribune, the Press and the Staats Zeitung occupied the same ground substantially as to the slavery question, were all in alliance with the Republican party, and were prosperous papers. With the beginning of the year 1858, the Journal, the Tribune and the Press announced that subscriptions must thereafter be paid in advance. On July 1, of the same year, the Tribune and the Democratic Press were consolidated under the name of The Press and Tribune, each paper being valued at $100,000. John L. Scripps and William Bross were owners of the Press, and subscribers and advertisers who have always remained constant to it. Charles L. Wilson was sole proprietor,

Charles L. Wilson

Andrew Shuman, editor, George P. Upton, local and commercial reporter, and Benjamin F. Taylor, literary editor.

CHARLES L. WILSON was born in Fairfield County, Connecticut, October 10, 1818. He was the son of John Quintard Wilson, at one time a prominent lawyer in New York City, afterward removing to Connecticut, where he was appointed a judge. His education was obtained in the common schools and academy of his native county. Completing such studies as these afforded, by the time he was seventeen, he looked out upon the West as presenting the greatest resources for him, and in September, 1835, found himself in Chicago. For the next ten years his life was passed in mercantile pursuits, but his brother, Richard L., having become the owner and editor of the Evening Journal, in 1845 Charles became associated with him as editor and in the ownership of the paper. Richard Wilson died in 1856, and Charles then became the sole owner of the Evening Journal. Mr. Wilson was active in the support of the Republican party, and was a warm adherent of Abraham Lincoln in the senatorial contest of 1858. In the Republican convention of 1860 he advocated the nomination of William H. Seward for the presidency, but when Mr. Lincoln was nominated supported him with enthusiasm. In 1861, Mr. Lincoln appointed him Secretary of Legation at London, in which position he remained until 1864, meantime leaving the Journal in charge of his brother,

Mary Tomlin's

Charles H. Ray, Joseph Medill and Alfred Cowles, owners of the Tribune.

Of the papers mentioned, the Democrat was the oldest. Its earlier history is given in our first volume. It had been a Democratic paper up to the time of the Kansas-Nebraska issue, but when the slavery question was again raised, it assisted in the formation of the Republican party. John Wentworth was both its owner and editor, and its columns were characterized by his self-assertion and independence. It supported Lincoln in the senatorial campaign of 1858, and again in the presidential campaign of 1860. When the Civil War broke out, it ardently supported the cause of the Union. In the spring of 1860, Wentworth was again elected mayor, and at the close of his term, determined

John L. Wilson

John L. Wilson, as business manager, and Andrew Shuman, as editor. Under this able management, the paper prospered greatly, and when Mr. Wilson returned from London in 1864 he found that his paper had become a very valuable property. In July, 1869, he married Miss Caroline F. Farrar, sister of Colonel Henry W. Farrar, who was at this time associated with the Journal as business manager. In 1875, Mr. Wilson's health began to fail, and in March, 1878, he died in San Antonio, Texas, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health. He left surviving him his wife and one daughter.

ANDREW SHUMAN, the son of Jacob and Margaret Shuman, was born November 8, 1830, in Lancaster County, Penn. He received a common school education, and at the age of fourteen was apprenticed to the printing business in the office of the Lancaster Union and Sentinel. He remained there until 1846, when he accompanied his employer to Auburn, N. Y., who went to take charge of the Daily Advertiser, the organ of William H. Seward. He continued working at the newspaper business until 1850, when he determined to procure a more complete education, and, during that year, prepared himself to enter Hamilton College, which he did in 1851. He remained at college until the fall of 1853, when, at the instance of some of the political friends of Mr. Seward, he assumed the editorship of the Daily Journal, Syracuse, N. Y., and remained in charge of that paper until July, 1856, when he became assistant editor of the Chicago Evening Journal. In 1855, he married Miss Lucy B. Dunlap, of Ovid, N. Y. They have one daughter. Mr. Shuman has held some public positions. He was Commissioner of the Illinois State Penitentiary at Joliet, from 1865 till 1871, and in 1876 was elected Lieutenant-Governor of Illinois. He ranks among the foremost journalists of Chicago, and is justly entitled to a large share of the credit for the success of the Evening Journal.

The reputation of the Journal is that of quiet and staid respectability. No one ever found in it any highly flavored articles, bordering on the licentious or the obscene. It is well informed, conservative, and judicious, serving the Republican party with faithfulness, but never advocating the extremely radical measures of the doctrinaires of that party. Messrs. Wilson and to retire from journalism. He had occupied the editorial chair for a quarter of a century, and felt himself entitled to a rest. On the 24th of July, 1861, the last number of the Democrat was issued, and its editor made his farewell address to his patrons. He did not, in terms, sell his paper. He sold his subscription lists, advertising, job work, patronage and good will to the Tribune, with the agreement that he was not to publish a newspaper until after the 1st of March, 1864. Thus, the Tribune absorbed its two rivals, became the sole morning Republican newspaper, and laid the foundations for the splendid property it was subsequently.

C. H. Ray

Horatio Hill

Taking the leading newspapers in their order of age, we commence with the Daily Journal, more widely known as

THE CHICAGO EVENING JOURNAL.—With the year 1858, the Evening Journal commenced its long career of prosperity. It adopted the principle of advance payment for subscriptions, and obtained a clientele of Shuman were both admirers of William H. Seward, and were impressed by his character. They deemed him a wise and judicious statesman. They belonged to his school, and the political tone of the Journal was keyed, so far as was possible, on the ideas and utterances of the great New Yorker. The Journal was an earnest supporter of Lincoln's administration during the War; favored Andrew Johnson until his rupture with Congress, and supported Grant's first and second administrations. It has never been in advance of its party, but, when the issues are made, marches well in line. It favors a protective tariff.

OLIVER HAZARD PERRY was born at Rochester, N.Y., in 1830, and was educated at that city and at Lockport, Ill., whither his family removed in 1847. He commenced his apprenticeship to the art of printing on the Will County Telegraph, the first newspaper published at Lockport. In 1851, he came to Chicago, and became connected with the Democrat as a printer, and remained on that paper until its publication ceased in 1861, when he entered the Journal office. In 1866, he became city editor of that paper, and, after the retirement of Benjamin F. Taylor, the literary editor. For about a year after the great fire he edited the North-Western Railway Traveler, published in the interests of the North-Western Railway Company. He then returned to the Journal, and has been continuously with it from that time. He was married, in 1870, to Miss Julia Vanderveek, of Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Perry has fine literary taste and judgment, and his criticisms are marked by good feeling and discrimination.

JAMES CHISHOLM was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1838, and received his education in that famous city. He came to the United States in 1864, and took up his residence in Chicago. He commenced journalism on the Times as a reporter, and, in 1865, joined the Tribune. After the fire, he became connected with the Inter Ocean, then with the Indicator, and, a few years later, with the Journal. Most of his journalistic work has been in the line of dramatic criticism. He was married, in 1871, to Miss Mary E. Garrison, of Chicago.

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE.—Ablly conducted and edited, enterprising in news-gathering, always partisan, the Chicago Tribune, during the period of which we now write, was the most prominent and most successful newspaper in the West. It had the merit of being on the popular side of the great political and social questions of the times. Its constituency was composed of the educated and progressive people of the Northwest, whose sentiments and opinions it reflected ably. In the campaigns of 1858 and 1860, it pursued Senator Douglas with exceeding bitterness, but when that statesman lay dead at the Tremont House, it paid a just and glowing tribute to his memory. It took a decided stand on the tangled currency that afflicted the people of the State from 1858 to 1862, on the War for the Union, on emancipation, on re-construction, on the impeachment of Johnson. During the War, it never for one moment faltered in the belief that the Union arms would be successful—never from first to last counseled peace on any other terms than entire submission. It was among the first, if not the very first, newspaper to urge the emancipation of the slaves. It opposed the impeachment of Johnson as unwise and impolitic, and advocated Congressional re-construction. On lesser and local questions it was usually in accord with its party, and believed the shield to be silver or gold, as the party decreed.

Its editors and chief writers during this time were William Bross, Dr. Charles H. Ray, John L. Scripps, Joseph Medill, Horace White and James W. Sheahan. Mr. Scripps was appointed postmaster in 1861, when his editorial connection with the paper ceased, and, in January, 1865, he sold out his stock to Horace White, who at that time became editor-in-chief.

TRIBUNE BUILDING AND RUINS.

After the consolidation with the Press, the paper was called the Press and Tribune until 1861, when the word Press was dropped, and the following winter the Legislature of Illinois granted a charter to Charles H. Ray, Joseph Medill, Alfred Cowles, John L. Scripps, and William Bross, and their successors, under the name of the Tribune Company, with a capital of $200,000.

The paper continued to be published at No. 51 Clark Street until the year 1868, when it removed into a new and handsome building, erected by the Tribune Company, on the southeast corner of Madison and Dearborn streets. The building was of Joliet marble, four stories high, and cost $225,000.

WILLIAM BROSS is one of those early and prominent residents of Chicago, who has grown with the city's growth. Although he is now in his seventy-second year, his mind is still active and he takes as great an interest in the wonderful progress of his city as when he was much younger. From the formation of the Republican party, he has supported its principles and policy with a bold and trenchant pen, and during the War assisted in raising troops, and has rendered the organization most effective service. Mr. Cross may be said to be the father of commercial journalism in Chicago, that feature of the daily press which has done more than all else to attract the solid wealth and enterprise of other localities to this city. But his labors as a journalist even antedate his record as a commercial editor, and he stands to-day as one of the oldest and best-known representatives of the press in the city. William Cross was born near Port Jervis, N. J., November 4, 1813, and when nine years of age removed with his family to Milford, Penn. There he lived until early manhood and received his academic education. In 1834, he entered Williams College, graduating four years later with high honor. Mr. Cross was so thorough in the classics, sciences and history, that he was at once called to take charge of Kidebury Academy, near his birth-place. He also taught at Chester for some years. He arrived in Chicago on May 12, 1848, and has since continuously resided here. He became a member of the book-selling firm of Griggs, Cross & Co., disposing of his interest the next year. Afterward, with Rev. J. A. Wight, D. D., he published the Prairie Herald. In September, 1852, he united with John L. Scripps in founding the Democratic Press, and under his able management it became a power. When the Republican party was formed, in 1854, he espoused its doctrines, and upheld them faithfully and consistently with voice and pen, delivering his first political speech in Dearborn Park, to indorse the nomination of General John C. Fremont to the presidency. He was elected a member of the City Council in 1855, and was the recognized commercial champion of the city's prosperity. During the War, especially, Mr. Cross made for himself a distinctive place as one of the bravest defenders of the Republican policy. He assisted in raising the 29th regiment of Colored Volunteers, which was commanded by his brother, Colonel John A. Cross, who was killed at Petersburg, Va., July 30, 1864. He also aided in discovering the rebel conspiracy by which it was proposed, in November of that year, to release the prisoners at Camp Douglas, burn the city of Chicago, and commit other depredations. In the fall of 1864, his services to the State were publicly recognized by his election to the position of lieutenant-governor of Illinois. He continued to act through two regular and one extra sessions, adding to his reputation as an orator of broad scope. For the past thirty years Mr. Cross has been more or less actively engaged in every State canvass. He is still closely identified with the Chicago Tribune. After the great fire, he was among those who took the lead in bringing relief to the stricken city, and was the first citizen of Chicago who presented her needs to the business men of the East; his graphic and pathetic statement, made to the New York Tribune, was the first considerable account of the fire given to the press of that city. His address before the relief committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce had an immense circulation and did much to inspire confidence in the early restoration of the city. Mr. Cross was married, in 1839, to the only daughter of Dr. John T. Jansen, of Goshen, N. Y. Only one of their eight children now survives—Mrs. Henry D. Lloyd, whose husband is an editorial writer on the Tribune. Two events in the life of Governor Cross are especially noteworthy. The amendment to the Constitution submitted by Congress to the States, abolishing slavery in the United States, was passed January 31, 1865. The resolution for its adoption was passed the next day by the Illinois Legislature, and hence his name as presiding officer of the Senate, with that of the Speaker of the House, stands first among all the States to that immortal document. All the infamous black laws of Illinois were repealed during the session of 1865, and his name was gladly affixed to them, as the representative of a free people. In 1863, he visited the Rocky Mountains with Vice-President Colfax. During the trip he ascended Mount Lincoln with a party of miners, and, in his honor, they named a mountain in the same range, only a mile or two from it, after their champion. Only a deep gorge partly separates them. Mount Lincoln is 14,297 feet high; Mount Cross, 14,185. The Dolly Varden and the Moose mines, two of the best-known and most valuable properties in Colorado, are on Mount Cross. That his name should be thus intimately associated with that of Lincoln, always his personal friend, among the highest peaks upon the continent, is an honor which any man might covet.

Wm. D. Phelps

JOHN LOCKE SCRIPPS was born on February 27, 1818, in Jackson County, Mo., a short distance from Cape Girardeau. During his infancy his parents moved to Rushville, Ill., where he received his early education. He graduated at McKendree College, Lebanon, Ill., and a short time subsequently studied law, and arrived in this city in 1847, to utilize his study by practice. In 1848, he purchased a one-third interest in the Tribune, and sold that interest in 1852, and then assisted in the inauguration of the Democratic Press. In 1861, Mr. Scripps was appointed postmaster of Chicago by President Lincoln, who was a warm personal friend of his; and therein, for four years, Mr. Scripps performed the duties incumbent upon him with singular ability, so that he earned the title of the best postmaster the city ever had. During the War he organized, equipped and dispatched to the front Co. "C," 72d Illinois Volunteer Infantry, bearing the expenses from his personal funds. In honor of him, this company was known as the "Scripps Guards." After his retirement from the office of postmaster, he became senior partner in the banking-house of Scripps, Preston & Kean, and shortly thereafter lost his wife, Mary E. Scripps, who died from heart disease on New Year's day, 1866, while dispensing the hospitalities of her home that are usual on that day. This loss fell upon Mr. Scripps with terrible force, and it preyed upon his mind so that his life was for some little time in imminent danger. He, however, rallied, and, by the energy and force of his will, made himself well temporarily, during which he paid some visits in Minnesota; but while in Minneapolis his corporeal system again asserted its debilitation, and with fatal effect. He died at that city on Friday, September 21, 1866. Of him Horace White thus justly wrote: "In the death of Mr. Scripps, Chicago has lost one of her noblest men. No citizen of this or any other community ever commanded a more hearty and thorough respect from his fellows than he. Candor, integrity and courage were the marked traits of his character. He feared God, but feared no man. He would no more have thought of compromising a principle, or abating an iota of his personal honor, than he would have committed suicide. With a heart full of kindness for all men, with a lofty sense of the properties of life and of intercourse with his fellow-men, a house ever open to the calls of hospitality, and a purse which never failed to respond to the call of suffering, he was the firmest man among ten thousand to the convictions of his conscience. A mean act, an unworthy motive, a cowardly thought, had no room in his soul. He was not insensible to public approbation, but never for an instant would he resort to the arts so common among politicians to secure popularity. He avoided the very appearance of evil. His uprightness of character and urbanity of demeanor had made him hosts of friends in city and State, and it is not too much to say that, in the meridian of his life, with his ample fortune, his unswerving record and his conspicuous talents he might have aspired to almost any position in the gift of his fellow-citizens."

DR. CHARLES II. RAY was born at Norwich, Chenango Co., N. V., on March 12, 1821, and came to the West in 1843, first settling in Muscatine, Iowa, where he practiced medicine, and afterward settling in Tazewell County, Illinois, where he also practiced his profession. During this period, also, he married Miss Jane Vates Per-Lee, who died in this city in June, 1862. In 1851, Dr. Ray removed to Galena, and purchased the Jeffersonian, a daily Democratic paper, which he conducted with personal and financial success until the period of the Kansas-Nebraska imbroglio, when his ineradicable love for personal liberty necessitated his antagonizing Stephen A. Douglas, and his identifying himself with the Republican party. In 1854-55, Dr. Ray was Secretary of the State Senate of Illinois, and as such presided during the heated canvass which resulted in the election of Lyman Trumbull to the United States Senate in lieu of his opponent, Abraham Lincoln. After the adjournment of the Legislature, Dr. Ray came to Chicago, contemplating the establishing of a penny Republican paper, and bringing with him a letter of introduction from Horace Greeley to Joseph Medill, who was contemplating locating in this city. Both these gentlemen arrived at about the same time, but after consultation, they determined upon purchasing the interests of General Webster and Timothy Wright in the Tribune. In April, 1855, Dr. Ray became editorially connected with the Tribune, but he did not purchase his interest therein until June, 1855. He remained a partner until November 20, 1863, when he severed his financial and editorial connection, with the view of engaging in speculation and achieving a fortune. In this design he was primarily very successful, and then married Miss Julia Clark, daughter of Judge Lincoln Clark, of Iowa, upon whom and his children he settled the moiety of his estate. Subsequently his investments proved unfortuitous, and he determined upon returning to journalism. He accordingly rejoined the Tribune as an editorial writer, on May 25, 1865, and remained there until August, 1865, when he again left the paper. In 1867, he was proffered a share in the Evening Post, which he accepted, and retained until his death on September 25, 1870.

HORACE WHITE was born in Colebrook, Coos Co., N. H., on August 10, 1834, the son of a prominent physician, who made a journey in a one-horse sled, in the winter of 1836-37, from New Hampshire to Wisconsin Territory, to find a location for a New England Colony, and who selected the site of the present city of Beloit as such locality. Thither he removed with his family in the summer of 1837, and there died in 1843, leaving a widow and four little children, Horace being the eldest. In 1846, Mrs. White married Deacon Samuel Hinman, and in 1849, Horace White entered Beloit College, from which he graduated with marked honors in 1853. In 1854, he came to Chicago and made his entry into journalistic life as local editor of the Evening Journal and, in 1855, having been appointed agent of the Associated Press he resigned his position on the Journal. In 1856, Mr. White was selected as assistant secretary of the Kansas National committee, their headquarters being in this city; which position Mr. White retained until 1857, performing excellent service with his facile pen for the committee. In 1857, he entered the office of the Tribune as an editorial writer, and in 1860 he was appointed secretary of the Republican State Central Committee of Illinois, retaining that position until 1864, and during which period Mr. White was special correspondent of the Tribune in Washington. In 1864, he bought an interest in the Tribune, and in the ensuing year became editor-in-chief, which position he retained until his retirement in November, 1874, when he made an extensive tour of the continent of Europe. Mr. White is a gentleman of comprehensive education and fine literary ability, which his studious habits and varied reading have enlarged and perfected. His jurisdiction in the editorial room of the Tribune resulted in an elegance of literary style that is rarely equaled, while his painstaking attention to detail maintained and perpetuated the accuracy which the paper had previously acquired, and which have given and preserved its prestige and influence.

JAMES WASHINGTON SHEAHAN was born in Baltimore, Md., of Irish parentage, and received his education at the Jesuit School, Frederick, Md. The following data are taken from the obituary, written by his friend and co-laborer George P. Upton, after Mr. Sheahan's death, on June 17, 1883. In 1847, he made his first visit to the West, to report the proceedings of the Illinois Constitutional Convention at Springfield, and there met Stephen A. Douglas, who suggested that he should inaugurate a Democratic newspaper in Chicago. This he subsequently did, as narrated in the preceding volume. In 1860, he sold the Times to Cyrus H. McCormick, and, in December, 1860, began the publication of the Post, which he sold in April, 1865, to the Republican Company, but remained in the office of that paper until 1866, when he joined the Tribune editorial staff, upon which he remained until the date of his death. In 1863, he was selected as one of the members of the School Board and retained that position until the close of 1864; and, during his term of service, he was unremitting in his efforts to reform the insufficient management and the defective methods that then hampered education in the public schools, and the methods that he propounded were largely adopted, subsequently, in the reformatory measures of the Board of Education. He was married, prior to his coming West, to Miss Drury, a sister of the artist. Of his talents and able manner of exhibiting them, Mr. Upton thus writes: "To a mastery of terse and incisive English he added a wonderful acquaintance with the field of politics, State and National, and of political economy. There were certain subjects which he had made his own, and where no others cared to try to cope with him. A lawyer by early education, a politician by training, a student of trade and finance by predilection, no one could have been better fitted for the editorial duties which devolved upon him. When his feelings were involved he was the master of a terrible satire, which drove his antagonists to despair. The editorial which he wrote for the Tribune at the time that Andrew Johnson came here to lay the corner-stone of the Douglas monument, was long remembered as the most biting statement of the incongruity of such a spectacle as was presented by the enemy of the dead Douglas coming here to try to do honor to his memory. Outside of the office, as well as in it, he was the pleasantest and most genial of companions, the embodiment of jest and anecdote and reminiscence, and the delight of the circles in which he moved and of the houses at which he was an honored guest. But of all others it was his juniors who took the most delight in his company, to whom he was ever the kindest, and who found in him the wise adviser as well as the cheerful companion." At the funeral, William F. McLaughlin, Thomas Hlyne, George P. Upton, Joseph Medill, James B. Kunnion, and Elias Colbert were pall-bearers, and a large number of prominent citizens attended the obsequies.

ELIAS COLBERT, the commercial editor of the Chicago Tribune, and one of the best-known journalists in Chicago, was born near Birmingham, England, and emigrated to the United States in 1857, coming direct to Chicago. He commenced his newspaper career as a reporter on the Daily News, founded by Alfred Dutch about that time, and sold at two cents, being the first cheap newspaper ever published in Chicago. It was a bright paper, but it encountered an insurmountable obstacle. There were but comparatively few cents in circulation. It was at a time, too, when the whole currency was in a deranged condition, when car-tickets, postage stamps and shipplasters of various degrees of goodness were used for small change. Nothing ran as low as two cents, and the Daily News, after a brief career, demised. He then formed a partnership with George Buckley, with whom he had studied photography in England, and organized the Northwestern Photographic Institute, with rooms in the Rice Block, on Dearborn Street. This was the first shorthand firm ever formed in the city, but R. R. Hitt had previously almost starved for want of patronage, and Henry Binmore had reported for the papers the debates between Lincoln and Bert then became a reporter on the city staff of the Times, and staid until the latter part of 1863, when he changed to the Tribune. He continued as a local reporter on that paper until August, 1866, when, on the departure of Mr. Ballantyne to the Republican, he succeeded that gentleman as commercial editor, which position he has filled most ably down to the present time. The annual reviews of trade and commerce, which for many years have been a prominent feature of the Tribune at the close of each year, have been the work of Mr. Colbert. His market reports and commercial summaries have always been highly valued, and he ranks among the foremost commercial statisticians of Chicago. In addition to his newspaper work, he has been an industrious student and writer on scientific and literary topics. He has published a history of Chicago, containing carefully gathered statistics of the growth and improvement of the city. He also wrote the major part of the work entitled, "Chicago and the Great Conflagration," published under the names of Colbert and Chamberlain. He was one of the principal contributors to the edition of 1873 of Appleton's American Cyclopaedia, writing the article on Chicago, and many others. He has also written for some of the leading magazines. But in addition to all this, he has been a profound student of astronomy, and, for many years, has been in charge of the observatory at the Chicago University, performing the duties of professor of astronomy, and he has written and published a number of works on astronomical subjects. "Astronomy without a Telescope" was published in 1869, and "Star Studies; What We Know of the Universe," in 1871. These two works had scarcely reached a prosperous sale before they were destroyed by the great fire. Since the fire, he has published an "Astronomy," "Fixed Stars," and "Mathematical Tables," all of which have met with deserved success. During the time he was taking care of the telescope and acting as professor of astronomy in the University, in addition to his daily work in the Tribune, he found time to deliver numerous lectures in city and country. Prominent among these were those delivered in the Exposition Building in the spring of 1874, where he repeated the Foucault Pendulum Experiment, proving that the earth "does move." This was done under the auspices of the Chicago Academy of Sciences. Mr. Colbert has contributed many articles to the Tribune on astronomical and scientific subjects, such as the calculation of eclipses, and, in 1880, of the orbit of the Clark companion of Sirius, with the deduction of a disturber moving inside that orbit. In 1881, he published in the Tribune, from one night's observations, a computation of the distance and size of the great comet of June, 1881; other prominent astronomers saying it could not be done. From 1873 until 1884, he prepared tables for the city to use in lighting street lamps, indicating the hours of moonlight, by which the city, during its financial straits in the early part of that period, saved from $30,000 to $40,000 a year. The city now uses a table prepared by him for sunlight alone. Another work published by him for private circulation is entitled "Scorie," which contains four productions which show extreme versatility and great genius. He is vice-president of the Astronomical Society of Chicago. He was president of the first Press Club ever formed in the city, organized in the fall of 1869, at which about eighty journalists were present. Mr. Colbert has two daughters living, one by a marriage in England, the other by his present wife, who was Miss Sarah Maria Cowper, of Chicago, whom he married in 1866.

GEORGE PUTNAM UPTON was born at Roxbury, Mass., October 25, 1834. After receiving the usual academic education, he entered Brown University, where he graduated in 1854, with honors, being the class poet of his year. Choosing a journalistic and literary career, his earliest contributions were made to the Waverly Magazine, the Flag of our Union, and the Boston Pilot, famous newspapers in their day, on which many a literary aspirant first tried his 'prentice hand. Turning his eyes westward, he joined the tide that was setting toward Chicago, and in 1855, commenced his journalistic career in this city. He first became a reporter on the Daily Native Citizen, a paper that had been started a short time previously as an organ of the American or Know Nothing party. It was owned by Simon B. Buckner, afterward the Confederate general from Kentucky, and was published by W. W. Danenhower. This paper gave up the ghost in the spring of 1856, and Mr. Upton joined the staff of the Evening Journal. Some contributions he made to the Journal, under the title of the Gummybag Papers, attracted a good deal of notice at the time. In the autumn of 1861, he took the local column of the Tribune, and has been connected with that paper ever since. He was a War correspondent of the Tribune during part of the year 1862, and wrote the accounts of the capture of Columbus, New Madrid, Island No. 10, and Fort Pillow. Illness compelled his return from the army, and he then became news, and afterward night editor of the Tribune. Fond of music and the drama, Mr. Upton has done a great service in Chicago, in awakening and cultivating an interest in those arts. He actively supported the Philharmonic Society, and has encouraged every effort to promote musical knowledge. He is one of the best known and fairest critics Chicago ever had. For many years he contributed a weekly article to the Tribune, under the pen-name of Peregrine Pickle, on art, music, the drama and cognate subjects, which were very popular and widely read. They were afterward published in book form and met with ready sale. He was first married, in 1833, to Miss Sarah E. Bliss, of Chicago, who died in 1876. He was again married in 1881, to Miss Genevieve S. Ward. In addition to his journalistic work he has been a constant contributor to the magazines, writing on all his favorite topics, and also on numismatics, in which at one time he took a great interest and made a fine collection of coins. In collaboration with J. W. Sheahan, he wrote a book called Chicago, its Past, Present and Future. His published works are the Peregrine Pickle letters, Woman in Music, a translation of the Life of Haydn, a Life of Wagner, a Life of Liszt and Max Müller's Deutsche Liebe, under the English title of Memories. He is engaged upon a Handbook of Opera.

THE CHICAGO TIMES.—The history of the Chicago Times is the history of progressive journalism in the West. It was the main life-work of one man, and in no particular can it be disjoined from him. It is therefore in a narrative of the life of Wilbur F. Storey that we find the story of the rise and progress of the Chicago Times

WILBUR F. STOREY was born in Salisbury, Vt., on the 19th of December, 1819. His father was a farmer, and Mr. Storey's early years were passed on a farm. At the age of twelve, he commenced to learn the trade of printing in the office of the Middlebury, (Vt.) Free Press. At the age of seventeen, he considered his knowledge of the trade sufficient for more extensive fields, and left his paternal home and started on his career. After a year and a half in New York City, where he worked on the Journal of Commerce, he found himself in LaPorte, Ind., embarking in his first newspaper enterprise. In conjunction with Edward Hannegan, then a prominent politician, and afterward United States Senator from Indiana, he began the publication of the LaPorte Herald. It was not successful, Mr. Hannegan was not suited to editorial work, the partnership was dissolved, and after about a year the Herald ceased to exist. His next venture was as editor of the Toesin, a Democratic paper published at Mishawaka, Ind., and there he remained a year and a half. He then went to reside with a sister, Mrs. Farrand, at Jackson, Mich., where he read law for two years. Aided by his brother-in-law, Mr. Farrand, he started the Jackson Patriot, and this was his first journalistic success. He then became an active politician, and President Polk appointed him postmaster at Jackson. He disposed of his newspaper, and, in 1849, when President Taylor removed him from the postmastership, he entered upon business of druggist, grocer and stationer. He had married, in 1847, Miss Maria Isham, a lady of fine character and attainments, and by her had one child, which lived only to be a year old. While a resident of Jackson, he also united with the Congregational Church. Afterward, on account of some question arising as to the sale in his drug store of alcoholic preparations, he withdrew from the church, and never after became connected with any religious body. In 1853, he removed to Detroit, and became half-owner of the Detroit Free Press, and subsequently its sole owner. It was a Democratic paper, without support, influence or circulation, and he made it one of the best and most influential papers in the State. In eight years he fully paid for it and cleared $30,000 besides. This great success awakened his ambition for a wider field of action. After canvassing the chances in several of the large cities, he chose Chicago, and on the 1st of June, 1861, he purchased the Chicago Times.

The Times was founded in 1854 by Isaac Cook, James W. Sheahan and Daniel Cameron. Mr. Sheahan conducted it until the summer of 1860, when it was purchased by Cyrus H. McCormick, who was also the owner of the Herald. The Herald had been founded in 1858, to represent the Buchanan, or administration, democracy. Mr. McCormick consolidated the two papers under the name of the Herald and Times, intending eventually to drop the name Times. He placed E. W. McCormas in editorial charge, a journalist from Virginia, and the paper then became an exponent of Southern democracy. The paper was then published in the fifth story of the McCormick Block, on the corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets. The circulation was but little over one thousand, with no advertising patronage worth mentioning. In a very short time these quarters were found to be too small, and a removal was made to No. 74 Randolph Street, and the paper began to assume that enterprise and audacity which were henceforth to be its chief characteristics. Mr. Storey brought the larger part of his staff from Detroit. John L. Chipman, editorial writer; Harry M. Scovel, news editor; Warren J. Isham, his brother-in-law, city editor; H. B. Chandler, business manager; and A. L. Patterson, assistant bookkeeper, and afterward business manager.

After the proclamation of emancipation, the Times ceased to favor the prosecution of the War, and was bitter in its denunciation of the administration. Mr. Chipman left the editorial chair, and his place was filled by M. L. Hopkins. The paper soon earned the designation of "copperhead sheet," and there was an intense hostility aroused against it and its owner. It was a time of terrible passion. Mr. Storey was regarded as such a moral monster, that any means which would remove him from the face of the earth would be justifiable. On the morning of the 3d of June, 1863, a file of soldiers marched into the press-room and took possession of the establishment. About eight thousand papers had been printed, a part of which were destroyed, but the larger part were issued. General Ambrose E. Burnside, in command of the Department of the Northwest, with headquarters at Cincinnati, had issued an order for the suppression of the Times, and the commander at Camp Douglas was charged with the execution of the order. A great mass meeting was held in the Court-house Square on the evening of June 3, which was addressed by General Singleton, of Quincy, Wirt Dexter, E. G. Asay, B. G. Caulfield, and many others, in advocacy of free speech and a free press, the leaders counseling moderation until the matter could be heard in the courts. A meeting was also held during the day in the Circuit Court room, at which, were present many prominent Republicans and business men, among whom were William B. Ogden, Van H. Higgins, Corydon Beckwith, Judge Dickey, Samuel W. Fuller, Wirt Dexter, James F. Joy, Senator Lyman Trumbull and Isaac N. Arnold. A petition to the President to revoke the order was signed by all present, and Trumbull and Arnold telegraphed personally to Mr. Lincoln to the same effect. Judge David Davis was also active in procuring the revocation. The order was revoked by the President. The paper was issued on the 2d of June; it was revoked on the 4th. Part of the issue of the 3d and all of the 4th of June were suppressed. On the 5th, publication was resumed.

These events proved of great financial benefit to the Times. Its circulation and advertising patronage were largely increased. That Mr. Storey afterward felt that his course during the War had been a mistake is evidenced by the remark he subsequently made: "After this, the Times will support all wars the country may undertake."

In the fall of 1863, Franc B. Wilkie joined the editorial staff of the paper.

FRANC B. WILKIE was born in Saratoga County, New York, July 2, 1830. His early years were spent on a farm, and his primal education was such as could be procured in the winter district schools. At the age of eighteen he went to learn the trade of a blacksmith, but, after a year and a half, gave it up, resolving to educate himself. Resuming work on a farm as a means of livelihood, he spent his leisure hours in diligent study, receiving the occasional assistance of a village clergyman, and, after several years, fitted himself to enter the sophomore class of Union College. He entered in the spring of 1853 and remained until the following spring, when he received an offer to take editorial charge of the Schenectady Star, which he accepted. He had been a contributor to the paper since his entrance at college. His duties embraced every kind of work about a newspaper, from setting type to writing all the copy. This engagement lasted until the fall of 1856, when he went to Davenport, Iowa, to start a Democratic paper called the Daily News. With this enterprise he was connected something over a year, when he sold out, and devoted several months to writing a book called "Davenport, Past and Present." During his residence in Davenport, Mr. Wilkie was married to Miss Ellen Morse, a daughter of John Morse, of Elgin, Ill., a lady of culture and attractive social qualities. They have had one son, John E. Wilkie, born in 1860. Leaving Davenport in the summer of 1858, Mr. Wilkie published a campaign paper at Elgin, Ill., in the interest of Stephen A. Douglas, and at the conclusion of the campaign accepted a position on the editorial staff of the Dubuque Herald. At the breaking out of the Civil War he accompanied the 1st Iowa regiment on its campaign in Missouri, as correspondent of the Herald. At Macon City the regiment came upon a deserted newspaper office, and Mr. Wilkie at once organized a force and published the paper, a feat that attracted very wide notice, and brought him an offer from the New York Times to become its correspondent. His letters to that paper, signed Galway, were among the best of the War correspondence of the time. Another of his Missouri exploits was both daring and unique. General Price, with a large force of Confederates, was besieging General Mulligan at Lexington, Mo., it was supposed, would soon be forced to surrender. Mr. Wilkie was in St. Louis when he heard of the state of affairs at Lexington, and he determined to report the battle from the rebel side. With considerable difficulty he reached Price's camp, announced his mission, and was allowed to enter. Price, becoming satisfied that he was a non-combatant, accorded him every facility; and although he ran a good deal of personal risk from reckless or drunken rebel soldiers, who looked upon him as a spy, he remained until Mulligan surrendered, and sent a full report to the Times. This service drew from Raymond a highly complimentary editorial notice, and secured his promotion to chief correspondent of the Times in the West. In this position he reported the campaign of General Grant, from the fall of Fort Henry until the surrender of Vicksburg, when he resigned, intending to put in book-form, for a Cincinnati publishing house, his experiences in the War. While the negotiations with the publishers were pending, Warren J. Isham, of the Chicago Times, was lost in the wreck of the "Sunbeam," in Lake Superior, and Mr. Storey offered Mr. Wilkie the vacant position, which was at once accepted. Mr. Wilkie's work upon the Times has been extremely versatile. Though editorial writing has been his chief work, he has done a vast amount of special correspondence, and has visited all parts of the Union and many parts of Europe as a correspondent of the Times. He has contributed to the Times many special articles, descriptions of various phases of life, sketches of the Bench and Bar of Chicago, as well as many translations, from the French, of tales, sketches and paragraphs, some of these being both felicitous and racy. He has published, in book-form, Walks about Chicago and other sketches, Sketches beyond the Sea, Sketches of the Bench and Bar, and a History of Inventions, all of which have met with an extended sale. Mr. Wilkie's style is strongly marked with cynical humor, and he can rail in good set terms at all the world. He entered fully into all the audacities of the Times and was no more discriminating than his chief as to where his blows fell, so that they only fell hard. He excels as a reporter or descriptive writer, is always picturesque and readable. His studies have been in the direction of modern science and political economy, rather than in politics and history. He has an excellent knowledge of the French and Italian languages, in the former of which he converses fluently.

HARRY M. SCOVEL was born at Albany, New York, on March 2, 1831. When he was but six years of age his father removed to Detroit, and there the early years of young Scovel were passed. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed as a printer, and, his tastes being literary, after serving some years as a compositor, he laid down the stick and took up the scissors and the pen. In 1853, he was associated with Mr. Storey on the editorial staff of the Free Press; and when Mr. Storey purchased the Chicago Times in 1861, Mr. Scovel accompanied him to Chicago, to accept the position of news editor on that paper. He remained on the Times until 1865, when he joined the Republican, staying one year on that paper, and then returned to the Times, and continued until 1869. In 1869, he accepted the news editorship of the Tribune, and has remained on that paper ever since. He also edits the Weekly Tribune. He has served for over forty years in the offices of morning newspapers, most of the time as news and exchange editor. He was married, in 1850, at Detroit, and has two daughters.

Mr. Storey's treatment of his editorial staff was peculiar. He never selected their subjects nor dictated what they should write. He assumed when he employed a writer, that he knew how to write and understood the spirit of the paper. What they wrote they submitted to him. What he did not like, he threw into the waste basket with some biting comment; what he liked, he published without word of commendation. He was a just employer, often generous, but he never had the least word of praise even for the most faithful service. His intercourse with those he employed was confined strictly to the business in hand, and he never wasted the least courtesy on the most important of them. They were simply parts of a great machine, of which he was the engineer, and he would as soon have exchanged courtesies with one of his great presses as with one of his assistants. He was a solitary man, with one principal thought, to make a great and successful newspaper.

The close of the war found the Times one of the most prosperous newspapers in the city, and it was compelled to enlarge its quarters and press facilities. In 1866, a new building with a stone front was erected on the northwest corner of Dearborn Street and Calhoun Place. It was five stories in height, and intended expressly for the Times. A. Worden, of Michigan, had been taken in as a partner, but, in 1865, he sold out his interest. Before removing to Dearborn Street, Henry B. Chandler, the business manager, was admitted as a partner. In 1870, Mr. Storey became the sole owner of the paper.

In 1867, Andre Matteson joined the editorial force of the Times for the second time.

ANDRE MATTESON was born in Chautauqua County, New York, September 4, 1827. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of New England, first in Connecticut and afterwards in Vermont. After receiving a common school education, young Matteson commenced to learn the art of printing, at which he served two years, and then completed his education at the Westfield Academy. Thus equipped, at the age of nineteen, he made his way to Buffalo, where he was employed for a time in a printing office, at times writing for the newspapers. Receiving an offer from Colonel Curtis, of The Wisconsin, a newspaper published in Milwaukee, to come West and take charge of the job office of that paper, he remained there two or three years. About 1850 he removed to Chicago, and was connected, for a short time, with the Evening Journal as commercial reporter, and subsequently with the Western Citizen, published by Zebina Eastman. In 1853, Mr. Matteson took a trip into Iowa and Minnesota, with some view of settling either at Dubuque or Winona. He returned to Chicago in 1854, about the time Cook, Cameron and Sheahan started the Chicago Times. He became city editor of the Times, under its first management, and remained in that position until the paper was sold to Mr. McCormick. In December, 1860, in partnership with Mr. Sheahan, he founded the Chicago Morning Post, and continued as one of the editors of that paper until its sale to the Republican in the spring of 1865. For the next two years he was employed on the Evening Post as an editorial writer, and in 1867 accepted a position on the editorial staff of the Times, which he has held continuously for eighteen years. During his connection with the Post he studied law, and was regularly examined and admitted to practice in the courts of Illinois. He has a knowledge of French and German, and is a very excellent Spanish scholar. He has been twice married; his first wife died two years after marriage, and, in 1856, he was married to Miss Ellen C. McNaughton, by whom he has had two children.

After the presidential campaign of 1868, the Times ceased to be a party organ, claimed to be independent, and made many vigorous onslaughts on the Democratic party.

Associated with the Times of this period are other names that well deserve extended notice, did our space permit. Among these were James Goodsell, afterward one of the successful editors on the New York Graphic, Charles Wright, Alexander Botkin and others.

Such was the Times and such its owners, when, in a single night, it was swept away. The blow was paralyzing. Mr. Storey was now fifty-two years of age. The arduous labors of ten years were already telling upon his powerful physique. Calculating that he could save from the wreck $100,000, he determined to retire, and not again attempt what then seemed to him the labor of Sisyphus. How his resolution was overcome, and how the Times arose from its ashes, will be the province of our third volume to tell.

THE CHICAGO MORNING POST.—When James W. Sheahan and Andre Matteson severed their connection with the Times, on its sale to Cyrus H. McCormick, they at once made preparations to start a new Democratic paper, and, on December 25, 1860, the Morning Post appeared. F. A. Eastman was business manager, Sheahan and Matteson editorial writers. It was not as successful as its founders had hoped, and, in 1865, they sold out to the Republican Company, recently formed. The Post was a straightforward Democratic paper. It favored the War for the Union, but opposed emancipation and the radical programme.

THE CHICAGO REPUBLICAN.—Senator Alonzo W. Mack, of Kankakee, on the 16th of January, 1865, introduced in the Illinois Senate, at Springfield, a bill to incorporate a company for the publication of a newspaper in Chicago, to be called the Chicago Republican, and on the 13th of February following the bill duly became a law. It enacted that Ira Y. Munn, John V. Farwell, Joseph K. C. Forrest, J. Young Scammon, of Chicago; Jesse K. Dubois and Jacob Bunn, of Springfield; John Wood, of Quincy; J. Wilson Shaffer, of Freeport; Amos C. Babcock, of Canton; Alonzo W. Mack, of Kankakee; Francis A. Hoffman and Henry C. Childs, of DuPage County, and their associates, successors, and assigns, should be a body corporate and politic, under the name of "The Chicago Republican Company," with a capital of $500,000. Under this act the Company was duly organized and the stock subscribed, Jacob Bunn, a Springfield banker, and Jesse K. Dubois becoming the principal stockholders. Senator Mack was appointed publisher, and Charles A. Dana editor-in-chief.

CHARLES ANDERSON DANA was born at Hinsdale, N. H., August 8, 1819. He received a moderate education, passing two years at Harvard College, but did not graduate. In 1842, he became a member of the famous Brook Farm community at Roxbury, Mass. The enterprise did not fulfill the expectations of its founders, and Dana withdrew in 1844. He commenced his journalistic career in writing for the Harbinger, of Boston, a weekly journal devoted to social reform and general literature. In 1847, he became connected with the New York Tribune. George Ripley, one of his associates at Brook Farm, joined the Tribune at the same time, and, together, they edited the New American Cyclopaedia published by the Appletons, a work of great value, and edited with ability. For the four or five years preceding 1861, Mr. Dana was the managing editor of the New York Tribune, but resigned in 1862, when he became assistant Secretary of War, under Edwin M. Stanton. This position he occupied with distinguished ability until 1865; then he resigned, to accept the editorship of the Republican.

ALONZO W. MACK was a well-known politician from Kankakee County. He had been a member of the Legislature for many years. His life has been one of extraordinary activity, and he has gained prominence in the various careers of physician, lawyer, soldier, legislator and journalist. He was born at Morristown, Vt., in 1822. He received a common-school education, and, at the age of sixteen, came West, and settled in Kalamazoo County, Michigan, where he commenced the study of medicine. When twenty-two years of age he graduated at LaPorte, Ind., where he remained and where he married. He soon returned to Kalamazoo, and entered upon medical practice. After some years he removed to Kankakee, Ill., and was one of the early settlers of that place. In Kankakee he commenced to practice law, and entered upon his political career, becoming first a member of the lower house of the Legislature, and afterward a senator, representing Kankakee, Will and Grundy counties. In the summer of 1862, he organized the 76th Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and was appointed colonel. He accompanied the regiment, and served with it until January, 1863, when he resigned to resume his seat in the Senate. After he left the Republican he commenced the practice of law in Chicago, which he continued until his death, on the 4th of January, 1871.

The first move of the new company was to purchase the Morning Post, and, on the 29th of May, 1865, the initial number of the Chicago Republican saw the light. It was a handsome sheet, in quarto form, and in its make up very similar to the New York Times. It was a bright and attractive paper; and never did journalistic craft spread its sails before the winds of popular favor under more favorable auspices. It was backed by a large capital, had experienced journalists in charge, was on the popular side in politics, spared no expense in securing the news, and yet it did not succeed. It expounded protectionism most ably, but the high-tariff Republicans clung to the low-tariff Tribune. It uttered the most advanced sentiments of the most advanced wing of its party, but the radicals took in the Tribune. In the summer of 1866, Mr. Dana sold out, and returned to New York, and Jacob Bunn became the principal owner of the paper. VanBuren Denslow, Henry M. Smith, James F. Ballantyne and George D. Williston were then employed on the Tribune. They were all trained Western journalists and newspaper men. Bunn offered them stock in the newspaper. They left the Tribune. On the 6th of August, 1866, the Republican was issued under the new régime. J. Newton Higgins became general manager, representing the interest of Mr. Bunn, and Dr. Mack's connection with the paper was severed. James W. Sheahan, who up to this time had been an editorial writer on the Republican, now left it, and joined the forces of the Tribune. Mr. Denslow continued on the paper very nearly a year as editor-in-chief, when he retired, and his position was taken by James F. Ballantyne.

JAMES F. BALLANTYNE was one of the ablest journalists of this period. He was born at Glasgow, Scotland, in 1829, and at the age of nine years was apprenticed to the printing business. His education was such as the Scotch youth of his time received in the night schools and Mechanics' Institutes then flourishing. By the time he had reached the age of twenty he had mastered his business and had acquired an excellent practical education. But in his application to his trade and devotion to business he had implanted the seeds of that disease which was to cut him off in the the very prime of his manhood and forbid his reaping the fruits of years of arduous labor. In 1849, he emigrated to the United States, and worked at his trade for one year in New York. There he met and married Miss Joan Erie, also a native of Glasgow. He came to Chicago in the latter part of 1850. Here, for the next seven years, he was engaged in the publishing business, for a time in connection with Daniel O'Hara; but the panic of 1857 found him unprepared for a financial storm, and the publishing business stopped. He now commenced his career of journalism, on the Democratic Press as commercial editor, and so continued after that paper was consolidated with the Tribune. He was the first commercial editor in Chicago, and was the first to prepare the annual reviews of trade and commerce which have always been among the special features of the Chicago Tribune. Mr. Ballantyne remained on the Tribune until August, 1866, when he became commercial editor of the Republican, and the next year editor-in-chief. In this position he remained until May, 1869, when failing health compelled him to give up all work, and seek, in a trip to Europe, renewed health and strength. He returned in a few months without substantial benefit. Consumption had fatally seized him, and the few months of life remaining to him presented an unavailing struggle with the disease. In March, 1870, he went to San Diego, California, and died there July 12, 1870. He was buried in Chicago. The only public position he ever held was member of the Board of Education, from 1865 until the time of his death.

Henry M. Smith became the editor-in-chief of the Republican for a short period, and, in the fall of 1870, the Springfield capitalists becoming discouraged, the concern was sold to a new company, composed of Joseph B. McCullagh, John R. Walsh, Homer N. Hibbard and William H. Schuyler, and Messrs. Bunn and Dubois retired from journalism.

The paper was now reduced in size and sold for three cents. It was considered to be flourishing, and was undoubtedly under excellent management when the great fire swallowed it up. A worthless insurance policy and a Western Associated Press franchise were its principal assets.

Such is a brief history of the most remarkable venture in journalism ever attempted in Chicago. It had almost unlimited means, its editors and managers were men of great ability as journalists; it was in accord with a great party; it gave the news as fully as its rivals; its pages were attractive; it flourished at a period when the most insignificant newspapers made money; and yet it failed.

HENRY MARTYN SMITH was born in New Bedford, Mass., on May 5, 1830. He was educated at Amherst College, where he graduated in 1851. He came West the same year, and settled at Detroit, where he became a tutor in the family of Captain E. B. Ward. The next year he commenced the study of law, but soon abandoned the idea of adopting that profession. He came to Chicago in the autumn of 1852, and entered the office of the Evening Journal as reporter, and continued in the city department of that paper three years. In 1855, he became city editor of the Democratic Press, and on the consolidation of that paper with the Tribune, remained in the same position. In July, 1866, he became one of the stockholders of the Republican, and left the Tribune to become an editorial writer on that paper. After the great fire he returned East, and has been connected with various journalistic enterprises in Brooklyn and in Massachusetts.

GUY MAGEE was born in Philadelphia on July 23, 1842. His parents removed to Canada, where he was educated. In 1862, he came to Chicago and commenced his career in journalism as a reporter for the Tribune. In the last year of the War he went to the front as a War correspondent for that paper, and upon Mr. Ballantyne's retirement from the Tribune, took the position of commercial and financial reporter until May, 1868, when he joined the Republican as city editor. He remained until 1870, when he took the same position on the Times. After the great fire, he was associate editor for about a year of the Chronicle, an insurance paper. In the fall of 1872, he became telegraph editor of the Tribune, and remained until July, 1873, when he took the city editorship of the Inter Ocean. In July, 1876, he returned to the Tribune as assistant city editor. This position he held until October, 1883, when he resigned it to become city editor of the Times.

DAVID BLAKELY was born in East Berkshire, Franklin Co., Vt., in 1834. At the age of thirteen, he was apprenticed in a printing office, and after leaving the trade, entered the University of Vermont, where he graduated, in 1857. He then removed to Minnesota, where he entered upon journalism, and in 1862, after serving two terms as clerk of the Minnesota Legislature, became Superintendent of Public Instruction. In the autumn of 1865, in partnership with his brother, C. H. Blakely, he founded the Chicago Evening Post, which he conducted until after the great fire. The paper was Republican in politics.

JOSEPH K. C. FORREST, a brilliant author and journalist, is a native of Cork, Ireland, where he was born, November 26, 1820. His father, a man of high standing in that city, was a freeman and a burgess, and for thirty years was director of the house of Cummins Bros. & Co., one of the wealthiest mercantile firms in the country. He also conducted a farm, of six hundred acres, and a large plating-mill and tannery. Joseph's uncle, Philip Ryder, was, for thirty years, controller of customs for Cork, and his oldest brother, John L. Forrest, married one of the daughters of James Lane, formerly mayor of the city. Notwithstanding his high connections and his abilities, which would have gained him great honors in his native country, young Forrest determined to come to the United States. He arrived in Chicago, in July, 1840, and soon became assistant editor of the Journal, under Richard L. Wilson, afterward assuming the editorial management of the Gem of the Prairie, which paper was subsequently merged into the Tribune. It was, in fact, upon the urgent solicitation of Mr. Forrest, that the Tribune was so christened. Selling his interest in the establishment, he joined John Wentworth, as assistant editor of the Democrat, holding this position during 1846-47, and it was while acting in this capacity, that he was elected clerk of the Recorder's Court, over Philip A. Hoynes. He did not hold office again until the People's party was organized in 1873, when he was chosen city clerk. Of late years, Mr. Forrest has been connected with the Chicago Daily News, where his versatile pen and well-stored mind have added much to the value of that enterprising and able newspaper. His reputation as a writer rests, not a little, upon his productions on commercial and financial topics, in which specialties he is deeply read, and which he treats in a philosophical vein, rare in these days of superficiality. Mr. Forrest married Miss Sadie Calhoun, daughter of Alvin Calhoun. They had two daughters, Hattie and Lydia, who married, respectively, William G. Baxter and Harry Boore. Mrs. Baxter was one of the fairest and tenderest of women, and died in 1884. This was the greatest sorrow of the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Forrest, and from it they have never recovered. Descending the vale of life, these gentle, kindly old citizens of Chicago but use their reminiscences as memories of their lost daughter, and look forward to the expiration of their life's journey as being a re-union with her whose pure life was the sunbeam of their world. Whatever there may be of political antagonisms to "Joe" Forrest, not one who knows him but gives him and his wife their earnest sympathy and kindest, heartiest affection.

ZEBINA EASTMAN was born in North Amherst, Mass., September 8, 1815. At the age of fourteen he determined to become a printer, and with this purpose entered a printing office at Amherst as an apprentice. He soon displayed a decided capacity for the art, and made very rapid progress in it. Having remained at his apprenticeship for eighteen months, he realized that a better education was necessary for him to succeed as a journalist. He therefore left the printing office and entered the Hadley Academy, to prepare for college. While pursuing his studies his health failed, and he was forced to abandon his desire for a collegiate education, and went back to the printing business. When eighteen years of age he persuaded his guardian to advance him what was due of his inheritance, amounting to two thousand dollars, and with this capital he embarked in his first venture in journalism. He went to Fayetteville, Vt., and in company with a friend started the Vermont Free Press. The first issue was dated June 7, 1834, and it was kept going until the following spring, when the capital being exhausted, the paper failed. Meantime, he had become imbued with strong anti-slavery feelings, and he resolved to devote himself to the cause of human freedom. In 1837, he emigrated to the West, stopping for a year or two at Ann Arbor, Mich., then, passing through Chicago, settled at Peoria, where he worked for a time on the Peoria Register. Subsequently he went to Lowell, LaSalle County, where he joined the veteran abolitionist, Benjamin Lundy, in publishing a paper called the Genius of Universal Emancipation. Mr. Lundy soon dying, Mr. Eastman continued the publication of the paper for several months. In June, 1840, he married Miss Mary Jane Corning, of Burlington, Vt., to whom he had been affianced before he left that State three years before. He returned to Lowell, and, in partnership with Hooper Warren, published the Genius of Liberty, as successor to the Genius of Universal Emancipation, but, in 1842, on the invitation of some of the prominent abolitionists of Chicago, he removed there and started the Western Citizen, which became the leading anti-slavery organ of the Northwest. In 1853, the name of the paper was changed to that of the Free West. It lasted but comparatively a short time, for the slavery question was rapidly coming up as the one commanding issue on which the States and the people were dividing, and the great and prosperous newspapers were becoming the exponents of freedom. The work of the abolitionists, as such, was nearly accomplished. In 1850, Mr. Eastman was appointed delegate for Illinois to the World's Peace Congress, at Frankfort, Germany. There he made valuable acquaintances, and among others Elihu Burritt, the "Learned Blacksmith." It was through the influences of Mr. Eastman that the abolition vote was thrown for Elihu B. Washburne, in 1852, thus electing him over his democratic opponent. In 1856, the Liberty party was practically merged in the Republican party, and a distinctive organ being no longer necessary, the Free West subscription list was transferred to the Chicago Tribune. From this time, Mr. Eastman became an active supporter of the Republican party, and did much to bring the abolitionists in accord with it. His services were appreciated and recognized, and after the election of Abraham Lincoln, he received the appointment of consul to Bristol, England. Prior to this, in 1857, Mr. Eastman attempted the publication of the Chicago Magazine, but for lack of support it lasted but five months. Mr. Eastman remained at Bristol for eight years, and was admirably fitted for the position. His services during the period of the Civil War were highly appreciated by his Government. On his return to the United States he took up his residence at Elgin, where he remained about four years, when he removed to the village of Maywood. The succeeding years were passed in literary pursuits, but failing health prevented any sustained effort in any direction. He died at Maywood, on the 14th of June, 1883.

Some writers who attained distinction during the period covered by this volume, were as follows:

"JANUARY SEARLE." This was the nom de plume of George S. Phillips, who was on the Tribune staff in 1863. He was the author of The Gypsies of the Dane's Dyke, and of a book descriptive of the churches of this city.

JOEL H. WICKER, a lawyer, and a brother of Charles G. Wicker, wrote extensively for the Times previous to 1859.

ALBERT H. BOGDAN was an employé of Alfred Dutch on the Daily News, afterward worked on the Tribune, and was then city clerk. He recently was engaged upon a patent inside.

I. NEWTON HIGGINS was on the editorial staff of the Times in 1863-64, and was then on the Republican. He subsequently went to California and was there employed on the Call.

HARRY GRIFFITHS was an assistant to Mr. Colbert on the Tribune in 1864-65, and afterward was engaged on the Republican. He was a brilliant writer, but his intemperate habits were his ruin.

"BEAU HACKNEY" was on the staff of the Times, and was esteemed a possible peer of Mark Twain. His death terminated his bright and flattering prospects.

S. V. R. HICKOX was on the Tribune from 1857 until 1872, being its agricultural editor for many years.

THE ILLINOIS STAATS ZEITUNG. — The Illinois Staats Zeitung stands foremost among the German newspapers of the West. Strongly allied to the Republican party on the question of slavery, it was of incalculable service in bringing the German-American voters of the Northwest to the support of the party and thus promoting its success. Its editors have all been men of ability and influence, and, in later years, the frequent revolts of the Germans from allegiance to the Republican party have been largely due to the sentiments of independence inculcated by the Staats Zeitung. But, during the formative period of the party, and in the campaign that resulted in the election of Mr. Lincoln, the Staats Zeitung was a power that deserved and received consideration from the highest party magnates.

In 1861, at the time of the outbreak of the civil war, Mr. Schneider, then editor of the Staats Zeitung, was appointed consul to Denmark, principally on account of his having sent a memorial through a committee, headed by Mr. Larned and others, to President Lincoln, to influence the press in the northern part of Europe—at that time prejudiced by the utterances of the London Times—in favor of the Union. Mr. Schneider, in fulfillment of his mission, in the fall of 1861, went to Hamburg, Bremen and Copenhagen, at which latter city the present Minister of Denmark to Washington, Mr. DeBille, was then editor and publisher of the Dag Bladet, and this gentleman was the first to change the tone of his paper relative to American politics, consequent upon appreciating the cogency of Mr. Schneider's arguments. In this year also Lorenz Brentano, who had previously been writing for the paper, bought Mr. Hoeffgen's interest, as Mr. Hoeffgen did not desire to remain in sole charge of the paper during Mr. Schneider's absence, and William Rapp was made editor of the paper. In the latter part of 1861, when Mr. Schneider returned from Europe, he sold his interest in the Staats Zeitung to Lorenz Brentano, and since that time he has been unconnected with any newspaper. At the time of its sale the paper had thirty-five hundred city subscribers, and had a Sunday as well as a weekly edition.

GEORGE SCHNEIDER was born in Pirmasens, Rhenish Bavaria, on December 13, 1823, and is the son of Ludwig and Josephine (Schlick) Schneider. He received his early education at the schools of his native place, and, at the age of twenty-one, became a journalist, and therein became actively engaged as a revolutionist in his Province against the domination of the Bavarian despotism. But he was not satisfied with fighting alone with his pen, but supplemented his efforts with his sword, and when the Prussians assisted the Bavarian monarchy, he saw that further attempts at subverting the tyranny were useless, and sailed for America, arriving at New York in July, 1849. From thence he went to Cleveland, Ohio, and from there to St. Louis, where he established the Neue Zeit. From thence he came to Chicago, as narrated in volume I of this History. Resigning his consulship, to which he was appointed, as above stated, in 1861, he returned to Chicago and was appointed collector of internal revenue by Abraham Lincoln, the first to occupy that position in the State, and for four years discharged the duties of that office with marked ability and scrupulous fidelity, making his administration also distinguished by his selecting subordinates for their efficiency and not for partisan principles. When his term of office expired, Mr. Schneider was elected president of the State Savings Institution, and retained his interest therein until 1871, when he was elected president of the National Bank of Illinois, which position he still holds. This institution is one of the most conservative, prosperous and influential in the State, and the thirteen years' occupancy of the presidential chair sufficiently testifies to the high appreciation the stockholders have of the ability of Mr. Schneider, which has made the institution what it is. Mr. Schneider was married on June 6, 1853, to Miss Matilda Schlotzer; they have seven daughters. Mr. Schneider, in addition to his other offices in public and private life, was delegate at large to the National Convention of 1856, district delegate to the Convention of 1860, and elector at large from the State of Illinois at the election of James A. Garfield. In 1876, he was appointed Minister to Switzerland by President Hayes. He resigned the position immediately thereafter. Mr. Schneider has long since buried all animosities toward his former country, and has since visited Rhenish Bavaria and rejuvenated old and hallowed associations in that land of his nativity.

ANTHONY C. HESING was born at Vechta, Oldenburg, Prussia, in 1823, and since he was fifteen years of age, has fought the battle of life by himself, having lost his mother in 1832 and his father in 1838. Until this time he had attended school, but his guardians then decreed that he must help to earn his living, seeming, by their subsequent action, to utilize young Helsing so far as possible and at a minimum of expense. Therefore, they apprenticed him to learn the trades of baker and brewer; but this was so galling to him, that after repeated applications to his guardians, he finally prevailed upon them to allow him to come to America. They had his patrimony of a thousand thalers—a large sum in that country—out of which they generously gave him enough to pay his passage, and retained the remainder. He arrived at Baltimore, at the age of seventeen, with five dollars in his pocket, and at Cincinnati, afterward, five dollars in debt. In the latter city he entered a retail grocery store, where he worked two years and, although he was unable to save much money, he established an excellent reputation for frugality, honesty and industry, and principally with this capital, he opened a grocery store on Court Street in 1842, which he maintained until 1848. In 1847, he re-visited Germany, and there met Miss Louisa Lamping, whom he married and brought with him to this country. In 1848, he sold out his grocery and erected a hotel on the corner of Race and Court streets, Cincinnati, which he managed until 1854, when he disposed of it and came to Chicago. He then engaged in the manufacture of brick, in company with Charles S. Dole, and continued therein until the panic of 1857 terminated their business. He then struggled along, cheerful under misfortune, brave under adversity, until 1860, when he was nominated and elected sheriff of Cook County, which office he retained two years.

In 1862, he bought an interest in the Staats Zeitung, and in 1867, became the sole proprietor of the paper; subsequently disposing of a portion of his interest to other stockholders in the company owning the paper. Mr. Helsing retained his management of the paper until his son, Washington Helsing, became the directing and governing hand of this most potential of German journals, its influence being only exceeded by the New York paper of the same name.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS will be comprehensively treated in the ensuing volume.

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATED PRESS.

The exciting enterprise which characterized the collection of news in the early days of the New York Herald and its rivals has long been a thing of the past. Carrier pigeons, pony expresses, relays of horses, special locomotives, chartered steamboats, fast sailing schooners and pilot boats have all been superseded by the telegraph, and the use of the telegraph is usually only a question of money. The result of this has been to equalize all newspapers, so far as the function of news gathering is concerned, and has compelled individual newspapers to achieve superiority in other respects, and in those features where intellect tells. Thus the standard of journalism has been elevated, and the value of the press to the business interests of the country immeasurably increased.

An association of five or six of the prominent newspapers of New York City was formed in the year 1851, for the purpose of collecting news for their own use. It was called the New York Associated Press, and was found so useful that like associations were formed in other parts of the country. The principal one of these is the Western Associated Press. It operates the territory from the Great Lakes to the Ohio River, south to Memphis and Louisville, and west to the Missouri. It has fifty-six voting members, and supplies news to more than eighty press customers, besides, who are not members. It interchanges among these the local news, and delivers a copy of local news to an agent of the New York Press Association, at Cincinnati. It also reports anything within its territory which may be needed in addition to the collection for western press use, and the New York association is under similar and reciprocal obligations to the West. Neither association can serve any competitor, or encroach upon the territory of the other. The news furnished, supplied as it is to newspapers of all shades of political opinion, is free from partisan bias, and is generally regarded as trustworthy. When a party organ desires political color to its news it furnishes it to its readers in the form of a special dispatch.

The Western Association Press was formed in 1865, Joseph Medill of the Chicago Tribune being one of its most active promoters. On the 21st of March, 1865, the Legislature of Michigan passed a general law to provide for the incorporation of associations engaged in the publication of newspapers, periodicals, books and other matter.

It provided that any three or more persons may associate themselves for the purpose of procuring intelligence for the newspaper press from all parts of the world, by telegraph or otherwise, upon such terms and conditions, and subject to the liabilities prescribed in the law. It further provided they should sign articles of association, specifying, the name, the capital-stock, the purpose, the place of business and the term of existence, which was not to exceed thirty years.

In pursuance of this law the first meeting of the Western Association Press was held at Louisville, on the 22d and 23d of November, 1865. They adopted articles of association as prescribed by the Michigan statute, and also a set of by-laws in pursuance of the same.

The articles and by-laws provided that the publishers of daily newspapers in the West might become members of the association by subscribing for one share of the capital-stock at its par value of ten dollars. This share of stock is evidence of the right of the newspaper holding it to participate in all the rights, advantages and immunities of the association. The stock is not transferable except on the sale of the newspaper holding it, and no newspaper is allowed to hold more than one share. Each share is entitled to one vote in all meetings of the association. Newspapers may be admitted to the association on the application of the press of the city where they are proposed to be published. In the event of any disagreement between any member of the association and the New York Associated Press or any telegraph company, the matter in controversy shall be referred to the Board of Directors, whose decision shall be sustained by the association.

The following were the first officers of the association: President, J. D. Osborn (Louisville Journal); secretary and treasurer, H. E. Baker (Detroit Advertiser and Tribune); directors, M. Halstead (Cincinnati Commercial); A. W. Fairbanks (Cleveland Herald); Jacob Barnes (Detroit Free Press); George L. Knapp (St. Louis Republican); Horace White (Chicago Tribune). Executive committee, M. Halstead and Horace White.

Subsequently, it was ascertained that, as the association was formed under a law of Michigan, the principal office should be in that State. Mr. Osborn then resigned the presidency, and H. N. Walker, of the Detroit Free Press, was chosen in his place.

Although the association has a contract with the Western Union Telegraph Company, by which its rates are very much lower than the ordinary charges, the tolls for a single year reach $175,000.

One of the direct results of the association is to make a close corporation of the newspapers already existing in any particular place, and rendering it almost impossible to start a new newspaper that can compete with them, inasmuch as the newspaper can not get the associated press dispatches without their consent. There have been cases where papers have been successful under such adverse circumstances, but they are quite rare. Capital usually shrinks from such enterprises, for until a paper can acquire a permanent and enduring constituency its expenses will exceed its income.

WESTERN NEWS COMPANY.

JOHN R. WALSH AND THE WESTERN NEWS COMPANY.—Prior to 1856, the circulation of periodicals and newspapers was for the most part the affair of the individual publishers. They obtained their subscriptions and served their subscribers through the mails. Some of the large newsdealers in New York City had used the Express to some extent in sending the more popular papers and magazines to a distance, but the business was not extensive until the formation of the American News Company, about the year 1856. This company was started in New York City by A. S. Tuttle, and was formed by the consolidation of several of the largest newsdealing firms of that city. As railroad facilities increased, it extended its business operations until, by the year 1861, it took in all the prominent cities of the Northern States. At this time there was one young man in Chicago, who saw that unless the newsdealers of Chicago adopted the same methods as the News Company, they could not hope to compete with them. This was John R. Walsh.

In a year or two, Mr. McNally took Mr. Walsh into partnership; but a trusted clerk having embezzled largely from the firm during that year, Mr. Walsh's interest was about used up, and he became a salesman again. Meantime he was watching the growth of the American News Company, and saw them occupying territory, that could be as well or better served from Chicago. He urged upon Mr. McNally that the business be extended to compete with the News Company. The railroads were opening up hundreds of new places in which plenty of customers could be found, but Mr. McNally was satisfied with what he had, and would not go into the enterprise. So, in 1861, with a little borrowed capital, Mr. Walsh opened a news depot of his own. Plenty of local customers flocked to him, but he had his eye on a larger field. He commenced to supply the outlying towns and cities of Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Iowa with papers and periodicals more regularly and more quickly than could be done by the News Company or through the mails. Newsdealers in these western towns soon found that by ordering from John R. Walsh, Chicago, they could get supplies twelve hours earlier than from the News Company, and twenty-four hours earlier than by the mails. It was the time of the War, and whatever people wanted, they wanted right away. The consequence was Mr. Walsh soon had almost the entire business in his hands, and the American News Company awoke to the fact that they had to deal with a young, enterprising and exceedingly energetic rival. Four or five years of competition convinced them that if they wished to do business in the Northwest, they must have the assistance, not the rivalry, of Mr. Walsh. Negotiations resulted in the establishment, in 1866, of the Western News Company, with John R. Walsh as manager. It was the first branch of the parent company, which now has branches in every large city of the United States.

The News Company has revolutionized the methods of newspaper and periodical circulation. It stands between the publisher and the public, doing, with comparative safety what the publisher formerly did, through the mails, with risk and loss. It orders so many hundred or so many thousand newspapers every day from each publisher, and pays the cash down for them. These it distributes in every town and hamlet throughout the land, reached by a railroad. The profit is small, but it is constant. The property dealt in is extremely perishable, but the company is saved from heavy loss by the agreement of the publishers to take back unsold papers, the company losing the cost of handling only.

Without the machinery afforded by the News Company, newspapers could not have acquired the large circulations they have. To accomplish it, a large increase in the clerical force of each establishment would be necessary, and even then the mails could not afford them the requisite facilities. Mr. Walsh's name is inseparably connected with this great enterprise. His energy and business ability has made it what it is. He is justly entitled to the credit of having materially contributed to the welfare and convenience of the great reading public of the West.

JOHN R. WALSH is a native of Ireland. He was born August 22, 1837, and came to the United States with his parents when he was twelve years of age, settling in Chicago. At the age of eighteen, he became clerk and salesman for J. McNally, who was then one of the principal newsdealers in the city. Of pleasant manners, retentive memory and obedient disposition, he soon made himself popular with the patrons of the store. He knew what each customer wanted and was quick to attend to him. Says a friend who knew him at this period, "When a man came into the store who wanted some particular thing, had perhaps ordered an extra paper or magazine, John could tell him at once whether it had come or not, or give him the special information he wanted, right off, while any of the others would have to go and look over files or lists or something which would take up time. So customers all wanted to deal with John." Mr. Walsh was one of the founders and is the president of the Chicago National Bank, to which he gives his constant personal attention during banking hours. He also continues to superintend the News Company. He was married, in 1867, to Miss Wilson of Chicago, and has five children. With evening his business cares are dismissed, and in his home and family he finds his rest and recreation. Amid all his vast business enterprises in which he has accumulated a large fortune, he has preserved the pleasant and generous traits of his younger manhood. In business dealings he is exact himself, and expects exactness in others, to the uttermost farthing, but his friendly hand is ever extended to help those who have not prospered so well as he. In all Chicago there is no more popular man than John R. Walsh.

HOTEL HISTORY.

Few people of to-day, who enjoy the comforts and even luxuries afforded by the modern hotel, think of the great changes which have been wrought in such establishments within a comparatively few years. The daisys have happily fled when guests were wont to climb three or four flights of stairs, to reach their sleeping apartment; preceded by a small boy, usually sleepy and always lazy, bearing a flickering tallow candle, or a smoking lamp. What guest of the old-time hotel can not remember the wish, on awaking in the morning, that he was safely down stairs, through the narrow and dimly-lighted passages? In those days, elevators and fire-escapes, electric lights and bells, and the many other modern inventions now considered indispensable, were unknown. Among the cities of the West, none could earlier boast of hotels, prompt to adopt every discovery looking to the comfort of guests, than Chicago.

TREMONT HOUSE.—As long ago as 1850, this city had, in the old Tremont House, a hotel which at that time had no equal in the West. As the residents of that day well remember, it originally stood on the northwest corner of Lake and Dearborn streets, and was built by Alanson Sweet in 1832-33. By way of comparing it with the present hotel of the same name, it may be mentioned that the first Tremont House was a small wooden building, twenty by thirty feet, and only three stories high. Its proprietor was Alanson Sweet, who conducted it as a saloon and boarding house. In the summer of 1836 the Couch brothers, Ira and James, arrived in Chicago, and opened a gentlemen's small furnishing store and tailor shop, on Lake Street, between State and Dearborn. In the fall of that year they sold out this business and rented the Tremont House from Mr. Sweet, which they kept until the 27th of October, 1839, when it was destroyed by fire. From this date until his death, the history of the Tremont may perhaps be best learned from the biography of the man who first gave it prominence, and which it has so long enjoyed, as one of the representative hostelries in the West.

IRA COUCH was born in Saratoga County, New York, on the 22d of November, 1806. At the age of sixteen, young Ira was apprenticed to a tailor, but he purchased his time from his employer, and, in 1826, set up business for himself in Jamestown, New York. In 1833, he married Caroline E. Gregory, at Ellcottville, Cattaraugus County; and in the summer of 1836, removed to Chicago. A few months later, he sold out his establishment, rented the Tremont House from Mr. Sweet, and in the fall of 1836, began his career as a hotel-keeper. When, in 1839, this house was burned, Mr. Couch lost almost all he had, but with characteristic energy he immediately leased, of the Messrs. Wadsworth, the corner lots where the present Tremont now stands, and began the erection of a new and better building than the old one. The second Tremont House fronted about ninety feet on Dearborn Street, by one hundred feet on Lake, and was a frame structure three stories in height. It was commenced late in December, 1839, completed during the following spring, and opened to the public in May, 1840. This house was kept by Mr. Couch until it was destroyed by fire, July 21, 1849. Before the burning of the last-mentioned building, however, Mr. Couch had purchased the ground on which it stood, and, at the time it was destroyed, was the owner of one hundred and forty feet on Lake Street, by one hundred and eighty feet on Dearborn. His second hotel having been burned, he conceived the idea of erecting a magnificent brick structure, covering the whole of the area already mentioned, and five and a half stories high. The magnitude of this scheme was such as to excite no little ridicule from his friends and business associates, who, as they saw the new building rising from the ruins of its predecessor, were pleased to term it "Couch's folly." Even the soundest business men, thought the building of such a hotel was a hazardous undertaking, and one wholly uncalled for by the demands of the times. The great hotel was completed, furnished, and opened to the public on Saturday, September 29, 1850. In January, 1851, the Gem of the Prairie, in a review of the notable buildings erected in Chicago during the previous year, said: "The Tremont House has precedence of all others. It is one of the chief ornaments of the city, and reflects great credit upon its proprietor, Mr. Ira Couch. The house is five and a half stories high, and its internal arrangements, including furniture and decorations, are all in the highest style of art, and of the class denominated princely. There is, perhaps, no hotel in the Union superior to it in any respect. The cost of the building was $75,000. J. M. Van Osdel, architect and superintendent; C. and W. Price, masons; Updike & Solfitt, builders." Three years after the house was opened, Mr. Couch leased the building, and sold the furniture to David A. and George W. Gage, of Boston, and practically retired from active business, though still exercising a supervision of his affairs. In company with his wife and child he began traveling, to recuperate an overtaxed constitution. In the winter of 1855-56, he returned to Chicago, going from thence to New Orleans and Havana, still accompanied by his wife and child. He was so delighted with the climate of Cuba, that he at once formed the intention of spending his winters in that country; and December of the following year found him, with his little family, again comfortably domiciled in the city of his choice. A few weeks later, he was suddenly stricken with a fever, and, almost before the dangerous character of his malady was known, he was dead, and his wife and child left alone in a land of strangers. His remains were brought to this city, and, about a year and a half after, were deposited in the massive stone vault erected for that purpose, in Lincoln Park, by his brother James. Thus died Ira Couch, at the age of fifty-one years, in the very prime of his manhood.

JAMES COUCH was born at Fort Edwards, on the Hudson, in August, 1800. He received his early education in Chautauqua County, and remained there until 1820, when he went into the Johnson House, at Fredonia, N. Y., as clerk. After remaining at this hotel for some time, Mr. Couch returned home, and, with his brother George, began keeping the Stage House, a hotel which stood on the lake shore, the thoroughfare then from Cleveland, Ohio, through Erie, Portland Harbor, Maysville and Jamestown, to Pittsburgh, Penn. He next went into the lumber and distilling business, and in 1836, in company with his brother Ira, came to Chicago. In July of that year both brothers returned to New York to purchase goods. After leaving New York, they separated at Albany, Ira going to Jamestown to join his family, and James proceeding with their merchandise to Buffalo by canal. At that place, being unable to find a steamer, he was compelled to charter a schooner to bring his goods to Chicago. After a passage lasting five weeks, he reached this city, and found his brother Ira, who had already arrived, awaiting him. The goods were placed in a small building on Lake Street, the property of Captain Seth Johnson. In the fall of 1836, he and his brother purchased the Tremont. His connection with that house has been already set forth. The hotel was re-built by him, after the great fire of 1871. He also erected a number of large and substantial business blocks in various parts of the city. He then began the erection of the Commercial House, but it was finished by others. Mr. Couch has, indeed, been a useful citizen of Chicago; he invested the money made here in erecting buildings that are a credit to him and the city they help to adorn; and, though now nearly eighty-five years of age, he is still strong and vigorous. He was married on the 25th of March, 1847, to Miss Elizabeth C. Wells, of Stratford, Conn. They have had two children—a son and daughter. The latter died in 1853, when only two years of age. The son, Ira Couch, was born in 1848, and was educated at Albany, N. Y., where he studied law and was admitted to the Bar in 1869.

Gage Bros. took the house in 1853, and in 1855 John B. Drake, the well-known proprietor of the Grand Pacific, became a partner and retained his connection with the Tremont until it was destroyed in the fire of 1871. In 1863, David A. Gage retired from the firm, and, in company with Charles C. Waite, assumed control of the Sherman House. Gage & Drake continued the Tremont until 1868, when the former sold his interest to Mr. Drake, who conducted the house until the fire. In 1861, the house was remodeled and enlarged on a grand scale, and the proprietors, Messrs. Gage Bros. & Drake, refurbished the house at a cost of over $30,000.

From the foregoing history it will be seen that not only, for thirty-five years, has the Tremont House held its place, as one of the leading hotels in Chicago, but for many years was unapproached by any of its competitors in the elegance of its appointments and excellence of its management; and, notwithstanding it has been three times destroyed by fire, it still stands an enduring monument to the memory of its founders, and of the men who have made it famed, as being one of the model hotels in the West.

THE SHERMAN HOUSE was built in 1836-37, by Hon. F. C. Sherman, who was subsequently Mayor of Chicago, and was first opened in December of the latter year, by Jacob Russell, who had formerly kept the old Lake House. It was then known as the City Hotel, but, in 1844, Mr. Sherman remodeled the house, added two stories, making it five stories in height, and changed its name to the Sherman House. Its proprietors from 1837 to 1857, have been named in the first volume of this work; and in 1858 it was kept by Martin Dodge and Hiram Longley. In December of that year, Ezekiel Tripp and Daniel W. Hale assumed control, and kept the house until in May, 1861, when the work of tearing it down was begun, to make room for the elegant and costly structure which Mr. Sherman had determined to erect in its stead. The new hotel was completed, and opened to the public for inspection, on Tuesday, July 8, 1861; and as the opening of the Tremont House, a trifle over a decade before, had been an event of no small importance in the march of Chicago's progress as a city, so the opening of the new Sherman, a second grand hotel, was an affair to be noted and remembered.

SHERMAN HOUSE.

The new Sherman House was six stories high, and had a frontage of one hundred and eighty feet on Clark, and one hundred and fifty feet on Randolph Street, the latter overlooking the public square. The material of the structure was the finest Athens marble, from the quarries at Lemont; the style of its architecture was plain, yet it possessed sufficient character to give it a deserved prominence among the finest edifices of its class in the West. The entire cost of the building was a little over $200,000, and the land was valued at about $150,000, while the furniture and appointments swelled the grand total to nearly half a million dollars.

The lessees of the house were Porteus B. Roberts, a well-known railroad man from Peoria, and Frank T. Sherman, a son of the proprietor; Samuel Hawk, formerly of the Richmond House, and W. S. Hughes were also associated in the management of the new Sherman, assisted by Messrs. Kellogg and Rice. Roberts and Sherman conducted the house until 1863, when David A. Gage (formerly of the Tremont House) and Charles C. Waite assumed control; two years later, John A. Rice became a partner. In 1867, the proprietors were Gage & Rice; in the following year Mr. Rice retired from the firm, being succeeded by Horace Walters; Gage Bros. & Walters then conducted the house until destroyed by the fire of 1871.

FRANCIS CORNWALL SHERMAN was born in Newton, Conn., in the year 1805, and came, with his family, to Chicago in April, 1834. Shortly after he reached this city he built, with the aid of a fellow-workman, a frame building on Randolph, between La Salle and Wells streets. This building, which was standing until the fire of 1871, was originally eighteen by thirty-four feet, and twelve feet high. Here he opened a boarding-house, and was soon doing a thriving business. The next year he purchased a wagon and a pair of horses, and, in the absence of stage-coach facilities, carried passengers from Chicago to Joliet, Galena, Ottawa, Peoria, and other places. In 1835, he moved out on what was then called the prairie, on Adams Street, near Market, and began making brick, his kilns being between Market Street and the river, about the present site of the Madison-street bridge. In 1835-36, he built for himself the first four-story brick building erected, on Lake Street near Clark. Mr. Sherman continued the business of brick-making and building for over fourteen years, during which time he erected a great number of houses and business blocks for others. In 1850, he had grown so wealthy that he retired from this business and devoted his time to the management of his large estate. From the time of his arrival at Chicago, Mr. Sherman always took an active interest in public affairs, and, in the course of a long and useful life, was many times honored with substantial tokens of public esteem. He was selected as one of the first board of trustees of the town of Chicago, of which body he was a member until the town, as a corporation, ceased to exist. He was also a member of the first board of aldermen, and was honored by frequent re-elections. He was a member of the board of county commissioners, and was always active in his efforts to preserve the court-house square for public purposes. In 1843, he was elected to the State Legislature, and four years later was a member of the same body, and aided in framing the new Constitution for the State. In politics, Mr. Sherman was an active Democrat, and on that ticket was a candidate, in 1856, for mayor of Chicago, but was defeated by Thomas Dyer. In 1862, he was elected to the mayoralty over C. N. Holden, and, in 1863, was re-elected for a two years' term, over T. B. Bryan, after one of the fiercest local contests known in the history of the city. Mr. Sherman was married, before coming to Chicago, to Miss Electa Trowbridge, of Danbury, Conn., and has had seven children. Of these, there are now but two living—General Frank T. Sherman, and Martha L. Marsh, now residing in Evanston. Mr. Sherman died November 12, 1870, and was deeply and sincerely mourned by the people of a city in which he had lived so long, and for the advancement of which he had ever earnestly labored.

His widow survived him eleven years, and died on the anniversary of her husband's death, November 12, 1881.

THE ADAMS HOUSE was built, in 1857, by Hugh Maher, a well-known capitalist of this city, and at one time accounted the largest property owner in Cook County. The house was opened, in the autumn of 1858, by William Adams; and in April of the following year, W. L. & J. I. Pearce, formerly of the Matteson House, purchased and assumed control of the Adams. In December, 1860, W. L. Pearce sold his interest to Schuyler S. Benjamin, now of the Brevoort House. Pearce & Benjamin conducted the Adams until it was destroyed, in October, 1871. It is of interest to note that this hotel stood on the former site of the old Hydraulic Mills, the first flouring mills in Chicago, which were discontinued in 1853.

HUGH MAHER was born in Ireland in 1818, and when nineteen years of age came to this country, arriving in Chicago in 1837. Here he rapidly amassed great wealth, and, in later years, was known in business circles as one of the boldest, yet shrewdest, speculators of his time. An idea of the extent of his possessions may be gained from the statement that he once owned the dock frontage on both sides of the Chicago River, from Twelfth to Eighteenth street. A small portion of this property he sold to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad Company for $205,000. In 1873, Mr. Maher moved to Hyde Park, where he continued to reside until his death, which occurred January 22, 1884.

THE CLIFTON HOUSE originally stood on the southeast corner of Wabash Avenue and Madison Street, and was built by Mr. Knights. It was first kept as a hotel, in 1858, by Joshua Barrell, then, in 1859-60, by Killian Winne. In 1861, Elijah W. Herrick purchased the property, and, after enlarging and re-furnishing the house, remained its proprietor until his death from cholera, in 1866. Joshua Barrell again assumed control, which he retained until 1870. In May of that year, the property was leased by W. A. Jenkins, who enlarged its capacity, and in May, 1871, made a second addition to the hotel. Mr. Jenkins remained its proprietor until it went down in the general conflagration of October 9, 1871. Previous to the fire, however, Albert A. Holmes had purchased an interest in the house, and was part owner of it at the time it was destroyed.

THE MATTESSON HOUSE, as built by Governor

ADAMS HOUSE.

Mattesson in 1850, was a five-story brick structure, having a frontage of eighty feet on Randolph and ninety feet on Dearborn Street. When built, it was considered second only to the Tremont. Its cost was $20,000. It was opened in the following year by W. L. Pearce, who, a few months later, associated with him his brother, J. I. Pearce, and they conducted it until, in 1853, they were succeeded by Stevens & Willard. In May, 1858, they sold out to Charles H. Bissell and William S. Goodrich, who kept the house until 1861, when Mr. Goodrich sold his interest to his partner. In 1864, Robert Hill took the house, and remained its proprietor until the fire. The following account of the sale of the old Mattesson House, is taken from the Tribune of March 6, 1866:

RUINS, ADAMS HOUSE.

"One of the old landmarks of Chicago, the well-known Mattesson House, on the northwest corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets, was sold at auction yesterday, to enable a partition to be made among the heirs of the Mattesson estate. * * * Finally, the property was awarded to Messrs. M. O. Walker and Robert Hill, for the sum of $130,000. It has been asserted that this is the oldest hotel building in the city, but this is a mistake. The Lake House, over on Kinzie Street, is much older, having been built about 1837 [1835], but is not now used as a hotel. The Tremont, however, still standing, is much older than the Mattesson. Thirty years ago, the lot was sold by Dr W. B. Egan to John H. Hodgson, for the sum of $1,000 and a suit of clothes. Mr. Hodgson, and others, built the Baltic House on the lot; it was destroyed by fire in 1849; and, in 1850, Mr. Hodgson sold the same ground to Joel A. Mattesson for $9,000, and that gentleman, during the same year, built the Mattesson House, which was opened under the management of W. L. Pearce, in 1851. When first opened, the rent of the Mattesson House was only $2,000 per annum, and it was almost on the verge of the business part of the city. In 1853, Mr. Pearce sold to Messrs. Stevens & Williams, two Vermonters, and they, in turn, in 1858, after having, it is said, each made a fortune out of the establishment, transferred it to Bissell & Goodrich. At this time, the rent was raised to $6,000, and the following year the building was elevated eight feet from its old position to the present grade. Mr. Goodrich sold out to his partner in 1861, and, until 1864, the house was kept by Mr. Bissell, who, in turn, sold it to Robert Hill, the present proprietor. It is stated that the entire rent of that portion of the hotel sold yesterday, and of the stores beneath, amounts to $15,900 per annum; and this can not be deemed an exorbitant income from the rentals, when it is taken into consideration that it is one of the best corners in the city for a business location. Mr. Hill, the present proprietor, formerly kept the Garden City House. The history of the Mattesson House is a short one, but as an old settler remarked, 'It seemed like a dream that this property, which I remember as little better than a valueless swamp, occupied by the small shop of Hudson, the tailor, should to-day be well worth $130,000, in the very heart of one of the most flourishing cities in the Union, and with every prospect of a still greater increase in value.'"

After the fire, a business building, known as the Borden Block, was erected upon its former site.

ROBERT HILL, well known as one of the most popular and successful hotel managers in the West, was born in 1821, in the town of Cooper, Maine. There, Robert was reared and educated, assisting his father in the management of his farm and hotel until 1843, when he went into the hotel business on his own account, at Baring, Maine, where he remained until 1849. In that year, he purchased a stock of general merchandise, and established himself at Sheboygan, Wis. In 1852, he married Miss Sarah Murdock, and in the spring of 1853 came to Chicago. His first business venture was as proprietor of the old Lake Street House, located on the northeast corner of Lake and Franklin streets. At the end of a year he disposed of this property, and leased the Clarendon House, on Randolph Street, between Fifth Avenue and Franklin Street, then among the leading hotels of the city. The enlargement and refitting of this house was rewarded by an extensive patronage, which soon exceeded his accommodations, and he leased the Garden City House in 1857, a pretentious structure that occupied the site where now stands the wholesale house of Marshall Field & Co. This was a large brick hotel, four stories in height, and containing seventy-five rooms. He conducted this house for seven years, and in 1864 secured the lease of the Mattesson House, and, two years later, with M. O. Walker, purchased the property for $130,000. After the destruction of this house in the great fire, Mr. Hill disposed of the Mattesson House property, and secured the land at the corner of Jackson Street and Wabash Avenue, where he erected the Mattesson House, of which he was the proprietor at the time of his death. Mr. Hill's death, March 4, 1877, was regretted, not only by the people of Chicago, who recognized in him a citizen of sterling worth, but also by thousands of guests of his house, who had had occasion to admire his qualities as a host and a man. During his life he was connected with the Union Park Congregational Society, whose charities always found in him a liberal supporter. Mr. and Mrs. Hill had seven children born to them, two daughters and five sons; the two former are now deceased. The sons are Charles, Horace, George, Webster and Edwin.

THE MASSASOIT HOUSE, situated, before the fire, at the southwest corner of Central Avenue and South Water Street, was built, in 1857, by David A. and George W. Gage, and was opened, the following year, by John C. Parks and John W. Humphreys. In appearance, the house nearly resembled the Massasoit of later years. The old Massasoit, however, though built of brick, was plastered on the outside, and then tiled in imitation of stone. It was five stories in height, contained seventy-two rooms, and cost, originally, $32,000. In 1857, John W. Humphreys, who had previously purchased his partner's interest, sold out to William Cox, who, in turn, was succeeded by Killian Winne. In the spring of 1863, Hiram Longley purchased the house, paying for it $35,000. Mr. Longley kept it until the fall of 1871, when, his health failing him, he leased the property for a term of years, and returned to Shirley, Mass., his native town, to spend his declining years. Through the courtesy of A. W. Longley, of this city, a nephew of the old hotel man, the following letter from Mary A., widow of Hiram Longley, has been furnished for publication in this History. The letter is dated April 2, 1884, and reads as follows:

"Dear Sir,—Your favor at hand. Will try to answer a few of your questions. Mr. Longley was born in Shirley, Mass., in 1807, and spent his early years as a manufacturer in Dover, N. H., and in his native town, where he first went into business for himself in 1825. In 1853, he went to Chicago, and in the following year purchased the old Rock Island House, situated on Clark Street, at the corner of Twelfth. Here he was burned out in August, 1856; and in November of the same year he went into the Sherman House, and remained there two years. From there to the Clarendon House, on Randolph Street, where he remained until the spring of 1863, when he purchased the Massasoit House. He paid for it $35,000. In the spring of 1871 he returned to the East; and you know what took place in the fall of that year. In May, 1873, his nephew, A. W. Longley, of Chicago, began rebuilding the house, and opened it in the fall; Mr. Longley, senior, also returned to Chicago during that year, and remained there until the spring of 1875, when he once more came East, to his native town, where he died February 15, 1877. He was married in 1838, to Mary A. Farnsworth, of Harvard, Mass.; he died childless. I have no cut nor picture of the old house; we had one, but it was destroyed at the time of the fire.

"Very respectfully, yours, MARY A. LONGLEY."

THE CLEVELAND HOUSE was built, in 1856, by A. Cleveland, and was located at Nos. 46-52 West Lake Street. Mr. Cleveland, with I. N. Merritt as manager, continued to keep the house until 1859, when it was destroyed in the great fire which occurred September 15, of that year. In 1863, a Cleveland House was started at 34 East Kinzie Street, corner of North Clark. This hotel was opened by Robert Duncan, and kept by him until 1865, when August Hendrick became proprietor, and so continued until the fire of 1871.

THE REVERE HOUSE, formerly the Young America, was first opened on the northeast corner of Randolph and Dearborn streets. It was built in 1853, by Isaac Cook, now of St. Louis, and was opened, on the European plan, in 1854, by J. Stockton White & Co. In 1857, the house was first called the Revere, and William R. Irish assumed its control. He was succeeded, two years later, by Albert M. Stoddard and Erastus B. George, and they, in turn, by C. W. Baldwin and H. F. Willard, who conducted the house until 1859, when it was pulled down, to be re-placed by a business block, built by C. H. McCormick, and known as the McCormick Block. On April 5, 1864, a new Revere House was opened, at the corner of North Clark and Kinzie streets, by Gilbert Dutcher, and kept by him until the fire. The following local notice of the last mentioned house and of the old Revere, is taken from the Tribune of April 2, 1864:

"All old residents of Chicago were once familiar with the old Revere House, which long since was pulled down, to make room for the present McCormick Block. The name was discontinued, but was not lost. It has been resuscitated, and applied to the old Foster House, which, having laid idle for two years, is about to be opened under a new name by Gilbert Dutcher, formerly of the Capital House, at Madison, Wisconsin. The way in which the house has been rejuvenated would surprise any one who knew it only as the old Foster House."

It is a strange coincidence that, as the old Revere House was re-placed by the McCormick Building, so was the second hotel by another building bearing McCormick's name. McCormick's Hall now stands at the corner of North Clark and Kinzie streets, the former site of Dutcher's Revere House; and the hotel afterward known as the Revere was situated just across the alley, on a half block farther north of its old location.

HATCH'S HOTEL, located at No. 29 North Wells Street, was kept, in 1858, by Heman Hatch, who, as early as 1845, kept the old Eagle Tavern, situated on Dearborn Street, between Lake and South Water streets. In 1859, James L. Howe became the proprietor of the Hatch House, and conducted it until 1863, when it passed into the hands of John T. Corcoran. Three years later, Hugh Dunn became a partner, and retained his connection with the house until 1870, when Corcoran purchased his interest, and at the time of the fire was running the house alone.

THE BARNES HOUSE, corner of Randolph and Canal streets, now among the oldest of Chicago's hotels, and for many years ranking among its leading hosteleries, was built, in 1866, by Royal B. Barnes, H. H. Yates and Daniel Booth. Royal B. Barnes was its first proprietor, and David M. Barnes, his son, its first bookkeeper. In 1869 the house passed into the hands of N. A. Hanks, who, in the following year, was succeeded by C. H. Rice and R. H. Worley. They relinquished their proprietorship, in 1871, to W. K. Swallow, who conducted the house until in 1873, when he failed. The hotel had not proved a profitable adventure to its various owners, and after Mr. Swallow's failure it was, for a time, permitted to stand idle. In 1874, Benjamin Ransom took it in charge, and conducted it until October, 1875, when he sold it to John T. Latschaw, in whose hands it remained but a few months. He then sold out to a man named Lowell, who shortly afterward took Charles Dore, of St. Louis, into partnership, and they conducted the house until June, 1876. At that time Benjamin Newman purchased Mr. Lowell's interest, the firm becoming Newman & Dore. On January 1, 1877, Mr. Dore retired from the business, and Mr. Newman took his two sons, Harvey R. and Benjamin L., into partnership, and the business was conducted under the firm name of Newman & Sons, until the death of Mr. Newman, Sr., May 6, 1880. Since that time, the sons, under the name and style of Newman Brothers, have been the proprietors. The house has since the fire been conducted on the European plan. In 1884, its present proprietors opened a restaurant on the first floor, and about the same time refitted and furnished the hotel throughout with new and elegant furniture, making it one of the leading hosteleries on the West Side. It may be added, that the success of the hotel dates from the time that Mr. Newman, Sr., took charge of it, and that since his death his sons have brought it to its present excellence. In 1881, the brothers took a year's lease on the old Burdick House, afterward the ill-fated Langham Hotel, and successfully conducted that house until May, 1882.

BENJAMIN NEWMAN (deceased) was born in Pickaway County, Ohio, in 1817. In 1829, his parents removed to Illinois, settling near Jacksonville. There he attained his majority, and engaged with his father in farming and stock-raising until 1857. The panic of that year ruined them financially, and Benjamin, who had long been inclined to the ministry, became an itinerant in the M. E. Church, and for nearly twenty years was identified in this work in various portions of Illinois. In 1876, he came with his family to Chicago, and purchased into the Barnes House, which he conducted until his death in 1880. Mr. Newman was married to Miss Caroline Routt, daughter of Harvey Routt, of Jacksonville. They had five children, all sons, of whom four are still living—Harvey R., Benjamin L., Charles and Henry.

HARVEY R. NEWMAN, eldest son of Benjamin Newman, was born in Jacksonville, Ill., April 15, 1857. He was given a good English education, and on coming to this city in 1876, with his father, entered the Northwestern University, at Evanston. He afterward pursued the study of law, until the death of his father, on May 6, 1881, when, with his brother, he succeeded to the business they still conduct.

BENJAMIN L. NEWMAN was born in Jacksonville, Ill., in 1859, and came with his parents to this city in 1876, where he has since lived. He began his business career before he had attained his majority, as a partner with his father in the proprietorship of the Barnes House, and, in 1880, with his brother Harvey R., he became its joint proprietor. Both brothers are enterprising and industrious, and to these excellent qualities may doubtless be attributed much of the success they have achieved.

THE METROPOLITAN HOTEL was kept, from 1858 to 1862, by A. L. Gage. In that year Benjamin H. Skinner assumed control of the house, and conducted the same until 1857, when he purchased the Briggs House. He was succeeded in the management of the Metropolitan by J. A. Baldwin, who, in 1869, was succeeded by H. G. Pulling and Abner Kirby, proprietors at the time it was burned.

THE RICHMOND HOUSE, situated at the northwest corner of South Water Street and Michigan Avenue, was built in 1856, by Thomas Richmond, a capitalist and vessel-owner, then an old citizen of Chicago. The house was opened in 1857 by Messrs. Taber & Hawk, who expended over $60,000 in furnishing it, making it, in all its appointments, scarcely second to any hotel in the city. In July, 1861, Killian Winne succeeded Taber & Hawk as proprietor. It is stated that Mr. Hawk not only lost his original investment, but left the house over $10,000 in debt. In March, 1862, Mr. Winne relinquished his control, being also a loser, and for some time the property remained vacant. The furniture was sold, under a foreclosure of mortgage, to Mr. LaGr, of LaFayette, Indiana, he paying only $9,000 for what, but a short time before, had cost over five times that amount. In 1863, an Eastern capitalist, R. W. Hyman, purchased the property for $85,000, and, after completely refurbishing the house, opened it and placed it in charge of Mr. Burroughs, an old, experienced hotel-keeper. In 1864, W. L. Pearce purchased the house, and conducted it until 1866, when it passed into the hands of Richard Somers, formerly of the City Hotel. Mr. Somers conducted it for about two years, when he also relinquished his proprietorship. At that time, all efforts to make the house a success having failed, it was sold to Mr. Lowenthal, who converted it into a business block, and it so remained until destroyed by the fire in October, 1871.

Thos. Richmond and

THE ORIENT HOUSE was situated at Nos. 281, 283 and 285 State Street, and it first appears as a hotel in the City Directory of 1859. In that year it was kept by L. L. Atwood, formerly a furniture dealer at No. 502

State Street. In 1862, it passed into the hands of D. H. Danolds, who was its proprietor until 1867, when he sold out to Augustus Parsons, who, in the following year, associated with himself Erastus C. Grant. The new firm conducted the house until 1870, when it was purchased by S. A. Danolds, who was its proprietor until 1871.

THE HAMILTON HOUSE, earlier known as the Washington House, when it was situated on the margin of the river, on South Water, near Clark Street, was built in 1840, and was kept for a number of years by Philip Connelly. In 1851, it was moved to the southeast corner of Clark and North Water streets, an addition built to it, and the remodeled structure became the Hamilton House, taking the name of its owner, Colonel Richard J. Hamilton, of this city. J. F. Draper & Co. opened the house, and continued its proprietors until 1857. At that time it passed into the hands of Amos B. Currier, who kept it until 1862. From this year, until 1866, Jacob L. Metzger was its proprietor; he was succeeded by James Kennedy, who ran the house until in the spring of 1868, when it was torn down.

THE BOARDMAN HOUSE was built in 1855-56, by Carter H. Harrison, and opened in the early part of the latter year, as a family hotel, by J. W. Boardman. The house was situated at the corner of Clark and Harrison streets, and was, in those days, the only exclusively family hotel in the city. Mr. Boardman remained in the house some three or four years, when it was sold to Henry H. Honoré. Mr. Boardman removed to the Gale property on Randolph Street, near the old Metropolitan Hotel, and there opened a house bearing his name, and which he kept for a number of years. He then went out of the hotel business for a time; but in the fall of 1872 he opened the Woodruff Hotel, corner of Wabash Avenue and Twenty-first Street, where he remained until his death, which occurred at LaCrosse, Wis., on the 17th of April, 1883.

J. W. Boardman

MR. BOARDMAN was born in Amesbury, Mass., in 1829, and before coming to Chicago, in 1854, followed the vocation of an engineer on the ocean steamer "George Law." His first business venture in this city was in the Boardman House; and during the twenty-nine years of his residence in Chicago he built up an enviable reputation as a man of sterling integrity and genuine worth. Mrs. Boardman, his widow, and one daughter are now residents here, the former still retaining her husband's interest in the hotel he was conducting at the time of his death.

THE CITY HOTEL, situated on the southeast corner of State and Lake streets, was kept in 1858 by Richard Somers & Co. In 1866, Mr. Somers purchased the Richmond House, and the City Hotel passed into the hands of L. H. Ainsworth, who kept it until 1868; he then sold out to Joseph W. Towne, who conducted the house until the fire. The City Hotel was built and owned by Styles Burton, and its first proprietors were Jeduthan Brown and Frederick Tuttle, who formerly kept the old American Temperance House, moving from there to the City Hotel, in 1848. W. F. Orcutt, now of the City Hotel, at State and Sixteenth streets, and who for several years was connected with the old City Hotel, has furnished the following letter concerning that hotel. Under date of March 26, 1884, he says:

W. F. Orcutt

"Yours of the 23d inst., at hand. I was, I think, associated with J. H. Thom, in 1854, in the management of the City Hotel. I remember the year, as it was the bad cholera season. Thom sold out, and Dick Somers was with me for a short time, and then I sold out. I was also with Brown & Tuttle, in the old American Temperance House, at the northwest corner of Wabash Avenue and Lake Street. They then took the City Hotel, and were its first proprietors. Their lease was, I think, for five years. Then Cyrus Adams, from Naperville, took it; I do not remember how long he kept it, but I took it again after he left. Styles Burton, who owned the house, is now dead; Mr. Tuttle is still living in this city. The main part of the house, corner of Lake and State streets, was four stories high, built of brick; back on State to the alley was of wood, three stories; the dining room was on the first floor until the building was remodelled. I am sorry to say I have no cut of the house.

"Yours respectfully,
"W. F. ORCUTT."

RICHARD SOMERS was born in England, June 21, 1821, and came to Chicago June 10, 1836. For some years he was a steward on various steamers running to Milwaukee, Grand Haven and other points. His first hotel venture was as proprietor of the City Hotel. In 1866, he purchased the Richmond House, having sold the former house to Joseph W. Towne. In 1869-70, he was elected a member of the City Council from the First Ward. About a year before the fire, he became steward at the Sherman House, and, while the city was yet in flames, he went over to the West Side, and leased, for his employees, the building that is now the Gault House. In 1872, he went to New York and took charge of the Grand Union Hotel of that city. In the following year, he returned to Chicago, and became steward at the Palmer House. In 1876, in company with John A. Rice, he went to Philadelphia, and took the management of the Globe Hotel, a structure which stood opposite the Centennial buildings. Two years later, when the Globe was torn down, Mr. Somers returned once more to Chicago, and from here went to Galveston, Texas, and took charge of the Tremont House there. Six months later he went to Milwaukee, Wis., and accepted position as steward in the Plankinton House. He remained there until, in October, 1883, he resigned this position to take the superintendency of the commissary department of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, having charge of the dining-cars and eating-houses along its line. It was in the employ of this company that Mr. Somers met his death, in an accident that occurred near Gladstone, Illinois. He left a widow, three sons, and two daughters; the latter are Mrs. John E. McWade and Mrs. W. T. Hall, of this city. Two of his sons, William and Joseph, are at present in charge of the commissary department of the new West Shore Railroad.

THE BRIGGS HOUSE, occupying the same site, both before and after the fire, was built in 1853, by William Briggs, and its first proprietors were George H. French and John Floyd, who opened the house in April of the following year. Messrs. Floyd and French conducted the house until in May, 1858, when, having been seriously crippled, financially, by the panic of the preceding year, they were forced to dispose of their interest to W. F. Tucker and J. H. Silsby. Mr. French, being an old and experienced hotel man, was retained in the house as manager under the new firm, and, in fact, was connected with it in various capacities, under its different owners, until his death, which occurred in this city in April, 1870. His former partner, Mr. Floyd, went South, to Montgomery, Alabama, where he died sometime during the War. Mr. Tucker remained the proprietor of the Briggs until, in 1867, B. H. Skinner, formerly of the old Metropolitan, assumed control, which he retained until June 17, 1871, when it was purchased by W. F. Wentworth and C. D. Woolworth, who were its proprietors when it was destroyed in October of that year. It is said of the Briggs House that, from the time of its opening and until it was burned, it had always proved a source of profit to its proprietors. The most unfortunate men ever connected with it were Messrs. Wentworth & Woolworth, who lost their all on the memorable 9th of October.

MINOR HOTELS. — Of the minor hotels in 1858-59, the following may be named:

The Burdette House, South Clark, near Polk Street, kept by J. H. Holmes; Caldwell House, Polk and Sherman streets, by Peter Caldwell; Cambridge House, No. 95 Carroll Street, by George Bond; Capitol House, Nos. 66-68 Michigan Avenue, by B. Douglass; Clark Street House, Nos. 296-298 Clark, by Willard Meacham; Dempsey's Hotel No. 105 North Water Street, by John Dempsey; Colby House, corner of Washington and South Wells streets, by Keys & Sandford; Commercial House, Sherman and Van Buren streets, by William Kennedy; Davidson House, West Kinzie Street, by A. L. Davidson; Doty's Hotel, No. 80 Randolph, by Theodorus Doty; Gage House, State and Twelfth streets, by A. T. Gage; Lake House, Cottage Grove Avenue, near Stock Yards, by John B. Sherman; Haertes Hotel, South Canal and Mitchell streets, by Nicholas Haertes; Naper-ville House, No. 207 Randolph Street, by Andrew Scholl; Phoenix Hotel, No. 126 Van Buren, by Samuel Boynton; Scott House, No. 22 North Wells, by Thomas S. Cook; Union Park House, West Madison, near Reuben Street, by Horace Hopkins; Sollitt House, No. 112 South Franklin, by Coons & Sollitt; Watkins House, Clinton and West Lake, by Andrew Watkins; Waverly House, No. 231 Kinzie Street, by M. Lantry; Willard House, near I. & W. depot, by Ervin Maxwell; Belvidere House, Clark and Cross streets, by E. Brodie; Martin's Hotel, No. 21 South Dearborn, by J. H. Martin; Meyer's Hotel, No. 48 South Franklin, by F. & J. Meyers; Graven House, No. 374 State; Dearborn House, northwest corner Lake Street and Michigan Avenue, by B. E. Tucker and Joseph W. Towne; Clarendon, No. 236 Randolph, by H. Longly; Marz's Hotel, Nos. 76-78 South Wells Street, by Gustavus Marz.

In 1859, there were, in addition to those mentioned for the preceding year, the following: The Michigan Southern House, Griswold Street, near Van Buren, by Martin Dodge; Boyington House, Nos. 11-13 South Canal, by Frank Thayer; Canada House, No. 303 North Water Street, by Edmond Morris; Eagle House, South Water, near Cook Street, by Edson Moore; McCordel House, Dearborn, between Lake and South Water streets, by J. W. Steele; Niagara House, Wells and Van Buren streets, by George W. Young; St. Lawrence Hotel, No. 114 West Randolph, by Michael O'Connor.

THE BIGELOW HOUSE was a structure of considerable importance, erected in 1870-71, and destroyed in the great fire of October 9, on the very day it was to have been thrown open to the public. Ben. H. Skinner had leased the hotel, and, at great expense, had furnished it throughout in the most elegant manner. His losses, when it burned, were so heavy that he was completely ruined. In the Chicago Tribune of September 25, 1871, appears the following notice of this house.

RUINS, BIGELOW HOUSE.

"The central or business portion of the city is building up in a manner that will make the streets, in a few years, avenues, lined on either side by marble structures, that, for strength, beauty and magnitude will not be surpassed by those of any city in the country. LaSalle and Madison streets are gaining in elegance every year, and Dearborn is not behind them. The most recent addition to this locality is the new hotel built by Captain George A. Bigelow, at the southwest corner of Dearborn and Adams, fronting one hundred and seventy-eight on the former by one hundred and ten feet on the latter street. The fronts on Dearborn and Adams are Athens stone, the one on Quincy of pressed brick."

The building, was of an imposing character, being of the German style. Its height, to the top of the middle tower, was one hundred and fifteen feet, to the top of the cornice seventy-six feet; this included four stories and basement, while the roof being mansard, and, crowned with the towers already mentioned, added much to the general appearance of the structure. The building alone cost $225,000, and the furnishing $200,000, making a total of $425,000.

WRIGHT'S HOTEL, situated at Nos. 22-24 North Wells Street, was opened by William H. Wright in 1859, and was kept by him until his death, which occurred in 1866. In 1868, the house (having, meantime, been kept by the widow) passed into the hands of John H. Maulton, who changed its name to the Maulton house, and remained its proprietor until the fire.

THE BURLINGTON HOUSE, located at the corner of Canal and Sixteenth streets, is first noted in the city directory of 1863, and was kept in that year by M. A. Mohr and D. E. Cassidy. This firm was succeeded, in 1865 by Samuel Crane, who continued its proprietor until 1867. Levi Pritchard then purchased the house, and has conducted it from that to the present time.

THE CENTRAL HOUSE, then Nos. 180-182 Randolph Street, was kept from 1862 to 1864 by Rudolph D. Upman, and from 1865 to 1868 by W. P. Elleson & Bros. the last three years of its existence, or until 1871, its proprietor was S. H. Gill.

THE ANDERSON HOUSE, Nos. 27-29 West Randolph Street, as first listed among the hotels of 1862, was, in that year, kept by William Fowler. In 1863, it was kept by Darius F. Emerson, and in the following year by F. E. Helshire. After 1864, it ceased to exist as a hotel.

THE ST. JAMES.—In July, 1865, W. A. Jenkins bought the furniture, and leased, from General Hart L. Stewart, the hotel known as the Stewart House, and situated at the corner of State and Washington streets, including, however, Nos. 92, 94, 96 and 98 on the first mentioned thoroughfare. After refitting the house, Mr. Jenkins changed its name to the Merchants' Hotel, and so conducted it until May, 1869, when it was destroyed by fire. During the same summer it was re-built on a larger scale, and was, in January, 1868, opened, under the management of Mr. Jenkins, as the St. James. In the fall of that year he sold the house, to Libby & Meserve, for $75,000; who kept it until in 1870. In September of that year Mr. Meserve retired from the firm, and assumed the proprietorship of the new Palmer House. Libby & Harlow continued to keep the St. James until it was destroyed in the fire.

MINOR HOTELS.—The hotels of minor importance, from 1860-71, were as follows:

Gelis House, Canal and Mitchell streets; Girard House, South Water Street, opposite the Illinois Central Railroad depot; Globe House, kept by David Bush, Nos. 57-61 Kinzie Street; Ilanover House, No. 50 South Wells Street; Merchants' Hotel, Nos. 17-19 LaSalle Street; Ohio Exchange, No. 40 Sherman Street; Rio Grande Hotel, No. 39 LaSalle Street; and the Vermont House, No. 19 South Market Street.

In 1861 there were: Clarendon House, No. 322 Randolph Street; Clifton House, Wabash Avenue, southeast corner Madison Street; Colby House, southwest corner Wells and Washington streets; Darrow House, State Street, southeast corner Hardin Place; Doty House, Nos. 80-82 Randolph Street; Duncan House,

No. 34 Kinzie Street; Farmers' Hotel, No. 131 West Lake Street; Fort Wayne House, No. 160 VanBuren Street; Foster House, northeast corner Clark and Kinzie streets; LaFayette House, Nos. 326-28 Wells Street; Myer's Hotel, No. 48 Sherman Street; Stanwix Hall, No. 279 Clark Street; South Branch House, southwest corner Canal and Meagher streets; Union Park House, West Madison Street, opposite Union Park; Waverly House, Nos. 323-25 Kinzie Street.

In 1862 there were the Alliance House, Canal near Harrison Street; Anderson House, Nos. 27-29 West Randolph Street; Arctic House, Canal between Madison and Monroe streets; Baltic House, No. 175 Washington Street; California House, No. 419 State Street; Central House, Nos. 180-82 Randolph Street; Continental, No. 16 North Wells Street; Franklin Street House, No. 51 Franklin Street; National Hotel, No. 300 Clark Street; Prescott House, Nos. 76-78 Wells Street (now Fifth Avenue); Randolph Street House, No. 174 West Randolph Street; Union House, Canal and Madison streets; and the Washington House, Nos. 244-246 Randolph Street.

In 1863, there were: Brewer's Arms, No. 47 West Lake Street; the Brighton House, on Archer Road; Burton's Hotel, Washington, southeast corner Wells Street; Warner House, Nos. 202-206 Randolph Street; Sam Patrick's Hotel, Nos. 112-114 Franklin Street; and the Hotel DeLunn, at No. 88 Monroe Street.

In 1864 may be noted in this class: All Nations Hotel, Nos. 12-14 North Canal Street, kept by Thos. R. Jones; Buell House, State and Twenty-second streets, by James M. Buell; DuPage House, Nos. 100-92 Randolph Street, by P. Dieter; Steward House, Nos. 94-102 State Street, by L. S. Elliott; and the Wheeling House, Nos. 82-84 West Lake Street, by Jacob Kesse.

In 1865, there were: The Atlantic, No. 37 West Lake Street; Central House, No. 182 Randolph Street; Fort Donelson House, No. 27 North Canal Street; Godfrey House, No. 352 Clark Street; Illinois House, No. 183 Illinois Street; Magnolia House, No. 163 Market Street; Rob Roy House, No. 46 North Dearborn Street; and the St. Cloud, Nos. 112-14 Franklin Street.

In 1866, there were: The Lincoln House, Nos. 29-31 West Randolph Street; the Oneida House, No. 280 South Wells Street; St. Clair's Hotel, No. 82 West Water Street; Bremen Hotel, No. 137 West Lake Street; and the Arctic House, Nos. 95-97 Canal Street.

In 1867: The Aurora House, No. 280 Wells Street; Champlin House, Nos. 47-49 Randolph Street, by W. E. Champlin; Desplains House, No. 13 West Lake Street; LaFayette House, No. 236 Wells Street; Potomac House, No. 27 Michigan Avenue; Washington Exchange Hotel, No. 27 Kinzie Street; and the Waverly House, at Nos. 223-25 Kinzie Street, by Robert Butcher.

In 1868: The Everett House, northeast corner Clark and Van Buren streets, kept by N. A. & E. G. White; Farwell House, Nos. 140-42 Madison Street; Michigan Central House, by Conrad Metzger, No. 21 Michigan Avenue; St. Louis House, by William Eberhardt, Nos. 27-70 Clark Street; and the Montgomery House, corner Clark and Harrison streets, by R. Douthett & Co.

In 1869: The Allen House, Nos. 54-56 Sherman Street, William Palmer, proprietor; Shaw's European Hotel, southwest corner Lake and State streets; Grant House, Nos. 135-37 Jackson Street; Lincolnshire House, kept by J. Darley, No. 121 West Lake Street; Montreal House, No. 185 Wells Street, by Peter B. Crepeau; and Wheeler's Hotel, J. B. Wheeler, proprietor, Nos. 80 and 82 West Water Street.

In 1870: California House, Nos. 419-421 State Street, kept by Fred. Ranohan; Clarendon House, by H. M. Miller, No. 152 North Clark Street; Continental Hotel, by Ed. R. Benedick, No. 249 Clark Street; the Douglas House, Sid. B. Andrews & Co., Vincennes Avenue and Douglas Place; Howard House, No. 280 State Street, by Collins & Jackson; Mansion House, No. 167 VanBuren Street, Jeremiah Fournier, proprietor; Morton House, by J. W. Canan, Nos. 112-14 Franklin Street; and the Raymond House, northwest corner State and Madison streets, kept by Messrs. Hinsdale & Campbell.

In 1871: The Baltimore House, by F. C. Freyholz, No. 64 North Canal Street; Blenis House, by Louis Blenis, Nos. 27-29 West Randolph Street; the Broadway House, M. C. Stender, proprietor, No. 830 State Street; Burke's European Hotel, by M. Burke, No. 140-142 Madison Street; Madison House, by J. Latham, Nos. 124-126 West Madison Street; Michigan Avenue Hotel, by J. Ullman, southwest corner of Michigan Avenue and Congress Street; and Prince's Hotel, by S. D. Prince, at the southwest corner of Washington Street and Fifth Avenue.

THE MICHIGAN AVENUE HOTEL, above mentioned, was opened to the public, in September, 1870, its proprietors being J. F. Pierson and J. B. Shepard. It had about seventy-nine rooms, and was furnished in costly style. It did not, however, prove a profitable venture to its proprietors, who went into bankruptcy. Joshua Barrell, assignee, sold the furniture at public sale. It was afterward continued by Joseph Ullman and Herman Tobias.

While the fire was burning on the opposite side of founded at Evanston, they still retained possession of the property, and in 1867 leased it in perpetuity to three citizens of Chicago. Henry M. Smith was one of the lessees of the tract, and in March, 1869, secured the passage of an act incorporating the "Pacific Hotel Company, of Chicago," with a capital stock of $500,000. In December, Mr. Tracy was chosen president, and, as is well known, many of the leading stockholders were closely identified with the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific railroad companies.

It was the original intention to erect the hotel upon the tract covered by Mr. Smith's lease; but the company afterward obtained from P. F. W. Peck a lease of the adjoining land, which made the boundaries Clark, Jackson, LaSalle and Quincy streets, the alley being vacated. Finally, after making a study of all the most completely appointed hotels in the country, the company decided upon a plan which, in general terms, provided for a magnificent structure six stories in height, built in the modern Italian style, with four grand entrances.

In July, 1870, the stockholders of the company held a meeting, and elected L. B. Otis, president, manager of construction, and chief financial officer, Henry M. Smith being secretary. Under the management of Mr. Otis, and the able supervision of W. W. Boyington, the architect, the grand plan was carried out, and in October, 1871, the palatial hotel had risen to its full stature, and was protected by a substantial covering. But it was born only to die; for, on the 9th of that month, it was destroyed by the great fire, and left only an imposing and beautiful ruin.

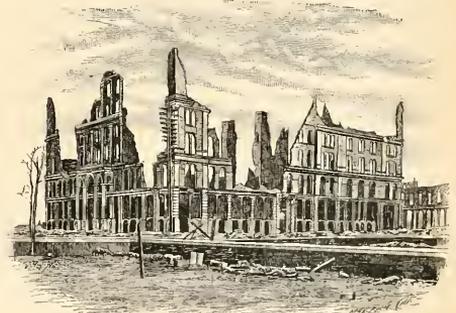

PALMER HOUSE.

the street, John B. Drake made an offer for the hotel, which was accepted, the purchaser taking his chances of its being destroyed. It, however, escaped the conflagration, and was the only building of any considerable size on the South Side that did so. It was, thereupon, opened to the public by Mr. Drake, as the Tremont House, and retained by him until 1873. The building was one of the landmarks* showing the boundary of the fire of 1871.

THE PALMER HOUSE was built in 1869-70, by Potter Palmer, at the northwest corner of State and Quincy streets, and although, in size and elegance, it is not to be compared with the present hotel bearing that name, it was a costly and imposing edifice. The house was eight stories in height, with handsome stone fronts, and contained two hundred and twenty-five rooms. The cost of its erection was $200,000, and of furnishing $100,000. The house was completed, and opened to the public, on Monday, September 26, 1870, by W. F. P. Meserve, the first proprietor. It was, of course, destroyed in the fire of 1871, after which the present splendid edifice, bearing the same name, was erected.

THE GRAND PACIFIC.—This splendid structure was erected to meet the demands of the rapidly-growing city, which, even in 1869-70, was acknowledged by the business world to be the metropolis of the West. As early as 1851, the trustees of the Northwestern University had purchased of P. F. W. Peck the tract of land between Jackson and Quincy streets, fronting on LaSalle Street, and there established a preparatory or high school. After their educational institution had been

* For view of this hotel, see chapter headed "Burning of Chicago."

RUINS, GRAND PACIFIC HOTEL.

RESTAURANTS.—As an adjunct to the history of hotels, may be given the personal mention of two of the leading caterers of this city; men whose progress in their business has been marked by honorable commercial characteristics, as well as commendable public spirit:

HERBERT M. KINSLEY, the most prominent caterer and restaurateur in Chicago, began business in this city April 17, 1865, at No. 65 Washington Street, in the Crosby Opera House block. His ambition then, as now, was to be the first in his line, and to this end he fitted up and equipped the finest restaurant in the city, his partner in the enterprise being U. H. Crosby. At the end of two years he sold his business to John Wright, and for one year thereafter was occupied in establishing hotel and dining cars. In the spring of 1868, he opened a restaurant and catering business at No. 23 Washington Street, continuing until the great fire. He suffered heavily in the fire, being insured in local companies, and collecting only a small amount of insurance. He then erected a shanty on Michigan Avenue, near Madison Street, in the building of which he assisted, and three weeks later began business. In the autumn of 1872, he took charge of the hotels on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, opening the Queen City hotel at Cumberland, Md., the Deer Park hotel at Deer Park, Md., and the Company's hotel at Grafton, Va. At the end of one year he returned to Chicago, and became connected with Brown's restaurant, at the corner of Madison and Clark streets, as manager for Wentworth & Woolworth, until their failure, when he leased the building and opened on his own account in the spring of 1874. In December of the same year he closed the house, and in April, 1875, began business at No. 66 Washington Street. Being reduced by manifold misfortunes to an humble position, Mr. Kinsley accepted the situation, fully confident that, though crushed by failure and disappointment, the time would come when he would hold no second place in his profession. His beginning at No. 66 Washington Street was of the humblest order, but it was not possible for a man of Mr. Kinsley's ambition and business ability to continue depressed. He will, in November, 1885, occupy his new building on Adams Street, between Clark and Dearborn streets, and will then have accommodations inferior to none in the United States. For modern elegance and convenience, his new quarters will be unsurpassed in this country. Mr. Kinsley was born in Canton, Mass., September 18, 1831. He passed his boyhood days in the schools of his native city, and at the age of eighteen was employed as a store boy in Springfield, Mass. He next obtained employment in a hosiery establishment in Boston, where he remained nearly two years. At the end of that time he went to Baltimore, and for about two years was bookkeeper in the office of the Baltimore Patriot. After leaving Baltimore, Mr. Kinsley first entered upon the business in which he has since become so famous, that of catering to the public. He took charge of the Woodruff House, in Cincinnati, which he managed for one year, coming to Chicago the following year (in 1857). He entered the old City Hotel as clerk, and afterward went to Brantford, Canada, and, taking charge of the Kirkby House, managed it for one year. Then, in company with John A. Rice, he became the proprietor of the Anglo-American, at Hamilton, Canada, the firm name being Rice & Kinsley. During his management of this house, he served a ball to the Prince of Wales in 1859, the splendor of which attracted comments from the entire press throughout the British possessions, and was one of the most elaborate receptions ever held in the Province. Returning to Chicago in 1860, Mr. Kinsley entered the Tremont House as clerk, and was afterward connected with the Sherman House as steward. Later on, he became the manager of the Revere House, and left there, in the winter of 1864, to superintend the fitting up of the Opera House restaurant, which he occupied the following spring. Mr. Kinsley was married in 1855, to Miss Angie M. Gilman, of Baltimore. They have three daughters — Francis, now the wife of Charles L. Hutchinson; Clara, the wife of Robert G. Clarke; and Emily. Mr. Kinsley is a prominent Mason, being a member of Ashlar Lodge, No. 908, A. F. & A. M.; LaFayette Chapter, No. 2, R. A. M.; Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; and of Oriental Consistory, 32° S. P. R. S. He is also a member of the Washington Park Club.

THOMAS ECKARDT, who conducts the only exclusive catering business in the city, came here in 1856, and opened a catering business at No. 228 State Street in company with his brother, the firm being Thomas Eckardt & Bro., until 1859, when the junior partner retired. In the fall of 1862, he moved to No. 126 State Street, and there continued until the great fire. Mr. Eckardt was one among the many who saw the accumulations of years of industry and economy swept away by the fire. Although losing all the property that he possessed, he still retained that energy which had enabled him to make one fortune, and, on September 1, 1872, he again commenced business at No. 263 W. Madison Street. He remained there until October 18, 1884, when he moved to No. 573 W. Madison Street, occupying the building which he had just completed. In 1881, he opened an order office in the Palmer House, and where he still caters to the élite of Chicago. Mr. Eckardt was born in Washington, D. C., December 9, 1825, the son of Henry Eckardt, a packer. While yet a mere child, his parents died, and he was afterward sent to the academy at Woodstock, Va., remaining there until he had reached his thirteenth year. At that time he returned to Washington, and assisted his brother, who was a caterer in that city, until he came to Chicago in 1856. He was twice married, first in 1849, to Miss Jane Collins of Delaware, and the second time in 1881, to Miss Mary Gould, the daughter of George Gould, of Hamilton, Ontario. Mr. Eckardt is a member of Hesperia Lodge, No. 411, A. F. & A. M.; of Washington Chapter No. 43, R. A. M.; and St. Bernard Commandery, No. 35, K. T. Mr. Eckardt is perhaps one of the most skillful caterers in the profession, having served the refreshments at some of the most noteworthy occasions in the history of Chicago society entertainments. At the Inauguration of President Taylor, in 1854, in the east wing of the Patent Office at Washington, the World's Fair was held. Mr. Eckardt had the contract to furnish a department of the Fair, and supplied a cake which was one of the finest ever exhibited, being fourteen feet high, built in a pyramidical form and weighing five thousand pounds, and for novelty of design it has never since been equaled by any public exhibit.

SOCIAL PROGRESS

An allusion is made, in the first volume of this work, to the embryonic state of society, and the manner in which the primitive settlers of a new country necessarily formulate and follow certain principles which underlie all social discriminations.

The Fort Dearborn of 1812, however, was a vastly different settlement from the City of Chicago in 1857. In the latter year social distinctions had become recognized facts. The line of class demarcation was sharply drawn, but still within the higher stratum were several equally well-defined circles. It may be characterized, not unfairly, as a period of Church cliques. Certain Churches, in both the North and South divisions, were recognized as aristocratic, and membership or attendance constituted a valid passport to social recognition. Denominational and parochial lines were more clearly defined than than now, yet wealth, even in those early days of Chicago's history, exerted a potent influence in the determination of the social status.

There were few social events which excited any marked interest. The "Cosmopolitan Club" was comparatively unknown, and no one seemed disposed to lead in breaking down the barriers of Church association. The artists made the first step in this direction; and the annual receptions of the Academy of Design, with their attendant features of dancing and of tableaux vivants, were enjoyed with a keen zest, as they were unexceptional in character, and occurred at long intervals.

Two excellent Mænnerchor's were formed; and, in 1870, three operas were rendered by local amateurs, at the Crosby Opera House. These operatic representations, like the receptions of the Academy, called together the leaders of society, as well as all those who had social prominence. They had a dual value; not only did they stimulate and cultivate a higher taste for the arts of music and design, but their tendency was toward the obliteration of imaginary social lines and the annihilation of social cliques.

It must be remembered, however, that "clubs," "art receptions" and "operatic renditions," necessarily, are for the few. In the busy life of a young commercial city, the majority are not able to find either the leisure or the means to gratify a taste for the aesthetic. To meet the aspirations of this class, to furnish its members with social pleasures which are morally healthful, is one of the fundamental principles upon which the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago has reared its success.

THE Y. M. C. A. AND FARWELL HALL.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION was organized during the evening of June 29, 1858, by the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and the election of officers. The following were the first officers of the Association :

Cyrus Bentley, president; Henry Howland, John V. Farwell, T. W. Bruce, R. Howe, J. E. Parsons, Alexander Baime, R. J. Rundell, vice-presidents; A. C. Leckie, recording secretary; H. D. Penfield, corresponding secretary; L. E. Alexander, treasurer; R. C. Waterman, register and librarian.

It began with a membership of one hundred and fifty-one, and, by the end of the first year, the number was increased to three hundred and fifty-five. It had rooms in the Methodist Church Block, corner of Clark and Washington streets, which it occupied until the completion of its own building in 1867.

Its first important work was the establishment of a daily noon prayer-meeting, which, during the winter and spring, was well attended. But after that the meetings languished. During this time of waning interest, a young man, who had already achieved some local repute in the Mission Sunday-school work, entered actively upon the work of the Association. He was Dwight L. Moody. Under his influence, the Association became a free and popular institution, taking in all classes of society. He was chairman of the committee to visit the poor and the sick; and the report of his first year's work showed that he visited five hundred and fifty-four families, and bestowed in charity $2,350, raised by the Association for that purpose. At the breaking out of the War, the devotional committee, of which Mr. Moody was the chairman, found a new field of labor. At Camp Douglas, he organized a prayer-meeting, and, every evening, eight or ten meetings were held in the different quarters, and on Sunday an almost continual service was held. The chapel of the Young Men's Christian Association at Camp Douglas, built in October, 1861, was the first camp chapel ever erected. Afterward, when Camp Douglas became a prison, Moody and his co-workers of the Association still prosecuted their labors there, and did a grand work among the prisoners, a great revival being the result of their labors. Meanwhile, as the War progressed, the Association joined in the labors of the Christian and Sanitary Commissions; and on many battle-fields their committees were found, assisting the wounded and caring for the dead. It was during these years that requests for prayers, from over the State and from the surrounding States, were sent to be read at the Chicago noon prayer-meeting, so that for a time this meeting seemed to be the center and heart of the religious life of the Northwest.

The report of the Army Committee for 1865 shows a distribution of 1,537 Bibles, 20,565 Testaments, 1,000 prayer-books, 2,025 hymn-books, 24,896 other religious books, 127,545 religious newspapers, and 43,450 pages of tracts, besides 28,400 literary papers and magazines. The Camp Douglas Chapel was erected at a cost of $2,300, and a soldier's library and reading-room were furnished by the Association, in a building erected by the Christian Commission. This was in addition to the regular home work.

An Employment Bureau was established in 1865, and situations were found for 1,435 men, 124 boys, and 718 girls, besides transient employment for many persons who were unable to go out to service. During this time the Association had occupied rented quarters in the Methodist Church Block, but its rapid growth and the great enlargement of its field of labor called for largely increased accommodations.

FARWELL HALL.—The question of building a hall was actively discussed, but the ways and means were not clear. At length a member said, "The only way for us to obtain a new building is to elect Mr. Moody president of the Association." Mr. Moody was nominated and elected to the office in the spring of 1866. The Association had been incorporated by the Legislature on February 22, 1861, the act being amended February 21, 1867. The trustees, under the act, were T. M. Avery, E. W. Blatchford, J. V. Farwell, William L. Lee, H. E. Sargent, A. R. Scranton, E. B. McCagg, Cyrus H. McCormick, H. A. Hurlbut, George Armour, E. D. L. Sweet and B. F. Jacobs. A large amount of the stock—over $100,000—was placed at once, the ground was presented by J. V. Farwell, and building operations forthwith commenced on Madison Street, between Clark and LaSalle streets. The building contained a public hall capable of seating twenty-five hundred people, a large room for the noon prayer-meeting, a library, a reading-room, offices of the tract and publication department, the relief department, and the employment bureau, private rooms for some of the officers, and other accommodations. There were also several fine stores and offices, and it was expected that the surplus earnings from rentals would retire all the stock—amounting to $300,000—in ten years. On Sunday evening, September 29, 1867, the new hall was dedicated. The services were continued the next evening, and then, in honor of John V. Farwell, it was named Farwell Hall. From this time, Mr. Moody became the apostle of the Young Men's Christian Association, and he was tireless in his devotion to its cause.

The new building was not destined to a long existence. It was destroyed by fire on the 7th of January, 1868. The loss was a heavy one, for the building was only partly insured. While the ruins were still smoking, a subscription was opened, and designs for another building were under way. Donations were made, and in the following year the second Farwell Hall took the place of the first. It was dedicated on the 19th of January, 1869. It remained the home of the Association and the center of a great Christian and benevolent work, until it was swept away by the fire of 1871.

Mr. Moody remained president for four years, but in the spring of 1870 he declined re-election, and was succeeded by C. M. Henderson. The following were the presidents of the Association during the several years specified: 1858–59, Cyrus Bentley; 1860–61, John V. Farwell; 1862, J. H. Hollister; 1863, B. F. Jacobs; 1864, E. S. Wells; 1865, H. W. Fuller; 1868–69, D. L. Moody; 1870–71, C. M. Henderson.

DWIGHT LYMAN MOODY was born on February 5, 1837, at Northfield, Mass. His father was Edwin Moody, and his mother Betsey (Holton) Moody. Edwin Moody died during 1841, leaving Mrs. Moody with a family of nine children, her only means of support being the little home on the mountain side, and an acre or two of land, not entirely free from debt. D. L. Moody was for some time unsettled, both in conduct and aims, and his studies were much neglected. His uncle, Samuel Holton, a shoe merchant in Boston, visited Northfield in 1853, and was little inclined to aid him to find a situation in the city, because of his desire to throw off all restraint. But the next spring, upon young Dwight's unexpectedly visiting Boston, a situation was found for him upon the condition that he should attend Dr. Kirk's church, and accept a certain boarding place. He began his clerkship, and soon could sell, in three months, more goods than other clerks could in a year. On May 16, 1855, he asked for admission to the Church, but was not received until his second application, made March 5, 1856. His early attempts to deliver addresses in prayer-meetings were discouraged by his friends, who frankly told him he could better serve God in some other way. In 1856, he came to Chicago, and joined the Plymouth Congregational Church; and here, also, his efforts to address the prayer-meetings were heard with dissatisfaction. Desiring more work, he took a Sunday-morning class in the First Methodist Episcopal Church, and he was soon, in connection with a small Mission Sunday-school, accorded the privilege of bringing in and teaching new scholars. In the spring of 1857, while distributing tracts and testaments to sailors, he met J. B. Stillson, a Presbyterian elder, from Rochester, N. Y., engaged in the same work; and for some months afterward the two labored together. Success created a desire for a larger field. Near the North Side Market he collected a motley crowd of juveniles in a deserted saloon, and, as the work grew upon his hands, he removed his school to the North Market Hall, which was used on Saturday nights for dancing. The school was held in this hall for six years, when Mr. Moody rented a saloon that would accommodate about two hundred persons. He soon determined to devote his entire time to God, and when asked how he expected to live, replied, "God will provide if he wishes me to keep on, and I will keep on until I am obliged to stop." With reference to the commencement of his labors in Chicago, he said: "When I began my Christian course I tried to work in the churches in Chicago, and I was told I had better not speak. I went into the dark lanes and got meetings there. I kept my mouth open. I did not let the Church close it. * * Take a bold stand for Christ. You will never be good for much for God's service until the world calls you crazy. If the world has nothing to say against you, you are not much of a Christian." Upon the breaking out of the War, he devoted much attention to the soldiers in Camp Douglas, and was very active in this labor. He was subsequently in the service of the Christian Commission, and president of the Executive Branch for Chicago, and frequently went to scenes of conflict, where he remained for weeks working with untiring zeal. After the close of the War, he became city missionary of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association, and afterward its president, and the hall of the Association became one of the stated fields of his labor. In the great fire of 1871, his Church, house and furniture were destroyed. He was compelled to flee from his house in the middle of the night, and saved nothing but his Bible. In thirty days afterward, a low wooden building was erected at the corner of Ontario and Wells streets for the accommodation of his congregation, and became known as the North Side Tabernacle. Mr. Moody, since the fire, has devoted most of his time to his work as an evangelist, in all parts of the United States and Great Britain. As an illustration of the results of his labors, the following is given: At a meeting in Glasgow, in December, 1873, the Crystal Palace, seating six thousand people, was crowded during a most gloomy day. A second meeting was organized, and thousands were turned away, unable to get into either meeting. A year afterward, Rev. Dr. Sewall, in a public address, said that as a result of the meetings, seven thousand had been added to the churches of Glasgow alone. Three thousand active young men were added to the various churches in Liverpool as the result of his labors there, and similar results were reported from other large cities. In connection with Mr. Sankey, he has since carried on the work in all the large cities of the United States, and also in Great Britain, many thousands being added to the Church as the result of their united labors. Mr. Moody was married, August 28, 1862, to Miss Emma C. Revell.

THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

With the revulsion of 1857, the Mechanics' Institute entered upon a period of decline, from which it never recovered. The city outgrew the need for such an organization; the men who had founded it were growing old, and new recruits came in but slowly and with hesitation. The War took off the younger element of its membership. The Young Men's Association, covering much of the same ground, came more into public favor, and the old-time popular Institute gradually dropped out of sight. Had it not been for the beneficence of Azel A. Peck, the Institute would have ceased to exist before 1860. He was elected president of the Institute in January, 1848, and on March 25, 1848, executed a will by which he bequeathed to the Institute, jointly with the Church of the Messiah, the rents and income of a lot of land on the corner of Washington and Canal streets, subject to the life-estate of his wife. Mrs. Peck died in 1867, since which time the income of the estate has been received by the Institute and the Church. The will further provided that the estate should revert, in fee-simple, to the devisees twenty-one years after the death of Mrs. Peck. The main object of the bequest was to provide an education for poor mechanics by means of the Institute.

Just prior to the financial crisis the Institute was supposed to be in a very flourishing condition. New and more spacious quarters were obtained for it in the First Presbyterian Church, corner of Washington and Clark streets, and were fitted up for its use at great expense. Heavy debts were incurred, and when the hard times culminated the Institute became bankrupt. Smaller quarters were taken, and but little work was done beyond the circulation of the books in the library. In 1861, W. W. Boyington, then president, reported the indebtedness at about $3,000. Then came judgments and executions, and the library and fixtures were sold to pay the debts. From that time until after the great fire, little or nothing was done by the Institute for the purposes for which it had been organized, beyond the regular calling of meetings and the annual elections of officers. This was done in order to preserve the Peck bequest, which would one day be of large value. After the death of Mrs. Peck, in 1867, the Superior Court appointed John M. Van Osdel trustee of the Institute as to matters relating to the will of Mr. Peck. It was not until some time after the fire that the income from the estate proved of material advantage to the Institute. The following were the presiding officers from 1858 to 1871: 1858, George P. Hansen; 1859, John V. Farwell; 1860-61, W. W. Boyington; 1862-67, John M. Van Osdel; 1868-71, Sanford Johnson.

The Institute had in 1871 one hundred and forty enrolled members, besides a number of life-members. The great fire swept away the last vestige of its books and property, also consuming its records. But there were still old members left who appreciated its importance, and preserved the organization. The Peck will provided—"In case the Mechanics' Institute should at any time cease to exist, that the City of Chicago, for the benefit of the Common School Fund, shall be its successor to all the benefits under the will." The city Board of Education, taking advantage of the apparent inaction of the Institute, at first attempted to have its charter declared forfeited by the State Legislature, in which it failed. It then filed an information of "non user" against it, to prove the non-existence of the association, that it might become its successor under the will. The matter never came to a hearing, however, as the Board subsequently dismissed their proceedings.

In 1875, the Institute made an arrangement with the Chicago Athenæum, by which rooms were provided for its use, and classes of instruction opened in arithmetic, mechanical drawing, and bookkeeping. This has proved highly successful and beneficial to both the Institute and the Athenæum, and is now likely to continue until the beneficent devise of Mr. Peck shall be exhausted. As the income from the estate has increased, the scope of instruction has widened, until it now embraces a complete Art-Industrial education, which is furnished at a comparatively trifling cost to each pupil.

Among those who have been prominently identified with the Institute may be mentioned Alanson S. Sherman, John M. Van Osdel, Jonathan A. Kennicott, Edward Burling, William W. Boyington, Frederick Bauman, James Hollingsworth, John Wentworth, R. E. Moss, Cornelius Price, William Bross, Charles M. Gray, N. S. Bouton, J. W. McGinness, Amos Grannis, Oren Sherman, John Sollitt, Jonathan Clark, Archibald Campbell, J. M. Adsit, P. I. Warner, Bernard Heeney, William Baker, John McEwen, Isaac Speer, Thomas B. Bryan and George F. Prussing.

THE CHICAGO LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

THE YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION, afterward known as the Chicago Library Association, entered upon the year 1858 under all the depressing influence of the financial revulsion of the year before. In 1857, it incurred increased annual expense on account of its removal to larger quarters in Portland Block, where the rental was $2,000 per annum; but its income, instead of increasing, very considerably diminished. The lecture season of 1858 proved unsuccessful in a financial point of view, and the close of the year found the Association largely in debt. The year 1859 did not bring relief from indebtedness, and the years 1860 and 1861 found it still staggering under heavy burdens of debt, as well as the apparent indifference on the part of those who had once been its warmest friends and supporters. There were, at the close of the year, eight thousand volumes in the library, a membership of nearly fifteen hundred, and an indebtedness of about $5,000. From this time until 1871, the Association was uniformly, though moderately, prosperous.

The Young Men's Christian Association was, in the spring of 1871, in a flourishing condition, and many friends of both associations thought they should be united. The candidates, at an annual election for the presidency of the Library Association, in March, 1871, were selected because of their views on that question. Three tickets were placed in the field—the regular ticket, headed by Hon. William Bross; a second by Marshall Field, favorable to annexation to the Young Men's Christian Association; and another, headed by John C. Dore. The election was held on the 25th of March, and many friends of the Young Men's Christian Association paid $5 for the membership certificates and voted the annexation ticket. The total number of votes cast was two hundred and forty three, of which the Field ticket received a large majority. The by-laws of the Association provided, however, that at the election of officers, all ballots not written or printed on white paper should be rejected. The inspectors of election found that the annexation ticket was printed on yellow paper, and consequently rejected them, and declared the election of the Bross ticket, which received only sixty-three votes. At a subsequent meeting, very largely attended by the members, a new election was ordered for Saturday, April 1, when the Bross ticket was successful, without a resort to technicalities. As these were the last officers of the Association, a list of them is here given:

Hon. William Bross, president; Hon. W. W. Farwell, first vice-president; John Crerar, second vice-president; William R. Larrabee, recording secretary; George M. Frink, corresponding secretary; Charles Henrotin, treasurer; General J. D. Webster, George L. Dunlap, Potter Palmer, John C. Dore, William Vocke, Murry Nelson and Edwin Lee Brown, managers.

During 1871 there was no improvement in the financial condition or prospects of the Association. In October the great conflagration came, and the Chicago Library Association ceased to exist.

The following were the presidents of the Association for the years mentioned:

1858, Erastus S. Williams; 1859, Edwin S. Wells; 1860, William H. Bradley; 1861, Philip Wadsworth; 1862, George S. Bowen; 1863, William E. Doggett; 1864, Henry M. Shepard; 1865, George M. Kimbark; 1866-67, Edwin Lee Brown; 1868, Charles H. Reed; 1869, Robert Collyer; 1870, C. C. Bonney; 1871, William Bross.

Other prominent members during these years were Melville W. Fuller, Thomas B. Bryan, George W. Gage, Norman Williams, Jr., William Sprague, Benjamin V. Page, Samuel J. Glover, J. Young Scammon, W. L. Newberry, Charles Hitchcock, and General J. D. Webster.

THE CHICAGO HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

At the suggestion, and chiefly through the well-directed efforts, of Rev. William Barry, the Chicago Historical Society was organized on the 24th of April, 1856, by the election of the following officers:

William H. Brown, president; William B. Ogden and J. Young Scammon, vice-presidents; S. D. Ward, treasurer; William Barry, recording secretary and librarian; Charles H. Ray, corresponding secretary. In addition to the above, the first members of the Society were Mark Skinner, M. Brayman, George Manierre, John H. Kinzie, J. V. Z. Blaney, Isaac N. Arnold, E. I. Tinkham, J. D. Webster, W. A. Smallwood, Van H. Higgins, N. S. Davis, M. D. Ogden, F. Scammon and Ezra B. McCagg. Luther Haven was added before the end of the year.

As stated in its constitution, the objects of the society were the establishment of a library and a cabinet of antiquities, relics, etc.; the collection of historical manuscripts, documents, papers and tracts; to encourage the discovery and investigation of aboriginal remains, especially within the State; and the collection of material illustrating the settlement and growth of Chicago. The president and secretary of the Society were men peculiarly fitted for the work before them. Mr. Brown was a gentleman of wide acquaintance and of remarkable historical attainments; while Rev. Mr. Barry not only possessed these qualities, but also gave up his whole time and strength to the work, with an industry and persistency which could not but bring good results. The first aim of the institution was to gather the primary materials of Illinois and American history, and to this end it directed its chief efforts. Although at first its patrons and active workers were few, by December, 1856, its collections amounted to thirty-three hundred volumes, of which three hundred and thirty-five were newspaper files. In December, 1856, an organization was effected for the ensuing year, and Colonel Samuel Stone chosen assistant librarian. To his active and unselfish interest and unrelaxing efforts may be attributed, to no small extent, the growth and firm establishment of the Society. On the 18th of December, 1856, the present seal was adopted.

On February 7, 1857, the Society was incorporated by Messrs. William H. Brown, William B. Ogden, Mahlon D. Ogden, J. Young Scammon, Mason Brayman, Mark Skinner, George Manierre, John H. Kinzie, J. V. Z. Blaney, Edward I. Tinkham, J. D. Webster, W. A. Smallwood, Van H. Higgins, N. S. Davis, C. H. Ray, S. D. Ward, Franklin Scammon, William Barry and E. B. McCagg. The number of resident members was limited to sixty. During 1857, there were added to the original list of members Samuel Stone, George F. Rumsey, Thomas Hoyno, I. H. Burch, John High, Jr., H. A. Johnson, Walter S. Gurnee, Walter L. Newberry, Charles L. Harmon, H. G. Loomis, Henry Farnum, Benjamin F. Carver, John C. Haines, John M. Wilson, John H. Foster, R. W. Patterson, Cyrus W. Bentley, B. W. Raymond and Robert H. Clarkson. Messrs. Moseley, Allen, Robbins and Stone were made life-members. By the first part of 1858, the collection of the Historical Society amounted to thirteen thousand volumes. In March of that year, the offer of Walter L. Newberry to provide them with a large room in his new building, corner of North Wells and Kinzie streets, was accepted. Before the end of the year, the volumes in the library aggregated eighteen thousand six hundred and fifty. There was no change in the officers during the year, except that Mr. Newberry was elected vice-president, in place of J. Young Scammon. In November, 1859, E. I. Tinkham was elected treasurer, in place of Mr. Ward.

The great event of 1859 was the exhibition of fine arts, under the auspices of the Chicago Historical Society, which opened on the 9th of May, in Burch's Building, corner of Wabash Avenue and Lake Street. It was the first public exhibition of paintings and statuary ever held in the State, and, for the six weeks during which it remained open, created much interest. During this period, twelve thousand persons registered themselves as "lovers of the fine arts." Including statuary, paintings and engravings, the pieces on exhibition numbered three hundred and seventy-two. Lieutenant-Colonel James D. Graham, chairman of the board of directors, contributed much to the success of the exhibition, he and L. W. Volk being, in fact, its chief instigators.

In February, 1860, the Society received a communication from Charles Macalester, of Philadelphia, on behalf of the estate of Henry D. Gilpin, conveying the intelligence of the generous endowment now known as the Gilpin Fund. By the terms of the will, it was to be invested and re-invested in public bonds of the city, and, after ten years, the income was to be used in the erection of a fire-proof building. This was to be separated from the main structure, but attached to it, and was to be known as "The Gilpin Library of the Historical Society of Chicago." No part of the principal was to be used, but after the building was completed the trustees of the fund were to appropriate to the use of the library the entire income of the estate, and to continue to invest in city stocks.

Walter L. Newberry succeeded William H. Brown as president of the Society in 1863; William B. Ogden and George Manierre, vice-presidents; Franklin Scammon, treasurer; William Barry, recording secretary and librarian; E. B. McCagg, corresponding secretary.

In June, 1866, Mr. Barry resigned his position, being succeeded by Thomas H. Armstrong. In September, Colonel Stone tendered his resignation as assistant librarian. J. W. Hoyt succeeded Mr. Armstrong.

The collections of the Society increased very rapidly, so that the quarters in the Newberry building were inadequate. An important step toward an increase of funds was the amendment to the constitution, passed in January, 1867, allowing an increase of resident members to any number. Soon afterward the Society commenced to shape its fund for building purposes.

The Society lost one of its best and most generous friends by the death of Mr. Newberry on November 6, 1868. J. Young Scammon succeeded him as president. Three lots had been purchased on the northwest corner of Dearborn Avenue and Ontario Street, and a building erected, intended to be but the west wing of the structure. It was a large, one-story brick building, with a deep basement, forty-two by ninety feet in size, and cost, with grounds, $60,000.

The new hall was dedicated November 19, 1868, Messrs. Scammon and Arnold delivering the addresses. When opened to the public, there were stored within its walls one hundred thousand volumes, newspapers, maps, manuscripts, etc.

In April, 1869, the Society received a bequest of $1,800 from Jonathan Burr, a wealthy and benevolent resident of Chicago.

On November 15, 1870, the following officers were elected: Edwin H. Sheldon, president; Thomas Hoyno, first vice-president; Ezra B. McCagg, second vice-president; E. I. Tinkham, treasurer; and J. W. Hoyt, secretary and librarian.

All the treasures of the Society were swept away by the great fire of 1871. The building was razed to the ground, and it seemed for a time as if the Chicago Historical Society was crushed beyond recovery. Among the rare manuscripts burned were the original draft of Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, the documentary history of Chicago and the Northwest, and 1,738 files of newspapers from the earliest settlement of the Northwest. There were 4,689 manuscripts, gathered at great expense, hundreds relating to the early Indian wars and nations. No more valuable and complete Indian history was extant. Several valuable paintings of noted men of early times in the West, and of famous Indian warriors and chiefs, were also destroyed.

RUINS, HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

CHICAGO ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

THE CHICAGO ACADEMY OF SCIENCES was founded in 1857, and the following were the original members: Drs. J. V. Z. Blaney, Nathan S. Davis, J. W. Freer, C. Helmuth, H. A. Johnson, E. Andrews, H. Parker and F. Scammon; and Messrs. R. K. Swift, J. D. Webster, E. W. Blatchford and H. W. Zimmerman.

Subscriptions were taken, amounting to about $1,500, and a room engaged in the old Saloon Building; when the financial crisis of that year put an end to the collecting of subscriptions, and, as a consequence, the society languished. As the hard times wore away, the courage of its promoters revived, and, in 1859, a new effort was made, the members of the society incorporating themselves under the name of "The Chicago Academy of Sciences," and new life was given to the enterprise. One of the most earnest workers for the society was Robert Kennicott.

ROBERT KENNICOTT was born in 1835, the son of Dr. John A. Kennicott, whose residence, called the "Grove," some eighteen miles northwest of Chicago, was well known to the early residents of the city. In boyhood, he had evinced a decided genius for natural science, and his father encouraged and assisted him. As he grew up, his exploring expeditions took wider and wider ranges, and his labors became more and more valuable. It had long been a favorite idea with him to build up a museum of natural history in Chicago, and he became one of the early members of the Academy. Many of the specimens he obtained on his expeditions were presented to it. By the time he was twenty-four, he had traveled largely over the entire Northwest, and had done a great work in arranging and classifying its natural history.

In 1859, Mr. Kennicott, under the direction of the Smithsonian Institute, led an exploring expedition into British and Russian North America. The field of his explorations stretched from Hudson's Bay to Behring's Straits, and occupied him three years. In 1862, he returned richly laden with specimens in all departments of natural history. These belonged to the Smithsonian Institute, but there had been an understanding that a full series of the specimens should be given to any society or institution Mr. Kennicott might name, which would suitably provide and care for them. He designated the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and under the impulse given by this valuable donation, the Academy again re-organized. A new charter was granted by the Legislature of the State to the following gentlemen: J. Young Scammon, George C. Walker, Horatio G. Loomis, Daniel Thompson, Edmund Aiken, Ezra B. McCagg, Eliphalet W. Blatchford, William E. Doggett, Robert Kennicott, Edmund Andrews, Hosmer A. Johnson, Oliver F. Fuller, James W. Freer, William Bross, James V. Z. Blaney and Benjamin F. Culver, under the name of "The Chicago Academy of Sciences."

Professor Agassiz was present at some of the meetings of the Academy, and testified to the great value of Mr. Kennicott's labors, with the result that about $60,000 was raised, and the Academy placed upon an enduring foundation. Mr. Kennicott was appointed the first director of the Museum, and the specimens, which were forwarded by the Smithsonian Institute, were arranged by him in the rooms of the Academy, in the Metropolitan Building, corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets. Constant additions were made by members of the Academy, by friends in the vicinity, and by exchanges with other societies.

In March, 1865, Mr. Kennicott, with a party of naturalists, undertook an expedition to Alaska, under the auspices of the Western Union Telegraph Company, to survey a route for a telegraph line to connect North America with Russia. An outfit for scientific purposes was furnished by the trustees from the funds of the Academy. The expedition, though begun auspiciously, and for a time successfully conducted, proved in the end a failure as to the results expected. Mr. Kennicott himself died from a sudden attack of illness on the banks of the Yukon River, in the depths of that remote region. Notwithstanding his loss, the Academy reaped some substantial results from the expedition.

Mr. Kennicott's successor as director of the Museum was Dr. William Stimpson, who was also the secretary of the Academy. In some departments of natural history he had a national reputation, having been for many years in charge of the Invertebrate Department of the Smithsonian Institute, and had become a recognized authority in that branch of Zoology. Dr. Stimpson continued in charge of the Museum, and in all ways promoted the interests of the Academy, until his death, in 1872.

In June, 1866, the building in which the Museum had been placed was partially destroyed by fire, and the collections damaged and a portion destroyed. The Society had been considering the subject of building for some time, and this fire stimulated them at once to action. A lot was purchased on Wabash Avenue, north of Van-Buren Street, and a fire-proof building erected thereon. It was opened on the 28th of January, 1868. So secure was this building supposed to be, that it became a favorite place for the deposit of special collections, and, for the same reason, several private libraries, rich in particular departments of science, found storage on its shelves, and added to its facilities in the prosecution of scientific inquiries.

On the 9th of October, 1871, this building in spite of its fire-proof qualities, with all its contents of inestimable value, specimens, manuscripts, library and apparatus, was burned.

THE CHICAGO ASTRONOMICAL SOCIETY.

The first movement which led to the organization of this Society was made in December, 1862, within the University of Chicago. It was caused by Rev. M. R. Fory, who came here, endeavoring to sell a telescope manufactured by Mr. Fitz, an optician of New York City. The price of the instrument was stated to be $8,000. In order to awaken a proper interest in the purchase of such an instrument, and the establishment of an observatory, it was determined, upon consultation with Dr. Burroughs and Prof. A. H. Mixer, that Rev. Mr. Fory should lecture on astronomy in Bryan Hall. This lecture was delivered December 8.

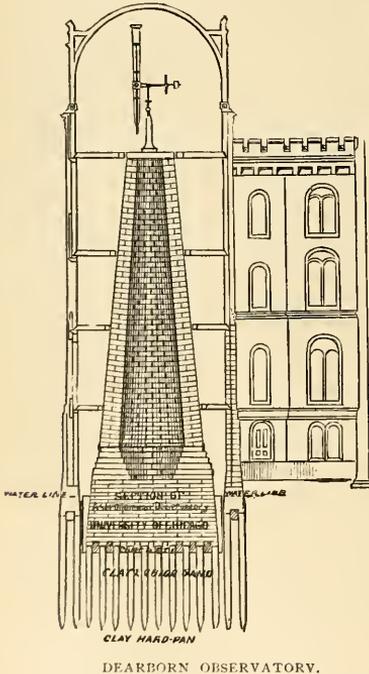

After the lecture, a meeting was organized by calling J. Young Scammon to preside, and a committee of five was then appointed with the view of purchasing the "Fitz glass" and of establishing an observatory. The committee consisted of J. Young Scammon, Rev. W. W. Everts, J. H. Woodworth, D. J. Ely and W. H. Wells. A meeting was held on December 13, and still another on December 15, to consider questions connected with the purchase of the "Fitz glass." But the committee had learned from Baron Brinnow, of the Ann Arbor University, something of the great telescope made by Alvan Clarke & Sons, of Cambridge, Mass., for the University of Mississippi, but which, on account of the breaking out of the Civil War, was left on the hands of the manufacturers. At a certain meeting of the committee this telescope was brought to the attention of the members by W. H. Wells, who also intimated that the Fitz glass had been previously offered for $2,000, and that he could see no good reason for paying $8,000 for an instrument which the maker had offered to other parties for from $2,000 to $3,000. Then the committee determined upon the purchase of the Clarke telescope, and thereby Chicago became the possessor of what was then the largest and best refracting telescope in the world, as its diameter was three inches greater than that of the great telescope at Cambridge, and greater than that of Pulkowa in Russia, the largest refracting telescope in Europe. This telescope of Alvan Clarke & Sons, upon being pointed to Sirius, discovered the hitherto unseen, though suspected, companion of Sirius.

Thomas Hoyme, as a sub-committee, visited Boston, ignoring both the claims of Mr. Fitz and the Fitz glass, which was, as the committee had ascertained, a dialytic instrument, and totally inadequate for observatory purposes. Mr. Hoyme at once secured the telescope, and thereby disappointed Professor G. P. Bond, who had commenced the circulation of a subscription list to purchase the instrument for the Cambridge Observatory.

At a meeting of the trustees of the University of Chicago, at which William B. Ogden presided, convened for the purpose of considering the proposed observatory, the telescope question was considered, and William B. Ogden at once subscribed $5,000 toward the project. About the middle of March, 1863, the committee took the initial steps toward erecting the observatory, by sending for a few plans for the building. On March 22, 1863, the telescope was purchased, and it was also learned that the Lalande prize, of the value of five hundred francs, had been awarded to Alvan Clarke & Sons by the French Academy of Sciences, for the discovery of the companion of Sirius with this telescope. Before the close of the month, one of our most liberal citizens (Hon. J. Y. Scammon) pledged himself to erect the building for the observatory and provide the room necessary for the instrument; another subscribed $5,000, and about nine others made themselves life-directors in the observatory by subscribing $500 each.

W. W. Boyington was sent east to examine different buildings, in order to be better prepared to construct here a suitable observatory. Afterward, under a contract between the University of Chicago and the Chicago Astronomical Society, an arrangement was made for the establishment of the observatory on the grounds of the first institution. The observatory-tower Mr. Scammon erected on the west side of the University building, at a cost to himself of $30,000, and it was named by the trustees of the university the "Dearborn Observatory," in memory of Mr. Scammon's first wife.

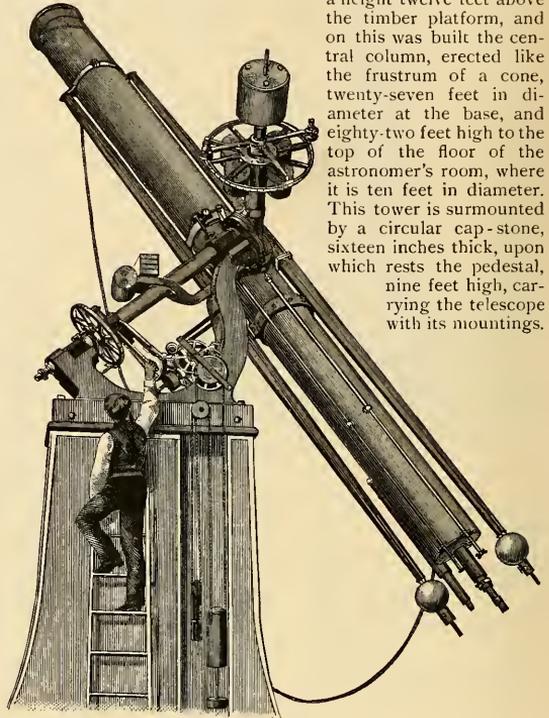

DEARBORN OBSERVATORY.

It consisted essentially of two independent buildings, the central and the outward portion. On account of the sandy nature of the soil, one hundred and five oak piles were driven twenty-seven feet into the earth, penetrating the underlying clay and hard pan. An excavation was made, fifteen feet deep, ten feet below water level, where the piles were sawed off and capped with square oak timbers. The interstices were filled with concrete, and then the entire surface was floored over with oak timbers. The masonry was then commenced on top of this foundation, consisting of solid blocks of stone from four to five feet square and from twelve to eighteen inches thick. This was carried up to a height twelve feet above the timber platform, and on this was built the central column, erected like the frustum of a cone, twenty-seven feet in diameter at the base, and eighty-two feet high to the top of the floor of the astronomer's room, where it is ten feet in diameter. This tower is surmounted by a circular cap-stone, sixteen inches thick, upon which rests the pedestal, nine feet high, carrying the telescope with its mountings.

THE GREAT TELESCOPE.

The foundation for this tower was completed about April 1, 1864.

The exterior building is octagonal in shape, thirty-five feet in diameter, one hundred feet high to the top of the roof. The original dome was hemispherical and rotated on balls, and was provided with a vertical opening nearly six feet wide. The floors of this exterior building do not touch the tower, so that neither the swaying of the building in the wind, nor the unequal expansion of its parts by the varying heat of the sun, have any effect upon the tower supporting the telescope. The tripod arrived November 4, 1864. It is eight and one-half feet high, seven and one-half feet long, three and one-half feet thick, and weighs upward of seven tons. It was quarried and shaped at the Penitentiary at Joliet.

The object-glass of the telescope has a clear aperture of eighteen and one-half inches diameter, and its focal length is twenty-three feet. It is provided with four astronomical eye-pieces, magnifying, respectively, 135, 225, 450 and 900 diameters; five micrometer eye-pieces, with magnifying power of 120, 190, 287, 385 and 900 diameters; a filar and two ring micrometers; and a single prism spectroscope. The declination circle is divided to five minutes of arc, and the right ascension circle to single minutes of time. Its total weight is nearly three tons, its tube is of mahogany, and its entire cost, including transportation and mounting, was $18,187. It arrived in Chicago from Boston at 2 p. m., on March 24, 1866, and was mounted on the 12th of April, Alvan Clarke himself being present, and remaining until the mounting was successfully accomplished.

The first director of the Observatory was Professor Truman Henry Safford. He had previously been engaged as assistant director at the Harvard Observatory. During the first three years he devoted most of his time to the observation of nebulae, and was the discoverer of about one hundred. During 1868, Walter S. Gurnee, of New York, formerly mayor of Chicago, donated $5,000 to the Society for the purchase of a Meridian Circle, which, like the telescope, was one of the largest ever made. From that time to the great fire of 1871, Professor Safford was engaged in a series of star observations, in connection with other astronomers at the principal observatories of the world, for the great catalogue of the German Astronomical Society. The share allotted to the Dearborn Observatory was the zone between the 35th and 40th degree of north declination, and about two-fifths of the work was completed at the date of the fire. During 1870, Elias Colbert* was made assistant director of the Observatory, without salary; and it was mainly through his efforts that a tower-clock was purchased, and the Observatory placed in communication with the Court-house bell.

The Chicago Astronomical Society was organized in November, 1863. The first board of directors was composed of J. Young Scammon, Thomas Hoyne, W. H. Wells, E. B. McCagg, A. H. Mixer, J. H. Woodworth, J. C. Burroughs, J. K. Pollard and T. B. Bryan. The first officers chosen were J. Young Scammon, president; W. H. Wells, vice-president; Thomas Hoyne, secretary, and D. J. Ely, treasurer. This Society was incorporated by the Legislature February 19, 1867. The officers of the Society conducted its affairs, under the title of Observatory Board, in a desultory manner, until 1870, when public interest became somewhat aroused by the efforts of Elias Colbert, personally, and through the public press. The history of this Society, together with what has been accomplished by means of the Observatory since the great fire of 1871, will be given hereafter.

OLD SETTLERS' SOCIETY.

This association was formed on February 9, 1871, at the Tremont House, Chicago, when it was decreed that "Members to be only residents of Cook County prior to the adoption of the charter of Chicago; and those voters resident in Cook County prior to January 1, 1843. The time may be extended, every third year, by a vote of three-fourths of the members present at an annual meeting. Ladies who have been here since 1843 are made honorary members."

The constitution was signed by the following gentlemen, who came to Chicago in the years preceding their names:

1818, Gurdon S. Hubbard; 1832, J. W. Pool, L. Nichols, James A. Marshall, Philo Carpenter, Joseph Mecker, Alexander

Beaubien; 1833, A. D. Taylor, Hibbard Porter, Asabel Pierce, Samuel Wayman; 1834, Rev. J. E. Ambrose, Grant Goodrich, Bennet Bailey, J. C. Rue, Alexander Wolcott, Seth Paine; 1835, James A. Smith, Tutbill King, Jacob Doney, Cyrenius Beers, M. D. Butterfield, John M. Turner, D. N. Chappell, George Bassett, James Lane, K. K. Jones, Charles V. Dyer, S. L. Brown; 1836,

James Couch, A. B. Wheeler, William L. Church, Daniel Worthington, A. Follansbe, J. T. Durant, Jacob Morgan, Charles Harding, James M. Hannahs, Elisha B. Lane, A. S. Sherman, Peter Graff, Oren Sherman, W. W. Smith, C. McDonald, John B. Weir, M. B. Smith, L. F. Hilliard, John Wentworth, John Turner, William M. Butler, L. A. Doolittle, C. B. Sammons, J. B. Hunt; 1837, Matthew Laflin, Michael White, N. S. Cushing, Elijah Smith, Darius Knights, William Wayman, J. B. Bridges, Eugene O'Sullivan, John M. Van Osdel, John Gray, Joel C. Walters; 1838, N. Coold, James B. Huggin, Alonzo J. Willard, William E. H. Gray, W. Butterfield, O. L. Lange; 1839, Henry Fuller, Isaac Speer, John A. Oliver, Sidney Sawyer; 1840, Edwin Judson, Thomas L. Forrest, Frederick Burcky, Thomas Speer; 1841, James Ward, B. W. Thomas; 1842, Thomas Hastie.

The especial object of the Society, as stated by John Wentworth, who was the prime mover in its organization, was not alone the social re-union of old settlers, but the collection and formulation of historic facts which otherwise would pass from remembrance and be lost.

THE FIRST GOLDEN WEDDING IN CHICAGO.—On February 13, 1863, Mr. and Mrs. D. B. Heatt celebrated their golden wedding at their residence, No. 122 Buffalo Street, it being the first occasion of the kind that happened in Chicago.

D. B. HEATT was born at West Troy, N. V., September 29, 1787, and Mrs Heatt (Jane Callender), was born at Sheffield, Mass., November 15, 1788. They were married at Poulney, Vermont, February 6, 1812, and came to Chicago in 1836. At the time of this event all their children, six in number, were living, and they had had thirty-three grandchildren, twenty-three of whom were living.

SILAS B. COBB, one of the oldest business men of Chicago, and now retired from active work, is a native of Montpelier, Vt., where he was born January 23, 1812. His father was, at different times, a tanner, a farmer and an inn-keeper, and early put his son to work. Silas began to learn the trade of a shoemaker, but he abandoned that and was apprenticed to a harnessmaker. After he had worked at this trade for a year, his employer sold out his business, and the purchaser claimed young Cobb as a part of his purchase; but, although eighteen years of age, his independent spirit evinced itself in his remark, that, "In this case, the nigger don't go with the plantation," and in his demand that a new arrangement be made. After his new employer had closed up his business, Mr. Cobb worked as a journeyman at Montpelier, South Hardwick, and other places. Nine months of faithful labor brought him a clear $60, with which, in his twenty-second year, he joined a party bound for the West. The company to which he attached himself was under the leadership of Oliver Goss, of Montpelier, who had already located on some government land near Chicago. Although his father was opposed to the venture, the young man determined to go as far west as his money would carry him. His route was to Buffalo, via the Erie Canal, and from thence to Chicago on the schooner "Atlanta." The passage was stormy, and, at the end of the trip, he was detained three days by the captain of the boat, who claimed that he owed him money; but the matter was finally adjusted by a sympathizing passenger, so that on June 2, 1833, after being on the water over five weeks, he landed in Chicago, or, rather in the rude settlement of log huts occupied by soldiers, half-breeds, and about thirty whites. Being penniless, he considered himself in luck when James Kinzie engaged him as the "boss carpenter" to superintend the erection of his hotel, at $2.75 a day and board. As Mr. Cobb knew no more about building a hotel than about the future Chicago, it is quite certain that his stress of circumstances forced him into assuming this responsibility, but he kept his eyes open, gave general directions, had under him a skilled workman, who really took the active management, and got along very well until he took into his employ a smart, prying Yankee who soon informed Mr. Kinzie of the true state of affairs. The young "boss" was therefore paid off, and with the proceeds of his venture bought up several lots of trinkets, which he put up at auction to the Indians and half-breeds. Next, he erected a small frame building, rented the upper part, using the lower story as a harness shop. Here, in company with Mr. Goss, who furnished the capital of thirty dollars for the purchase of the stock, he remained for one year, when he dissolved the partnership and removed to larger quarters. In 1848, he sold out his establishment at a good figure, and formed a partnership with William Osborne, dealing in boots and shoes, hides, and leather. Within four years he disposed of his interest, and retired from active business with a fair competency. He has since so sensibly invested his means in real estate and public enterprises, that he is among the most prosperous property owners in the city. In 1852, he was appointed executor of the estate of the late Joel Matteson of the Matteson House, and guardian of his five children, holding this position of trust until 1866. He was made a director of the Chicago Gas Light and Coke Company in 1855, and a few years thereafter was placed upon the board of management, being at present one of its members. It was under Mr. Cobb's administration, as president of the Chicago City Railway, that the cable system was introduced; and he is still connected with that corporation, the West Side Horse Railway Company and the National Bank of Illinois. In years past he has also been identified with the Galena & Chicago Union and the Beloit & Madison Railroads, and was the builder and owner of several fine blocks on Lake and Dearborn streets. Mr. Cobb was married, in 1840, to Maria Warren, daughter of Daniel Warren, of Warrenville, DuPage Co., Ill. They have had six children, of whom the following are living: Maria Louisa, the wife of William E. Walker; Bertha M., now Mrs. William Armour, and Leonora, married to Joseph G. Coleman.

* In 1860, Elias Colbert made the first attempt to establish standard time in the city.

WILLIAM HICKLING, who was, at the time of his death, vice-president of the Chicago Historical Society, was born in Lincolnshire, England, December 7, 1814. When he attained the age of seventeen, he emigrated to America, and after a six weeks' voyage, he arrived at Philadelphia, by way of New Orleans. In Philadelphia he resided two years, and at the age of nineteen started for New Orleans or the Western States, having no fixed destination in view. When on a flat-boat floating down the Ohio river, he became acquainted with George E. Walker, who was eleven years his senior, who advised him to come to Chicago. They arrived in Chicago as early at least as August, 1833, for on the 28th of that month Mark Noble, Sr., transferred to James B. Campbell and George E. Walker a parcel of land near Chicago Avenue and the North Branch of the Chicago River. In the vicinity of this land, or possibly within its limits, Mr. Hickling and Mr. Walker built a saw-mill in the fall of 1833. This mill was sold, and they afterward either built or bought a saw-mill on the Desplaines River, which they likewise sold, and moved to Ottawa, Ill., thinking that place had brighter prospects than Chicago. In Ottawa they started a store, and Mr. Hickling was elected first mayor of that city. After serving two terms, himself and wife made the tour of Europe, and upon returning to Ottawa he was again elected to the mayoralty. He was also elected president of the Board of Education, holding that position a number of years, at the same time being mayor, and president of the First National Bank of Ottawa. He and his second wife (who still survives him) made a second tour through Europe and other parts of the world, occupying three years. While on one of these tours he purchased the portraits of Columbus and Vespucci, which, since his death, his widow, in compliance with his will, has presented to the Chicago Historical Society. In 1869, he removed from Ottawa to Chicago, and in 1870 became a member of the above-mentioned organization. After the great fire, although one of the greatest sufferers, he was one of the first to come to the aid of the Society with pecuniary means, and was ever afterward one of its most devoted friends. In 1877, he was elected a member of the executive committee. Toward the close of his life his disposition grew more retiring than in his earlier days, the result perhaps of his failing eyesight and increasing deafness. Before these calamities befel him, he was one of the most genial and companionable of men; but as his infirmities grew he became more devoted to books—history and stories of Indian and pioneer life being his favorite themes. His death occurred on August 25, 1881. He had been twice married, his first wife having been Mrs. Clark, youngest sister of George E. Walker, who died in August, 1850, and his second wife Miss Caswell. Besides the two portraits of Columbus and Vespucci, already mentioned, Mrs. Hickling, who takes a deep interest in the Chicago Historical Society, has presented to it the sum of five hundred dollars, and also the portrait of her deceased husband. Concerning Mr. Hickling's connection with the early railroad enterprises of Illinois, General John J. Thomas thus wrote from Belleville: "My first acquaintance with Mr. William Hickling was in 1837. He was then engaged, with Messrs. George E. Walker, Samuel B. Chandler, Vital Jarrott and Governor John Reynolds, in the construction of the Pittsburg & St. Louis Railroad. The road was intended to carry coal from the bluffs to the St. Louis market, and was graded, and wooden rails laid, without the iron strap-rails then used, to the now extinct town of Pittsburg. The town was platted by Mr. Hickling for the company (he having no financial interests in the company), and several houses built, but none of them are now standing. The site of this town is at the foot of a bluff a few rods south of the present Illinois & St. Louis Railroad track, about seven miles out from St. Louis. The eastern terminus of the Pittsburg road crossed the lake on about one-quarter of a mile of piling, much of which is still standing, and can be seen from the Illinois & St. Louis Railroad track. The enterprise, however, proved a failure, financially, and the only use the road was put to was the conveying of many cords of wood to St. Louis by horse-power. No coal was removed until years after, when a new company reconstructed the road with a light T rail and ran a small two-wheeled locomotive over it. It has since changed hands several times, and is now the property of the Illinois & St. Louis Railroad and Coal Company, by which it was extended to Belleville, but no farther. Besides doing a lucrative passenger traffic between the cities, it carries a large percentage of the coal consumed in St. Louis. In 1838, after the failure of the Pittsburg & St. Louis Railroad Company, Messrs. Walker and Hickling went to Ottawa, Ill., where their fortunes were accumulated."

OREN SHERMAN, senior member of the firm of Sherman & Flavin, marble dealers, and one of the early residents of Chicago, was born March 5, 1816, in Barre, Vt. His parents, Colonel Nathaniel Sherman and Deborah (Webster) Sherman, were also both natives of that State. In the spring of 1836, the young man started for the West, and setting stakes at New Buffalo, Mich., remained there until he found that the transportation facilities there in vogue seriously impeded his business, when he removed to Chicago. This was in the fall of 1836, and in the spring of the next year he opened a dry-goods store on LaSalle Street, between Lake and South Water streets. His location was subsequently changed to the corner of Lake and LaSalle streets, and to No. 105 and 107 Lake Street, at which latter numbers he did business for many years. In the spring of 1838, Mr. Sherman formed a partnership with Nathaniel Pitkin, which continued until 1844. During a portion of this period he was engaged in packing pork and dealing in produce, doing about one-half the business transacted in the former commodity. Subsequently, he was associated in the dry-goods business with David Ballentine and General Hart L. Stewart. In 1851, he established the first carpet store and place for the sale of house-furnishing goods in Chicago. In the spring of 1853, he sold out to Messrs. Beecher, Hollister & Wilkins, and he then went into business with his brother, Alson S. Sherman (who, in 1844, was mayor of the city). They owned a stone-quarry at Lemont, and lime-works at Bridgeport, and energetically developed this branch of industry. After being together a year as a private firm, they organized the Illinois Stone & Lime Company. Subsequently the interests were separated, and the Illinois Stone Company organized as follows: Stephen F. Gale, H. G. Loomis, W. S. Gurnee and Alson S. Oren Sherman. The Lime Company was composed of W. S. Gurnee, M. C. Stearns and the Sherman brothers. The lime business was disposed of, and the Illinois Stone Company continued. Before Oren Sherman finally established himself in the marble trade, in the spring of 1857, he purchased of Messrs. Sturtevant & Kettlestrings their lime-works at Lyons, Ill. which he sold to Colonel Francis T. Sherman and W. G. Sherman. After continuing in the marble trade for two years, Oren Sherman formed a stock company to conduct the business, which consisted of himself, Henry Wilson and George W. Prickett. This company continued until 1867, when it was merged into one composed of Mr. Sherman, D. D. Cole and others, which existed until the time of the fire, when it was dissolved by the "force of circumstances" brought about by that fierce conflagration. He was one of the first business men to get a roof over his rough temporary structure, and after putting out his sign, which, after he became his watchword, "While there's life, there's hope," he entered into the thick of the trade-revival succeeding the fire. He started business with one load of marble, which still remained at the depot, and what fragments he could dig from the ruins of his building.

Undaunted by misfortune, with characteristic energy he applied himself to the work of restoration, and in the early spring of 1872, he built a large manufactory on Wabash Avenue, opposite Grace Episcopal Church, and, with his sons, L. E. and Fred J. Sherman, organized the Chicago Marble Manufacturing Company, carrying on business very successfully. Their contracts included many of the leading hotels and public buildings of the New Chicago, and successfully passed through the panic of 1873, until, in 1877, they went out of business. In 1878, the firm of Sherman & Flavin came into existence. On March 1, 1885, they occupied their spacious building on Wabash Avenue, where they employ one hundred and twenty-five men, and do a business of over $150,000 out of $200,000 annually.

MICHAEL HOFFMANN, one of the early German residents of Chicago, was born in West Prussia, about twenty miles from the French frontier, on December 11, 1812. In May, 1836, he left his native village, and, on July 21 of that year, landed in New York City. Mr. Hoffmann started for Chicago, in August of the next year, taking the canal-boat from Albany to Buffalo, and the steamer to Detroit. After remaining there for a short time, he traveled on foot to LaSalle, and reached Chicago in November, 1837. Like hundreds of other men who have since become professional men and capitalists, Mr. Hoffmann worked upon the canal, and when winter came upon him, took to peddling water. He hauled it from the corner of Lake and State streets, his charges being usually about twenty cents a load. On May 1, 1840, he commenced to work for William B. Ogden, boarding at his house. He remained with him until November, 1844, and became closely attached to him, placing him, to-day, as not only one of the ablest but the best of Chicago's citizens. The date of his departure from Mr. Ogden's house was also the date of his marriage to Mary Echtenacht. His wife's mother is still living, having nearly reached the age of ninety years. After leaving the employ of Mr. Ogden, Mr. Hoffmann engaged in a general teaming business, and, in 1850, established himself as a gardener. This occupation he followed until 1870. In the meantime, through his acquaintance with Mr. Ogden, he had purchased a large tract of land between Dearborn and State streets, near what would now be Goethe Street, North Side. He afterward purchased property on Chicago Avenue, and a fine tract of wooded land in the outskirts of the city. Mr. Hoffmann subsequently sold a portion of his property (the piece on Chicago Avenue) just previous to the fire. Although the fire of 1871 swept away his three houses, his real estate remained, of which he is now the owner of several fine pieces. He has but lately bought a valuable lot just north of that upon which stands his residence on LaSalle Avenue. Mr. and Mrs. Hoffmann have three sons and one daughter living. Mr. and Mrs. Hoffmann are among the oldest members of the German Catholic Church in the city, being first connected with the old St. Mary's Church. For many years they have been identified with the St. Joseph's Church, on the North Side, having always been among the leaders of their Society in benevolent work.

CHARLES BERDELL was born in Bavaria, Germany, November 9, 1818, coming to America in January, 1837, and settling in Cleveland, Ohio. While there he received from his uncle, who had located in Chicago, most enthusiastic accounts of the probabilities of the new place, and accordingly, in the fall of 1839, started from Cleveland on the steamer "General Wayne." On the way he met Stephen F. Gale and John Wentworth, who had been East on a visit, and by his conversations with them his confidence in Chicago was more firmly established than ever. When first coming to Chicago, young Berdell, through the influence of his uncle, who was a justice of the peace and connected with John B. Rice's orchestra, also became a musician in the theatre. During the Harrison presidential campaign, his services were also called into play, he being sometimes obliged to leave his work on the canal at Summit. After a few months he commenced to learn the cabinet trade, working for a time in a turner's shop. When he first came to Chicago, Mr. Berdell lived with his uncle, whose residence was upon the present site of the First National Bank. In 1852, he bought a lot of Mr. Gale, at the corner of Randolph and Halsted streets, married Catherine Becker, and erected a house. He had previously purchased thirty acres of land on Ashland Avenue, from Blue Island Avenue to the river, but, as the cholera had created considerable alarm for several years after 1848, he was induced to sell in 1852, upon the conviction that the epidemic would permanently affect the growth of the city. Mr. Berdell served on the police force for twelve years, from 1861, being sergeant of the Chicago Avenue station from 1865 to 1873. For the past few years he has derived a good income from the renting of living apartments. Mr. Berdell's wife died in October, 1871, leaving four children still living—Charles A., a lawyer in Gunnison County, Col., who cares for the mining property of several prominent citizens of Chicago; Gustav A., Oscar A. and Emma, who lives at home.

NATHANIEL GOOLD, one of the pioneers of Chicago, was born in Hopkinton, N. H., March 22, 1814, his parents being Nathaniel and Elizabeth (Eaton) Goold. His father, a blacksmith by trade, originally came from Cape Cod, Mass. On December 24, 1835, Mr. Goold married Bessie A. Blake, who is still in the enjoyment of good health, and who will celebrate, with him, Providence permitting, the golden anniversary of their wedding. Nathaniel was left an orphan when only six years of age, and was early thrown upon his own resources. He mastered the carpenter's trade, obtained a fair business education, and then, through the representation of two friends who had invested in property in Chicago, and the enthusiastic accounts presented in a book "The West and Texas," which fell into his hands, he was induced to turn his face toward Chicago. He arrived here July 12, 1838, on the old steamboat "Madison." Deciding to make Chicago his home, he returned to the East to make arrangements for moving his wife and one child to the new country. In July, 1839, he came to this city to locate permanently, and established a family grocery at No. 155 Lake Street. At first he hired a house on the corner of Lake and Canal streets, Asahel Pierce being his neighbor—there being, in fact, no house west of him on the west side of the river. In the fall after his arrival, to his unbounded astonishment, he was nominated for alderman of the Fourth Ward, and taken in hand by John Wentworth, who introduced him to "the boys." After a severe and exciting canvass Mr. Goold was beaten by his Whig competitor, William O. Snell. Of the thirty-four votes cast, Mr. Goold received fourteen. As Chicago began to grow he decided to move his family to the north side of the river, and accordingly built a house on the corner of Dearborn and Michigan streets, living there from 1840 to 1851. Mr. Goold attended the first sale of lands after the completion of the canal in 1848, but was afraid to purchase at that time. A friend named McAuley, however, bought in Block 3, Section 27, near Cottage Grove Avenue and Twenty-second Street. This was then just outside the city limits, and when Mr. Goold bought the block from Mr. McAuley, an acquaintance asked the question in amazement. "What do you want of that? All it is good for is to leave to your children." The purchase price was $471, and Mr. Goold at once set about erecting a dwelling house on Prairie Avenue, fronting east. Of the eight lots in the block he disposed of six, his residence still standing upon one and his factory upon the other. At an early day he commenced to experiment in the manufacture of organs, his ambition having been aroused by the sight of a pipe instrument with two stops. Being a natural mechanic, he set about constructing two organs, and sold his first one to the Catholic Church, a little one story building on Madison Street, between Wabash and Michigan avenues, and he received $160. He also disposed of one to the Unitarian Church, the last being exhibited at the fair of the Mechanics' Institute and receiving a gold medal. It may be said, parenthetically, that his organ was the only one on exhibition. He afterward began the manufacturing of pianos, and established an extensive business. Two years ago he erected a large manufactory, five stories in height, upon the rear of his Cottage Grove Avenue lot, and received his son, John E. Goold, and a skilled workman, into partnership with him. At present the firm are making a specialty of the manufacture of Hansom cab bodies, having yet a large stock of pianos in their warehouses. Mr. Goold has two married daughters living—Mrs. Frank Dyke, a resident of Chicago, and Mrs. Charles Reed, a resident of Michigan.

A. B. KELLOGG, the son of Solomon and Rebecca (Turner) Kellogg, was born on April 25, 1810, in Cayuga County, N. Y. When he was but ten years of age, his parents removed to Yates County, near Penn Yan, and then to Cleveland, Ohio, where his father died of cholera. Upon the death of his father he went to live with his elder brother, Solomon, in Prescott, Canada, but upon the breaking out of the "Patriot Rebellion," in 1838, they were driven away. They were obliged to dispose of their property at a great sacrifice and, in November, they moved to Lockport, Ill., where they opened a carriage and blacksmith shop. The locality did not agree with them, and, after spending a short time in Chicago, they removed to Riverside and built a hotel. For this structure they were obliged to draw their lumber with an ox team. Mr. Kellogg continued in this business for twelve years. In 1849, however, he caught the California fever, and, departing for the Far West, spent twelve months away from home, some three months of which period were passed among the California mines, but he returned to Riverside in just about his former financial condition, considering himself fortunate in making that showing. In July, 1851, he married Mary M. Light, of Plymouth, Ohio. His brother, in the meantime, had caught the gold fever, departed for the West, and remained about a year and a half, but he returned a poorer man than when he went away. Mr. Kellogg did not confine his energies, however, to keeping a hotel, but was called upon to fill nearly every town office. He was town trustee, supervisor, highway commissioner, and school trustee, and, as early as 1840, was elected a captain of militia of his district. He was also treasurer of the school fund for the town of Cicero, and during his administration (1870-78), the moneys under his control increased from $26,000 to $80,000. Mr. Kellogg's investments in Chicago real estate have been profitable. At an early day, when he kept the Riverside Hotel, he purchased two acres of land on West Madison Street, upon which he now resides. He also made purchases on Dearborn Street, the Cheney property, and he rented it. Mr. Kellogg's first wife died on January 12, 1865. His present wife was formerly Miss Sophronia A. Crawford. He has four living children, three sons and one daughter. Myron L. is connected with the Champion Reaper Works, Chicago; his daughter is Mrs. Fred. A. Seaton, whose husband is manager of the American Express at Dubuque, and George is in the grain business, at Ashkum, Iroquois Co., Ill. Mr. Kellogg has been connected with the Masonic fraternity since 1849, first joining LaFayette Lodge, No. 18, the pioneer of Chicago. He now holds a life-membership in Union Park Lodge.

L. G. FISHER, well known in Chicago as an old settler and a man of means, was born on August 17, 1808, in Derby, Vt. After completing his education at Brownnington Academy and teaching school for three years, Mr. Fisher was appointed sheriff's deputy of Orleans County, Vt. The high-sheriff was, at that time, the father of Judge Jameson, of Chicago. After holding that position for three years he resigned it, and for the succeeding three years traveled through several of the States and the Canadas for the Fairbanks Scale Company. He then engaged with them to establish a commission business, either in Louisville or St. Louis, and on May 15, 1837, started for the West. On his arrival in Albany, he learned of the suspension of specie payments. His plans were, in consequence, entirely changed, and he took passage on a schooner commanded by Captain Stephen Clement, present treasurer of the North Side Rolling Mill Company. Although he sailed on the 1st of July, head winds and rough weather delayed the arrival of the boat until July 3. Mr. Fisher found the city in the throes of financial despair, and after a short time, left for Milwaukee, whose condition he found even worse. He then started for Galena, with the intention of mining for lead. Going by the way of an Indian trail, he finally reached Watertown, Ill., and there met with Charles H. Goodhue & Sons, old Canadian acquaintances, who were building a saw mill. In company with Charles Goodhue, he visited New Albany (now Beloit, Wis.), and purchased an interest in a squatter's claim of the town site, held by Caleb Blodgett, Messrs. Blodgett, White, Johnson and Fisher platted that portion of Beloit lying east of the river, and the latter had the honor of suggesting the change of name from New Albany to that by which it is now known. In the fall of 1838, Mr. Fisher brought the first goods into Beloit, and there continued as a merchant for many years. In 1839, he was appointed sheriff of Rock County, by Governor Dodge and re-appointed by Governor Doty, in 1842. During that time a law was passed making the office elective for a term of two years and ineligible for two terms in succession. Mr. Fisher served his elective term, thus making his entire length of service about six years. During his residence in Beloit, he was an extensive farmer, selling goods from 1838 to 1864, and operating stores both in Beloit and Rockford, Wisconsin. He was also engaged in manufacturing flour, lumber, reapers and mowers, machinery and paper, was largely interested in real estate, and, withal, one of the most liberal patrons of educational institutions. He was instrumental in locating the Beloit Female Seminary, gave a large portion of its site, and has been a trustee since its organization. He was alderman of the city from the date of its organization until nearly the time of his coming to Chicago, in 1866. It was mostly through his efforts that the Chicago & North-Western and the Racine & Mississippi lines were built through Beloit. With his partners, he built most of the latter road and a portion of the Dixon Air Line. At one time, Mr. Fisher was the receiver of the Racine & Mississippi, also a director in that and the Beloit & Madison Railroad. When the financial storm of 1857 beat upon the country, he and his fellow-contractors were grading what is now the North-Western road across Iowa. The old company failed, owing them largely; his company obtained, however, one hundred sections of land and the charter. He was a member of the Wisconsin Legislature in 1856-57. In 1861, he received a recruiting commission from the governor, and did good service in enlisting men for the War, being at one time a member of the gubernatorial staff. Mr. Fisher was postmaster during Lincoln's administration, and was re-appointed by Johnson, but refusing to support him politically, was removed. He was also appointed, by Salmon P. Chase, one of two State commissioners to receive subscriptions for the first United States gold bonds. In 1866, he removed to Chicago to attend to his real estate interests. He, with William E. Hale and Ralph Emerson, had, previous to the great fire, just built the Hale Building, on the corner of State and Washington streets, and the structure adjoining Burley & Tyrrell's present place of business. After the fire, he and his partners erected them as they now stand. In 1870, Mr. Fisher was elected supervisor of the village of Hyde Park, and served one year and a half. In 1873, accompanied by his family, he made a European trip and remained eighteen months abroad, going abroad again with his family in 1881. Mr. Fisher has retired from business cares, and lives in an elegant home in Hyde Park, taking an active part in the management of local affairs. Some years ago he was elected one of the board of trustees of Union Park Seminary; has been on its executive committee for twelve years, and vice-president half of that period. Mr. Fisher was married, in 1842, to Caroline Field, daughter of Deacon Peter R. Field, of Beloit; she died in 1850. Their son, L. G. Fisher, Jr., married Catherine Eddy, daughter of Rev. Alfred Eddy. A daughter, Anna Field, married Dr. Samuel R. Ward, the son of a foreign missionary, who was born in Ceylon. Dr. Ward is a practicing physician in Richmond, Ill. In 1851, Mr. Fisher married Rachael Colton, a native of Berkshire County, Mass. They have one daughter, Sallie, the wife of William A. Bond, of Turner & Bond.

COLONEL EZRA TAYLOR was born in Genesee County, N. Y., in 1810. He resided there until 1837, when he settled in this city. He entered into the packing business, and was engaged with the firm of G. S. Hubbard & Co. until the breaking out of the War. Prior to that time, the young men of this city had organized the Chicago Light Artillery, and, at the time of the "rising cloud of war," Colonel Taylor was its captain in command. This military company was enrolled in the 60th Regiment, under the command of Brigadier-General Swift. In the spring of 1861, Colonel Taylor re-organized the Chicago Light Artillery, and recruited a second company, to be attached to it, thereafter known as Battery "B." Upon the call for troops, in April, Colonel Taylor (then captain) offered his command to the governor, and it was duly accepted. The battery remained here until June 1 and then proceeded to Cairo, where it was met by its captain, who had been to St. Louis procuring arms for the artillery organizations of the State. In July, Captain Taylor, with Battery "B," crossed the Mississippi to Bird's Point, Mo. Their first engagement of any importance occurred at Belmont, on November 7, 1861, where "Taylor's Battery" performed splendid service, it being the only artillery with General Grant, in that, his first, engagement. The battery afterward moved on to Fort Henry, and then to Fort Donelson, and, in the latter engagement, Taylor's Battery was highly commended by the brigade commander, for the coolness and daring of its officers and men. In the report of that battle by Colonel W. H. L. Wallace, commander, he says: "The conduct of Captain Ezra Taylor, commanding Light Battery "B," during the whole series of engagements, was such as to distinguish him as a daring, yet cool and sagacious officer. Pushing his guns into positions that were swept by the enemy's shot, he, in person, directed the posting of his sections, and in many instances himself sighted the guns. Such conduct found its natural reflection in the perfect order and bravery that characterized his entire command." Captain Taylor received his commission, as such, on May 15, 1862, and on April 1, 1862, was promoted Senior Major of the 1st Illinois Light Artillery. On the 4th of April, he was appointed chief-of-artillery in General Sherman's division, with orders to report to that commander at Shiloh. Battery "B," of which he had been commander was engaged in that battle on the 6th and 7th of April. In this famous engagement, Major Taylor did noble service, personally appearing and directing each battery to its position, which inflicted terrible slaughter on the enemy. Major Taylor received his commission as colonel of the 1st Illinois Artillery, on May 6, 1863. He resigned August 20, 1864, by reason of his having been severely wounded, and on returning home was confined to his house for several months. He received the appointment of provision inspector of this port, from the United States Government, and was also inspector for the Board of Trade of this city in 1865, which offices he has continuously held to the present time. He was married, January 12, 1840, to Miss Sabina Langen, of Chicago. They had six children, four of whom are deceased. William N. Taylor, their eldest son, died in South Carolina, from wounds received during the War, and was major of Battery "B" at the time of his death. Two other sons, Thomas E. and James L., contracted malarial fever during their service in the War, and they died shortly after their return home. Thomas Francis Taylor died when six years of age. The wife of Colonel Taylor died on July 8, 1882, and only two sons remain to comfort his declining days. George L. Taylor is captain of Engine Co. No. 14, and Henry E. Taylor lives a retired life. Colonel Taylor married Mrs. Jane J. Fitzgerald, in Toronto, Canada, in 1884.

MEDICAL HISTORY.

There is little to be said concerning physicians, as a distinct class of the city's population, for the period extending from 1857 to 1871, that is not found in other portions of this work. They became so thoroughly commingled with the interests of the city, aside from protecting and advancing her hygiene, and so prominent in all enterprises that had for their object her material benefit, that among the leaders in the city's progress will be found the names of many of our physicians.

When negligence permitted the condition of the city to become unhealthy in the extreme,—an invitation to epidemics,—the physicians persistently sounded the alarm that ultimately caused the citizens to demand of the authorities, purification, and the establishment of sanitary laws and officials. The system of sewerage adopted by the city was substantially a mode suggested by a physician. The method of drainage was that promulgated by a physician. The establishment of the county and city hospital was forced upon the authorities by two physicians, who primarily were connected with others in its maintenance. When the War spread its devastation and agony among thousands, Chicago's physicians were found prominent among those who braved death to alleviate their sufferings upon the battle-field. When the tardy measures taken to cleanse the city had proven utterly ineffectual, and the cholera appeared, those who had so persistently advocated precautionary measures, demonstrated that they knew not only how to warn against a foe but also how to fight it, and, with unremitting zeal, with unswerving fidelity to the afflicted, and with self-abnegation, the physicians of Chicago cared for the sufferers. And of all the bright pages of Chicago's history, there is none that glows with brighter luster, than that whereon are emblazoned the names of those physicians whose assiduity in attendance upon cholera-stricken patients caused them to forfeit their own lives.

C. M. Nuttall

From the history of Rush Medical College, in the preceding volume, it will be seen, by the constantly increasing number of students attending the institution, that Chicago was becoming noted as a center for medical education. The ripe scholarship, brilliant attainments, and comprehensiveness of its faculty, could not but make a marked impression, not alone upon the students who attended their lectures, but upon the medical literati and the profession at large. For these reasons the fame of Rush Medical College is continental, as is the proficiency of its graduates. To disseminate this proficiency among those less favored, societies were formed; and to discountenance charlatans, other associations were composed, with infrangible regulations, upon a medico-ethical basis. As the clientèle of the Rush Medical College became very large, the necessity for additional colleges became apparent, and they were instituted. Knowledge and philanthropy are usually associated—enlargement of the brain may superinduce enlargement of the heart; and to help the afflicted poor, dispensaries and hospitals were established in different parts of the city.

In succeeding pages these various matters receive specific mention, together with prominent members of the profession; and the history of the founding and perpetuation of these institutions comprises the material and prosaic part of the medical history; while, as an index of the statistics of medical population, the subjoined table is given, showing the number of practicing physicians, as exhibited in the various directories of the years specified:

1858, 198; 1859, 210; 1860, 209; 1861, 212; 1862, 195; 1863, 213; 1864, 229; 1865, 269; 1866, 279; 1867, 334; 1868, 382; 1869, (notably inaccurate); 1870, 464; 1871, 414.

These figures may not be exact, but they are a fair index of the growth of the profession in Chicago.

RUSH MEDICAL COLLEGE.—The history of this college during the epoch herein treated is thoroughly one of earnest labor and gratifying result. The organization of another medical college in 1859, was a provision, by the medical fraternity, for the demands made by the growing number of students that came to the city; and the institution of the medical department of Lind University in no wise detracted from the attendance at Rush Medical College. The students multiplied, and ere long it was found necessary to erect a new building for their accommodation. This was done in 1867, at a cost of about $70,000, which expense was borne by the members of the faculty. The new building was erected on the vacant college-lot, immediately north of, and adjoining, the old one, which thus became an adjunct. The new edifice was sixty feet on Dearborn Street, by seventy-two feet on Indiana Street, and had two large lecture-rooms, each containing six hundred and twenty-five numbered seats. Every convenience for the prosecution of studies was afforded in the lecture-rooms, anatomical rooms, museum and laboratory, and its equipment and facilities gained for it the reputation of being one of the best medical colleges in the country, which encomium was fully justified by the station which its graduates subsequently occupied.

RUSH MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The faculty of Rush Medical College, since its inauguration, have been as follows:*

Professor of anatomy and surgery: Daniel Brainard, 1844-54; surgery and clinical surgeon, Daniel Brainard, 1855-65; principles and practice of surgery and clinical surgery, Moses Gunn, 1866-71.

Professor of chemistry and materia medica: James Van Zandt Blaney, 1844; chemistry and pharmacy, James V. Z. Blaney, 1845-64 (E. S. Carr, acting professor during the War), 1865-69, emeritus, 1870-71; Henry M. Lyman, 1870-71.

Professor of theory and practice of medicine: John McLean, 1844; materia medica and therapeutics, John McLean, 1845-47; materia medica, therapeutics and medical jurisprudence, John McLean, 1848-54; Hosmer A. Johnson, 1855-56; materia medica and medical jurisprudence, John H. Rauch, 1857-58; Ephraim Ingals, 1859-70; James H. Etheridge, 1871.

Professor of obstetrics: M. L. Knapp, 1844; obstetrics and diseases of women and children, Graham N. Fitch, 1845; John Evans, 1845-56; William H. Byford, 1857-58; DeLaskie Miller, 1859-71.

Professor of anatomy: W. B. Herrick, 1845-47; general and descriptive anatomy, W. B. Herrick, 1848-50; anatomy and physiology, W. B. Herrick, 1851-54; anatomy, Joseph Warren Freer, 1855-58; R. L. Rea, 1859-71.

Professor of the institutes and practice of medicine: Austin Flint, 1845; Graham N. Fitch, 1846-47; principles and practice of medicine, Graham N. Fitch, 1848; Thomas Spencer, 1849; N. S. Davis, 1850-54; Thomas Spencer, emeritus, 1855; principles and practice of medicine and clinical medicine, N. S. Davis, 1855-58; J. Adams Allen, 1859-71.

J. Adams Allen

Professor of physiology and pathology: Nathan Smith Davis, 1849-50; William B. Herrick, 1855-56; William B. Herrick, emeritus, 1857-58; Hosmer A. Johnson, 1857-58; A. S. Hudson, 1859-62.

Demonstrator of anatomy: W. B. Herrick, 1848-50; Joseph W. Freer, 1851-54; Edmund Andrews, 1855; J. H. Hollister, 1856-58; Edwin Powell, 1859-63; I. P. Lynn, 1864; Robert M. Lackey, 1865; William Lewitt, 1866-67; Chas. T. Parkes, 1868-71.

Professor of surgical anatomy and surgical pathology: Joseph W. Freer, 1859; physiology and surgical pathology, J. W. Freer, 1860-61; physiology, microscopical and surgical anatomy, J. W. Freer, 1862-65; physiology and microscopical anatomy, J. W. Freer, 1866-71.

Clinical lecturer on diseases of the eye and ear: Edward Lorenzo Holmes, 1864-67; professor of ophthalmology, Edward L. Holmes, 1868.

Clinical lecturer at City Hospital: Joseph P. Ross, 1865-67; professor of clinical medicine and diseases of the chest, Joseph P. Ross, 1868-71.

Lecturer on legal medicine and insanity: D. A. Morse, 1869.

Professor to chair of surgery: J. C. Morfit, 1856; Edwin Powell, 1857-58; G. J. Cloud, 1861; William Lewitt, 1866-67; William Little, 1868; clinical assistant and professor of surgery, H. F. Chesbrough, 1869; professor to professor of anatomy, F. H. Martin, Jr., 1870-71.

* When the designations of the professorships were changed, they are so annotated, the first date following the name of the professor being that wherein the chair was instituted.

Professor of military surgery and surgical anatomy: Edwin Powell, 1866-71.

Assistant to professor of physiology: F. L. Wadsworth, 1869 to 1871.

Assistant to professor of materia medica: E. Fletcher Ingals, 1870-71.

Assistant to professor of obstetrics: C. T. Fenn, 1870-71.

Assistant to professor of chemistry: L. W. Case, 1870-71.

Assistant to professor of surgery: Charles T. Parkes, 1870-71.

RUINS, RUSH MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The following tabulated statement gives the number of graduates from 1858 to 1871:

SESSIONS.	STUDENTS.	GRADUATES.
1858-59	117	31
1859-60	119	35
1860-61	160	37
1861-62	134	35
1862-63	179	58
1863-64	255	80
1864-65	276	104
1865-66	255	90
1866-67	374	71
1867-68	290	117
1868-69	328	108
1869-70	286	135
1870-71	223	85
*1871-72	149	78

Hon. Grant Goodrich has been the secretary of the board of trustees since the foundation of the college, and has signed the diploma of every graduate since William Butterfield's graduation. During these years, also, the dispensary of the college was maintained under the administration of various members of the faculty, until October 9, 1871, when it and the college building, the result of twenty-seven years of care, were incinerated. The fire reached to the college about 2:30 o'clock a. m. Professor DeLaskie Miller was in the college at the time, and was driven from it by the smoke and flame. The value of the property is thus designated by Dr. J. Adams Allen: "There was much in the museum of Rush Medical College destroyed by the fire of 1871, that no money could replace or measure. The pecuniary loss in that which money might replace may be estimated at not less than $125,000."

* The number of students in attendance at the opening of the session of 1871-72, was much larger than on the previous year, but, as the matriculation register was destroyed by the fire, the number of those who returned to the class assembled in the attic of the old County Hospital only is given.

JAMES VAN ZANDT BLANEY was born on May 1, 1820, at Newcastle, Delaware. At the age of eighteen he graduated from Princeton College, but remained thereat some time afterward, and pursued the study of chemistry under the distinguished Professor Joseph Henry, subsequently of the Smithsonian Institute. This post-graduate course evinced the bent of young Blaney's mind, and was the index of his success in the future. From Princeton he went to Philadelphia, and there studied medicine, graduating with honors, but being under age could not receive his diploma until he attained his majority. Ad interim, he walked the hospitals, and there gained experience that was afterward fruitful. In 1842 he started West, and was with Dr. Daniel Brainard in the founding of Rush Medical College. Untiring in energy, unflagging in zeal, and of comprehensive genius, he is found filling three chairs in the faculty of the college, pursuing the practice of medicine, and lecturing to large and appreciative audiences upon varied subjects. His versatility was literally unbounded and his oratorical power was phenomenal. What were to others achievements worthy of plaudits from the scientific world were to him undertaken and fulfilled, apparently, only as pastime. As an analytical chemist his fame was cosmopolitan, and was manifested in the trial of George W. Green, the banker, who was tried, in 1854, for the murder of his wife by poison, and convicted on the testimony of Dr. Blaney. By the use of novel tests he detected strychnine in the stomach of the murdered woman, and, in open court, in his usual clear, terse and convincing manner, explained his formula to the satisfaction of court and jury. Green had carefully studied his subject, and believed himself quite safe; but he now saw his Necessis standing before him, and at once gave up all hope. The jury rendered their verdict of guilty without leaving their seats, and Green requested a private interview with Blaney in his cell. After thanking the doctor for his fairness and courtesy, he exclaimed: "Dr. Blaney, God Almighty must have directed your investigation, or you never could have detected the poison." And that same night the wretched man hung himself in his cell. In this case there was no proof, except that furnished by the doctor's analysis, that strychnine, or indeed any poison at all, had been taken by the deceased. Blaney's analysis was published on both sides of the Atlantic, creating great excitement, especially in England, where the celebrated Palmer murder-trial had just ended in the conviction and execution of the murderer, in spite of the failure of the chemists to detect poison. In 1857, Dr. Blaney occupied the chair of chemistry and natural philosophy in the Northwestern University at Evanston, principally to afford him a partial rest and gratify his fondness for rural life. There he built a beautiful home, and laid out a garden whose floriculture made it celebrated. In this garden he tested the artificial fertilizers that are now so prominent in agriculture. During 1861, he was appointed surgeon of volunteers, and shortly thereafter was appointed medical director. At the battle of Winchester he was surgeon-in-chief of General Philip H. Sheridan's staff, and until the close of the war filled the position of medical director and purveyor. On the termination of the War he was delegated to pay off the medical officers of the Northwest, and in furtherance of this duty disbursed more than $600,000, and was promoted lieutenant-colonel. On leaving the army, Dr. Blaney resumed his profession as a consulting physician only, devoting himself to the science of chemistry. Therein his skill is thus attested by Lewis Dodge: "In 1853, the Chicago Mechanics' Institute advertised premiums for the best native wines and brandies. About fifty specimens of brandy were examined, and among them was one sample made by Dr. Blaney, from an essential oil or ether, obtained in refining a common agricultural product, which was, in fact, the quintessence of brandy. The liquors were tested on four different evenings, a careful record being kept, and it was found that the committee had, on each trial, marked Dr. Blaney's artificial brandy not only the best but the oldest. The doctor assured the writer that this brandy was made within the hour in which it was tested, at a cost not to exceed twenty cents a gallon. * *

James Van Zandt Blaney

This discovery, stupendous in its possible consequences, from a deep sense of duty and a noble self-sacrifice difficult to understand, was suppressed by the good doctor, and died a secret with its author." Dr. Blaney was married, on July 8, 1847, to Miss Clarissa Butler, daughter of Walter Butler and niece of Hon. Benjamin F. Butler. He died December 11, 1874, one of the noblest and most accomplished gentlemen that ever graced the medical profession of Chicago, leaving four children—James K., Charles D., Bessie and Cassie. James Van Zandt Blaney was a 33° Mason, an honorary member of the Northern Jurisdiction of the Ancient and Accepted Rite. He was past master of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, companion of Lafayette Chapter, R.A.M., past commander of Apollo Commandery K. T., and was the first grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar in Illinois, and generalissimo of the Grand Encampment of the United States.

NATHAN SMITH DAVIS was born January 9, 1817, in the town of Greene, Chenango Co., N. Y. He obtained his rudimentary education at the district school of the neighborhood, subsequently spending six months in Cazenovia Seminary, studying languages and the natural and applied sciences; after which he entered the office of Dr. Daniel Clark, of Smithville Flats, as a medical student, and during the following winter he attended lectures at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, at Fairfield, N. Y. At the termination of the session he continued his course of study in the office of Dr. Thomas Jackson, of Binghamton, N. Y., where he spent the two succeeding summers, returning to the college at Fairfield each winter. In January, 1837, he graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine, being then twenty years of age. His graduation and his scholastic proficiency so impressed the faculty that they recommended him as the successor to Dr. Daniel Chatfield, of Vienna, Oneida Co., N. Y., which position he occupied only until July, 1837, when he removed to Binghamton, N. Y. In the spring of 1838, he married the daughter of Hon. John Parker, of Vienna, N. Y. Dr. Davis remained in Binghamton nine years, and then removed to New York City; and, at the close of the winter session of the College of Physicians and Surgeons in that city, was appointed lecturer on medical jurisprudence for the spring course. In July, 1849, the faculty and trustees of Rush Medical College offered Dr. Davis the chair of physiology and pathology, which he accepted, and removed to Chicago. The following year he occupied the chair of practical medicine, which he retained during his connection with the college. In the summer of 1850, Dr. Davis delivered a course of lectures upon the sanitary condition of the city and the means for its improvement, and the plan he elaborated upon the water supply and sewerage were practically those subsequently adopted by the city. The money proceeds of this course of lectures was applied to the purchase of the first twelve beds that were supplied to the Illinois General Hospital of the Lake,* since known as the Mercy Hospital of this city. To concisely state Dr. Davis's varied achievements on behalf of philanthropy and science is quite a task, so many and frequent have they been, but the following will give some idea of them. Early in the city's history Dr. Davis became associated with a relief society to systematically help the poor, that was afterward merged into the Young Men's Christian Association; he was one of the founders of the Washington Home; he was one of the originators of the Chicago Medical * Vide history thereof, in first volume.

Society, and one of the earliest members of the Illinois State Medical Society. He was one of the founders of the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and to him has been awarded the honor of originating the American Medical Association in 1846-47, of which he was president during the years 1864-65, and in which he still holds the position of an active and influential member, being editor-in-chief of the Journal of the Association. He was a member of the board of Reform School commissioners, and one of the earliest members of the board of trustees of the Northwestern University. Dr. Davis was one of the first faculty of the Chicago Medical College, and was subsequently president of the board of trustees and president of the faculty, which latter office he still fills. He has also been a prominent editor of, and contributor to, medical literature. He has been a member of the Methodist Church since he was sixteen years of age, and has always been a large and frequent contributor to many public and private charities. Perhaps, however, the doctor's prominent characteristic, and the one that has made him so potential a factor for good, has been his persistent, arduous and uncompromising advocacy of temperance and his constant assaults upon the evils of strong drink. The beneficial effect that this has had upon his thousands of listeners, upon the medical graduate, upon his numberless patients, is simply incalculable, and the detriment that Dr. Davis has been to the progress of evil is impossible of description, for during his long, honored and busy life thousands of persons have had ample cause to thank him for his medical skill, his benevolence, and his Christianity.

M. S. Davis

JONATHAN ADAMS ALLEN was born in Middlebury, Vt., on January 16, 1825. His maternal ancestors came to America, from England, in the "Mayflower," in 1620, and his paternal ancestors arrived here, from Wales, in 1634, having been driven to that country from England by the exigencies of civil war at a remote date. His ancestry on both sides were, therefore, English. Their descendant, the subject of this sketch, was prepared for college at the early age of nine years, the result of which procedure was to impair his health and superinduce symptoms of a speedy decline. He was then exiled from study temporarily, and went into the country, where special pains were taken to counteract the ill effects of premature mental application. In winter he was allowed to pursue light study, and this method being pursued until he was sixteen he became possessed of a sturdy physique that has stood him in good stead during the performance of the exacting duties of his profession. In 1845, he graduated with the degree of B.A., and during December, 1846, with the degree of M.D. January 1, 1847, Dr. Allen married Miss Mary Marsh, of Kalamazoo, Mich., and the succeeding day visited his first patient. Since this primal patient, the recital of Dr. Allen's life would be a narration of the achievement of the highest honors in his profession—of a life of unwearied application, of indomitable perseverance and of persistent instruction. He has occupied numerous chairs, and, as a result of his extended studies and varied investigations, the students of Rush Medical College esteem him the "versatile uncle," as he has been familiarly called by the students and alumni of the college for many years, and one whose didactic discourse always sticks in their memory, such is his happy faculty of imparting instruction. Every study that Dr. Allen has undertaken he has beautified its theses by his eloquence and literary talent; in every phase of existence wherein he has lived, he has been honored and esteemed as few men are. President of Rush Medical College, grand master of the Masons of Michigan, grand commander of Knights Templar, honorary member of the 33° Scottish Rite, Northern Jurisdiction, the chosen orator on occasions of celebration, successful editor and correspondent, his works live with him, and after him will endure. Dr. Allen removed to Chicago in 1859, and since that time has resided in the city. Dr. Allen was also surgeon of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad for twenty-four years, and he has, from his observant travels, obtained a fund of information and knowledge excelled by but few people. Not alone did Dr. Allen make the tour of Europe, but he also visited Egypt and Morocco. His daily journals of his journeys—a few excerpts from which have been published—would make several large octavo volumes.

WILLIAM B. HERRICK was born on September 20, 1813, at Durham, Maine, and obtained his early education in the vicinity of his home, but supplemented his scholastic tuition by persistent study and a judicious course of reading. When he was sixteen years old he commenced teaching school, at intervals attending the Gorham Academy, Maine. While there, he determined upon becoming a physician, in pursuance of which intention he attended medical lectures at Bowdoin and Dartmouth Colleges, and graduated from Dartmouth as M.D. on November 16, 1836. In 1837, Dr. Herrick settled in Louisville, Ky., and was appointed assistant demonstrator of anatomy in the Louisville Medical College. He only remained in that city two years, and, in 1839, removed to Hillsborough, Illinois, where, in 1840, he married Martha J. Seward, daughter of John B. Seward, who was one of the pioneers of this State. He remained in Hillsborough until 1844, when he came to Chicago, and was made professor of anatomy in Rush Medical College. At the outbreak of the Mexican War he received the appointment of assistant surgeon of the 1st Illinois Volunteers, and therein performed the duties of surgeon of the regiment. He participated in the movements and engagements of his regiment, and was with them in the battle of Buena Vista, and afterward was in charge of the hospital at Saltillo, Mexico, until the sickness caused by the exposure and fatigues of the campaign necessitated his resignation on May 24, 1847. He then returned North, and entered on a private practice in this city, which he maintained until 1857, also occupying a chair of anatomy in Rush Medical College. He, likewise, was one of the originators of the Chicago Medical Society and the Illinois State Medical Society, and was always prominently identified with all that was either beneficial for the medical fraternity or the public health. In 1857, he was compelled to relinquish his practice, and seek, by climatic change, the restoration of his health. But the rigors of campaign life had been too potent for his constitution, which, however, did not succumb entirely until 1865. On the last day of that year, at his home in Maine, the spirit of Dr. William B. Herrick passed from this earth, and the New Year dawned for him in the undiscovered hereafter. He was a prominent and influential Mason, a past master of Oriental Lodge, a member of Apollo Commandery, and a past grand master of the Grand Lodge of Masons of the State of Illinois.

JAMES HENRY ETHERIDGE, a prominent physician of Chicago, and a member of the faculty of Rush Medical College, was born in St. Johnsville, Montgomery Co., N. V., March 20, 1844. His father, Dr. Francis B. Etheridge, was born in the same place, and was the son of a soldier of our Revolutionary War. The mother of the subject of this sketch was Fanny Easton, of Connecticut. Dr. F. B. Etheridge was a practising physician and surgeon for forty-seven years. During the Civil War he served in the field as surgeon of one of the Minnesota Volunteer regiments. He died at Hastings, Minnesota, in 1871. His son, Dr. James H. Etheridge, received his early education in New York State. On the outbreak of War he was prepared to enter the junior year at Harvard College, but the absence of his father at the front disarranged these plans, and he decided to devote his attention to medicine. He read four years with his father, and attended three full courses at Rush Medical College, in Chicago, where he was graduated in March, 1860, receiving his degree of M.D. He at once began practice in Evanston, where he remained about two years. At the end of that time he made the tour of Europe, walking the hospitals of some of the largest cities. On returning to America, Dr. Etheridge settled in Chicago, on July 31, 1871, and on the same date was elected to the chair of therapeutics, materia medica and medical jurisprudence, in Rush Medical College, which position he still holds. He is one of the gynecologists to the Central Free Dispensary; was one of the staff of the Woman's Hospital of the State of Illinois; and was at one time also connected with St. Joseph's Hospital. He is an occasional contributor to the medical journals, and is a member of the Chicago Medical Society, of the Illinois State Medical Society, and of the American Medical Association. He was married, June 22, 1870, to Miss Harriet Elizabeth Powers, of Evanston. They have two daughters.

W. H. Bayford

MOSES GUNN was born on April 20, 1822, the son of Linus and Esther (Bronson) Gunn, in East Bloomfield, Ontario Co., N. Y. The ancestry of Dr. Gunn, in America, descends from the Gunn clan in the north of Scotland. After the subject of this sketch had received his preliminary education at the common schools at home, and taken a classical education at the academy, he determined upon pursuing the medical profession, and entered the Geneva Medical College, from whence he graduated in 1846. Immediately after receiving his diploma as Doctor of Medicine, he started for the West, carrying with him, in a neat trunk, the body of a huge African, whereon his surgical skill could be exercised at a favorable opportunity; which caused oburgation on the part of the stage drivers. There were no "baggage-smashers" upon the doctor's route, otherwise an unpleasant contrepemps might have occurred. He arrived at Ann Arbor, Mich., in February, 1846, and—at the same time that he commenced practice—inaugurated the first systematic course of anatomical lectures ever given in Michigan. He had a class of twenty-five or thirty students, and it is presumable that at the first lectures the African was resurrected from his xylophagus, and scientifically dissected. Upon the organization of the Medical Department of the University of Michigan, Dr. Gunn was elected professor of surgery, by a most flattering majority over his competitor. But for once the Latin adage of Palman qui meruit ferat was carried out. He occupied the chair for seventeen years, and notwithstanding his engrossing duties engendered by his private practice and his professorship, as an avocation he studied German, in which language he attained great proficiency. In 1848, Dr. Gunn married Jane Augusta Terry, the only daughter of J. M. Terry, M.D. In 1853, he removed to Detroit, and, in 1856, received the degree of M.A. from Geneva College, and, in 1877, that of LL.D. from the University of Chicago. On September 1, 1861, Dr. Gunn entered the army, that he might gain a practical knowledge of military surgery, and was with General McClellan's army in the Peninsula campaign of 1862, wherein he rendered efficient medical service. In the spring of 1867, he moved to Chicago, and accepted a position in the faculty of Rush Medical College, as successor to Dr. Brainard, since which time the medical reputation of Dr. Gunn has become identified with the Sile of the profession. In appearance, Dr. Gunn is distinguished and military; his speech is quick, decisive, and always germane to the subject, and herein lies his secret as a successful professor of surgery. His lectures were invariably lucid expositions of the subject; while with the scalpel he illustrated his disquisition. His touch is velvet, his nerves steel; and being gifted with a profound memory and exquisite perception and attention to minutiae, it is no marvel that he is a skillful and successful surgeon.

ABRAHAM REEVES JACKSON, A.M., M.D., is a native of the State of Pennsylvania, being born in Philadelphia June 17, 1827. His parents, Washington and Deborah (Lee) Jackson, gave their son a good public school and high school education, after which it was designed to make a civil engineer of him. He, in fact, did study engineering for about a year, but becoming convinced that he had not found his true vocation, commenced the study of medicine in the Medical Department of Pennsylvania College, graduating therefrom in 1848. Soon afterward he commenced the practice of his profession in Stroudsburg, Penn., and continued there for twenty-two years, acting during the War as contract surgeon in the volunteer service, and as Assistant Medical Director of the Army of Virginia. Removing to Chicago in May, 1870, he set about the accomplishment of an object which he had long had in view, viz., the establishment of a hospital for women exclusively. In September, 1871, through his earnest labors and his high professional standing, he secured the incorporation of "The Woman's Hospital of the State of Illinois," and was appointed its surgeon-in-chief. It is unnecessary, at this day, to call attention to the beneficial results which have followed in the wake of this noble enterprise. In 1872, he was appointed lecturer on gynecology in Rush Medical College, and held that position until 1876, when he resigned it to attend to the increasing demands of his large private practice. Although Dr. Jackson has been remarkably successful within the confines of his profession, he has obtained a high standing in broader fields. He is a fine writer, having edited the Chicago Medical Register for many years, and contributed all his life, more or less, to the treasures of general literature. Through the unrivalled humor of Mark Twain, he himself has become a world-wide celebrity; since it is no secret that genial Dr. Jackson is the prototype of "my friend, the doctor," in "Innocents Abroad." Dr. Jackson is also associate editor of the Independent Practitioner of New York and the Western Medical Reporter of Chicago, and is considered one of the best authorities in all questions relating to medical jurisprudence. In addition to performing all these duties which devolve upon him, he is president of the College of Physicians and Surgeons and professor of gynecology in that institution, a position which he has held for the past four years.

DANIEL ROBERTS BROWER, one of Chicago's well-known physicians, is a Pennsylvanian by birth, having been born, in 1839, in Philadelphia, or rather in a suburb then known as Manayunk, now a part of Philadelphia proper. In early youth he attended the schools of his native city, as well as those of Norristown, Penn., and, in 1860, at the age of twenty-one, he was graduated at the Polytechnic College of Philadelphia. He at once went to Washington, D. C., where, until 1864 (when he was graduated with the degree of M.D.) he was a student in the Medical Department of Georgetown College. He was at once appointed to the army as Assistant Surgeon U. S. Volunteers, and served in general hospital service in and about Fort Monroe and Norfolk and, after the close of the War, also in Richmond, Va., until the summer of 1866, when he was mustered out of the military service. He was then engaged as the surgeon in charge of Howard's Grove Hospital, an institution under the supervision of the Freedmen's Bureau, where he remained until 1868. At this time he received information that he had been elected superintendent of the Eastern Lunatic Asylum of Virginia, at Williamsburg. This he accepted, occupying the position until the fall of 1875, when he resigned. In the following February he came to Chicago; and here has been his home ever since, where he is and has been engaged in the practice of his profession, making a specialty of diseases of the nervous system. Dr. Brower is professor of diseases of the nervous system in the Woman's Medical College of Chicago, and lecturer on the practice of medicine in the spring course of the Rush Medical College. He is also physician to diseases of the nervous system at St. Joseph's Hospital, and consulting physician at the Woman's Hospital. He is a member of the Chicago Medical Society, of the Chicago Pathological Society, of the Illinois State Medical Society, and of the American Medical Association. For four years—1881-85—Dr. Brower was one of the editors of the Chicago Medical Journal. He was married, May 15, 1868, to Miss Eliza Ann Shearer, of Pennsylvania. They have two children, Eliza Ann and Daniel Roberts, Jr.

HORATIO NELSON HURLBUT, M.D., the oldest physician of continuous practice in Chicago, was born in Batavia, Genesee Co., N. Y., on November 9, 1806. In February, 1818, he left his home and commenced the battle of life. In his twentieth year, being taken with a severe attack of cholera morbus, he was given some two grains of tartar emetic, which induced acute inflammation of the stomach from which he suffered many years. This circumstance induced him to look into the mysteries of medicine. In March, 1831, he removed to Springtown, Crawford Co., Penn., where he remained two years, after which he returned to Ashtabula County, and bought his brother's practice. Finally he was enabled to attend lectures at the Willoughby Medical College, afterward the Starling Medical College of Columbus. In 1851, Dr. Hurlbut came to Chicago, and opened an office with Henry W. Clark, on Randolph Street, in what was then known as Warner's Hall. He at once commenced a course of study in Rush Medical College and the next year received his degree. Dr. Hurlbut joined the Masonic fraternity in 1854, receiving his degree in Wabansia Lodge, No. 160. He is now a life-member of Home Lodge, Chicago Chapter, Chicago Council, Apollo Commandery and of Oriental Consistory; he took the 32° on April 22, 1864, and the honorary 33° on June 22, 1871. Dr. Hurlbut was the first S.W. and the second W.M. of Dearborn Lodge and the first W.M. of Home Lodge, and was also G.H.P. for the last twenty years, his last term ending in December, 1884. He served for twenty years as G.H.P. of the Council of Princes of Jerusalem, and is an honorary member of Chevalier Bayard Commandery. His son, Dr. H. V. L. Hurlbut, is well known as a physician of large practice and high standing; and his daughter is the wife of Major Edward P. Tobey. The latter took his last course of lectures at Rush Medical College, and graduated in the spring of 1852, having attended two courses at Cleveland Medical College.

JOHN S. CLARK, M.D., is one of the oldest members of the medical fraternity in Chicago. He was born at Clarksville, a place which derived its name from his father, Jehiel Clark, near Auburn, in Cayuga County, N. Y., November 10, 1821. His mother was Nancy Casey, a daughter of Hon. George Casey, of Auburn, N. Y. At the close of his studies at the village schools he went to Canandaigua, N. Y., where for two years he pursued a course of studies in the academy at that place. He then attended Taylor's preparatory school at Geneva, where he remained until he commenced the study of his profession under the preceptorship of Dr. Gardner Wells, of Waterloo, Seneca Co., N. Y., where he remained one year. He then returned to Geneva, and entered the Geneva Medical College, in addition to which, during the intervals that occurred between the regular college terms, he was installed in the office of Professor Thomas Spencer, one of the faculty of the college. After a thorough course of study, he graduated from that institution in 1843. Immediately following his graduation, he went to Waterloo, N. Y., and there, on the 15th of February, 1843, was united in marriage to Miss Frances Wheeler, daughter of Rev. Eli Wheeler, of St. Paul's Episcopal Church. In company with his young wife, he went to Seneca Falls, N. Y., and entered upon his his maiden experience as a physician. After a residence at Seneca Falls of thirteen years, he came to Chicago in the summer of 1856, and began the practice of his profession. In 1858 he erected a home on Wells Street. The fire of 1871 swept away the old homestead, and destroyed a valuable collection of works of art, books and music. As soon as circumstances would permit he began and completed the erection of a home at his present location, on LaSalle Avenue, and moved there from his temporary residence in the West Division. He is a great lover of books, and pictures; at the present time he has a large and valuable collection of both. February 20, 1868, he was married for the second time, in this city, to Miss Fanny Campbell, daughter of the late William Campbell, barrister, of Chicago. He is the father of fourteen children, six of whom were by his first wife, who died in December, 1854. In 1865, he received an honorary degree of Doctor of Medicine from Rush Medical College. Dr. Clark, though in his sixty-fourth year, is in possession of mental faculties that are still vigorous.

SAMUEL R. HAVEN, M.D., was born on January 29, 1827, in Sheridan, Chautauqua Co., N. Y. His parents were Samuel and Hepsibah M. (Denny) Haven, and removed west to Joliet, Ill., in the fall of 1834, the first sight of Chicago obtained by Samuel R. being on October 4 of that year. He was matriculated at Rush Medical College in the spring of 1847, being a pupil of J. V. Z. Blaney, professor of chemistry in that institution. Graduating in 1850, he was seized with the gold fever, and spent nearly two years in Upper California, digging the precious metal and practicing his profession. For a young man he prospered quite remarkably, and managed to take into his coffers much of the loose money which then flowed so freely; viz., for a modest prescription, $15 or $20, and for treatment of a felon, to which the miners were greatly subject, $20 or $25. Returning to Chicago about the middle of 1853, he formed a partnership with Dr. J. W. Freer, and remained with him for a number of years. Dr. Haven joined the army April 21, 1861, first reporting to Colonel R. K. Swift for duty, and going to Cairo, where he remained six months. He then passed a creditable examination before the medical board at Washington, and joined the Army of the Potomac as brigade surgeon. At first he was attached to General W. F. Smith's brigade and was afterward ordered to General Grant at Memphis, remaining with him during the preliminary steps attending the siege of Vicksburg. Of late years, Dr. Haven has retired from active practice, and is now living upon the fruits of his former work. He was married in 1854, to Jane Stowell, daughter of E. C. Stowell, deceased, formerly well known among the business men and real estate dealers of Chicago. In the early days, Mr. Stowell was manager of Frink & Walker's express and later a lumber merchant and an extensive real estate dealer.

PHILLIP H. MATTHEI, M.D., was born in Rodenberg, Hesse-Cassel, formerly Prussia, on October 20, 1833. His father, Henry, was a man of influence, being for many years burgo-master of that town, and his mother, Sophia Bornemann. Young Matthei received his early education at his native town and in Wunstorf, capital of Hanover. At the latter place, in 1853, he graduated in pharmacy and chemistry, having passed a very creditable examination before the board. For several years he was engaged in the drug business. He then took a regular course of medicine at the Rush Medical College, from which he received his degree in 1861. Dr. Matthei at once entered into regular practice, but returned to Europe in 1871, and received a second degree from the University of Gottingen in 1872. During his two years absence abroad, he studied in the hospitals of Gottingen and of Berlin, returning to Chicago in 1875, and since then has devoted himself exclusively to the general practice of his profession, having made an enviable and established reputation. Dr. Matthei is a member of the city and State medical societies, and is widely known in social and musical circles, having held honorable positions in the Germania society, and being closely identified with the Concordia. He was married to Miss Johanna Matthei, of Kadeberg, whose father held the responsible position as physician of the district of Kadeberg, on March 5, 1857. The son, Alexander, is a practicing physician of advancing reputation. The other children are Ida and Walter.

CALVIN M. FITCH, M.D., was born January 3, 1829, in Shelton, Vt., being a son of Rev. John A. Fitch, an Episcopal clergyman who labored at that place for many years. His mother's maiden name was Lucia M. May. His great-grandfather was a noted character in the Revolutionary War, being in command of the Connecticut Cavalry. Col. James Fitch, his great-grandfather on his father's side, was greatly interested in the educational institutions of his day and contributed the glass and nails that went into the original building of Yale College. Dr. Fitch's great uncle was the first president of Williams College, while both his father's and his mother's sides show a long array of physicians and professional men. He received his preliminary education in his native town, and pursued a classical course at the Vermont State University, Burlington, Vt., from which he received the degree of A.M. in 1852. He received his medical education in the University of New York, from which he graduated in March, 1852, with the degree of M.D. He practiced with an uncle, a physician in New York City, for two years after his graduation, and spent one year (1855) abroad, perfecting himself in practice in the hospitals of London and Paris. On his return, in 1856, he settled in Chicago, where he has since been engaged in the successful practice of his profession. He is a member of the Chicago and State medical societies and also of the American Medical Association. Dr. Fitch married, in March, 1860, Susan Ransom Fitch, they have two children, a son and a daughter. The son, Walter M., recently graduated from Rush Medical College, and is now associated with his father.

EDMUND ANDREWS, one of the oldest and leading surgeons of Chicago, was born in Putney, Vt., on April 22, 1824. His father, Rev. Elisha D. Andrews, was a clergyman of many years' standing in the Congregational denomination. At the age of five years, his parents removed to a locality near Rochester, N. Y., in which city he received his academic education. They subsequently settled in Ann Arbor, Mich., where young Andrews pursued the literary and medical courses in the State University. He graduated in 1849, and in 1852 received the several degrees of A.B., A.M., and M.D. After graduating from the medical department, he became demonstrator of human anatomy therein, and, later, was appointed professor of comparative anatomy. In 1856, Dr. Andrews removed to Chicago and opened an office with Dr. Nathan S. Davis, at No. 65 Lake Street. In this city he has continued in the successful practice of his profession, holding many positions of honor and trust within the pale of his calling. One year of this period he spent in the service of his country as surgeon of the 1st Illinois Artillery. He has been professor of surgery in the Chicago Medical College from its foundation to its present time, and is at present surgeon in the Mercy Hospital and consulting surgeon of the Michael Reese Hospital. His high standing has also been recognized by his election to the presidency of the Chicago Medical Society, the Illinois State Medical Society, and the Chicago Academy of Sciences. As will be seen by reference to the first volume of this History, Dr. Andrews is the authority cited on the geology of this district. Dr. Andrews is also a member of the American Medical Association, and has a reputation for skill in his profession which extends far beyond the limits of this State. Two of his sons—E. Wyllys and Frank T.—are already following in the footsteps of their father. The former is at present in Europe, perfecting himself in his studies and practice, and the latter is actively engaged in his calling here.

VALENTINE A. BOYER, M.D., has been a resident of Chicago for fifty years. He was born in Reading, Berks County, Penn., January 23, 1814, the son of John K. and Elizabeth (Anrand) Boyer. His father was a merchant. He commenced his collegiate education at Canville, Columbia (now Montour) County, and afterward attended Milton College, fourteen miles from that place. Previous to coming to Chicago, in 1833, he had attended a course of medical lectures in the University of Pennsylvania. He arrived in this city with his family on the 26th of May, but afterward returned to Philadelphia, to continue his medical studies in the University of Pennsylvania, from which he graduated in 1836, with his diploma of M.D. He at once commenced practice in this city, but as his father was a large contractor on the Illinois & Michigan Canal, the doctor was induced to enter into partnership with Medore Beaubien and Dr. Joseph Walker, who took a few sections. In 1846, when Chicago was made a port of entry and William B. Snowhook was appointed collector, Dr. Boyer became the first deputy collector, surveyor and inspector. He was also appointed by Governor Ford, about that time, assistant surgeon of the Illinois Militia, continuing the practice of his profession with Dr. Edmund S. Kimberly. From 1844 to 1852 he was a justice of the peace, served for a time as deputy U. S. Marshal, and also subsequently acted as clerk of the probate business, under L. P. Hilliard. In 1853, Dr. Boyer was in the drug business, and continued in the business up to 1857, and during the latter part of the year 1853 finished the contract on the Illinois Central road. During the early days he invested quite extensively in real estate, purchasing property at the corner of Adams and Dearborn streets, upon which he erected a brick building. Dr. Boyer is a member of the Philadelphia Medical Society. He is connected with LaFayette Chapter (R. A. M.), Chicago, and was a member of the lodge by that name, the first organized in Chicago. He is a charter member of Germania Lodge, A. F. & A. M., and of Robert Blum Lodge, I. O. O. F. He was married October 30, 1847, in Milwaukee, to Mary C. Specht.

LEVI D. BOONE was born December 8, 1808, near Lexington, Ky., and is a nephew of the noted Daniel Boone. His father received his death wound at Horse Shoe Bend. Thus, at ten years of age, the son was not only obliged to earn his own living, but to assist in supporting his widowed mother. In spite of that force of circumstances, which would have discouraged most young men, he determined to be a physician, and his resolve was accompanied with such persistent efforts, that, when twenty-one years of age, he graduated from Transylvania University, with the degree of M.D. In 1829, he left Kentucky, and removed to Edwardsville, Ill., where he entered the office of Dr. Benjamin F. Edwards, remaining with him for about one year, after which, at Hillsboro', he entered upon the practice of his profession. He had but fairly established himself, when the Black Hawk war broke out, and Dr. Boone was the first man in this county to enlist, serving as captain of a cavalry company, and also as regimental surgeon, during the entire war. In March, 1833, Dr. Boone married Louisa M. Smith, daughter of Judge Theophilus W. Smith, who held a position upon the bench of the State Supreme Court. They had eleven children, six of whom are now living; Daniel L. and Samuel S. Boone; Clara B., now the wife William Hansborough; Louisa M., now Mrs. Claude J. Adams; Lucy A., who married the lamented George B. Carpenter; and Mrs. Jabez II. C. Gross, formerly Mary J. Boone. Dr. Boone continued to practice his profession for many years, but, like many energetic and public-spirited citizens of Chicago, became interested in the Illinois & Michigan Canal, which Judge Breese and Judge Smith (Dr. Boone's father-in-law), did so much to make a public improvement as opposed to a mere private enterprise. Dr. Boone's immediate interests consisted in the assumption of a contract for the construction of a section of the canal, Henry G. Hubbard, Dr. John T. Temple, John M. Van Osdel, and others being associated with him. The canal lands taken up by the doctor became afterward very valuable, and formed the basis of the property, which, through his exertions and those of his sons, came to the family. In the spring of 1855, Dr. Boone was elected mayor of the city by the American party, relinquishing his share of a large and lucrative practice to his partner, Dr. B. McVickar. One of his first acts, after inauguration, was the appointment of his Democratic opponent, Isaac L. Milliken, to the office of chief of police, demonstrating how well these two, opposed politically, fraternized socially. Before his selection by the Know-Nothing party, Dr. Boone had always been an old-line Whig. It is quite generally remembered, that during the year 1862, although a loyal citizen of the most unequivocal type, he was arrested and incarcerated in Camp Douglas for assisting a prisoner of war to escape, by furnishing him with money with which to bribe the sentinel. Not only was it proved that the money had been sent to the rebel by his mother in the South, to relieve his wants, as was often done, but that, although a member of the distributing committee, the doctor was absent in Boston at the time the money was paid to the Southern gentleman. Four years after Dr. Boone's arrest, Colonel Joseph H. Tucker, commanding Camp Douglas in 1862, stated that nothing was developed which in any way could implicate the doctor, and that he never doubted his true and sincere loyalty to the country throughout the entire period of its greatest crisis. An incident, illustrating his confidence in the enduring qualities of the country and the perpetuity of the Union, was his sale, to Potter Palmer, of the ground where the store of Gossage & Co. now stands, on State Street, near Washington. Bonds of the Government had been issued, and there seemed to be a question at that time, even among the most loyal, as to what finality the War would bring forth. Silas B. Cobb was approached, in the interest of the doctor, to purchase the corner lot, as there was a good prospect of the latter delivering the whole, if he acquired Cobb's interest. But Mr. Cobb's interest in the country's stability and the city's future was as great as Dr. Boone's, so the former refused to sell, but offered to buy, thus giving him what Mr. Palmer sought to acquire by purchase of Dr. Boone. Mr. Palmer had a barrel of bonds, which he did not consider of great value, and finally purchased Dr. Boone's interest for $100,000, the sale netting the latter $97,500. This transaction inaugurated a series of purchases on the part of Potter Palmer, which has so signally improved State Street, and transferred the retail trade from Lake Street to that thoroughfare. During his lifetime, Dr. Boone was connected with several important financial institutions, being secretary of the Chicago Marine and Fire Insurance Company in 1837, president of the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank, in 1852, and trustee of the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company of Maine, from 1857 to 1877. With whatever enterprise he was connected, he enjoyed the confidence of his fellows. But although a successful business man, he did not attain his position as a result of parsimony. He was generous, not only to his friends, but sustained the causes of education and religion with a broad-minded spirit. It is not generally known that his donation to these and charitable objects amounted to about $200,000. To the society of which he was a member, and now known as the Immanuel Baptist Church, he gave $100,000 alone. From its inception, he was also identified with the University of Chicago, donating liberal sums for its encouragement and support. Dr. Boone's death occurred January 24, 1882, and his demise was looked upon as a public loss.

L. D. Boone

THOMAS DAVIS FITCH was born at Troy, Bradford Co., Penn., on July 14, 1820, the son of Lewis Haines and Polly Maria (Root) Fitch. In 1846, his parents removed to LaFayette, Stark Co., Ill., and there young Fitch engaged in teaching school (he having previously received a common school and academical education at his native place) and continued as pedagogue until 1847. He then pursued a course of study at Knox College, Galesburg, in this State, and also entered upon the study of medicine under the personal direction of his uncle, Charles Badger, M.D., of Mishawaka, Ind. He also, during his medical studies, attended the regular course of lectures at Rush Medical College of 1850-51, and also received private lectures from the celebrated physicians, A. B. Palmer and Nathan Smith Davis. In the fall of 1851, he commenced practicing at Wethersfield, Henry Co., Ill., and continued therein until the fall of 1853, when he resumed his studies at Rush Medical College, and graduated in February, 1854. He then was elected delegate from the Stark County Medical Association to the American Medical Association. Of this Association he is still a member. He also, about this time, joined the Illinois State Medical Society. In the fall of 1854, he removed to Kewanee, Henry Co., Ill., and was one of the inceptors of the Henry County Medical Society, and subsequently its president. At the outbreak of the War, in 1861, he received a commission as major and surgeon of the 42d Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and remained in the service until May, 1863, when he resigned on account of serious illness in his family and his own ill health. On May 1, 1864, he located at Chicago, since which time he has become one of the most prominent members of the profession in the city. He was elected county physician in 1865, and at the close of his term of office, in 1867, was appointed attending surgeon at the County Hospital. In 1870, he was placed in charge of the department of obstetrics and diseases of women and children, and retained charge thereof for some thirteen years; he was also secretary and president of the medical board of the hospital. He was one of the inaugurators of the Woman's Medical College, and one of its first faculty, filling the chair of gynecology until 1880, when, on account of a stroke of paralysis, he was made professor of clinical gynecology, and in 1853, on account of continued disability, he was made emeritus professor of gynecology. In 1880, he was made clinical adjunct to the chair of gynecology in Rush Medical College, which he filled for only one year in consequence of his serious illness. He is a member and ex-president of the Illinois State Medical Society, in which he filled the office of permanent secretary for ten years. He is ex-president and secretary and an honored member of the Chicago Medical Society, and has been since 1865. He has been attending or consulting physician to the Washingtonian Home for the past twenty years. He is a member and past master of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, A. F. & A. M.; member of Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.; Siloam Council, R. & S. M.; Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T.; and past prelate of same; also member of Oriental Consistory, 32<sup>d</sup>. He is also a prominent Odd Fellow, being P. G. and P. L. P. He was married on April 6, 1852, to Miss Harriet Winslow Skinner, of LaPorte, Ind.

GERHARD CHRISTIAN PAOLI was born in Drontheim, Norway, on June 23, 1815, the son of Pascal and Boletta Lehue Paoli. His early youth was not replete with educational facilities, and it was not until he was fourteen years of age that he was enabled to obtain the preliminaries to a liberal course of study, and these were acquired in a chemical laboratory, where he worked for three years. He then went to Christiania, the capital of Norway, and entered upon a university course, paying for the same by money he earned during the intervals of class-hours; at the close of the course determining on adopting the medical profession. After six years of theoretical study and practical application thereof in hospital practice, he removed to Stockholm, Sweden, and entered upon the practice of his profession, remaining there for four years, and then, in 1846, he came to America. He traveled over a large portion of the country, and then established himself at Springfield, Ohio. In 1853, he came to Chicago and went into the business of distillation of pure spirits, with the renowned chemist, Dr. James Van Zandt Blaney; and it may be remarked that association with Dr. Blaney is a high eulogium of Dr. Paoli's ability and proficiency. This distillation was conducted on a method of his own discovery, and which received a premium at the World's Fair, in 1853, and at the United States Fair, in Chicago, in 1856. Dr. Paoli commenced his private practice in this city, on his arrival, wherein he has been very successful. He was also city physician during the mayoralty of Hon. John Wentworth and John Haines; was appointed United States examining surgeon for pensions; and received an honorary degree from Rush Medical College in 1866. He is also a correspondent of several medical journals in this country. He is intimately connected with the various medical societies, and has been twice president and vice-president of the Chicago Medical Society. He was also one of the first professors of the Woman's Medical College, and has always been identified with liberality of thought, speech and action, and is in himself a splendid exemplar of the tenets he advocates. Large-hearted, benevolent, gentle as a woman, although occasionally stern of speech and sententious, Dr. Paoli is beloved by his patients and friends and admired by those few persons who are opposed to him in belief or dogma. He was married in England, in 1842, his first wife dying there. They had one child, Charles, who is now in the U. S. Postal Service. In 1851, he was married to Mrs. Sarah Magnusson, formerly Miss Corning, a lady of recognized literary ability and social charms.

JOSEPH F. HENROTIN was one of the old practitioners residing on the North Side, where he arrived in 1848. He was familiarly known in that section as the "old French doctor," and particularly distinguished himself during the cholera season, when he staid at his post day and night to fight the fatal scourge. From 1857 to the time of his death, in 1876, he was Belgian consul in Chicago, and his oldest son, Charles Henrotin, now occupies the same position. Six feet tall, with a massive head that bespoke his intelligence, he presented a most imposing appearance, that to this day is remembered by all residents of the North Side.

FERNAND HENROTIN, son of Dr. J. F. Henrotin, was born in Brussels, Belgium, on September 28, 1847, coming to this country when he was but ten years old. He received his education in the United States and graduated at Rush Medical College in the class of 1867-68, at once commencing his medical practice. In 1870-71, he was prosector of anatomy to his Alma Mater, and in 1877-78 was appointed county physician. Dr. Henrotin is surgeon to the Alexian Brothers' Hospital, is on the medical staff of the Cook County Hospital, and is surgeon to the police and fire departments. These various appointments manifest the esteem in which the doctor's skill is held by the public. Dr. Henrotin was married, April 24, 1873, to Miss Emily B. Prussing.

SAMUEL J. JONES, M.D., LL.D., was born at Bainbridge, Lancaster Co., Penn., March 22, 1836. His father, Dr. Robert H. Jones, was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia; practiced many years with skill and success; and died in 1863. His mother, whose maiden name was Sarah M. Ekel, came from Lebanon, Penn. In 1853, he entered Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., and graduated from it, with distinguishing honors in 1857. He soon commenced the study of medicine, and in 1858 matriculated in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, taking the degree of M.D. from that institution, in 1860. In the same year he entered the United States Navy as Assistant Surgeon; was attached to the United States Steamer "Minnesota," the flag ship of the Atlantic Squadron, upon which he remained for two years, when he was promoted to the rank of surgeon. He continued in the naval service of the country until 1868, when he resigned. During the same year he was chosen as delegate from the American Medical Association to the European Medical Associations, which held meetings at Oxford, Heidelberg and Dresden, in connection with Dr. Samuel D. Gross and Dr. Goodman of Philadelphia, and Dr. Barker of New York. In 1869, he was elected president of the board of examining surgeons for United States pensions, in this city. In 1870, he was appointed professor of ophthalmology and otology, in the Chicago Medical College, and still holds that chair. He established and conducted, for many years, the eye and ear department of Mercy Hospital and of the South Side Dispensary. He was for several years an attending surgeon in the Illinois Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, located in Chicago, and he established and has charge of the eye and ear department of St. Luke's Hospital. He is, also, at present engaged in editorial work, being the responsible editor of the Chicago Medical Journal and Examiner, published by the Medical Press Association. For the past fifteen years, he has confined his practice exclusively to diseases of the eye and of the ear, and his rare skill, both in the medical and surgical treatment of cases, has won him, not only celebrity as an oculist and aurist, but has secured to him an extensive practice. He has closely applied himself to the development of knowledge in his special department of the profession, and is an authority in questions concerning ophthalmology and otology.

JOHN GUERIN, M.D., was born in County Limerick, Ireland, May 28, 1839. He attended school in the town of Tipperary until, at the age of eleven years, he came to America with his father. His father was a farmer, and, like many others of his countrymen, was compelled to leave his native soil and seek a new home in America, on account of the exacting measures of the Irish landlords. The family settled in Malone, Franklin Co., N. Y., and for some time the son, of whom we write, worked on the farm in summer and attended the local school in the winter. After a time he was able to spend a year in study in a good school in Montreal, when he returned home to Malone, passing two years in the Franklin Academy in that town. By this time he had determined ultimately to become a physician, but it was necessary for him to earn the means to accomplish that purpose, so, after leaving Franklin Academy, he taught school for a short time in Moira, Franklin Co., N. Y. After this, in 1858 or 1859, he spent about two years in the State Normal School, at Albany, N. Y., where he was graduated in the winter, of 1860 or 1861, although, during this period, he taught school for one winter in Columbia County, N. Y. After graduation at the State Normal School, Dr. Guerin spent two years in teaching in Fall River, Columbia Co., Wis., and in March, 1863, came to Chicago, where, until February, 1866, he held the position of professor of natural sciences and mathematics in the University of St. Mary's of the Lake. During the time he occupied this chair, he studied at Rush Medical College, where he was graduated in 1866, with the degree of M.D. He then resigned his professorship in the university, and began the practice of medicine in this city which he has continued ever since. Immediately after the fire of 1871, he served as city physician. He has been a member of the medical board of and gynecologist to the Cook County Hospital since 1878, and he is also a member of the Chicago Medical Society. Dr. Guerin was married in Chicago, in January, 1870, to Miss Mary Jackson. They have had eight children—Thomas Edmund, Michael Henry, John Matthew, Mary, Mark Emmet, Matilda, Catherine and Gertrude. Of these, all but John Matthew and Matilda are living.

CHARLES AMBLER BUCHER, who is honorably entitled to the distinction accorded early residents, is the son of George, a soldier during the War of 1812, and Catherine (Estlemon) Bucher, who were among the first white settlers at Painted Post, an Indian settlement situated in Steuben County, N. Y. They were married at that place in 1819. On November 11, 1829, at Canton, Steuben Co., N. Y., Dr. Bucher was born, and these he obtained, during his boyhood, such education as the place afforded. At the age of fifteen, the subject of medicine began to occupy his youthful attention. So deep an impression did the study of the science make upon him, that he determined to devote the future to it. Two years later, at the age of twenty, he placed himself under the supervision of a preceptor, where he remained for two years. In 1850, he went to Geneva, N. Y., and attended a course of lectures in the medical college at that place. Assured that the West would afford a wider field for his advancement as a student, in 1851, he came to Chicago and, securing a position as clerk, continued his studies during his residence here, which embraced a period of three years. At the expiration of that time, he went to Aurora, Ill., from thence to Bloomington, where he resumed his studies. After remaining there a short time, he went to Batavia, Ill., and, settling there, applied himself vigorously to study. Having fully prepared himself for a college course, he returned to Chicago in 1860, and entered Rush Medical College, from which institution he graduated in 1862. The excitement attendant upon the Rebellion was then at its height. In company with others he enlisted, and was assigned to Company "B," 124th Illinois Infantry Volunteers, acting for a portion of the time as assistant surgeon. After a service of seven months, he was discharged, and commissioned as first assistant-surgeon and assigned to the 72d Illinois Infantry Volunteers, with which command he continued until he was mustered out at Vicksburg, Miss., in 1865. After his discharge, which occurred in Chicago in that year, he returned to Batavia, and began the practice of his profession. In 1879, he selected Chicago as his future and permanent place of residence, since which time he has been engaged in the active practice of his profession here. Dr. Bucher is familiar with the early days of the Garden City, and possesses a fund of interesting information in reference to its history at that time. He is a member of the Pathological Society and the Fox River Valley Medical Society. On September 20, 1854, at Aurora, Ill., he was married to Miss Minerva Simpson of that city.

JOHN B. BELL, M.D., was born in Augusta County, Va., January 12, 1836. His ancestors had resided there since the foundation of the colony by the English settlers, in the seventeenth century. His grandfather, on the paternal side, was a captain in the Revolutionary War, and was distinguished for his bravery during the struggles of the Republic. The parents of the subject of this sketch, John and Sophia (Erwin) Bell, resided in Augusta County, Va., all their lives. Dr. Bell obtained his early education at a plantation school-house at the place of his birth. Having acquired, under the instruction of the district schoolmaster, the rudiments of an English education, he went, in 1852, to Lexington, Va., where he entered an educational institution, known at that time as the Washington College, taking a classical course, which embraced a period of four years. As soon as he had finished his studies, he returned home; shortly after which he became interested in scientific matters, and especially to that branch appertaining to materia medica. Having given the subject considerable attention, in 1857 he placed himself under the instruction of a preceptor, where he remained for one year and a half. Fully qualified to enter upon a college course, he, in the fall of 1858, went to Philadelphia, and became a student in the Jefferson Medical College, graduating in 1861. Returning to Augusta County, he began the practice of his profession, which he followed until 1865, in which year he came to Chicago, since which time he has been engaged in active practice in the city. Dr. Bell is a scholarly gentleman and a physician of extended experience. August 2, 1862, he was married, in Augusta, County, Va., to Emma Robinson, who died in this city in 1875. He is the father of two children, boys. Dr. Bell is a member of Covenant Lodge, Corinthian Chapter and St. Bernard Commandery of the Masonic Order.

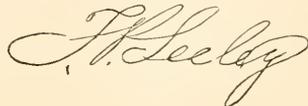

WILLIAM EDWIN CLARKE, son of Thaddeus and Deborah (Baker) Clarke, was born at Lebanon, Conn., February 22, 1810. When he was but a child, his parents moved to Rochester, N. Y. His education, up to the fourteenth year, was acquired under the supervision of his mother, who was a highly cultivated woman. In 1833, he entered the Rochester Academy, at that time under the management of Professor Chester Dewey, where he remained, undergoing a collegiate education until 1840. At the close of his academic career, he settled upon the profession of medicine as his calling in life, and began a course of thorough study in that science, under the able preceptorship of Dr. E. M. Moore, of Rochester, N. Y., which he continued, with but little interruption, for five years. While studying with Dr. Moore, he attended lectures at the Berkshire Medical College, located at Pittsfield, Mass. Following the close of his studies at that institution, he went to Woodstock, Vt., and entered the Vermont Medical College, and, after taking two full courses at that institution, he graduated in 1845. Locating in Rochester, N. Y., he there began the practice of his profession. In 1847, he moved to Coldwater, Mich., where he practiced until 1852, when he came to Chicago. In 1855, circumstances induced him to return to Michigan; settling in Cass County, he practiced his profession until 1861. At the breaking out of the Rebellion, he entered the army as a surgeon in the 4th Michigan Infantry. Several months later, at the request of Colonel H. C. Gilbert, of the 19th Michigan, he was transferred to that regiment. In July, 1863, on account of illness, superinduced by confinement as a prisoner of war, he resigned his commission and went to Washington, D. C., where he became attached to the general hospital, in which position he served until the close of hostilities. In 1865, he returned to Chicago, and re-engaged in practice. Dr. Clarke is familiar with much of the early history of Chicago. He is a member of the Chicago Medical Society, Illinois State Medical Society, and the National Medical Association. On January 25, 1849, he was married, at Marshall, Mich., to Harriet Hale; she died, at Washington, D. C., June 19, 1854. His second marriage, to Mary L. Reed, occurred in this city, December, 1855. He is the father of two children, both by his second wife. Mr. Clarke is a gentleman of intelligence and education, and a brother of the well-known writer and correspondent, Grace Greenwood.

ABRAM GROESBECK was born on May 24, 1810, at Albany, N. Y., and received his education at Albany Academy, where he became noted for his classical attainments and general proficiency in his studies. At about the age of fifteen, he left school and commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Jonathan Eights, with whom (immediately upon his becoming a licentiate) he was associated in the practice of medicine in his native city. On May 24, 1831, he received his license to practice medicine from the New York State Medical Society, and, upon the establishment of the Albany Medical College, in 1848, the faculty recognized the ability of Dr. Groesbeck by conferring an honorary degree upon him. His talents had received public recognition long ere this, however, as, immediately upon receiving authority to practice, he was appointed physician to the Alms-house at Albany. In April, 1856, he came to Chicago and commenced practicing, which he maintained until the date of his decease, on November 25, 1884. As the doctor remarked, he had always led an active life, and found it impossible to continue in idleness. During the latter years of his life he was afflicted with an optical disease which made it impracticable for him to read, and rendered the ability to distinguish any objects, save the largest, a matter of extreme difficulty. Notwithstanding this great deprivation, he was, like John Milton, cheerful and contented, and universally beloved by everyone who had an opportunity of observing his comprehensive and contented mind, subduer and beautifier of his physical disability. In 1841, he was married to Miss Mary L. Williams; they have two children: Mrs. Harriet Williams VanBuren, the wife of Augustus VanBuren, one of the leading lawyers of this city, and Fannie Groesbeck.

HENRY TOMBOEKEN was born in the province of Hanover, Germany, on October 4, 1837, and came to the United States, when a child, with his parents, residing for a few years in Philadelphia, coming to Chicago in 1851. Having determined upon pursuing the study of pharmacy, he entered the College of Pharmacy, and was one of the two primary graduates from that institution in 1860. To render him still more proficient in pharmaceutical science, he visited Europe, studying the natural sciences, especially chemistry, at the University of Goettingen, during the years 1861 and 1862. Returning to America, he resolved upon becoming a physician, and entered as a student at Rush Medical College, and graduated therefrom in 1866; subsequent to which he acted as assistant to an older physician for a time, and later visited Europe again, devoting considerable time to clinical study of cases in the hospitals of Berlin and Vienna, under the supervision of some of the ablest exponents of medical and surgical science in the world. This last phase of Dr. Tomboeken's biography depicts the man and the physician—a diffidence to undertake any enterprise without an intimate and thorough knowledge of the matter in hand.

THADDEUS POMEROY SEELY was born in Canton, N. V., on May 27, 1831, and received his early education at the village of Evans, N. Y., whither the family moved in 1834. He very early determined upon acquiring a liberal education; and to realize means to achieve this, he sold books and maps and also taught school when but fifteen years of age. In 1848, he matriculated at Madison University, Hamilton, New York, and in 1850, exchanged his course of study to Union College, Schenectady, from whence he graduated in 1852, with high honors. In 1853, he commenced his medical course at Ann Arbor, Mich., and, to provide funds for the continuance of his studies, he procured the position of principal of the academy at Galesburg, Ill., and remained there one year. He studied medicine under the instruction of Professor A. B. Palmer, of this city, and also attended one course of lectures at Rush Medical College. In the spring of 1856, he graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine from Michigan University, and settled in Dowagiac, Mich., in the practice of his profession. At the commencement of the Civil War he became volunteer surgeon of the 16th Michigan Volunteer Infantry, with which regiment he went through General McClellan's campaign in Virginia. He was subsequently appointed as assistant surgeon of U. S. Volunteers, and assigned to duty in the hospitals of Washington and Alexandria, where he remained for one year, and also examined, as regular, the first colored regiment that was admitted into the surgical army. At the battle of Gaines Mill he was taken prisoner and sent to Libby prison, where he volunteered his services for the care of sick prisoners. The following extract from a newspaper, of which the editor was a fellow-prisoner with Doctor Seelye, testified to his philanthropy and humanity: "I can safely say that no surgeon did so much work, none labored as many hours, none volunteered more sympathy and kindness, than Dr. T. F. Seelye. He remained at Gaines Mill Hospital until the wounded were removed to Richmond, working night and day there as he did here. He remained with our wounded, at Richmond, four weeks after he might have been liberated, had he chosen to leave his patients to the mercy of tyrants, as other surgeons had done. Such a man should be remembered." In 1863, he was surgeon on an expedition to Arizona, and had a narrow escape from the Apaches while he was choosing the site for the first house erected in Prescott. After the War, Dr. Seelye returned to Chicago and commenced the practice that has resulted so fortunately for himself, and so happily for those who have sought his services. He has successfully performed many difficult surgical operations, including that of ovariectomy. He married, on February 1, 1866, Mary Josephine Bennett, daughter of Hon. Joseph Bennett, of Evans, Erie Co., N. Y. They have two children—Alfred Bennett and Herbert Averill.

CHARLES STORCK, M.D., was born in Tegernau, District of Schopfleim, Grand Duchy of Baden, June 9, 1826. His father, Charles F. Storck, was a physician of good standing, his grandfather being also a member of the same profession. Quite early in life, Charles Storck became connected with the Catholic Church, in which his uncle, Hyacinth, was an archdeacon. The youth's education was supervised by this uncle, who placed him in the best schools of Germany. He was particularly interested in the study of chemistry, and after attending the gymnasium, took a full course at the Polytechnic Institute in Karlsruhe. He afterward commenced his military career, serving as a military cadet, and passing through the military school at Karlsruhe, after returning with his regiment from Holstein. Serving with the Revolutionary Army in 1848-49, as captain in the engineer's corps, he took part in the battles of Kastadt and Kuppenheim, also in the Black Forest campaign. The young officer, at length, found himself in Switzerland as a refugee, but, although invited to return to Berlin by Emperor William, he decided to come to America, where no stigma would attach to his name from any source. His younger brother had already located in Buffalo, N. Y., as a physician, and, in 1840, Charles came to this country. After remaining in New York for a short time he removed to Philadelphia, where he obtained a situation as assistant editor of the Freie Presse. His next experience was with a farmer, near Reading, Penn. After remaining with him for one season, his father arrived from Germany, and commenced the practice of medicine in Williamsville, Erie Co., N. Y. There the son commenced the study of his profession, and, after acquiring a knowledge of English, attended the medical department of the University of Michigan, which he left in 1854. In 1855, he graduated from the University of Albany, N. Y., from which he received his degree of M. D. Returning to Williamsville, he was married to Mary Koch, the daughter of a merchant of that place and sister of the present sheriff of Erie County, N. Y. For two years, Dr. Storck practiced his profession at Lockport, Niagara Co., N. Y., and during the succeeding two years in Williamsville. During 1859, he removed to Toronto, Canada West, opened an office and also studied in the hospital of that city. Dr. Storck came to Chicago in the fall of 1860, and during the succeeding June joined the 24th (Hecker) Regiment as assistant surgeon. After serving in that capacity ten months, he resigned, and, in February, 1862, was appointed post surgeon at Ironton, Mo. Until in June, 1863, he remained attached to the Army of Southeastern Missouri, when, on account of sickness, he resigned, and, returning to Chicago, continued to practice medicine. During the great fire he resided on the North Side, opposite the Rush Medical College, which institution, with his own dwelling, was swept away by that conflagration. Dr. Storck lost all his worldly possessions except an old horse and the clothes on his back. He started out bravely to repair his misfortune, and, although he received no aid whatever from any outside assistance, he soon was upon his feet again and had regained much of his practice, which he had temporarily lost. After the fire he moved with his family to West Lake Street and resided for some time in the oldest brick house then standing on that thoroughfare. He afterward removed to the North Side, where he now resides. Dr. Storck has two sons, Harvey Storck, of Omaha, Neb., and William Storck.

CHARLES GILBERT DAVIS was born in Clay County, Mo., October 14, 1849. His father is Dr. George W. Davis, who has practiced medicine in that region for many years, and at one time was the owner of the greater part of Clay County. He is in vigorous health; although over seventy years of age, and lives on his farm of one thousand acres in Bates County, Mo. Of late years he has retired from active practice, being only engaged as consulting physician. Charles G. Davis received his early education at the Western Christian University in Kansas, where he was graduated in the class of 1864. After a time he entered the Eclectic Medical Institute in Cincinnati, where he was graduated, in 1871, with the degree of M. D. Desiring to still further pursue his studies before beginning practice, he went South, and entered the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, where, in 1873, he again received the degree of M. D. The ensuing year (1874) was spent in quarantine hospital service at St. Louis, Mo., and the year following in general practice in that city and vicinity. While there he availed himself of the opportunity to take the ad eundem degree of Doctor of Medicine, at the Missouri Medical College. In 1876, he removed to Chicago where he has since been in active practice, and is a member of the Chicago Medical Society. Dr. Davis was married, in 1875, to Miss Bella Braden of Lawrence, Kan. They have two children—Charles Braden and George Gilbert.

F. MONTROSE WELLER, for some years a prominent member of the medical profession in Chicago, was the first regular physician to practice in the village of Evanston. His ancestors are from all countries and all climes. On his father's side they originally came from Bavaria and Holland, having united with a branch from Portugal, and the results of this combination, passed over into New England at an early day, resting from their wanderings at Whitehall, N. Y. His mother's ancestors were of Scotch and English stock, with a sprinkle of Irish. Thus it is that Dr. Weller has the blood of many nationalities in his veins. His father, John Weller was a farmer and master-builder, while his mother, Anna Farquharsen, was a native of Otesego, N. Y. Dr. Weller was born April 13, 1825, in Sardinia, Erie Co., N. Y. As he says, "I was born on a hemlock ridge, and rocked in a cradle made of basswood slabs." The boy was of a sickly constitution, with white complexion and flaxen hair, and for many years neither his parents nor his friends expected that he would reach maturity. Until he was eleven years of age, he attended the district schools in his neighborhood, and afterward obtained a partial classical education. He taught school for some time, making a specialty of normal instruction, and being at the head of quite a flourishing high school. His leaning was toward theology, but he decided to study medicine, intending, at first, to qualify himself merely as a lecturer on hygiene, and thus acquire the knowledge which would be helpful to him in preserving his precarious health. He commenced his studies at Oxford, Mich., and, taking a course in the medical department of the State University, at Ann Arbor, graduated therefrom in 1854. In the summer of 1855, he removed to Evanston. Dr. Weller at once commenced practice as the pioneer physician of the village, and continued to build up a good career and name for a period of eleven years. He then removed to Chicago, where he remained for seven years, then returning to Evanston, where he practiced for five years. In 1875, he again removed to Chicago, where he has since resided, a portion of the time having been passed as an invalid. At present, however, Dr. Weller is in good health and is building up a comfortable practice, and he expresses the hope to be useful to his fellow-men for many years to come. He was married in December, 1853, at Northville, Wayne Co., Mich., to Maria Antoinette Hillopoite, who died at Evanston in 1858. His second wife, now living, is the daughter of the late George M. Huntoon, one of the oldest settlers of Chicago. They were married January 1, 1861, and have one child, a boy.

HENRY GEIGER, son of Dominikus and Kunigunda (Burg) Geiger, who were married at Offenburg, in Baden, Germany, was born at Offenburg, November 9, 1836. During nine years of his residence at his birth-place, he attended the high school, acquiring a preparatory education. In 1855, having some time previously evinced a desire to pursue scientific studies, especially that branch appertaining to materia medica, he went to Heidelberg, and entered the medical college at that place, remaining there three years. In 1858, he located at Wurtzburg, where he became a student in the medical college situated there. In the latter part of 1861, he graduated from the medical institution in Heidelberg with honors. A desire for travel, with a view to enlarging upon the knowledge he had thus far obtained, induced him to visit the several medical colleges and hospitals in Vienna and Prague. After a tour of those places, he entered, in 1863, the German military service as surgeon, officiating in that capacity until 1866. A short period of inactivity followed, when, after considerable deliberation, he determined to tempt fortune in the New World. Accordingly, in January, 1867, he sailed for the United States. Fond du Lac, Wis., shortly after his arrival in this country, became his place of residence, where he continued for five months practicing his profession. At the expiration of that time, he came to Chicago and located permanently. In 1869, he was appointed county physician for the North Side. From 1877 to 1878, he acted as physician to the entire county. In 1874, he was a member of the Board of Health. From October, 1882, to January, 1884, Dr. Geiger officiated in the capacity of medical inspector. He is a member of the German Medical Society. On January 10, 1867, at Offenburg, Germany, he married Emma Hissmaier, and has two children.

ALEXANDER HARDY COOKE was born on June 10, 1824, at Mount Pleasant, Canada, receiving his early education at home and the grammar schools of the vicinity. In 1838, he went to New York State, and attended the Lewiston Academy in Niagara County. He graduated as M.D. from the University of the City of New York in 1849, commencing to practice immediately thereafter. He again graduated from the Victoria Medical College and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, of Canada, in 1866, continuing his practice in Canada until 1869, when he came to Chicago. Dr. Cooke married, in 1843, Angelina Augusta Winer of Hamilton, Canada. Their first-born, William Winer Cooke, was first lieutenant and adjutant of the 7th U. S. Cavalry, and brevet lieutenant-colonel U. S. A., and was killed, with the gallant General George A. Custer, at the battle of the Little Big Horn, M. T., on June 25, 1876. Three sons yet live to Dr. and Mrs. Cooke—John Masson Cooke, who resides in England; Alexander Wilson Cooke, who is one of the Chicago city engineers; and Rev. George Brega Cooke, who is an Episcopal clergyman, at Sault Sainte Marie, Algoma, Canada.

CHICAGO MEDICAL COLLEGE.—On March 12, 1859, at the office of Drs. Rutter and Isham, a meeting was held by Drs. David Rutter, Hosmer A. Johnson, Edmund Andrews and Ralph N. Isham, to organize a medical faculty of the Lind University. As a result of this meeting the medical department of Lind University, subsequently known and incorporated as the Chicago Medical College, and the medical department of the Northwestern University, was opened on October 10, 1859, in Lind's block on Market Street, near Randolph, where lecture and anatomical rooms were fitted up and a museum established for this specific purpose. The ceremonies were conducted by Dr. Hosmer A. Johnson, as president of the faculty, and were opened with prayer by Rev. J. Ambrose Wight; the address was delivered by Dr. N. S. Davis. The first term opened on October 11, 1859, and terminated March 5, 1860. The faculty have been as follows:

Professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children: David Rutter, emeritus, 1859-64; William H. Byford, 1859-71; E. O. F. Roler, associate, 1869-71.

Professor of descriptive anatomy: Titus DeVille, 1859-60; emeritus, 1860-65; J. H. Hollister, 1860-63; J. S. Jewell, 1863-69; W. H. Boyd, 1869-71. Assistant professors: S. A. McWilliams, 1867-69; Norman Bridge, 1869-71.

Demonstrators of practical anatomy: Horace Wardner, 1859-61; Ernst Schmidt, 1861-63; J. S. Jewell, 1863-66; E. O. F. Roler, 1866-67; J. M. Woodworth, 1867-69; Thomas S. Bond, 1869-71. Assistant, Norman Bridge, 1868-69.

Professor of physiology and histology: Hosmer Allen Johnson, 1859-66; J. M. Woodworth, 1866-67; Daniel T. Nelson, 1867-71.

Professor of principles and practice of medicine and clinical medicine: Nathan Smith Davis, 1859-71.

Professor of diseases of respiratory and circulatory organs: Hosmer A. Johnson, 1868-71.

Professor of principles and practice of surgery and clinical surgery: Edmund Andrews, 1859-71. (Subsequent to 1863, this chair also included military surgery.) Assistant, S. A. McWilliams, 1869-71.

Professor of surgical anatomy and operations of surgery: Ralph N. Isham, 1859-71.

Curator of museum: Julian S. Sherman, 1868-69.

Professor of orthopedic surgery: Julian S. Sherman, 1869-70.

Professor of orthopedic surgery and diseases of the joints: Julian S. Sherman, 1870-71.

Professor of materia medica and therapeutics: J. H. Hollister, 1859-60; A. L. McArthur, 1860-63; J. H. Hollister, 1863-65; Henry Wing, 1865-66; M. O. Heydock, 1866-71.

Professor of general pathology and public hygiene: M. K. Taylor, 1859-63; Henry Wing, 1863-65; Hosmer A. Johnson, 1865-66; emeritus, 1866-67; J. H. Hollister, 1866-69.

Professor of pathology and pathological anatomy: J. H. Hollister, 1869-71.

Professor of medical jurisprudence: H. G. Spafford, Esq., 1859-64; M. O. Heydock, 1864-66; R. J. Patterson, 1866-71.

Professor of hygiene: Thomas Bevan, 1868-71.

Professor of inorganic chemistry, organic chemistry and toxicology: F. Mahla, Ph.D., 1859-67; John E. Davies, 1867-68; C. Gilbert Wheeler, 1868-71.

Professor of ophthalmology and otology: Joseph S. Hildreth, 1869-70; Samuel J. Jones, 1870-71.

This college was the first to establish the graded system of instruction, by the institution of junior and senior departments.

The following list gives the number of students and graduates at each session:

SESSIONS.	STUDENTS.	GRADUATES.
1859-60	33	12
1860-61	54	14
1861-62	63	17
1862-63	81	17
1863-64	89	17
1864-65	102	31
1865-66	103	31
1866-67	104	33
1867-68	113	50
1868-69	85	42
1869-70	72	27
1870-71	107	30
1871-72	101	33

In 1864, the name of the institute was changed to that it bears at present, Chicago Medical College; and in the same year the college was removed to a new building, especially erected for the purpose, No. 1015 State Street, two doors south of Twenty-second Street. In 1870, the college again removed to Nos. 54 and 56 Twenty-sixth Street, at the corner of Prairie Avenue, the building being completed September 1, 1870, at a cost of $25,000, when it also became the medical department of the Northwestern University. It likewise furnishes medical and surgical services at the wards of the hospital of the Sisters of Mercy, called Mercy Hospital, on the corner of Calumet Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street.

CHICAGO MEDICAL COLLEGE.

One prominent innovation in, and improvement upon, precedent methods of education was established by the Chicago Medical College—the graded system heretofore adverted to, and the arrangement made by the faculty, on April 25, 1868, “that three consecutive courses of lectures should be given, with a separate group of studies for each of the three years of pupilage.” These three courses of lectures, which are distinct and successive, constitute a most complete and comprehensive sequence of study, and Chicago Medical College is the founder of the system.*

One additional item is of historic interest in connection with the college; that at the same time the medical department of Lind University was inaugurated, the Chicago City Dispensary was established in Lind's block, with Drs. Edmund Andrews, William H. Byford and Horace Wardner as physicians and surgeons. During the year 1860, more than three thousand patients were prescribed for and treated, and, upon the removal of the college to its various sites, the Dispensary, with its crowds of attendants, was a faithful follower.

WILLIAM HEATH BYFORD was born March 20, 1817, in Eaton, Ohio, the son of Henry T. and Hannah Byford, and is essentially a self-made man. Left fatherless when only nine years old, he was compelled to relinquish the preliminary studies he was pursuing at a district school, and work to help support his widowed mother. In 1831, he was apprenticed to a tailor in Palestine, Ill., with whom he staid two years, and then engaged with another tailor at Vincennes, Ind. In this position, he not only worked at his trade, but also, by the aid of books which he borrowed, acquired a proficiency in English and a mastery of Greek, French and Latin, and took especial pains to study physiology, chemistry and natural history. Shortly before the termination of his apprenticeship he determined that he would be a physician, and, in pursuance thereof, he applied himself to medical studies under the instruction of Dr. Joseph Maddox, Vincennes. In the pursuit of these studies he manifested the same indefatigable application and comprehensive understanding that had characterized him hitherto. After passing the required examination, he commenced the practice of medicine on August 8, 1832, at Owensville, Gibson Co., Ind. During 1840, he removed to Mount Vernon, Ind., and five years subsequently received a regular graduation and accepted diploma from the Ohio Medical College. In October, 1850, he occupied the chair of anatomy in the Evansville Medical College of Indiana, remaining there two years, when he was transferred to the professorship of theory and practice in the same college, continuing therein until the suspension of the college in 1854. In May, 1857, he was elected vice-president of the American Medical Association, and in the ensuing fall he was appointed professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in Rush Medical College. In 1859, he associated himself with a number of other medical men in the formation of the Chicago Medical College, and occupied the chair of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in that institution until 1880. In that year Rush Medical College created the new chair of gynecology, and invited Dr. Byford to unite with the faculty of that school. He still occupies that position. In 1860, Dr. Byford was the prime mover in the organization of the Woman's Medical College of Chicago. He has been since its establishment, and still is, the president of that college. He has been engaged as a teacher in the Woman's College in the chair of obstetrics, and now of gynecology. After many years of labor he has the satisfaction of seeing this Institution placed upon a permanent basis and in a prosperous condition. He is the author of several successful medical books, among which are the "Practice of Medicine and Surgery applied to the Diseases and Accidents incident to Women," the third edition of which is now nearly exhausted; and "The Theory and Practice of Obstetrics," August 2, 1875, the physicians of Chicago united in forming the Medical Professors' Association, with the view of improving the character of the medical publications of the city. That association published the Chicago Medical Journal and the Medical Examiner, the two existing medical periodicals of Chicago, combining them under the title of The Chicago Medical Journal and Examiner. The association elected Dr. Byford editor-in-chief of the new journal. He occupied that position for four years, the length of time for which he was elected, and then refused a re-election. His contributions to the Medical Journal are numerous and on various subjects. Although not often venturing outside of professional subjects in his literary productions, Dr. Byford is the author of "The Philosophy of Domestic Life," a small volume that has had extensive circulation. In 1876, Dr. Byford was associated with other eminent men in the organization of the American Gynecological Society. At the first election of officers he was selected vice-president, and in 1881 he was chosen president of that association. He has contributed several lengthy papers to its volumes of transactions. On October 3, 1849, Dr. Byford was married to Mary Anna Holland, daughter of Dr. Hezekiah Holland, who died March 3, 1864.

* Important facts in this which were obtained from the "History of the Chicago Medical College, a lecture by Hossner A. Johnson, A.M., M.D.," Robert Ferguson's Sons, 1870; and from Dr. Frank S. Johnson.

December 3, 1873, he was again married to Lina W. Flersheim, of Buffalo, N. Y. His first wife bore him five children—Ann Eliza, Mary Jane, Wm. Hezekiah, Henry Q., and Maud H. Dr. Byford has been for twenty-five years engaged in a large and lucrative practice in this city, and is still as active and industrious as at any former period of his professional career.

HOSMER ALLEN JOHNSON was born in the town of Wales, near Buffalo, N. Y., October 6, 1822, the son of Samuel and Sally (Allen) Johnson. While yet a child, his parents removed to Boston, Erie Co., N. Y., where he first received the rudiments of his education in the district school. In 1834, his parents removed to Almont, Lapeer Co., Mich., and for some time subsequently, his time was so engrossed with the necessary labor upon the new farm, that he had no opportunity of attending school. Under the supervision of his mother, who was a woman of high moral character and rare intellectuality, he, however, studied during his leisure moments, and so perfected his English education that, in 1840, he was able to teach school for the winter. When he attained his majority, he set about procuring a liberal education, and taught school part of the year to enable him to attend the academy or college the remaining part. In the fall of 1846, he entered the sophomore class of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, but was compelled, in 1848, to travel to a southern climate, because of symptoms of pulmonary consumption. During his tour of travel he taught school at Vandalia, and also gave a course of lectures on geology and kindred topics, continuing, in the meantime, the studies of his class. In the spring of 1849, he passed the examinations at Ann Arbor, and at the following commencement, he received the degree of Artium Baccalaureus. In October, 1850, he came to this city and taught school, and at the same time, continued, in Rush Medical College, the medical studies which he had commenced two years before. In the spring of 1851, he became the first resident physician of Mercy Hospital, and received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from Rush Medical College, in February, 1852—acknowledged as the leader of that class. During the following summer, he received the degree of Artium Magister from the University of Michigan. In 1853, Dr. Johnson resigned his chair in Rush Medical College, having been one of the faculty since 1853, and shortly thereafter, united with some other physicians in the formation of the Medical Department of Lind University, subsequently the Chicago Medical College. In the same year, he was elected President of the Illinois State Medical Society. In 1865,

Dr. Johnson sailed for Europe, as one of the delegates of the American Medical Association. He was one of the founders of the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and its first corresponding secretary; in 1853, he was a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and in 1854, of the American Medical Association. In June, 1861, Governor Richard Yates appointed him a member of the board of medical examiners for the State of Illinois, and at the first meeting of that board he was elected its president, and served in that capacity until the close of the War. He was one of the consulting physicians of the Cook County Hospital, and for several years, one of the attending physicians and consulting surgeons of the Chicago Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary. He was for six years a member of the Chicago Board of Health, and now is a member of the National Board of Health and professor of diseases of the circulatory and respiratory organs of Chicago Medical College. In 1883, he received the degree of Legum Doctor from the Northwestern University, and after the great fire of 1871, he directed the medical work of the Chicago Relief and Aid Society. As an instance of the manner of the progress that this earnest and close student makes in studies that he undertakes, his Masonic career may be cited. In 1855, he was initiated an entered apprentice Mason; in 1855, he was appointed grand orator of the Grand Lodge of Illinois; in 1856, organized, sub ordinem, the grand commander of Knight's Templar of Illinois, and, in 1861, became an active member of the Supreme Council of 33°, at Boston, for the Northern Jurisdiction of the United States of America. Dr. Johnson was married in May, 1855, to Miss Margaret Ann Seward, and has two children—Frank Seward Johnson, A.M., M.D., lecturer on histology in Chicago Medical College, and who is closely following in the steps of his eminent father, and Flora Belle Johnson. Whole volumes of deserved eulogium could be written upon the life, character and achievements of Hosmer Allen Johnson, but his works are his noblest and best tribute; the success that attends his ministrations among the afflicted is not the result of inherited qualities, but the effect of close, careful and patient study, allied to a ripe and cultivated mind and understanding. A keen student, a trenchant lecturer, a distinguished humanitarian, an accomplished surgeon, a staunch friend, and a magnanimous opponent, Dr. Johnson is alike an honor to the profession and the circle he adorns, and to the beloved society of which he is an honored and influential member.

CHARLES GILMAN SMITH, M.D., is one of Chicago's oldest and most respected practitioners, coming to this city from Boston in February, 1853. Hanging out his sign at No. 122 Lake Street, Dr. Smith commenced his long and successful career. His regular practice grew in a gratifying degree, so that by 1868, he was enabled to go abroad and study his profession in the hospitals of England, France and Germany. Previously, however, during the War, Dr. Smith's reputation, as a safe and skillful practitioner, had been further established by his official connection with Camp Douglas, he being one of the six attending physicians placed on duty there. His long residence in Chicago, and his thorough training, have given him a high standing among those in general practice. For several years he was a lecturer in the Woman's Medical College, and is at present a consulting physician of the Women's and Children's Hospital and of the Presbyterian Hospital. Dr. Smith is also the oldest examiner for life insurance companies in Chicago, being connected with the most important corporations of that character.

Aside from his professional labors, he has found time to build up a high reputation among social and literary circles, having served for some time as president of the Chicago Literary Club, which is composed of many of the city's most prominent and cultured residents. Dr. Smith was born in Exeter, N. H., on January 4, 1828, the son of Josiah G. and Frances Anne (Eastham) Smith. Dr. Smith was first educated in the public schools of Exeter, and at the Phillips Academy. At the latter institute he prepared for Harvard College, and, in 1847, when sixteen years of age, entered the sophomore year. While attending the medical department of the college, in 1848, occurred the terrible Webster-Parkman tragedy, which horrified all New England. Professor Webster, who was a member of the medical faculty, being hanged for murder, the class was temporarily broken up. Young Smith removed to Philadelphia to pursue his medical studies, and, in 1851, graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, with the degree of M. D. Locating in Boston, he practiced for about two years, being a portion of the time attending physician at the Poor House Hospital. From there he removed to Chicago. He married, on October 16, 1873, Harriet, youngest daughter of Erastus T. Gaylord, one of the earliest residents of Cleveland, Ohio.

JAMES STEWART JEWELL was born September 8, 1837, near Galena, Illinois, and is the son of John M. and Margaret M. Jewell, both natives of Tennessee. After the usual preliminary education he began the study of medicine with Dr. S. M. Mitchell, of Williamson County, Illinois, in 1855. In 1860, he was graduated at the Chicago Medical College, where he received the degree of M. D. He began practice, in 1860, in Southern Illinois, and, in 1862, removed to Chicago to take the position of professor of anatomy in the Chicago Medical College. Dr. Jewell has been a practitioner in Chicago and vicinity ever since, except when abroad in 1869-70. He projected, and edited for eight years, the Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases, which became widely and favorably known, at home and abroad. He is a member of numerous societies, and has held various official positions in his profession and out of it. Among these, he is a member of the American Neurological Society, of which he was president for three years; of the American Medical Association, of the International Medical Association, of the Illinois State Medical Society, the Chicago Medical Society, the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and the Wisconsin Academy of Sciences. He has been professor of nervous and mental diseases in the Chicago Medical College, and is now emeritus professor of psychological medicine in that institution. The doctor was married, in 1864, to Mary C. Kennedy, of Nashville, Illinois. They have had seven children, four of whom are living—Mary, James, Stewart and Helen. Mrs. Jewell died November 26, 1887.

THEODORE J. BLUTHARDT was born in Neuenburg, Germany, on July 24, 1837, and received his early education at the gymnasium at Couitz, Prussia. He came to Chicago in 1856, and engaged in various pursuits until 1859, when he matriculated at the Chicago Medical College, and graduated therefrom in March, 1861, after which he returned to Europe with the intention of continuing his medical studies, but the War of the Rebellion diverted him from that purpose, and he returned to this country in July to participate in the struggle, and was commissioned assistant surgeon of the 1st Illinois Cavalry, by Governor Yates, on July 23, 1861. He immediately joined his comrades at Mexico, Missouri, and was with them in their various campaigns and at the siege of Lexington, where they were under the immediate command of Colonel James A. Mulligan, after which engagement he was placed in charge of the wounded, whom he took to the St. Louis General Hospital, and was there placed on duty. He remained at that hospital until he was promoted surgeon of the 23d Missouri Infantry Volunteers, on April 1, 1862. This promotion was made by order of General Henry Wager Halleck, and as a recognition of his valuable services at Lexington and subsequently. He immediately joined his new command, and participated in the battle of Shiloh, on April 6, 1862, and in all other battles and skirmishes of the Army of the Cumberland. He resigned in January, 1864, on account of the disability caused by wounds; afterward he was commissioned surgeon of the 14th Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and assigned to duty as post surgeon at Alton, Ill., where he remained until the War had terminated, when he returned to Chicago and entered civil practice. In December, 1866, he was elected county physician, from which he resigned in April, 1869, and in the fall of that year was elected a member of the board of supervisors of Cook County, and was president thereof until 1870. In 1870, he was elected supervisor of West Chicago, and, on July 1, 1873, was appointed a member of the Board of Education, which position he occupied for three years. In December, 1879, he was again appointed county physician, which position he still occupies. Mr. Bluthardt is a member of the Masonic fraternity and of the I. O. O. F., and is also a member of the Chicago Medical Society. He was also, for several years, the president of the Germania Mennechorch of this city. He married, on January 23, 1862, Miss Augusta Kottaken, of St. Louis, sister of Colonel Kottaken, of Little Rock, Ark.

DANIEL T. NELSON was born on September 16, 1839, in Milford, Worcester Co., Mass., the son of Drake and Lydia Thurber (Pond) Nelson. In 1841, his parents became a part of the pioneer settlers of Colesburgh, Delaware Co., Iowa; and there he remained, receiving a rudimentary education, until 1849, when he returned to Milton and attended the High School there. In 1857, he matriculated at Amherst College, and there remained until 1861, supporting himself, in part, by teaching school, when he graduated with honor. In the spring of 1862, Mr. Nelson entered the medical department of Harvard University, and, in 1865, graduated at the head of his class and received his diploma as Doctor of Medicine. Immediately after he graduated, he received the appointment in the military service as acting assistant surgeon, and was on duty with the Army of the James until General Lee's surrender, when he was stationed at the post hospital, Richmond, Va. In November, 1865, Dr. Nelson came to Chicago, and began his practice here, and, in April, 1867, was elected professor of physiology and histology in the Chicago Medical College, retaining that position until 1880. In the spring of 1881, he was appointed adjunct professor of gynecology at Rush Medical College, and still occupies that position. He was a member of the International Medical Congress of London, in 1881, and is a member of the following societies: British Medical Association, American Medical Association, Illinois State Medical Society, Chicago Medical Society, Chicago Gynecological Society, Chicago Academy of Sciences, and the Illinois State Microscopical Society. Dr. Nelson married, in 1862, Miss Sarah H. Travis, of Hallowell, Mass. They have the following children: Lillian T., Frank C., and Flora H.; and had two children, now deceased, Lottie May and Eddie D.

ADDISON HOWARD FOSTER was born at Wilton, N. H., on November 13, 1838. After the usual attendance upon local schools, he fitted for college at the New Ipswich Appleton Academy, where he was graduated in 1859. He then entered Dartmouth College, at Hanover, N. H., where he was graduated in 1863. Selecting medicine for his profession, he began his study with Dr. William D. Buck, of Manchester, N. H. After spending a year in the medical department of Dartmouth, he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City, where he was graduated in March, 1866. He then settled in Lawrence, Mass., where he practiced until 1868, when he removed to Chicago. He was with the original faculty of surgery, which post he occupied from 1870 to 1876; and, from the latter date to the present time, Dr. Foster has been a consulting physician to the Hospital for Women and Children. Since 1875, he has been a director, and, since 1879, the treasurer of the Chicago Medical Press Association, and, since 1869, has also been the medical examiner for the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company, of Boston, Mass. Dr. Foster is also a member of the American Medical Association, of the Illinois State Medical Society, of the Chicago Medical Society, and of the Chicago Pathological Society. He was married, September 18, 1866, to Susan M. Houghton, of New Ipswich, N. H. They have three children—Fred Houghton, born in Lawrence, Mass.; and Winslow Howard and Charles Stedman, born in Chicago.

WILLIAM MARTIN, son of William and Emma (Webb) Martin, was born November 10, 1844, at Alton, Ill. A portion of his early education was obtained at his native place, by attending a public school. In 1856, his parents moved to Godfrey, Ill., where he resided during the ensuing seven years—eighteen months of which time he passed at Lebanon, Ill., as a student in McKendree College. In 1859, he came to Chicago, engaged in business, and gave some attention to the subject of medicine. In 1863, he resolved upon pursuing a thorough course of study under an instructor, for the purpose of obtaining a preparatory knowledge of the science. He therefore placed himself under the prec tutorship of Dr. J. H. Hollister, where he remained one year, following which he entered the Chicago Medical College, graduating from that institution in 1867. By the opening of that year, he became identified with the Mercy Hospital in this city, as resident physician, a position which he filled for six months. At the expiration of that period, desirous of enlarging the knowledge he had thus far acquired, he went to New York and attended a course of lectures at Bellevue Medical College and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, dividing the term of the winter of 1868 between those two institutions. Returning to this city at the termination of his studies in the East, he located here, and practiced as a doctor of medicine. During 1866, he officiated as resident physician at the Soldiers' Home in this city.

BENJAMIN REL VANDOOZER was born at Little Rock, Ill., in 1843. While a youth, he removed to Oswego, Ill., and after several years' attendance at the public schools, he learned the printer's trade. In 1856, he became associated with the Kendall County Free Press, and was connected with it until 1861. He enlisted in the ranks of the 127th Illinois Infantry Volunteers, in August, 1862, and served with the army until the close of hostilities. Returning to Illinois, he came to Chicago, where he passed 1866-67 in medical studies at the Rush Medical College, and another year in the Chicago Medical College, where he was graduated in 1868, with the degree of M.D. Upon graduating, he opened an office in Chicago, where he has since been engaged in general practice. Dr. VanDoozer was connected with the Chicago Board of Health as Sanitary Inspector, from 1871 until 1874. He is a member of the Chicago Medical Society, and since January, 1878, has been assistant surgeon of the Illinois Central Railroad. Dr. VanDoozer was married, on October 8, 1861, to Miss Theresa Altha Lewis, of Oswego, Ill., and has one son, Frederick Rel.

JOHN D. SKEER, M.D., the son of Ely and Mary Skeer, of Butler County, Penn., was born July 5, 1825. The family name was primitively Skears, and is of English origin, from Yorkshire. His father, Ely Skeer, was a veteran of the War of 1812, who was on his way to Black Rock, N. Y., when the news came that hostilities had ceased and peace was declared. His boyhood was spent in Butler County, attending school and assisting his father in business. At the age of twenty he began the study of medicine under the guidance of Dr. Ormsby, with whom he read three years. In 1850, he matriculated in the Cincinnati Eclectic Medical College, and took his degree as Doctor of Medicine with the class of 1852, afterward locating in Clarion County, Penn., where he practiced six years. He then located in Newark, Ohio, and identified himself with the regular profession, continuing there six years, during which time he passed through the cholera epidemic of 1854. In 1859, he removed to this city. Upon the outbreak of the Rebellion he entered the service, and was appointed acting assistant surgeon of the 16th United States Infantry, and followed his command until March, 1862, when he was placed in charge of Hospital No. 9, at Nashville, Tenn., which position he resigned on account of ill health, in the fall of 1863. During that year, he passed the examination of the Illinois State Medical Board, and received a commission as full surgeon, afterward returning to Nashville, where he took the degree of M. D. from the university of that city. Remaining there, he engaged in hospital service until the fall of 1866, when he returned to this city and resumed general practice. Dr. Skeer was married, in December, 1853, to Miss Melissa Thompson, of Clarion County, Penn. Their family consists of Kate, the wife of Robert S. Rudd, a prominent lawyer of New York; Charles H., George M., Velma and Tina Mozelle. Their eldest daughter, Clara, died when in her twenty-third year.

EDWARD W. EDWARDS was born in the State of Maryland on April 6, 1816, and received his medical education in the city of Baltimore, graduating as a doctor of medicine from the Washington Medical College in 1846, subsequent to which he spent some time in traveling and combining medical study and practice. Among other places, Dr. Edwards practiced for a year in the Island of Cuba. He came to Chicago in 1861, since which time he has resided and practiced here, and in his own proper person is an able exemplar of professional ability.

JOHN SCHALLER, M.D., has been a resident of Chicago and a physician in good practice for about thirty years, having, during all this period, resided in the neighborhood of his present home, No. 193 Randolph Street. He was born in Flonheim, Rhein Hessen, on October 13, 1827, being the son of Henry and Magdalene (Mueller) Schaller. Taking eight courses of medical lectures at Heidelberg, four in winter and four in summer, he removed to Giessen, Hesse Darmstadt, to complete his education. Two more courses earned for him the degree of M.D., Dr. Schaller graduating from the university at that point on December 6, 1854. During the fall of the next year, he emigrated to America and came direct to Chicago, where he engaged in the practice of his profession, and has thus continued up to this present day. In December, 1856, he was married to Babetta Henry, who died October 10, 1865. Two children are still living—Henry and George J. The latter graduated from Rush Medical College in 1881. For two years George acted as an assistant physician in that institution and in Cook County Hospital, soon afterward going to Europe and taking courses of lectures at Heidelberg, Berlin and Vienna, besides visiting the hospitals at these points, and in London, Paris, Denmark and Sweden. He then became house physician of the German Hospital. Dr. John Schaller married his second wife, formerly Barbara Geadhardy, on October 13, 1866. They have had two children. One died in infancy, and the second, Susie, is attending school at the Institute of the Sacred Heart, in Washington Heights. Dr. Schaller is consulting physician of the German Hospital.

SAMUEL ANDERSON MCWILLIAMS, professor in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Chicago, was born in Ireland, in 1838. In early youth, unaccompanied by his parents, he crossed the Atlantic, and settled in Prince Edward County, Canada, where he subsequently taught school for several years. In 1857, he entered the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, where, having completed the classical course, he was graduated in the class of 1861, with the degree of B.A. He then took a full course in the chemical department of the University, and spent a year in study in the medical department of the same institution, and in 1864, received from the University the degree of M.A. He subsequently attended medical lectures in the Chicago Medical College, where, in 1866, he graduated with the highest honors of his class, and received the title of M.D. He at once commenced the practice of medicine in Chicago, associated with Nathan S. Davis, M.D., and has continued to be actively engaged in his profession ever since. For several years after graduation he lectured upon various subjects in the Chicago Medical College, and was also clinical teacher and attending physician for several years to the South Side Dispensary. In 1870, the Doctor was elected to the professorship of anatomy in the Woman's Hospital Medical College of Chicago, which he continued to fill for several years with punctuality, ability and complete satisfaction to all concerned. In 1881, in connection with four other medical men, Professor McWilliams took an active part in the foundation and successful completion of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Chicago, and also of the West Side Free Dispensary. In the formation of the faculty, the Doctor was elected to the professorship of clinical medicine, diseases of the chest and physical diagnosis, a position which he still holds. As a teacher he is clear and systematic in his methods, and scrupulously punctual in meeting his appointments. He is vice-president of the College, as well as a member of its board of directors since its organization. He is also president of the West Side Free Dispensary. Dr. McWilliams has been one of the attending physicians to the Cook County Hospital for the last seven years, and has regularly given clinics to large classes of medical students in the amphitheater of the hospital during that time. He is a member of the Chicago Medical Society, of the Illinois State Medical Society, and of the American Medical Society. In 1868, Dr. McWilliams was married to Miss Amelia Hobkirk, of Waupun, Wis. They had three children, only one of whom is living, Bertha Amelia. Mrs. McWilliams died in December, 1882, and in January, 1884, he married Miss Bertha Scheibel, of Chicago, by whom he has one child, Grace.

EBENEZER H. THURSTON, M.D., was born in Wolverhampton, England, December 22, 1838, being the son of Thomas and Elizabeth (Shaw) Thurston. His parents came to America in 1845, and, settling in Madison County, N. Y., gave their son the best of educational advantages. At the district schools of his neighborhood, the Hubbardsville Academy, and under the private tutorage of Professor James Bush, he obtained a permanent substructure for an academic and medical education. In 1859, his parents removed to Utica, where he continued his studies at the academy and commenced his medical career as a pupil under Dr. M. M. Bagg, of that city. While pursuing his medical studies at Utica, the War began, and he enlisted in April 1861, leaving Utica with the 14th New York Infantry Volunteers. His general education and knowledge of medicine soon found recognition, and he was attached to the hospital department of his regiment, acting as steward. In this capacity he was taken prisoner at the battle of Gaines's Mills, June 27, 1862, and lodged in Libby prison. There the doctor remained until the following November, when he was released and sent to St. John's College Hospital, Annapolis, Md. There he passed an examination and was appointed hospital steward, U. S. A., partly as a reward for services rendered the government in attending the sick and wounded officers and soldiers in Libby Prison. He held this position for some time, until worn out by imprisonment and long continued hardship in field and post hospitals, he succumbed to a severe attack of typhoid fever. As his health was greatly impaired, he received his discharge from the army. Upon his con-valence, he resumed his medical studies, and, in 1864, obtained his degree of M.D. from the University of Buffalo, and then immediately proceeded to the seat of State government, at Albany, N. Y. He there passed a rigid medical examination, and was granted a commission as assistant-surgeon of the 8th New York Cavalry, and was with that gallant regiment in all its battles from Petersburg to Appomattox Court House. At the close of the war he was breveted surgeon and honorably mustered out of service at Rochester, N. Y., July, 1865. He was greatly respected and beloved by his fellow officers and soldiers, and remains in friendly correspondence with many of them to this day. From the close of his services in the army until 1870, he followed his profession in the State of New York, and then removed to Chicago. Dr. Thurston's career in this city as physician and surgeon is too well known to require mention in this brief biography. His large and increasing practice attest his professional skill and well-deserved popularity. He is a member of the Oneida County and the Chicago Medical societies, and also a member of the Illinois State Medical Society. The doctor was married, in May, 1866, to Julia F. Randall, daughter of James Randall, of Utica, N. Y. They have one child, Grace.

ILLINOIS CHARITABLE EYE AND EAR INFIRMARY.
—In May, 1858, Dr. Edward L. Holmes, Dr. Joseph W. Freer, Rev. William Barry and Dr. Charles V. Dyer met with several wealthy and charitable citizens of Chicago, and determined upon establishing the Chicago Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, and as a preliminary thereto organized the following board of trustees: Walter L. Newberry, president; Charles V. Dyer, Luther Haven, vice presidents; Samuel Stone, secretary and treasurer; William H. Brown, Rev. William Barry, Philo Carpenter, J. H. Kinzie, Ezra B. McCagg, Flavel Moseley, Rev. N. L. Rice and Mark Skinner. It being determined that, at first, but a dispensary should be instituted, one room in a small wooden building was procured at No. 60 North Clark Street, on the northeast corner of Michigan Street. The consulting surgeons were Daniel Brainard and Joseph W. Freer, and the attending surgeons Edward L. Holmes, Henry Parker, F. B. Norcum, and W. H. Baltzwell.

During the first year about one hundred and fifteen patients were treated, and during the year ending May 1, 1861—about three years after its opening—two hundred and eighty-eight patients received treatment; two hundred and thirty-seven of whom were afflicted with ophthalmic diseases and fifty-one with diseases of the ear. Up to May 1, 1861, five hundred and eighty patients received treatment, and during that year the dispensary was removed to Ewing's Block, corner of North Clark and North Water streets, where the surgeons were Daniel Brainard, Joseph W. Freer, Edward L. Holmes and Edwin Powell. In July, 1864, Walter L. Newberry donated to the Infirmary the use of the lot occupying Nos. 16-18 East Pearson Street, opposite the old Ogden School, for ten years, whereon a large two-story wooden building, costing $2,000, was moved. The trustees at that time were Walter L. Newberry, president; Charles V. Dyer and Luther Haven, vice-presidents; Samuel Stone, secretary; Ezra B. McCagg, treasurer; William H. Brown, William Barry, Flavel Moseley, Philo Carpenter, John Evans, John H. Kinzie and Cyrus Bentley. Drs. Brainard and Freer were the board of surgeons and ex-officio trustees, and Drs. Holmes and Powell the consulting surgeons. Dr. Holmes thus summarizes the history of this institution up to the year 1871, in Early Medical Chicago:

“The first patient requiring board in the institution applied before a single room had been cleaned and furnished. For two nights he slept on a blanket on the floor. The rooms were furnished as the gradually increasing number of patients required. In a few months the number of applicants, especially soldiers recently discharged from the army and suffering from diseases of the eye, became so numerous that greater accommodations were rendered necessary. A large attic was finished, and divided into several comfortable rooms. The building was soon after raised and a brick basement constructed under it. Support for a limited number of patients from Illinois, Minnesota and Wisconsin was made possible by the donation of $500, placed for this purpose in the hands of the respective governors of these States. The United States Sanitary Commission, the Northwestern Sanitary and Christian Commissions, also, granted large sums for the support of soldiers at the Infirmary. In the fall of 1869, additional accommodations became necessary, and were obtained by the construction of a large building in the rear of the lot. The Infirmary, during the early period of its existence, was greatly indebted to the churches of the North Side, especially, members of which contributed, year by year, large quantities of furniture and clothing, in addition to donations of money. In this way, the Infirmary was enabled, not only to support an increasing number of patients, but to cancel an indebtedness of nearly $6,000, and also to gradually accumulate a fund of $7,000. From the year 1867 to 1871, the General Assembly appropriated $5,000 a year, for the support of patients at the Infirmary, and, in 1871, the institution became a public charity—owned and supported by the State.”

In 1871, the consulting surgeons were Joseph W. Freer and H. A. Johnson; and Edward L. Holmes and Edwin Powell, attending surgeons. During the same year the hospital was destroyed by the great fire, which reached the building about 3:30 a. m., on Monday. The majority of the inmates were taken by George Davenport, superintendent, to Blatchford's shot-tower, on Kinzie Street, where they stayed for some days.

THE CITY HOSPITAL, on LaSalle Street, between Cross and Old streets, was commenced in June, 1856, and completed in November, 1857, at a cost to the city of about $58,000, and was capable of accommodating three hundred patients. In August, 1859, it was leased by some surgeons for five years, and they contracted to receive and care for the city patients at a uniform allowance of three dollars a week. The hospital, under this arrangement, was opened on August 13, 1859, with Daniel Brainard, George Schloetzer and George K. Amerman as surgeons, and DeLaskie Miller, Joseph P. Ross and S. C. Blake as physicians. The warden was A. H. Carter, and Mrs. Carter was the matron. There was also a board of nine governors, three from each division of the city, who exercised general supervision over the affairs of hospital, as follows: North Division, George W. Dole, Gurdon S. Hubbard, Edward I. Tinkham; West Division, Reuben Tayler, Edson L. O'Hara, secretary, and D. F. Wilson; South Division, William Jones, president, Dr. H. Hitchcock and Dr. John H. Foster. In addition to the other services of the hospital, clinical instruction was given—principally to the students of Rush Medical College.

In 1860, W. C. Brown was the resident physician and surgeon. In 1862, the medical board are given as George K. Amerman, Joseph P. Ross, Joseph W. Freer and R. L. Rea; Henry Dunham, resident physician and surgeon. In the summer of 1863, the hospital was confiscated by the United States military authorities, and placed under the jurisdiction of Surgeon Brock. McVickar, with Drs. Joseph P. Ross and George K. Amerman as acting assistant surgeons. Dr. McVickar was succeeded by Dr. Hall, and he by Dr. S. A. Jackson. On July 25, 1865, Surgeon Joseph S. Hildreth took charge, and the scope of treatment was limited to diseases of the eye and ear, and the hospital was termed the “Des Marres Eye and Ear Hospital.” Its location was at this period designated as at the corner of Arnold and Eighteenth streets; the main building seventy feet long by fifty-five feet wide and four stories high, with a wing on the south side sixty-three feet long by sixty feet wide. The hospital capacity was one hundred and thirty patients and forty attendants. M. K. Gleason and J. H. Goss were the acting assistant surgeons under Dr. Hildreth. On November 11, 1865, the two last patients were discharged, and the doors of the Des Marres Hospital were closed. During the occupancy of the hospital by the United States authorities, the county patients were treated in a building at Jefferson, utilized for that purpose.

Drs. Ross and Amerman immediately and actively interested themselves to re-establish the hospital as a public charity, and, deciding that to further this end it would be requisite to become a politician, Dr. Amerman suspended party banners from the caduceus, and was elected a supervisor. In 1866, the first year of his service, he inaugurated and organized the Cook County Hospital, but being enfeebled by ill-health he was compelled to resign the direction thereof. Dr. Joseph P. Ross was elected to the position of supervisor and chairman of the hospital committee in 1866, and occupied it for two years. Hence, the establishment of the present vast and beneficial Cook County Hospital must be ascribed to the persistent energy and unflinching labors of Joseph P. Ross and George K. Amerman.

THE COOK COUNTY HOSPITAL had the following medical attendance in the years specified :

1866—George K. Amerman, R. G. Bogue and Charles G. Smith, attending surgeons; Joseph W. Freer, William Wagner, consulting surgeons; Thomas Bevan, Joseph P. Ross, H. W. Jones, attending physicians; Hosmer A. Johnson, R. C. Hamill, consulting physicians; Joseph S. Hildreth, eye and ear surgeon; Henry M. Lyman, pathologist. Benjamin Chase was warden and Mrs. Chase, matron. 1868—Edwin Powell, R. G. Bogue and C. G. Smith were attending surgeons; J. R. Gore and W. Wagner, consulting surgeons. The remaining physicians and surgeons were the same, with the addition of Daniel S. Root, house surgeon, and Nicholas Lyon and Benjamin S. Miller, assistants. In 1869, the physicians and surgeons were as before, except that Benjamin S. Miller was house surgeon, and George K. Dyce, and Mr. and Mrs. Chase were replaced by H. S. and Mrs. Eliza Rexford, as warden and matron. In 1870 and 1871, Edwin Powell, R. G. Bogue, T. D. Fitch and Charles G. Smith were attending surgeons; J. R. Gore and J. W. Freer, consulting surgeons; Thomas Bevan, Joseph P. Ross, H. W. Jones, Hosmer A. Johnson, H. A. Lyman, attending physicians; William H. Byford, R. C. Hamill, consulting physicians; Joseph S. Hildreth, eye and ear surgeon; J. W. Tope, house surgeon; William Fox and J. T. B. Gephart, assistants. Mr. and Mrs. Rexford were warden and matron.

JOSEPH P. ROSS was born on January 7, 1828, in Clark County, Ohio. When but six years of age, his father moved to Piqua, Ohio, and there he received his early education, attending the district school during the winter, and helping on the farm during the summer. When he was but nineteen, he made a commercial venture in a woolen mill, and after two years, he succeeded in clearing two thousand dollars. Being possessed of capital, he determined on securing an education, and attended the academy at Piqua, where he took a thorough scientific course, after which, he commenced the study of medicine in the office of Dr. G. V. Dorsey, at Piqua. After two years study with Dr. Dorsey, he attended lectures at Starling Medical College, Columbus, Ohio, and the ensuing year a course at the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, whence he graduated in the spring of 1852. He immediately commenced practice at St. Mary's, Ohio, but after a visit to Chicago, he determined that the Garden City was to be his home, and removed here in February, 1853. Shortly after his arrival, he formed a partnership with Dr. Lucian P. Cheney, and after that the history of Dr. Ross became commingled with the medical history of Chicago, he being always found in the front of any enterprise to help the poor and benefit his fellow-creatures by medical aid and surgical treatment. Physician to the Orphan Asylum, physician to the Reform School for fifteen years, originator, organizer and physician of the Cook County Hospital, physician on the battle-field during the War, and attending surgeon at Camp Douglas—these are a few of the positions of honor and philanthropy he has filled. The professorship in the Rush Medical College he occupied in 1867 he still retains, and his lectures have been listened to with interest and edification by the hundreds of graduates of that institution since 1867. In addition to lecturing, he has contributed largely to the financial success of Rush Medical College. After the fire, when the institution had a heavy bonded debt, he, with his colleagues, developed a scheme by which they were enabled to erect their present college building. At present, he is actively engaged in establishing the Presbyterian Hospital of Chicago. Ever since he came to Chicago, he has been identified with the Presbyterian church, and for the last eighteen years has been an elder in the Jefferson-park Congregational Society, with which he has been connected since its organization. Dr. Ross was married, in 1856, to Elizabeth H. King, a daughter of Tutuill King, who was one of the solid merchants of early Chicago. They have the following children: T. King Ross, J. Whitney Ross, Robert E. Ross, William H. Ross, Bessie G. Ross and Lila Frances Ross.

SMALL-POX HOSPITAL.—The small-pox hospital, in 1859, was on North Avenue, between Wolcott Street (now North State) and Lake Michigan, and Dr. William Wagner was the physician in charge. George B. Bay was the warden, Mrs. Clara F. Bay, the matron, and Miss Ann Anderson, assistant. This building remained at this location, and under this administration, until the year 1864, when a large and spacious building, costing $13,593.18, was erected, which contained twenty-four wards. It had a main building, two stories and basement, forty-eight by twenty-four feet, and two wings, each one story and basement, of thirty-two by sixty feet. This building was called the Lake Hospital. Dr. T. B. Bridges, health officer, had supervision of the hospital; Dr. S. C. Blake was the physician, William E. Jones was steward, and Mrs. Jones matron. In 1868, Dr. Niles T. Quales became the surgeon, and, in 1870, Dr. H. S. Hahn, who remained in charge of the hospital until its destruction by the fire of 1871, when the patients were all removed to Maywood. The fire reached the hospital at about two o'clock on Tuesday morning, and the value of the building and furniture destroyed was $6,000. When the hospital was erected near the Bridewell, the patients were removed thither from Maywood.

NILES THEODORE QALES, M.D., was born near Hardanger, Norway, January 17, 1831. He attended the public schools of the neighborhood and assisted his father in farming until he reached his seventeenth year, when he entered the agricultural school in Hardanger, where he remained three years, graduating in 1851. He then took charge of a large estate for one year, afterward going to Copenhagen and matriculating in the Royal Veterinary College, and received his diploma in 1856. Returning to his native town, he practiced as a veterinary surgeon three years, and emigrated to this city in 1859, where he resumed practice. At the breaking out of the Rebellion he enlisted in the First Illinois Artillery, Captain Taylor's Battery, and followed the fortunes of that command until 1863, when he was detailed for detached service at General Sherman's headquarters. At the close of the War he began the study of medicine under the instruction of Dr. Paoli, of this city, and matriculated in the Rush Medical College, taking his degree as Doctor of Medicine in the class of 1867. He was appointed interne at the Cook County Hospital, and filled that position one year following his graduation. In 1868, he was tendered the position of city physician, which he occupied nearly three years, and, in 1870 was made surgeon of the United States Marine Hospital. After the great fire of 1871, he was visiting physician of the Relief and Aid Society. Dr. Quales was married, May 26, 1870, to Miss Carrie L. Lawson, of Chicago, and has three children—Iver L., Martha G. and Nellie R.

ST. JOSEPH'S HOSPITAL.—Upon Sunday, August 20, 1871, the corner stone of this hospital was laid in the lot at the corner of Burling Street and Sophia (now Garfield Avenue). The ceremonies were conducted under the auspices of Right Rev. Bishop Foley. After the laying of the stone, Father McMullen, of the Cathedral of the Holy Name, preached in the vernacular, and Father Zimmer in German. The building was contemplated to be one hundred and fourteen feet front and one hundred and twenty feet deep, three stories in height, with basement and mansard roof, and to cost $80,000. As there was an insufficiency of funds, however, the main building alone was erected, at a cost of $50,000. The hospital is under the charge of a Sister Superior and eight Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, the mother-house of which organization is at Emmetsburg, Frederick Co., Md. There is accommodation for one hundred patients, and the medical staff comprises Dr. Moses Gunn, Dr. W. Godfrey Dyas, Dr. Charles T. Parkes, Dr. J. Adams Allen, Dr. Daniel R. Brower and Dr. E. M. Landis, house physician.

Joseph Ross.

FRANCIS L. WADSWORTH, physician and surgeon, was born in Oxford County, Maine, in 1833, where he resided until twenty-five years of age. He then came west and located in this city. He entered Rush Medical College in 1865, and took his degree four years later. He has since resided and been engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery in Chicago. Dr. Wadsworth was married in 1868, but two years later he lost his wife. In 1872, he was married to Miss Sarah F. Robinson, of Rhode Island. His eldest son, Charles Freer, was born in 1870, and the younger, Frank Russell Wadsworth, was born in 1874. For eleven years Dr. Wadsworth was lecturer and adjunct professor of physiology at Rush Medical College, and since 1881, has occupied the position of professor of physiology and histology in the Woman's Medical College, of this city. He is at present the physician in charge of St. Joseph's Hospital.

MERCY HOSPITAL. — This hospital was removed in 1853 to No. 265 Wabash Avenue, and in 1864 to the northwest corner of Calumet Avenue and Twenty-sixth Street, into a building which had formerly been occupied by the St. Agnes Academy, and which now comprises the north wing of the hospital. The central building and south wing were erected in 1869, and has accommodations for three hundred patients, is managed and controlled by thirty-four Sisters of Mercy, and has the medical attendance of two resident physicians and the faculty of the Chicago Medical College. It is worthy of remark and praise that Dr. Nathan Smith Davis, who first lectured for the benefit of the Illinois General Hospital of the Lake—control of which the sisterhood assumed—has remained in attendance upon the Mercy Hospital ever since, a period of thirty-one years.

MERCY HOSPITAL.

JEWISH HOSPITAL.—In 1859, the United Hebrew Relief Association was organized in this city, having for its object the amelioration of suffering and care of the sick. The first president of the Association was Henry Greenebaum. In 1867, the association determined upon establishing a hospital, where the objects of their philanthropy could be brought together and their wants attended to with system and better effect. Consequently, on September 2, 1867, the corner-stone was laid at No. 537 North LaSalle Street, between Schiller and Goethe streets, under the auspices of the association. The stone was laid by Isaac Greensfelder, president of the association, and addresses were delivered by Mayor John B. Rice, Godfrey Snyderacker (in German) and Henry Greenebaum. The hospital was completed in 1868, was of red brick, two-and-a-half stories high, eighty feet front by forty feet deep, and cost about $30,000, the lot being valued at $10,000. It was called the "Jews' Hospital," and was destroyed in the fire of 1871, at about 11 o'clock a. m., on Monday, the loss aggregating about $40,000.

ALEXIAN BROTHERS' HOSPITAL.—The Order of Alexian Brothers was founded by Saint Alexius of Rome, in honor of San Juan de Dios de Hispaña Saint John of God of Spain, who lived in the 13th century. The introduction of the order in Chicago was through Brother Bonaventura in 1866, who came here to found and establish a hospital. For some little time Brother Bonaventura worked alone, boarding with Mr. Wischmeyer, and then found Brother Alex, who was working in the city. Together these brothers worked, and in about six months they established St. Mary's Hospital—named in honor of St. Mary of the Immaculate Conception—at No. 527 North Dearborn Street, corner of Schiller. Of this hospital, Brother Bonaventura was superior, and he had five brothers and three novices as assistants, the hospital accommodating eight patients. The fraternity exact payment from those who are able to pay, but receive the poor gratis, making no distinction on account of the religious belief, or irreligious unbelief, of a prospective patient.

A novice is required to serve for six months, wearing his ordinary apparel; then he is invested with the garb of the Alexians, and has a further probation of two years. If then found qualified, he is admitted to this order, whose members devote themselves to caring for the sick and taking charge of Asylums. In Germany, where the order comprises many members, only one hospital is controlled by them, but numerous insane asylums are under their painstaking and gentle care. One peculiarity about the order is, that the institutions under its care will allow none but males within their walls, from monastic dogmatism partaking of misogyny. But to those who obtain access to their hospitals and asylums, the Alexian Brothers prove kind, gentle and scrupulously careful nurses; and many poor, afflicted men have reason to bless this benevolent and philanthropic organization. Their ambition is for comprehensive charity, and they are desirous of getting charge of a branch of the city hospital, where their scope of sick-bed attendance will be more general.

In 1868, the hospital was moved to No. 546 North Franklin Street, the same site where their hospital is now located. The house faced, in those days, upon Franklin, in lieu of Market Street. At this time, Henry Engela was president, Matthew Pollig was vice-president, and Nicholas Schyns was secretary. Henry Engela was the first Provincial who came to Chicago—a provincial being the chief executive of a province, which is composed of several localities. About the year 1869, the name was changed to the Alexian Brothers' Hospital, and the hospital was enlarged and added to, till, at the time of the fire, it had accommodations for about seventy-five patients and was attended by twelve brothers. But the fire did not respect this noble charity, and the Alexian Brothers' Hospital was destroyed thereby, the fire reaching the building at 4 o'clock p. m., on Monday. The value of the hospital was about $48,000, and the furniture therein cost $5,200, making the aggregate loss $53,000, not including two magnificent statues that stood in their chapel, which were conceded to be the finest specimens of the sculptor's art in Chicago.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.—In the spring of 1864, Mrs. Sarah Franklin, Mrs. Henry W. Hinsdale, Mrs. Aaron Haven, Mrs. B. F. Hadduck, Mrs. A. LeDuc, Mrs. W. J. Barney, Mrs. Levi Colburn and Mrs. Clinton Locke, under the leadership of Rev. Clinton Locke, determined upon establishing a free hospital; the initiatory prospectus of which stated that it would forever be under the control of the Episcopal Church, but would minister unto the poor and afflicted of all creeds and nations. A charter was soon after obtained from the Legislature. Rev. Clinton Locke was then chosen president, and Dr. Walter Hay physician. On January 20, 1865, the act of incorporation was approved, and the following gentlemen were the incorporated trustees: James H. Hoes, D. W. Page, L. B. Otis, W. G. Hibbard, J. F. Beaty, Thomas C. Haines, George P. Lee, Samuel Gehr, A. C. Calkins, R. D. VanWagener, Walter Hay, and the Rector of Grace Episcopal Church, of Chicago. At the first meeting of the trustees, Dr. Clinton Locke was retained as president, which office he has held ever since. Since its inception, this hospital has gradually grown in its scope of charitable treatment, in consequence of the endowments it has received and the stable financial benefit it has acquired. A given sum of money provides a bed in the institution for some poor stricken wayfarer, and several such provisions have been made by the wealthy and charitable members of the Episcopal Church. Mrs. N. K. Fairbank is the treasurer of this praiseworthy institution. As St. Luke's is a charity hospital, funds are always needed for the support of its inmates.

ALBERT BLISS STRONG, M.D., member of the Illinois State and local medical societies, and medical director for the Chicago Mutual Life Indemnity Association, was born in Galesburg, Ill., May 22, 1845. His father, Rev. Erastus A. Strong, of the Theological Seminary of the Diocese of Ohio, and chaplain of the 3d O. V. I. during the War of 1862-65, left his home, near Lake Champlain, N. Y., in 1839, and made the entire journey to Galesburg on foot. He was one of the most energetic and enterprising of the hardy pioneers who settled Northern Illinois, and was most highly esteemed for his sterling integrity and worth. The first plows made in Galesburg were forged by his hammer, and his was the first house erected in that city. Overcoming every obstacle which had prevented him from obtaining an education, he perseveringly worked with such end in view, and succeeded in obtaining a collegiate training. His wife, Elizabeth S., the daughter of Levi Stillman, a prominent citizen and chair manufacturer, of Hartford, Conn., was from one of the oldest and most respected families of the Nutmeg State. While an infant of two years, Dr. Strong's parents moved to Gambier, Ohio, where he remained until four years old, and, during the while his father was rector of the Episcopal Church at Granville Ohio, attended the schools of Licking County, Ohio. He then entered the preparatory department of Kenyon College, and continued in that institution until 1862. When seventeen years of age, he enlisted in the 85th Ohio Volunteer Infantry for three months service. His command was stationed at Camp Douglas as guard over Confederate prisoners. At the expiration of his term of enlistment, he re-enlisted in the 4th Ohio Cavalry, but was rejected by the commanding officer on account of his extreme youth. He resumed his studies at Kenyon College in 1864, and graduated therefrom in 1868. He immediately came to Chicago, and for one year was principal of the Blue Island Avenue School. At the same time he began the study of medicine under Dr. I. N. Danforth, afterward under the directions of Dr. J. P. Ross, both of Chicago, with whom he remained three years, during which time he matriculated in Rush Medical College, and took his degree as Doctor of Medicine with the class of 1872. Before his graduation he was appointed resident physician to St. Luke's Hospital, and attended lectures in Rush Medical College, which were given in an amphitheatre of the County Hospital, at the corner of Eighteenth and Arnold streets. He applied for the position of interne, and, upon competitive examination, was appointed to that position in the Cook County Hospital, and, after the fire of 1871, was one of the Relief Committee. Immediately after his graduation, on competitive examination, he received the appointment of lecturer on materia medica, in the spring course of Rush College, which chair he filled for two years. He was then elected to the chair of demonstrator of anatomy, which he now occupies. Dr. Strong was married June 24, 1869, to Miss Ida F. Cook, daughter of ex-Alderman Cook, of Chicago, and has three children—Ralph S., Walter A. and Edward. He is a prominent member of the Illinois Club.

CHICAGO MEDICAL SOCIETY.—The continuation of the history of this Society, given in the first volume, may be thus summarized. The officers for the period from 1858 to 1871 were as follows, so far as they could be ascertained:

1858—N. S. Davis, president; H. Parker, vice-president; Thomas Bevan, secretary and treasurer. 1859—D. D. Waite, president; Swayne Wickersham, vice-president; N. S. Davis, secretary and treasurer; N. S. Davis, Swayne Wickersham, Charles D. B. O'Ryan, delegates to the American Medical Association; John M. Woodworth, George K. Amerman, Edward L. Holmes, Henry C. Clapp, delegates to the State Medical Society. 1861—Ira Hatch, president; Swayne Wickersham, vice-president; Charles Gilman Smith, secretary. 1862—Gerhard Christian Paoli, president; Swayne Wickersham, vice-president; Edward L. Holmes, secretary and treasurer. 1863—M. O. Heydock, president; T. Bevan, vice-president; E. Marguerat, secretary and treasurer. 1864—Gerhard C. Paoli, president; M. O. Heydock, vice-president; Edward L. Holmes, secretary and treasurer. 1865—F. Bevan, president; E. Marguerat, vice-president; D. Mills Tucker, secretary. 1866—A. Groesbeck, president; J. P. Ross, vice-president; T. Davis Fitch, secretary; D. Mills Tucker, treasurer. 1867—J. P. Ross, president; John Reed, vice-president; Henry M. Lyman, secretary and treasurer. 1868—E. Marguerat, president; R. G. Bogue, vice-president; P. S. MacDonald, secretary. 1869—R. G. Bogue, president; Ernst Schmidt, vice-president; Hiram Wanzer, secretary and treasurer. 1870—T. D. Fitch, president; F. A. Emmons, vice-president; C. C. Dumreicher, secretary and treasurer. 1871—William Godfrey Dyas, president; W. E. Quine, secretary.

Many interesting facts and data concerning the Society are forever lost, because of the destruction of the records in the fire of 1871; they being unfortunately, at that time, in the possession of a committee and not in the custody of the secretary, Dr. W. E. Quine.

THE CHICAGO ACADEMY OF MEDICAL SCIENCES was organized March 1, 1859, with the following officers: DeLaskie Miller, president; J. N. Graham, first vice-president; J. R. Gore, second vice-president; E. C. Rogers, third vice-president; S. C. Blake, recording secretary; Edward L. Holmes, corresponding secretary; R. C. Hamill, treasurer; William Scott Dennison, assistant secretary and librarian; and James Bloodgood, Joseph P. Ross and Ephraim Ingals, trustees.

THE CHICAGO COLLEGE OF PHARMACY was organized and incorporated on the 5th of September, 1859, to advance the art of pharmacy and collateral sciences, to establish on just principles the relations existing between apothecaries, druggists, physicians and the public, and to improve the members, their assistants and apprentices, by the cultivation and diffusion of scientific knowledge. The first course of lectures commenced November 9, 1859, at room No. 18 Rice's Building, Nos. 75 to 81 Dearborn Street. The officers were Franklin Scammon, M.D., president; Frederick A. Bryan and Henry W. Fuller, vice-presidents; J. D. Paine, secretary; S. S. Bliss, treasurer; Franklin Scammon, T. W. P. Mercereau, S. S. Bliss, E. L. O'Hara, W. H. Muller, F. A. Bryan, J. D. Paine, E. H. Sargent, George Buck and L. F. Humeston, trustees. The faculty were James Van Zandt Blaney, M.D., professor of chemistry; F. Scammon, M.D., professor of pharmacy, and John H. Rauch, M.D., professor of materia medica. The college was subsequently removed to Lind's Block, attic story,* after which the lectures on chemistry were delivered in the hall of Rush Medical College, the faculty thereof generously allowing it to be used free of charge. Before the inauguration of the second course of lectures, F. Mahla, Ph. D., was given the chair of chemistry and Dr. J. A. Allen the chair of materia medica. The prostration of business interests in 1861 produced a depression in the affairs of the College, which was, however, counteracted by the zeal and energy of W. H. Dillingham. For several years interest in the college flagged, until the arrival of an extensive assortment of chemicals from Messrs. Powers & Weightman—a donation from those gentlemen—in the spring of 1867, excited comment and inquiry. A meeting held at the office of Dr. William H. Byford resulted in the formation of committees that resuscitated the school, and re-established it at Rice's Building, No. 77 Dearborn Street. In September, 1868, the first number of the Pharmacist was issued, as a quarterly journal, the object being to furnish a fund to renew the course of pharmaceutical lectures. But not until in 1870 was the College of Pharmacy re-opened. On the evening of September 30 of that year, Dr. John H. Rauch gave the first lecture. The faculty were J. V. Z. Blaney, professor of chemistry; George M. Hambright, professor of materia medica; N. Gray Bartlett, professor of pharmacy; and John H. Rauch, professor of botany. From the third class of thirty-one students one graduated, F. M. Goodman, he being also the third graduate from the college; the first two were Henry Tomboeken and Thomas Whitfield. The faculty for 1871-72 were N. Gray Bartlett, professor of chemistry; Albert E. Ebert, professor of pharmacy; George M. Hambright, professor of materia medica; and John H. Rauch, professor of botany. The fourth annual course of lectures was opened on October 3, 1871, by the president of the college, E. H. Sargent, to a large and enthusiastic class. Before a week had passed, the building and apparatus were things of the past. The loss of apparatus and material amounted to about $1,000.

* For valuable data presented in this sketch, the collaborator is indebted to N. Gray Bartlett.

E. H. SARGENT was born at Dover, New Hampshire, on November 13, 1830, and is the son of John Bowen and Mercy Sargent. He received his education at the Dover Academy, after which he learned the drug business at Lowell, Mass. In 1852, he came to this city and went into business with Dr. Franklin Seamon, their store being situated at No. 140 Lake Street. Since the dissolution of the partnership, Mr. Sargent has continued the business alone, until the present time, and is now, though still a young man, one of the oldest and most prominent druggists in the city of Chicago. Mr. Sargent was president of the Chicago College of Pharmacy from 1865 to 1872, and of the American Pharmaceutical Association in 1869-70. On June 4, 1856, he married, at Jeffersonville, Ind., Miss Mary Westcott Elmer. In 1854, Mr. Sargent became a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M., and now, with Hon. John Wentworth and other veteran residents of Chicago, ranks among the oldest members of the lodge.

WILLIAM M. DALE was born in Kilmarnock, County of Ayr, Scotland, February 10, 1842, and was educated at the academy of his native town. After receiving his English education, he was apprenticed in a drug store at that place. He served there four years and then went to Glasgow, where he also remained four years in a drug store, and from thence to Kinross, where he established a little store of his own, and remained until he left the "land o' cakes" for Chicago, arriving here in 1865. Mr. Dale first went into Buck & Rayner's establishment, where he was employed for two years, and then, in partnership with John Heiland, he established the house of Dale & Heiland, at No. 155 Clark Street. After the fire, the firm moved to the West Side for one year, and there Mr. Dale re-opened at the old stand, where he continued until 1870, when he established the drug store, corner of Clark and Madison streets, which, under his management, has become one of the most popular pharmacies in the city. Mr. Dale was married, June 1, 1860, to Mary Walker, of Glasgow, and has five children—William Wallace, Christina, Alice, Jessie and Maggie.

THEODORE HENRY PATTERSON was born November 24, 1840, in Lorain County, Ohio. He attended for several years the schools of his native town, and finally graduated from the high school at Elyria. After this he taught school for four winters, and began studying medicine under his uncle, Dr. R. J. Patterson, having made up his mind to enter the medical profession. He afterward took a course of lectures at Rush Medical College, in this city, and attended two terms at a medical school in Cleveland. In 1864, he graduated from the Charity Hospital Medical College of that city, and received the degree of M.D. When the War broke out, Dr. Patterson, loyal to the great cause, offered his services to the Government and he was appointed assistant-surgeon of the 187th Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He proved to be most successful and competent, and was promoted, on June 26, 1865, to be surgeon of his regiment and acting surgeon-in-chief of the Second Military Division of Georgia. After the War was over, he decided to make Chicago his future home. He arrived here in March, 1866, and was appointed temporary physician of the Cook County Poor House. In September of the same year, he concluded to give up practicing his profession and turn his attention to pharmacy. He opened a drug store at the corner of Michigan Avenue and Twenty-second Street, where he remained thirteen years, and in 1879 he removed to his present place of business. He has been prominently identified with the Chicago College of Pharmacy since its inception, having been trustee, treasurer, secretary and president of the same, at different times. In April, 1883, he was unanimously elected president of that institution, and was tendered that office in 1884, which, however, he declined. Dr. Patterson has also been largely identified with the State Pharmaceutical Association; in fact, he is a man of energy and purpose, and is always ready, willing and active to promote the interests of any institution that will tend to benefit the medical profession, and to this perhaps is due the high regard and esteem with which he is held by those who are most interested in such work. Dr. Patterson is at present secretary of the Pharmaceutical Association, which office he has held and filled with credit since 1882. He is also a member of the American Pharmaceutical Association, and of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, the Grand Army of the Republic, and of the Douglas Club. He was married, February 24, 1870, to Miss Laura Waggner, of Chicago; they have three children—Charles W., Theodore Hiram, and Olive.

BRAINARD FREE DISPENSARY was established in 1869, at rooms 11 and 12, in Rice & Jackson's block, on the northwest corner of Jefferson and Randolph streets. Of this charitable enterprise, Samuel Hoard was president, Albro E. Bishop was vice-president, and S. W. Walker secretary and treasurer.

PROTESTANT DEACONESSES' HOSPITAL was established in 1868, at No. 141 North Dearborn Street, with Rev. W. A. Passavant, director; Dr. George Schloetzer, physician; and Miss C. Super, matron. The hospital remained at this location until the fire.

MEDICAL RELIEF.

The first step taken by the physicians and surgeons of the city to assist their unfortunate brethren, was at a meeting held Tuesday evening, October 11, 1871, where various measures were discussed. The meeting adjourned, and re-convened on the 17th, when the following telegram was received—the first organized attempt on the part of the medical fraternity in a foreign city:

"NEW YORK, October 16, 1871.

"DR. H. A. JOHNSON,

"Chairman Sanitary Committee:

"Over two thousand dollars subscribed by medical men this evening for suffering physicians of Chicago. Organize for its distribution, and draw on Dr. S. T. Hubbard, 27 West Twenty-ninth Street. Further amounts to be reported.

"E. R. PEASLEE, M. D., Chairman."

The $2,000 mentioned was sent October 24, 1871, by Dr. S. T. Hubbard, to Dr. Walter Hay. Upon October 19, a meeting was held, whereat the following pamphlet was promulgated:

"At a meeting of physicians, held on the 17th inst., at No. 707 Wabash Avenue, of which Dr. N. S. Davis was made chairman, and Dr. E. Andrews secretary, the announcement having been made that communications had been received from prominent physicians of other cities, to the effect that contributions for the relief of the suffering members of the profession here are now awaiting the order of responsible parties to receive and disburse them, Drs. Moses Gunn, E. Andrews, and A. Fisher having been appointed a committee to recommend suitable persons for a permanent relief committee of five, nominated the following gentlemen: Drs. N. S. Davis, DeLaskie Miller, Ernst Schmidt, T. D.

Fitch, and Walter Hay, which nominations being unanimously approved, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the committee just chosen is hereby authorized to receive all donations for the relief of the respectable physicians who are sufferers by the late fire, distribute the same at their discretion, and render a strict account, with vouchers, to any future meeting which may be called by the chairman to consider the same.

Resolved, That this meeting tender the cordial and heartfelt thanks of the profession of this city to their brethren in other and distant cities, for the prompt and liberal offers of assistance to the many among us who have lost, by the late fire, not only their homes, clothes, books and instruments, but their practice; and pledge a just use of whatever is given.

Contributions may be forwarded at once by express, or draft on New York, to Walter Hay, M.D., secretary medical relief committee, No. 384 Michigan Avenue. Donations from publishing houses, instrument makers and physicians, of books, instruments, or apparatus, will be gratefully received, as many of our professional brethren have saved only their lives.

"DELAKEIE MILLER, M.D., No. 513 Wabash Avenue, chairman.

"N. S. DAVIS, M.D., No. 797 Wabash Avenue, treasurer.

"ERNST SCHMIDT, M.D., No. 357 State Street.

"T. D. FITCH, M.D., No. 296 West Monroe Street.

"WALTER HAY, M.D., No. 384 Michigan Avenue, secretary."

In response to this appeal $10,781.08 were received by Dr. Walter Hay, secretary, and $10,781.00 were disbursed by Dr. Nathan Smith Davis, treasurer, the balance of eight cents being still intact. As a part of this aggregate were eighteen checks for $50 each, disbursed by a committee of physicians from St. Louis, who were advised relative to its distribution by the Chicago Medical Relief Society. By the courtesy of Dr. Walter Hay, the following tabulated statement of receipts is, for the first time, given to the public; the table of expenditures can not, for obvious reasons, be published. In connection with the liberal contributions made by the New York physicians, it is an acknowledged fact, that, to the exertions of Frank H. Hamilton, M.D., of New York, the medical profession of Chicago is mainly indebted for the relief received from the former city. A schedule of the money received is as follows:

1871.
Oct. 21.	Physicians of St. Louis, per Drs. William S. Edgar and J. Hermann	$ 900 00
Oct. 24.	Academy of Medicine, Cincinnati, per C. C. Comegys, president	392 00
Oct. 24.	Francis Minot, Boston, Mass.	10 00
Oct. 24.	Dr. Mergler, Wheeling, Cook Co., Ills.	20 00
Oct. 24.	Dr. H. Kiefe, Detroit, Mich.	25 00
Oct. 27.	Dr. S. T. Hubbard, treasurer N. Y. Executive Committee	2,000 00
Oct. 23.	Dr. C. E. Buckingham, Boston	25 00
Oct. 23.	Academy of Medicine, Cincinnati, per C. E. Comegys, M.D., president	65 00
Oct. 23.	Dr. Franklin Bonney, Hadley, Mass.	14 00
Nov. 1.	Kings County Medical Society, Brooklyn, L. I., per Dr. J. H. H. Burge and Dr. Gunn	1,000 00
Nov. 1.	New York Executive Committee, per Dr. S. T. Hubbard, treasurer	2,000 00
Nov. 6.	German Physicians of Baltimore, per Dr. A. Friedenwald, president, and Dr. Ernst Schmidt	132 00
Nov. 6.	Dr. A. Friedenwald, Baltimore	5 00
Nov. 6.	Kings County Medical Society, Brooklyn, L. I., per Dr. J. H. H. Burge and Dr. Moses Gunn	100 00
Nov. 19.	New York Executive Committee, per Dr. S. T. Hubbard, treasurer	1,000 00
Dec. 2.	St. Louis physicians, per Dr. W. S. Edgar, treasurer	100 00
Dec. 5.	Dr. J. C. Reeve, Dayton, Ohio	10 00
Dec. 6.	New York Executive Committee, per Dr. S. T. Hubbard, treasurer	500 00
Dec. 8.	Kings County Medical Society, per Dr. J. H. H. Burge and Dr. Moses Gunn	238 00
Dec. 11.	Dr. John McCurdy, Youngstown, O.	10 00

Dec. 14.	Physicians of Lowell, Mass., per Dr. Burnham, of Lowell, and Dr. David Dodge, of Chicago	$ 105 00
Dec. 14.	Medical Society of San Francisco, Cal., and other physicians, per Drs. Dean, president, and Gibbons, secretary (gold draft)	253 08
Dec. 22.	Rensselaer County Medical Society, Lansingburgh, N. Y., per Dr. George H. Hubbard, president	75 00
Dec. 23.	Dr. J. C. Reeve, Dayton, O. (2d)	5 00
Dec. 23.	Medical Society of the District of Columbia	200 00 1872.
Jan. 3.	New York Executive Committee, per Dr. S. T. Hubbard, treasurer	150 00
Jan. 15.	Dr. Francis Minot, Boston, per Dr. N. S. Davis	25 00
Jan. 17.	Dr. J. Ludlow, treasurer of Philadelphia Executive Committee	1,115 00
Jan. 18.	Boyle Co., Ky., Medical Society, per Drs. J. D. Jackson and N. S. Davis	35 00
Jan. 30.	Dr. J. R. Gibson, U. S. Army, Yorkville, S. C.	5 00
Feb. 2.	Dr. J. G. Richardson, Philadelphia	20 00
Feb. 9.	Francis H. Brown, M.D., 97 Wal- tham Street, Boston, Mass.	97 00
Feb. 10.	S. T. Hubbard, treasurer New York Executive Committee	150 00
Total		$10,781 08

At the date when the final account of Dr. Walter Hay, secretary, and Dr. Nathan S. Davis, treasurer, were submitted, a vote of thanks was given those officers and the committee; and the Medical Relief Committee, which had performed so much good in so unostentatious a manner, ceased to be.

HOMEOPATHY.

The history of this branch of the medical profession has the same general statement applicable thereto, as pertains to the Allopathic school. The homeopaths, by their successful surgical and medical practice, commanded the respect of the older school and recognition from the public.

There were no cases of organized opposition to the homeopathic practitioners, nor many cases of individual antagonism, until the breaking out of the War, when the board of allopathic practitioners found themselves in a quandary, by the application of Gaylord D. Beebe for a position in the army. By this application, the board were forced into hostility, for how were they to examine a homeopath? As to his surgical qualifications, the matter was sufficiently easy of solution; but there was a probability that the patients, whom the prospective surgeon would be called upon to administer unto, would require other than surgical treatment, and how could they endorse the treatment by the homeopathic pharmaceutical theses? Hence, the board were compelled to oppose Dr. Beebe and refuse to examine him.*

This case naturally incensed the adherents of the new school, and created animadversion on the procedure of the board of examiners.

But the fruition of their effort and merit has dissolved the old lines of demarkation, and homeopathic and allopathic physicians have been found in unity, the talents of each school engendering a mutual respect and esteem, and the emulation, a praiseworthy effort, to see who could the most effectually relieve distress and suffering, both bodily and mental.

* Dr. Beebe's success in procuring an examination at Washington, and passing the same, will be found narrated in his biography, on page 469, vol. 1.

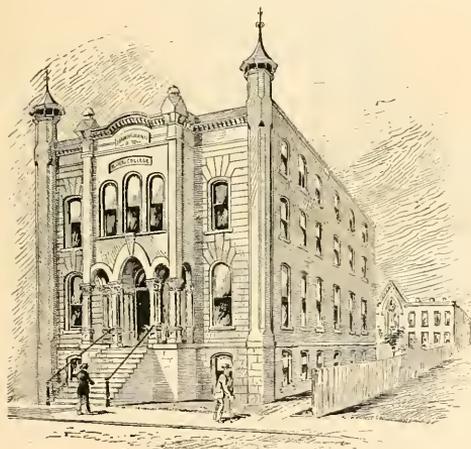

Yours truly
D. J. Smith M. D.

The history of the college which was the center of the homeopathic system is, briefly, as follows:

HAHNEMANN MEDICAL COLLEGE.—In the summer of 1859, the homeopathic physicians of this city were convened to organize the college and nominate the faculty and officers. The following gentlemen were nominated, and subsequently confirmed by the board of trustees: David Sheppard Smith, president of the faculty and, ex officio, president of the board of trustees; George E. Shipman, secretary and treasurer; A. E. Small, professor of the theory and practice of medicine; George E. Shipman, professor of materia medica and therapeutics; H. K. W. Boardman, professor of surgery; J. L. Kellogg, professor of obstetrics; Reuben Ludlam, professor of physiology and pathology; Nicho. F. Cooke, professor of chemistry and toxicology; Gaylord D. Beebe, professor of anatomy; and George Payson, lecturer on medical jurisprudence. Mr. Payson was not a doctor of medicine, as were the professors. The faculty then met, and selected A. E. Small dean, and Reuben Ludlam registrar. At this meeting it was decided to inaugurate a fall and winter curriculum of lectures, continuing for twenty weeks, at No. 168 South Clark Street, the rooms being situated in the marble block adjoining Witkowsky Hall, near Monroe Street. The course commenced October 15, 1860, with twenty-five students, eleven of whom, who had previously attended lectures at other institutes, were graduated at the public commencement, held on February 14, 1861. These graduates were N. C. Burnham, R. J. Curtis, F. F. Dederkey, C. S. Dunscombe, George E. Husband, E. M. P. Ludlam, John Moore, W. K. Palmer, A. W. Phillips, F. L. Vincent and C. A. Williams.

HAHNEMANN MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The faculty of Hahnemann Medical College have been as follows,* during the years from 1861 to 1871:

Professors of principles and practice of medicine: A. E. Small, 1861-63; theory and practice of medicine; A. E. Small, emeritus, 1864-69; C. C. Smith, 1870; N. F. Prentice 1871.

Professor of materia medica and therapeutics: George E. Shipman, 1861-63; George E. Shipman, emeritus, 1864-70; David * D. S. Smith was president of the college from 1861 to 1866, and A. E. Small for the years 1870-71. George E. Shipman was secretary from 1861 to 1863, and Henry M. Smith from 1864 to 1871. A. E. Small was dean of the faculty from 1861 to 1869, and R. Ludlam in 1870-71.

Sheppard Smith, 1864-65; E. M. Hale, 1866; materia medica, therapeutics and medical botany, E. M. Hale, 1867; materia medica and therapeutics, Temple S. Hoynes, 1870-71; C. J. Hempel,* emeritus, 1871.

Professor of medical jurisprudence: A. E. Small, 1864-65; medical jurisprudence and insanity, C. Woodhouse, 1866-69.

Professor of chemistry and toxicology: Nicho. F. Cooke, 1861-63; Rodnev Welch, 1864-71.

Professor of physiology, pathology and clinical medicine: R. Ludlam, 1861-63; C. F. Reed, 1864; H. P. Gatchell, 1865-67; H. P. Gatchell, emeritus, 1868-69; J. S. Mitchell, 1868-71.

Professor of obstetrics and the diseases of women and children: J. L. Kellogg, 1861-63; R. Ludlam, 1864-71.

Professor of surgery and surgical anatomy, Henry Kirk White Boardman, 1861-63; Gaylord D. Beebe, 1864-65; surgery, G. D. Beebe, 1866-69 principles and practice of surgery, Willis Danforth, 1870-71.

Professor of anatomy: Gaylord D. Beebe, 1861; general and descriptive anatomy, W. Handford White, 1862-63; D. Alphonso Colton, 1864-67; H. C. Allen, 1868-69; S. P. Hedges, 1870-71.

Professor of surgical and pathological anatomy: J. S. Mitchell, 1866-67; D. Alphonso Colton, 1868; practical and pathological anatomy, D. A. Colton, 1869-70, emeritus, 1871.

Demonstrator of anatomy: D. A. Colton, 1862-63; C. A. Wilbur, 1864-65; H. S. Sloan, 1866; E. A. Ballard, 1870.

Assistant to chair of anatomy: J. W. Streeter, 1870.

Professor of chemistry and medical jurisprudence: F. A. Lord, 1862-63; physiological and medical chemistry, F. A. Lord,† 1864-71.

Professor of medical botany and pharmacology: E. M. Hale, 1870-71.

Professor of clinical medicine: Leonard Pratt, 1870.

Professor of special pathology and diagnosis: Leonard Pratt, 1871.

Lecturer on psychological medicine, R. N. Foster, 1870.

Lecturer on the diseases of children, R. N. Foster, 1871.

Lecturer on the diseases of the eye and ear, W. H. Woodyard, 1871.

The following table gives the number of students and graduates from the institution of the working college until 1871:

TERM.	NO. STUDENTS.	NO. GRADUATES.
1860-61	20	11
1861-62	29	11
1862-63	31	11
1863-64	20	5
1864-65	42	13
1865-66	59	26
1866-67	60	26
1867-68	67	24
1868-69	53	24
1869-70	50	19
1870-71	90	38
1871-72	92	32

The quarters of the college remained on Clark Street until 1868, when they were removed to No. 619 (now 1237) State Street, and over an edifice used as a vinegar-factory. Here the faculty and the students remained until October 3, 1870, when their elegant building on Cottage Grove Avenue was completed, at a cost of $18,000, and the first lecture given on that date. A hospital was also erected on Groveland Park Avenue, and therein students had the advantage of clinical instruction. Hon. J. Y. Scammon donated the ground upon which this hospital was built. One additional fact in connection with this college places it in the front rank of the progressive institutions of the country, it having thrown open its doors to female students in 1869, two of whom, Mrs. R. H. Harris and Mrs. M. B. Camm, graduated at the session of 1870-71. These were the first ladies graduated in Chicago, and Hahnemann College was the first medical institution that conferred diplomas upon the opposite sex.

* Dr. Hempel was a translator of note. Among his translations are Schiller's works and twenty volumes of medical works.

† Dr. F. A. Lord died in the fall of 1872. The U. S. Medical and Surgical Journal, commenting thereupon, stated that "his lectures upon physiological chemistry, delivered in this college, were probably in advance of anything of the kind that has been attempted in this country."

ALVAN EDMUND SMALL, A.M., M.D., president of Hahnemann Medical College and Hospital of Chicago, is one of the oldest resident physicians of this city. He was born in Wales, Lincoln Co., Maine, March 4, 1811, and attended the public schools until he was sixteen years of age. By that time he had so distinguished himself for scholarship, that he was chosen as principal of one of the district grammar schools. After teaching for a time, he commenced an academic course at Monmouth, in his native State, and, completing a four-years course, he was installed as principal of one of the city schools in Bath, Maine, which position he filled with great acceptance for two years. While engaged in his work as teacher, he continued to be himself a diligent student of English and classical literature, as a private pupil of Hon. Benjamin Randall, then representative in Congress. Having determined to study medicine, the young teacher placed himself under the tuition of Dr. H. B. C. Green, of Saco, Maine, a man eminent for his ability and success as a physician. With Dr. Green he studied for two years, and then completed his medical education in Philadelphia, at the old Pennsylvania School, the Mecca of medicine in this country. His first location for practice was in Delaware County, Penn., where he remained until 1845, when, after embracing homeopathy, he removed to Philadelphia, and engaged in a general practice. During the years of his practice in that city, he gained an enviable reputation as an unusually skillful and successful physician, and in 1849 was appointed the first professor of physiology and pathology in the Homeopathic Medical College of Pennsylvania, which institution had the honor of being the first regularly chartered homeopathic school in the world. In 1853, he was transferred to the chair of institutes and practice in the same institution. When Dr. Small severed his connection with this college, in order to remove to Chicago, the trustees and faculty, in a very earnest and eulogistic series of resolutions, expressed their sense of the loss sustained by them. Dr. Small removed to Chicago in 1856, and entered upon a general practice. Here his reputation followed him, and his success as a physician soon made him one of the marked medical men of Chicago. When the Hahnemann Medical College of Chicago was organized, in 1859, Dr. Small was elected to the chair of theory and practice, and also became dean of the faculty. In 1865, he was honored by being made emeritus professor of the same chair. For thirty-five years of his professional life, Dr. Small has served in the capacity of a medical teacher. In that time he has delivered over two thousand lectures, and hundreds of physicians throughout the country remember his instructive and earnest addresses with pleasure and appreciation. Besides his regular professional duties, Dr. Small has been for many years engaged in editorial work, having been a voluminous author and writer of medical review articles, and a journalist. His published works include the "Manual of the Homeopathic Practice," which has passed through fifteen editions, and been translated into the German language; a volume on "Diseases of the Nervous System"; and monographs on various subjects, that have given him a world-wide reputation. For thirty-two years he has been an active and most valued member of various medical societies. He has held the office of president of the Illinois State Homeopathic Medical Association, and also of the American Institute of Homeopathy; he is a life-member of the Chicago Academy of Sciences and of the Chicago Historical Society. In his intercourse with his professional brethren, his uniform courtesy, kindness and genuine good-will toward all, have marked him as a man to be loved for his admirable qualities of mind and heart, as well as respected and admired for his ability and talents. At the age of nearly seventy-four, he possesses the baleness, vigor and geniality of youthful prime, and is a striking example of self-culture of mind and care of the physical system.

REUBEN LUDLAM was born at Camden, N. J., on October 7, 1831, and was the son of Jacob W. Ludlam, a distinguished physician of that place, who removed to Illinois, and died at Evanston in 1858. During his adolescence, Reuben Ludlam manifested a talent and taste for medical science, and commenced a systematic course of study under the tutelage of his father, and accompanied him on his visits to his patients. Six years were devoted by him to the special preparation for his medical work, and his proficiency was demonstrated by the degree of Doctor of Medicine being conferred upon him by the University of Pennsylvania, in March, 1852. Shortly after this, he removed to Chicago, and became a convert to the doctrines of Hahnemann. Upon the organization of the first faculty of the Hahnemann Medical College, in 1859, he accepted the professorship of physiology, pathology and clinical medicine, and after four years he was transferred to the chair of obstetrics and diseases of women and children, a position that he is naturally, and by education peculiarly qualified to fill, as he has given special attention to the diseases that are included in that department. He has devoted a great deal of time to the study of uterine surgery, both in this country and in Europe, and, having combined years of practice with years of arduous study, Dr. Ludlam is the acknowledged leading gynecologist of the homeopathic school in the United States, and, as such, he is a prominent pillar of the success of Hahnemann Medical College, of whose faculty he is dean. He is an accomplished French scholar, and thus is enabled to pursue his scientific investigations in both the English and French works and periodicals. As a medical writer, Dr. Ludlam is clear, graceful and logical; his writings manifest the careful research and laborious investigation that are the key-notes of his success, and for this reason they are regarded as authoritative upon the topics of which they treat. For six years, he was editorially connected with the North American Journal of Homeopathy, published in New York, and for nine years with the United States

R. Ludlam

Medical and Surgical Journal, published in Chicago. In March, 1863, a Chicago house published "A Course of Clinical Lectures on Diphtheria," of which Dr. Ludlam was the author, and which was the first medical work ever issued in the Northwest. In 1871, however, another volume, entitled "Clinical and Didactic Lectures on the Diseases of Women," made its debut, from his pen and became at once a recognized text book in all homeopathic medical colleges. It has run through five large editions, and has been translated into French, and published in Paris by Delahaye. In 1879, Dr. Ludlam, in addition to his other multifarious duties, translated a work on Clinical Medicine from the French of Jousset, adding many original and valuable notes. The literary and medical successes of Dr. Ludlam naturally attracted the attention of other States to him, and, in 1868, the Home Infirmary for the Diseases of Women, in New York, tendered him the position of physician thereto; and, in 1870, he was elected professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in the New York Homeopathic College; but, being satisfied with Chicago, Dr. Ludlam declined these proffered honors. Among many positions whereby the estimation of his associates has been manifested may be mentioned the presidency of the American Institute of Homeopathy, of the Chicago Academy of Medicine, of the Western Institute of Homeopathy, of the Illinois Homeopathic Medical Society and of the Clinical Society of Chicago. Dr. Ludlam was also a member of the Medical Department of the Relief and Aid Society, which performed such a gigantic eleemosynary work after the great fire. In this department he was the sole homeopathic physician, and is now the representative of his school of medicine on the State Board of Health. Dr. Ludlam is also the editor of the Clinique, a magazine that is the recognized expositor of homeopathic medical science in this city. Dr. Ludlam has been twice married; his first wife, Anna M. Porter, of Greenwood, N. J., dying three years after marriage. By his second wife, Harriet G. Farvin, of New York, he has a son, who bears the same name as his father.

NICHOLAS FRANCIS COOKE was born, on August 25, 1829, at Providence, R. I., the great-grandson of Hon. Nicholas Cooke, the first Continental Governor of Rhode Island. Early in life he decided upon entering the medical profession, and so prosecuted his studies for several years as private pupil of Rev. Thomas Sheppard, D.D., of Bristol, R. I., and with a special course of instruction imparted by Professor Henry S. Frieze, now professor of the Latin language and literature in the University of Michigan, also receiving special instruction in medical science from Usher Parsons, M.D., of Providence, R. I. In 1846, Dr. Cooke entered Brown University, and was a contemporaneous student, although not a classmate,

Nicho. Francis Cooke

