CHICAGO.

---

The original picture—a copy of which is given on the opposite page—was presented, through the proprietors of the LONDON (England GRAPHIC, to the City of Chicago. After the immediate necessities of the sufferers by the fire of 1871 had been alleviated, and it was announced that no more money from abroad would be needed, there remained a large sum in the hands of the proprietors of the LONDON GRAPHIC. Being unable to return the money to the donors, it was determined to use the same towards the purchase of this picture for the City of Chicago. Mr. Ed Armitage is the artist.

PREFACE.

OF the general plan of the History and its specific treatment of subjects, it is requisite that something explanatory should be said. It has already been stated, in the anterior volume, why it was found absolutely needful to make topical essays of the various matters under consideration, and this mode has been continued in the present volume. By this method, chronology and the presentation of facts can be more easily conserved — which is the province of the historian, — and the drawing of inferences avoided — which is the realm of the essayist. In furtherance of this aim, and heeding the line of demarcation between history and essay, it has been the principle of the collaborator to present compendia of incidents, in the particular dissertation, as they transpired, rather than a general account of the event toward which the incidents tended. It is sufficiently easy to realize that a certain number of acres were devastated by the Chicago fire, but without the aid of the historian it would be difficult to acquire any knowledge of the various causes which rendered such destruction not only practicable, but easy.

For the same reason, there are given the biographies of many of Chicago's citizens. These give the history of the men and women who performed the actions that have made history; their lives and their deeds are the keys to the marvellous progress and achievement that have made the name of Chicago a household word throughout the habitable globe. If further advocacy were needed for the presentation of the deeds of "common-place, every-day men" — who are those with whom we deal in in common-place, every-day life — it would be found in these words of the historiographer, Charles Knight: "The history of manners, of common life, is essentially dependent upon the civil, the military, the religious history of a nation. Public events act upon the condition of a people, and the condition of a people interchangeably acts upon public events." Hence, the biography of an individual acts as a plane mirror in reflecting the macrocosm around it, or as the facet of a diamond refracts the beauty of the sun. "History is philosophy teaching by example," and the precedents of our merchants, our professional men and our artisans is worthy of all emulation — such examples being rendered possible by the magnitude of our city's transactions and the splendor of her commercial prosperity.

In procuring matter for the various topics of which chapters have been made, manifold courtesies and valuable information were received from large numbers of our citizens, among them the publishers are especially indebted to Hons. John Wentworth, William Bross, Henry Booth, and Messrs. Joseph Medill, Joseph O. Rutter, John H. Dunham, John R. Walsh, John G. Shortall, J. Adams Allen, William J. Onahan, Samuel H. Kerfoot, Robert Fergus, Charles C. Bonney, Elias Colbert, Joseph P. Ross, Gil. W. Barnard, C. C. P. Holden and George P. Upton. The resources of the Public Library and of the Chicago Historical Society have been heavily taxed by the collaborators, but both of these Institutions, as well as their respective directors, William F. Poole and Albert D. Hager, have furnished vast quantities of most valuable information. The Press, without exception, has been most courteous and painstaking, and from the large fund of its varied experience and cosmopolitan knowledge has given copiously. That there are so many reproductions of ante-fire edifices and views of parts of the city is principally ascribable to the kindness of Messrs. P. B. Greene, Lovejoy & Foster, A. J. W. Copelin, A. Hesler and John E. Woodhead; while to Joshua Smith the publishers are indebted for permission to reproduce his copyrighted view of the ruins of Chicago. In brief, whenever an individual or family, a corporation or society, was applied to for data it was unhesitatingly furnished.

PREFACE.

During the process of compilation it was found expedient to abolish any attempt at an historical resumé of the subject-matter of the preceding volume. Two reasons made the serial story precedent an undesirable one to follow: first, that such a syllabus would be too brief to be valuable, or even comprehensibly accurate, and second, that there is not a page to spare in the entire second volume. This latter fact renders needful a quasi-apology for this work — happily the only condonation required.

In making a synthesis of the various topics prepared by the collaborators, it was ascertained that several matters that might have been elaborated in this volume, and whose treatment pertains to this epoch, would have to be excluded, because their introduction and satisfactory recital would amplify the book beyond reasonable dimensions and render it unwieldy. A dilemma was then instituted, in the query as to what should be ignored or excised? The narrative of the War could neither be curtailed nor syncopated from the work, for the story of Chicago's heroism and patriotic devotion to the Union and her soldiers constitutes one of the grandest pages in her wonderful history. The recital of the burning of the city could not be absconded, as that is the grand climacteric of the volume and the apotheosis of the trials and sufferings of our people. And the introduction of these two topics being conceded to be necessary, a review of the space they occupy will render comprehensible the need for curtailment elsewhere. This elision, however, is only an elision from epochal dissertation, as in the ensuing volume all the missing historical fibers will be taken up and interwoven into a complete and harmonious termination. In fact, experience has shown that in a number of instances continuous narration is more expedient than an interrupted recital.

In perusing this volume, some cursory idea may be formed of the enormous quantity of labor that has been bestowed upon its authorship; the expenditure of such work is an index to the amount that was utilized in the construction and improvement of the city up to October 8, 1871. Step by step have the compilers followed the citizens of Chicago during the erection of their habitations and commerce; as their pencils recorded the vast amount of progress in all branches of the arts and sciences, in mechanics and agriculture, in trade and manufacture, they realized the unparalleled advance of the Garden City from 1857 to 1871, and as their records were examined for this work, it was apparent that the principal difficulty in recording it was not what to write, but what not to write. Only fourteen years of a city's existence, and a folio volume of eight hundred pages is inadequate to fully record it. Mirabile dictu!

Relative to the accuracy of the statements made, it is pertinent to remark that neither time, labor nor money have been spared in gathering the material, which, after its compilation, was submitted to competent judges of its verity; and upon their dicta were excisions, additions or changes made. It is not considered that perfection has been attained, but every precaution and care has been utilized to insure accuracy. The publishers are cognizant of the fidelity and scrupulous pains that have been taken in every process of making this book, and give it to the citizens of Chicago, confident that everything possible has been done to make it worthy of the city of which it is the history.

HISTORY OF CHICAGO.

CORPORATE HISTORY.

THE CORPORATION.

MUNICIPAL CHANGES.—From 1857 to 1871, inclusive, occurred several important changes in the municipal government. In February, 1861, by an amendatory act of the charter, the office of City Marshal was abolished after March 4, 1862, and the Board of Public Works created. The latter body was to assume all the functions heretofore pertaining to the Water, Street and Sewerage Commissioners. At the same time was established the Board of Police, to consist of three commissioners chosen from the three divisions of the city. The first commissioner of the board was to be chosen at the general municipal election in 1863.

The city was divided into sixteen wards by the revised charter of February, 1863, and its limits made to include Bridgeport and Holstein, the line being carried one mile further south. At the same time, all of that territory north of the Chicago River and east of the North Branch was constituted the North Division of the city; all south of the main river and south and east of the South Branch, and of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, the South Division; while the district lying west of the North and South branches of the river, and of the canal was made the West Division. The South Division included six wards, the West Division, nine, and the North Division, five. By acts of February 27 and March 10, 1869, the present city limits were fixed, the territory added to that of 1863, being the district on the west, including the tract lying north of the canal, east of Crawford Avenue and south of North Avenue. The city limits now embrace an area of thirty-five square miles.

The map on opposite page will give a clear idea of the growth of the corporate territory.

In March, 1869, the time for holding the municipal election was changed from April to November. In April, 1875, the City of Chicago was newly incorporated, under the general law, and molded into its present shape.

JOHN C. HAINES served for two terms as mayor of Chicago, from March 2, 1858, to March 6, 1860, having for many previous years been closely identified with the business and public interests of the city. His character is that of the man who makes sure that every forward step in his life is taken upon solid ground. Born in Deerfield, N. Y., on May 26, 1818, he came to Chicago in 1835, worked energetically at various commercial pursuits for a period of eleven years, when he had so established himself in the confidence of the community and accumulated so comfortable a capital, that he decided to extend his scope of activity into a broader field. In 1846, therefore, he entered into a partnership with Jared Gage, and the new firm purchased the Chicago Flour Mills. This was among the pioneer manufactories of the kind in the city, and success was an apparent fact from the first. Mr. Haines' ability was so manifest in the conduct of his own affairs, that he was called upon by his fellow-citizens to serve them, being, in 1848, elected a member of the City Council. In this position he continued for six successive years, and when the city decided to discard the old hydraulic water works for the more metropolitan system, he was called upon to assist, officially, in carrying on the different enterprises. In 1853 he was elected one of the three water commissioners for a term of three years, his co-workers being J. H. Woodworth and George W. Dole. In February, 1854, the supply of water for the city commenced, so that Mr. Haines has the satisfaction of being one of the founders of Chicago's waterworks system, and of living to see the folly of those outcries against the broad views which he and his brother commissioners entertained, regarding the nature of public works to be established. At the end of his term he was re-elected for the ensuing three years in the same capacity. In the meantime he had severed his connection with Mr. Gage and become interested in various financial institutions, among others, the Illinois Savings Institution, of which he was chosen president in 1859. As previously stated, he had commenced his term of service as mayor during the preceding year, being the unanimous choice of the Republican Convention. For several years, after he had completed his second term, he devoted himself to the care of his extensive interests, but took so leading a part in everything which concerned the public welfare that in 1860 he was chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention. He was among the most earnest and effective workers, among the many able men who attended that convention, who placed the people of Illinois and her constitution of 1870 as uncompromisingly opposed to special legislation and jobbery. In 1874 he was elected to the State Senate, representing the first district, during the twenty-ninth and thirtieth general assemblies. For the past few years Mr. Haines has withdrawn from active political life—in fact, he never has been obtrusive, but whatever of honor has come to him has been quite unlooked for. For many years he has been largely interested in several branches of the manufacturing interests of Chicago, and connected with the leading savings banks of the city. For some years past he has resided in Waukegan.

ROSWELL B. MASON served as mayor of Chicago from November 2, 1869, to November 7, 1871. He was, therefore, at the head of municipal affairs when that calamity occurred which, for years to come, will be the point from which to date the deeds and lives of the men and women of this city. It was well, truly, that a man of such rugged common sense and brave character had control of the city government. Responses to his energetic calls for relief came from all over the civilized world, and before he went out of office he had the courage to intrust all moneys, and supplies received by him on behalf of the people of Chicago, to the Relief and Aid Society, instead of to the City Council. Being advised, furthermore, that criminals of all classes were pouring toward Chicago, thinking to be benefited by the confusion then reigning, he earned the approval of all good citizens by calling upon the government of the United States for protection, and General P. H. Sheridan placed the city under martial law. During his entire administration, in short, he showed an independent and fearless spirit, seeming to remember that he had been called to the chair by the votes of the Republicans and Democrats alike. Previous to his election as mayor, Mr. Mason's life had been spent in the unceasing toil of his profession as a civil engineer, the greater portion of his career having been devoted to the surveying and construction of railroads. As the architect alone (if the word may be allowed) of the grand system known as the Illinois Central Railroad, Mr. Mason is entitled to a high place among the benefactors not only of the city, but of the state; and his previous training evidently fitted him for just such an undertaking. Born at New Hartford, Oneida Co., N. Y., September 19, 1805, he spent his early years as do most farmer's boys. In his seventeenth year, he assisted his father to fill a contract which he had taken, of furnishing stone for the locks of the Erie Canal, and thus the boy formed the acquaintance of Edward F. Gay, an assistant engineer in charge of construction. In the spring of 1822, he became a rodman under Mr. Gay, and afterward accompanied the surveying party to the Schuylkill Canal; but in August, 1824, he was obliged to return home on account of sickness. He next connected himself with the survey of a canal from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence River, at Ogdensburg, and in the spring of 1825 took a position with Major Beech and Mr. Gay on the Morris Canal, in New Jersey. Mr. Gay resigned his position as first assistant engineer, soon afterward, when Mr. Mason was given the place, and retained it until he was made chief engineer and superintendent, during the latter portion of his six years' connection with the work. For the succeeding two years he held an important position in the construction of the Pennsylvania Canal, and after that was superintendent of Morris Canal. In the spring of 1837, work was begun on the Housatonic Railroad, extending from Bridgeport, Conn., to the north line of the state. This was one of the pioneer railroads of the country, and Mr. Mason its chief engineer; remaining with the road in that capacity for ten years, subsequently acting as its superintendent. As chief engineer and superintendent of the New York and New Haven Railroad, and engineer in charge of the construction of the Vermont Valley line, Mr. Mason had further opportunities for extending his broad practical experience, previous to entering the western field. In the spring of 1851, he came to Illinois to take charge of the construction of the Illinois Central road, completing it in October, 1856. The details of the progress of this splendid feat of engineering skill will be found in the first volume of this history, the salient facts being given by Mr. Mason himself. After several unsuccessful ventures as a grading contractor, in 1860 he became superintendent of the Chicago and Alton Railroad, was appointed comptroller of the land department of the Illinois Central Railroad company in 1861, and retained the latter position until August, 1867. In the meantime (1865) he had been appointed by the State Legislature one of the members of the Chicago Board of Public Works, to superintend the lowering of the summit of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. In 1868, while acting in this capacity, he also constructed the Dunleith and Dubuque bridge. In November, 1869, he resigned as a member of the Board of Public Works to assume the responsible duties of mayor. After serving two years, he returned to the care of his large business interests. From 1873 to 1883, inclusive, Mr. Mason served as one of the trustees of the Illinois

Industrial University. This is the only public position he has filled since being mayor of the city; but as president of the Chicago South Branch Dock Company, with many other business duties and social and church demands upon his time, his days are still filled with works. Mr. Mason was one of the founders of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the Northwest, which was organized in 1857, and has held the office of director and trustee almost continuously up to the present time. He is a leading member of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, being one of its elders. Mr. Mason was married September 6, 1831, to Miss Harriet L. Hopkins, daughter of Royal Hopkins, of Parsippany, N. J. George Arnold Mason, one of their sons, was killed in a railroad accident, in the year 1855. The remaining family of four sons and three daughters are living, while Mr. Mason himself, at the advanced age of nearly eighty years, appears never to have asked the question, "Is life worth living?"

JOSEPH MEDILL, mayor of the city of Chicago during the two trying years succeeding the fire, and since November, 1874, editor-in-chief of the Tribune, is the son of Irish parents who immigrated to America in 1819. He was born April 6, 1823, in New Brunswick, in the vicinity of St. John's. When he was eight years of age his parents removed to Stark County, Ohio, in which state he resided for twenty-three years, spending his boyhood days on a farm near Massillon. After obtaining an academic education at this town, and teaching at times, he decided, when he had reached his majority, to engage in the study of law. Mr. Medill studied this profession in the offices of Hiram Griswold and Seymour Belden, was admitted to the bar in November, 1846, and commenced to practice in New Philadelphia, Ohio, in partnership with George W. McIlvaine, since chief justice of the Supreme Court of Ohio. But the tastes and the ambitions of the young man tended toward a different career, than one within the limits of the legal profession, and therefore he dissolved the partnership with Mr. McIlvaine in the fall of 1849, soon thereafter establishing the Coshocton Republican. This was published as a free-soil Whig paper until the winter of 1851-52, when he sold it and removing to Cleveland, established the Daily Forest City. He supported General Scott as a presidential candidate, but after his disastrous defeat, concluding that the Whig party had outlived its usefulness, advocated the formation of that grand organization of which, for over thirty years he has been a corner-stone. The new party was founded upon anti-slavery principles, composed of Seward Whigs, Chase Free-soilers and Wilmot-proviso Democrats and was christened, in 1854, National Republican. In 1853 Mr. Medill merged his paper with the True Democrat, owned and edited by John C. Vaughan, and the Cleveland Leader was born into American journalism. In the winter of 1853-54, then but thirty years of age, he met his co-workers at Cleveland, as one of the chief organizers of the Republican party and during the succeeding winter sold his interest in the Leader, came to Chicago and, with Mr. Vaughan, and Dr. C. H. Ray, of Galena, purchased the Tribune. From April, 1855, until the great fire, Mr. Medill bent all his energies toward the development of the journal which he found an infant, and transformed into a giant in the formation of public opinion. During the war the Chicago Tribune was an incalculable power in the work of steadfastly upholding National Union sentiment at home and abroad. It was this journal, more than any other in the country, which brought forward Abraham Lincoln from comparative obscurity and elected him President of the United States. It was more Mr. Medill's individual exertions which brought about the great reform which so much conduced to the firm establishment of Union principles in all the cities of the North, viz.: that by which all soldiers serving in the field were allowed to vote. Through his instrumentality Governors Ramsay, of Minnesota, and Solomon, of Wisconsin, called extra sessions of the state legislatures for the purpose of providing the necessary legislation, and other states whose constitutions permitted, followed their example. He not only agitated the subject in the Tribune, but corresponded with the leading public men of the country until the great importance of the proposed measure was recognized and a strong public sentiment created, which swept all opposition before it. The soldier vote thus cast elected Lincoln in 1864, and saved Congress to the Republicans. Mr. Medill was also instrumental in organizing the Union American League of America, which was a most useful auxiliary to the Northern cause. During the first ten years of his connection with this journal, he was not only managing editor but the business head of the establishment; he not only triumphantly directed its political but its financial policy, until he had built up the Tribune into one of the most prosperous, as well as powerful, journals in America. In 1869 Mr. Medill was elected to the Constitutional Convention, and through his influence and efforts, among many useful and important provisions were those incorporated into the body politic giving representation to minorities in the legislature and chartered companies. He was appointed by President Grant a member of the civil service commission in 1871, and in November of that year was elected mayor of the city, being carried to that office on one of the most irresistible waves of public enthusiasm which ever swept over the city. Mayor Medill assumed control of municipal affairs at a time when the finances of the city, in fact all of its departments, were in a state of great confusion caused, as is well known, by the disorganizing effects of the great fire. But he placed his shoulders under the load of difficulties and lifted the shattered city out of many of its troubles. In September, 1873, a few weeks before the expiration of his term of office, with his health somewhat broken by the strain which so long had been placed upon his mind and body, he resigned the mayoralty and departed upon a European tour for rest and recreation. Upon his return to Chicago in November, 1871, he purchased a controlling interest in the Tribune and as editor-in-chief assumed the general management of its affairs. This position he still holds, guiding its policy with a steady hand and being still recognized as one of the great powers of the Republican party.

At a regular meeting of the Council, held October 30, 1871, the Committee on Finance made the following report:

"To the Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Chicago, in Common Council assembled:

"Your Committee on Finance herewith submit the statement to the Tax Commissioners of the appraised value of all the real and personal property in the city of Chicago for the municipal year A. D. 1871. Your committee have carefully considered the necessities of the city for the remaining half of the fiscal year, and have come to the conclusion that a tax levy of ten mills on the dollar will be sufficient to pay the expenditures during the past six years already incurred, and produce also sufficient for an economical running of the city government for the balance of the fiscal year ending April 1, 1872. In this tax levy your committee have not attempted to interfere with the annual appropriation bill, passed in June last, as they have no authority so to do; but the same remains as passed. It is hoped that the Legislature will give the Council power to revise the annual appropriation bill, and it will then be for the Council to decide in what way it shall be revised. This levy of ten mills will be upon the whole city, the burnt as well as the unburnt district; but it is hoped that the Legislature, which will meet the 15th of November next, will confer the power upon the city authorities to rebate the taxes upon all property destroyed, in whole or in part, and that we thus will be able to afford the necessary relief to the property lying within the burnt portions of the city. Your committee, in view of the great calamity which has befallen our city, have deemed it advisable that every expenditure of money which could be deferred should not now be made, and we have labored to cut the tax levies down to the lowest possible rate consistent with the duty of paying expenditures for the fiscal year already made, and of the carrying on of the city government until the close of the present fiscal year. Ten mills, with the reduction which will be made for the property destroyed, will, with great economy, we believe, be sufficient; and not a dollar beyond what is absolutely necessary should be raised at the present time, for it will be with the greatest difficulty that persons owning property in the burnt district will be able to pay the reduced levy, having in many cases lost all their personal property, and are struggling to rebuild. Your committee will, therefore, respectfully ask the passage of the ordinance accompanying this report.

(Signed)

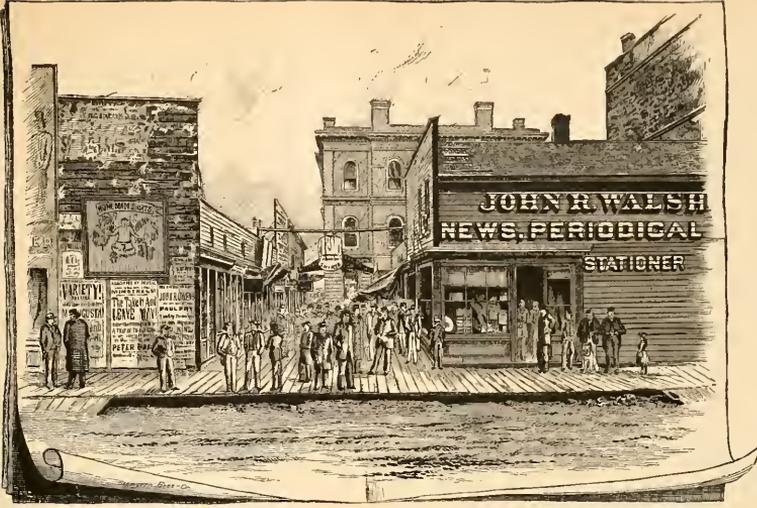

THOMAS WILCE,
J. E. OTIS,
J. BUEHLER,
Committee on Finance."

The valuation referred to was as follows: Real Estate—South Division, $110,665,190; West Division, $87,631,930; North Division, $38,591,280. Total, $236,888,400. Personal Property—South Division, $38,017,180; West Division, $8,850,420; North Division, $4,800,000. Total, $51,670,600.

The ordinance referred to, which was passed, provided for the levying of the following taxes: For the municipal year 1871: Contingent expenses,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills on the dollar; interest on bonded debt,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; police expenses,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; permanent improvements,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; school purposes,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; sewerage purposes,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; for lighting the streets,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; cleaning and repairing the streets,  $1\frac{2}{100}$  mills; water works, 1 mill.

At a special meeting of the Common Council held November 9, 1871, George Taylor, City Comptroller, presented a report covering the period from April 1 to September 1, of that year. During that period the receipts had been $5,336,308 and the expenditures $3,678,942, leaving a balance of $1,657,366 in the treasury, just subsequent to the fire.

WILLIAM J. ONAHAN, City Collector of Chicago, was born in Leighlin Bridge, County Carlow, Ireland. He first removed to Dublin, and, in 1845, he located in Liverpool and started for America in the year 1851. Landing at New York, March 17 of that year (St. Patrick's day), he commenced his life in the new country as an office boy, graduating to the position of assistant book-keeper in a large clothing house. Being induced to come West and try his fortunes in Chicago, he arrived here September 24, 1854. Mr. Onahan early identified himself with religious, and charitable work in this city and has continued untriflingly in labors of this kind. In 1857 he was chosen secretary of the Catholic Institute and subsequently became president of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, with which charitable organization he has ever since been actively identified. At the beginning of the civil war, Mr. Onahan was active in the work of organizing the Twenty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry, commanded by the lamented Colonel James A. Mulligan, and afterward celebrated as the "Irish Brigade." He was now approaching the public period in his career, filled so full with honors. His literary tastes and attainments early brought him to the notice of all educational patrons, being appointed a member of the Board of Education in 1863, and a director of the Public Library in 1873 for a term of eight years, serving in 1881 as president of that organization. Mr. Onahan founded the St. Patrick's Society in 1864 and acted as its first president, being elected to the same position in 1878, and each subsequent year. In 1869 Mr. Onahan was elected City Collector,

OLD AND NEW SITE OF REYNOLDS' BLOCK ; SOUTHWEST CORNER OF DEARBORN AND MADISON STREETS.

John R. Walsh's store stood on the corner of Madison Street and Custom House Place—so named by Mr. Walsh. The front of his store, on the Place, was thirty-six feet from the wall as shown in cut; the front line of Reynolds' Block was fifty feet from the same wall.

at which time the entire revenue of the city, derived from taxes, special assessment, and licenses, amounting to upwards of seven million of dollars annually, passed through his hands. He was the first to institute needed reforms, and to systematize and reduce to exact order the method of keeping the office and tax accounts. In consequence of changes in the city charter, the office of collector was made appointive; and, in 1879, Mr. Onahan was again called to his former position by Mayor Harrison, being unanimously confirmed by the City Council. He has since been twice re-appointed and confirmed in like manner, to the universal satisfaction of the tax-payers. He was one of the principal organizers of the Second Regiment of the National Guards in 1875, it being incorporated as a portion of the State Militia. He remained president of the association until 1879, having assumed a debt of $15,000 in behalf of the regiment, and seen it liquidated. Upon his resignation he was justly and happily complimented by Governor Culom upon the part which he had taken in the organization and maintenance of that body. The work with which Mr. Onahan has been more particularly identified of late years, is the Irish Catholic Colonization Association of the United States; whose object is to promote the settlement of Irish immigrants and citizens on lands in the West. He was also one of the founders of the Charity Organization Society and was elected its first vice-president; being furthermore a director of St. Mary's Training School. Twice president of the Union Catholic Library Association, he has delivered before it many interesting lectures, chiefly on historical subjects. He has also lectured in other cities, and although his regular official duties would be sufficient for a man of ordinary energy, Mr. Onahan is a prolific and valued contributor to the literature of the day. In 1876 Notre Dame University conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Law, although he rarely, if ever, employs this honorable affix to his name. He is also a corresponding member of the Chicago Historical Society. Mr. Onahan was married July 8, 1860, to Miss Margaret G. Duffy. They have had six children, only one of whom is living. It is but just to the invaluable service performed by this gentleman, in furnishing the compilers of this history with large quantities of comprehensive data, to here acknowledge such service; and to additionally state that, were it not for the information furnished by Mr. Onahan, the history of Catholic organizations and procedures would be fatally defective.

WILLIAM BEYE, for twelve years deputy county treasurer of Cook County and now engaged in the grain commission business, is a native of the dukedom of Brunswick, Prussia. He was born on May 12, 1841, and came to America in 1856. He had a brother in the western part of Cook County, Ill., to whom he went, but remained with him only a week when he struck out for himself and engaged in agricultural pursuits in summer, attending school during the winter months, until the war, when he enlisted in the army. He joined Farnsworth's 8th Illinois Cavalry at St. Charles on September 18, 1861, and followed its fortunes during the war. He fought in the battles of Williamsburg, Seven Pines, or Fair Oaks, Malvern Hill, Va., Antietam, Md., Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, besides being in many other smaller engagements and skirmishes. In 1865 his regiment was sent to St. Louis, on the way to the plains for frontier service, but thinking their term of enlistment had expired, they asked to be discharged and were mustered out on July 17, 1865. Returning to Elk Grove, he entered the academy at Elgin the following fall, and after six months' attendance took a term in Bryant & Stratton's Business College in Chicago. He concluded his business course in the spring of 1867, when he obtained a situation as clerk in the office of the County Treasurer, J. M. Allen. His faithfulness and ability secured him a position for four years as clerk and then his promotion as deputy for twelve years. During the first years of his occupancy of the position as deputy treasurer, the great Chicago fire of 1871 occurred and the ensuing Thursday the safe was dug out from the ruins while the debris was yet warm; and the books and accounts although charred were in a condition of perfect legible preservation, and so accurate were the papers, so carefully had the entries been made by Mr. Beye, and so thoroughly in order were all the data, that the following Monday Mr. Beye and Mr. Heber S. Rexford, then county treasurer, went to Springfield and settled the accounts of the state, very much to the surprise of the state officials, who complimented Mr. Beye highly for the accuracy and care which had rendered such a settlement possible. In May, 1873, he formed a co-partnership with James H. Heald under the style and name of William Beye & Co., and in January, 1884, they took J. C. Howell into partnership, so that the firm is now Howell, Beye & Co. On April 23, 1878, Mr. Beye was married to Miss Nellie C. Lombard, a Boston lady, daughter of C. S. Lombard, by whom he has four children: Hannah C., Marion, William and Cudworth. He is a member of Unity Church of Chicago. He is a Royal Arch Mason, and member of Palatine Lodge, No. 314. He is also a member of the Union Club, Union Veteran League Club and the Channing Club.

MANCEL TALCOTT, whose long and industrious life was spent in Chicago, was born in Rome, Oneida Co., N. Y., October 12, 1817, the son of Mancel and Betsy Talcott. He early attended the common schools of his native state, and, in 1834, came to Chicago, walking from Detroit to this city. On his arrival he naturally turned his attention to farming as the only avenue through which he could obtain immediate employment. He accordingly settled at Park Ridge where he remained from 1841 to 1850, when, attracted to the Pacific coast by the gold discoveries, he went there March 25, 1850, and returned November 25, 1851; at the end of that time, and having succeeded in accumulating a considerable fortune, he formed a partnership with Horace M. Singer in 1854, and the Singer & Talcott Stone Company was established. Mr. Talcott was a member of the firm until shortly prior to his death, which occurred June 5, 1878. He was married October 25, 1841, to Miss Mary H. Otis, of Park Ridge. Mr. Talcott was elected alderman in 1863, serving one year. In 1865 he was again elected to the City Council, serving a term of two years. In November, 1871, he was chosen a member of the Board of County Commissioners, and resigned his position upon being elected police commissioner, to fill the place of T. B. Brown, who had resigned. He was for many years a member of the Police Board, resigning the position of president of that body in December, 1872. He was one of the founders of the First National Bank of Chicago, of which he was a director until the time of his death. He was also for a number of years president of the Union Stock Yards National Bank, and president of the Excelsior Stone Company. His life is most distinguished, however, by his benevolence to public charities and religious societies. His many gifts have not all found record, but exist in the memory of those who knew him best.

FRANCIS ADAMS, for so many years corporation counsel, and assistant to that official, was born in Enniskillen, North of Ireland, March 26, 1829, being the eldest of a family of twelve children. He obtained his early education at the village and grammar schools of his native place, having previous to his thirteenth year laid a good foundation for future intellectual operations. When he was twelve years of age, his father, who had been a merchant, desiring to place within the reach of his children the manifold advantages of this country, decided to emigrate to the United States. In the spring of 1841, he, therefore, started for New Orleans with his family, landing at that port and settling in Logan County, Ky., in the month of April. There he purchased a farm, upon which young Adams worked for two years, being next employed in a dry goods store at Clarksville, and subsequently with his father, at the same place and in the same business. But mercantile pursuits were not congenial to the active mind of the youth, and he therefore proceeded to prepare for a collegiate course in a private school at Clarksville. Entering the sophomore class of the Masonic College, at that place, he graduated, in 1851, with the highest honors of his class. As his means were limited, he partially paid his expenses, while in college, by acting as a tutor. After graduating, he taught school for one year in Christian County, Ky., having also commenced the reading of law. This course he persistently continued, at the same time supporting himself as a record writer in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court at Clarksville. Finally Mr. Adams entered the law department of the Cumberland Presbyterian University, at Lebanon, Tenn., which was conducted by Judge Green, for many years Chancellor of the State, and A. B. Caruthers, distinguished as one of the best common-law judges in Tennessee. In the spring of 1854, he was admitted to the practice of law in that state, and was at once offered a partnership with Robert W. Humphreys, of Clarksville. This offer was declined, however, and Mr. Adams removed to Kaufmann, Kaufmann Co., Tex., where, between practicing his profession and teaching school, he more than supported himself. Not liking the country, however, and with a prospect of bettering himself, in the spring of 1855 he removed to Russellville, Ky., where his mother resided, his father having died in 1852. But the fame of Chicago reached him before he had long been there, and accordingly he started for the growing, ambitious young city, which he reached on the 5th of October, 1855. He opened an office in the old frame building, opposite the Sherman House, occupied by the Chicago Tribune. Mr. Adams continued to practice alone until during the summer of 1856, when he formed a partnership with Patrick Ballingall, who had been city attorney, and was one of Chicago's most noted criminal lawyers. The partnership continued until 1858, when it was dissolved, Mr. Adams forming a connection with S. A. Irvin, formerly corporation counsel. Having spent a short time in Memphis, Tenn., and Peoria, Ill., being absent about nine months, in the spring of 1861, Mr. Adams returned to Chicago, where, after successfully practicing his profession for two years, he was elected city attorney. After his term expired, he resumed private practice, and thus continued until August, 1874, when he was employed by Mayor Colvin and Comptroller Hayes to assist the corporation counsel in conducting litigation relating to taxes. The corporation having failed to collect the taxes for the years 1873 and 1874, levied under the "City Tax Act," which the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional, Mr. Adams prepared an act, which was passed by the Legislature of 1877, providing for the collection of the taxes of those and prior years. The application for judgment under this act was vigorously opposed on the ground of the alleged unconstitutionality of the act, but the city was successful in the County, Appellate and Supreme courts, and collected over $750,000 of back taxes under the act, subsequently. Application for judgment in the County Court was made in 1878, and he, having previously resigned, was specially employed to conduct the litigation on the part of the city. In May, 1879, he was appointed corporation counsel by Mayor Harrison, so that when the case reached the Supreme Court, Mr. Adams appeared again for the city. He resigned his position in December, 1883, and took a vacation of several months for rest and recreation. As an evidence of the estimation in which Mr. Adams is held by the public, and especially by those who have been officially intimate with him, the following extract is taken from a letter addressed to him by Mayor Harrison, alluding to Mr. Adams's resignation, which had been tendered him; he says: "I regret the necessity more than any one else. When difficult legal questions have come up, I have always felt myself safe in being guided by your opinion. When important matters of municipal interest have been in court, I have felt, with your attending to such matters, the city was safe. There is no one else I can get to fill your place in whom I can put this trust. There are many good lawyers, but those who have had long experience will not abandon private practice to go into a position subject to the vicissitudes attending municipal elections. Therefore, in losing you I feel your loss cannot be made good."

In October, 1884, Mr. Adams resumed private practice, and is now so engaged.

In addition to the fine service which Mr. Adams has rendered the city in the matter of permanently settling its litigation in regard to taxes, he has been engaged in a number of the most important cases which, within the past few years, have come up for adjudication. In April, 1875, it will be remembered that an election was held for the incorporation of the city under the act of 1872 and that upon application of certain citizens the Circuit Court issued an injunction restraining the members of the Common Council from canvassing the returns. Being advised by F. Lyle Diekey, corporation counsel, and Mr. Adams, his assistant, that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction over their action in the matter, the canvass proceeded, and the result was declared; whereupon the aldermen and their counsel were fined for contempt, but the case being appealed to the Supreme Court, the city was sustained in every point. Mr. Adams's oral argument in the contempt case before Judge Williams, of the Circuit Court, attracted general attention, being set down as a masterly effort.

The Chicago Times of May 27, 1875, thus commented on it: "The conclusion of the argument of Mr. Francis Adams in the important contempt case was certainly one of the finest examples of unpretentious forensic eloquence that has lately been heard in this city. It was the expression, moreover, of sentiments and doctrine that deserve from all seekers after truth the warmest praise. The consistency which some men profess to worship, and which consists in clinging blindly to error, if supported by the authority of tradition, rather than reject what they have once accepted for truth, is the consistency of the bigot, the Bourbon and the fool. No more eloquent rebuke of such medievalism, whether manifest in politics, in theology or in jurisprudence, has been uttered than will be found in the concluding passages of Mr. Adams' address to the court."

That all may have an opportunity of judging whether this praise was deserved or not, that portion of Mr. Adams's address to which reference is made is here inserted. It should be stated, however, that the speech was in reply to a charge of inconsistency made by the opposing counsel, in that Mr. Adams had advised the Common Council just before the meeting of that body next after the injunction was issued, not to canvass the returns: "At that time," he said, "I did not consider the question of jurisdiction or authority to issue the writ. The only question which I then had to consider was how, in view of all the circumstances, should the Common Council act that evening? I thought it prudent and cautious that they should proceed slowly, and that time should be given for an investigation of the questions, they being of great importance. That is my explanation and that is the explanation which I have put on the record. But, if your honor please, I am not disposed to shirk or avoid, in the least degree, the consequences of any act of mine. I accept the canon of interpretation that you must gather one's meaning from the language which he uses, and if that opinion, taken in its ordinary sense, means that the law requires obedience to a writ unauthorized by law, then, if your honor please, following the illustrious example of the Supreme Court of this state and the Appellate Courts of all the states, I here and now overrule that opinion. It may be said that I am inconsistent. Perhaps, indeed, I am open to that charge, as some deem consistency. If consistency means adherence to an erroneous opinion after you shall have discovered your error, then perish consistency for me; I will have none of it. If that is the consistency of which it is said it is a 'jewel,' I seek no such jewels for my personal adornment. But if a sincere, earnest effort to walk in the straight and narrow way of truth, and having, through ignorance, accident or weakness diverged from it to the right hand or the left, to deliberately retrace your steps until you shall have found it, and, having found it, to walk in it humbly, yet firmly and fearlessly, if this be consistency then I desire not, indeed, to be esteemed consistent, but to be so; in the words of the noble motto of the celebrated Danish astronomer, Tycho Brahe,—Esse non haberi. It may be said that I have changed my opinion. If I have, I have but illustrated in my individual life a constant phase in the history of human progress. Had not the opinions of mankind changed, the inductive system of philosophy, the key to all knowledge of the physical sciences, a system which an American author has happily denominated experimental interrogation of nature, and which modern scientists agree in recognizing as the only true system of philosophy, would have perished with Aristotle.

"Had not the opinions of mankind changed, the absurd geocentric theory in Astronomy advocated by the Ancients, advocated by the Fathers of the early Church, enforced even to torture and death by the medieval ecclesiastics, would still be adhered to; we would yet believe the earth to stand still, and to be a wide extended plain with towering mountains on every hand supporting the dome of the sky, and the celestial orbs flaming in the blue vault above but to give light to this little planet.

"We should still witness such scenes as the persecution of a Copernicus, the incarceration of a Galileo, the burning of a Bruno, or some modern Calvin gloating over the expiring agonies of a Servetus infinitely his superior in knowledge and power; and, worse than all, we would witness all Christendom exalting ignorance as the mother of devotion. But the opinions of mankind have changed, and what are the results? Volumes would fall to describe them all. We have a theology engaged in the constant effort to co-ordinate itself with reason; a general advance along the whole line of human progress; the majestic march of intellect, to use the eloquent language of Croly, the human mind ever approximating yet never attaining the exceeding excellence and glory of that ever living, eternal, unchangeable Majesty, by whom, and for whom all things were made. In view of this contrast shall we of the Nineteenth Century proclaim our infallibility? Shall we venerate error because of its antiquity? Shall we ally ourselves with that Bourbonic herd which never learns and never forgets? or shall we rather join that advancing column whose banner borne full high in air, and glorious in the splendor of intellectual light, has ennobled on its ample folds the word 'Excelsior.' For myself I equally abjure and deplore the darkness, the stagnation, and the senseless traditions of the past. I identify myself with the civilization of the century. Gladly, gratefully accepting the light there is, I devoutly desire more, and hope for changes in public opinion commensurate with such increasing light, the resultant of which will always be in the direction of absolute truth."

The cases of the City of Chicago v. Rumsey, and the same v. Munger, involved the question whether the owners of property on La Salle Street between Randolph and Lake streets could recover damages on account of the obstruction of that thoroughfare by the approach to the tunnel. Through the efforts of Mr. Adams their claims for damages were defeated in the Supreme Court, Mr. Rumsey having recovered a judgment in the lower court. He is also to be credited with the success of the city in its case against Fagan, which involved an assessment of over $1,000,000, for the extension of Dearborn Street. This was in October, 1876. Mr. Adams also appeared for the city in its suit against City Treasurer Gage, and the sureties on his bond, recovering $507,700, the largest amount ever obtained in such a suit in this state. Opposed to him were some of the most eminent counsel of the Commonwealth. These are but a few of the important cases in which he has successfully prosecuted municipal claims. In fact, on legal questions involving the interests of the city his opinions are regarded by the citizens, the Bar and municipal officers as quasi judicial—as instance his opinion, delivered in the summer of 1883, in relation to the respective rights of the city and the street railways. The facts in this latter case are as follows: A number of the ordinances passed in 1858, and subsequent thereto, granted to the railway companies the right to construct their lines in certain streets and maintain and operate them for twenty-five years. They also contained a provision that, at the expiration of that period, the city, if it elected so to do, might purchase the tracks, rolling stock, etc., of the roads, the property to be appraised as provided in the ordinance. The time limited by the ordinance expired in 1883, and the question was presented whether the city could purchase the property. This question necessarily involved an examination and construction of all the acts of the State Legislature and the ordinances of the city in relation to the companies; also the question of the control, respectively, of the State and the city over the public streets of the corporation. It was contended by many, and strenuously urged by the Citizens' Association, that the provision in the ordinance for the purchase of the roads by the city was valid; that the right to purchase was part of the contracts between the city, and the companies, and that certain legislation of the State, which had extended the privileges of the companies as to the streets mentioned in the ordinances was unconstitutional as impairing the obligations of the contracts. The questions involved were presented to Mr. Adams for his opinion, and upon that opinion was based an ordinance extending the privilege of the companies for a period of twenty years, but providing that the companies should pay the city, annually, in quarterly instalments, a license fee of fifty dollars for each car used, thirteen round trips to be deemed one day's use. Mr. Adams is a Mason and formerly connected with Waubansia Lodge, and is at present an unaffiliated member of that body. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. His brother, the Right Rev. William F. Adams, formerly Bishop of New Mexico and Arizona, is now a rector of a leading parish at Vicksburg, Miss. Dr. William C. Adams, of Nashotah, Wis., his father's cousin, is one of the most erudite scholars in the Church, being considered almost infallible in all matters relating to ecclesiastical law.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS.

This department of the city government was established May 6, 1861, under the legislative act revising the charter of the city. The duties of the board comprised all those performed by the Water Commissioners, Sewerage Commissioners, Street Commissioners, City Superintendent and Special Commissioners for making assessments, and controlled all public improvements then going on or to be undertaken. The names of the members from the date of organization in 1861 to 1871, are given below, the names of the mayors, who were ex-officio members, being omitted:

Commissioners—1861-63—Benjamin Carpenter, president; Frederick Letz, treasurer; John G. Gindele. 1863-67—John G. Gindele, president; Frederick Letz, treasurer; Orrin J. Rose. 1864-67—William Gooding and Roswell B. Mason, "acting members on matters pertaining to the cleansing of the river." 1867-70—A. H. Burley, president; John McArthur, treasurer; W. H. Carter. 1867-69—William Gooding and R. B. Mason members acting with the board in cleansing the river. 1869-71—William Gooding and E. B. Talcott, members acting in the same capacity, term expiring May 1, 1871. 1870-72—John McArthur, president; W. H. Carter, treasurer; Redmond Prindiville.

E. S. Chesbrough was City Engineer from 1861 to 1871. A. W. Finkham acted as secretary until December, 1870, when he resigned and was succeeded by F. H. Bailey.

STREET IMPROVEMENTS.—Permanent improvement upon the streets of Chicago did not commence until 1855. The Nicholson pavement had been gradually growing in favor, until, by the time the Board of Public Works was organized, the city had about decided that wooden pavement, if not Nicholson, was preferable to any other. It was found that although six or seven years of usage had the effect of wearing the blocks down, the pine, being soft, tough and elastic, retained a coating of fine gravel and made a hard surface, at the same time spreading so much as to close up the interstices and form the pavement into a solid body. Boulder pavement, as on Lake Street, when not properly laid, or composed of soft and marly stone, did not last, on an average, longer than five years; while, to carefully select the stones would make this pavement almost as expensive as Nicholson. South Water, Randolph and other business thoroughfares were the victims of the boulder-stone policy. From 1857 up to the time of the organization of the Board of Public Works, the city expended $234,000 in cleaning and repairing streets. But up to this time there does not seem to have been any concerted action looking to a well-defined system of improvement. In 1861, however, the resolve was formed of first improving the business streets of the city, and gradually extending the work to less traveled territory. This policy was closely adhered to for a number of years. By 1863 nearly four hundred miles of streets had been improved in various ways, about twenty-two miles having been macadamized or graveled. Before the enlargement of the city limits by the charter of 1863, the streets were 363½ miles in length, divided by divisions as follows: South Division, 77½ miles; West Division, 207½ miles; North Division, 78½ miles. Under this charter a most important reform was accomplished, by which special assessments were made for the improvement of streets and alleys. Under the old charter, also, the board had no right to build sidewalks or repair them, but expenditures only were made when their condition threatened life and limb, and the city treasury. But, under the charter of 1863, action by the city authorities was made summary, when sidewalks were in a dangerous condition. To the general disappointment of those who advocated the "special assessment" feature of the new charter, the Superior Court of Chicago decided that its provisions were unconstitutional, and in 1864 the city was left without any law by which improvements could be carried on. Accordingly it was necessary to let a large amount of work lie over until 1865. The decision was not sustained by the Supreme Court, and consequently the special assessments for 1865 were unusually heavy. The report of the Board of Public Works for the year ending ending April 1 of that year, contains the following:

"The appropriations for street repairs and cleaning are altogether too limited. In 1857 and 1858, about as much money was spent for these purposes as now, and as prices then were only half what they are now, and the city was only about half as large, it follows that about three or four times as much in proportion was appropriated then as now. The Council has, for instance, appropriated this year, for the South Division, $24,000. This sum of money is expected to keep clean all the improved streets and alleys of the South Division, and to do more or less repairing on them; to build, and keep in repair, all the culverts, aprons and crosswalks of more than one hundred miles of its streets and alleys; to keep the earthen streets thrown up in shape, and their ditches in order; and, finally, to pay the expenses for inspecting the sidewalks, and for enforcing the orders of the Board, requiring owners to build or repair their sidewalks. On one-third or one-fourth of a mile of a street paved by special assessment, property owners are required to pay more than the annual appropriation, made by the city, for the repairs and cleaning of the streets and alleys, and for the culverts, aprons, street-crossings and sidewalks of the whole South Division."

During the year 1866, the scavenger system was adopted by the Police Board, which greatly assisted the Board of Public Works in cleaning the streets. A decision of great importance to the city was also made by the Superior Court, and affirmed by the Supreme Court, to the effect that railroad companies, in common with other parties whose property is benefited, are subject to assessment for their share of the benefits resulting from the paving, or otherwise improving, of such streets. Nicholson pavement was advancing in public favor, so much so that it was the evident conviction of Mr. Nicholson himself, that the city felt it was too expensive a proceeding to continue paying him a royalty on his patent. A species of pavement was laid by the city, differing from his only in that the strip, or picket, between the rows of blocks was omitted. In April, 1867, a writ of injunction was served on the city by the United States District Court, at the instance of parties representing Samuel Nicholson, restraining the laying of any wooden pavement in which his patent was used. The difficulty was subsequently compromised.

In September, 1867, the Board of Public Works first adopted the policy of cleaning the streets by contract. After trying the experiment for a year with Messrs. McDonald & Hamlen, one was entered into with John T. Salter for a period of three years.

By March, 1868, the sidewalks laid in the different divisions of the city were as follows: North Division, ninety-one miles; South Division, one hundred and twenty-two miles; West Division, two hundred and twenty miles; making a total of four hundred and thirty-three miles laid throughout the city.

By 1869 all the pavements being laid were of wood, as had been the practice for several previous years, the Boyington patent coming particularly into use. The peculiarity of this patent was that one-half the rows of three-inch blocks were seven inches deep (instead of six), resting on ordinary flooring of inch boards, while the alternate rows of the usual depth of six inches rested on the center of strips of inch boards, five inches wide, placed crosswise of the flooring. These strips touched against the seven-inch rows, and were nailed to the flooring. There were thus formed between the six and seven-inch rows, cells six inches deep and one inch wide, extending across the street. Respecting the gravel in the cells and on the surface, and the use of tar in the pavement, there was no difference from the ordinary mode.

There were, then, in 1869, four kinds of wooden pavements, the "Converse" patent being the one which came into use latest. In the Converse pavement the spaces between the blocks were filled with strips of the same height as the blocks. In 1870, various processes were patented and applied, for the preservation of wooden pavements. The North American Wood Preserving Company impregnated some blocks with copperas and lime (their process), and a section of pavement was laid on South Park Avenue, between Twenty-second and Twenty-ninth streets.

Noticeable among the street improvements of 1870-71, was the construction of the viaducts at Halsted, West Indiana and West Adams streets. The one at Halsted and Sixteenth streets was the first built.

During the year nineteen and a half miles of wooden pavement were laid, making over fifty-six miles, mostly in good condition, excepting Clark Street from the river to Polk Street, and Lake Street from the river to Clark Street, where the pavement had been laid about nine years. About eighty-seven of the five hundred and thirty-three miles of street were improved, and over this section three-fourths of the travel of the city passed.

For the year ending March 31, 1871, there were also laid about five hundred and sixty-one miles of sidewalk, nearly all of pine—over forty-one miles having been built during that period.

DEWITT CLINTON CREGIER, who for thirty years has been connected with the Public Works of Chicago; having filled the position of chief and designing engineer of the Water Works for twenty-five years; city engineer for three years and having entered upon his fourth year as commissioner of Public Works, was born in the city of New York, June 1, 1829. He is the son of John L. and Ann E. (LeFort) Cregier, his mother being the daughter of a well-known French ship-master who was, for many years, prominently identified with the merchant marine of New York. She was also a cousin of Henry Inman, the famous portrait painter, and nearly related by marriage to Daniel Tompkins, at one time vice-president of the United States. When Mr. Cregier was four years of age his father died, his mother surviving but few years, and he being left an orphan at thirteen years of age. Until he was in his sixteenth year he lived with relatives, attending the public schools of New York City, and conducting himself as an industrious, ambitious, sensible lad should. He next tried a clerkship for a time, but mercantile pursuits being evidently distasteful to him, he connected himself with the engineer's department of the steamer "Oregon," running on Long Island Sound, in which position he remained until 1847. Next he entered the machinery department of what subsequently became the famous Morgan Iron Works of New York. Before he abandoned this vocation he had thoroughly mastered the principles of mechanical engineering, and, in 1851, he connected himself with the engineer corps of the United States mail steamers plying between New York, Havana and New Orleans. During the summer of 1853, Mr. Cregier came to Chicago to superintend the erection of the first pumping machinery for the water works, and has had active or general charge of them ever since. During his term of service he superintended the erection of all the machinery now in use at the North-side works, including the magnificent double pumping-engine which has no superior in the world. Since his connection with the water works there has never been an accident which interfered seriously with their operation, with the exception, of course, of the stoppage occasioned by that grand "set back" to all city departments, the great fire of 1871. Mr. Cregier is of a very inventive turn of mind, and is the patentee of a large number of well-known and valued appliances used in connection with the public works. All of the fire hydrants used in the city are of his design. For these, and other improvements, he holds patents which the city uses free of charge. It is certain that few officials in the country can boast of a larger or a more meritorious connection with public works than Commissioner Cregier. Mr. Cregier was married August 2, 1853, to Miss Mary S. Foggin, of New York City. The same day the young couple started for Chicago, where they arrived on the 6th of the same month. They have had ten children, of whom six sons and one daughter are living, viz.: Mary Florence, Nathaniel Banks, DeWitt Clinton, Washington Rogers, Edward LeFort, Charles Knap and Frederick Quintard. As a Mason, Mr. Cregier is of high standing. His first service was with Blaney Lodge, in 1860. Shortly after he joined it he was elected Senior Warden, which office he held for one year, when he was elected to preside over that body, which he continued to do for six years. He was elected to the office of Senior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, held the office for one term and was afterward elected Deputy Grand Master for two consecutive terms. In 1870, the fraternity conferred the highest honors in their power to bestow, by electing him Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the State of Illinois. At the annual communication held in Chicago, in 1871, the Brotherhood further evinced their appreciation of his worth by unanimously re-electing him. He was also a member of the Triennial Committee of the Conclave of Knights Templar in 1880. He is at present a life member and Master of Blaney Lodge, member of LaFayette Chapter, Siloam Council, Apollo Commandery and Oriental Consistory, and an honorary member of twelve other lodges and commanderies. In many of these he has held the highest official positions. He is also a member of the Supreme Council—33° A. A. S. Rite—for the Northern Masonic Jurisdiction of the United States and of the Royal Order of Scotland. In addition he is representative of the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia, Michigan, Mississippi, Connecticut and Indiana near the Grand Lodge of Illinois, and of the Grand Chapter of the State of New York near the Grand Chapter of Illinois. He is also president of the Illinois Masonic Benevolent Society, president of the Western Society of Engineers, and a member of the American Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures and Commerce. Soon after the great fire Mr. Cregier, as Grand Master of the State, took charge of the relief fund amounting to over $90,000, in conjunction with the committee organized to distribute the money and supplies. The subsequent report of the auditing commission, composed of Grand Masters from Pennsylvania, Iowa and the District of Columbia, in connection with the disbursement of the relief fund, was a just tribute to the faithfulness and ability with which the committee, at whose head was Mr. Cregier, administered the trust confided to them by the Fraternity abroad. In fact, both as a public official and as a broad-minded, broad-hearted man, Mr. Cregier has been continually honored and has steadfastly retained the general confidence in his ability and honesty.

BRIDGE BUILDING.—In 1857 the Madison-street bridge, South Branch, was built by Gaylord & Co. It was of iron, one hundred and fifty-five feet long, and cost $42,000. The Clark-street bridge was constructed in 1858. In 1860 a structure was thrown across the river at South Halsted Street, by Fox & Howard, contractors. The bridge was one hundred and fifty feet long, composed of wooden braces and iron chords, costing $8,500. A bridge similar to the one at South Halsted was built, in 1862, at Clybourn Avenue, North Branch, by the same parties, and also one at Wells Street, over the main river. In November, 1863, the iron bridge at Rush Street, built in 1856, was accidentally destroyed. A drove of cattle were crossing it, when the structure was crushed down on one side, and fell into the river, two of the turn-table wheels being broken and three trusses thrown down laterally. The cost of the ruined bridge, with piers and abutments, was $50,000. Another bridge at this point was commenced in November, 1863, and completed in January, 1864, by Messrs. Fox & Howard. It was what is known as the wooden-truss bridge, and was two hundred and eleven feet in length. During 1864, also, the State-street bridge was finished. The city had a right of way on the South Side to the river front, but did not obtain the land to extend Wolcott Street (North State) until May, 1864. It was then purchased of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company, and the work of constructing the bridge was placed in the hands of Fox & Howard. The city accepted the bridge in January, 1865. It was one hundred and eighty-four feet in length, and cost $32,000, and was composed of wooden braces and chords. The piers and abutments were afterward built, and the line of communication between the North and South sides opened for traffic. The viaducts over the railroad formed, with the bridge, one of the most useful improvements of the time. In 1865, the following bridges were built: North Avenue, North Branch, by N. Chapin & Co.; Fuller Street by the same contractors; Randolph Street, South Branch, by L. B. Boomer & Co. The latter was opened for traffic in July. A continuation of the bridge building by years, up to and including 1871, is as follows:

1866—North Halsted Street, North Branch, wooden braces and chords, Fox & Howard, 130 feet, $7,000; Clark Street, Main River, wooden braces and iron chords, Thomas Mackin, 180 feet, $13,800.

1867—Chicago Avenue, North Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 175 feet, $26,700; Van Buren Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 163 feet, $18,270.

1868—Lake Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 185 feet, $11,450; Twelfth Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 202 feet, $44,940; Eighteenth Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 175 feet, $28,500; Main Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 152 feet, $12,450.

1869—70—Division Street, North Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 176 feet, $15,794.84; Indiana Street, North Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 163 feet, $48,800; Polk Street, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 154 feet, $29,450; Western Avenue, West Fork of South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, F. E. Canda, 125 feet, $13,000; Throop-street bridge, Fox & Howard, $12,649. The Wells-street viaduct was constructed during this year.

1870—Kinzie Street, North Branch, wooden braces and chords, Fox & Howard, 170 feet, $15,850; Adams Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 160 feet, $37,860; Archer Avenue, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 152 feet, $11,500.

1871—Erie Street, North Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 200 feet, $30,000 (not then in use); Twenty-second Street, South Branch, wooden braces and iron chords, Fox & Howard, 210 feet, $26,900; Kenburn Street, West Fork of South Branch, wooden braces and chords, Fox & Howard, 152 feet, $11,500. Total original cost, $511,154.84.

CLARK STREET BRIDGE.

The great fire destroyed the bridges across the main river at Rush, State, Clark and Wells streets, across the North Branch at Chicago Avenue, and across the South Branch at Adams, Van Buren and Polk streets; also the viaducts over the railway tracks at Wells and State streets. The Adams-street viaduct was partially destroyed. The damage to bridges and viaducts, including abutments, center-piers and protections, is estimated at $204,310.

Contracts were at once entered into to rebuild the bridges destroyed. The following table gives a clear idea of the stupendous work undertaken by the city in the matter of the construction of bridges alone, the date of the report being July 1, 1872:

SAMUEL GEORGE ARTINGSTALL, acting engineer of the city of Chicago, was born on November 26, 1846, in Manchester, England. His parents were John and Ellen (Hall) Artingstall, his father being an architect and civil engineer in high standing. When the son was nineteen years of age Mr. Artingstall died, and he was thrown completely upon his own resources. But even at this early period of his life, his ability was recognized by the appointment which he received of general superintendent of the viaduct, then being built over the canal and London & Northwestern Railroad, at St. Helen's, near Liverpool. The engineer of the work was William Fairburn, and the contractors, Robert Neil & Sons, of Manchester. Mr. Artingstall was in the service of the latter firm, with whom he remained for a number of years, having in charge, during that period, such important enterprises as the construction of the bridge at Manchester, and the building of the Bolton Cotton Mills, situated in the same county. In 1866, he left Manchester, and came to Chicago, obtaining employment at once as a draughtsman in the city sewerage department. After the fire, he was actively engaged in designing plans for the bridges, especially of those first constructed, such as at North Halsted, Madison, and Randolph streets. The engine and station houses for the accommodation of the Fire and Police departments were also erected from his plans, and under his immediate supervision. William Bryson, who had been connected with the Department of Public Works for nineteen years, and who had the active superintendence in the construction of the tunnels, under City Engineer Chesbrough, died in October, 1875. He had also drawn plans for the West-side pumping-works, from whose drawings they had been but partially constructed at the time of his death. The work thus left uncompleted was taken up by Mr. Artingstall, and he has since, in reality, been the acting engineer for the public works of the city. His formal appointment, however, dates from February, 1882. With the exception of Max Hjortsborg, chief engineer of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, who was run over and killed near Kensington, town of Hyde Park, in 1881, Mr. Artingstall is the only member of the Institution of Civil Engineers (London) who has ever lived in Chicago. Since coming to this country, and since the formation of the association in 1869, he has also been connected with the Western Society of Engineers. Mr. Artingstall was married November 1, 1873, to Susan Archer, formerly a resident of Milwaukee. They have five living children, one son and four daughters.

A. M. HIRSCH, principal assistant engineer, and one of the oldest officials of continuous service connected with any department of public works, was born February 6, 1827, in Wormdit, near Koenigsberg, East Prussia. He received his early education at the gymnasium of Konitz, his design from the first being to prepare himself as a royal officer in the engineering corps of the Prussian government. After graduating from the gymnasium at Konitz, he studied surveying, and, in 1847, successfully passed his examination as a royal surveyor. He was then employed by the government in building railroads, macadamizing highways and constructing water-works. In 1850, he entered the Architectural Academy at Berlin, where he remained two years and a half. Early in 1853, he passed his examination, having, during this period, served as a volunteer in the Prussian army, and immediately afterward emigrated to New York City. For a short time he found remunerative employment among the architects and surveyors of that city, but, meeting some friends from the Old Country who were on their way to the ambitious city of the West, he was induced to join them and pass on to Chicago. More fortunate than some of his comrades, he immediately obtained a situation under Roswell B. Mason, chief engineer in charge of the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad. A few months thereafter, he received an appointment as engineer under Colonel J. D. Graham, United States Topographical Engineer, in charge of the Lake Michigan harbor improvements. In this capacity he remained until the spring of 1856, when he entered the service of the city of Chicago as assistant engineer in the street department. He had the honor of drawing the first cross section of a Chicago street, and among other radical improvements which he introduced in early times, was the substitution of the old proportion of grades in bridge approaches (1:10) to the modern and accepted figures of 1:10. For many years Mr. Hirsch has had the active management of this important branch of the Department of Public Works, his official title now being Principal Assistant Engineer. He is one of the very few now living who resided in old Fort Dearborn, he lived there during the years 1854-55. He married Miss Matilda Hildebrand, of Kiel, Germany. They have three children living—Alfred A., James H. and Clara S. Alfred A. (now traveling salesman for J. V. Farwell & Co.) married Miss Matilda Schaefer, of St. Louis (her father, Colonel Schaefer, was killed at the Battle of Murfreesboro, Ky., during the late civil war). They have one child, a daughter, Cora. James H. (now with Clement, Bane & Co.) married Miss Anna Fox, of New York City; her father, Charles Fox, was superintendent of the Singer Manufacturing Company, at South Bend, Ind., and died of consumption at Denver, Col. They have one child, a daughter, Verna Mae.

RIVER TUNNELS.—If he is interested in the bridge question, the general reader will remember how sectional jealousies entered into, and raged around the question of locating the early bridges of the city. But by 1857-58 the marine interests of Chicago had increased so prodigiously, that all local feelings in the breasts of landmen had been thrown aside; and all the pugnacity of the city was divided in the fierce warfare which raged between river navigators and those persons who were obliged to use the thoroughfares. What constituted the respective rights of land travelers and water travelers, and what was their relative importance in the community?—this was the question which vexed the any kind. The next kind of bridges were similar to the present ones, turning on their centers, but placed so low as scarcely to allow a canal boat to pass under them, and had to be opened for every tug or larger vessel. As the population and commerce increased, the crossing of the river was more and more frequently obstructed by the passage of vessels; but the rights of navigation were considered paramount to all others on the river, and vessels could not be detained at all by the bridge, no matter what number of vehicles or individuals might be prevented from crossing. The first interference with the absolute rights of navigation was in requiring the tugs to lower their smoke stacks when passing under the bridges that had been placed high enough. There was quite a rebellion against it by the tug masters for a day or two, but it soon ended, and there has been none since, against so reasonable a regulation. This reduced the necessity of opening the bridges so often, and consequently afforded much relief. As the business of the city increased, the obstruction to the land travel in crossing the river was greatly increased, notwithstanding the raising of the most important bridges. * * * * * Early efforts were made to set on foot projects for constructing tunnels under the river, and thus avoiding the inconvenience of waiting at the bridges for the passage of vessels. In 1853, a company for the purpose having been formed, with the Hon. William B. Ogden at its head, plans were proposed for such a work, both in masonry and iron. Among these plans were those of Messrs. William Gooding, E. F. Tracy, and Thomas C. Clarke. Had the company constructed the work, it was their intention to adopt Mr. Clarke's plan, which was for a wrought iron tunnel; because its estimated cost was less than that of a tunnel in masonry, and it could have been constructed without much interference with navigation. Owing to the more general adoption of turn-bridges about this time, the great necessity for tunnels was removed, and the probability of their yielding a satisfactory income much diminished.

For the general benefit of the public, red and green signals were introduced under the ordinance of June 4, 1860, and, under the law of October 7, 1861, bells were placed on Rush, Clark, Wells, Lake, Randolph and Madison-street bridges. But still the bridge-tender was an unruly member of the municipal body. He had the people under his thumb, as it were, and previous to 1868 the city had no control over him. On April 22, 1867, the ten-minute ordinance was passed, and business on the land once more moved along with some regularity, during the busy season of navigation on the lakes and rivers. The vessel men, however, were now delayed quite materially, and consequently they brought the question before the Illinois Supreme Court, to test its legality. The action of the Council was sustained. In April, 1868, the friends of the tug men and vessel owners in the Common Council attempted to repeal the ordinance of 1867, but were unsuccessful in their efforts. This celebrated ordinance, which may be called the ground work of all subsequent bridge legislation, provided that vessel owners, bridge-tenders, or officers, found guilty of a violation of its provisions should be liable to a fine of $100, and to imprisonment in the city bridewell for three months.

Although this legislation had its effect in bringing a certain amount of relief, various tunnel projects, which were advanced, and some of them which were almost brought to a conclusion previous to 1868, indicated that the public were convinced in what direction lay the most permanent solution of the difficulty.

As early as April, 1864, the Chicago Tunnel Company petitioned for the passage of an ordinance authorizing it to construct tunnels under the Chicago River at Franklin and Lake streets. Pending the action of the Council on this ordinance, the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad Company petitioned for the construction of a free tunnel at Adams Street, offering to subscribe $25,000 toward it, or $15,000 for any other street as far north as Washington, provided that Adams Street between Canal Street and the river should be vacated. On the 14th of November, a petition was presented for the passage of an ordinance appropriating public for many a long and weary month. So far as it related to the question of the conveniences of land travel, the problem was to be partially solved by the construction of the two river tunnels. City Engineer Cheshbrough made the following statement, showing what early attempts were made to bring the reform about:

The first bridges across the river were floating structures, and, of course, when closed could not allow the passage of vessels of $100,000 to construct a tunnel at Washington Street. In January, 1865, the ordinance was passed to issue $100,000 in city bonds, provided $100,000 could be raised by subscription. Plans for it had been approved, bids received, and the contract was about to be awarded for its construction, in June, when it was discovered that there was no legal authority for building it at all. These difficulties were obviated by the passage of the legalizing ordinance, and the contract was awarded to James H. Moore. By March, 1866, however, it became evident that the subscription of $100,000 had failed of being raised, and the City Council therefore fell back upon the Adams-street tunnel, the railroad offer being still open.

State, Franklin and Clark streets were next favored with the attention of the city fathers, but in July they returned to their first plan, and requested the Board of Public Works to proceed as soon as possible with the construction of the tunnel on Washington Street. Bids were again received, the contract being awarded, in August, 1866, to Messrs. Stewart, Ludlam & Co., for $271,646. The contractors broke ground west of the river October 2 and east of the river October 11. They excavated to a depth of thirty-seven feet just east of the river and removed a large portion of the earth as far as Market Street. West of the river they removed the earth from the upper portion of the cut between Clinton and West Water streets. They also accomplished other work, but, on account of an insufficient supply of funds, which were, at last, completely cut off, it was entirely abandoned in May, 1867. The excavation then caved in, and after the city had expended over $20,000 upon the enterprise, everything was as if it never had been. New plans and specifications were prepared, and in July, 1867, the contract was awarded to J. K. Lake for $328,500. Operations were commenced July 25, the foundation of the main archway, east entrance, being begun on the 13th of August, and the key-stone put in October 31. The masonry on the main arch east of the river was carried to near the middle of Market Street, when, owing to the severity of the weather, work was suspended for the winter. Operations were continued during 1867, with slight interruptions, Mr. Clark withdrawing from the contracting firm, and A. A. McDowell being admitted. In the spring of 1868, the contractors having prepared improved machinery, prosecuted the work night and day, until it was completed. Yielding of braces, leaks in the coffer-dams, and other drawbacks, which often accompany such undertakings, delayed the final completion of the tunnel until January 1, 1869. The day was celebrated by the contractors taking the Mayor, City Council, Board of Public Works, Fire Department and other public officials through it. Much pains had been taken to prevent leakage through the roof of this tunnel, by the use of asphaltum, and through other portions of the arch by a composition of coal tar, lime, etc.

The tunnel is located with its center line in the middle of Washington Street. The eastern approach commences in the center of Franklin Street, and the western terminates in the center of Clinton Street, thirteen and a half feet above low water line. The bottom of the tunnel below the center of the river bed is 32.4 feet below the line. There are three passage ways, the south one for foot passengers and the other two for horses and vehicles. On each side of the river, two hundred feet apart, was a wall of rubble masonry, built to provide for the prospective widening of that stream. At the eastern and western ends of the covered passage way there was the face-wall extending up to the surface of the street. The surface drainage of the tunnel was carried through pipes into several wells, the one at the east end under the river section being carried up to the street grade, in the form of a shaft enclosed in the stone abutment. Through this shaft the water that collects in the well is pumped by machinery into the chamber above, which is built for that purpose. The total cost of Washington-street tunnel is placed at $517,000. Its length is 1605 feet. In the preparation of plans and estimates for the tunnel E. S. Chesbrough was assisted by William Thomas, architect. In November, 1866, William Bryson was appointed resident engineer.

LaSalle-street Tunnel.—In 1869, the plans for the LaSalle-street tunnel were prepared by William Bryson, and the contract for its construction awarded to R. E. Moss, George Chambers and A. J. McBean; the two latter gentlemen fulfilling the contract. Work was begun November 3, 1860, on the north coffer-dam and by the last day of March, 1870, the masonry was completed from the center of the river to a point fifty feet north of the north dock line. With the exception of a change in grade from 1 in 16 to 1 in 20, the liberal use of asphaltum for the brick beds, and a headway two feet higher, this subterranean passage varies little from the Washington-street tunnel. The LaSalle-street tunnel was opened to the public July 4, 1871. Its length is 1890 feet and its cost was $566,000. The fire of October warped the railing around the open approaches to the tunnel, as it did that of the east approach of the one on Washington Street, rendering a considerable portion of it unfit for anything but scrap iron. The stone coping was also somewhat damaged.

ELLIS S. CHESBROUGH, as the constructor of the two lake tunnels, stands among the world's great civil engineers. Previous to coming to Chicago, most of his professional life was passed upon eastern railroads. He was the son of Isaac M. and Phranja (Jones) Chesbrough, and on account of his father's failure in business, Ellis lost much schooling which otherwise would have been given him, working for various mercantile establishments in the city of Baltimore, where he was born, and where he spent his days up to his seventeenth year. At the age of fifteen his father became one of a company of engineers employed by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, and, through his influence, the son also obtained employment in the same line and with the same corporation. Ellis remained with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company until 1830, when he entered the service of the State of Pennsylvania, in the survey for the projected Allegheny Portage Railroad. During the succeeding eleven years he was employed on the Patterson & Hudson, the Boston & Providence, the Taunton Branch, and the Louisville, Charleston & Cincinnati railroads, being a member of the engineering corps of Captain, afterward General, William Gibbs McNeill. In 1840, Mr. Chesbrough was appointed superintendent of construction of the last named railroad, and held that position until the line was completed to Columbia, S. C. He then went to Providence, R. I., where his father resided, and, after spending a few months in the shops of the Stonington Railroad Company, was thrown out of employment by stress of hard times, tried farming and failed, and finally, in 1844, returned to his profession. In 1846, he was appointed engineer of the Water Commissioners of Boston, and upon completing the structures along the line of the Cochituate aqueduct, was elected Water Commissioner, and subsequently City Engineer. Having been appointed chief engineer of the Board of Sewerage Commissioners of Chicago in December, 1855, Mr. Chesbrough presented a plan for a sewerage system of the city, which was adopted by the municipal authorities, and fixed his reputation as an expert in that specialty throughout the country. The next year he went to Europe to obtain information relative to the drainage of cities, and his report was published by the Board, and has been considered standard authority on the subject ever since. In 1861, when the sewerage and water systems of the city had become so cumbersome as to require a larger governing organization, a regular board of public works was established, Mr. Chesbrough being chosen chief engineer, and subsequently city engineer. The latter position he retained until succeeded by Dewitt C. Cregier, four years ago. The wonders which he accomplished for Chicago during that period, are detailed in that portion of the corporate history devoted to the grand march of public improvements from 1861 to 1882. For the past few years Mr. Chesbrough has retired from the active duties of his profession. His wife, formerly Miss Elizabeth A. Freyer, of Baltimore, Md., whom he married in 1837, is still living.

SEWERAGE SYSTEM.—Previous to the organization of the Board of Public Works, about 54.5 miles of sewerage had been constructed—6.02 miles in 1856; 4.86 miles in 1857; 19.29 miles in 1858; 10.45 miles in 1859; 13.07 miles in 1860; and .53 miles in 1861. Although but 2,826 feet were constructed in 1861, three fourths of this amount was built by private, and interested parties. The board had no resources from which to draw, and suit was commenced against the Sewerage Commissioners for $53,882 84, on orders which the Marine Bank refused to pay at par, and for $107,746.53 against S. Lund, treasurer of the late board. In 1862, about three miles of sewers were constructed, principally of brick. The balance of the account due from S. Lund, now found to amount to $108,696.53, had not been obtained. After the year 1863, when the finances of the city were somewhat embarrassed, the construction of sewers and the growth of the system progressed favorably. Following is a table covering the period, commencing with the time the Board of Public Works assumed charge, up to and including 1871, the figures for 1861 being the number of feet constructed up to that year, with cost :

The damage to the sewerage system, by the great fire, was comparatively light, consisting of injury to man-hole and catch-basin covers, and in the extra expense occasioned in cleansing sewers and basins, caused by the deposits of lime and debris from burnt buildings. The loss in this department is estimated at $42,000.

THE CITY HALL.—The joint building which had been completed in 1853 by the city and county for their municipal purposes, after a few years was found to be entirely inadequate to the public wants ; and in 1869 the Board of County Commissioners and the Common Council of the city agreed upon an enlargement. Two wings and an additional story were added to it, and these were completed during the year 1870. The west half of the court house as it stood, was purchased outright by the city from the county, and entirely remodeled. This, with the additions, gave room for all the city officers, except those of the Board of Education. The cost to the city of its portion of the addition, including the purchase money for the half bought from the county, together with the cost of remodeling and furnishing, was $467,000. The original building was of marble, from the Lockport quarries of New York. The additions were built of the stone from the well-known Lemont quarries of Cook County.

THE WATER SYSTEM.—THE LAKE TUNNEL.—The early settlers of Chicago were ever gazing toward Lake Michigan as the source from which, as a people, they were eventually to be saved from the vileness of their then water "privileges." Up to 1858 they had not gone more than a few rods from the shore ; nor did they make the attempt for some years thereafter. It seemed to slowly dawn upon the municipal authorities that, as servants of the public, they were called upon to look to the quality as well as the quantity of the drinking supply. Two new reservoirs, each having a capacity of half a million gallons, were erected in 1858, one being placed in the North and one in the West Division of the city. During that year the average daily supply was three million gallons. For several years the operations of the old works were uniform and satisfactory, except at periods during the coldest weather, when vast quantities of fish and ice collected at the mouth of the inlet pipe and threatened to cut off the supply entirely. The Board of Water Commissioners having met the immediate wants of the community as to quantity, now began seriously to consider the question of purity of the water supply. Surveys and estimates of various improvements were made.

During 1860 five plans were submitted to the Council for attaining the requisite purity. First, by extending a pipe one mile out into the lake ; second, by building a tunnel one mile under the lake ; third, locating the pumping works at Winnetka ; fourth, by the construction of filter beds ; fifth, by the erection of a subsiding reservoir. The suggestions did not receive much attention, but the people continued to cry for the purest water which could be obtained. The next year (1861) E. S. Chesbrough, as the newly appointed city engineer, submitted to noted chemists a number of samples of water, taken from the lake and river. One fact was ascertained which, at first, gave rise to some surprise, viz., that water taken from near Clark-street bridge, in the spring, was found purer than that taken from the lake, one mile from Cleaverville. This was afterward explained, on the ground of "freshets." The investigation continued from early in the spring to late in the fall, and the fact was demonstrated that the water of Lake Michigan, some distance from the shore, was superior in every respect to that used by any other city, and could not be excelled.

In 1862 Mr. Chesbrough made an elaborate report to the Common Council in regard to obtaining a better water supply, and then for the first time forcibly pointed out the benefits of the tunnel system, which he subsequently carried to a splendid engineering triumph. Meanwhile the water supply had increased from about three million of gallons daily, in 1858, to 6,400,000 gallons in 1863. The tunnel plan having been adopted in June of that year, an exploration of the lake bottom was commenced by Mr. Chesbrough, about twenty feet from shore. It was ascertained that the underlying stratum was a thick bed of blue clay, for some distance to the eastward. At about three-quarters of a mile from the shore, a boring was made through the upper layer of sand and the thirty feet of blue clay, the water at that point being twenty feet deep. Two miles and a half east of the Water Works, at a point where is located the present crib, the strata revealed no change of consequence. The water in this locality was thirty feet deep, and as clear and cold as if flowing from living springs. At a depth of thirty-six feet the water was  $51\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$  in temperature, while it reached  $60^{\circ}$  on the surface. The revised city charter of February, 1863, had authorized the extension of aqueducts and inlet pipes into the lake and provided for their protection. Mr. Chesbrough's plan was formally adopted by the city, in September of that year. Proposals for constructing the tunnel were received on the ninth of that month. The contract was awarded to Messrs. Dull & Gowan, of Harrisburgh, Penn., their bid being \$315,139. That firm assumed all risks, incident to such works. The tunnel was to be completed November 1, 1865.

The inaugural ceremonies attending the breaking of ground for the tunnel took place March 17, 1864. Mayor Sherman, after addressing the people present, took a pick and, breaking the ground, declared the great work commenced. The majority of the Common Council, Messrs. Letz and Rose of the Board of Public Works, City Engineer Chesbrough, Comptroller S. S. Hayes, Dewitt C. Cregier, chief engineer of the water works; Colonel James Gowan and James J. Dull, contractors; U. P. Harris, chief engineer of the Fire Department, and others, were present. Each public official took a shovelful of earth and, placing it in a wheelbarrow, transferred that vehicle to Messrs. Dull & Gowan, the contractors, thus symbolizing the fact that the undertaking had been placed in their hands. After breaking ground the shore shaft was sunk. It was originally intended to construct the shaft wholly of brick, running it down from the surface of the ground to a depth of fifteen feet below the level of the lake; but the fact that a shifting quicksand had to be passed through, compelled them to abandon that plan of operation. The contractors were, therefore, authorized to run down an iron cylinder, of the same dimensions as the center of the crib, to a depth of twenty-six feet, and to the bottom of the sand bed. This inlet cylinder was nine feet in inside diameter. It was put down in four sections of about nine feet in length. From the shore shaft the tunnel extended two miles out in a straight line, at right angles with the shore. Excavations were commenced immediately after the ground was broken. In July, 1865, the giant crib* for the east end of the tunnel was launched, in the presence of Governor Oglesby and a large concourse of citizens. After being towed out in safety, two miles from the shore, it was there sunk. With regard to the character of the work, the material met with in the process of excavation was stiff blue clay throughout, so that the anticipation of the contractors in this respect was fulfilled. The soil was found to be so uniform, that only one leakage of water through the tunnel ever occurred, and that only coming at the rate of a bucketful in five minutes. This occurred in September, 1865. From that time no accident of any importance transpired. There were two or three slight escapes of gas. The first brick was laid at the crib end on the 22d of December, 1865, and on the last day of the year the workmen began to excavate from that end, at which time they had already 4,825 feet done from the shore. From that time the work progressed steadily and with few interruptions.

In the early part of November, 1866, when within a few feet of meeting, the workmen, for the first time, discovered sand pockets, which caused leakage, and delayed the final blow until December 6, 1866, when the last stone was placed by Mayor J. B. Rice. A large flag floated from the cupola of the old ante-fire Court House, in which building the Board of Public Works had their office. It was in honor of the final closing up of the tunnel arch at the point where the crib and shore sections met. The Board of Public Works had previously extended invitations to the Common Council, Board of Education, and many other prominent citizens, to witness the ceremonies.

At the time fixed, about two hundred of the guests were on the spot, awaiting anxiously the rare adventure before them. The invitations stated that a number of the guests were to make a tour of the tunnel from the shore shaft to the crib, and return by the lake, on board tug-boats, while others went out to the crib first, and returned by the tunnel railroad. Thousands of people were on the spot who had not received invitations, and who, of course, could not make the interesting voyage. The Board of Public Works had managed to have two trains of cars pass through the tunnel, from the shore to the crib, one leaving the shore shaft at ten o'clock, and the other at half-past twelve; also to have a tug-boat leave State-street bridge at corresponding hours for the crib. Twenty-one earth-cars were put in readiness for the tunnel, or subaqueous, trip, and the tug-boat "S. N. Crawford" was chartered for service for the supermarine voyage. The hour for starting was ten o'clock, at which time the entire party were on hand, full of eager expectation. When the hour arrived, J. B. Rice, then mayor, the general members of the Board of Public Works, the Common Council, and as many of the guests as could ride in the first train, were lowered into the shore shaft, where they entered the cars. The Mayor took the first car, and the other members of the party arranged themselves in the train, four persons occupying a car, one sitting in each corner. As the memorial stone was to be inserted upon the south side, the passengers were seated so as to face that point of the compass. The motive power of the train was a mule, which could be dimly discerned in the gloom ahead. When all was in order, the train started off through the tube-like passage, the mule cantering along at a rapid pace. At the distance of a mile and a half from shore, the exact point where the two tunneling parties met, the train stopped. The Mayor and members of the Board of Public Works left their seats and advanced to the spot. Mr. Kroschell, the city inspector, said :

"Mr. Mayor, and Members of the Common Council: You have arrived at the spot where the two ends of the work are to be closed up. It only remains for you, Mr. Mayor, to place the last stone in position in this work, and we are going to help you to do it."

Mayor Rice then came forward, and, amid the cheers of the guests, spoke as follows :

"Members of the Board of Public Works, of the Board of Aldermen, Gentlemen, Contractors, and Fellow Citizens: At the commencement of this important work, the Mayor of the city, being its chief officer, and supposed to represent the sentiments of all our citizens, was appointed to remove the first shovelful of earth, thereby introducing the work, and showing the world that the great undertaking should be done. Now that this portion of it is completed, I have the great pleasure and the honor, as Mayor of the city, in like capacity to put the last finishing stroke upon this work, which is intended, as I understand, to show the world that the citizens of Chicago, through me, give this great enterprise their approval."

His Honor then took the trowel and the stone, a perfectly white block of marble one foot long by six inches wide, inscribed with the words, "Closed December 6, 1866," and deposited the key-stone in its final resting place, remarking further, as he did so :

"Now, gentlemen, in behalf of the City of Chicago, I place the last stone in this great tunnel—the wonder of America and the world."

A number of pieces of American coins were deposited inside the stone by the guests, when the Mayor continued :

"Gentlemen, I announce to you all that the last stone in this great tunnel is laid, and that the work is completed."

It was now eleven o'clock, and the party, re-entering the cars, were soon at the crib shaft, appearing somewhat blinded by the light as they ascended from beneath the lake. The party who came by the tug were already there, and many were the congratulations exchanged. In a short time the second train from the shore arrived, and the passengers were also elevated to the large room in the crib. At this juncture the cannons boomed, being fired simultaneously from the crib and shore. Some little time was spent in examining the wonderful structure, and then the regular order of exercises proceeded. J. G. Gindele, then president of the Board of Public Works, addressed the visitors in a brief speech. In response, Mayor Rice said :

"Members of the Board of Public Works, Aldermen of the City of Chicago, and Fellow Citizens, one and all: The remarks last made by the President of the Board of Public Works render it unnecessary for the Mayor of Chicago to speak a word; but, as I am here, I would gladly testify with such weak words as I can use, my appreciation of the wonderful work of which I have seen the completion to-day; and with heartfelt joy I stand here among you to-day—this day of gladness,—made doubly glad by the genius of man. This great work is completed. We have seen it. It is now a means of furnishing every inhabitant of the city of Chicago with pure, sweet water; and a supply in excess of the demand, sufficient for a million of inhabitants more. All honor and thanks to the men who conceived, and to the men who executed this great work. And I would congratulate the citizens of Chicago, here, that they have the healthy winds of our boundless prairies, that they have the life sustaining bread of our perfectly cultivated fields, that they have the pure refreshing water of our mighty lake, all of which tend to make Chicago the most favored of cities. I do not intend to enter into statistics as to when the tunnel was commenced, how it has progressed, how difficulties have been met with at every turn, how these difficulties have been surmounted, how men doubted at its commencement, how these doubts are forever set at rest; but I will unite with you all in saying: Hail! Chicago, metropolis of the great West, vast in her resources, fortunate in her citizens, whose genius, industry and integrity secure to us the use of all those advantages and blessings which are vouchsafed to us by the Creator and Dispenser of all the things which we have."

Addresses were also made by Aldermen Holden and Clark, and D. D. Driscoll, the corporation attorney. Mr. Chesbrough likewise made a short speech, in which he claimed that great credit and praise were due Messrs. Dull & Gowan, the contractors, upon whom the responsibility of the work rested. After partaking of a fine collation, prepared in the kitchen of the crib, the party who came by the tug started for the shore, via the tunnel railroad, and the Mayor, aldermen, etc., took passage on the tug.

The total cost of the tunnel to the city was $464,866.05.

THE WATER WORKS.—The grounds upon which were erected the buildings of the water works of 1867, were bounded by Chicago Avenue, Pine and Pearson streets, and the lake.* They had a frontage of two hundred and eighteen feet on Pine Street, and extended from the lake westward a distance of five hundred and seventy-one feet. When, in 1863, it became evident that additional machinery would be required, in order to embrace the tunnel system, and otherwise extend the operations of the water works, it was found that the dimensions of the old building, pump-well and foundations would not admit of any such extension. Plans and specifications for a new engine, boiler, etc., were prepared early in 1864, and in July the contract was awarded to George W. Quintard, proprietor of the Morgan Iron Works, New York City. Various plans were suggested by which the new buildings required for the more extensive system could be erected, without disturbing the supply of water furnished the city by the old works. In pursuance of the plan finally adopted, the preliminary work of removing the north boiler and brick smoke-chimney, the wall of the main building, the boiler house and a portion of the water-tower of the old works, was commenced in March,

* Most of the facts in regard to the construction of the water-works buildings are from the official reports of Dewitt C. Cregier, engineer under E. S. Chesbrough.

CRIB BEING BUILT.

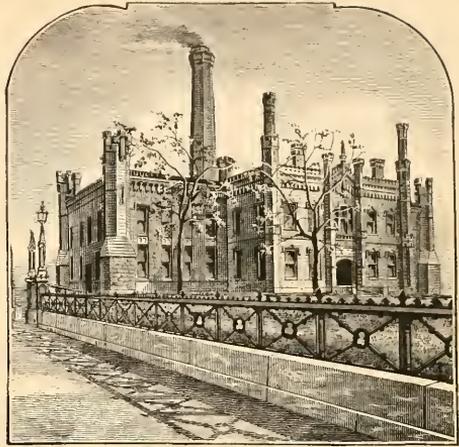

1866. Upon the site thus prepared a pump-well was sunk to the depth of twenty-one feet, being completed in March, 1867. The structure was located within a dozen feet of one of the engines then in use, and on account of the yielding nature of the soil, the work was proceeded with cautiously but successfully.

On March 25, 1867, water was first let into the tunnel. On that day the new water works were formally inaugurated by the laying of the corner-stone of a new tower, situated half a block west of the old one, and subsequently completed to a height of one hundred and thirty feet. Within this tower was to be constructed an iron column, three feet in internal diameter, to the top of which the water would be forced from the tunnel by the powerful machinery then being built. The water was thence forced by its own pressure through the mains, and to the tops of the highest buildings in the city. In consequence of the delay in completing the north wing of the main building, and the unfinished condition of the connection of the tunnel with the new pump-well, as well as the laying of the connecting mains between the engines and new water-tower, the engine was not used for some time after it was completed. On the 20th of July, 1867, the work alluded to had so far progressed as to admit water to the new pump-well, and the engines were put in operation.

The first stone for the engine foundations was set October 6, 1866, and the work completed during the following month. A new engine was now being built, in addition to the two then in use, it being constructed by George W. Quintard, proprietor of the Morgan Iron Works, New York City. The entire cost was $112,350. It was first brought into play in July, 1867, and had a capacity of eighteen million gallons daily.

In the fall of 1867, the city commenced to erect a machine shop for the manufacturing of hydrants, stop valves, and for doing other work connected with the water system. The building was completed in February, 1868. It was two stories high, built of brick.

During the early part of 1869, the building for the new pumping works, and the beautiful water-tower, were completed. The former was erected upon the site of the old works, and owing to the care necessary to guard against accident to the water supply, operations had naturally been conducted slowly. The style of architecture was castellated Gothic, with heavy battlemented corners, executed with solid rock-faced ashlar stone and cut-stone trimmings, all the details being of a massive and permanent character. The dimensions of the engine-room were one hundred and forty-two feet long, sixty feet wide, and thirty-six feet in the clear. The central portion of the main front was divided into two stories, the upper part being devoted to draughting rooms and sleeping apartments for the engineers. The lower part was divided by the main entrance. A large reception room, engineers' offices, etc., comprised the ground floor. The roof of the main building was constructed of massive timbers, covered with slate and pierced with the necessary ventilators. Midway between the floor and ceiling, and extending around the entire interior space of the building, was a handsome gallery, from which could be viewed the operations of the engines. Below the main floor of the principal building there was a space extending over the whole area, nine feet high, in which were located the pumps, delivery mains, etc., and from which the pump-wells, connected with the lake tunnel, descended. The boiler rooms were placed nineteen feet apart, and were situated in the rear of the main building. Between the boiler rooms was the smoke-stack, which rose to a height of one hundred and thirty feet from the ground

About one hundred feet to the west of the main building was the imposing water-tower. The exterior of the shaft was octagonal and rose one hundred and fifty-four feet from the ground to the top of the stone work, which terminate in a battlemented cornice. The whole was surmounted by an iron cupola, pierced with numerous windows, from which might be obtained a magnificent view of the lake, the city and surrounding country. The exterior of the tower was divided into five sections. The first section was forty feet square and surrounded the base of the shaft. The floor and roof of this portion was of massive stone, the latter forming a balcony. The bottom of the interior was hexagonal. Here the base-piece of the stand pipe (a casting weighing six tons) was placed, having six openings, supplying thirty-inch gates, to which the water mains were connected. From this base a thirty-six inch wrought iron stand-pipe ascended to a height of one hundred and thirty-eight feet. Around this pipe was an easy and substantial iron stairway, leading to the cupola on the top, and lighted throughout with alternating windows. The whole structure was looked upon as thoroughly fire-proof, being composed wholly of stone, brick and iron. Much credit was justly accorded to W. W. Boyington, the architect of the buildings, for the professional skill, taste and judgment displayed in the work entrusted to him.

The year 1869, then, marks the virtual establishment of the second system of Water Works, although it has since been extended to such magnificent proportions, to keep pace with the wonderful growth of the city, that the fine accomplishments of the past are lost sight of in the splendid achievements of the later period. Up to March 31, 1869, the cost of the water system, including all expenditures for works then in progress had been $3,146,383.14; this expenditure having been met by the issuing of over two million and a half in bonds, and by water rents. During the year 1868-69 thirty and a half miles of water pipe were laid, making over two hundred and eight miles then in use. Even then the extent of pipes laid exceeded that of any cities except New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. One important improvement suggested at this time, and subsequently carried out, in order to meet an insufficient supply of water, was an extension of the system of two-feet mains around the three divisions of the city, making, in fact, a continuous main of about thirteen miles in length.

In October, 1869, the plans and estimates for the establishment of the West-side water works, on the corner of Twenty-second Street and Ashland Avenue, were submitted to the City Council. But as they were not completed until six years thereafter, a history of this important extension of the water service must be deferred to the third volume.

During 1870-71, the tunnels under the canal and river at Division Street, and under the river at Chicago Avenue, and at Adams Street, to accommodate the water mains passing to the West Division of the city, at these points, and the tunnel under the South Fork of the South Branch at Archer Avenue, for the water main passing to the southwestern portion of the city, were all completed and put in use. The grounds at the water works were fenced and preparations made to beautify them. A fourth engine, constructed in Pittsburgh, of thirty-six million gallons daily capacity, was also in place at the works and nearly ready for use. It was designed to increase the combined capacity to seventy-one million gallons.

The great fire of 1871 swept away most of the buildings connected with the pumping works, damaging the machinery so badly that the water supply (and therefore all means of checking the conflagration) was cut off. The loss on buildings and machinery was about $75,000. The machine shop connected with the works, including much valuable machinery was almost a total loss, while the damage to the North and South Side reservoirs was some $20,000, and nearly three miles of water-service pipe were melted or otherwise injured. The total damage to the water works system was $248,010.

While the three engines were disabled, a partial supply of water was furnished some sections of the city by pumping into the pipes from the river, at different points, and by making connections with wells at the corner of Western and Chicago avenues, at Wahl's glue factory, at the Northwestern Distillery and at Lincoln Park. Many of the inhabitants living in the vicinity of Union and Jefferson parks obtained their supply from the artificial lakes, thus preventing much threatened distress. The damage to the engine house was repaired, the machine shop reconstructed upon the old foundation, and the engines so promptly put in working order that the one of 1867 was running October 17, 1871; that of 1857 on November 10, and that of 1853 on the 30th of November.

The following table shows the amount of assessments for the maintenance of the water system made by the Board of Public Works since it was created, in 1861, up to the time of the fire—the fiscal periods end with April 1 for the years specified:

RIVER, HARBOR AND MARINE.

HARBOR AND RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.—The location of the streets of the city, the course of the river and the condition of the sand-bars at the beginning of 1858, varied but little from descriptions given in the first volume of this history. The charts made between 1854 and 1858 by S. S. Greely show the former position of Fort Dearborn, the ancient river bed, the sand-bar at its mouth and the grounds and the buildings of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. The distance from the east line of Michigan Avenue, at Randolph Street, to the shore of Lake Michigan (according to the plat of the Fort Dearborn Addition to Chicago) is given at about seventy-five feet. The distance from the same point to the shore line, as laid down by Surveyor John Wall, in 1821, was one hundred and seventy-five feet, continuing northeasterly to a point at the intersection of St. Clair and Illinois streets. In 1836 the west line of the sand-bar was one hundred and fifty feet east of the line of 1821. In the map of 1858 a large area of "made land" is shown on the lake side of the sand-bar. West of "Slip A" was the Illinois Central freight house. Between this building and the old channel of the river was the Michigan Central freight house, and west of it was a second structure of a like character. South of the latter freight house was the passenger depot belonging to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, while, standing on the southeast corner of Michigan Avenue and River Street, was the old United States Marine Hospital, sold in 1864. Diagonally across from the Marine Hospital was the block house and two small buildings belonging to Fort Dearborn. The south building, or officers' quarters, stood on what is now River Street, nearly at the foot of Rush-street bridge; while the north building stood on land, which was subsequently excavated, and now forms the south channel at that point. The light-house stood on the river bank, just west of Rush-street bridge. The above particulars are given that the general reader may obtain an idea of the appearance of the harbor, the river's mouth, and the surrounding country in the year 1858.

The Government seemed still loath to recognize Chicago's importance as a commercial emporium, even by so much as making a modest appropriation by which her decaying harbor piers could be kept in repair. The city herself therefore took up the matter, trusting to the future for re-imbusement. In the fall of 1859 a small sum was raised by the Board of Trade to preserve a portion of the North Pier, which was fast rotting and falling into the lake. In 1861 and 1862 the repairs undertaken by the city were just sufficient to prevent the harbor improvements from becoming utterly useless, the municipal authorities and public-spirited citizens still hoping for justice, if not an outburst of generosity, from the General Government. As the city failed to obtain an appropriation from Congress, in 1863 she undertook the work of dredging the mouth of the river, in order to obtain a channel fourteen feet deep, between the north and the south piers, and across the bar. This effort to effect even a temporary improvement was quite abortive, and it was not until August, 1864, that the mouth of the river was relieved, to a marked extent, of its troublesome accumulations. Messrs. Fox & Howard, who had contracted with the city to do the work, had opened a passage which would admit craft drawing from twelve to twelve and a half feet of water. The channel was, however, too narrow, and vessels were in danger of being stranded during a high wind. During the years 1864-65 the channel was dredged through the bar to a depth of fourteen feet. The north pier was extended four hundred and fifty feet, at a cost, to the city, of $75,000.

At this time it was felt more keenly than ever that the outlay should be made by the United States Government rather than by the city, and it was hoped that whatever amount was expended would be refunded from the national treasury, especially as the work was being done under the direction of a United States engineer. A map of the harbor made during August, 1865, shows a channel of thirteen or fourteen feet deep at the mouth of the river, and a sand-bar covered by six feet of water for a distance of one thousand feet in a southerly direction, and having a width of one hundred and fifty feet, at a point twelve hundred feet from the North Pier. During this year the outer end of the pier work was completed, and the dock lines along the Chicago River and its branches were surveyed. The pier was further extended, the channel dredged, and Goose Island, at the confluence of the North and South branches was removed during 1865-66. A channel, fifty feet wide and ten feet deep below low water, was also made in the upper part of the South Branch. During the year ending August, 1866, the formation of another sand-bar across the entrance to the harbor was in its incipient stages, the water shoaling from three to six feet.

The General Government at last had become cognizant of the errors of the past, and made an appropriation of $88,000, which enabled the contractors to extend the pier six hundred feet further to the eastward. While Lieutenant-Colonel J. D. Graham was in charge of the harbor improvements, the War Department granted permission to the Chicago Dock and Canal Company to make an opening through the United States North Pier; so as to allow a communication between the harbor, and the ship-basins and canals, which that company had been authorized to build. In 1867, to provide for the required three hundred feet of opening in the pier, the United States commenced to extend the pier, beginning from a point three hundred feet from the shore terminus. The extension was therefore carried out nine hundred feet, to a depth of twenty-four feet of water. During the year ending June 30, 1868, the Chicago Dock and Canal Company, in conjunction with the United States Government, was feebly prosecuting the harbor improvements. Owing to the delay caused by the inclosing of the ship-basin by the Dock Company, the bar at the mouth of the harbor continually increased, and the United States engineer in charge of the works granted the contractors an extension of one year's time. The appropriation made in 1868 by Congress amounted to $35,000, followed by one of $29,700 in 1869. Early during the latter year the channel of the North Branch was dredged to a uniform depth of eleven and one-half feet. At this time the width of the river, at various points, was as follows: At Lake Street, 200 feet; Randolph, 170 feet; Washington, 165 feet; Madison, 155 feet; Monroe (North side), 163 feet; Monroe (South side), 133 feet; Adams, 127 feet; Jackson, 133 feet; Van Buren, 200 feet; Tyler, 130 feet; Harrison, 127 feet; Polk, 115 feet; Taylor, 130 feet; Twelfth (North side), 155 feet; Maxwell, 142 feet; Mitchell, 130 feet; Sixteenth, 143 feet; Seventeenth, 135 feet; Eighteenth, 118 feet. When the proposition was made to give the main river a uniform width of two hundred and fifty feet, and the branches a uniform width of two hundred feet, the measurements given above were ascertained. It was necessary to widen the main river only below Rush-street bridge.

In 1868, opposite Randolph and Monroe streets, in twelve-foot soundings, the bar had reached a width of 1,050 feet, while from the pier, southward, its length was 3,900 feet. The continued extension of the pier up to 1868 divided the sand current further east, and a new bar was then in process of formation in a southerly direction from the end of the pier, with its center six hundred and fifty feet distant. This new bar formed an angle of between sixty and seventy degrees with the old one, and in 1868 the water was shoaling near the pier, so that it was dangerous for vessels of heavy draught to attempt to enter without a tug-boat. Of the appropriations made by the General Government, during the previous three years, the sum of more than $66,000 was available in 1869. During the early part of this year the North Pier was fully completed. The greater portion of the six hundred feet of the South Pier was also completed in 1869. The total length of the Illinois Central breakwater was now nearly seventeen thousand feet, the water line of the crib works, south of Randolph Street, being six hundred feet east of the east side of Michigan Avenue. The area then enclosed amounted to about thirty-three acres, and upon a portion of that area the Illinois Central Railroad depot was built. It was during the season of 1869 that the land between the mouth of the river and Twelfth Street to the south, and Chicago Avenue to the north, was dredged away, and the channel also completed through the South Fork from the canal locks to the rolling mills. This year was one which proved great, not only in undertakings, but in accomplishments. Among other enterprises, the Chicago Canal & Dock Company inaugurated the system of outside docks, on the north side of the North Pier extension. During July and August, 1869, a survey of the harbor entrance and lake front was made, under the direction of Major Wheeler, who recommended an extension of the South Pier until it equalled the North, the building of a breakwater at right angles, extending four thousand feet in a southerly direction, and the connection of this breakwater to the shore by a pier. These improvements were to form an outer harbor, and relieve the overcrowded condition of the Chicago River. If future necessities required an enlargement of this basin, the breakwater could be extended. Major Wheeler estimated the cost of the improvements at $897,095.73. In January, 1870, the Board of United States Engineers, consisting of Colonel

THE MARINE.—The narrow muddy inlet called the Chicago River, has made Chicago one of the largest ports of entry in the United States. When the navigation of the great lakes was primarily instituted, it was the only place from St. Joseph River, in Michigan, to Milwaukee, a distance of more than two hundred and fifty miles, where a vessel could be loaded or unloaded or find shelter in a storm. It was the only accessible port, and hence destined to become the commercial center of the vast Northwest. The early growth of the marine is detailed in the first volume, and the improvements of the harbor are given elsewhere in the present volume. With those improvements, the shipping interests of Chicago continued to grow yearly, until, before the year 1871, there were annually entered at this port a greater number of vessels than at the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, San Francisco, Charleston and Mobile combined. And this, notwithstanding the fact that the harbor of Chicago is closed for at least three months of the year.

We here present some tables which illustrate the growth and vast extent of Chicago's lake commerce; and, although such details are necessarily unattractive, they will well repay a study by the admirer of historical statistics.

The lake tonnage enrolled at the port of Chicago in 1858 amounted to 8,151 tons in steam vessels and 58,771 tons in sail vessels. Estimating the value of the steam vessels, completed and rigged and equipped for active service, at $35 per ton, the value of these two classes of tonnage amounts to the sum of $2,383,025. In addition to these there was the canal tonnage, amounting to 152 canal boats of about 15,000 tons. Estimating the canal boats at $1,000 a piece, the value of the whole would be—

Lake tonnage.....	$2,383,025
Canal tonnage .....	152,000
	$2,535,025

The number of vessels owned in Chicago in 1858 was:

The arrivals and clearances at the port of Chicago for 1858 were:

Arrivals.....	6,882	Tonnage .....	1,644,060

The value of the lake commerce for 1858 was as follows:

Imports .....	$27,194,144 24
Exports .....	21,261,074 73
	$48,455,218 97

Some further statistics of receipts and shipments of the principal articles of commerce will be presented in the table for the year 1871. The figures for 1858 and 1871 we present as fully as they can be obtained, in order that the commerce of the first and last year, comprised within this volume, may be contrasted.

The following tables, obtained from the United States Custom House and from the Board of Trade of Chicago, show the constant and rapid growth of the lake commerce.

Owing to the destruction of records in the great fire, the arrivals and clearances for 1859, 1860, and 1861 are not obtainable. Those for the years here given present very compactly the increasing activity of the Chicago marine.

The following are the imports and exports, as exhibited by the records of the Custom House, for the years specified:

The number of vessels owned in Chicago in 1871 was as follows:

Steam .....	84	Tonnage.....	6,846.30
Sail .....	333	" .....	64,814.26
Canal boats.....	233	" .....	23,735.39

Estimating their value upon the same basis as those for 1858 are estimated—

The value of this tonnage would be.....	$3,775,351
Tonnage of 1858.....	2,535,025
Increase.....	$1,240,326

This indicates a growth of one-third in thirteen years; not at all comparable to the mighty extension of railroad transportation in the same time, but nevertheless a very constant and substantial growth.

Marine insurances are made from April to November, including both months.

THE SKJOLDMOEN.—On the 16th of July, 1863, one of the smallest crafts that ever crossed the Atlantic, the sloop "Skjoldmoen," commanded by Captain L. Wesenberg, arrived at the port of Chicago, from Bergen, Norway, which latter port she left on the 12th of April, arriving at Quebec on the 2d of July, and reaching Chicago on the afternoon of the 16th of July, occupying ninety-four days in the voyage. She had a rough and stormy passage, but made good sailing time. She was a vessel of 55 tons burden, sixty feet long and forty-eight feet keel, and was said to be the smallest vessel that ever crossed the Atlantic. She certainly was the smallest vessel that ever crossed the Atlantic and arrived safely at the port of Chicago. She brought to a Chicago firm a cargo of herrings, stock fish, anchovies, and Norwegian cod liver oil.

On the 31st of July following, she cleared this port for Christiania, Norway, with a cargo of flour, pork, hides, hams, tobacco and kerosene lamps. Although the freight was of this varied character, the amount of each was small.

SHIP BUILDING has never been an extensive industry in Chicago, for the reason that owing to the high prices of labor and materials vessels could be more cheaply built elsewhere. There have been, however, a number of ship-yards more or less flourishing, and some very fine vessels have been built. The following are among the prominent firms engaged in the business from 1858 to 1871: Akhurst & Douglas, Doolittle & Miller, Miller & Hood, Miller Brothers, J. W. Banta, Miller, Freder-ickson & Burns, Orville Olcott, Fox & Howard and O. B. Green.

* 155,000 hogs packed. At this time Chicago was first in beef packing and third in hogs. Cincinnati and Louisville respectively first and second.

The tug "George B. McClellan," named in honor of the future General, then the vice-president of the Illinois Central Railroad, was launched from the shipyard of Martin, Green & Co., June 20, 1860.

The "Union," the largest tug in the harbor except the "McQueen," was launched from the yard of Miller & Hood. She was built for Messrs. Redmond and John Prindiville, and blew up in 1862 in the lake near the entrance to the river, killing Thomas Daly, the captain, Thomas Boyd, the harbor master, and the fireman. Captain John Prindiville was on board of her but escaped unhurt. The tug "J. Prindiville," one of the largest and most powerful tugs afloat, was built at the yard of Miller & Hood for Captains John and Redmond Prindiville, Captain Joseph Nicholson, and Mr. John Ebbert, and launched May 8, 1862. She was commanded by Captain Nicholson, and was employed in towing vessels between Lakes Erie and Huron; and also in wrecking during the summer and in the fall in rendering assistance to vessels in distress near this port. The propeller "Lady Franklin" was built at the yard of J. W. Banta for J. T. & E. M. Edwards, and was launched March 11, 1861.

A complete list of the vessels built at our shipyards prior to the great fire is now unattainable, but since 1873 the Board of Trade reports contain a list of the vessels annually built and documented at the port of Chicago. They show an average of about twelve vessels of various classes. It is more than probable that the average for the years prior to 1871 was larger than this.

DISASTERS.—The perils of "those who go down to the sea in ships" are amply complemented by the perils of those who sail upon the waters of the great lakes. The long list of lake disasters tells a frightful story of hardship and danger and loss of life. Of vessels owned in Chicago alone, from fifteen to twenty are lost annually, with many lives.

We here give a brief account of some of the greatest of these disasters:

The propeller "Troy," commanded by Captain Byron, and owned in Chicago by A. H. Covert and John B. Warren, carrying a cargo of wheat to Buffalo, was wrecked on Saginaw Bay, Lake Huron, opposite Goderich, October 19, 1859. In a storm, a heavy sea struck her and broke in her gangway, and she foundered in a short time. The crew and passengers, including the wife of the captain, got safely off in the boats but all foundered in the heavy sea. No one was saved but two deck hands, who were swept across to Goderich on pieces of the wreck, and these made the shore.

THE LOSS OF THE LADY ELGIN.—The most terrible disaster that ever occurred on the great lakes was the loss of the steamer "Lady Elgin," on the 8th of September, 1860.

The "Lady Elgin," one of the largest vessels of her class, was a Canadian built boat and was launched in 1851. She was three hundred feet in length, of one thousand tons burden, and had a reputation for speed that made her a great favorite with the traveling public and excursion parties. Before the completion of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, she carried the Canadian mails along the lakes, but after the completion of that road she was sold to Gurdon S. Hubbard & Co., of Chicago, and employed by them in the Lake Superior and Michigan trade. She carried the mails, freight and passengers to points on the lakes between Chicago and Bayfield, Wis. The captain of the steamer was John Wilson, of Chicago, who commanded her from the time she changed ownership. He had an extensive experience in lake navigation, and was a popular and favorite master.

On Thursday the 6th of September, 1860, on her voyage from Milwaukee to Chicago, she took on board a large party of excursionists at the former place, who intended to make a trip to Chicago and return. Among them were some of the most prominent Irish citizens of Milwaukee, several public officers, and a large number of the members of the military companies of that city. On Friday, near midnight, the steamer left the Chicago dock for her northern destination, taking with her the Milwaukee excursionists and a number of other passengers. Including the crew, three hundred and ninety-three persons were on board when she started; as the vessel steamed swiftly northward, music and dancing ruled the hour, and all was mirth and gaiety in the salon cabins.

At two o'clock in the morning, the vessel was off Waukegan, about ten miles from shore, and the passengers were at the height of their merriment. Without, the night was threatening, rain was falling and the wind blew freshly from the north. Another vessel was also nearing the same point; it was the schooner "Augusta," laden with lumber and bound for Chicago, she sailing south by east under all sail, except the gaff top-sail, and was making eleven knots an hour. The steamer had all her lights set, the schooner had none. The watch of the schooner saw the lights of the steamer for at least half an hour as the vessels were rapidly rushing towards each other. The officers of the steamer were totally unconscious of the schooner's presence, for it could not be seen from the deck. For twenty minutes the captain and crew of the schooner actually gazed at the vessel they were about to run down without making one effort to avoid it. The rule of navigation was, that vessels going north should pass vessels steering south to the larboard side; but the captain of the "Augusta" seemed determined to pass the "Lady Elgin" on the starboard side, and with the full view of the steamer before him it was not until within three to five minutes of the collision that he ordered the helm "hard up." Whether the order was obeyed, or whether the vessel steered so badly that she would not answer her helm on such short notice, is uncertain, but her course remained unaltered, and coming straight on she struck the steamer on the larboard side, knocked a great hole in her, and then glided swiftly off into the darkness, five minutes after the collision being totally lost to sight. At this moment the wind grew into a gale and the waves commenced running high. The hole was below the water line, and, though everything was done by the captain that could be done, nothing could stop the rush of water into the hold. After the crash of the collision the music and dancing ceased of course, but though the lamps were extinguished by the concussion no cry nor shriek was heard. The women stood in the cabins, pale, motionless and silent. No sound was heard but the escaping steam, and the surging of the waves. As the vessel settled, the passengers mounted to the hurricane deck. There were several boats, but only a few succeeded in getting off in them without oars. There was an abundant supply of life-preservers, it is said, but no one seems to have thought of using them. Within a half hour after the collision, the engine fell through the bottom of the vessel, and the hull went down immediately after, leaving the hurricane deck, with its vast living freight, floating like a raft. A number of the passengers jumped from this, thinking it would sink. And now, drifting before the wind and tossed by the waves, the deck commenced to break up, and finally separated into five pieces, to each of which, half submerged, many of the passengers desperately clung, but many, as their strength gave out, sank amid the tossing waves. One portion of the deck, on which the captain was, held twenty-five persons. He was the only one who stirred from the recumbent position, which was necessary to keep a secure hold on the precarious support. He carried a child, which he found in the arms of an exhausted and submerged woman, to an elevated position of the raft, and left it in charge of another woman, but she could not long care for it and it was washed away. He constantly exhorted all to keep silent, and to refrain from moving, and thus save their strength. Clinging to their frail support in silent terror, day broke upon them and found them drifting southward, nearly off Winnetka. The lake seemed covered with floating pieces of the wreck, on many of which one or more persons were still desperately making a fight for life. Soon it became known on shore that a great vessel had been wrecked, and that hundreds of persons were still struggling in the water. Relief parties hurried to the scene from Evanston, from Winnetka and along the shore. At this point there is not much beach and the shore rises abruptly for more than one hundred feet. The surf ran high, but the bolder spirits of the relief parties, with ropes tied around them, dashed through the surf and rescued many who, nearly exhausted, came drifting near the shore. Among those who distinguished themselves in this way was Edward W. Spencer, now of Rock Island, Ill., but at that time a student in the Garrett Biblical Institute of Evanston. He saved some fifteen persons. The saving of John Eviston and wife of Milwaukee created great excitement. The gallant fellow was seen some distance out on the wheel-house, on which he firmly held his wife. As he reached the shore the surf capsized his raft, and for several seconds both were submerged. When they rose again to view, the wife was at some distance from the wheel-house, to which Mr. Eviston was still holding. Seeing his wife he swam out to her, and again succeeded in regaining the wheel-house with her. Again the rolling waves carried them toward the shore, and at last the wheel-house grounded. Taking his wife in his arms, the gallant fellow now attempted to wade to the land, but after a step or two sank exhausted in the water. At this moment he was caught by the brave Spencer, and they were safely brought to shore.

From the raft on which Captain Wilson was, not more than seven or eight persons were saved. It, too, capsized in the surf as it neared the shore, but a few regained their hold. The captain, who throughout had behaved with the greatest heroism, succeeded in getting one of the ladies back on it, but a great sea washed them off again, and both were drowned when within a few rods of the shore. Of the twenty-five persons on this portion of the deck when it broke up, eight only were saved. They had been in the water for more than ten hours. It was considerably past noon of that fatal 8th of September when the last struggling survivor was pulled ashore. Of the three hundred and ninety-three persons who had sailed the previous night, two hundred and ninety-seven were lost.

The "Augusta" was a schooner of three hundred and fifty tons burden, was owned by George W. Bissell, of Detroit, and commanded by Captain D. M. Malott, of the same city. After the disaster, her name was changed to "Colonel Cook." The community cast the blame for the catastrophe upon the captain of the schooner, but in the investigation that followed he was exonerated.

Among the lost were Colonel Lumsden, of the New Orleans Picayune, and his family, who were traveling in the north for pleasure. Another distinguished person was Herbert Ingram, an English gentleman, a member of Parliament, and proprietor of the London Illustrated News. He was traveling through the United States, with his son, a lad of fifteen years. His original plan was to cross the prairies of Illinois, and descend the Mississippi to New Orleans. Reaching Chicago, he concluded to first visit Lake Superior, and took passage on the "Lady Elgin" on her fatal voyage. His body was washed ashore near Winnetka on the afternoon of the 8th, just as one of his friends, from whom he had parted the night before, Mr. Hayward, of Chicago, reached the spot. It was supposed that life was not extinct, but all efforts at resuscitation failed. His remains were carried back to England.

It was many weeks before the lake gave up all the victims of this great calamity, but it is believed that all were ultimately recovered.

But the great mourning was in Milwaukee, some of whose best and most prominent citizens were lost. Of all the gay excursionists who had taken passage on the "Lady Elgin" two days before, only about seventy-five returned alive.

Captain Malott, with all hands, was lost in the wreck of the bark "Major," in Lake Michigan, two or three years after the "Lady Elgin" disaster.

Captain Wilson left a wife and two children, a son and daughter. His son was drowned at Cleveland a few years afterward, at the age of fifteen.

November 6, 1861, the propeller "Hunter," Captain Dickson, having been chartered for Buffalo went up the South Branch to the Union Elevator of Sturgis & Co. At three o'clock the next morning the hands came on board intoxicated, and went to the steerage. A moment later the watchman saw smoke coming from the hold near the stack. When the captain, clerk and some of the hands rushed on deck, they found that two of the deck hands who had gone below were not to be found. The flames spread so rapidly that these two could not escape, and were burned to death. The vessel was entirely destroyed, the loss being $40,000.

THE WRECK OF THE SUNBEAM.—The passenger steamer "Sunbeam" was built in the winter of 1862 by Albert E. Goodrich, of Chicago. She was about four hundred tons burden, was elegantly furnished, and was a great favorite with the traveling public. She was used in the lakes Michigan and Superior trade, but in the summer of 1863 plied between Superior City and Portage Lake. On her fourth trip, she left Superior City on Monday night, the 23d of August, 1863, and reached Ontonagon a little before noon on Thursday, where she remained until half-past six in the afternoon. When she started from Ontonagon the wind was blowing freshly from the north, and about ten o'clock grew to a gale. The steamer rode the storm successfully until morning, when she became unmanageable. Her machinery would not work, nor could anything be done with the sail. The crew consisted of twenty-one persons, and the passengers numbered five or six. They now took to the boats, except the pilot, Charles Frazer, who when the vessel careened was still in the pilot house. He got out, and as the vessel went down was left floating on a portion of the hurricane deck. A few moments after, as Frazer was floating on the waves, he saw both boats capsized. Frazer was on his raft from eight o'clock Friday morning until two o'clock Saturday afternoon, without any nourishment except a demijohn of port wine he had caught floating near him. He finally reached the shore, and was the only survivor of the wreck.

Among the lost was W. J. Isham, one of the editorial staff of the Chicago Times. Mr. Isham was the brother of the first wife of W. F. Storey, proprietor of the Times. At the time he took passage on the "Sunbeam" he was returning from his summer vacation. His body was never recovered.

THE BURNING OF THE SEA BIRD.—The "Sea Bird," Captain John Morrison, of Chicago, was a side-wheel steamer belonging to Albert E. Goodrich, afterward president of the Goodrich Transportation Company. She was of about five hundred tons burden, and was built at Marine City, on the St. Clair River, in 1861, for E. B. Ward, of Detroit, and was bought by Captain Goodrich. She was employed in the Lake Michigan trade, stopping at various points along the western shore of Lake Michigan from Chicago to Two Rivers.

In the spring of 1868 she made her first trip of the season, from Chicago to Two Rivers, in the first days of April, and on her return, when off Lake Forest, twenty miles north of Chicago, was totally consumed by fire, on the morning of the 9th of April. Of seventy persons on board at the time, including the crew and passengers, only three escaped.

How the fire originated was never known, but it was supposed to have been through the carelessness of one of the porters, who was observed by one of the survivors to throw a scuttle of coal and ashes overboard, and a very short time afterward the fire broke out in the aft part of the vessel, near the place where the porter had stowed. It was a little before seven o'clock in the morning when the fire was discovered, as the passengers were rising for breakfast. The steamer was immediately headed for shore, but the wind was blowing heavily from the northeast, and drove the flames forward, soon stopping the machinery. Rapidly the fire drove the passengers toward the bow, and then over it into the lake. No boats seem to have been lowered nor any effort made by the officers to save life. If there were life-preservers on board, and there presumably were, none were used. Panic seems to have seized officers, crew and passengers alike. Before noon the vessel was burned to the water's edge. The survivors were A. C. Chamberlin and Mr. Hennebury, of Sheboygan, Wis., and James H. Leonard, of Manitowoc.

LOSS OF THE IRON LIFE-BOAT LITTLE WESTERN.—In June, 1868, Captain James Garrett, Professor LeGendre, and Edward Chester, all of Chicago, completed the building of an iron life boat, in which they declared their intention to make a voyage from Chicago to Liverpool. The vessel was twenty feet long, two feet six inches breadth of beam, and length of keel eighteen feet. The cabin was six feet long and four feet six inches high, furnished with two bunks, underneath which were two tanks for fresh water. The keel was of wrought iron and weighed three hundred and fifty pounds. The center board was of boiler-plate iron and weighed two hundred pounds. The forecabin was water tight, and used as a store room. The cost computed was $1,500.

On Sunday morning, June 21, in the presence of a great crowd that lined the shore of the lake, the "Little Western" made what appeared to be a very successful trial trip, sailing from the North Pier out into the lake about six miles and return. The wind was high and the waves rolled quite heavily, but she answered every movement of her helm, and seemed to give great satisfaction to her owners.

In the afternoon another trip was made toward the Douglas monument. There were on board Captain Garrett, Professor LeGendre, Edward Chester, George Atkins, foreman of the Times newspaper, Henry Chisholm, a reporter of the Times, and a little boy. They left the North Pier at two o'clock, sailing southward. When off the Chicago University, the wind stiffened considerably, and it was thought advisable to stand on the other tack, and make for shore. After sailing shoreward about ten minutes, a sudden squall struck the boat and turned her completely over. Just before the squall struck her, all the passengers were on deck, except Mr. Chisholm, who had retired to the cabin and was reclining on one of the bunks. All were thrown into the water except Mr. Chisholm, but secured themselves on the vessel, which they attempted to right, in which effort they succeeded for a moment, but an adverse wind again striking her, she fell over again. An effort was made to rescue Mr. Chisholm from the cabin but it proved unsuccessful. The captain and Mr. Atkins clung to the mast, while the rest held on to the bottom of the vessel. Succor immediately put out from shore, and a tug also steamed to their help. When aid arrived, Captain Garrett was observed to become exhausted, and he died the moment he was hauled on board the tug. He and Mr. Chisholm were the only victims of the disaster.

THE WRECK OF THE ARROW.—On Tuesday the 16th day of November, 1869, one of the greatest storms of wind, rain and snow came down upon Lake Michigan, and the great lakes generally, that has ever been known. Hundreds of vessels were driven ashore and many lives were lost.

On Wednesday morning the schooner "Arrow," a vessel of two hundred and eighty tons, owned by Michael Brandt, of Chicago, was discovered wrecked off Grosse Point. The vessel was sunk, but the top of her cabin was out of the water, and on this the crew, consisting of eight persons, were discovered. The waves ran high, and no boat could be launched in such a surf as rolled up on the beach. Word was sent to Chicago, and a tug with a life-boat and volunteer crew hastened to the scene of the wreck, where they arrived Wednesday afternoon. The sea still ran high, but the life-boat was launched, and attempt made to reach the wreck. Scarcely had a half-dozen strokes been made before the boat was stove in, and the crew were thrown into the water. They reached the shore with great difficulty. No other boat could be procured, and nothing further could be done. Fires were built on the shore, to encourage the shipwrecked crew to believe that efforts would still be made, and the tug steamed back to Chicago for further aid.

Volunteers were now called for, and the following party was organized Thursday morning: Captain William Crawford, Captain Freer, Captain George C. Clark, Samuel Marshall, a mate, Mr. Evans, a pilot, and Thomas H. Iverson, a steward of the tug "G. W. Wood." A regular life-boat could not be obtained, but Captain Freer tendered the use of the yawl of the propeller "East Saginaw," and with this the adventurers steamed north, on the tug "G. W. Wood," and reached the place at eight o'clock in the evening. The storm had abated its force, through the waves were still running. The wrecked crew were observed to be still safe on the cabin of the schooner.

Launching the yawl in safety, with great difficulty

they got to the leeward side of the wreck. A line was cast on board, and soon every one of the almost perishing seamen were on board the yawl. The word was given, and the oarsmen were about to give way, when a huge wave raised the bow of the boat, tipped it over backward, and threw savers and saved into the water. The crew of the schooner, benumbed with cold and weakened by starvation, were incapable of making the least effort to save themselves, and sank like stones. Four of the yawl's crew, by great efforts, succeeded in getting on the wreck, thus finding themselves in the same position of the crew they had come to save. Marshall succeeded in getting on the capsized yawl, and finally drifted ashore. Iverson, who had shown great gallantry throughout the whole adventure, and who was a fearless swimmer, started to swim to the shore, but the undertow was too strong for him, and he was carried out into the lake and lost.

Those who were on the wreck were obliged to remain there throughout the night, but the next morning, the waves having abated, an old yawl was manned from the shore and the heroic party was saved. Their sufferings through the night had been terrible, but no permanent injury was received by any of them.

LOSSES OF VESSELS IN THE GREAT FIRE.—A number of vessels in the Chicago River, at the time of the fire, escaped by being towed up the North Branch, but the following were destroyed:

	Loss.

JOHN PRINDIVILLE.—There is no name better known or more highly esteemed on all our inland seas and among the old settlers of Chicago than that of Captain John Prindiville, familiarly called the "Storm King" in insurance, marine and yachting circles. He was born in Ireland in 1825, and at the age of eight came to America with his parents; who were in comfortable circumstances. His uncle was a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin. His father, Maurice Prindiville, was about to enter that university but, being of a roving disposition, left school and went to India, where he remained for several years. At the age of twenty-five he returned to Ireland, married, and determined to live quietly at home for the remainder of his life, but the old adventurous, roving spirit was not to be quenched, and he then concluded that America was the country wherein he should live. He accordingly came hither with his family. After their arrival, they remained in Buffalo for some time and afterwards lived in Detroit for about two years. Mr. Prindiville, having been educated to no trade or business, speedily got rid of the greater portion of the money he had brought with him from Ireland, and to retrieve his fortunes determined upon coming to Chicago, the then promised land, where he and his family arrived on August 23, 1836. John Prindiville commenced attending the public school on Kinzie Street, between Dearborn and Wolcott streets, then taught by Edward Murphy; it was afterward removed east on Kinzie Street, between Wolcott and Cass streets; his teachers being Messrs. Dunbar, Calvin DeWolf and A. G. Wilder. He also attended school in the room under the old St. James Church, on Cass Street, between Michigan and Illinois streets,—which was also taught by Mr. DeWolf,—finally terminating his educational course at St. Mary's College of this city. He commenced sailing on the lakes when quite young, advancing step by step, until he was promoted to the position of captain. He commanded the schooner "Liberty" in 1845 and, in the fall of 1850, the brigantine "Minnesota," the first American vessel ever allowed to go through the river St. Lawrence. She was loaded with copper ore at the Bruce Mines on Lake Huron, to be transported to Swansea in Wales. The position of commander of this vessel was considered, at that time a very important one, involving a larger amount of responsibility than would ordinarily be entrusted to one so young. Captain Prindiville continued sailing until 1855, but later, at intervals, commanded several steamers, the last of which was the "Adriatic," in 1872. He became connected with the insurance business in 1866. For many years he has represented the St. Paul Fire and Marine Insurance Company, of St. Paul, Minn., and the Continental, of New York. His continued and diversified experience has made him replete with valuable information, which he uses for the benefit of his clients. He has also a large vessel agency and is a prominent official of the Chicago Yacht Club. He was married in 1845 to Miss Margaret Kahlor who died in 1865 after a long and painful illness; they had a family of six children; three of whom are living. In 1868 he was married to Miss Margaret Prendergast, a native of Vermont; they have six children, all living.

JOHN B. WARREN, the son of Truman A. and Margaret (Bazine) Warren, was born at Mackinac, October 15, 1821. His father was a native of Vermont, his mother of French extraction. Young Warren spent his early days on the island, hunting, fishing, sailing, and obtained such schooling as the frontier afforded at that early day. His natural taste was for a sailor's life, which he met with the entire approval of his parents, when he was seventeen the young man took his own destiny in his hands, by saying good-bye to school one day without his parents' consent, and slyly going on board the schooner "Jacob Barker," then discharging at the pier. Unseen, the young fellow found a bunk forward under the windlass, and when the vessel got under way, at daylight the next morning, was roused out and assigned to duty as fore-castle boy, during the passage to Grand Haven. There he shipped on board the sloop "Kanger" as chief cook. This was in June, 1838, and from that time until 1867, nearly thirty years, he continued in various capacities to sail the great lakes. Having a special aptitude for the business, he rapidly advanced, soon becoming mate and then captain. The first vessel he commanded was the schooner "Crook," in 1842. In 1854, he became part owner of the propeller "Troy," but never had very good fortune with that ill-fated vessel. He commanded her from 1854 until 1858, in the trade between Chicago and Buffalo. In 1859, he gave up the command, and turned her over to Captain Byron, under whom she was lost in Saginaw Bay, as related in this chapter. Captain Warren commanded various other vessels in the Chicago, Grand Haven and Buffalo trade, until 1867, when he was appointed United States Inspector of Hulls at the port of Chicago, which position he still holds. He resided at Grand Haven until 1858, when he removed to Chicago. Captain Warren has been twice married—first at Grand Haven in 1848. His wife dying, he married a second time, in 1867. By the last marriage there have been two children, only one of whom, a son, is now living.

The following are sketches of a few of the typical mariners of the port of Chicago:

CAPTAIN JAMES L. HIGGIE was born in Fifeshire, Scotland, March 23, 1834, the son of John and Jane (Mitchell) Higgie. There were nine children in the family, and the parents died when the son of whom we write was only four years of age. Young Higgie came to the United States in 1847 and settled in Kenosha, Wis., and was educated at Racine and Kenosha in the common schools. He worked in the country about two miles from Kenosha in the summer, and attended school in the winter. In the spring of 1848 he shipped aboard the schooner "Mary Ann Leonard" as cook, returning to Kenosha in the winter. He spent two years of his life as cook, part of the time on the "L. C. Erwin." In 1850 he went before the mast on the "Erwin," and during the next year he was captain and sailed her two years; then he went as captain of the schooner "Whirlwind," sailing her for two years. In 1855 he sailed the schooner "William Jones," and remained on her until 1856. In 1857 he bought the schooner "Pilgrim," paying $1,000 cash and earning the balance out of the vessel. He was her captain seven years. In 1863 he came to Chicago, and during 1864 remained on shore, and engaged in the commission business, forming a partnership with Mr. Halsted, the firm being Higgie & Halsted. During his partnership, in 1865, he purchased the barque "William Sturges." In 1866 the partnership was dissolved and he retired from the firm in order to give his undivided attention to his personal affairs, intending, as he did, to increase the number of his vessels. In 1867 he purchased the schooner "William Shook," making three vessels sailing in his interest. In 1868 he purchased the schooner "City of Chicago," and in 1869 he lost the "William Shook" on Lake Huron and sold the schooner "Pilgrim." In 1870 he purchased the schooner "John Miner." The year of 1871 was an eventful one to those having marine interests, for it was this year that the tug owners raised the tariff so high as to almost prohibit business, in consequence of which the vessel owners combined, raising a capital stock company called the Vessel Owners' Towing Company, electing Captain Higgie president, after which he went to Buffalo and contracted for five new tugs and then returned to Chicago. When the tugs were ready to deliver to the company he again went to Buffalo and equipped them, and they arrived in Chicago about one month prior to the great fire of 1871, since which time the company have added six tugs, making eleven in their service. Captain Higgie has continued as president of the Vessel Owners' Towing Company since its organization, and has continued also to operate vessels of his own, and has handled a large quantity of real estate in the meantime. The first boat under his command was the "Lewis C. Erwin," and the last that he sailed was the "Pilgrim," in 1863. Captain Higgie was married in Racine, Wis., in 1867, to Miss Mary J. Kirkham, and they have seven children living—James L., Mary L., Noble K., Arthur M., Archie, Imogene and George K. James L. Higgie is one of the prominent men who is closely identified with marine matters in Chicago, and his name is familiarly known over the whole extent of the lakes, and is a synonym for honorable dealing and commercial equity. During his thirty years' of active life, Captain Higgie has made a multitude of close and earnest friends, whose number is increased each day of his life. He has been a Mason since 1862, and is a member of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, A. F. & A. M., of Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M., and of Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T.

CAPTAIN CHARLES J. MAGILL, now the oldest vessel agent in Chicago, is a native of Placentia, Newfoundland, where he was born October 29, 1818. At the age of thirteen years he went to sea, and followed a seafaring life thereafter for eleven years, being commander of a vessel during one year of his service. In 1842, he left sailing on the ocean, and in July of that year, went to Buffalo, N. Y., and commenced sailing upon the great lakes. He first made the port of Chicago in August, 1842, and took up his place of residence here in 1853. He was in command of lake vessels several years, but on settling in Chicago, gave up the hazardous business which he had followed for twenty-two years. In April, 1855, he became a member of the Board of Trade, and engaged in the lake transportation business. He was, in 1853-54, agent of the New York and Lake Erie line, and, in 1855, became the general western agent of the Collingwood line of steamers. Ever since his arrival in Chicago he has followed the vessel and transportation business, acting as agent for the chartering of vessels and steamships seeking freight in this port. His high standing and popularity as a business man are evinced by his being chosen to serve on the Board of Trade Committee of Appeals, the duties of which require integrity and business acumen of the highest order. He was married in September, 1846, at Guilford, New Haven Co., Conn., to Miss Esther Chalker. Mr. and Mrs. Magill have eight children, five sons and three daughters.

CAPTAIN BENJAMIN F. DAVISON, deceased, was born in Norwich, Chenango Co., N. Y., May 3, 1810. In 1831 he went as deck hand on a steamer. In 1832 he was employed on the schooner "Detroit." He was married in 1839 at Buffalo, N. Y., to Miss Armenia Phelps Sawyer, who died in 1851. In 1839, he sailed the "John C. Spencer" from Chicago to Buffalo, and in the fall he sailed and owned the schooner "Edwin Jenney," which was wrecked in the fall of 1845, when he was badly frozen. From 1846 to 1854 he was with Fox & Bruce, engaged in fitting out vessels and in wrecking. In 1852 he superintended the building of the steamer "Golden Gate," of Buffalo, and in 1853 sailed the steamer "Charter." In 1852 he married, at Buffalo, Miss Sarah Thorne, and in 1854 was sent to Chicago by the underwriters to perform the duties of marine inspector, during which time he entered into partnership in the ship-chandlery business, associating with him Levi J. Colburn, which partnership continued until 1866, when Mr. Colburn retired, and Captain Davison associated with him his two sons, Benjamin F. jr. and Edwin C. Davison; which firm remained until 1871, and was then dissolved by the great fire. In 1872 he formed a partnership with John F. McCormick, and they remained together until October, 1876, when the store was destroyed by fire. In the spring of 1877, Captain Davison was taken sick, and died May 1, of the same year, leaving a wife and three sons; Edwin C. and Benjamin F. jr., by the first wife, and John L. T. by the second. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity for many years, having joined in Buffalo, and affiliated with Cleveland Lodge, No. 211, A. F. & A. M., of this city.

BENJAMIN F. DAVISON, JR., son of Captain Benjamin F. Davison, was born in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1842. He came to Chicago in 1854 and was employed with his father, assisting him in inspecting vessels, until 1857. He then engaged with Sanford Hall & Co., agents of the People's Line of propellers, remaining with them until 1860. He was for two years as office-clerk, and was check clerk during the balance of the time. In 1862 he enlisted in the army, going in the Marine Artillery Battery, and was afterward transferred to Co. "G," 36th New York Artillery. He returned to Chicago in 1863, and, in 1864, entered the service of Colburn & Davison, ship chandlers, being their bookkeeper for three years. In 1867 he was employed by Jesse Cox, collecting tug boat bills. In the same year he went into partnership with his father under the style of B. F. Davison & Sons, remaining until the fire of 1871. From 1872 to 1873 he was employed as a tug boat collector; he then went into vessel brokerage and insurance business, and formed a partnership with Mr. Holmes, the firm being Davison & Holmes. He was married December, 1866, in Chicago, to Miss Martha Simpson, and has two children, Benjamin F. and William Simpson Davison. He is a member of Covenant Lodge No. 526, A. F. & A. M.; of Corinthian Chapter, No. 69, R. A. M.; and of Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T. He is also a member of Post 23, G. A. R., and of Chicago Lodge, No. 91, A. O. U. W.

CAPTAIN JOSEPH WILSON was born in Cork, Ireland, in the year 1834, and lived with his parents and attended school until he was about eleven years of age; when, like so many boys, he longed for a seaman's life and ran away and went into the English Navy, where he served two years as naval apprentice on the school ship "Crocodile"; then going on the brig "Dolphin" in search of slavers, remaining on her for eighteen months, when he was transferred to the frigate "Indefatigable," the first fifty-gun ship the English Navy ever built, and remained there during the balance of his time. He then returned to England and, after being paid off, joined the steamship "Hague," cruising in the English channel; after being about two weeks on board, he ran away and joined an English barque "Orromocto," a merchant ship from St. John's, N. B., going from there to Wales and arriving in New Orleans in 1850. He left her at that city and joined the American ship "Old England," of Bath, sailing from New Orleans to Havre, France, in which vessel he made two voyages; he then shipped aboard the American ship, "Trenton of Bath," in the fall of 1851, being second mate the first two years, and the last year being promoted to mate. In 1854 he left the ocean and came directly to Chicago, landing in May, and in a few days after his arrival, he shipped before the mast on schooner "A. G. Gray," but remained only a short time; then shipped on the barque "Ocean Wave," for Grand Traverse Bay, leaving her there with several of the crew, on account of having to do Sunday work. He then worked his way to Grand River on a propeller, and came back to Chicago on the schooner "Mary," of which boat he was soon made mate, and, after serving as mate two months, was made captain and sailed her for two years. In 1857 he went to New Orleans and shipped again on the "Trenton," on the ocean, and was eighteen months aboard her, coming back to Chicago in 1859. For a short time he sailed the schooner "Storm" on the lakes, and in the fall shipped as second mate of barque "Major Anderson." In 1861 he was second mate of barque "American Union," going as mate in brig "Pilgrim," in 1862, and, in 1863, as mate on the barque "Nucleus" for a season. In 1864 he sailed the brig "Montezuma," continuing on her one year, when for nearly three years after he was captain of the "John F. Warner." For the next five years he was captain of the "Two Fannies" and two years on the "City of Milwaukee," that foundered on Lake Huron in two hundred and forty feet of water, going down a total wreck; all hands were saved, however, by the schooner "Mary L. Higgins" about three hours after. He then returned to Chicago and sailed the "Two Fannies" another year, going as mate the next season, and as master for two years after on the "Lizzie Law," when he changed to the "Ellen Spry," which he sailed up to the spring of 1884, remaining on shore during the remainder of that year in the employ of Miller Brothers. Captain Wilson was married in Chicago in 1862, to Miss Thillie Polson.

CAPTAIN JOHN A. CRAWFORD is a native of New York State and was born in Cohoes, Albany County, in 1830. His father, James Crawford, was killed in Lockport, N. Y., in 1840, in widening the canal in that place. After his father's death, John went to West Troy, N. Y., with his mother, where he lived two years, and when twelve years old went to work for a farmer in Watervliet, working for two years for his board and clothes; he then went to West Troy and commenced work in Roy's boot factory, remaining there for six months, and then shipped as cook on the sloop "Clinton," getting $4.00 a month, remaining on her until he became her commander. During the winter of 1845, and until 1847, he worked for the Government at the arsenal at Watervliet, N. Y., making ammunition; and in the spring of 1847 he was seriously injured by an explosion. After his recovery he shipped on the sloop "Mechanic," afterward going on board the "Highlander," buying a half interest in her. In the winter of 1848, and for two years following, he was on the ocean, aboard the "John Silliman," which was commanded by Captain Ross, who had his wife and sister-in-law with him. It was there that Captain Crawford obtained his knowledge of books, and it was through the kindness of Captain Ross's wife and sister that he had the opportunity; they manifesting an interest in their student. In 1852 he commenced steamboating on the Hudson River, and went on board the "Washington Hunt" as pilot, and, in 1853, served as pilot of the steamer "John S. Ide," occupying the same position the next year on the steamer "Annie," one of the "Swift-shore Line," and, in 1855, went as mate on the tug-boat "Commerce," belonging to the same line. Sailing until the winter, he went to Philadelphia at the request of some friends, and superintended the building of a tug, preparatory to coming to Chicago. His uncle made him a one-third owner, and he sailed from Philadelphia on the new tug called the "Andrew Foster" in April, arriving in Chicago June 10, 1856. On his arrival at Chicago he at once commenced towing vessels. That year was a prosperous one for shipping agents, vessels getting twenty-five cents a bushel for carrying grain to Buffalo and New York. In 1856 he went to Two Rivers for the purpose of towing down two canal boats, but soon after starting on the return trip, the wind rose from the southeast and he was obliged to make a harbor, putting in to Manitowoc, where he arrived in safety through the assistance of the captain of the "Gertrude." This was said to be the first steamboat ever inside that harbor, at that time. In 1857 the panic began, and, during that year and a part of 1858, the shipping interests were severe sufferers, as many as fifty vessels lying in port during the entire season. April 1, 1857, was the date of the severest gale in this locality, in the memory of Captain Crawford; the brig "David Smart" foundering outside the North Pier while anchored, and, with one exception, all hands on board were lost. A volunteer crew, which started to the rescue, were capsized and lost. From 1856 to 1863 he was continuously in service on the lakes in the tug service, and on the close of the season of 1862 gave up his position on the "Foster" to take charge of a large wrecking tug, the "George W. Wood." Since 1863 he has been interested in a tug line, and during the first season built the tug "Crawford," whose boiler exploded about two weeks after, in Chicago harbor, killing all the hands but one. Captain Crawford was married to Mrs. Kate Vance, a widow, daughter of Captain John McFadden. Three children are living, Samuel A., Jane Belle, and the younger, a girl, who, through her own persistence, was christened "John" Ellen, and who is regularly called by that name.

CAPTAIN IRA H. OWEN, one of the early citizens of Ohio, was born in Conneaut, in that State, in 1823, at which place he remained until 1837, when he shipped on the schooner "Savannah," commencing in the capacity of cook the first year; the following three years he went before the mast, and at the end of that time he was promoted mate of the "Alps," where he remained for about two years; and continued as mate of different vessels until 1845. He was part owner of the "Wm. L. Marcy," which was lost in November, 1844, when all hands on board went down, Captain Joseph Perry having command of the vessel during the absence of Captain Owen, which was caused by sickness. When able for duty again, he sailed the schooner "General Harrison," plying between Chicago and St. Joseph, Mich., carrying stone to build the pier at the latter place. He spent about a year in travel, and went into business at Sault Ste. Marie, and in 1847 was mate of the steamer "Sam Ward," E. B. Ward, commander. From 1848 to 1852 he was mate, and afterward captain of the propeller "Pocahontas," and was mate and master of the propeller "Mayflower" for two seasons, and then master of the "M. D. Spaulding," the "Buffalo," the "Evergreen City," and the "Fountain City," leaving the lakes in 1860 on account of sickness. In 1867 he built the steam barge "St. Clair," in which he carried lumber east from different points, receiving therefor the liberal remuneration of $8 per thousand. From 1870 to 1875 he was in the ore trade, and, during that time, built the tow-barges "Agnes L. Potter" and "Jessie Lynn," the steam-barges "S. C. Baldwin" and "Ira H. Owen," these boats belonging to the Escanaba and Lake Michigan Transportation Company. The boats were sold to the Inter-Ocean Transportation Company, leaving the charters intact; the Escanaba Company bought the propellers "Inter-Ocean" and her consort, the "Argonaut," Captain Owen being then elected treasurer, in which office he has remained from 1877. The company has since transformed the "Argonaut" into a steamer, and has built the steamer "Escanaba," of about 1,000 tons, and the "Rhoda Emily," of about 500 tons, having in all four steamers. Captain Owen is at present interested in and president of the Delta Transportation Company and the Escanaba Towing and Wrecking Company, the first company owning the steamers "Minnie M." and "Lady Washington," and the latter company the tugs "Owen" and "Delta." The Escanaba Company being chartered under the laws of Michigan, was made plaintiff in the celebrated case contesting the rights of the city to close the bridges, and, after a desperate contest, was defeated. Captain Owen first landed in Chicago in 1839, and came here permanently in the spring of 1871, just previous to the great fire. He married Miss Electa Bunker, of Cleveland, Ohio, in 1847, and has two sons living, named William R. and Ira D. Although advanced in years, he bears his age gracefully, and carefully attends to the details of his business, being promptly identified with the shipping interests of this port, and having perhaps as extensive an acquaintance among marine men as any one living here at this time.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM WALSH was born near New Ross, County Wexford, Ireland, in 1829. He graduated at the public schools at the age of thirteen, and then took a commercial course of six months. He afterwards studied navigation, and, in 1843, shipped as cabin-boy from New Ross on the schooner "Victoria of Wexford," going to ports in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, and the Baltic and Black seas. In March, 1844, he bound himself as apprentice to Mr. Howlett of New Ross, who had several vessels trading in different parts of the world. He first joined an expedition for the release of the barque "Clarinda," on shore at the Isle of Skye, Scotland, loaded with deals from Nova Scotia. She was taken off the beach and towed to Dublin, Ireland, where she underwent repairs, was fitted out, and sailed for St. John's, N.B., about November 1, 1844; and after several attempts abandoned her voyage and put in at Newport, Wales, where she was loaded with coals for Wexford, Ireland, and was finally driven by contrary winds to Liverpool, where she was sold. He was then transferred to the barque "John Bell," owned by the same proprietors, and sailed to Baltimore, Md., from whence he returned on the "John Bell" to Waterford, where he arrived safely, and again sailed for Quebec, Canada, and on return trip brought a load of square timber for Cardiff, Wales. He shipped next on the barque "William Stewart Hamilton," in January, 1846, loaded at Liverpool with a cargo of general merchandise for Calcutta, and returned to London in 1847. He next joined the ship "Margaret Pemberton," same line, sailing from London, England for New Ross, to take a load of passengers to Quebec, Canada. Owing to the prevalence of ship fever at Quebec, nearly half the list of passengers died, either from ship-cholera or ship-fever. Captain Walsh was taken down with the disease on his arrival, and sent to the Marine Hospital, where he recovered, and finding that his ship had sailed, he shipped aboard a new vessel named the "Plantagenet" for Liverpool, and found the "Margaret Pemberton" fitting out for New Orleans. He joined the "Pemberton" and sailed in her about October, 1847. She was dis-masted during the trip, about four hundred miles southwest of Cape Clear, and put into Milford Haven, Wales, and repaired. He accompanied the vessel to Cardiff. She abandoned the trip first contemplated and loaded with coal and merchandise at that place for Valparaiso, S.A. They encountered a gale of wind in the Bay of Biscay, which caused the "Pemberton" to spring a leak, and they put in to the Island of Tenerife, where, on account of lack of place to repair, they lay nearly five months, and the vessel and cargo were condemned and sold. He sailed on a Spanish brig to New Ross, via London, and again joined the barque "William S. Hamilton," going to Quebec, loaded with passengers and returning with timber, and February 1, 1848, his apprenticeship ended. He then shipped on the brig "George Ramsey" in the coasting trade, took a load of passengers to Quebec, Canada, and on May 1, the vessel was sold. He worked towing timber until September, and joined an English ship, for Cork, Ireland. He then went to Liverpool and shipped on the "Scotland" of Belfast, and sailed for Mobile, Ala. In 1850 he loaded with cotton for Liverpool, and arrived in July of the same year. He next shipped on the barque "Unknown" for Nova Scotia, where she loaded with deals for Liverpool. He joined a brig at Liverpool, in the coasting trade between that point, Cardiff and Waterford. He shipped on the barque "John Bell," in 1851, with passengers for Quebec, Canada, where he left her, and engaged again in towing timber. In November of the same year he shipped on the "Julia," bound for Liverpool, and on arriving there shipped aboard the "James Wright" bringing passengers to New York City. He joined a barque there, bound for Savannah, Ga., and afterward made another voyage from New York City to Charleston, S.C. and back, where he joined the steamship "Lady Franklin" as quartermaster, bound for Havre, France. He remained with her until fall, and shipped for Mobile, Ala., on the "Moses Taylor." He then went steambating on the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers, where he remained until the spring of 1853, when he shipped for Philadelphia, going to New York City by rail; at which time he married. He afterward joined a packet at Portland, trading between Philadelphia and eastern ports, and in the fall joined a steamboat as wheelsman, going to New Orleans. Leaving her there he went to Mobile, Ala., and was employed in a cotton yard that winter, going to Boston on a Providence boat, and by rail to New York City, where he was engaged in rigging work until 1855, when he embarked in the grocery business. He sold out his business at a loss and went to Buffalo, N.Y., and at that port shipped on the barque "John Sweeney," then considered a large vessel, loaded with coal for Chicago, landing here in May, 1855. He then joined the schooner "Ashtabula," and finally, in September, came to Chicago permanently. He next sailed in the schooner "Palmetto" as mate, and in the winter went again to Mobile, Ala., coming back in the spring. He afterward was mate on the schooner "E. G. Gray," then made a trip in the barque "Cherubusco," another in the "Pilgrim," and spent the next winter in Mobile, Ala.; remaining South, going to Cuba, and returning to Chicago in 1858. He was mate of the schooner "Abigail," and became master of the "H. N. Gates" and sailed her the season of 1859 on the lakes. He bought one-third interest in the schooner "Barney Eaton" in 1860, and sailed her until 1862, when he sold his interest and bought the scow "Union" and sailed her during 1862; sold her, and bought the schooner "Falcon" in the spring of 1863, and afterward the schooner "Peoria"; and in the years of 1865-66 remained ashore looking after his vessel interest. He sailed the schooner "Peoria" during the season from 1867 to 1871, and sold her in 1872, and he afterward bought the schooner "Albrecht" and sailed her until 1879, when he sold her to Hackley & McGordon, taking the tug "J. H. Hackley." He later took an interest in two vessels with the Ford River Lumber Company, and superintended them, carrying lumber from their mills at Ford River to Chicago. He superintended the building of the schooners "Ford River" and "Resumption," at Wolf & Davidson's ship-yard at Milwaukee, Wis., in 1870-80. He sailed the "Ford River" the season of 1880, and gave up sailing in the spring of 1881. He bought a half-interest in a new tug, building at Wolf & Davidson's yard, fitted her out and brought her to Chicago. She was named after W. H. Wolf her builder, and is running on the Chicago River under his control. He still holds an interest in the schooners "Resumption" and "Ford River" and the tug "Hackley." Captain Walsh was married in New York City April 23, 1853, to Miss Mary Barron, a native of County Wexford, Ireland; they have a family of four sons and four daughters now living.

WILLIAM HARMAN, THE FIRST SHIPSMITH to establish himself in Chicago, was born in Hull, Yorkshire, England, in September, 1804. After learning his trade he went to Paris, France, where for six years he was employed in the Charronton Iron Works. While a resident of the capital, in 1824, he married Phoebe Spencer, an old acquaintance and also a native of Hull. In 1830 Mr. Harman emigrated to America and, settling in New York City, worked at the West Point Foundry for a number of years, but, on account of his wife's health, decided to come West. Arriving at Chicago, in June, 1835, he started his shop in which were manufactured heavy forgings for vessels. He continued in this business until the spring of 1853, when he removed to Oregon and for twenty-three years resided at the Dalles, Portland, being a great portion of this period foreman of the shops of the Oregon Steamship Navigation Company. He has paid Chicago several visits and at this time (June, 1883) is with his son (William Harman, of the Union Tug Line), but is making preparations to return to Oregon and active work. Mr. Harman is still hale and hearty. In 1840 he was a convert to the Washingtonian temperance movement, and for the past forty-five years has been an ardent advocate of the principles to which he then subscribed.

WILLIAM HARMAN, JR., was born in New York City, in March, 1834, coming to Chicago, as an infant, in June of the next year. He served his time, as an apprentice, with Philetus W. Gates, who then, in partnership with Hiram H. Scoville, and afterward with A. H. Hoge, ran a foundry and machine shop on the corner of Washington and West Water streets. From 1850 to 1858 he remained in Mr. Gates's employ, and subsequently became chief engineer on the Prindiville & Sturges line of tugs. When Captain Prindiville sold out in 1863, Mr. Harman bought the "Sturges" and "Rumsey," but a few days thereafter they were seized by the United States Government for service on the Mississippi River. The "Sturges" exploded in running the Vicksburg blockade, and the "Rumsey" is said to be still in service at Memphis, Tenn. Mr. Harman has been engaged in the business ever since, owing at the present time four of the nine tugs which compose the Union Line. He was married August 1, 1860, to Miss Nora Everett, of Chicago. They have had twelve children, six of whom are living, four boys and two girls. Mr. Harman's eldest son is associated with him in the tug business.

In connection with the marine interests of this city, it is proper to make mention of the transportation companies which have done so much toward amplifying Chicago's commercial and maritime relations. The most prominent, as well as among the oldest of these, is probably that of Captain A. E. Goodrich. Another firm, however, which is well and thoroughly known, is that of Leopold & Austrian, commission and transportation agents, which was established originally in 1847, at Eagle River, Mich., under the style of Leopold Bros. & Co., general merchants, the firm being composed at that time of Samuel F., Aaron F. and Henry F. Leopold, and Joseph Austrian. They built up an extensive trade in that region, and were largely engaged in handling copper ore and other products from the mines. About 1864, Samuel F. Leopold and Joseph Austrian came to Chicago, and established the house here under the style of Leopold & Austrian, the present title, with a branch house at Milwaukee conducted by Aaron F. Leopold. Henry Leopold retired from the concern in 1875, and Aaron Leopold in January, 1885, the business being now carried on by Samuel F. Leopold and Joseph Austrian. They do a very large commission business in grain, produce and copper, and are also agents of the Lake Michigan and Lake Superior Transportation Company. Both partners have been members of the Board of Trade for the past fifteen years.

SAMUEL F. LEOPOLD, of the firm of Leopold & Austrian, was born in the Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany, in 1825, and was educated at his home, attending the high school, and finishing his studies by acquiring a knowledge of the French language. At the close of his school days he went into the employment of a leading dry goods house, where he remained from the age of fifteen to twenty-one. In 1846 he concluded to come to America, and during that year arrived at Mackinaw, Mich., where his brother Louis was then in the business of general merchandising. He at once went into his brother's employ, and was with him for several years. He next went to Green Bay, Wis., opened a general store, in company with his brother Henry, and remained there until 1851, after which he concluded to try the Lake Superior region, and went into the mining supply trade, there being at that time but two prominent mines on the lake—the "Cliff" mine at Eagle River, and the "Minnesota" at Rockland, a small place near Ontonagon. His intuition and business sagacity led him to believe that this was to become a great mining region, and to supply those mines would be a trade well worth looking after. He accordingly commenced that business in a small way, with his brothers Henry and Aaron, and was joined the second year by Joseph Austrian, under the firm name of Leopold Bros. & Co., after which, with increased capital and facilities, they extended their business, opening a new store at Eagle Harbor, which was managed by his brother, and one at Hancock, which was the first store building in that place. By perseverance and industry he was enabled to see the business increase, and he, in 1867, came to Chicago and joined his brother here. One item will show the business methods of the Leopold Brothers. The copper ore was sent to Boston and New York, there smelted, and after being manufactured into wares a large portion of it was returned to Chicago. He made up his mind that Chicago was the place to ship to direct, and that it was entirely unnecessary to send the copper east. He at once commenced the trade here, and it is largely due to his determination and that of his partner, Joseph Austrian, that the West was so readily supplied, and through them were saved large sums, especially in transportation, for it was soon discovered that the price of copper was the same here as in New York. Mr. Leopold was early identified with the People's Line of Transportation, carrying passengers and freight to and from the Lake Superior region. The interests of this line were constantly increased, and it was finally merged into the Lake Michigan and Lake Superior Transportation Company in 1879, when this organization was perfected, and regularly chartered by the State of Illinois. At the first election of officers Mr. Leopold was made president, and at each succeeding election has been re-elected, which position he holds at present. After remaining in America ten years he returned to Germany, and at Stuttgart, in 1856, married Miss Babetta Goodman. He has six children living—Helen, Nathan, Alfred, Rachael, Hulda and Celia.

JOSEPH AUSTRIAN, a member of the well known firm of Leopold & Austrian, and general manager of the Lake Michigan and Lake Superior Transportation Company, is the son of Abram I. and Maria Austrian, of Witzelshofen, Bavaria, Germany, and was born September 15, 1833. He received a liberal education in the public schools of his native city, and, after completing special studies under private instruction, he assisted his father in agricultural pursuits until he was seventeen years of age. After a year's stay with relatives at Feuchtwangien, he concluded to try his fortunes in the New World. Accompanied by his sister, Ida, he embarked on the sailing vessel "Robert Kelly," and after a perilous voyage of nearly a month's duration, he arrived at New York. Leaving his sister in care of an uncle, he immediately departed for Mackinaw, Mich., where he had relatives. Upon reaching Detroit he found, to his consternation, that navigation to his destination had closed for the season, and that he would be compelled to remain there all winter. His position was trying in the extreme, as he was a stranger in a strange land, unfamiliar with the customs and language of the people, and almost penniless. He was, however, equal to the emergency, and managed to earn an honest living, and wisely employed his evenings in making himself master of the English language. On the 28th of March, 1851, he took passage for Mackinaw on board the propeller "Republic," and reached that city on the 1st of April. After remaining with his sister and brother-in-law one month, he went to LaPointe, then a small village on Madeline Island, one of the Apostle group, and entered the employ of his brother Julius, who was engaged in general merchandising and in the fish business, making himself generally useful in the store and assisting him on the fishing-ground. At that time the inhabitants of LaPointe and Madeline Island were Indians and half-breeds, and about half a dozen white people. During his stay at LaPointe, he experienced many adventures and narrow escapes. On one occasion, while attending to his duties on the fishing-ground, his boat was capsized by a sudden squall, and only through the greatest exertion was he enabled to save his life. At another time he set out to visit a distant habitation, and was obliged to pass through a dense forest. Night coming on, he lost his way and wandered into a swamp, where he was compelled to remain until the following day before he could make his way out. There were at that time but few vessels on Lake Superior, as the Sault Ste. Marie Ship Canal had not been constructed. The only two steam vessels on that lake were the small propellers "Napoleon" and "Independence," which had been drawn over the portage. These vessels, with a few schooners, constituted the entire fleet. In the spring of 1851 the propeller "Monticello," was transported over the portage and was added to the tonnage already there. It took the propeller "Napoleon" a week to make her trip from LaPointe to Sault Ste. Marie. In the winter of 1851-52 he was engaged in the logging camps, and when the snow left in the spring he was employed in a saw-mill, the power of which was obtained from a small stream, now called Pike's Creek. In the fall of 1851, also of the following year, he coasted between LaPointe and Ontonagon, a distance of ninety miles, for the purpose of obtaining provisions and merchandise. These trips were often dangerous on account of perverse winds and violent storms. His cargo from LaPointe consisted of fish, furs, etc., which he traded for groceries and other necessities. During these voyages it was customary to camp out at night on the lake shore, and on one occasion the snow fell during the night to such a depth that he had great difficulty in extricating himself. Late in the year of 1852 he went to Eagle River and entered the employ of Henry F. Leopold, who was engaged there in general merchandising, with whom he remained until the fall of 1853, as salesman and bookkeeper, when Mr. Leopold disposed of his business. He then went to Cleveland, Ohio, where he met his mother and the rest of the family, who had left their Bavarian home upon the death of his father. In the following spring he returned to Eagle River, and as partner of the firm of H. F. Leopold & Co., reopened the store at that point and began business on a larger scale. He remained at Eagle River during the next ten years, and, through his energy and ability, increased their business from an insignificant amount to the most gratifying proportions. In 1863 he went to Hancock, Mich., where his firm were among the first to erect a large store and warehouses, the erection of which he directed and superintended. His firm also operated a branch store at Eagle Harbor during that year. He disposed of his business interests in 1864, and, coming to Chicago, entered upon the enterprise of establishing a transportation line between this city and Lake Superior. Associating himself with Messrs. L. F., H. F., S. F., and A. F. Leopold, under the firm name of Leopold & Austrian, they organized the "People's Line." Their first vessel was the propeller "Ontonagon," which was soon found inadequate to meet the demands of their rapidly increasing business, and during the next year they put in another boat, the propeller "Norman." These vessels made weekly trips to Sault Ste. Marie, and were the means of diverting to Chicago the bulk of northwestern shipments, which had previously been sent to Detroit and Cleveland. Although the "People's Line" was busily engaged their boats were not of the class calculated to attract the attention of great shippers, and, to supply the deficiency, Mr. Austrian contracted in Cleveland for the building of a first-class freight and passenger vessel, which would in all respects meet the demands of their business. He returned to Chicago a day prior to the great fire. After the holocaust, he correctly divined that the future held brilliant business prospects, and gave orders for the immediate completion of their new vessel. In July, 1872, the "Peerless" came from the ways, and was pronounced the finest craft of the lake marine. The "Ontonagon" was sold and replaced by the "Joseph L. Hurd," which was thoroughly refitted, and supplied with a handsome and commodious passenger cabin. Upon the consolidation of the Lake Michigan and People's lines, under the name of the Lake Michigan and Lake Superior Transportation Company, he was elected general manager of the company, which position he now fills. Through the combination of these two companies, other vessels were added to the line, which afford unequalled facilities to both the shipping and traveling public for all points between Chicago and Lake Superior. Mr. Austrian was married in February, 1869, to Miss Mary Mann, daughter of S. Mann, Esq., of Cleveland, Ohio, a graduate of the high school of that city, and a lady of unusual musical accomplishments. They have now four children: Belle, Florence, Stella and Alice, having lost their only son, Alfred, in 1880.

THE LAKE MICHIGAN AND LAKE SUPERIOR TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, whose office is located at the corner of Washington and Market streets, was first organized in 1879, and regularly chartered by the State of Illinois. At its organization, S. F. Leopold was elected president; A. T. Spencer, vice-president; C. F. A. Spencer, secretary and treasurer; Joseph Austrian, general manager. The election of officers is held every three years, and each time since the organization have the original officers been chosen. The company was established for the purpose of forming a line of passenger and freight boats, plying between Chicago and Lake Superior, and several steamers, used privately by some of the members of the company, were placed in the line, among which were the steamers "Peerless," "City of Duluth," "City of Fremont," and "J. L. Hurd." They afterward added the steam barge "J. R. Whiting" and its consort "Guiding Star," and in 1884 the "Jay Gould."

CAPTAIN ALBERT T. SPENCER was born in Westfield, Chautauque Co., N. Y., in 1822, where he remained until about eight years of age, when he removed with his parents to Erie County, Penn. After residing there about three years, he moved to Erie, Penn., in 1836, where he remained until 1846, attending in the mean time the academy in the winter, and in the summer spending his time on the steamboats. He commenced his first trip in 1836, on a steamer called the "Thomas Jefferson," plying between Chicago and Buffalo. In 1838 the steamer "Buffalo" was finished, and he served on her; in 1839, he went on the new steamer "Wisconsin," and remained with her until 1840, when he transferred his services to the "Missouri." The last new boat added to the line, which belonged to Charles M. Reed, of Erie, in whose service he had been from the first, was the "Keystone State." He went on this vessel and remained until 1851, when he gave up steamboating. For years he had been engaged as steward and purchasing agent, which latter office included the filling orders for Western merchants in Eastern markets. In 1836, when he first came to Chicago, there was but one landing in the city, located at the north end of the present Rush-street bridge, and in front of a hotel then building, called the Lake House, and also opposite old Fort Dearborn. This dock was used until 1839, when the property east of State Street, called the Reservation, was sold. Charles M. Reed, of Erie, Penn., bought at that sale all of the property on the south side, from the foot of State Street to Wabash Avenue, a portion of which he still owns, and on which he built docks for his boats, which regularly landed there until sidewheel steamers were superseded by propellers. In 1855, it was determined to run a line of sidewheel boats between Chicago and Collingwood, to be called the Collingwood Line, which included the "Queen City," "Niagara," "Louisiana," and "Keystone State," connecting with what was then known as the Ontario, Simcoe & Huron Railroad, now called the Northern Railroad of Canada, under the management of the Grand Trunk Railroad. Captain Spencer acted as agent of this company for nearly twenty-five years. During 1855, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was completed, and he commenced running to ports on Lake Superior, having formerly run to the Sault and connected with the steamers above. This was the first line between Chicago and Lake Superior. He came to Chicago to reside permanently in the spring of 1847, and has been ever since either steamboating or as part owner of steamboats. In 1870, he was elected vice president of the newly consolidated line of the Lake Michigan and Lake Superior Transportation Company, and has held this office up to the present time, being three times re-elected. Captain Spencer has lived to see Chicago grow from almost a wilderness to a city of the first rank, and has reared a family in whom he has a pardonable pride. He was married in Chicago, in 1845, to Miss Lucia E. Howe, daughter of F. A. Howe, Esq., and has three children living, Charles F. A., Mrs. W. H. Dodge, of Waukegan, Ill., and Louis V.

CHARLES F. A. SPENCER, a son of Captain A. T. Spencer, was born in Chicago, at the corner of Dearborn and Washington streets, on September 13, 1846. He commenced his studies in Chicago and completed them in Waukegan, Ill., where his father afterward lived. In 1860 he entered at Chicago the office of his father, who had charge of the business of the Collingwood Line of steamers, and remained with him until 1866, when he went to Milwaukee. He there took charge of the office of the steamers of the Grand Trunk Railroad, plying between Chicago, Milwaukee and Sarnia, Canada, and the Chicago, Milwaukee and Lake Superior Line of steamers, plying between Chicago and points on the upper lakes, this line being a competitor of the People's Line, which was afterwards consolidated with it. In the winter of 1866-67 he managed the business of the Blue Line, a fast railroad express for freights, and in 1867 came to Chicago and took charge of the Chicago, Milwaukee & Lake Superior Line of steamers, also doing a commission business with merchants and mines on the lakes. When the two lines of Lake Superior steamers consolidated under the name of Lake Michigan and Lake Superior Transportation Company, he was chosen secretary and treasurer at the first election of officers in 1879, and has been re-appointed to the same positions at each successive election. Mr. Spencer was married in Chicago, in 1872, to Mrs. A. J. Wonnacott, who died in 1883, leaving two children—May H. and Albert L.

OCEAN MARINE.—As an adjunct to the marine interests may, with propriety, be mentioned some of the individuals who have been important factors in building up the immigration business here.

ANDREW J. GRAHAM, who, since the retirement of John M. Graham, the pioneer Catholic bookseller, has had charge of his father's business, also claims the distinction of operating the oldest established ocean-steamship agency in Chicago. When Mr. Graham, sr., left the firm after the fire, its management fell to Joseph J., Mrs. John M., and Andrew J. Graham. The former died in January, 1885, and Andrew J. Graham became the active manager of the business, which is the oldest and largest of its kind in the city. The establishment at No. 113 Desplaines Street is the most extensive west of New York and does a large business in general and church goods, besides being the general headquarters for all books and goods employed by the clergy. In connection with the book business, Mr. Graham operates an agency for the Cunard and other large ocean steamship lines. The agency was established in 1866 by his father, who was the first agent of the Black Ball Line. The books of the establishment show the sales of tickets, to be used on the sailing vessels of this line, which date back nearly to the time of the war, when money was selling at thirteen dollars for the pound sterling. Since then the firm has done much to encourage and promote immigration, Mr. Graham booking seven hundred and fifty passengers from the old country in less than five months of 1885. The establishment has become known prominently here and in Ireland, and the utmost care is given to protecting the interests of emigrants consigned to the Graham agency. Mr. Graham was born February 5, 1861, in Chicago, and was married on November 10, 1884, to Miss Minnie Padden of this city. He is the youngest man in his line in the city, but he has conducted the establishment, founded in the fifties, with credit and success. Mr. Graham is associated with all progressive church and social movements of importance in the community where he resides, and the increase of the business he controls is due largely to his ability and enterprise.

FRED G. WHITING, the general western agent for the Cunard Ocean Steamship Line, has been a resident of Chicago for thirty-two years; in the employ of the company he now represents since 1871, and connected with the line in a managerial capacity since 1853. The position occupied by Mr. Whiting is one of responsibility and importance, representing as it does the entire western interests of the oldest ocean line of steamers in existence, the Cunard Company having been formed in 1840. Since his first connection with the company, Mr. Whiting has witnessed its marvelous growth, and has been one of its trusted auxiliaries in bringing about that result. The integrity and honor of his office, a post under direct authorization from John Burns, chairman of the corporation, in Liverpool, can not be fully estimated without a knowledge of the wonderful prosperity of the same, and the extensive element it comprises in trans-Atlantic traffic. The Cunard was first known as the British and North American Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, with headquarters in Liverpool. It commenced business with four paddle-wheel steamships, with an aggregate of four thousand six hundred and two tonnage. This has increased, from year to year, until there are now some sixty vessels afloat, many of which are the fastest and most magnificent ships yet constructed, some with a tonnage of eight thousand, and with fourteen thousand five hundred horse-power, and a grand total aggregate of one hundred and fifty thousand tonnage. In the last forty-five years the steamers of this line have made five thousand trips, and carried three million passengers, and have never lost a life nor a letter from the mails entrusted to their charge. Mr. Whiting, to whom the western business of this large company is confided, entered the service of the same under P. H. Du Vernet, an old and trusted servant of the company, who established its first agency here in 1871, at its first office location, No. 72 Market Street, and its present quarters, under the Sherman House, where the agency has been for over ten years. Mr. Whiting filled every position in the province of employment, from a subordinate clerkship to chief bookkeeper. His attachment personally to the retired agent, is quite as sincere as his fidelity to the company, which recognized the ability of an ambitious young man, determined to reach the top of the ladder through industry and integrity. When Mr. Du Vernet was called to take charge of the Boston office of the company, in July, 1853, Mr. Whiting was appointed his successor. Since that date, the flattering success of the first agent in increasing the business of the company, seems to have followed his successor, until the Cunard maintains the lead in its line, throughout all the numerous agencies under control of the Chicago office. Mr. Whiting's career has been closely identified with the history of the city. Born at Cheltenham, England, June 9, 1852, the son of Ezra and Sarah Whiting, he came with his parents to Chicago the following year. The senior Whiting was an expert in the art of architectural construction, and was prominently known as a builder among the old settlers, having erected the old Adams House, the Rock Island car-shops, and other large structures. The present steamship manager spent most of his youth in Chicago, and received his early education at the Jones School, on Harrison Street. During the oil excitement, his father removed to Canada, and the son completed his education at the Upper Canadian College, at Toronto. He returned to Chicago three years later. In 1878 Mr. Whiting was married to Minnie, daughter of Edwin Walker, the stone contractor and builder of the court house. They have one child, named Edwin W. The prosperity that has attended the efforts of Mr. Whiting, are no more pleasing to himself and his friends, than the realization that, though the youngest of the steamship agents in Chicago, he holds one of the most important positions in that service, and has employed his honors only to serve the line he so ably represents, and to conduce to the progress of the community of which he is an esteemed member.

Fritz Frantzen, one of the earliest foreign steamship agents in Chicago, was born in Jutland, near Horsens, Denmark, in 1835, his father's name being Jens J., and that of his mother, Anna. His father was a school teacher, and was greatly honored and esteemed by all for his strict integrity of character. After graduating from the Horsens' College in 1850, he served a practical apprenticeship as millwright, securing a theoretical experience at the industrial schools of Copenhagen. In 1861, he was appointed assistant to the chief engineer of railroad construction at Copenhagen, in which capacity he served until 1863, when the war between Germany and Denmark broke out. Mr. Frantzen entered the army and was promoted to a lieutenantcy in May, 1864. After the battle of Düppel, where he had a narrow escape from death, and from which engagement one regiment marched home decimated and with every important officer killed, Schleswig-Holstein was ceded to the Germans, peace proclaimed, and Mr. Frantzen set sail for America, intending to offer his services in the war of the Rebellion. He arrived in Chicago in the spring of 1865, to find the country at peace, and for two years engaged in the millwright business with George Olson, the pioneer Dane, who has lived forty years in this city. In 1867 he opened a steamship agency and foreign exchange office, at No. 43 West Kinzie Street for the Allan Line, operating under the local management of its principal representative at this point. In 1870, he moved to No. 83, on the same thoroughfare, and in 1875 to No. 98 Milwaukee Avenue, purchasing the property and remaining there, and at No. 92, until 1884, when he bought his present place of business at No. 296 Milwaukee Avenue. Immediately after the great fire, Mr. Frantzen was almost the only agent in shape for the transaction of business, and he enjoyed a transient monopoly of the ocean steamship trade. He was one of the first notaries public in the division of the city where he resides. He has returned to Europe several times, on one occasion to arrange for the importation of foreign publications. He was married in 1867, to Miss Helena Michelsen. They have four children: Arthur, George, Henry and Walter.

THE POLICE DEPARTMENT.

From 1858 until the spring of 1861, the police of the city continued to act under the direction of the Mayor or the City Marshal. By ordinance of May 17, 1851, the City Marshal was constituted the acting chief-of-police, but the Mayor, by virtue of his office, was the head of the force. He made the appointments and could direct their action, and, during the two terms of the mayoralty held by Mr. Wentworth, in 1857 and in 1860, the Mayor was a very important factor of the force. One of the notable acts of his first term was his raid upon street and sidewalk obstructions, on the night of June 18, 1857. There was an ordinance prohibiting the obstruction of sidewalks by signs, awnings, posts, merchandise or other things, but as it had never been enforced, it was looked upon generally as a dead letter. Not so, however, thought the Mayor, and finding that warnings and notices were of no avail, on the night mentioned he gathered a force of his policemen with drays and wagons, and took down every sign or other obstruction to the sidewalk on the principal streets, and before morning had them all deposited in a pile on State Street, at the north end of Market Hall. There they remained until reclaimed by their owners, the reclamation being invariably accompanied by a fine for violating the ordinance.

At other times Mr. Wentworth accompanied a force on special "raids," and at all times was the active and real chief of police.

Under Mayor Wentworth the police wore leather badges, but had no other distinctive mark or uniform.

In 1858, under Mayor Haines, a uniform for the police was adopted. It consisted of a short blue frock-coat, which got the nickname of the "copper" stock coat, and a blue navy cap with gold band. A plain brass star took the place of the leather badge. When Mr. Wentworth came in again in 1860, he replaced the star with his leather badges, but made no change in uniform.

During these years, from 1858 to 1861, each division of the city constituted a police district, with a station at the different market halls. The force consisted of a captain, six lieutenants, three sergeants, and between fifty and sixty patrolmen. About half the latter, under the captain, two lieutenants and a sergeant, were stationed in the South Division, the rest being divided between the North and West divisions. There were also two police magistrates. The following were the last City Marshals who were at the head of the police department: 1858, J. M. Donnelly; 1859, Jacob Rehm; 1860, Iver Lawson.

On the 15th of February, 1861, the Legislature of Illinois passed an act to establish a Board of Police Commissioners in the City of Chicago. The board was to consist of three commissioners, one to be chosen from each division of the city. The Governor of the State was authorized to appoint the members of the first board, who were to hold their offices for two, four and six years respectively, from and after the next general municipal election. The respective terms of the first commissioners were to be decided by their drawing lots. It was further provided that at the general municipal election in 1863, and biennially thereafter, there should be elected a commissioner to succeed the one whose term then expired.

Under this law Governor Yates, on the 22d of February, 1861, appointed Frederick Tuttle from the South Division, William Wayman from the West Division, and Alexander C. Coventry from the North Division, as the Board of Police.

The commissioners organized and elected Mr. Coventry president, and Mr. Wayman, treasurer of the board. In drawing lots for their terms of office, Mr. Coventry drew the long term, Mr. Wayman the intermediate term and Mr. Tuttle the short term.

By the law it was made the duty of the board to organize the police force by appointing a superintendent and deputy superintendent, captains, sergeants and patrolmen. While they were in the midst of the performance of this duty, but before they had made any appointments, Mayor Wentworth, whose term of office was drawing near its close, started them into action in a very surprising way. About one o'clock in the morning of the 26th of March, 1861, he assembled the entire police force before him at his office in the City Hall, and discharged them, leaving only a custodian at each station. The reason he gave for this sensational stroke was that the Board of Commissioners should have a chance to start fair in their work of appointment. It certainly had the effect of causing the board to make a beginning. Jacob Rehm was at once appointed deputy superintendent, and before the close of the day several officers and some twenty-five patrolmen were appointed and sworn in. The city had been without a police force for about twelve hours. In a few weeks the force was thoroughly organized under Cyrus P. Bradley as superintendent, and Jacob Rehm, deputy.

One of the first things the new board did was to adopt a new and complete uniform for the members of the force. It consisted of a blue frock-coat and gray pantaloons with blue stripe. The badge was a silver shield.

This was the first full uniforming of the police in Chicago. In February, 1863, the Legislature revised the city charter, and in so doing made a change in the constitution of board of police. The term of office was reduced to three years, one commissioner to be elected every year, and the mayor was made a member of the board ex officio.

In 1863 Mr. Tuttle's term expired, and J. L. Newhouse was elected as his successor, the board being composed of A. C. Coventry, William Wayman, and J. L. Newhouse. Jacob Rehm was appointed superintendent, and the captains were John Nelson, William Turtle, and Frederick Gund. The city was divided into three police precincts, each division of the city constituting one, with stations and sub-stations.

The First Precinct Station was the Armory Building on the corner of Franklin and Adams streets, with a sub-station at the corner of Twenty-sixth and State streets. A captain, three sergeants and thirty-six patrolmen formed the force in the first precinct.

The Second Precinct Station was at the west end of West Market Hall, Randolph Street, with a captain, two sergeants and twenty patrolmen.

The Third Precinct Station was at the north end of North Market Hall, Michigan Street east of Clark, and had a captain, two sergeants and eighteen patrolmen.

During 1864 the force remained unchanged except that Thomas B. Brown was elected member of the board from the West Division, and William Tuttle was appointed superintendent. In 1865 the Legislature again amended the law with respect to the Police Board. By the act of February 16, 1865, the term of the Police Commissioners was extended to six years, one to be elected every two years, and it was provided that the police force should consist of a general superintendent, one deputy superintendent, three captains, sergeants of police not exceeding twelve, and patrolmen not exceeding two hundred.

The board in 1865 was composed of Alexander C. Coventry, president; John Wentworth and Thomas B. Brown, with William Tuttle as superintendent. The stations remained the same as during the previous year, but the patrolmen were increased to one hundred and twenty-five.

In 1866 the members of the board were Thomas B. Brown, A. D. Titsworth and Frederick Gund. Jacob Rehm was appointed superintendent, and the number of patrolmen was increased to one hundred and fifty-five. There were also sub-stations at the corner of Archer Road and Halsted Street, at Lake and Paulina streets, and at North Avenue and Larrabee Street.

In 1867 the Legislature again amended the police law, mainly in respect to salaries. The Board of Commissioners were required to devote their entire time, if requisite, to the duties of their office, and were each to receive an annual salary of not less than $2,500; the amount, however, was to be fixed by the Common Council.

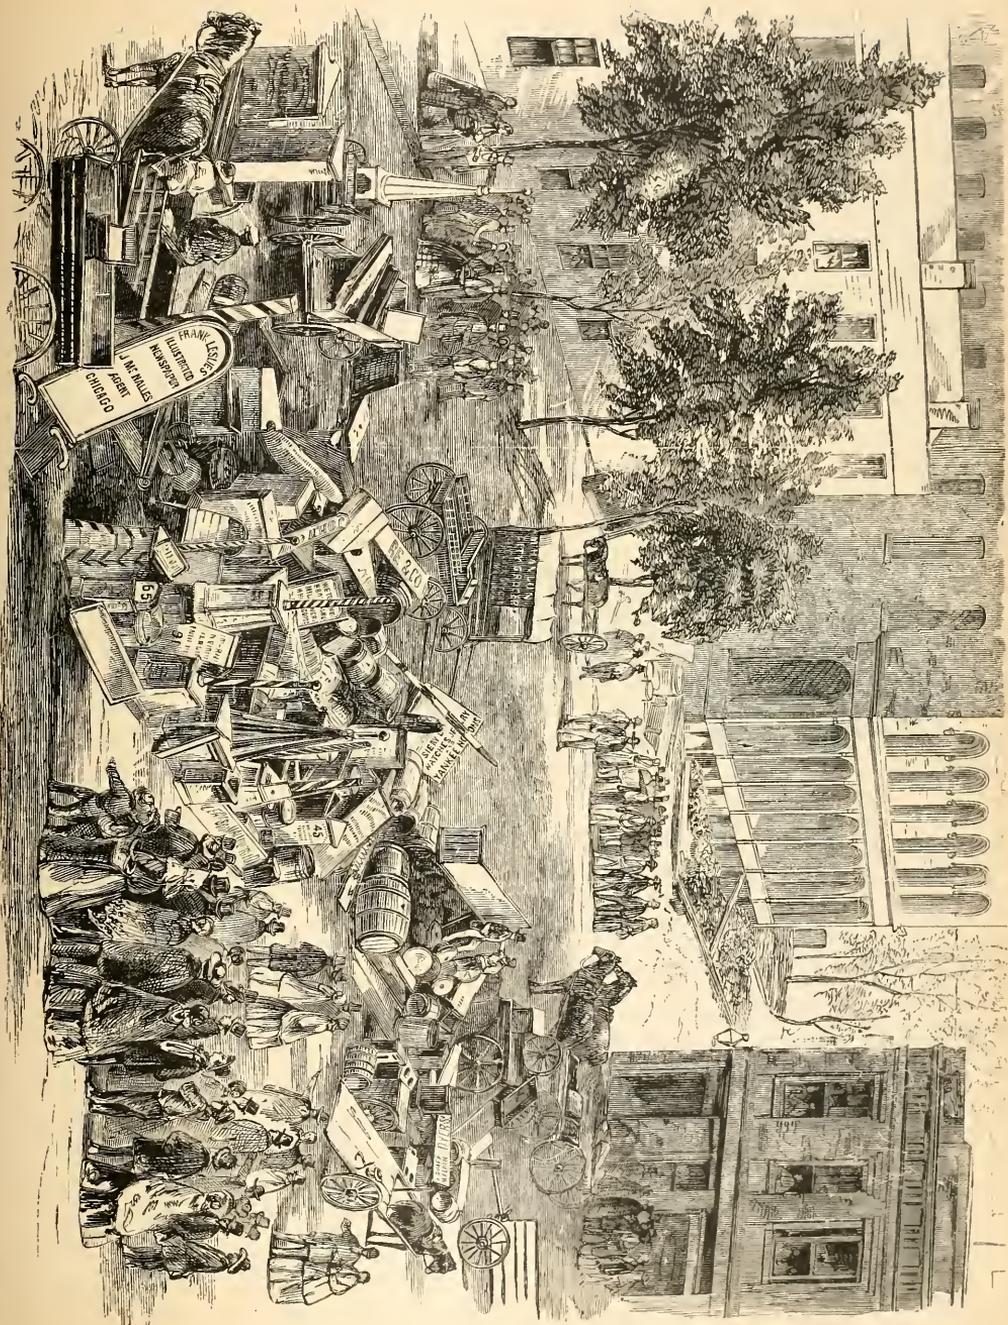

The other salaries were as follows: The superintendent not less than $3,000; deputy superintendent not less than $2,500; each captain not less than $1,500; each sergeant not less than $1,200; and each patrolman not less than $800 nor more than $1,000.

By a later act of the Legislature in March, 1869, the salary of each commissioner was fixed at $3,000, each captain's at $2,000 and each sergeant's at $1,500.

In 1867 the patrolmen were increased to one hundred and seventy-three, but no other change, either in board, officers, or stations, occurred. In 1868 there was no change except that Wells Sherman was appointed deputy superintendent in the place of John Nelson.

In 1869 the board was unchanged, but W. W. Kennedy was appointed superintendent. The stations were the same with the addition of sub-stations on Cottage Grove Avenue, between Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth streets, on the corner of Twelfth and Johnson streets and on Chicago, near Milwaukee Avenue.

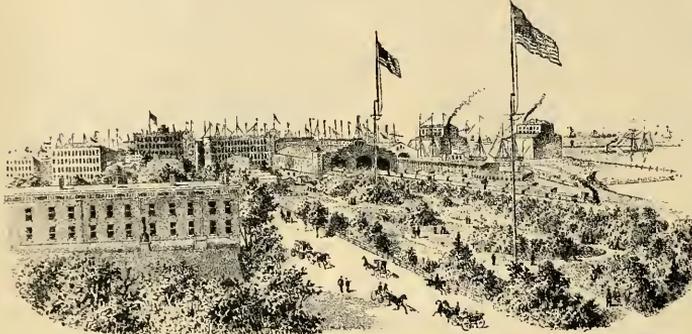

In 1870 the precincts and stations remained the same. Two hundred and seventy-four patrolmen were employed under W. W. Kennedy, superintendent. The commissioners were Thomas B. Brown, Mark Sheridan and Frederick Gund. In 1871 the Board of Commissioners and officers remained the same as during the previous year, the patrolmen being increased to three hundred and ten men. Three additional stations were established; called the South Branch sub-station, the North Branch sub-station and the Webster Avenue sub-station.

CYRUS PARKER BRADLEY was one of the most energetic and able men ever connected with the fire and police service in Chicago; in fact, for many years he was considered one of its most practical and useful citizens, doing much to bring an orderly and efficient municipal government out of the changes and struggles for excellence of these early times. Mr. Bradley was born at Concord, N. H., November 14, 1819, locating in Chicago when in his eighteenth year. For a number of years he remained in the employ of H. Norton, Walters & Co., owners of a large warehouse located near old Fort Dearborn. In 1843, he was married in Chicago to Martha Ann Hodgson, eldest daughter of John H. Hodgson, formerly of London, England. They have had five children, two sons and three daughters. In 1849, Mr. Bradley was appointed collector of taxes for the town of South Chicago. It was while thus serving that the great flood occurred, so disastrous to the shipping interests of the city, and which destroyed so much municipal property. He was then one of the most vigorous and brave young men in Chicago, and upon this particular occasion made quite a hero of himself in detaching vessels from the ice gorge, and otherwise breaking up the "jam." Long ere this, Mr. Bradley had connected himself with Pioneer Engine Company, No. 1, of which he afterward became one of the first foremen. In 1850, he succeeded Ashley Gilbert as Fire Marshal, serving for two terms. He was also one of the organizers of the Firemen's Benevolent Association, and acted as its secretary in 1855. In June of that year, under Mayor Boone's administration, the Police Department was created, and Mr. Bradley became the first Chief of Police, having, during the previous two years, served as sheriff of the county. He was Chief of Police for one year, and remained connected with the department until 1860, when he was appointed Superintendent of Police. From the spring of 1856 to the spring of 1858, Mr. Bradley, in connection with Bartholomew C. Yates, I. H. Williams and Charles Noyes, conducted a detective and collecting police agency, which was an invaluable adjunct to the regular city police department, and placed him in the front rank of the skillful and brave detectives of the country. In 1858, Mr. Bradley bought his partners' interests in the firm, and, for some time, conducted the agency alone. During this period, he was also an active member of the Chicago Light Artillery, which served in the war as old batteries A and B, under Colonel Ezra Taylor. From 1856 to 1860, Mr. Bradley acted as sergeant and third lieutenant. When the war broke out, he was holding the position of superintendent of police, and, as provost marshal, accomplished invaluable work for the Union cause, by placing an iron-bound embargo upon the cowardly fugitives from the operations of the draft. Policemen were placed at the depots of all eastern railroads and on board all vessels in the harbor, and every one, subject to draft, was required to show that he was not leaving the state to avoid service; that he had legitimate business, and that he would return to answer to a draft, should one be made. Agents of railroads and boats were not permitted to sell tickets to persons liable to draft, unless they had a pass from Mr. Bradley, except at depots where an officer was stationed to examine all applicants for tickets. Other rules were made, showing the superintendent's determination to uphold the Union cause at home. Mr. Bradley resigned his office in 1862, and was soon afterward elected secretary to the Board of Police, continuing to serve in that capacity until the fall of 1864. From that date until his death, he was connected with the Government Detective Force as special agent of the Treasury Department. In this position he acquired special prominence for his success in the detection of counterfeiters and the capture of their outfits. As he gave his personal attention to each case placed by the Government in his hands, and did not trust to his subordinates, the draft upon his strength was too much. The last piece of detective work which he did consisted in the breaking up of a nest of counterfeiters in St. Louis. Untiring labors and exposures brought on an attack of erysipelas, which resulted in his death at Chicago, on March 6, 1865. His funeral was attended by the officers of the city government and his many and warm friends, his decease being universally regarded as a great public loss. Mr. Bradley left, besides a multitude of warm personal friends, a wife and five children to mourn his loss. The eldest daughter, Martha Louise, is Mrs. George H. Heaford; Anna Maria is the wife of Joseph G. Peters; Henry C. Bradley and Charles H. Bradley are too well known in political and county circles to require more than a mention here; Emeline E. Bradley, the youngest daughter, is now the wife of Dr. W. H. Morgan.

FREDERICK GUND was born in Plankstadt, Baden, Germany, on December 1, 1823. From the age of seventeen until he was twenty-three he attended the noted military school at Mannheim. This city being close to the French frontier, it contained an arsenal, barracks and military school, being in fact the center of military operations during the wars between France and Germany. Although it was also an extensive manufacturing point, its attractions were not sufficient to hold the young man, and, in 1846, he embarked for America where he could exist under a republican form of government. After his arrival here he engaged in the manufacture of cigars for a short time at Troy, N. Y., in company with an experienced cigarmaker, and then came to Chicago, obtaining his first view of its then muddy and unattractive streets in April, 1847. Here he continued in the cigar business alone, subsequently taking into partnership his brother, John A. Gund, to whom he sold out his interests about 1855, having accumulated a comfortable fortune. In 1854 Mr. Gund joined the police force under the mayoralty of Isaac L. Milliken, and was promoted to the rank of second lieutenant of the third district in 1856, and that of first lieutenant in 1859. In 1863 he was chosen captain of the fourth precinct, it having been changed to the North Side. In November, 1865, he was appointed police commissioner, his term expiring in November, 1871. In the spring of 1872 he was appointed captain of the fourth precinct, which position he occupied until August 1 of the same year, when he resigned. Mr. Gund married his present wife, Adelheid Wertheim, in Chicago, during the fall of 1848. They have three living children—Frederick W., an employe of the City Telegraph Service; Mary, wife of J. T. Casper; and Frank A., a clerk in the post-office. Since his residence in Chicago Mr. Gund has been an influential and prominent member of the St. Joseph's Catholic Church.

JOHN BONFIELD, now captain of the third precinct, has been a resident of Chicago for over forty years. He was born in Bathurst, New Brunswick, on April 26, 1836, being the son of Michael and Mary (Julien) Bonfield. His father was a farmer, and when the boy was six years of age his parents removed to a point near Buffalo, N. Y. Remaining there two years, they settled at Chicago, in July, 1844, where young Bonfield laid the foundation of a primary education in the public schools of this city, principally at District No. 4, then in charge of A. G. Wilder. When he was about nineteen years of age he commenced to learn the machinist's trade, running a stationary engine for a number of years, both in the packing house of R. M. Hough and in Wahl Brothers' glue factory. In 1857 he secured a position as engineer of a locomotive on the Chicago & Alton Railroad, and there remained for about ten years. His next ventures, which were both unsuccessful, were in the grocery business, and as a proprietor, with his brother, in a fertilizing establishment at the Stock Yards. He failed in the former, and his fertilizing establishment was burned to the ground. In 1871 Captain Bonfield became inspector of customs, retaining that position for three years, and soon after resigning his office. In January, 1878, he was appointed patrolman on the police force and detailed at the Twenty-second-street station. William J. McGarigle placed him on the detective force, his headquarters being at the Central station. He was next appointed lieutenant in command of the Twenty-second-street station, and, in the summer of 1879, was transferred to the Madison-street district. Subsequently he became lieutenant of the West Twelfth-street station, was placed in command of the detectives at the Central station, and on December 14, 1880, was appointed captain of the third precinct, with headquarters at the Desplains-street station. Captain Bonfield is a Mason in good standing, being a member of Richard Cole Lodge, No. 697, A. F. & A. M., and Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M. He was married to his first wife, Catharine Slattery, in July, 1856, by whom he had three daughters, who are all living. She died in the year 1865, and two years later he married Miss Flora N. Turner, his present wife.

WILLIAM BUCKLEY, captain of the fifth police precinct, is, in point of service, one of the oldest officials connected with the department. He was born in the County of Waterford, Ireland, June 9, 1832. After having received a fair education, at the age of sixteen, he emigrated to America, his first occupation being employed as a farm hand by Colonel George D. Coles, of Glen Cove, Queens Co., N. Y. For five years he also worked on a farm in Warren County, Ohio, coming to Chicago July 7, 1856. During the first three years of his residence in this city he was employed by Colonel Richard J. Hamilton and Law & Strother, in the coal business, and had a taste of the trials accompanying a car driver and conductor. He pushed bravely and successfully through all difficulties, however, and, in April, 1865, joined the police force and began that career in his life which has been marked with such success, rising through the grades of roundsman, station-keeper and sergeant to his present position—all within eight years. On July 14, 1873, he succeeded Captain Michael C. Hickey, resigned, receiving the unanimous confirmation of the Council, as captain of the first precinct. In April, 1884, he was transferred to his present position, Fred. Ebersold succeeding him at the Harrison-street station. As is natural, engaged as he has been for the past twenty years, Captain Buckley has had many narrow escapes from death, but he seems to have had a charmed life. He has been for many years a member of the Police Benevolent Association, holding the office of treasurer from 1868 to 1877, inclusive. Captain Buckley was married in September, 1858, to Miss Catharine Cashin. Four children were born to them; of these Thomas and Mary are deceased. The loving mother and wife died on January 12, 1882, leaving the family and a large circle of friends to deeply mourn her loss. Richard W. Buckley, a promising son, is a bookkeeper for E. J. Lehman; Catharine, Captain Buckley's only living daughter, was married on February 21, 1884, to Daniel F. Burke, of the firm of Burke Brothers.

AMOS W. HATHAWAY, captain of the fourth precinct station, headquarters on West Chicago Avenue, has, with the exception of a few months, been in the continual service of the police department for over twenty years. He first became a patrolman in the fall of 1864, being assigned to the old North Market Hall. Continuing in this position for three years, he resigned to engage in more remunerative occupations, but his love for his old life returning, he joined the force again in 1868, as sergeant of the Huron-street station. Under Superintendent Washburne's administration a change was made in the name of the office, and Sergeant Hathaway became Lieutenant Hathaway of the Huron-street station. He continued thus to act until August 1, 1879, when he was promoted to the captaincy of the fourth precinct, whose headquarters were then at the North Chicago-avenue station. On April 22, 1884, he was transferred to his present position, the number of his former precinct being retained, but the headquarters and district being changed. Captain Hathaway was married in 1862 to Miss Rosalie R. Russell. They have had nine children, of whom four girls and three boys are living. Captain Hathaway's early life was one of unremitting hardship, and one eminently calculated to build up a rugged character. Born on May 29, 1839, at Providence, R. I., his mother died when he was only five months of age, when his grandmother took him to her farm near Oswego, N. Y., where he remained for some eight years. She then removed to Jefferson county in the same State, where the boy lived and worked until he was eleven years of age. Young as he was, he then made up his mind that if he was to work in this world it was far preferable to be his own master, and determined to return to Oswego. But car fare was not easily obtained, and so "pitching into" a huckleberry swamp near home he earned enough money to carry him to the city, where he quickly found employment with Smith & Knud, machinists. For three years he labored with them at this trade, and then for a time operated a stationary engine for W. H. Wheeler. The fact that he was quite proficient in his trade enabled him to obtain a position as a sailor on the vessel "E. W. Cross," plying between Oswego and Chicago. He followed the lakes until the fall of 1855, when he determined to settle in Chicago. But first he took a trip south and worked for some time on a farm near LaSalle, Ill., and also found employment in driving a team. Then the western fever struck him, and a portion of 1857 and 1858 he spent in and around Lawrence, Kas, being a companion of Colonel James Lane, and a witness of many of the exciting episodes of those days. Returning to Chicago, he became employed on a farm in Palatine, and located permanently in this city during the year 1860. He first obtained a position as foreman of the Mechanical Bakery, corner of Clinton and Lake streets, and whose proprietor, Henry C. Childs, obtained a large contract for supplying the army with "hard-tack." At one period he manufactured as high as one hundred barrels of flour every twenty-four hours, the bakery being run night and day to meet the demand. Mr. Hathaway remained in this position for three years, but his health becoming impaired, in 1863 he relinquished active business and spent a number of months in sailing the lakes, to regain it. As stated, during the fall of 1864 he joined the police department and entered into the life-work which he has made such a marked success.

THE DETECTIVE FORCE.—The Board of Police Commissioners instituted the first organized force of detectives in 1861. Prior to that time the City Marshals had occasionally detailed one or more of the regular force for special detective service.

The following officers were among the first who were regularly engaged in detective work: Asa Williams, Isaac Williams, Henry A. Kauffman, Joseph H. Dixon, William Douglas and Horace M. Elliott.

As a fitting termination to this mention of the secret service department an account of a man of cosmopolitan reputation is given.

ALLAN PINKERTON was a man by nature fitted for the profession to which he devoted his life, and in which he achieved a fame bounded only by the limitation of the habitable globe. In the grandeur of his work he made himself of such value to the law and order interests, that the whole country can, and does, justly claim him as the greatest representative of the best interests of a commonwealth, of either ancient or modern times. But the fact that he was a citizen of Chicago for over forty years, and that it was here that he laid the foundation of his subsequent splendid career, entitles him to a prominent place in the pages of her history and among those of her citizens whom it is her duty, as well as her delight, to pay this slight tribute of respect. It is no idle remark that a history of Chicago would not be complete without a mention of Allan Pinkerton and the work he accomplished during his long and eventful life; while the story simply told will interest even the most casual reader of these pages. He was born in Muirhead Street, Ruglen Loan, in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, on the 25th day of August, 1819. His parents were in humble circumstances, his father, William Pinkerton, being employed as a police sergeant by the municipality. When Allan was but a small boy, his father died from the effects of injuries received at the hands of a prisoner whom he was arresting, and the family were thus deprived of their means of support. Notwithstanding his extreme youth, being then scarcely nine years of age, he sought and obtained employment with a prominent print maker, Neil Murphy, who is still living in Glasgow. After serving with Mr. Murphy for several years, he was apprenticed to John McCauley, with whom he learned the trade of a cooper. Before attaining his majority he became imbued with the sentiments of independence and reform, which were advocated by those who put forth the People's Charter in Great Britain, and he soon became identified with the celebrated Chartist movement of the disaffected people. The Government resolved to crush this revolutionary uprising, and several of the leaders were arrested and transported. Fearful for his own safety, Allan Pinkerton resolved to leave the country and seek a refuge in America. He therefore, in 1842, after being married to Miss Jane Carfrae, sailed the following day, with his wife, for America, landing at Quebec after a perilous voyage, wherein their vessel was wrecked and the suffering passengers picked up by a passing vessel and carried to that port. From Quebec Mr. Pinkerton and his young wife made their way to Chicago by the lakes. The young couple, owing to their misfortunes, were nearly destitute, but with a stout heart he applied himself to securing employment. Meeting George Anderson, who was then engaged in the tobacco business, he enlisted the services of that gentleman in his behalf, and soon succeeded in obtaining employment at his trade, that of a cooper, at Lill's brewery, for meager wages, which, however, enabled him to live in a small house near to the present location of Rush-street bridge. He remained in Chicago but a short time, and then journeyed to Dundee, in Kane County, where he began business for himself. He prospered rapidly, and his establishment increased to such a degree that he resolved to settle permanently in that locality, but circumstances interfered and opened up to him the possibilities of a new career which by nature and inclination he was so well qualified to adorn. Mr. Pinkerton will be pleasantly remembered by many of the old residents of Dundee now living. While employed in his business as a cooper he had frequent occasion to visit some of the islands in Fox River, to procure materials for his stock, and while on one of these, he discovered the existence of a gang of counterfeiters, who made the island their retreat and there established their headquarters. Having a natural love for adventure, and being a stranger to fear, he determined to thoroughly investigate the entire operations of these counterfeiters, which he eventually succeeded in doing, effectually breaking up the existence of the gang and securing the arrest and conviction of John Craig, the leader and prime mover, together with the most prominent and dangerous of his associates. This exploit gained for the young cooper considerable renown, and shortly afterward he was appointed a deputy sheriff of Kane County; the duties of which position he filled in such an efficient manner that numerous bands of horse thieves and counterfeiters were either captured and punished or forced to leave the country, while wrongdoers were inspired with a wholesome fear of his vigilance and relentless pursuit. The reputation which he gained in this capacity soon spread to Chicago, and attracted the attention of William L. Church, who was then sheriff of Cook County. This gentleman immediately offered Mr. Pinkerton the appointment of deputy sheriff, with increased powers of usefulness and added remuneration, which he at once accepted. He continued in this position during the term of Mr. Church, and also under his successor in office, Sheriff C. P. Bradley. When Mr. Boone was elected mayor of Chicago he appointed Allan Pinkerton as a detective of the city force. This was the first appointment of a detective in Chicago, and was the initial step in the career of this greatest detective of the age. In the year 1852 Mr. Pinkerton became impressed with the importance of establishing a detective agency which would be independent of political influence, and by whose efforts the criminal could be punished without fear or personal favor. He accordingly associated with him Edward L. Rucker, an attorney-at-law, and securing the patronage of several railroad companies then in their infancy, they started the "Pinkerton Detective Agency," the first institution of its kind in the United States. Mr. Rucker continued with him only about a year, when Mr. Pinkerton undertook the entire management of the constantly increasing business. When the agency was first established, they employed some four or five men; among the most prominent being George H. Bangs, afterward general superintendent, who remained with Mr. Pinkerton until his death, which occurred in 1854, and Timothy Webster, who, while in his employ, was taken as a Union spy, and executed at Richmond, Va., during the war of the Rebellion. From that small beginning, the detective force, under Mr. Pinkerton's orders, increased steadily, until it now numbers nearly three hundred men. Mr. Pinkerton, from his boyhood, was an ardent lover of freedom and free institutions, and on coming to America was impressed with a deep-seated hatred of slavery. When the fugitive slave law was enacted, his opposition to this barbarous measure was aroused, and he resolved to use his utmost efforts to defeat its operation. He immediately associated himself with those old patriots, John Brown, James H. Collins, the Lovejoy brothers, and other prominent abolitionists, and rendered most heroic and important service in running what was then called the "underground railroad." By his efforts and energy, many a famished and hunted negro, who, guided only by the glimmering light of the north star, had broken away from the bonds of slavery, and made his way to Chicago, on his terrible journey to the welcoming borders of Canada, has been fed and clothed and passed safely on his way, many times under the very eyes of the officers of the law who were ready and anxious to send him back to servitude and punishment. In those days, it was not an uncommon thing to see Mr. Pinkerton's house, which was then on Adams Street, besieged by numbers of prayerful negroes, seeking his aid in behalf of some trembling and hunted fugitive, whom the law was about to consign to a physical punishment worse than death; and it is needless to say that these appeals were never made in vain. In the year 1860, Mr. Pinkerton increased his business by adding to it an important feature, consisting of a corps of night-watchmen, or Merchants' Police. This force, which was started with only six men, now numbers more than two hundred able-bodied watchmen. The first captain was Paul H. Dennis, and the next was the late James Fitzgerald. Mr. Pinkerton's detective business soon grew to gigantic proportions, and his reputation extended to all the leading cities of the East. Among the first notable and important cases which came to him, was that of the robbery of the Adams Express Company at Montgomery, Ala., by one Nathan Maroney, the agent of the company at that point. Mr. Pinkerton was engaged for this investigation by the late E. S. Sanford, vice-president of the Adams Express Company. At the time the robbery occurred, Mr. Sanford was in New York, and he at once applied to Robert Boyer, an expert detective in that city. Mr. Boyer, on learning the particulars of the case, at once informed Mr. Sanford that there was only one man in the country who was possessed of the detective ability, the natural firmness and dogged perseverance for the task. Mr. Sanford listened incredulously to these statements, and regarded with ridicule the idea of sending to Chicago for a detective, while New York City was full of them. However, he took the advice as offered, and placed the case in Mr. Pinkerton's hands. The result proved the wisdom of Mr. Boyer's recommendations, and although the operation extended over several months, and the suspected parties were followed from Alabama to New Jersey, they were finally arrested, and nearly the entire amount of the money taken by the thieves—some $40,000—was secured, most of it in the original packages. This money was unearthed from a cellar in a frame house, and over a thousand miles from the scene of the robbery. A handsomely engrossed testimonial was presented to Mr. Pinkerton, by the company, for this exploit, and now adorns the walls of the office of the Chicago Agency. The success of this operation at once established Mr. Pinkerton's reputation with the various express companies throughout the country, and when the car on the New Haven Railroad was robbed, some time afterward, by a gang of the most expert and desperate thieves, Andy and William Roberts, and others, Mr. Pinkerton was again sent for, and in an incredibly short space of time the entire money—$30,000—was recaptured, and the burglars in jail, waiting their trial. In 1861, being employed by Mr. Felton, and other officials of the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad, to look out for incendiaries on their road, Mr. Pinkerton discovered, in Baltimore, a plot to assassinate President Lincoln on the journey from his home to Washington to be inaugurated as president. Mr. Pinkerton at once took charge of affairs, and carried Mr. Lincoln safely through Baltimore and the waiting conspirators, and delivered him to his friends at Washington. When the war of the Rebellion broke out, President Lincoln sent for Mr. Pinkerton to come to Washington, and authorized him to organize the secret-service division of the army, the first Government police force ever organized in this country. This was done with Mr. Pinkerton at the head, under the nom de plume of E. J. Allen. In this capacity he served the country during the war, leaving his Chicago office in the charge of capable people, and, at the close of the war, came back to take charge thereof himself. His first important case, on resuming his former duties, was the robbery of the Adams Express Company, near Baltimore, by throwing the safes from the train while it was in motion, and getting away with over $100,000. This case, with other cases of the same nature, was a success, the thieves, six in number, being arrested, tried and convicted, and the money all recovered. Some time later came the robbery of the Harnden Express Company, in Baltimore, by which $20,000 was secured. The thieves in this case were also convicted, and the money recovered. The next important case was the robbery of the Carbondale Bank, at Carbondale, Penn., in which case the thieves were arrested, and the money—$40,000—recovered. Following these came the robbery of the Adams Express Company on the New York & New Haven Railroad, on January 6, 1866. The thieves, six in number, including the brakeman, entered the express car by wrenching off the lock, and then bursting the safe. They secured about $700,000 in this exploit. Through the efforts of Mr. Pinkerton and Mr. Frank Warner (the latter being, at the time, the superintendent of the New York office), the thieves were convicted, and the money all recovered but about $12,000, the most of which was afterward returned through a Catholic priest. The arrest and conviction of the robbers of Mylart's Bank, at Scranton, Penn., next followed, and about this time—1866—Mr. Pinkerton determined to enlarge his business, and establish an office in New York, which he did that year, and afterward instituted another one in Philadelphia, both under competent superintendents. The next case of importance, of which Mr. Pinkerton had charge, was the robbery, by Morton and Thompson, of the express car of the Merchants' Union Express Company, on the Hudson River Railroad, whereby they secured $300,000. These men were tracked to Canada, and there arrested, and, in spite of all that man could do and the help which they received from corrupt government officials, they were extradited to White Plains, New York. They afterward broke from prison, raided the Boylston Bank in Boston, and then fled to Europe. In the same year came the death of the Reno brothers and Anderson, of Seymour, Indiana. These men were desperadoes of the most pronounced type. They robbed stores and express trains, burglarized safes, and their very names became a terror along the railroad lines in that section of the country. Entire discontinuance of express service was seriously thought of by the companies. In 1868, near Osgood Station, Indiana, they robbed the Adams Express Company of $97,000, by boarding the train, throwing the messenger from the car, opening the safes, and deliberately appropriating their contents. This case was given to Mr. Pinkerton, and Simeon and Bill Reno were arrested by him at Indianapolis; Frank Reno and Charles Anderson fled to Canada, were pursued to Windsor, Ontario, and extradited, after a long siege of more than three months. During the trial which followed, another portion of the gang, for the purpose of diverting suspicion from them, attempted another express robbery; but of this Mr. Pinkerton was fully advised, and prepared for them. After one of the men had been shot, the rest were captured; but while awaiting the action of the law, the indignant and outraged populace of the country took them out, and hung them within full view of the jail. When Frank Reno and Charles Anderson were returned to the United States, they were put into jail at New Albany, Indiana, in company with Simeon and Bill Reno. About three weeks after their arrival there, one hundred masked men marched to the jail, having come in on the north-bound train, overpowered the sheriff and jailer, and hung the three Renos and Anderson, and that ended the banditti in Southern Indiana. On May 7, 1869, Mr. Pinkerton was stricken down with a severe stroke of paralysis, from which he never fully recovered, and since that time, has never been actively employed in his business, leaving the management of it to his two sons and other superintendents. One of the last cases he managed, was the work of breaking up the Molly Maguires in Pennsylvania. By working his operatives into their secret organizations, and having them admitted to a full knowledge of their mysteries and plans, Mr. Pinkerton was enabled to, at least, bring their schemes to a full exposure, and to stop, effectually, their course of robbery and murder. Twenty-four of them were hung, after due trial, and more than fifty were sent to the penitentiary for long terms of imprisonment. Mr. Pinkerton was the author of fifteen volumes of detective experiences, which have had an extensive circulation throughout the country, and left several volumes in manuscript behind him, which will probably be given to the press at an early date. His last published volume, "Thirty Years a Detective," recounts, with all the original force of his strong mind, the various devices resorted to, by criminals of every class, to effect success in their several branches of crime. Mr. Pinkerton's ruling idea, in the publication of these works, has been to show to the public how surely and inevitably detection and punishment follow the commission of crime. However skillful the criminal may be, however careful he may have planned to escape suspicion or pursuit, and notwithstanding the precautions he may have taken, the cool, intelligent and skillful detective will follow him relentlessly, until escape is impossible and arrest and punishment overtake him. The moral invariably sought to be inculcated by these works is, the beneficial enlightenment of society and the installation of a wholesome fear of the law, which will deter those tempted to crime from taking the fatal step which leads to dishonor and the prison cell. Mr. Pinkerton was a man of strong physique, which enabled him to rally several times when his physicians despaired of his recovery. He was ever noted for his iron will and indomitable perseverance, and was remarkably strong in his affections and hatreds; his friends were tied to him with "hooks of steel," and his enemies were made to feel the full force of his anger when he was aroused. Of late years he took great pride in his stock farm at Onarga, Iroquois Co., Ill., called "Larch Farm," which is said to be one of the handsomest places in the country, and upon which Mr. Pinkerton has expended many thousands of dollars. In prosecuting his business Mr. Pinkerton made it his inflexible rule never to operate for rewards, or on payments contingent upon success, and would never allow any of his operatives to receive any reward or gratuity for his services. He paid his employes liberally, and worked for those who engaged him at certain fixed per diem, which was all that was ever received. Another notable and praiseworthy feature of his immense business, and one of the strictest rules of his institution was, that he never, under any circumstances, could be induced to operate in a divorce case or where family matters were in dispute. In following out this line of conduct he flatly refused many thousand dollars annually. It was also a principle of Mr. Pinkerton that the old maxim of "setting a thief to catch a thief" was morally wrong and unwise in action, and that taking two men of the same mental caliber, the one guilty and the other innocent, the latter would invariably prevail over the mental and moral force of the former. Mr. Pinkerton leaves a widow, Mrs. Joan Pinkerton, the devoted wife who followed her young husband in his voluntary exile to America, and who has been his constant companion and wise counsellor through the many years and changing fortunes of their wedded life. To them were born eight children, only three of whom are living:—William A., the eldest, in charge of the Chicago office and the western division; while Robert A. is the general superintendent, and has immediate charge, of the Eastern office. Mr. Pinkerton has also a daughter living, who is now the wife of William J. Chalmers, of the firm of Fraser & Chalmers, in Chicago. Mr. Pinkerton has acquired a handsome competency, having an elegant home and much valuable real estate in the city, besides one of the most magnificent farms in the state. The following just analysis of his character and tribute to his worth was spoken by Luther Lullin Mills, at the funeral services held over his remains in this city, July 3, 1884:

"When the intelligence of the death of Allan Pinkerton was sent throughout America and across the sea, there was felt in every part of this continent and remote countries as well, a profound sorrow. From San Francisco to the busy river Clyde, from the Mexican Gulf to London, the hearts of thousands were made sad. The patriot soldiers of the Nation, whose comrade he had been, the freedmen whom he had helped to rescue from their slavery, and millions in many lands whom for a generation he had aided to guard in his battle against crime, were thrilled by the consciousness of their loss. And so, to-day, Chicago mourns him, and to his loved ones hand a laurel and a flower of grief to be placed upon his grave. How can a few words tell again the history of his life, so crowded with character and incidents. The school-boys know it by heart. Full of truth, it reads like a romance or a dream. The birth, amid surroundings of poverty, in the heart of Scotland; the child's brave struggle; the youth's fidelity to the rights of man in the historic agitation for suffrage and the recognition of equality in his native country; the early journey across the sea; and the long, brave fight against circumstances he here conducted, until recognition rewarded him with better opportunities—of these facts we need no reminding. His thousands of successful assaults against organized and determined crime, in many countries; his patriotic deeds for this nation; his work for the slave; and his myriad broad humanities, are facts familiar. But now they may constitute a foundation for a fair and just estimate of his life and the man's real character. Allan Pinkerton was shaped by nature with strong flesh and blood, made stronger by his youthful toils. There was no storm at sea, there was no winter on the shore, too severe for this man's endurance. No privations were too great for his bodily resistance, until, at last, his Scottish strength, like the tree on Loch Leven's bank, yielded to the storms of time, and fell heavy with years." * * * "His courage was unwavering, as his will was indomitable. He was never afraid. In his presence the outlaw was a coward, and before his eye the robber grew pale. In the old war-days, how Allan Pinkerton carried his life in his hands, and, with a few brave men around him, entered the lines of the enemy, the historian hereafter will gladly and fairly record. Allan Pinkerton's love of men was the deep and real inspiration of his greatest acts." * * * "He was an intimate friend of John Brown, and not long before that martyr met his fate at Harper's Ferry, Allan Pinkerton protected him and his companions in this very city on their journey. There live to-day hundreds who owe their freedom from slavery to this man. The tears of the slave pay free tribute now to his fidelity to liberty. When rebellion threatened the Nation's life, and a mob stood between Lincoln and the Capital, Allan Pinkerton conducted him in safety to his inauguration. The country may well thank his fidelity; his service was a pivotal fact for its future. At Washington, conducting the secret service, he was an intimate friend of the President and his cabinet, especially Stanton and Chase. For the great secretary of war, he was a right arm." * * "Strong, determined, brave, among his loved ones and those who could enter the circle of his closer friendship he was gentle as a child. In his later years of rest his thoughts clustered round his home as always he had loved it. The fireside was his joy. He loved nature; his favorite song was the sea, which seemed fitted to his broad and powerful spirit. He sought the country, and of late found comfort in the fields. He took broad acres and made for himself and family a farm; like the classic hero he found solace in the soil. There he saw the grain growing and breathed the balsam of the trees; and placing himself thus close to nature's heart the great man felt and knew the power and goodness of God. How meagre are the words of man to speak the worth of Allan Pinkerton. 'When that the poor have cried,' this man hath made quick answer to their need; when the wronged sought help against power he bravely bared his arm in their defence; he recognized no distinctions of society save those of merit among men; he despised all fraud and false pretense; he fought for the good and against the bad; he was not content with moral suasion, but met the social enemy with weapons. He was tender; he was strong; he was brave; he was true. Take his mortality to-day, from faithful wife and loving children, and ten thousand friends and the millions who knew him; wrap him in your bosom, great Illinois—you can not claim him as your own. He belongs to his generation and the future; no one state can claim him; his memory is the right of countries, not of states. Hero and friend, farewell!"

THE PAID FIRE DEPARTMENT.

LAST OF THE VOLUNTEERS.—In the preceding volume it has been narrated how Northern Liberty Engine Company No. 15, Northern Hose Company No. 7, and Union Hose Company No. 8 were the last of the volunteer organizations. The engine company disbanded in the spring of 1862, and the hose companies were in service until the same year. The first foreman of Northern Liberty was Conrad Folz, and its members A. Nieman, J. Schmidt, C. Folz, J. Berger, F. Gerbing, J. Rheinwald, J. Heinrich, J. Brunk, J. Williams, C. Scheime, J. H. Heller, O. Heine, E. Kasseberg and J. Brosche. The Northern Hose Company was stationed on Clybourn Avenue, corner of Larrabee Street, its members being C. Charleston, A. Gabriel, O. Probst, — Shiegler, C. Hettinger, foreman; W. Shartz, T. Mixer, F. Keiser, J. Keiser, H. Mabus, T. Shirer, William Bowling, C. Glassner, S. Wolf, B. Lozier, M. Engle and E. Bitz. The foreman of Union Hose, Peter Weber, was most active in its organization, its members being as follows: P. Weber, A. Roehrick, N. J. Gauer, William Dewald, J. Voght, N. Zimmer, John Weinand, John Gauer, P. Klein, J. N. Weinand, M. Wachter, N. Conrad, Henry Brick, H. Hunneman, J. Long, N. Hand, N. Masson and John Mara. With the disbanding of the above organizations the last of the old Volunteer Department disappeared. There was no company, however, in which the boys took deeper pride, and for which they mourned more sincerely, when it died, than "Hope Hose." The following extract from the Press-Tribune of January 6, 1860, is apropos:

"A LONG FAREWELL TO HOPE.—The boys of Hope Hose Company, in the palmy days of our Volunteer Fire Department, were a crack corps, and as fine a set of young men as ever handled a spanner or turned out to a fire. Their superb Philadelphia hose carriage, originally costing $5,000, was one of the finest pieces of workmanship in the United States, and at the New York Crystal Palace drew warm encomiums. But the steam fire engine has tardily done to the volunteer force what the locomotive did to the stage coach. Firemen ride to fires now, and fire machines thunder through our streets to the scene of conflagration at the heels of steeds urged to a furious gallop. Human muscle, ever so gallant and willing, must toil far behind. The boys of Hope Hose Company, at a late meeting, voted to disband, and, in so doing, they marked the era of the close of their gallant career with a deed of generosity fully in keeping with their fame, and the truth that

'The bravest are the tenderest;
The loving are the daring.'

"They are to secure as early a sale as possible of their beautiful silver-mounted carriage, and all the accoutrements of the late corps, and devote the proceeds to the 'Home of the Friendless.' Well done, 'Hope.'"

THE FIRST OF THE PAID DEPARTMENT.—After the great fire of October 17, 1857, the agitation for the establishment of a Paid Department commenced with vigor. In November of that year the Common Council ordered a steam engine, and, on February 5, 1858, the "Long John" arrived. D. J. Swenie had been elected chief of the department; L. Walters, first assistant, and M. W. Powell, second assistant, during the previous month, their election marking the entry of the Paid Department. The new engine was first tested on February 10. Since its arrival, the "Long John" had been left in the open air, and consequently there was some difficulty in getting it to work. All in all, however, the test was satisfactory, steam being got up in ten minutes and two streams being thrown to a height of seventy feet, and horizontally over two hundred feet. In March, "Long John" was tested with one of Latta's Cincinnati engines, which had been constructed for the city of St. Louis. It had been named "John B. Weimer," in honor of the then mayor of that city, but when it came in competition with "Long John" its inferiority was at once evident. The trial was conducted under the direction of Chief Engineer Swenie and the Board of Underwriters. Mr. Latta was present, as was also Miles Greenwood, chief engineer of Cincinnati, Ohio. "Long John" was put into active service about the 1st of May, being located at the old Armory Building, corner of Adams and Franklin streets. The horses were hired of Messrs. King & Barry, their barn being at first about a mile from the engine house. Nine persons were burned to death on the 19th of May, at the fire on South Wells Street, and so much delay was caused in getting the horses to their engine, that it was resolved to build a barn at the rear of the house. This reform in the workings of the department was therefore brought about. "Long John" fulfilled its early promise, throwing two good streams, being manned by the volunteer hose companies, and by Joel A. Prescott, engineer, and William Horner, assistant engineer, paid members of the department. The volunteers were Thomas Barry, John McLean, Alexander McMonagle and Thomas O'Brien. The hose carriage was hitched behind the engine, with two men at the tongue, but most of the time it was drawn by John Brinnoek, a drayman, living near the engine house.

The ordinance providing for the Paid Fire Department was passed in June, 1858. The chief and assistant engineers were to have full charge of the department, its general supervision and "rule-making" power residing in the Board of Control, consisting of the Mayor, Chairman of the Committee on Fire and Water, the Chief Engineer, and one Water Commissioner chosen by themselves. When approved, the rules made by the board were to have the force of ordinances. Except engineers, all members of the department were to be nominated by the board and confirmed by the Council. By section "four," the salaries were fixed as follows: Captains, $200 per annum; lieutenants, $100; engineers, $600; pipemen, drivers and stokers, $1 per day; all others $25 per month. Every fireman, when on duty, was required to wear a badge, and no engine was to be used except such as belonged to the city. Rules were laid down as to the number of men apportioned to each steam engine, hand engine and hook and ladder and hose company. Consequently, after July, all the men of "Long John" engine company were paid, and, in December, a full company was commissioned and moved into their new quarters on LaSalle Street; the company being commissioned on the 25th of that month. Their engine house was near the corner of LaSalle and Washington streets. The first members of "Long John" were as follows: Joel A. Kinney, foreman; Alexander McMonagle, John McLean, Thomas Barry, Thomas O'Brien, William Mullin, James Quirk, pipemen; Joel A. Prescott, engineer; Robert Etridge, assistant engineer; Alvin C. King and Dennis O'Connor, drivers; John Farrell, watchman.

In September, 1858, there was a trial of three steam engines at the foot of Washington Street, on the lake shore. The "Enterprise" was already owned by the city, and Messrs. Silsby & Wyndhurst, its builders, were anxious that the "Atlantic" and "Island Queen" should also be purchased. They were accordingly tested and subsequently became city property. By February, 1860, the "U. P. Harris" and "Little Giant" were added to the list. Besides the above, the Department was now composed of Hand Engine No. 9, located at Carville; No. 13, on Third Street, near Milwaukee Avenue; No. 15, on North Avenue, corner of LaSalle; Hose Cart No. 7, Larrabee Street, near Clybourn Avenue; Hose Cart No. 8, Oak Street, near Wolcott; also having a hook and ladder and supply hose carriage.

A change had also been made in the Chief of the Department. In February, 1859, great excitement and some alarm was occasioned in the minds of large property owners by the nomination of Silas McBride as Chief Engineer. He was not considered entirely competent, and was, moreover, opposed to any reform looking to the crowding out of the small hand engines. The progressive party was, therefore, alarmed, and the extent of the feeling may be inferred from the fact that immediately upon the nomination of Mr. McBride by the Firemen's Convention, a petition appeared in the Tribune, signed (but the names not published) by over three thousand citizens, among them being a majority of the old and experienced firemen, asking U. P. Harris to allow the use of his name for chief, with Darius Knights as first assistant and James J. Langdon as second assistant. Mr. Harris was triumphantly elected.

U. P. HARRIS, one of the most popular chiefs of the Fire Department, died at noon on the 2d of June, 1871. In his last moments he was attended by Dr. J. S. Beach and other warm friends. His decease was occasioned by congestion of the brain, brought about by the severe labors which he bore while engaged in the discharge of his duties in former years. It was greatly due to Mr. Harris's energy and ability that, before his death, he was able to see the Fire Department brought to a state of efficiency placing it in the very front rank. He was born in New York City, January 1, 1818, and was therefore only fifty-three years of age at the time of his death. Even while a boy of sixteen he evinced a decided bent of his disposition by becoming a member of the Volunteer Fire Department of that city, and showing so much spirit and judgment that he had hundreds of admirers who always knew him as the "Boy Fireman." Mr. Harris moved to the West when twenty-three years old, and finally to Chicago in 1845. He at once engaged in the clothing business, forming a partnership with a Mr. Ladd. His accommodating spirit, which worked his ruin, induced him to indorse the note of a friend for a much larger amount than all cautious dictates would warrant. His friend failed, and Mr. Harris failed himself. As a business man, his reckless generosity ever stood in his way; but as a public man, as a man of the people, as a leader of men where the flames ranged and danger was at its height, he was—U. P. Harris—which is all that is necessary to say. His earliest work as a fireman was done with Engine Company No. 3. He was elected Chief Engineer of the Department in 1852-53, serving also as City Treasurer during the latter year. In March, 1859, he commenced to serve his third term, as chief, and continued thus to act for a number of years, bringing the Department into splendid shape. In fact, if the boys ever had an idol to whom they bowed down and whom they worshipped, that idol was U. P. Harris. One secret of his popularity was his personal magnetism, by which he gained many friends and which he seemed to instil into the natures of those under him, so that, when his eye was upon them, they fought the flames like valiant soldiers. Although requiring faithful and unflinching service from his men, while they were on duty, when he set out to amuse them he was a boy among them. Many of them will still look back with the pleasantest memories upon those "New Years" when Chief Harris kept open house and distributed oysters, turkey, beef and other

"fixings" to his friends, dispensing his feast with that genial heartiness which gave it an additional richness and savor. Mr. Harris was a simple man with a brave heart. In 1868, bruised in body and shattered in health, he retired from active service to engage in some light business which would give him some employment without fatigue. He still haunted the old engine houses, however, and talked over the early times with the pioneers of the Department, but he was not destined to retain that privilege for a long time. As stated, his death occurred in June, 1871. The pall bearers at his funeral were Darius Knights, C. N. Holden, Silas McBride, D. J. Swenic, William Mullin, John McLane, George F. Foster, M. W. Powell, Adam Amberg, J. A. Kinney, A. McMonagle and John C. Schmidt. His remains were buried in Rosehill Cemetery, being escorted by members of the Paid and Volunteer Departments, Common Council and Board of Public Works.

February 16, 1865, by the amended Charter the Fire Department was placed in the hands of a board of police and fire commissioners. Under this act, on October 23, the Council passed an amended ordinance defining new fire limits and adopting regulations for the service. The Fire Commissioners appointed by the Council were: A. C. Coventry, John S. Newhouse and John Wentworth. In 1867, the underwriters of the city secured an amendment to the ordinance giving them a representation in the Board, and, under this amendment, in that year, William James was appointed Fire Commissioner, representing that interest.

By 1866, the Department consisted of eleven steamers, two hand engines, thirteen horse carts, one hook and ladder truck, one hundred and twenty paid members, one hundred and twenty-five volunteers and fifty-three horses. Within the next five years the hand-engines had disappeared, the steam engines had increased to seventeen, the horse carts to twenty-three, the paid members to one hundred and ninety-four and the horses to ninety-one. The condition of the Department previous to the great fire is set forth in the following extracts:

In 1871, the Fire Department was officered as follows: Robert A. Williams, chief fire marshal; Mathias Benner, first assistant; Charles S. Petrie, second assistant; William Musham, third assistant; Hiram Amick, clerk; John McCauley, fire warden North Division; Benjamin F. McCarthy, fire warden South Division; Charles H. Chapin, fire warden West Division; E. B. Chandler, superintendent of fire alarm and police telegraph; J. P. Barrett, chief operator.

The fire limits of the city were as follows: Beginning at Thirty-ninth Street, west to State, north to Twenty-sixth, thence west to the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway tracks; then to Twenty-second Street; thence west to South Jefferson, north to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company's tracks, then west to Throop Street, then north to Twelfth, then west to Ashland Avenue, then north to Van Buren, west to Western Avenue, north to West Lake, east to Ashland Avenue, then north to West Indiana, east to North Carpenter, north to Chicago Avenue, east to North Wells, north to the intersection of North Wells Street with Lincoln Avenue, northwesterly to Fullerton Avenue, east to Lake Michigan; south, bounded by Lake Michigan.

At the time of the great fire the following companies were in service: Steamers—"Long John" No. 1, A. McMonagle, foreman; "Waubansia" No. 2, M. Sullivan, foreman; "Jacob Rehm" No. 4, G. Charleon, foreman; "Chicago" No. 5, C. Schimmals, foreman; "Little Giant" No. 6, James Enright, foreman; "Economy" No. 8, N. Dubach, foreman; "Frank Sherman" No. 9, Joel A. Kinney, foreman; "J. B. Rice" No. 10, J. J. Walsh, foreman; "A. C. Coventry" No.

11, L. J. Walsh, foreman; "T. B. Brown" No. 12, F. W. Taplin, foreman; "Fred Gund" No. 14, Denis J. Swenick, foreman; "A. D. Titsworth" No. 13, Maurice W. Shay, foreman; "Illinois" No. 15, William Mullen, foreman; "Winnebago" No. 16, John Dreher, foreman; "R. A. Williams" No. 17, C. T. Brown, foreman. It will be remembered that "Liberty" No. 7 and "William James" No. 3 were destroyed in the repair shop, at the time of the fire, which accounts for their non-appearance in this list.

The following additional apparatus was also engaged in fighting the flames: Hook and Ladder Companies—No. 2, M. Schull, foreman; No. 3, J. H. Greene; No. 4, George Ernst. Hose Elevators—Nos. 1 and 2. Supply Hose Carts—No. 1, Leo Myers; No. 2, John Dorsey; No. 3, Matthew Schuh; No. 4, J. C. Schmidt; No. 5, J. J. Grant; No. 6, Thomas Barry.

For full particulars as to the most prodigious conflagration of modern times, the reader is referred to that portion of the history wherein it is treated as a separate topic.

ROBERT A. WILLIAMS, chief marshal at the time of the great fire, was born on the Chateaugay River, thirty miles west of Montreal City, Canada, June 14, 1828. While a boy he learned the trade of blacksmith, after which he came to Chicago in March, 1848. In August, 1849, he joined the Volunteer Fire Department, becoming a member of Engine Company No. 6. Mr. Williams served as foreman for five or six years, and then was appointed to the same position in the first steam engine company on the West Side, serving as captain until 1860, when he went to Pike's Peak for his health. During all this time Mr. Williams had worked industriously at his trade, serving in the Fire Department purely from love of a fireman's life. The next fall he returned from Pike's Peak and became foreman of a wagon factory, a position he filled for fifteen years. Mr. Williams next served in the Department as first assistant under U. P. Harris, and upon his resignation in 1868, was appointed Chief of the Department. This position he held until 1873, that responsibility resting upon him during the great fire of 1871.

FIRE ALARM TELEGRAPH.—The Fire Alarm and Police Telegraph system which is now a portion of Chicago's wonderful municipal machinery, first originated at the "Hub." Dr. Channing, of Boston, in June, 1845, when the science of electricity was in its infancy, published a general statement of his views upon applying the newly discovered agency to the protection of his city from fires and crimes. From his suggestions, sprung the present wonderful plan which is now in vogue in the larger cities of the country. Hon. Josiah Quincy, Jr., mayor of Boston, seized upon the suggestions with enthusiasm, and in 1848, recommended that the system be then adopted. At this time, Moses G. Farmer, telegraph engineer of Boston, also directed his attention to the subject, and to him, together with John N. Gamewell and Dr. Channing, is principally due the perfection of the system of fire alarm and police telegraphy, as it is now known. In 1851, Dr. Channing submitted a detailed plan to the corporation of Boston, and in April, 1852, the suggestion was put into practical operation. In 1852, the seven fire bells of New York city were connected by an electric wire. This crude connection was subsequently replaced by the American Fire Alarm and Police Telegraph. The system was put into operation in Philadelphia, April 19, 1856; St. Louis, Baltimore, New Orleans, Charleston, Montreal, and Chicago, subsequently adopting the reform. Mr. Gamewell constructed the apparatus in St. Louis, New Orleans, Charleston, and other places. In fact, if Dr. Channing may be called the father of the system, Mr. Gamewell may justly be accorded the honor of being its master builder. In May, 1858, he exhibited his apparatus to the aldermen of this city, it being placed in the council chamber, and thrown open to public inspection during certain hours of the day. He had just completed his telegraph in St. Louis, where it worked admirably. At this time, D. J. Swenick was Chief of the Department, and urged the immediate adoption of the system as something which the growing, if not the immediate, demands of the city warranted. But many citizens, believing that "the time was not yet," threw doubts upon the propriety of establishing it, and nothing definite was accomplished until 1863. At a meeting of the Common Council, held May 18, 1863, a resolution passed, providing for the appointment of a committee of three (one from each division of the city) whose duty it should be to ascertain the cost of constructing a telegraph. In the spring of 1864, the authorities took hold of the subject with such earnestness that the contract was awarded to W. H. Mendell, of the firm of John F. Kinnard & Co., who had been interested with Mr. Gamewell in the construction of the system in other cities, and who were, at that time, the owners of sixteen patents connected with it. The contract price was $70,000, the system embracing the following apparatus: One hundred and twenty-five miles of wire, one hundred and six boxes, fourteen engine-house gongs, six bell-strikers, six dial instruments for police purposes, and the necessary central-office fixtures. On the 2d of June, 1865, the system was formally turned over to the city, and pronounced to be in perfect working order. Its inauguration took place in the presence of the Mayor and Common Council, Board of Police Commissioners, Board of Public Works, and members of the Press. The committee appointed to test the working of the apparatus consisted of Alderman Shimp for the South, Alderman Bond for the West, and Alderman Clark for the North Division. After a short time of preparation had elapsed, the call was sounded from Box No. 5, located at the corner of Lake Street and Michigan Avenue. Mr. Mendell, instantly, on noting the number of the box, turned to the repeater, and placed the pointer on the dial over the figure "5." The alarm bells and engine-house gongs instantly pealed forth the number of the box, and in less than one minute, the different engines were seen hurrying toward the spot indicated. At precisely eleven minutes after four o'clock, the first signal was given, and four minutes thereafter, the first engine arrived on the spot. The engines reached the ground in the following order: "Atlantic," in four minutes; "Long John," in six; "Island Queen," in eight; "Tempest" (hose), in nine; "U. P. Harris," in thirteen; "Economy," in thirteen—from a distance of a mile and a half; "American" and "Little Giant," hose companies, in sixteen minutes; "Little Giant," steamer, also in sixteen; "Northern Star" (hose), in nineteen minutes—from a distance of two miles and a half. The committee also tested several other signal boxes. In every case, the signal was promptly received by the operator, and the whole apparatus worked to perfection. Some of the engines failed to appear on the spot indicated, and, not fully understanding the working of the telegraph on the first trial, reported at the Court House.

Since the introduction of the system, many improvements in the apparatus have taken place.* At first, the street boxes were of the style known as "cranks," and were about as clumsy contrivances, compared with what now are used, as were the gongs then in use. In 1871, these were replaced by improved apparatus, although the rest of the machinery, being of a better character, was continued for many years later, and some of it is still in service.

The central office was located, originally, in the dome of the old Court-house cupola. Old citizens and firemen can remember the network of wires that radiated thence to the tops of the buildings that surrounded the Court-house square. The operating force consisted of E. B. Chandler, superintendent; John P.

John P. Barrett

Barrett (present superintendent, William J. Kirkman (afterward murdered in Texas, while agent of the Freedmen's Bureau), Alfred Ranous, operators, and Nathaniel W. Gray, repairer. Later, the force included John Donnelly, a well-known telegrapher; W. D. S. Anderson, known by railroad and telegraph men from the lakes to the Gulf; L. B. Firman, general manager of the American District Telegraph and Telephone Exchange of this city; George E. Fuller, killed in 1873, on Engine No. 6, while responding to an alarm of fire; William J. Brown, John Kennedy, and William R. Myers. Mr. Chandler, after managing the system with signal ability for eleven years, resigned the superintendency, to take the general western agency of Ganewell & Co., in the spring of 1876, and was succeeded by John P. Barrett.

At the time of the great fire the headquarters were located in the old Court House, and it is needless to say that they were suddenly abandoned on the morning of October 9th. The system suffered severely, losing sixty boxes, sixteen gongs, three bell-strikers, eight police dials, about forty miles of wire, and the entire central office apparatus. Nevertheless, the telegraph corps, under the direction of Superintendent Chandler, displayed such energy that, on the evening of the second day, with instruments borrowed and altered to suit their needs, the West Division lines, embracing nearly one-half of the entire system, were ready for service, and by the end of the week connection was completed with such of the system as had escaped the fire in the South Division. Everything was destroyed in the North Division, except two street boxes, and about a mile of wire, and no attempt was made to connect them for several weeks.

The Fire Alarm Telegraph consists, primarily, of two parts, the signal apparatus and wires by which the presence of a fire or other cause of alarm is telegraphed to the central office, and the alarm apparatus by which the bells in different parts of the city are struck from the central office, by the operator there stationed. Distributed over the city are signal boxes. These are cottage-shaped, of heavy cast-iron, and fastened to the side of a house, or post, being communicated by insulated wires with the signal circuit overhead, while a conductor conveys atmospheric electricity collected by the wires to the earth. At first all the boxes were provided with signs stating where the keys could be found. Within the past few years, the Hooker Keyless Door has come more or less into use, which does away with the delay heretofore occasioned in times of fire, caused by the looking up of the key and properly using it. The handle or knob of the alarm protrudes so that it can be easily turned. The terrific noise which immediately ensues, however, is a sufficient guard against any undue meddling with the machine. Supposing the knob to have been turned, and the hook inside the box pulled, the number of the box is registered at the central station. The duty of the operator then is to release the mechanism of a repeater, and communicate the alarm to every bell in the city. The striking apparatus of the bells is under the action of an electro-magnet, and the number and frequency of the strokes are regulated at will by the operator at the central office. It is also in his power, when he considers it advisable, to only signal a portion of the department. This is done by means of switches, which disconnect any of the alarm circuits, and on these disconnected circuits the bells will remain silent. By this means the direct location of the conflagration can be given from every bell in the city within a few seconds after its discovery.

EDWARD BRUCE CHANDLER, first superintendent of the Fire Alarm Telegraph of Chicago, and, at present, the general agent of the Gamewell System for the west and southwest, was born in Hartford, Washington Co., N. Y., January 30, 1838. When he was in his eighth year he removed with his parents to Romco, Macomb Co., Mich., where he received a good primary education in the public schools. At sixteen years of age he entered Ann Arbor University, and graduated in the Literary Department in the summer of 1858. His long career of usefulness and success in his chosen profession, dates from his arrival in Chicago on the 31st of January, 1859. He at once commenced to learn telegraphy under E. D. L. Sweet, superintendent of the Western Division of the Illinois & Mississippi Company. Mr. Chandler was soon placed in service; first at Bureau Junction, then at Peru, Amboy, and Rock Island, Ill., where he acquitted himself so creditably that during a portion of the war period he was transferred to a more important point and post, being manager of the Springfield office. Returning to Chicago in May, 1864, he was employed as a telegraph operator and clerk in the office of the general superintendent of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. The Fire Alarm Telegraph System of Chicago had been finally completed, in the spring of 1865, by John F. Kennard, the partner of John N. Gamewell in the construction of lines in the northern cities, and, on the 15th of April, Mr. Chandler was appointed superintendent. One of his brightest, most persevering operators at that time, was John P. Barrett, his successor as superintendent. The system went into operation June 2, 1865, and Mr. Chandler continued to manage it with marked ability for a period of eleven years. On the 31st of May, 1876, he resigned the position to assume his present one. In 1852, he, in connection with others, established the Police Signal and Telephone Company, of which he was elected president, and still holds that office. Since 1874, when it was organized, he has also been treasurer of the American Electrical Association. Mr. Chandler is a prominent Mason, being a member of Home Lodge, No. 508, A. F. & A. M.; Chicago Chapter, No. 127, R. A. M.; and Chevalier Bayard Commandery, No. 52, K. T. He was married in Princeton, Ill., January 19, 1872, to Miss Emily C. Moseley, the youngest daughter of Roland Moseley, one of the earliest settlers of Bureau County. They have two children.

JOHN P. BARRETT, superintendent of the Fire Alarm Telegraph, was born in Auburn, N. Y. While still a child his parents emigrated to Chicago, where the boy received a good common school education, and "ran" with "Niagara" No. 3. In 1853, he took to the sea, and while off the coast of South America, in the Pacific Ocean fell from the mast-head and broke his arm and leg. In August, 1862, he returned to Chicago and was appointed a member of the Fire Department, serving as watchman for No. 8 and No. 3. In 1864, he was given charge of the City-hall bell, which position he held until 1865, when the city adopted the Fire Alarm Telegraph System. Under E. B. Chandler, superintendent, Mr. Barrett became an efficient operator, and upon the retirement of Mr. Chandler in May, 1876, became superintendent himself. Mr. Barrett has not rested satisfied with having acquired a well deserved reputation as an executive officer, but since he has been at the head of this Department has accomplished many important reforms and become quite an inventor. With his instrument called the "joker," the alarm is received in each engine-house the moment the box is pulled, thereby doing away with waiting for the alarm to strike on the gong from the general office. He was also the originator of the Police Patrol Service, now being generally introduced throughout the United States. Mr. Barrett was married April 20, 1868, and has had nine children, seven of whom are living. He is a life member of the Paid Fire Department Benevolent Association.

DAVID M. HYLAND, chief operator of the department of the Fire Alarm and Police Telegraph, is a native of Massachusetts, being born in Lowell thirty-five years ago, a son of Matthew W. Hyland. His parents removing to Channahon, Ill., when he was about six years of age, he naturally followed them. Remaining there two years they came to Chicago in 1859, and here their son received his education in the Kinzie school. In 1862, he went to South Bend, Ind., to attend Notre Dame University for three years, and in 1867 managed to come to Chicago and learn the mysteries of telegraphing. In 1871, being then twenty-one years of age, he entered the office of Edward B. Chandler, superintendent of the Fire Alarm Telegraph system from its establishment in June, 1865. By dint of hard work, untiring perseverance and decided ability in his profession, Mr. Hyland has risen from the humblest position to one only second to the superintendency, now held by John P. Barrett. He has been chief operator in the department since the centennial year.

THE FIRE INSURANCE PATROL was organized a few days before the great fire, and under the superintendency of Benjamin B. Bullwinkle has rendered valuable service in the saving of property. As it is not under corporate control, however, and is no portion of the Fire Department, the details of its organization and work will be given in the chapter on Fire Insurance in the ensuing volume.

BENJAMIN B. BULLWINKLE, superintendent of the Fire Insurance Patrol, has become known throughout the country for the perfection to which he has brought this annex to the Fire Department of Chicago. The appliances and improvements of the system which have been introduced, not only in the United States but in foreign lands, are many of them the children of Captain Bullwinkle's fertile brain. Especially is this true with regard to the electrical automatic contrivances which render easy, safe and rapid the movements of men and horses when an alarm is sounded. The exhibition given in honor of ex-President and Mrs. Hayes, on September 12, 1873, illustrates the efficiency and wonderful rapidity which mark the workings of the system under the superintendent's masterly management. At that time, to their unbounded astonishment, a large company of ladies and gentlemen saw the whole working force of men and horses in their places and out upon the street ready for business in just one and a half seconds from the sounding of the alarm. As reported by a local paper: "Mrs. Hayes good naturedly requested the superintendent to have it done slower, so that she and the President could see how it was done, but Captain Ben gracefully declined, saying that while he and his men were willing to repeat the performance as often as desired, they should rather do it in a little less than in any longer time." The history of such a man must be of interest to any American, especially to one who is struggling to rise by hard, honest work. He was born in New York City, March 18, 1847, being the son of Charles T. and Eliza (Laughlin) Bullwinkle. His mother died in 1854, and soon afterward his father came to Chicago, where he, too, died in 1857. Benjamin, the oldest of three children, was thus left with a younger brother and sister, without money or relatives. Notwithstanding this responsibility, he bravely refused assistance from eastern relatives, and actually set out to work to support his "little family" upon his earnings as an errand boy. Other openings presented themselves to the brave lad, as his friends commenced to take a hearty interest in his manly disposition, and as the other children grew older all contributed to the household exchequer. Mr. Bullwinkle thus continued to be the "father to his sister" until she was married, and the guardian of his brother until he learned the trade of jeweler and was able to shift for himself. When about fifteen years of age Mr. Bullwinkle obtained a situation in the office of the American Express Company, but soon afterward drifted into the charmed circle of the Fire Department as driver of the chief's wagon. At this time, as the chief was expected to be present at all the fires himself, the fortunate driver had the advantage of having a living example before him, and was not slow to improve the opportunities afforded him of learning how to "fight fire" himself. He soon mastered every branch of his profession and came into such general notice that just before the great fire, when the insurance companies decided to organize a fire patrol, as New York, Boston and Philadelphia had already done, they selected Captain Bullwinkle as the proper person to be placed at its head. Under the auspices of a committee of three, he completed the organization on the 2d of October, 1871, and although several eastern gentlemen were urged for the position of superintendent, his undisputed qualifications gained the day. The great fire annihilated so many of the insurance companies who had supported the enterprise that it seemed probable that the patrol system would fall with them. But Captain Bullwinkle kept his men together and temporary quarters were found for them on Blue Island Avenue until a frame building could be erected on Michigan Avenue near Jackson, on the present site of the Exposition Building. After it was found that Chicago was by no means ruined, but that the destruction of her fire traps had taught her a lesson by which insurance companies were in future to profit, many of these organizations entered enthusiastically into the work of placing the patrol upon a more substantial basis. In April, 1872, Captain Bullwinkle's force moved into a spacious brick building at No. 113 Franklin Street, built expressly for it by the Chicago Board of Underwriters. In 1877-78, the brick building No. 176 Monroe Street was erected by L. Z. Leiter, but its interior was entirely finished by the members of the patrol under the direction of the superintendent. The building was formally opened by "Patrol No. 1" on February 16, 1878. "Patrol No. 2" was organized on August 3, 1875, with a captain and four men, for duty on the West Side a brick building having been erected expressly for it on Peoria Street near Congress. On January 26, 1882, after the stock-yards fire the packers furnished a building and entire equipment for a patrol, paying one-half the expense of maintaining the same. Both this patrol and No. 2 are under the personal supervision of Superintendent Bullwinkle, who seems omnipresent and is certainly omnipotent in his particular province. That his services are fully appreciated is evident from the comfortable and even elegant quarters which have been furnished him and his men. He has had many marks of personal favor, such as the presentation by his employes, in December, 1875, of a gold badge costing $450, and a magnificent gold watch, chain and badge from the Underwriters, which testimonial was valued at $825, and received by the superintendent with unfeigned pride, in February, 1878. Among the Masons, Captain Bullwinkle is held in high esteem, and he is an officer in Apollo Commandery, No. 1, Knights Templar. He is a member of the Third Presbyterian Church. On November 5, 1873, Mr. Bullwinkle was married to Miss Angelica J. Moody, and has one son.

FIREMEN'S BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The first act to incorporate the Firemen's Benevolent Association of the Volunteer Department was approved by Governor French, June 21, 1852. The association had, however, previously been organized in 1847. From 1858, up to and including 1871, the officers were as follows:

Presidents.—John T. Edwards, 1858-64; U. P. Harris, 1864-66; Peter L. Yoe, 1866-70; John L. Gerber, 1870-71.

Vice-Presidents.—Darius Knights, 1858; Cyrus P. Bradley, 1858-62; Frederick Letz, 1862-63; Robert Letz, 1863-65; Robert A. Williams, 1865-69; John L. Gerber, 1869-70; J. M. Johnston, 1870-71.

Secretaries.—P. P. Wood, 1858-62; Augustus H. Burley, 1862-65; Thomas H. Buckley, 1865-70; D. J. Swenie, 1870-71.

Treasurer.—Charles N. Holden, 1858-71.

The Benevolent Association of the Paid Department was organized in the fall of 1863. In answer to a call issued to all the companies in the Paid Fire Department, a meeting was held, September 12, 1863, at the engine house of the "Long John" Engine Company, on LaSalle Street, near the old Chamber of Commerce. D. J. Swenie was chosen president of the meeting and Joel Prescott secretary. A committee was appointed to draft a constitution and by-laws, which were adopted October 14th, and an association organized with the following officers: Francis Agnew, president; Charles T. Brown, vice-president; Thomas Barry, secretary; Joel Prescott, treasurer; J. J. Gillespie, D. J. Swenie and L. J. Walsh, finance committee. The initiation fee was fixed at $1 and the annual dues at $5. Many who desired to be members were so confident that these fees would not be sufficient to maintain the association and also pay $8 per week for sick benefits and other expenses, that they refused to join the organization. But they were wrong in their prognostications, as the subsequent prosperity of the association sufficiently indicated. For the first year of its existence, the balance in the treasury was $486.83. At the time of the great fire there was over $5,000 in the treasury.

From the organization of the association, up to and including the time of the great fire, the officers were as follows:

President, Frank Agnew, 1864-71; Vice-Presidents, Charles T. Brown, 1864; J. J. Gillespie, 1864-67; M. W. Powell, 1867-68; J. P. Barrett, 1868-71; Secretaries, Theodore Barry, 1864-66; Leo Myers, 1866-69; Hiram Amick (Recording), 1869-71; Joel A. Kinney (Financial), 1869-71; Treasurer, Joel Prescott, 1863-71.

COMPANY SKETCHES.—The following sketches of steam fire engine companies include those organized previous to 1871:

"Long John" Engine Company No. 1. As has been stated, this company was first put under full pay in December, 1858, with Joel A. Kinney as its foreman. He held the position but a few months, being succeeded the next year by Thomas Barry. Mr. Barry remained in this position for two years, when he was transferred to Engine Company No. 8. In 1868, Alexander McMonagle was appointed foreman of the company, the "Long John" engine having made its last appearance during the early portion of the year. On the 28th of January, 1868, occurred the Lake-street fire, which was its final work, the steamer soon afterward going into the "scrap-heap." "Long John the Second" arrived from the Silsby works, on the 20th of June, and was immediately put into service. It remained intact, however, for only about eighteen months; for, on January 17, 1870, while going down the approach to Washington-street tunnel, on its way to a South Canal-street fire, and indulging in a contest of speed with the "A. D. Titsworth" No. 13, it was overturned, and brought up, at the mouth of the tunnel, a total wreck. James Enright, engineer, now engineer of No. 16, was seriously injured. The third "Long John" arrived January 30, 1870, and was put into service on the 2d of February. Mr. McMonagle continued to act as foreman until after 1871.

"Enterprise" Engine Company No. 2 was organized December 26, 1858, and was located in the quarters vacated by the "Long John" in the old Armory Building, corner of Adams and Franklin streets. The first members were: Delos N. Chappel, foreman; John Sloan, Maurice Walsh, Alexander Ross, John Lewis, Patrick Guilfoil, John Agnew, pipemen; George Roberts, engineer; Harry Roberts, assistant engineer; John Heber and George Delemater, drivers; Michael Powers, watchman. Mr. Chappel remained as foreman until the summer of 1859, when he was succeeded by P. P. Wood. Mr. Wood joined "Battery A," in 1862, and became captain because of meritorious service. James J. Walsh ("Ginger") succeeded Captain Wood. Mr. Walsh is now captain of Engine Company No. 22, located at No. 460 Webster Avenue, and is the oldest foreman, of continuous service, in the department. He remained as acting foreman until No. 2 was reorganized, as "J. B. Rice" No. 10, in February, 1866, and the engine transferred to Bridgeport. Joel A. Kinney became foreman of No. 2 in April, 1866, remaining one year. Mathias Benner succeeded him in April, 1867, continuing thus to act until May 4, 1868.

"Atlantic" Engine Company No. 3, the first company put into commission under full pay, was organized October 23, 1858, and was located on the North Side, No. 225 Michigan Street, where No. 3 now is. The following were the first members: George McCagg, foreman; L. J. Walsh, John O'Neil, William Toner, Frank Agnew, Martin Dollard, James Maxwell, pipemen; George Roberts, engineer; Harry Roberts, assistant engineer; William Dexter and Francis T. Swenie, drivers; Robert Williams, watchman. Mr. McCagg was foreman until 1861, when Mr. Walsh succeeded him and remained in that position until after 1871.

"Island Queen" Engine Company No. 4 was organized January 5, 1859, and located at the corner of Clinton and Washington streets. Afterwards its headquarters were in No. 6's house, on West Lake Street. The original members of "Island Queen" were as follows: Robert A. Williams, foreman; Leo Myers, Peter Schimmels, Adolph Wilkie, Nicholas Eckhardt, John Hocksfeare, Anton Lawson and Henry McBride, pipemen; Fred Monday, engineer; William Johnson, assistant engineer; Patrick Garrity and Joseph Smith, drivers; John Myer, watchman. Mr. Williams remained foreman until the spring of 1860, being succeeded, for a short time, by John McLane. In 1861, came Charles T. Brown, who served until after the fire.

"U. P. Harris" Engine Company No. 5 was put in commission January 26, 1860, and was stationed on West Jackson Street, between Clinton and Jefferson streets. The original members were: Alfred F. Stoddard, foreman; Leo Myers, John Harrington, John Drehr and John Scanlon, pipemen; Robert Etheridge, engineer; Frank Sowersby, assistant engineer; John Windheim and Charles Nolan, drivers; Michael Powers, watchman. Mr. Myers remained foreman until he was appointed first assistant of the Department in 1863. William Sodem served from 1863 until 1868, and Christian Schimmels from that year until after the fire.

M. W. CONWAY, chief of the Third Battalion, was born in Ireland, in 1842, settling in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., with his parents when he was six years of age. Coming to Chicago in 1855, he obtained a good education, joining the "Garden City" Hose Company No. 6, the next year, when fourteen years of age. He remained a member of the company until it disbanded in 1859, and soon afterwards moved to Memphis, Tenn., where he remained until the breaking out of the war. He then returned to Chicago, and enlisted in Mulligan's Brigade (23d Illinois). At the conclusion of the war he again became a citizen of Chicago and, in December, 1868, was appointed pipeman of Engine Company No. 5, which position he held during the great fire of 1871. His engine put the first water on the front of the fire. In 1872, he was transferred to Tempest Hose Company, which was replaced in 1875 by the first chemical engine ever in service in Chicago. He was captain of No. 17, in 1873, and of No. 7 during the following year, receiving the commendation of the Board of Police and Fire Commissioners for the courage he displayed in the fire of July, 1874. Mr. Conway was promoted to the position of Chief of the Seventh Battalion in September, 1875, his headquarters being at No. 15's house; and in April, 1877, was transferred to the Fourth, being stationed at the house of Engine Company No. 12. In May, 1886, he assumed command of the Fifth Battalion, being transferred to Hook and Ladder No. 5, on West Twelfth Street. In April, 1882, he was given charge of the Third Battalion, with headquarters at No. 80 West Erie Street.

"Little Giant" Engine Company No. 6 was organized on the 13th of February, 1860, and stationed at No. 98 Dearborn Street. The original members were: Fred A. Bragg, foreman; William R. Hoisington, Samuel Cunningham, Nelson Edson, and Richard Stringer, pipemen; Samuel Furlong, engineer; William A. Durfee, assistant engineer; John Callahan and William J. Moore, drivers; J. R. George, watchman. Upon the date of organization, given above, the engine arrived, via the Grand Trunk and Michigan Central Railroad, from the Amoskeag works. It was one of the three ordered by the city, weighed six thousand five hundred pounds, cost $3,500, and was located at the engine house of old "Fire King" No. 1. The "Little Giant" was reorganized in 1864, its headquarters being on Maxwell Street, near Canal. John Harrington was the first foreman, being succeeded by Richard Brown, who held the position until 1868. William Musham then became foreman, serving until after the fire.

WILLIAM MUSHAM, first assistant fire marshal, was born in Chicago, February 9, 1839. Having obtained a good common school education and learned the carpenter's trade, he joined the "Philadelphia" Hose Company when only sixteen years of age. Next he became a member of "Phoenix" Company No. 8, which was then located at the present site of No. 11's house. When Engine Company No. 8 was disbanded, in 1858, to give place to paid company "Atlantic" No. 3, he left the Department and had no connection with it until 1861, when he was appointed pipeman on "Little Giant" Engine Company No. 6. In 1865, he attended the grand firemen's review in Philadelphia, remaining in that city and becoming a member of the famous "Fairmount" Engine Company. The next year he returned to Chicago connecting himself with "T. B. Brown" Engine Company No. 12. In the fall of 1868, he left the company to become foreman of "Little Giant" No. 6. When the great fire occurred Mr. Musham was acting as captain of the company, which did such noble service under him that, in March, 1872, the Board of Fire Commissioners promoted him to the position of third assistant marshal, having charge of the entire West Division. In April, 1877, he was transferred from the Fourth to the Second Battalion, his old comrades showing their sorrow at his departure by presenting him with a silver tea-set and an elegant fireman's hat. In May, 1880, Mr. Musham became first assistant fire marshal and inspector of the Department, which position he still fills in every good sense of the word. His early experience as a carpenter has served him well, as for the past quarter of a century he has had charge of all repairs and rebuilding of engine houses. Mr. Musham was married in September, 1873, to Miss Kate McFadden, daughter of Michael McFadden, who came to Chicago in 1840. They have a family of six children. William Musham, his father, came to Chicago in 1835 and resided here until his death, in 1844. He was captain of one of the first vessels that came to Chicago, and had been a sailor from boyhood.

"Liberty" Engine Company No. 7 was put in commission April 27, 1861, and located at No. 180 Dearborn Avenue. Its original members were: D. J. Swenie, foreman; John O'Neil, Frank Agnew, and William Toner, pipemen; William Horner, engineer; Frank Sowersby, assistant engineer; Horace Ward and William Mullen, drivers; John Farrell, watchman. Mr. Swenie was the first and only foreman, serving until No. 7's successor, "Fred. Gund" No. 14, was organized, in 1867.

PETER SCHNUR, marshal and chief of the Sixth Battalion, was born in the city of New York, September 28, 1842. When six months of age, his parents came to Chicago, where he received his education, and was apprenticed to a tinsmith. He never learned his trade, however, on account of the breaking out of the war. Mr. Schnur first enlisted in Taylor's Battery, passing through some of the bloodiest battles of the war, and receiving an honorable discharge July 24, 1864. Returning to Chicago, he commenced working as a substitute in Engine Company No. 8, the captain of which was the late Thomas Barry. After serving three weeks, he was appointed a member, and given the position of driver of "Liberty" Company No. 7, under the command of Captain D. J. Swenie. In 1872, he was promoted to be assistant foreman of Engine Company No. 12, serving as such until December 31, 1872, when he became captain of Hook and Ladder No. 2. There he remained until October, 1873, when he was transferred as captain to his old company (No. 14), succeeding Mr. Swenie, who had been made first assistant marshal. On the 21st of January, 1878, Mr. Schnur was appointed marshal and chief of the Third Battalion. In March, 1882, he was placed in charge of the Sixth Battalion, his headquarters being at No. 322 East Twenty-second Street. Marshal Schnur was married in January, 1878, to Miss Margaret E. Fearon, a daughter of Bartholomew Fearon, an early settler of Lake County. He is a member of the Benevolent Association of the Paid Fire Department, both city and state; also, of Court Benevolent Lodge, No. 38, I. O. F.

"Economy" Engine Company No. 8 was organized November 2, 1861, and was located at No. 265 Eighteenth Street, the following being the original list of members: Thomas Barry, foreman; John Leahan, P. R. Burns, John Agnew, pipemen; Thomas Cooper, engineer; E. S. Hammond, assistant engineer; Edward Baggot and John Windheim, drivers; John P. Barrett, watchman. In September, 1871, Mr. Barry was transferred to "Douglas" Hose No. 6, Nicholas Dubach being appointed foreman of No. 8.

THOMAS BARRY, ex-assistant fire marshal and chief of Sixth Battalion, was born in Ireland March 3, 1832. When eleven years of age he emigrated to America, settling first in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y. For three years previous to 1850, he, although but a boy, did good service with the Department, learning the trade of boiler maker. In the latter part of 1850, when he was eighteen years of age, he arrived in Chicago, resuming his trade, and, after resting five years, becoming a member of "Red Jacket" Engine Company No. 4. Mr. Barry remained with the company until the Paid Department was organized. He was appointed "Long John's" first pipeman, and in 1859 commenced to serve as its foreman. In November, 1861, he was transferred to "Economy" No. 8, as foreman; and remained in charge until June, 1865, when he was injured by the falling of a brick wall on South Water Street. His limbs were fractured in eleven different places, and he was picked up for dead, but skillful care, combined with his vigorous constitution, brought him out of the shadow of death and made a hardy man of him. After his recovery he became watchman of No. 6 for about a year, being again elected captain of the "Economy" in June, 1867. In July he was again injured, and in January, 1871, at Armour's packing house. In September of that year he was transferred to the "Douglas" Hose No. 6, where he served during the fire of October. In the following November, he took charge of Engine No. 19, and in November, 1874, he was promoted to the position which he held at the time of his death.

"Frank Sherman" Engine Company No. 9 was organized March 15, 1864, with headquarters at No. 97 Dearborn Street. The original members were: John J. Gillespie, foreman; M. W. Shay, John R. George and Samuel Cunningham, pipemen; William Donlan, engineer; John Holm, assistant engineer; William J. Moore and Richard Stringer, drivers; John P. Fearn, watchman. Mr. Shay became foreman in 1865, Mr. Gillespie having been promoted to the assistant marshalship. In 1867, Joel A. Kinney became foreman of the Company, holding that position at the time of the great fire in 1871. The headquarters of No. 9 were changed from Dearborn Street to No. 2527 Cottage Grove Avenue.

JOEL A. KINNEY, assistant fire marshal and chief of the Fourth Battalion, is a native of Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., where he was born July 19, 1828, being the son of Joel and Pamela Kinney. In 1833, he removed with his parents to Hamilton, Upper Canada, coming to Wheeling, Cook Co., Ill., in 1837. On the 25th of November, 1840, he settled in Chicago. Soon afterward the lad received his first baptism by fire; for while playing among the ruins of a conflagration on the southwest corner of Lake and LaSalle streets, he was so badly burned as to be nearly crippled for life. When fourteen years of age he entered the printing office of the Democrat, and two years later became one of the original composers on the Journal. Young Kinney was also one of the "crew" of two boys who carried that paper to its few patrons in 1844. In addition to his other duties he acted as roller boy—in fact, was a youth of all work. During this year, in May, he commenced his long term of service as a fireman by joining "Neptune" Bucket Company No. 1, which in November, 1846, was reorganized as Engine Company No. 4. In 1852, Mr. Kinney joined Engine Company No. 1, becoming first assistant engineer of the Department in 1855 and foreman of "Long John" Steam Engine Company No. 1, in December, 1858. Colorado and silver bonanzas claimed his attention in the spring of 1860, he departing for the west in April of that year. On October 1, 1862, he joined the Independent Battery of Colorado, being promoted to the second lieutenantcy, May 24, 1865. Lieutenant Kinney saw considerable service up to the summer of 1864, being stationed a portion of the time at Fort Larned, western Kansas, and participating in the closing scenes of the war in Missouri. When he returned to Chicago, in the fall of 1865, he found it virtually impossible to avoid service in the Fire Department; since not only was he warmly urged to enter it, but all his leanings were that way. In April, 1866, he was appointed foreman of Engine Company No. 2, and a year later was transferred to the reorganized "Frank Sherman" Engine Company No. 9. Mr. Kinney and his company passed through the great fire with very much credit to all concerned. In February, 1874, Mr. Kinney was promoted to his present position. He is a prominent member of the old Fireman's Benevolent Association; also of the Benevolent Association of the Paid Department, being its financial secretary for a number of years.

"J. B. Rice" Engine Company No. 10 was organized February 19, 1866, and located at No. 338 State Street. Following are the original members: James J. Walsh, foreman; Jacob Held, Nicholas Barth, Thomas Dunigan, pipemen; George Roberts, engineer; Fred Allen, assistant engineer; Samuel Ripley, Archy Martin, drivers; Jacob Reis, watchman. The "J. B. Rice" engine was first publicly tested in the Court-house square, September 26, 1865. Among the spectators were Enoch McGrue, chief engineer of the Cincinnati Fire Department; A. B. Taylor, chief engineer of the Fond du Lac Department; J. F. Kinnard, patentee and proprietor of the Fire Alarm and Police Telegraph; and Commissioners John Wentworth and Brown. The engine was stationed at the northeast corner of the square, taking water from the fountain basin. At five o'clock the wood was ignited, and in eight minutes and a quarter the steamer began to throw water. With less than fifty pounds of steam, through a one and a quarter inch nozzle, a stream was thrown one hundred and seventy-five feet high. This was never before accomplished in this city, except by the "Neptune" in 1858, when, through a nozzle of the same size, it threw a stream to an altitude of over two hundred feet. The horizontal stream, through four sections of hose, one and a quarter inch nozzle, "Siamese" connection, was thrown to a distance of two hundred and thirty feet. The "Neptune" threw a stream two hundred and sixty feet, but it must be remembered that this engine weighed four times as much as the "Rice." The "J. B. Rice" was built at the Amoskeag works at Manchester, N. H., being similar to the "Frank Sherman." Mr. Walsh remained foreman of the "Rice" until 1872.

CHARLES S. PETRIE, assistant fire marshal, secretary of the Fire Department and superintendent of repair-shop, was born in Chicago, September 25, 1840. He obtained his early education at St. Joseph's Catholic School in this city, and afterward at South Bend, Ind. When in his sixteenth year he both entered the employ of the McCormick Reaper Company and joined the Volunteer Fire Department as a runner. In 1856, he was accepted as a regular member of Engine Company No. 11. Between 1858 and 1862, Mr. Petrie was steamboating between New Orleans and Nashville, in "scrambling" for gold, for a short time, at Pike's Peak, Colo., and in acting as assistant engineer on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. On the 30th of January, 1862, he returned to Chicago, and took charge of the tug boat "Union." He held the position of assistant of "Atlantic" Engine Company No. 3 for two years and a half from September 16, 1862, and then returned to the McCormick Reaper Works. On Friday, February 1, 1866, he was appointed to the position of assistant engineer of the "J. B. Rice" No. 10, and remained in that position until Edwin Roberts, the engineer, died. Mr. Petrie was promoted to the vacant position July 2, 1867. When the "William James" No. 3 was organized during the following November, he was transferred to it as engineer. The steamer was destroyed at the repair-shop during the great fire of 1871, but Captain John McLean R. J. Harmon, Harry Anderson and Mr. Petrie did such excellent service as pipemen in the southwest lumber district that they were presented with a purse of $400 by the business men of the community. On Friday, February 14, 1872, he was promoted to the position of third assistant fire marshal in charge of the West Division, having his headquarters at Engine House No. 17. He became second assistant fire marshal, on Friday, March 1, being assigned to the North Division, with headquarters at Supply House No. 3. Marshal Petrie acquitted himself with his usual judgment and bravery at the fire of 1874, being found, by a friend, during the height of the excitement, with his boots burned completely from his feet. To return to his "lucky day." On Friday, April 11, 1877, he accepted the position of superintendent of the repair-shop, at the same time going to all fires upon second alarm, and taking the place of the marshals when the latter were absent. At the time of the burning of the Academy of Music, on Halsted Street, October 12, 1880, Marshal Petrie had an extremely narrow escape from death. With other firemen he was on the roof when it suddenly gave way, carrying them all into a cauldron of fire. He received several bad bruises and a terrible shock. Mr. Petrie's position at extensive conflagrations is generally the one of the greatest danger, as he is consigned to direct operations from the roofs. Since Marshal Petrie has held the position of superintendent of the repair-shops he has invented the heaters used in the Department, also the stand-pipe and water-tower combined, and numerous smaller devices attached to the apparatus, which are generally admitted to be of great value. He has been secretary of the Fire Department since the death of Hans Haerting, January 15, 1881. He is a great favorite among the men, and is much interested in benevolent and social objects. He has held the office of president of the Mutual Aid Association of the Paid Fire Department, and was treasurer for three years of the Benevolent Association. He joined the Court Garden City, No. 1, Order of Foresters, February 2, 1876, and, with several others, organized Court Benevolence, No. 30, January 27, 1880. From this Court he was elected a representative to the High Court, which position he still holds. He served one term as high chief ranger, and to his untiring efforts is greatly due the present prosperous condition of the order. He served as one of the delegates of the world, at London, in 1879. He was one of the originators of Illinois Council No. 615, Royal Arcanum, chartered September 7, 1881, holding the offices of regent, past regent, and treasurer. Marshal Petrie became a member of D. C. Cregier Lodge, No. 643, A. F. & A. M., in September, 1879; Corinthian Chapter, No. 69, R. A. M., February, 1880; St. Bernard Commandery, No. 35, K. T., November, 1881. He is a charter member of Teutonia Mennerchor, and has been president of the N. W. B. Social Club for two years. Mr. Petrie was married to Miss Martha A. Morton, of Nashville, Tenn., on January 30, 1862, shortly after his return to Chicago from his river service between that city and New Orleans.

"A. C. Coventry" Engine Company No. 11 was organized in January, 1866, and was located at No. 225 Michigan Street, the following being the original members: Lawrence J. Walsh, foreman; George L. Taylor, Thomas Maxwell, Fred Williams, pipemen; James Furlong, engineer; Bart. Hardy, assistant engineer; Eugene Sullivan, John Kennedy, drivers; William McIntyre, watchman. Mr. Walsh continued to act as foreman of the company until 1872.

"T. B. Brown" Engine Company No. 12 was organized on February 19, 1866, and was located at No. 80 West Lake Street, with the following roll of members: Charles T. Brown, foreman; Fred Taplen, Nicholas Eckhardt, Adolph Wilke, Charles Gagenheimer, pipemen; Charles Noble, engineer; Thaddeus Haley, stoker; John Windheim and Jacob Ross, drivers; Daniel O'Connell, watchman. Mr. Brown remained foreman of the company, and its successor, the "R. A. Williams" No. 17, until after the great fire.

"A. D. Titsworth" Engine Company No. 13 was organized in January, 1867, and located at No. 97 Dearborn Street, with the following members: Maurice W. Shay, foreman; James E. Furlong, T. Mognahan, S. Paine, A. Barber, John Fitzgerald, Chris. Goodwin, J. M. Reis, Charles Kramer, T. Sanderson. Mr. Shay remained foreman until October, 1873, when he was promoted to the position of assistant marshal.

MAURICE W. SHAY, assistant fire marshal and chief of the First Battalion, was born in Nova Scotia, March 22, 1832. When six years of age he removed with his parents to Eastport, Me., where, in 1839, he witnessed the great fire in that city. The casualty left a deep impression on his boyish mind, and prompted him to adopt the arduous and meritorious life of a fireman. In 1840, he removed to Charlestown, Mass., where he was reared, and seven years later, being then but a lad of fifteen, commenced running with "Warren" Engine Company No. 4, of the Volunteer Fire Department. On visiting that city, in 1884, he was made a member of the Volunteer Veteran Association of Charlestown, Mass. He removed to Cleveland in 1849, and the next year joined "Phoenix" Engine Company No. 4. In 1852, Pittsburgh, Penn., claimed him as an efficient, brave and aspiring fireman, serving for three months as a member of "Eagle" Company. He returned to his former company—the "Phoenix," of Cleveland—in 1855; he was elected second assistant foreman of the company, and in the next year was advanced to the position of assistant engineer of the Fire Department. Mr. Shay came to Chicago in October, 1856, appearing first as a pipeman of "Liberty" Hose No. 6, in 1857. One year later he was elected assistant foreman, remaining in this position until the company was disbanded and the Paid Fire Department organized. In September, 1861, after being out of the service for two years, he was appointed truckman on Hook and Ladder Company No. 1. While an assistant of Hose Company No. 6, in October, 1857, at a large fire on Lake Street, he was working on the top of a wall and fell down with it, many firemen being killed, among others being his gallant foreman, John B. Dickey. Mr. Shay had a narrow escape himself. Transferred to "Little Giant" Engine Company No. 6, in 1862, two years later he was promoted to be foreman, and given charge of "Frank Sherman" Engine Company No. 9, which was organized in March, 1864. In January, 1867, the "A. D. Titworth" Engine Company No. 13 was organized, and Mr. Shay was transferred from the "Frank Sherman" to become its first foreman. No. 13 ever stood in the front rank of the crack engine companies of Chicago, and Mr. Shay was mainly instrumental in bringing it to its splendid position. Although a strict disciplinarian, he was, and is, a great favorite with his men. As one evidence of this warm feeling of respect and admiration, it may be remarked that in February, 1869, his personal friends in the department presented him with an elegant gold watch. In the great fire his company did noble service, taking position on Jefferson Street and stubbornly contesting the progress of the flames westward. On October 3, 1873, Mr. Shay was promoted to be assistant fire marshal, having been detailed as such while foreman of his old company. His headquarters were at first, the house of Hook and Ladder Company No. 4, on East Twenty-second Street, but when he was transferred to the First Battalion in November, 1874, his headquarters were at Hook and Ladder No. 6, on Franklin Street, and subsequently at No. 13's house on Dearborn Street. Here he still is stationed, an efficient, faithful, and popular officer of the Department. Notwithstanding which, Mr. Shay was never married—except in the columns of the daily press. On account of ill-health he was obliged to relinquish active duty in the department, but his services were demanded, and therefore was appointed inspector of the Fire Department, and since then has held that position. Three years ago he was invited by the Board of Fire Commissioners of St. Paul, Minn., to visit that city, and was tendered the position of chief of the Fire Department of that city; this honor he declined—preferring Chicago and his old associations.

"Fred Gund" Engine Company No. 14 was organized on April 7, 1867, and was stationed at No. 180 North Dearborn Street. The following were the original members: Denis J. Swenie, foreman; J. Enright, J. Green, E. O'Neil, pipemen; William Horner, engineer; J. Berry, assistant engineer; P. Schnur and D. Daley, drivers; John Farrell, watchman. Mr. Swenie was foreman at the time of the fire.

D. J. SWENIE, the first and last chief of the Paid Fire Department of Chicago, was born in Glasgow, July 29, 1834. He is therefore in his fifty-first year, a vigorous man in every sense of the word; and the position which he has held for five years—the head of one of the grandest fire departments in the world—is but the logical result of thirty-five years of arduous and faithful service. Mr. Swenie came to Chicago in July, 1849, an honest industrious boy of fifteen, and engaged in the manufacture of leather hose, fire hats, etc., with C. E. Peck, whose house was on Lake Street. In this way he became acquainted with the volunteer firemen, and before he was a year older had joined No. 3 Hose Company. Next he became a member of "Niagara" Company No. 3, and, in 1852, when only eighteen years of age, was elected assistant foreman of "Red Jacket" Engine Company No. 4. In September, 1854, after the disbandment of the "Red Jackets," he returned to No. 3, where he remained until 1856, when he was elected first assistant engineer of the Department. In March, 1858, he was chosen chief engineer, organizing the Paid Steam Fire Department. The opposition shown to him by the element of the volunteer service, would have caused a less courageous man than Chief Swenie to have withdrawn from a life which brought so many hardships and perplexities. In February, 1859, U. P. Harris was nominated for chief engineer, and elected in March. For two years he ran with "Atlantic" Hose Company No. 3, as an exempt member. In 1861, Mr. Swenie was appointed foreman of "Liberty" Engine No. 7. In 1867, the engine was transferred to another house, and he received a new engine called the "Fred Gund" No. 14, still retaining his old members and holding his position as foreman. On the tenth anniversary of his appointment as foreman, his many friends in the Department gave a banquet in honor of the occasion at "No. 14" house, which was a grand affair. C. N. Holten presented him with a gold watch and chain, with a miniature fire-hat and trumpet, as charms. Upon the resignation of Chief Harris, in February, 1868, K. A. Williams was appointed by the Fire Commissioners to fill the vacancy. Mr. Swenie was tendered the position of first assistant, but preferring, for the present, to retain his old position, he continued to discharge the duties pertaining thereto until October, 1873, when he was appointed first assistant fire marshal under Chief Benner. At the great fire he was the means of saving four squares on the North Side, bounded by Michigan and Market streets and the river. Mayor Harrison appointed him acting-chief July 3, 1879, and upon the retirement of Mr. Benner in November, he became the head of the Department, being confirmed on the 10th of that month.

"Illinois" Engine Company No. 15 was organized in December, 1867, its headquarters being on the corner of May and Twenty-second streets. Its original members were: William Mullin, foreman; Francis Berry, engineer; James Kingswell, stoker; Norman T. Ormsby and Mathias Shafer, drivers; Eugene Vallie and Hugh Ward, pipemen. Mr. Mullin continued as foreman up to the time of the fire.

"Winnebago" Engine Company No. 16, with four call members, was organized at the same time as No. 15, and located on the corner of State and Thirty-first streets. The following were its first members: John Dreher, foreman; James Enright, engineer; Patrick Crowley, stoker; Thomas Byrnes, driver; Gilman Palmer, watchman; Francis Butterfield, Frank Howard and Thomas McAuliffe, pipemen. Mr. Dreher continued to act as foreman until after the fire.

"R. A. Williams" Engine Company No. 17, the last engine company organized before the fire, was put in commission on the 16th of February, 1870, and was located at No. 80 West Lake Street. The original members were as follows: Charles T. Brown, foreman; John Cook, S. H. Scadin, A. J. Calder, and David Hyland, pipemen; John E. Ferguson, engineer; Charles Schroeder, stoker; Adam S. Barber and Patrick Lamey, drivers; Daniel O'Connell, watchman. Mr. Brown was foreman at the time of the fire.

"Pioneer" Hook and Ladder No. 1, organized August 13, 1859, was located at No. 121 LaSalle Street. George Ernst was its first foreman; Charles T. Brown, William Kelch, Edward Fingerhutt and Aaron J. Sloan, truckmen; John P. Ferns, driver. Mr. Ernst was succeeded by F. T. Swenie, who served from June, 1871, to April, 1872.

"Protection" Hook and Ladder No. 2 was organized in October, 1868, and was located at No. 83 West Jackson Street, with the following list of members: James J. Grant, foreman; Hugo Franzen, Fred. Reis, J. A. Cooke and Lewis Fiene, truckmen; N. T. Ormsby, driver. Mr. Grant remained foreman until after the fire.

"Rescue" Hook and Ladder No. 3 was organized January 24, 1871, being located at No. 36 Chicago Avenue. Its original members were John H. Green, foreman; William Friese, Thomas Maxwell, Charles M. Duffy and James Duff, truckmen; Norman N. Holt, driver. Mr. Green continued as foreman until April 10, 1877, when he was promoted to be assistant marshal, and was succeeded by Mr. Holt.

Hook and Ladder Company No. 4, the last created before the fire of October, was organized on the 11th of October, 1871, and located on Sanger Street, near McGregor. The members were: George Ernst, foreman; Joseph O'Donohue, H. H. Breternetz and Francis Flanagan, truckmen; G. W. Weller, driver. Mr. Ernst was foreman at the time of the great fire.

Hose Company No. 1 was organized September 15, 1859, and was located on the corner of Clinton and Washington streets; Engine Company No. 4 removing to No. 80 West Lake Street to accommodate the new organization. Following are the first members: Edward Mendson, foreman; Frank Lily and John Fowler, pipemen; Charles Anderson, driver. Peter Schummels, Matthew Schuh and Leo Myers were successively foremen of the company, until the close of 1871.

LEO MYERS was born in Chicago June 26, 1834, being the first child of French parents who had this city for his birthplace. Commencing, in 1847, as a torch-boy in Bucket Company No. 1, he helped, later, to organize the "Lawrence Engine Company No. 7, becoming a pipeman. He next joined the "Niagara Engine Company No. 8, where he remained until the Paid Department was organized. In 1849 he was chosen pipeman on the "Island Queen," was promoted to foreman of "U. P. Harris" No. 5, and, in 1863, to assistant fire marshal. Holding that position for one year he resigned, afterward serving as foreman of "Supply" Hose No. 1, until 1872, after which he traveled for the Babcock Manufacturing Company for two years, and then returned to the Department. First, he acted for a short time as captain of No. 10, being transferred, in 1874, to No. 23. He was promoted to the assistant marshalship in April, 1877, in charge of the Seventh Battalion. His territory covers the lumber district, one of the most dangerous localities in the city, and the selection of Mr. Myers for this position showed the high estimation in which he was held, and which he has merited.

"American" Hose Company No. 2 was organized in November, 1859, and located at No. 31 Blue Island Avenue. The list of first members was as follows: Edward Baggot, foreman; Frank Powell, pipeman; and John Kennedy, driver. Mr. Baggot was succeeded by John Dorsey, who was foreman at the time of the fire.

"North Star" Hose Company No. 3 was organized during the month of October, 1863, and was stationed in the North Division, corner of Larrabee Street and North Avenue. John Reinwald, Matthew Mathias and John E. Schmidt were the first members. In 1864, this company was merged into "Island Queen" No. 4.

"John A. Huck" Hose Company No. 3 was organized in June, 1867, and located at the corner of Oak and Rush streets, with the following list of members: Foreman, Matthew Schuh; pipeman, Nicholas Wenmand; driver, Peter Lawson.

"Lincoln" Hose Company No. 4 was organized in July, 1870, and stationed at No. 454 Webster Avenue, with the following roll of members: John C. Schmidt, foreman; Edward Varges, hoseman; John Hardell, driver.

In August, 1870, a new apparatus, called a "Hose Elevator," was added to the Department, located at the corner of Washington and Franklin streets; and in January, 1871, another machine for the same purpose (elevating hose to the top stories of high buildings,) but of the Skinner patent, was put in use. Although seemingly unwieldy and impracticable, yet, when the firemen became accustomed to its use, it proved very efficient, and saved vast amounts of property, which nothing but a similar apparatus could have accomplished.

In September, 1871, Hose Companies "Washington" No. 5 and "Douglas" No. 6 were organized. No. 5 was located at No. 1004 West Madison Street, with the following members: J. J. Grant, foreman; James Young, hoseman; R. A. Bunnell, driver. No. 6 was located at No. 603 Cottage Grove Avenue, with the following members: Thomas Barry, foreman; George H. Idell, hoseman; Eugene Sullivan, driver.

Engine No. 14 was temporarily stationed at No. 39 Rawson Street, at quarters built for Hose No. 7 after the fire.

LOSSES BY FIRE.—From the time the Paid Department was fairly organized, and the last of the volunteer companies were disbanded—from 1863 up to and including the year 1871, but excluding the damage done by the great fire—the total loss above insurance in the city of Chicago, amounted to $13,779,848; the insurance $10,851,952. Below will be found a short account of the most notable fires which occurred during the period covered by this volume.

Because of a delay occasioned by the sounding of a wrong alarm, January 26, 1858, when the Fire Department reached the lumber yard of Messrs. Holt & Mason, on Market Street, the flames had gained the mastery. The half square between Adams and Monroe streets presented a grand spectacle, as it was covered with lumber and other combustible material, upon which the fire was feeding, and rearing itself into the air to a height of fifty or sixty feet. About six o'clock in the morning the flames crossed Market Street, and lapped up a row of wooden buildings in the rear of the gas works. Much alarm was felt lest the latter should suffer and the supply of gas be cut off, or a terrible explosion occur. A number of vessels also narrowly escaped destruction. The entire loss was $100,000, which, in those days, constituted a serious conflagration. Many suspicious circumstances, brought up at the time, pointed to this fire as of incendiary origin, and a fireman, who enjoyed the soubriquet of "Beast" Brown, was arrested for the crime and subsequently sentenced to the penitentiary. His confession was to the effect that Messrs. Holt & Mason refused to subscribe to a Firemen's ball, given by Company No. 4. In August, 1860, one of the rogues whom Brown claimed as his confederates, was arrested in the interior of the State by Captain Bradley's detectives. This man Mike Kirby, alias "Shasky") was employed at the Gas Company's yard, at the time of the fire, and throws the blame of the whole affair upon "Beast" Brown. One Jerry McCormick assisted him. They failed twice in their attempt, but succeeded the third time. Kirby was held for trial, in $2,000 bail. McCormick was never captured.

A fire which broke out on the west side of South Wells Street, between Jackson and VanBuren, on May 18, 1858, early in the morning, was not noteworthy because of great loss of property, but because three women, two men and four children perished in the flames. A row of four two-story wooden tenements was here situated, the lower portion being taken up with stores and the upper story with sleeping rooms. The inmates burned were taken unawares, the flames spreading rapidly, owing to the combustible nature of the material.

On September 15, 1859, a fire broke out in a frame stable on Canal Street, near the corner of Lake, owned and occupied by F. Mehring & Co., ice dealers. At the time, a few minutes before nine o'clock, a high wind was blowing from the southeast, and the fire was swept into the middle of the block, which was covered with lumber yards, wooden buildings, sheds, outhouses, work shops, etc. The flames were driven north and west, sweeping along Lake and Canal streets. First came a collection of two-story stores, saloons etc; next the Cleveland House, built of Milwaukee brick, and the Clifton House, on the corner; then the Cochran House, a magnificent six-story marble structure, owned by J. W. Cochran, but unoccupied, being ahead of the requirements of the times. All these structures were destroyed, the Hydraulic Mills were gutted, and E. W. Blatchford's lead works, the largest of the kind in the west, were also a total loss. The entire square, bounded by West Lake, North Jefferson, Fulton and Clinton streets, was burned over, except that portion from former Engine No. 6, on Lake Street, to the corner of North Jefferson; also on North Jefferson to Fulton, and on Fulton Street to the lead works, including Phillips' Packing house. "Hope" Hose Company of Philadelphia was present during the fire, being in attendance at the State fair, and did splendid service. About four blocks were swept over, the total loss being $500,000.

The district was substantially bounded by Canal Street on the east, Carroll on the north, Jefferson to Fulton and Clinton to Lake, except Blatchford's lead works.

The buildings of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, consisted of a magnificent stone round-house, with a huge dome and cupola, and a large machine shop, seventy by one hundred and sixty feet, three stories in height. The blacksmith shop was one story high. Unfortunately, when a fire broke out, April 17, 1860, the buildings were so situated that the engines could not take suction from the lake, but were obliged to make long lines and take water, through four-inch mains, on Wabash Avenue. "Little Giant" No. 6 "Island Queen" No. 4, and hand-engine No. 9, "Carville" performed good service, but could not save the property from ruin. The large shops and round-house were burned, and such locomotives as could be saved were dragged out by hand and by a passenger locomotive, which was, fortunately, obtained. The total damage occasioned by this conflagration was $130,000.

On the 1st of May, 1860, the wholesale five-story warehouse of Messrs. Barrett, King & Co., on Lake Street, was burned, as to the two upper stories, and deluged with water as to the lower floors.

During the remainder of 1860, fires occurred as follows: October 18, 1860, the ice house of Messrs. Joy & Frisbie, at Crystal Lake. Three houses, owned by the same firm, on the North Branch, were burned some weeks previously. Lill & Diversey's malt house, adjoining the Water Works, was partially destroyed, on the 27th of October. On November 18th, the propeller "Hunter" was burned, and two lives lost.

On the 15th of March, 1862, the temporary depot of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad Company, on Canal, near Madison Street, was struck by lightning and destroyed by fire. The great Union Depot was then in course of construction.

On the 2d of June, 1865, a fire broke out in the agricultural warehouse of Stoddard & Cook, near the corner of Lake and Clinton streets, within the district of the great conflagration of September, 1859. The building was situated in the center of the block, and the flames rapidly spread to the manufactory of John Hollingsworth & Co. and also to the warehouse of Furst, Bradley & Co. The immense lumber yard of T. M. Avery also succumbed. Total damage, $325,000. The first telegraph alarm sent through the new system, summoned the Department to this fire.

A sad loss of life is to be recorded at the fire of June 7, 1865, which was located in Zea & Zimmerman's and Montgomery & Kenly's, on South Water Street. The flames spread to minor buildings. Several firemen were killed or seriously injured by falling walls. The unfortunates were: Ignatz Geis, of the steamer "Frank Sherman," and John Straining, of No. 5, killed; John Agnew, Thomas Barry and Christian Goodwin, of the steamer "Economy," injured; Augustus Hurr, assistant fire marshal of the South Division, badly injured; and William Musham, of the steamer "Frank Sherman," slightly injured.

The fire which broke out on January 9, 1866, in the cellar occupied by Michalson & Apopew, as the sales-room of the National Tobacco Works, on Randolph Street, was, undoubtedly, the work of an incendiary. On the ground floor was a saloon, while the upper stories comprised the Clarendon Hotel. As the flames broke out early in the morning, many of the inmates of the house were obliged to escape by means of ropes and other paraphernalia. The total loss was $140,000.

On June 7, 1866, while dashing to the scene of a fire in the Metropolitan Block, on LaSalle Street, the steam engine "Economy" came into collision with a locomotive. The engine was overturned; the driver, Daniel Heardt, was pitched to the ground with such violence as to receive fatal injuries.

Flames were discovered issuing from the basement of the large building corner of Franklin and Market streets, occupied by the Pennsylvania Oil Company, June 9, 1866. Four floors of the building were occupied by Kussel Brothers, wholesale grocers, and their stock destroyed was valued at $100,000. The building was owned by B. F. Sherman, cost $20,000. The loss to the Pennsylvania Company was $60,000. The inside of Hall, Kimbark & Co.'s hardware establishment also caved in, making the total damage by the fire aggregate $207,400.

What were known as Ward's Rolling Mills, situated on the North Branch, were burned June 21, 1866, entailing a loss upon the owners of fully $200,000. The property was owned by a company, of which the principal stockholder was Captain E. B. Ward, of Detroit. It was with great difficulty that the new works, then just completed, were saved.

The conflagration of July 16, 1866, rendered sixty or seventy families homeless, and the suffering caused thereby developed a kindness which extended all over that part of the city. The fire commenced at the rear of a building on State Street, near Polk, and swept over to the east side of that thoroughfare, where thirty small buildings were burned to the ground. The district burned over extended from the alley between State Street and Third Avenue to the alley at the rear of Wabash Avenue. Everything was laid in ruins. "Long John" No. 1 was first at the scene of the fire; and in half an hour every steamer in the city was there. The fierceness of the flames is shown in the destruction of two large ice houses, owned, respectively, by Sanborn & Giles and Otto Schroeder. J. H. McVicker's residence narrowly escaped, his family having disposed of their goods in the most condensed form, looking to a speedy departure. When the extent of the casualty to the poor people of the district became known, every saloon was thrown open to them and many private residences, while from the corner of Third Avenue and Polk Street, a number of ladies dispensed lemonade and other refreshments to the firemen and the sufferers. While the fire was at its height, a man was discovered in the upper portion of a carpenter shop, a few doors north of Polk Street, deliberately attempting to fire the building. The scoundrel offered the policeman $50 for his liberty, but his pleadings and his attempt at bribery were without effect, and he was taken to the Armory, where he did not attempt to deny the fact that he was taken with a box of matches in his hand. No casualty, which brought loss of life, occurred, but a number of firemen were sun-struck and one severely injured. The total damage was $140,000.

On the 19th of August, 1866, a fire occurred on South Water Street, near Michigan Avenue, which destroyed property amounting to nearly one-half million of dollars. The tobacco factory of Van Horn, Murray & Coy, the wholesale grocery of G. & C. W. Church & Cady, and the wholesale drug-store of Tolman, Pinkham & Co., suffered more or less from the flames. The wholesale dry-goods store of Carson, Pirie & Co. narrowly escaped burning, the iron shutters being warped and twisted by the intense heat.

At the fire in D. Lowenthal's tobacco warehouse, which occurred October 9, 1866, Chief Harris was badly burned by an explosion which greeted him when he first entered the building. The factory, with its contents, was destroyed, and a heavy stock of liquor in Montgomery & Blair's refinery, next door, was much damaged. A small panic took place among the guests of the Massasoit House, across the way, and at one time the Great Central Depot was considered to be in danger. The total loss was $100,000, upon which there was about twenty-five per cent. insurance.

November 18, 1866, the tobacco warehouse of D. Bunker & Co., on South Water Street, was burned, and before the flames were extinguished they had swept away the entire center of the block extending on Lake from Wells to Franklin Street. Explosions were frequently heard, and many narrow escapes are recorded from falling walls. The property destroyed amounted in the aggregate to half a million dollars, the principal sufferers being as follows: On South Water Street: McMurphy, Boyle & Clark, Minchrod & Daniels, and Swazy, Smith & Co., commission merchants; William B. Ogden, owner of several buildings; and J. L. Booth, Rochester, N. Y., agricultural implements. On Lake Street: Sickels, Preston & Co., Rainbold & Magnus, and E. Ashley Mears, hardware; Charles J. L. Meyer, sash, door and blinds; Wheeler, Pierce & Co., commission merchants; Martin & Bros., show-case manufacturers; John Sink estate, owner of building. The total loss occasioned by this fire was $450,000, upon which there was an insurance of $300,000.

The five-story brick structure on Lake Street, in which were W. B. Keen & Co., Dean & Ottaway, Rufus Blanchard and J. W. Goodspeed & Co., all engaged in the publishing or printing business, was the scene of a conflagration April 12, 1867.

James S. Kirk & Co.'s soap and candle manufactory was burned May 7, 1867, with a loss of $105,000.

On June 4, 1867, the Garden City fire-works factory, on Bremen Street, was the scene of a terrible explosion, which was the means of burning it to the ground and destroying half a dozen other buildings. It was owned by Charles Morris. Fortunately no lives were lost.

David Henry, a wholesale liquor dealer, occupied all of a large store on State Street, except the basement, and his stock, and the building owned by the Butterfield estate, were burned August 30, 1867; loss $100,000.

The main portion of the magnificent structure, known as Farwell Hall, was destroyed by fire January 7, 1868. It had been completed only a few months. By almost superhuman exertions the two wings of the building were saved.

On January 16, 1868, the five-story building on Lake Street, occupied by Starratt & Beatty with a heavy stock of hardware, the structure being owned by Samuel Thomas and John B. Rice, succumbed to Chicago's persistent enemy, suffering a damage of $200,000.

A very destructive fire was that of January 28, 1868, which raged over the eastern terminus of Lake Street and vicinity. S. C. Griggs & Co.'s splendid publishing establishment was destroyed, the event being considered almost in the light of a public calamity. Telegrams of condolence were received by the firm from Harper & Brother, J. B. Lippincott, Ticknor & Fields, George W. Childs, Appleton & Co., and others. J. V. Farwell & Co., Fisk, Kirtland & Co., and R. G. Dun & Co., suffered, while the stock of McDougal, Nicholas & Co., dealers in boots and shoes, was a total loss. L. Schoenfeld & Co., and Rosenfeld Bros., in the same line of business, suffered a total loss. The building destroyed on the corner of Lake Street and Wabash Avenue entailed a loss upon J. H. Burch, its owner, of $400,000.

The second fire, which became a portion of the same great conflagration, originated in the basement of Carson, Pirie & Co.'s, on Lake Street, spreading to the west and east and leaping across the alley and laying the block Nos. 4-14 in ruins. Nos. 16-22 was a five-story marble block, owned by Henry B. Dixon, which was burned to the ground, the building being occupied by Burnhams & Van Schaack, wholesale druggists; Whitney Bros. & Yundt, boots and shoes; and Seymour, Carter & Co., hosiery, gloves, etc. The block from No. 10 to No. 14 was owned by H. A. Kohn & Bros., and leased to Keith, Wood & Co., dry goods and notions, and to Fitch, Williams & Co., hats and caps. Nos. 4-8 was a building owned by C. H. McCormick & Brother, and occupied by C. M. Henderson & Co., boots and shoes, and S. Harris, wholesale clothier. No. 20 was owned by W. Butterfield; No. 18, occupied by Foreman, Harris, Nahm & Co., wholesale clothing merchants; No. 24 by Carson, Pirie & Co., dry goods dealers, Merrill & Hopkins, crockery, and M. W. Welsh, wholesale dealer in gloves. The damage occasioned by this conflagration was over $2,000,000; insurance, $1,486,000.

February 24, 1868, the Northwestern Hotel, formerly the Eagle, one of Chicago's landmarks, was destroyed by fire. It was erected by E. Moore, in 1858.

March 29, 1868, Gould Brothers' linseed oil works, on Canal, between Van Buren and Harrison streets, at the rear of the Alton & St. Louis freight house, was burned; loss, $400,000.

The old North Side Market Hall was burned April 18, 1868.

Two immense freight houses of the Milwaukee division of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company were burned September 13, 1868. They extended from the corner of Indiana and Jefferson streets to the northwest, beyond the corner of Fourth and Desplaines streets, about four hundred feet of the larger house being laid in ashes before water was turned on. The cost of the property destroyed, comprising valuable freight, reached $100,000.

S. I. Russell's planing mill, on Fulton Street, was destroyed by fire December 11, 1868.

The Union Park Congregational Church was burned February 22, 1869.

At the Canal-street fire, which occurred March 5, Thomas O'Brien, Peter Moretta, George Bergh and Charles Wilt, firemen, were smothered to death. The fire originated on the corner of Washington and Canal streets.

By the destruction of Burkhart, Van Slyck & Schotsal's wood-cutting machine manufactory, on West Water Street, near the Excelsior Iron Works, on May 19, nearly $150,000 went up in fire and smoke.

The great oil, paint and glass establishment of Messrs. Heath & Milligan, Nos. 170-2 East Randolph Street, was burned to the ground August 12, 1870. Many firemen narrowly escaped injury when the huge wall of the building fell in Court Place.

The most destructive fire of this period, however, with the exception of the great conflagration, occurred September 4, 1870. In the spring of 1870, a massive building, seven stories high, was completed, and known as the Drake Block. It was situated on the southeast corner of Wabash Avenue and Washington Street, and at the time was one of the most imposing buildings of the kind in the United States. At about five o'clock in the afternoon, smoke was seen issuing from the sixth story. The structure was capped by a finely ornamented and highly combustible Mansard roof, which, when the flames commenced the attack could not be reached by the firemen. Between five o'clock p.m. and midnight this magnificent block was transformed into a mass of ruins, and nearly three million dollars' worth of property had vanished into air. The fire is supposed to have originated in Ladin, Butler & Co.'s paper store, on the east side of Wabash Avenue, between Washington and Madison streets. It was still the custom of the "boys," when called upon to throw a stream to a great height, to have their pipemen raised in "buckets" by the machine hose elevators, from which vantage ground they sometimes successfully accomplished their work. But at the Drake-block fire, as at others, the "bucket machine" would not work, hence the helplessness of the Department. Even in three-quarters of an hour after the fire was discovered, two buildings were destroyed, and only three streams of water had been brought to play upon the burning mass. Within less than two hours the entire block was ablaze, and the St. Mary's Catholic Church, corner of Madison, was threatened with destruction. As fast as goods were removed from the burning building they were carried across the street to the old Presbyterian Church. The principal sufferers were J. V. Farwell & Co., who lost $1,500,000, and J. V. Farwell, individually, who owned his building, valued at $165,000; Ladin, Butler & Co., $225,000; Kirkland, Ordway & Co., boots and shoes, $150,000; John B. Drake, $160,000; and Field, Leiter & Co., who occupied the third and fourth floors of the Drake Building, $180,000. The total insurance upon the property destroyed was $1,554,500.

Armour & Co.'s packing house, corner of Salt Street and Archer Avenue, was burned January 14, 1871. In pens adjoining were four thousand live hogs, which narrowly escaped being roasted and being made edible according to Charles Lamb's recipe. They were driven out before being singed, however, so that the loss was confined to the packing house. It was the largest in the city, one hundred and forty by two hundred feet, two stories in height, and the loss on building and stock was $125,000; insurance, $85,000.

On January 13, 1871, the cutlery establishment of Messrs Simons & Ruble, on Ewing Street, between Halsted and Blue Island Avenue, was burned. It was the only establishment of the kind in the West. The proprietors suffered a damage of $100,000; insurance, $80,000.

On the 30th of September, 1871, the Burlington warehouse "A," on Sixteenth Street, near the corner of State, was discovered to be in flames and was destroyed. It was constructed of brick, being one hundred and sixty-five feet on Sixteenth Street and running back one hundred and thirty-three feet to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy tracks. The warehouse was built by R. McCabe in 1864, and purchased from him by Sturges & Co. for a wool and general warehouse. In 1869, it was bought by Samuel Nickerson, president of the First National Bank, who owned it at the time of the fire. Large quantities of whiskeys, highwines, syrups, empty barrels, etc., were stored in the basement; the first floor being given up to sugars, machinery, groceries and general goods; the second being packed with broom corn, machinery, agricultural implements, empty cooperage and household goods; and the third with stoves and castings. Warehouse "B," separated from the doomed building by only an eight-inch fire-wall, had a narrow escape from burning. In it were stored over $2,000,000 worth of teas, coffees, sugars, etc. The damage to Warehouse "A" amounted to $638,300; insurance, $326,850.

As will be remembered, the Department became "thoroughly" Paid by about the year 1863. Since that time up to and including 1871-72, the losses and number of fires have been as below, the figures for the latter year, however, not including the conflagration of October, 1871:

YEARS.	NO. OF FIRES.	AMOUNT OF INSURANCE.	TOTAL LOSS.

THE SCHOOLS.

GENERAL CHANGES IN SCHOOL ORGANIZATION.—By act of February 16, 1857, the Board of School Inspectors, which, since its organization, had consisted of seven members, was increased to fifteen. The office of School Trustees was also abolished by this act. The fifteen inspectors were denominated the Board of Education, and divided into three classes. They were to be elected by the Board of Aldermen, for terms of one, two and three years. In February, 1858, the power to fix the boundaries of school districts was delegated by the Common Council to the Board of School Inspectors. During the same month the school buildings, heretofore designated by numbers, were named as follows: School No. 1, "Dearborn"; School No. 2, "Jones"; School No. 3, "Scammon"; School No. 4, "Kinzie"; School No. 5, "Franklin"; School No. 6, "Washington"; School No. 7, "Moseley"; School No. 8, "Brown"; School No. 9, "Foster"; School No. 10, "Ogden." In April, the Common Council ordered that all bills against the School Tax Fund, for improvements, repairs and school supplies, should pass under the supervision of the Board. During the year 1859, a clerk was first employed in the office of the Superintendent of Schools, and Samuel Hall served in this capacity until February, 1860, when he was succeeded by Shepherd Johnston, the present incumbent. In the winter of 1867, provision was made by the Legislature for a regular clerk, and, on April 2, Mr. Johnston was elected to the position. March 6, 1861, the Board of Education adopted a graded course of instruction which had been prepared by Superintendent William H. Wells. Chicago was a pioneer, as usual, among the western cities in taking this step, and the material features of the course were extensively copied by other cities. The City Charter, adopted February 13, 1863, contained a provision for the establishment of a separate school for colored children, and in March the Common Council took the necessary steps to carry it out. This school was opened June 15, 1863, in a rented building, located corner of Fourth Avenue and Taylor Street, and was continued until April, 1865, when it was closed—the provision having been repealed by the City Charter of that year, in deference to the prevailing sentiment of the country. The office of Building and Supply Agent was established during the summer of 1863, and James Ward, who had served as a member of the Board of Education since 1857, was appointed to the position, and held it up to the time of his death in July, 1881. In February, 1865, an act of the Legislature made the minimum age at which children would be received into the public schools six years instead of five. Also by legislative enactment, the Board was made to consist of sixteen members, who were divided into four classes. The same act made provision for the appointment of a school agent by the Board—the appointment, up to the year 1860, having been made by the Common Council. From 1860 to 1865, the city comptroller was, ex officio, School Agent. In May of the latter year, Charles C. Chase, the comptroller's chief clerk, who had been attending to the business connected with the School Fund, was elected school agent, and has since discharged the duties of the position. By legislative act of February, 15, 1865, $100,000 of "school construction" bonds were authorized to be issued. Within the next two years the Council, by ordinance, ordered $75,000 of this amount issued. In June, 1866, the Council authorized a loan of not exceeding $80,000 to be used. Previous to 1865, the money for erecting school-houses came from the School Tax Fund. Even the Charter amendments, approved that year, allowed no higher school tax than three mills on a dollar, to meet the expenses of purchasing grounds for school-houses, erecting and repairing buildings and supporting the schools. Appreciating the wants of the city, the Legislature passed the act of 1867, authorizing the Council to issue a half million dollars of bonds. For this liberal provision the Board of Education was chiefly indebted to Moses W. Leavitt, deceased, then a member of the Lower House of the Legislature, and whose efforts were ably seconded by Lester L. Bond in the senate. An act of March 10, 1869, made provision for the issue of $700,000 additional bonds. The bonds authorized by the acts of 1867 and 1869, were issued and negotiated by the city comptroller, in compliance with ordinances passed by the Council, upon the request of the Board of Education—$350,000 in 1867; $150,000 in 1868; $200,000 in 1869; and $500,000 in 1870.

ber, 1854. Flavel Moseley was chairman of the Board of School Inspectors from that time until 1857, when that body became transmuted into the Board of Education. This change was made by the amended city charter of February 16, 1857, which also increased the members from seven to fifteen. Under the new organization, Luther Haven became president, and continued in that position for three years. In 1860, John C. Dore was chosen president, serving until the close of the year ending February 1, 1861. Dr. John H. Foster served from that time to December 31, 1861, when he was succeeded by Mr. Haven, who held the position for the next year, and was followed by Walter L. Newberry, in 1863. C. N. Holden acted as president from January 1, 1864, to September 1, 1866; George C. Clarke, for the succeeding year; L. Brentano, for the year ending July, 1868; John Wentworth, for 1869; William H. King, 1870; and Eben F. Runyan, for the year 1871. Mr. Runyan held the position at the time of the great fire. From 1857 until 1862, the office of the Board of Education was at No. 119 South Clark Street, up-stairs, and from that time until May, 1871, at No. 76 LaSalle Street, opposite the Court House. In May, 1871, the Board removed into its new quarters, on the southwest corner of Randolph and LaSalle streets, occupying a portion of the second and third floors of the building, where they remained until the great fire.

STATISTICAL.—The School Report for the year ending February 1, 1858, shows that the estimated value of real estate belonging to the School Fund, within the city limits, was $900,000; outside country property, at $25,000. The High, "Scammon," "Jones" and "Franklin" school-buildings were situated upon lots belong to the School Fund. These lots could not be used by the city for school purposes, except upon the payment of ground rent, the same as paid by private individuals, as the avails of the School Fund could not be diverted to any other purpose than the payment of teachers. The income of the School Fund for the year, including the dividend of interest on the State Fund, was $36,144.10. The expenditures for the support of the schools amounted to $62,701. For the next year, the income was $37,341.44; expenditures, $70,341.10. The report for the year ending December 31, 1861, exhibits the following:

Real estate belonging to the fund, $1,066,180; income, $45,834.75; expenditures, $106,486.78. By the end of the following year, the income had increased to $58,238.68, and the expenditures to $112,110.32. By the year ending September 1, 1866, the receipts had increased to $182,311, and expenditures, $176,066. For the year ending July 3, 1868, the financial situation was as follows: Expenditures from school building-fund—the proceeds of bonds previously alluded to—$207,192.05; receipts from school fund, $275,234.20, and expenditures, $273,307.34; real estate belonging to the fund inside the city, $651,206.67; two-mill tax levied, $387,456.99.

JOHN H. FOSTER, deceased, one of Chicago's most prominent educational patrons, was born in the town of Hillsborough, N.H., March 2, 1796; being the second son of Aaron and Metehabet (Nichols) Foster, who were simple, Christian and steadfast persons. Work upon the farm in summer and study in the district school in winter, occupied his time until he had reached the age of sixteen, when he entered Kimball Union Academy at Meriden, N.H. In 1815, young Foster taught his first school at Schoharie, N.Y., where his eldest brother, Rev. Aaron Foster, of Charlemont, Mass., was teaching. For a time he continued to assist his father in summer, pursuing his studies in the autumn and teaching during the winter in various New Hampshire villages. His mother, who was a woman of more than common intellectual ability, died in 1816. Mr. Foster studied medicine at Dartmouth College from which he graduated, and by 1832 had accumulated some thousand dollars in the practice of his profession and by the strictest economy. Coming west he invested his money in Morgan County, Ill., lands, which locality he had made his home. While here he was appointed a surgeon in the army and served during the Black Hawk War. He had a younger brother, Amos, who was a lieutenant in the army and had been for a time stationed at Fort Dearborn. Lieutenant Foster purchased some of the original town lots of Chicago, but was afterward ordered to Fort Howard, Wis., and while there was shot and killed by an insubordinate soldier, whom he had reprimanded for drunkenness. This occurred in 1832, and Dr. Foster came to Chicago, as one of the heirs, to look after the estate. Having confidence in the future of the unprepossessing town, he bought the interests of the others, and thus laid the foundation for the considerable fortune which he accumulated. Dr. Foster remained in Chicago until 1836, when he left his property, then a drug upon the market, in the hands of his attorney, and spent some two years in New England. On September 21, 1840, Dr. Foster married Miss Nancy Smith, of Peterborough, N.H. They immediately removed to Chicago, where their real estate was again assuming a positive value. Three daughters were born to them, to whom in 1860 he gave nearly one-half of his entire real property, with the design of lightening his shoulders of many business cares. This wise step no doubt would have had the desired effect of lengthening his life many years, had it not been for the unfortunate accident which caused his death. On Saturday, May 9, 1874, he was violently thrown from his carriage, in consequence of a sudden start of his horse. He was immediately taken home, and after a short season of insensibility, his wonderful constitution seemed to rally and confident hopes of his recovery were entertained; but on Sunday, the 17th, fatal symptoms suddenly appeared, and on Monday, the 18th, he fell asleep so quietly that those about him hardly knew the moment of his departure. His funeral took place on Wednesday, the 20th, from Unity Church, of which he had been for many years a quiet and unassuming member. The sermon, preached by Rev. Robert Collyer, was a touching tribute to the great heart and wise mind of the departed. As a public man, Dr. Foster was best known in the departments of the city and state education, and the Chicago Board of Education justly placed him beside those other corner stones in the upbuilding of the system, Flavel Moseley and Luther Haven. Resolutions in memory of the deceased were not only passed by this Board, but the Half-Orphan Asylum and Humane Society added the mite of their contribution to the general offering which was placed upon his grand character by the whole city. Dr. Foster left a wife and three daughters, Mrs. Perkins Bass, Mrs. E. C. Porter and Mrs. George E. Adams.

LUTHER HAVEN, deceased, never brought his ability and energy more effectively to bear, than while he was identified with the public schools of Chicago. He has left his impress upon her system and his name to adorn one of her most magnificent institutions. Born upon a farm, near Framingham, Mass., in 1807, he obtained sufficient schooling, by the time he was seventeen years of age, to be able to teach. From 1831 to 1834 he spent in a private academy at Ellington, Conn., after which he was engaged as a teacher in the English and mathematical department of the Leices-ter Academy, then one of the leading institutions of learning in the United States. He afterward was principal of the department for eleven years. The four years following he spent in various mercantile pursuits in Massachusetts, coming to Chicago in 1849. Shortly after his arrival, he engaged in the manufacture of linseed oil with Dr. F. Scammon, brother of J. Young Scammon, and a year later formed a partnership with B. F. Adams, the father of George E. Adams, in the real estate business. For a number of years the firm was among the most prominent in the city. In various capacities Mr. Haven was connected with the public school system of Chicago for ten years, or, to be more particular, from January, 1853, to October, 1863. During the last four years he was president of the Board of Education, and made for himself a name which, as stated in the resolutions of that body, passed at the time of his death, "will be handed down to posterity as one of the fathers and founders of our liberal system of education." When John Wentworth ran for mayor, in 1860, Mr. Haven was named as city comptroller, but he declined the honor. In October, 1861, he was appointed by President Lincoln as collector of the port and, ex officio, United States depository. He was re-appointed by President Johnson in February, 1866, and unanimously confirmed by the senate, being an incumbent of this position at the time of his death on March 9th of that year. After an illness of five weeks, superinduced by congestion of the lungs, he breathed his last, a public man and private citizen of sterling honesty and faithfulness, a prudent counselor, a generous friend and a devoted husband and father. He left at his death four children and a widow. Mrs. Haven was formerly Ann Elizabeth Wheaton, the eldest daughter of John R. Wheaton, of Warren, R. I. Mr. Haven's death was the occasion of special action by the Board of Education, the Board of Trade and the officers of the Custom House, his funeral being attended by the substantial and public-spirited citizens of Chicago, all of whom mourned him as one of the best citizens of Chicago.

FLAVEL MOSELEY was born in the year 1795. In company with Jason McCord, whom he had met in Cincinnati, and with whom he formed a partnership, Mr. Moseley came to Chicago in 1834, and opened a general country store, near the corner of Wells and South Water streets. The partnership was dissolved about 1850, Mr. Moseley retiring, having in the meantime made judicious investments in real estate. He thus continued to actively employ himself until failing health, three years before his death, forced him to withdraw from business. From the time of the first organization of the public school system of Chicago, until the winter of 1862-63, Mr. Moseley labored for its welfare, as no man ever did before, or has since. He served on the Board of Education a greater length of time than any other citizen. He was the first to contribute $1,000 for an "Indigent Children's Fund," and also gave the High School, then struggling into life, liberal assistance. Never having married, Mr. Moseley seems to have devoted his warmest affections to the cause of public education in his adopted city, and the high standard reached by the common school is largely, if not mostly, the result of his labors. As stated, he resigned in the winter of 1862-63, and sailed for Cuba, in a vain effort to up-build his failing health. He spent three winters in that milder climate, but during the fall of 1865, realizing that he could not survive a fourth season even there, he started for Chicago; but he never reached the city alive, expiring on the 30th of October, at Williamsburg, N. Y. His estate was valued at about $200,000, and, as was to have been expected, in his will he remembered the public schools of Chicago in a liberal way, giving them $10,000 in addition to the previous donation of $1,000 to assist the poor children of the city to obtain an education. This has since been known as the "Moseley Public School Book Fund." Mr. Moseley was a faithful member of the Second Presbyterian Church, and upon his death $50,000 went toward establishing and maintaining its Sabbath School; $10,000 to the Home Missionary Society of New York City (Congregational); $10,000 to the Chicago Home for the Friendless, and a like amount to the Orphan Asylum. The deceased has a sister living in North Windham, Conn., and one at Hampton, in the same county, and a half-brother, Edward Moseley, at Ellington, Conn. Two brothers, Elnathan and Anson C., reside in Penobscot Co., Me.; Eben is a resident of Palos, Miami Co., Ind., and Harvey, of Columbus, Ga.

SAMUEL SNOWDEN HAYES, deceased, was born at Nashville, Tenn., December 25, 1820, and is a son of Dr. R. P. Hayes and Mary C. (Snowden) Hayes, whose father was an influential Presbyterian minister and one of the founders of Princeton College. Dr. Hayes and his wife had removed to Nashville soon after the close of the war of 1812, during which he had been a surgeon of a New York regiment. In 1823, his wife died, and, in 1837, Dr. Hayes followed her. Having obtained a good academic and classical education, Mr. Hayes learned the drug business, and, in August, 1838, bought a stock and settled in Shawneetown, Ill. After carrying on the business two years, he sold out and began the study of law in the office of Henry Eddy. He was admitted to the bar in 1842, and at once settled at Mount Vernon, Ill. After a brief residence there, he removed to Carmi, White County, where he remained in the practice of his profession until the winter of 1850-51, when he removed to Chicago. This was soon after his marriage to Lizzie J., eldest daughter of Colonel E. D. Taylor, then of Michigan City, afterward one of the prominent men of the city and state. Before removing to Chicago, Mr. Hayes had acquired quite a position as a political leader, being a ready speaker and a stalwart Democrat from youth. In 1845, he was a delegate to the Memphis Convention, called to promote western and southern commercial interests and internal improvements and, in 1846, was elected to the State Legislature by a handsome majority over the Whig candidate. In the spring of 1847, he raised a company for the Mexican War, being the first to volunteer; but owing to the distance from the seat of government, the muster-rolls were not received there until the quota of the state had been filled. The same season, also, he served as a delegate to a convention for the revision of the constitution, taking a prominent part in its deliberations as chairman of the Committee on Law Reform. In the autumn of 1848, he was a successful candidate for Presidential Elector on the Cass-Butler ticket; also for reelection to the State Legislature. During the session of the Legislature for 1848-49, he acted as chairman of the Committee on Education. Soon after his removal to Chicago he was employed by the city authorities as counsellor and city solicitor. Although a warm personal friend of Senator Douglas, when that gentleman supported the repeal of the Missouri Compromise he found one of his strongest opponents in Mr. Hayes. He did not abandon the Democratic party, however, believing in its distinctive principles. In 1856, he supported Buchanan, but sided with Senator Douglas in opposing his course in attempting to bring Kansas into the Union as a slave state, continuing to be his warm friend, as he had ever been, and his firm ally until his death. Although at times severely criticizing the acts of the administration, Mr. Hayes was uniformly in favor of crushing the Rebellion by force of arms; realizing at the same time, as few did at the commencement of the war, the grave nature of the opposition to be encountered. He did not, in short, believe that the existence of the Democratic party was dependent upon the institution of slavery. Mr. Hayes was often honored by the public, being several times elected to a seat in national conventions and acted once as president of a state convention. In 1862, he was called to assume the responsible office of city comptroller.

S. H. Hayes

Among his other acts to raise and sustain the public credit, was the creation of a sinking fund for the liquidation of the bonded debt of the city by procuring an act of the Legislature requiring an annual tax of one mill on all its taxable property. For two terms he was member of the Board of Education, and made so enviable a record for himself that the public school building on Leavitt Street was named in his honor. He resigned his position as comptroller in May, 1865, and soon afterward was appointed one of the three members of the United States Revenue Commission, to inquire into the sources of national revenue and revise and recommend improvements in the tax system of the United States. The choice for the Democratic Commissioner lay between George H. Pendleton and Mr. Hayes. The report which he made was especially original and comprehensive, bringing him into national prominence. In February, 1867, the law was passed for the establishment of the State Industrial University, and Governor Oglesby appointed Mr. Hayes a member of the Board of Trustees. He served until the expiration of his term in 1873. He was a prominent member of the Constitutional Convention of 1870-71, and during the great fire in Chicago took an active part in the work of relief. He became city comptroller again, under Mayor Colvin, in 1873, and at a time when the city's finances were under the cloud which darkened the country. His management of this responsible trust was all that could be desired. And not only did Mr. Hayes show his great ability in the management of public trusts, but also of his own affairs. He was a large land owner in and around Chicago, and annually expended large sums of money in the erection of buildings and the improvement of real estate.

ABNER WELLS HENDERSON was born in Bridgewater, Oneida Co., N. Y., in the year 1812. He was the son of Solomon and Eliza (Wells) Henderson. Almost from childhood he won the reputation, which he held to old age, of being an earnest student and an accurate scholar. At the very early age of thirteen he was prepared to enter Union College, Schenectady. There he held foremost rank in his studies, and graduated when seventeen years old, under President Nott, with whom he was a special favorite. Later he pursued theological studies, and entered the Presbyterian ministry. He married, in 1842, Miss Helen Eddy, daughter of Seth Eddy, a wealthy and widely known merchant of Stillwater, Saratoga Co., N. Y. In all their after life Mrs. Henderson was a faithful, efficient and helpful co-worker in his labors, both for the cause of the church and education. Owing to a throat disease, Mr. Henderson was forced to abandon preaching temporarily, and devoted his time to teaching. At an early day he left his home in Utica, N. Y., and removed to Chicago in 1843, and in that year opened the first seminary for young ladies. The daughters of prominent men among the early settlers who were then his pupils, and who now grace homes of their own, refer often to the lasting influence of Mr. and Mrs. Henderson, not only in their educational attainments, but in the molding and strengthening of their characters as well. When health was restored, he immediately resumed his pastoral duties, having charge of a church in Morris, and later in Elgin, Ill. He was the first to suggest and establish the daily noon service in the Chicago Bridewell. After the commencement of the war he accepted, in 1861, the appointment of Chaplain to the 13th Illinois Cavalry. He discharged his duties in the camp, the field and the hospitals with such special fidelity as to win the approbation of officers and men of every class and character. For more than three years he persevered in these arduous labors, not even taking a furlough, until ordered north by his physicians to save his life. He suffered a long illness, from which he was never fully restored. For the benefit of his health he spent four years traveling with his family in Europe and the Holy Land. He returned to Chicago in 1869, and immediately resumed work in the interests of the church. A return of his disease was the cause of his death, which occurred in Chicago, October 18, 1872. He left surviving him a wife, son and daughter. He is described by those who were his co-workers and knew him intimately, to have been one of the best scholars in the Chicago Presbytery.

JOHN CLARK DORE, son of Ezekiel and Abigail Dore, was born in Ossipee, Carroll Co., N. H., March 22, 1822. Early in life, he showed such aptness as a scholar that he was, on examination, deemed well qualified to teach when seventeen years of age. By teaching he was enabled to pursue his studies, and to enter Hartmouth College when twenty-one, from which he graduated with honor in 1847. Just before graduating, Mr. Dore received an appointment as assistant teacher in a public school in Boston, and was soon after elected principal of the Boylston school. His success as a teacher and organizer in Boston became known to the Board of Education of Chicago, and in March, 1854, he was elected first superintendent of the public schools of Chicago. He entered immediately upon the duties of his office, and classified the pupils in all the schools upon the Boston plan. The present public school system of Chicago was inaugurated by him. Mr. Dore resigned his office of superintendent in the spring of 1856, having served two years, to engage in mercantile pursuits, but was soon after elected a member of the Board of Education. He continued a member of the Board for several years, and was at one time its president. In recognition of the valuable services of Mr. Dore in the cause of public education in Chicago, one of the largest school buildings of the city was named the Dore School. As a merchant, Mr. Dore was successful, and honored by his associates in trade. He was made vice-president of the Board of Trade in 1865, and president in 1866. Mr. Dore was president of the Commercial Insurance Company for several years, and, in 1869, was president of the local Board of Underwriters. He was also elected president of the State Savings Institution soon after the great fire, but resigned and sold out his stock in 1873, leaving the bank not only solvent but with a large surplus (over a quarter of a million of dollars), as an examination of the books of the bank clearly showed, after the failure of the bank under a far different management, in 1877, four years later. Mr. Dore was State Senator four years, from 1865 to 1873, during which time he drew the bills for the Humane Laws of the State, and for the charter for the Illinois Humane Society, procuring their passage by the General Assembly. The Illinois Humane Society was organized through his instrumentality. He was president of the Society for several years, and still continues (1884) a director. In politics, Mr. Dore is a Republican. He was formerly president of the Newsboys' and Bootblack's Home. The deed of the lot on which the Home stands is now (1884) in his name. Mr. Dore was married January 1, 1850, to Miss Annie B. Moulton, daughter of Dr. Alvah Moulton, a distinguished physician of Ossipee, N. H. Their only child, a son, died in infancy.

WILLARD WOODARD was born in Sandwich, Mass., December 12, 1824, and when only six weeks old his parents, Joseph and Esther (Pike) Woodard, moved to Hopkinton, Mass., where they made their permanent home. It was at the latter-named place that he received his education, spending the summer on the farm with his parents, and attending the public school, and finally the academy. He regularly learned the trade of boot-maker, working in the summer at his trade, while in the winter he taught school, sometimes teaching through the entire year. When he was twenty-five years of age he went into merchandising, opening a drug, book and jewelry store at Hopkinton, and in 1856 he came Chicago. He was employed here as the principal of the Jones School, located at that time at the corner of Clark and Harrison streets, which was then the south school of the city, taking all the scholars south of Harrison Street, on the South Side. Flavel Moseley was then president of the School Board. At a Teachers' Institute, the first one Mr. Woodard attended, forty-seven teachers were present, that being the entire number then employed, the president of the Board having informed the teachers that absence from an institute, without excuse, would be regarded as a resignation. Mr. Woodard remained in the schools for eight years, and resigned to become associated with George Sherwood in the publication of school books, and is at present connected with this house. In 1864, he was elected from the old Ninth Ward, the strongest Republican ward in the city at that time, to the Council, and held the position until 1871, when he was elected to the State Senate, and was a member during the first session after the new constitution was adopted. He was a member of the first City Library Board, appointed during the Medill administration, and was appointed by Governor Cullom a member of the West Park Commissioners, and was president of the Board three years. Mr. Woodard was married in Hopkinton, Mass., in 1851, to Miss Levina J. Ellery, and has three children—Charles Sumner; Flora A., wife of William H. Garrison, an attorney of the city, and Jennie E., wife of Edward Dicker, of the firm of Mathews & Dicker, attorneys, also of Chicago.

JAMES WARD, deceased, building and supply agent for eighteen years, was born near Antrim, North Ireland, August 1, 1814. When twenty years of age, he left home, setting first at Auburn, N. Y., where he managed a farm and stone quarry until 1841, when he decided to emigrate to the West. His destination was Dubuque, Iowa, but arriving in Chicago, he concluded to remain here. He soon made the acquaintance of Philo Carpenter, and removed from the business portion of the city out into the country, to the south-east corner of Sangamon and Randolph streets, where he purchased a one-third block from his new-found friend. Having engaged in the grain and pork business, he soon was able to build a residence, which was done, being the fourth house erected upon Carpenter's Addition. About this time, he and his brother Hugh commenced to obtain a wide reputation as builders, which resulted in their erecting many substantial edifices between Halsted Street and the river. After continuing a successful partnership for eight years, his brother died. Mr. Ward served as a member of the Board of Education from 1857 until 1863, when he retired, and was appointed building and supply agent, which office he held until the time of his death, July 6, 1881. In appreciation of his valuable services rendered to the cause of education in Chicago, the "Ward School," located on Shields Avenue and Twenty-seventh Street, was named after him. Mr. Ward was three times married, his first wife being Mary E. Hickson, of Auburn N. Y. She died in Chicago in 1855. He next married Orchestra Pier, of Syracuse, N. Y., who lived only about two years after the marriage. His third wife was Mary E. Smith, of Chicago. He had nine children—Sarah Agnes (wife of William A. Amberg, of Chicago) and Mary Etta (wife of Edward J. Gannon, of Dallas, Texas), daughters of his first wife; Frank Carpenter, Albert James, Anna Rebecca, Charles Stewart, Walter Moses, Ella C., and James Amberg, children by his last wife.

MUSIC, DRAWING AND GERMAN.—At a meeting of the Inspectors and Trustees of Common Schools held December 10, 1841, at the office of William Jones, it was agreed to introduce vocal music into the public school system. N. Gilbert, the first teacher, was soon afterward employed. After the first quarter in the year 1843, vocal music was discontinued, but was re-introduced in the fall of 1846, although not as a permanent branch. In January, 1848, Frank Lombard was appointed teacher of vocal music, continuing in that position until December, 1853, when he was succeeded by Christopher Plagge, who resigned in March, 1854, being succeeded by J. L. Slayton, who served until July, 1856. In September of that year William Tillinghast was elected teacher of vocal music, serving until the middle of October, 1866, when the board deemed it inexpedient to continue this branch of instruction. Charles Ansgore served from November, 1863, to January, 1865, as teacher of music in the High School, and Orlando Blackman was appointed teacher for the grammar and primary schools in November, 1863, and still continues his connection with the schools in this capacity. E. E. Whittemore was appointed, in 1867, as additional teacher of vocal music. Messrs. Whittemore and Blackman graded the instruction in vocal music and brought the system into its present shape.

In 1865, the attention of the Board of Education was first called to the importance of teaching drawing in the primary grades. A trial was first made in the Brown School, and in 1867, Miss A. E. Trimmingham, teacher of drawing in the High School, commenced to give instruction to teachers at the Teachers' Institute. The superintendent, in his report for that year, pointed out the importance of employing a teacher for the grammar and primary schools. In 1869, Bartholomew's Drawing Books were adopted as text books, but in November, 1870, the study of drawing as now taught in the public schools was discontinued. In December, however, Misses Clara F. Currier and Mary Starr were employed to give two lessons a week in each of the first six grades, the time and length of the lessons to be regulated by a programme to be drawn up under the direction of the principals of the several schools. They continued in these positions until the summer of 1872.

attendance during the session being one hundred and fifty. In January, 1863, a school was opened in the Dearborn Building, and continued until March, the average attendance of both sexes being two hundred and twenty. The school was re-opened in November, 1863, and remained in session until March, 1864. An appropriation of $5,000, made during the fiscal year 1864-65, enabled the Board of Education to enlarge the HAVEN-SCHOOL BUILDING.

The first experiment of introducing German into the public schools below the High School, was made in the Washington School, West Division, in October, 1865. A class was then formed, under the charge of Mrs. Pauline M. Reed. In April, 1866, she was transferred to the High School, and was succeeded by Mrs. Caroline McFee. In July, 1866, so successful had been the experiment, that the board resolved to introduce the study into the Franklin and Newberry schools, for the benefit of scholars in the North Division; into the Moseley School, for the South Division; and the Wells School, for the West. By the close of the year, seven hundred pupils were pursuing the study. It was introduced into the Cottage Grove School in May, 1868; into the Kinzie School in September, 1868; Carpenter School, January, 1869; LaSalle-street Primary School, January, 1870; into the Haven School in May, 1870; the Skinner School in September, 1870; the Scammon School, October, 1870; the Lincoln School, January, 1871; and into the Ogden School in September, 1871. At the time of the great fire, which caused a suspension of the study until the following January, there were over four thousand pupils studying German in the district schools.

EVENING SCHOOLS.—The main facts in regard to the evening schools of Chicago are gathered from the historical sketch prepared by Shepherd Johnston in 1880. The first experiment of organizing free evening schools was made during the winter of 1856, the sessions being held in West Market-Hall, on West Randolph Street, between Desplaines and Union streets, three evenings each week, under charge of Daniel S. Wentworth. The use of the hall was furnished by the city, and the services of the teachers were gratuitous. The school was opened with sixty scholars, the average system of public evening schools, and in the fall of 1864 institutions of this character were opened in the Franklin school-building, in the North Division; in the Dearborn and Haven school-buildings, in the South Division; and in the Washington and Foster school-buildings in the West Division. The evening schools were continued each year from 1863 to 1871, when owing to the great fire they were broken up, and no appropriation was made by the Council until 1873.

SPECIAL FUNDS.—The condition of the special funds in the summer of 1871, with an account of their formation, is thus given in the report for the year ending June of that year:

Moseley Book Fund.—In 1856, a fund of $1,000 was established by the late Flavel Moseley, the interest of which is expended in purchasing text books for indigent children attending the public schools. During the year 1867, a bequest of $10,000 made by Mr. Moseley, less a revenue tax of $600, was added to this fund, so that the total fund now amounts to $10,400.

Foster Medal Fund.—In 1857, Dr. John H. Foster established a fund of $1,000, the avails of which are expended in procuring medals and other awards of merit for the most deserving pupils attending the grammar departments of the district schools.

Jones Fund.—In 1858, William Jones established a fund of $1,000, the interest of which is applied for the benefit of the Jones School, in procuring text books for indigent children, books of reference, maps, globes, etc.

Newberry Fund.—In 1862, Walter L. Newberry established a fund of $1,000, the interest of which is applied for the benefit of the Newberry School, in procuring text books for indigent children, school apparatus, books for reference, etc.

Porter Telegraph College Scholarship.—In 1867, E. Payson Porter donated one life-scholarship to the graduating class of each department of the High School, annually for the period of ten years, to be awarded to the pupil in each class whose average for the year is the highest among those who have been neither absent nor tardy during the year.

Carpenter Fund.—In 1868, Philo Carpenter established a fund of $1,000, the interest of which is to be applied for the benefit of the Carpenter School.

Holden Fund.—In 1868, Charles N. Holden placed in the hands of the secretary $100, with instructions to draw on him annually for a similar amount, until $1,000 are placed at the disposal of the Board, to be expended for the benefit of the Holden School as follows: Eight-tenths of the amount to be used in the purchase of text books, for deserving and needy children attending the school who are not able to supply themselves; the remaining two-tenths, together with all not expended for text books for needy children, to be used in the purchase of books for prizes.

Burr Fund.—In 1868, Jonathan Burr, in his last will and testament, proved in Probate Court February 25, 1869, after certain specific bequests to various relatives and public institutions, bequeathed one-eleventh of the balance of his property and estate to the City of Chicago, in trust, the annual income of the same to be paid over to the Board of Education, to be expended in procuring books of reference, maps, charts, illustrative apparatus and works of taste and art; and in case the City of Chicago fails to provide the necessary text books and slates for indigent children attending the public schools of the city, then the Board of Education is authorized and directed, at its discretion, to use and expend the whole or any part of said income for such purpose.

ALBERT G. LANE, county superintendent of schools, was born March 15, 1841, in Galewood, Jefferson Township, Cook Co., Ill., his parents being Elisha B. and Amanda (Grannis) Lane. His father went to that locality in 1836, but moved to Chicago soon after the birth of his son, where he established himself as a carpenter. Previous to his death in February, 1884, he was connected for seventeen years with the Department of Public Buildings of the city government. Albert G. Lane received his primary education at the Scammon School (District No. 3) and afterward as a member of the first high school class. In November, 1858, he commenced his long and successful career as an educator by becoming a teacher in the Franklin School, whose territory then embraced one of the largest districts in the city. In December, 1869, he was elected superintendent of schools of the county, which position he held four years. Being defeated for reelection he took charge of Preston, Kean & Co.'s West Side Bank for four years, when, in November, 1877, he was chosen to the position which he now holds, and admirably fills. On July 18, 1878, Mr. Lane was married to Miss Frances Smallwood, an accomplished lady who had been a teacher, for ten years, in the Central High School. They have two daughters.

GEORGE HOWLAND, present superintendent of schools, is a native of Conway, Franklin Co., Mass. He is the son of William Avery Howland. His mother's maiden name was Hannah Morton. Both of his parents were natives of New England. George Howland spent his boyhood upon his father's farm, devoting his leisure to such studies as were within his reach. In course of time he entered Williston Seminary, East Hampton, and afterward Amherst College, from which he was graduated in 1850. Two years after receiving his degree as Bachelor of Arts, he returned to Amherst, and was connected with the college for five years—first as tutor and then as instructor in Latin and French. In December, 1857, he arrived in Chicago, and the following January was elected a teacher in the High School, which position he held until July, 1860, when he was elected principal. After twenty years of work, his faithfulness and ability were openly rewarded by his election to the position of superintendent of schools, in July, 1880. During the previous year he had been elected trustee of Amherst College, and was reelected in 1884. In 1881, he was appointed a member of the Illinois State Board of Education, and elected president thereof in 1883.

HISTORIES OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Dearborn School.—The first permanent building for public educational purposes was erected in the spring of 1845, on the ground now occupied by the Crystal Block and Hershey Music Hall, opposite McVicker's Theater. It was known as "School No. 1" until its name was changed to the Dearborn School, in February, 1858.

"Upon the opening of the building," says Mr. Johnston, "districts Nos. 1 and 2 were consolidated into one, and were accommodated in this building; and from this time until the opening of the new building on Block No. 113, School-section Addition, afterward known as the Jones School, the reports are headed Districts 1 and 2. One year after the opening of the building there were enrolled in the school five hundred and forty-three pupils; at the end of the second year six hundred and sixty pupils; and at the end of the third year, eight hundred and sixty-four pupils. The first teachers in the school were Austin D. Sturtevant, principal, who had been in the employ of the city in districts Nos. 3 and 2, since October, 1840, and Misses Lucia A. Garvin and Martha Durant. Mr. Sturtevant remained in charge until August, 1846, when he resigned, and was succeeded by A. W. Ingalls, who remained in charge until his death in April, 1850. F. A. Benham was the next appointee, being followed by J. P. Brooks, who served from April, 1854, to February, 1855; Perkins Bass from February, 1855, to May, 1856; O. B. Hewitt from May, 1856, to April, 1857; George D. Broomell until November, 1863; Albert R. Sabin to July, 1865; George D. Broomell to July, 1866; Daniel S. Wentworth to July, 1867; Leslie Lewis to October, 1869; Andrew M. Brooks to January, 1870; and Alfred P. Burbank from March, 1870, to July, 1871. The Dearborn-school building was used for school purposes till the close of the school year, in June, 1871, when the lot was leased by the Common Council to Rand, McNally & Co.; and a building known as Johnson Hall, located on Wabash Avenue, near Monroe Street, was rented for the accommodation of the school at a rental of $3,600 per annum. The Dearborn-school building was torn down during the summer of 1871. The school was continued after the summer vacation of 1871 in Johnson Hall, under the charge of Miss Alice L. Barnard, as principal, until the great fire swept over the whole territory of the Dearborn-school district, when the organization of the Dearborn School became extinct."

Kinzie School.—In March, 1845, the question of erecting a permanent building in District No. 4, North Division, was agitated, recommended by the Committee on Schools in June, and the structure completed in January, 1846. The site was on the corner of LaSalle Avenue and Ohio Street, being purchased by William B. Ogden. The size of the building was forty-five by seventy feet, two stories high. Its first principal was A. G. Wilder, who had been in charge of the school of this district since 1843, and retained his position for a period of fourteen years. In 1857, Philip Atkinson succeeded him, serving until the fall of 1858. The next principal was Benjamin D. Slocum, who served until 1862, when William J. Armstrong was chosen to the position. After remaining about four months he was succeeded by Jeremiah Slocum, who served until May, 1864, when he was transferred to the Moseley School. Ira S. Baker was Mr. Slocum's successor and remained in charge of the school until the fall of 1868. F. Hanford was principal during the school year 1868-69, and was followed by James Hannan, who continued thus to act up to the time the main building and branch were destroyed by the fire of 1871.

The branch building of the Kinzie School was authorized to be erected by the Common Council in May, 1862, and was completed during that year.

Scammon School.—The question of erecting a permanent building for the West Division was considered during the early portion of 1846. It was completed during the year, the structure being of brick and two stories in height; its location being on land belonging to the School Fund on Madison Street, east of Halsted. In October, 1861, a four-room frame building was ordered erected on what was then known as the Scammon-school lot, and completed in 1862, at a cost of about $2,800. A. D. Sturtevant, its first principal, was succeeded, in 1854, by Daniel S. Wentworth. Mr. Wentworth served until January, 1863, when he was followed by A. H. Vanzwoll, who continued in the position until after the fire.

Jones School.—In November, 1846, an order was passed by the School Inspectors to employ a teacher in the southern portion of the First and Second districts, which was the beginning of the Jones School. Miss Alice L. Barnard taught the school in a small rented building on the northwest corner of Wabash Avenue and Twelfth Street. In September, 1848, this lot was purchased at a sale of canal lands, and the building was occupied for school purposes until the Haven school-house was built in the fall of 1862, this school being taught during this period by Miss Barnard. Upon the opening of the Haven School, this building was removed to the corner of Clark and Harrison streets.

In November, 1849, the Jones District was made to include all the territory lying south of a line drawn east and west through the center of the blocks between Monroe and Adams streets. A building for this new district was completed during the second week in March, 1850, at a cost of $6,795. The first principal was H. McChesney, who served until October, 1851, when he was succeeded by Isaac Clafin. He continued to act as principal until the spring of 1856, and Willard Woodard then resigned, his successor, Leander Stone, serving for about a year and a half. M. Ingalls became the next principal, and H. Belfield took charge of the school during the fall of 1865. The latter held the position until he was transferred to the new Dore School, in December, 1867. Morton Culver, the next incumbent, gave place to Norton W. Boomer in the fall of 1870. Mr. Boomer held the position at the time of the great fire, which swept the Jones from the list of public schools. The building was then valued at $13,170, and the present fine structure, located on the corner of Harrison Street and Third Avenue, was not erected until 1873.

Washington School.—In April, 1851, the city purchased a lot on the corner of West Indiana and Sangamon streets. A building was erected during that year, a two-story brick structure, and the school was opened in January, 1852. This was then the Sixth School District. In 1862, a wooden structure was erected to accommodate the requirements of that region. In October, 1855, A. D. Sturtevant, the first principal, was succeeded by George A. Low, who served during the school year 1857-58. In December, 1858, Benjamin R. Cutter became principal, and so acted up to the time of his death, June 15, 1875. A new building was erected for the Washington School in the summer of 1871, on Morgan Street, between Eric and Ohio. This structure, four stories high, built of brick, was one of the most imposing school buildings in the city.

Sangamon-street School.—Upon the removal of the Washington School to its new quarters on Morgan Street, the old building was occupied by the Sangamon-street School, having primary grades only. Mrs. Laura D. Ayres remained as principal until the time of the fire.

Franklin School.—This house (District No. 5) was opened in January, 1852, being located on the corner of Division and Sedgwick streets. D. C. Ferguson, its first principal, served until March, 1855, after which Charles A. Dupee acted for one year, when he was elected principal of the High School, at its opening. William Drake followed him, being succeeded by Albert G. Lane in the fall of 1858. Mr. Lane was one of the first High School graduates, and continued principal of the Franklin School until November, 1869, when he was elected to the office he now holds—the superintendency of schools of Cook County.

The new Franklin building was ready for occupancy January 4, 1869, dedicatory services being held on the 8th of that month; which included addresses by A. W. Tinkham, secretary of the Board of Public Works; L. Brentano, president of the Board of Education; Judge J. A. Jameson, Elliott Anthony; J. L. Pickard, superintendent of schools; and a poem by J. Mahoney. The building was similar in construction to the Hayes School, each being four stories high, with four rooms in each story, except in the upper in which there were two classrooms and an assembly hall. The Franklin was erected on a lot belonging to the School Fund, on the corner of Division and Sedgwick streets. In the fall of 1869, F. Hanford became principal of the Franklin School, and remained in that position until elected assistant superintendent of schools, and was followed, in October, 1870, by Albert R. Sabin.

The branch building was erected on the same lot in 1862, and was destroyed with the main structure in the great fire. The value of the property was then $77,195.

MARGARET DOUGALL, principal of the Oak-street public school, was born in Montreal, and came with her parents, Thomas and Elizabeth (Cameron) Dougall, to Chicago, when a mere child. She received her preliminary education in the Ogden School, there winning the first scholarship medal for general excellence, and graduated from the High School in the class of 1864. Subsequent to her graduation, she began to teach at the Franklin School, and continued there until the fire of 1871 burned the building, and then went to the Lincoln School to finish the remainder of the year, with the late Mr. Hanford as principal. After the re-building of the Franklin School, and at its opening, in November, 1872, Miss Dougall returned as head assistant for two years, and in September, 1874, she organized the Sheldon School, and became its principal. In September, 1880, she was transferred to the Oak-street School, which she organized and put in working order.

Brown School.—In December, 1853, an order was passed to purchase a school site on Warren Avenue, between Page and Wood streets. The purchase was made, and, in February, 1855, proposals were received for the erection of a two-story wooden school-house upon this lot, which was soon afterward completed. The new twelve-room brick building was opened during the early portion of 1858, and was the first school building heated by steam in the city. The structure was of brick, three stories high, and cost $25,000. The old structure which had been used since 1855, was removed shortly after the completion of the new building to the Wells-school lot, then known as School, No. 12, corner of Ashland Avenue and Cornelia Street, a little over one mile north. After the erection of the permanent building on the Wells-school lot, in 1866, it was again removed to the Burr-school lot, corner of Ashland and Wabansia avenues, about a mile distant, remaining in this location until after the fire. When, in February, 1858, the Board of Education commenced to designate the schools by names instead of by numbers, District No. 8 was called the "Brown School," in honor of William H. Brown, school agent and trustee of the School Fund for thirteen years, and who so unselfishly labored to establish the system of public education when it was weak and in need of fostering care. Henry M. Keith served as principal, until the close of the school year in 1859, having five assistants. Samuel H. White served from that time until September, 1868, when he was succeeded by John K. Merrill, who continued in charge until after 1871.

Foster School.—In 1855, a wooden school-house, two stories high, was erected on Union Street, between O'Brien and Dussold streets, for District No. 9, which was then but sparsely settled. Two years thereafter a brick structure was erected, to accommodate the rapidly increasing school population, the building being of brick, three stories high, and costing $28,000. A small branch building (wood) was erected in 1862. George W. Spofford remained principal for the Foster School, as it was called in 1858, until the fall of 1870, when he was succeeded by Orville T. Bright, who served until after 1871. The Foster School was named after Dr. John H. Foster, for many years intimately connected with the public schools of Chicago, an able, benevolent and liberal gentleman. The main building of the Foster School was erected, as stated, in 1857, on Union Street near Twelfth. There still remained on the lot, the old building of 1855, in addition to the four-room structure erected in 1862. In 1864, the city purchased a frame building at the corner of Halsted and Twelfth streets, which was used for some time as a branch.

Ogden School.—In the spring of 1856, a lot was purchased on Chestnut Street, north of Chicago Avenue, and a building erected thereon during the same year. It was composed of brick, three stories high. Appleton H. Fitch acted as principal from the opening of the school until the fall of 1858, when George W. Dow was appointed. F. S. Heywood was principal from the fall of 1861 to the fall of 1870, at which time George W. Heath accepted the position. The great fire destroyed the building.

Moseley School.—The first Moseley-school building was erected in 1856, corner of Michigan Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street. It was built of brick, three stories high. Bradford Y. Averill was the first principal of the school, being succeeded in the fall of 1859 by Francis A. Benham. Samuel A. Briggs commenced his term of service in the winter of 1861, and continued as principal until May, 1864, when he was succeeded by Jeremiah Slocum. When, in June, 1870, Mr. Slocum was appointed an assistant in the High School, Samuel N. Griffith was chosen principal, and held the position at the time of the fire.

Central High School.—As has been stated in the first volume of this history, the Central High School building was completed in the fall of 1856. The school was in charge of Charles A. Dupee, who was succeeded, in September, 1860, by George Howland, his former assistant and the present superintendent of schools. Provision was made for a classical course of three years, and a normal course of two years. The combined classical and English high courses could be completed in four years. In 1860, both the classical and English courses were extended to four years and all pupils were required to take at least one language during the course. A special classical course of three years was provided in 1868 for those in preparation for college. The normal department was organized as an independent school in 1871, and so continued until 1876, when it was again made a department of the High School. Ira Moore was principal of the normal school from October, 1856, to July, 1857, and Edward C. Delano from September, 1857, until the suspension, in June, 1877. The age required for admission previous to 1870 was thirteen years, when it was reduced to twelve years.

Branch High Schools.—In September, 1869, branch high schools or classes were formed in each division of the city: In the Franklin School, North Division, Haven School, South Division, and two in the West Division—one in the Foster-school building, and the other in the Hayes-school building. The studies of the first year of the high school course were taken up in these classes, after which, if they desired to continue the course, the pupils attended the central building. This arrangement continued until 1875, when the Division High Schools were established, with a two years' course.

The Newberry-school building was erected in 1858. It is located at the corner of Orchard and Willow streets, on ground purchased of Walter L. Newberry. It contains twenty-three rooms, including an assembly hall, and has sittings for one thousand four hundred and forty pupils. The immediate predecessor of the Newberry School was known as the "Branch of School No. 5," or "Branch of the Franklin." This was located in a mission-church building on Larrabee Street near North Avenue, and closed in December, 1858, with one hundred and eighteen pupils. Miss Hooke is at present the head-assistant of the Newberry School, having been appointed to this position in 1862. The Newberry School was organized in January, 1859, by Miss Emma Hooke, assisted by Misses Ellen J. Stevens and Ellen V. Lamb. After the first two or three days, John Atwater engaged in the school as a substitute for the principal, who was detained by the death of a son. After about one week, the first principal, Curtis C. Meserve, of Rochester, N. Y., assumed charge, and continued in this relation until July, 1865. He afterward engaged in the real estate business, and was a member of the Board of Education from 1868 to 1872. In September, 1865, the second principal, Albert R. Sabin, began his work, which remained in his charge until October, 1870, when he became principal of the Franklin School. In October, 1870, the third and present principal, Corydon G. Stowell, was transferred to this school from what was then known as the Larrabee-street School, and later as the Lincoln School, of which he was appointed the first principal in September, 1870. The sessions of the Newberry School were interrupted by the great fire of October 8 and 9, 1871. The membership at the close of September, 1871, was nine hundred and seventy-one pupils. On Tuesday, October 10, the school building, situated on the very border of the fire limits on the northwest, was opened as a hospital and supply depot for sufferers by the fire, with the principal in charge. About six hundred persons were sheltered there on the night of October 10, and for several days following thousands were furnished with provisions, supplied through the Chicago Relief and Aid Society. On October 13, about four hundred and twenty-five persons were lodged in the building. The North Chicago Free Dispensary was opened in the school-house during its use for relief purposes. The number of occupants gradually diminished, so that in the second week in November those remaining were removed to the relief barracks, erected near the corner of North Avenue and North Halsted Street. One birth and one death occurred in the school building during its use as a hospital. On November 13, the school was re-opened with five hundred and seventy-five pupils. Many who had saved their text books from the fire donated such as they did not need to the Newberry Fund Library, for the use of the pupils who needed them. Complete school records were not resumed until December, 1871, at the close of which month there were one thousand and sixty-six in attendance. Since that time the greatest membership has been one thousand five hundred and twenty-two, in October, 1872, and the least one thousand one hundred and fifteen, in December, 1875. The "Newberry Fund" of one thousand dollars was given to the city for the benefit of this school, April 7, 1862, by Walter L. Newberry, Esq. The income from the investment of this fund has been applied to the purchase of text books, maps, charts, apparatus, and a general library. The latter now contains two hundred and ninety-one volumes. The Newberry Magazine Club was organized by the teachers in 1872, to provide such magazines and papers as seemed desirable for professional and juvenile reading. They still sustain this undertaking, and their efforts have been supplemented by limited appropriations from the Newberry Fund. The building was heated by stoves until 1873, when steam-heating apparatus was provided. Evening schools were conducted at the Newberry building during the greater part of the fall terms of 1873-75 and 1877-78. The Nickersonville Branch of the Newberry was opened in September, 1867, in charge of Miss Mary A. C. Smith. When the Lincoln School was opened in September, 1870, this became a branch of that school. Of the twenty-seven teachers now connected with the Newberry (two absent on leave), one has been in this school twenty years; one, thirteen; two, nine; two, eight; one, seven; two, six; three, five; one, four; two, three; six, two; two, one; and four less than one year—the average time being nearly four and three-fourths years. From the organization of this school to June, 1879, inclusive, there were one hundred and twenty-nine different teachers, and two hundred and twenty-eight pupils admitted from its highest grade to the high school.

ALBERT ROBBINS SABIN, principal of the Franklin public school, son of E. S. and Sophia (Hall) Sabin, was born at Saxton's River, Windham Co., Vt., September 30, 1837. He was educated at Middlebury College, Vt., and finished his studies in 1862, taking the honorary degrees of A. B. and A. M. In September, 1862, he came to Chicago, and on November 9, 1863, commenced to teach at the old Dearborn School (then opposite McVicker's Theatre) where he remained two years. He next held the position of principal of the Newberry School for five years, and was appointed to the Franklin School in 1869. In the fire of 1871, the school building was burned, and for the remainder of the scholastic year Mr. Sabin taught in the Douglas School. During the following two years he was teacher of classics in the High School under Mr. Howland, the present superintendent of city schools, and for the next five years was principal of the Lake Forest Academy, a preparatory school for boys. During the following two years, Mr. Sabin was professor at Lake Forest University, was then superintendent of schools in Lake County for four years, and at the expiration of that time he returned to Chicago and became principal of the Kinzie School, succeeding James Hannan. After the death of Norton W. Boomer, Mr. Sabin was transferred to his present position. Mr. Sabin was married in Vermont, July 11, 1862, to Miss Mary Barber, of Middlebury, Vt. He has one son, Stuart B., who is preparing to enter the Williams College next fall.

In the summer of 1862, Mr. Sabin patriotically responded to the call for volunteers in defense of the Union, by raising a company in Addison Co., Vt., which became a part of the 9th Vermont Infantry Volunteers. The regiment was captured at Harper's Ferry under Colonel Miles, and, the whole garrison being paroled, was sent to Annapolis, Md., and from there ordered to Kansas to fight against the Indians, who were on the war path. The regiment came to Chicago and was there mustered out, as the Indians were subdued, and at Camp Douglas Mr. Sabin resigned his commission as captain and returned to private life, settling in Chicago. Mr. Sabin belongs to the Masonic Order, and is a member of the National and State Teachers' associations and of the Chicago Institute of Education.

Skinner School.—In 1859, a brick structure, four stories in height, with wing, was erected at the corner of Aberdeen and Jackson streets. It was named in honor of Hon. Mark Skinner, and was built upon the same plan as the Newberry. A. N. Merriman served as principal until the fall of 1869, when he was succeeded by Ira S. Baker, who continued until after the fire.

Haven School.—This building, named in honor of Luther Haven, was dedicated September 20, 1862. Rev. W. H. Ryder presided at the dedicatory exercises, addresses being delivered by Mr. Haven, James Ward, chairman of the Committee on Buildings and Grounds; S. S. Hayes, city comptroller; Newton Bateman, superintendent of public instruction; James J. Noble, principal of the school; and City Superintendent Wells. The building, on Wabash Avenue, south of Twelfth, was three stories high, with basement and attic, heated by steam and furnished with modern improvements. Mr. Noble was succeeded by George D. Broomell in the fall of 1866. Mr. Broomell, whose name has been previously mentioned in connection with the Dearborn School, served until September, 1869, when he was elected the virtual first assistant-superintendent of public schools, although the office had not yet been legally created. Leslie Lewis, who had followed Mr. Broomell as principal of the Dearborn School, now succeeded him as principal of the Haven School, and continued in that position until after 1871.

School Number Twelve.—This building, situated on the corner of Reuben and Cornelia streets, was removed from the Brown-school (District No. 8) lot, upon the opening of the new building, was a wooden structure, two stories high, and contained two rooms. Its first principal was Eugene L. Aiken. Two branches in the vicinity were opened previous to the erection of the present imposing structure known as the Wells School. Morton Culver succeeded Mr. Aiken. Rebecca C. Gosselin was principal of the Reuben-street branch. Upon the opening of the new sixteen-room building erected on this lot, the frame building was again removed still further north, to the Burr-school (first known as the Rolling Mill School, lot, corner of Ashland and Waubansia avenues.

Wells School.—The ground for this building, named after William H. Wells, for eight years the faithful and able superintendent of Public Schools, was broken August 1, 1865, and the building dedicated with appropriate ceremonies September 14, 1866. It stood in the center of a plat of ground of forty-five thousand square feet in extent, fronting east on Reuben Street, now known as Ashland Avenue, and extending south on Cornelia. The structure was four stories high, exclusive of basement, and built of brick, at a cost of $37,000. At the dedicatory exercises the chair was occupied by the president of the Board of Education, C. N. Holden. J. G. Gindele, of the Board of Public Works, delivered the keys to Mayor Rice who, in turn, transferred them

C. N. Holden. They passed from Mr. Holden's hands to those of Jeremiah Mahoney, principal of the school. Addresses were also delivered by John C. Dore, first superintendent of public schools; William H. Wells, the second, and J. L. Pickard, the then incumbent; also by

William Wells.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM WELLS.

Willard Woodard, chairman of the Committee on Schools of the Common Council; C. C. P. Holden, chairman of the Finance Committee; ex-City Comptroller S. S. Hayes; and Dr. W. H. Ryder, chairman of Committee on Dedication. Mr. Mahoney continued to act as principal during all the period covered by this volume.

South Chicago School.—By legislative enactment of February 13, 1863, the limits of the city were extended so as to take in the South Chicago, Bridgeport and Holstein schools, the number of pupils enrolled in these schools, at this time, being three hundred and ninety-seven. The South Chicago school occupied a small frame building, located on Douglas Avenue, near South Park Avenue. Upon the opening of the Cottage Grove-school building, in 1867, it was removed to Twenty-sixth Street, near Wentworth Avenue, and served as a branch of the Moseley School till the opening of the Ward-school building in 1875, when the building was sold. Rodney Welch acted as principal until the fall of 1865, when he was succeeded by J. H. Broomell, who took charge of the Cottage Grove School upon the opening in January, 1867. The South Chicago School was merged into the latter.

Cottage Grove School.—This building, located on Douglas Avenue, near Cottage Grove, was erected in the fall of 1866, being first occupied January 2, 1867. It was pleasantly situated in the center of extensive grounds, shaded by native forest trees. The building was of wood, costing about $24,000. James H. Broomell was its first principal, and so remained until the spring of 1877.

Holstein School.—By the extension of the city limits in 1863, the Holstein School, on Cortland Street near Henshaw, became one of the public schools. One room was added in 1867. Mary E. Lyon, Miriam S. Sherman, and Eliza Lundergreen were successively principals of the school.

The Elizabeth-street Primary School was opened January 2, 1867, and located on Lake Street, corner of Elizabeth. Sarah E. Osgood was principal until the fall of 1869, when Hattie N. Winchell assumed the responsibilities. She is still principal.

Pearson-street Primary School.—This school was opened January 2, 1867, and located at the corner of Pearson and Market streets. The building was destroyed in the great fire of 1871, the property being then valued at over $16,000. Flora J. Parish served as principal up to the fall of 1869, and Mary J. Synon up to the time the school was swept away.

The Walsh-street Primary School, of the same size and internal arrangement as the Cottage Grove, was opened May 6, 1867. It was located on Twentieth Street, corner of Johnson. Frank B. Williams, its first principal, was succeeded in the fall of 1868 by Mary E. S. Brown, who served until after 1871.

MARY ELEANOR SPENCER BROWN RICE, principal of the Walsh Public School, was born in Stephentown, Rensselaer Co.,

N. Y., April 8, 1843, and is the daughter of Roswell Darling and Eleanor (Carr) Brown. Her father's ancestors came from Scotland in the middle of the eighteenth century, and settled in New York, and her mother's from England in the first half of the seventeenth century, locating in Massachusetts. In 1845, her parents removed to Joliet, Ill., where she was educated. After a thorough training in all departments of the schools of that city, she graduated from the High School in July, 1859, and began teaching during the same year, in the graded schools of that place, holding responsible positions in the primary and grammar departments for about eight years. In 1867, she went to Warsaw, Ill., and taught one year in the High School there. She came to Chicago in October, 1868, and was appointed assistant at the Walsh (then a grammar school), and in the January following, became principal of the same. In April, 1869, at the general examination of grammar schools, the Walsh ranked first in the city, the class winning the honor, being the one Mrs. Rice had taught exclusively for seven months. In the spring examination of 1870, this school stood No. 4. At the examination for papers to be sent to the Vienna Exposition in 1873, it ranked second in the city. In the fall of October, 1871, Mrs. Rice was the only principal who generously gave up her position to a principal of a burned-out school; but as soon as a vacancy occurred, she was recalled to her former place. When Mrs. Rice was first placed at the head of the Walsh School, it consisted of a two-story wooden structure and a branch, having ten divisions and eleven teachers, including herself; now there are two twelve-room buildings and twenty-seven teachers, including the principal. Mrs. Rice was married in Joliet, May 29, 1882, to Dr. N. B. Rice, of Chicago.

The Dore School.—This building, on Harrison Street, near Halsted, was named after John C. Dore, first city superintendent of schools. It was constructed upon the plan of the Wells and Holden school-houses, being of brick, four stories high. The structure was completed in December, 1867, and dedicated January 4, 1868. President Clarke presided, and various addresses were delivered, among others one by Mr. Dore himself. Jeremiah Mahoney, principal of the Wells School, also read an ode address to public school teachers, one verse of which is here produced, as being peculiarly charged with good sense:—

“Three trades are game for every critic fool:
Religion, politics, and teaching school.
All other callings are by calm behest
Explained by those who understand them best;
But every wordy, theoretic leech
Can show you how to vote and preach and teach.”

H. H. Belfield remained principal of the Dore until after 1871, having been transferred from the Jones School.

Rolling Mill Primary.—During the year 1867, the original No. Twelve-school building was moved from the corner of Reuben Street and Waubansia Avenue. This structure first did service on the prairies west of Union Park in 1855, upon ground occupied by the Brown School. A wooden addition was made the next year; Sarah O. Babcock was principal until 1871. Both buildings were subsequently removed to the Wicker Park-school lot.

Elm-street Primary School was built in 1868, on the corner of Rush and Elm streets, and opened on the 5th of September. It was of wood, two stories high, built upon the same plan as the Cottage Grove-school house, and cost nearly $20,000. Lizzie C. Rust, Annie E. Young and Sarah N. Smith were the principals during the succeeding three years. The building was destroyed in the great fire.

Bridgeport School.—As previously stated, the Bridgeport School was one of those absorbed by the city upon the extension of its corporate limits in 1863, and was situated on the corner of Archer Avenue and Fuller Street. This building was enlarged during the fall of that year by the addition of two rooms on what is now the front of the building. In the summer of 1864 it was again increased in size by the addition of two rooms in the rear of the building. Charles F. Babcock was principal.

The Holden School, located on Deering Street, corner of Thirty-first, was erected in 1868, being dedicated on May 2 of that year. It was named in honor of Charles N. Holden. The building was a four-story brick structure and cost over $70,000. Charles F. Babcock, its principal, served until after the fire.

CHARLES FERDINAND BABCOCK, the principal of the Holden School, was born in Sherborn, Mass., September 8, 1836, and is the son of Malachi and Sarah Babcock. He received his primary education at the academy in Leicester, Mass., and then attended Captain Alden Partridge's military school, at Brandywine Springs, Del. Having finished his course of study there, he was employed on a branch of the Chicago & Alton Railroad until December, 1855, when he moved to the great West and became an assistant engineer on the Racine & Mississippi Railway, where he remained for some time, next becoming connected in the same capacity with the Joliet & Chicago Railroad Company. He began teaching in the public schools of Chicago in 1862, having been appointed at that time to the position which he now so meritoriously fills. Mr. Babcock was married in 1860, to Miss Helen Marr, of Chicago. He is a member of Richard Cole Lodge, No. 607, A. F. & A. M., and of Washington Chapter, No. 43, R. A. M.

The Hayes School, so called in honor of Samuel S. Hayes, was built in 1868, at a cost of over $70,000, and was situated on Leavitt Street, between Walnut and Fulton. The building, a brick structure, was four stories high, and modeled after the Holden-school house. A. N. Merriman, the present incumbent, was principal, being transferred from the Skinner School. The dedicatory services occurred on September 25, addresses being delivered by General J. McArthur, of the Board of Public Works; S. A. Briggs, vice-president of the Board of Education; Alderman C. C. P. Holden, Rev. Robert Collyer, S. S. Hayes and Alderman Willard Woodard.

The Carpenter School, named after Philo Carpenter, and erected in 1868, was four stories in height, and, in the money of those times, cost over $75,000. The lot had a frontage of two hundred and thirteen feet on Centre Avenue, and ran back on Second Street for a distance of two hundred and five feet. Alfred Kirk was the first principal of the school and remained in that position until after 1871.

Wentworth-avenue Primary School was opened September 5, 1868, the building being a two-story structure erected at a cost of nearly $20,000. Mary E. Reed acted as principal for several years after its establishment.

Cicero Primary School was opened in 1869, when the corporate limits were extended west. Its principals, while it was under city control, were Lydia C. Avery and Nancy A. Helm. The building was located on Warren Avenue, fronting the railroad track, and the school was closed in December, 1870. Its pupils were transferred to the Hayes School.

The Clarke School was completed January 1, 1869, and opened on the 17th of January. Addresses were delivered by R. M. Guilford, a member of the Board and of the Committee on Schools; Alderman Woodard; W. H. Carter, of the Board of Public Works; E. F. Runyan; J. L. Pickard, superintendent of schools; and by George C. Clarke; and a dedicatory poem was read by George Howland, principal of the High School. Frank B. Williams, its first principal, continued to act in such capacity until after the fire. He is now principal of the Marquette School.

FRANK BENTON WILLIAMS, principal of the Marquette School, was born in Chelsea, Vt., on his grandfather's farm (the well-known Elisha Williams' place, on the East Hill), February 3, 1837; and is the son of David P. and Dolly (Alexander) Williams. When twelve years of age his father died, and the family moved to Tunbridge, Vt., where Frank continued to work on a farm during the summer, and attended school in the winter. When about fourteen, he was bound out to a brother-in-law, until he should become of age, but being a proud-spirited boy he concluded henceforth to depend on himself, so broke his bonds and started out in life. He continued to work on a farm and attend school until eighteen, when he began to teach a school in Tunbridge. The following three years he was a student in the Thetford and Chelsea academies. He then went to the Kimball Union Academy at Meriden, N. H., and graduated in 1859. Having resolved to go west and read law, he changed his mind, went to Greenfield, in Southern Missouri, and opened an academy, which he taught for three years with success, and was then offered a school in Palmyra, Walworth Co., Wis., which he accepted and taught for two years. Thence he went to Madison, Wis., organized and conducted the high school for one year, during which time he wrote a history of the Madison schools. In 1866, he came to Chicago to accept the principalship of the Walsh School, and, having succeeded as an instructor and disciplinarian, the Board of Education took cognizance of his qualifications and transferred him to the Clarke School, one of the best in the city. Here he taught for twelve years, raising it to a high standard of excellence, in fact, it was the model school of the city. After teaching so long, he intimated to the Board of Education a desire to see the old world, for the purpose of recreation and to study the educational systems of the different schools in the countries he might visit. He was relieved from the Clarke, and engaged to organize the Marquette School, then in course of construction, virtually being retained in the employ of the Board while granted a leave of absence. He traveled in Ireland, Scotland, England, and on the continent, visiting the schools and laying up a fund of information of which he has since made practical use. After an absence of five months, he returned and organized the Marquette School, and now has its management. This is also a model school, and the pride of the West Side. To his ideas, well and faithfully executed, under his skillful direction, is due the marked success of this school. Mr. Williams was the prime mover in organizing the society of the Sons of Vermont in Chicago, and has been among the foremost in making the association a success, acting as secretary and in other official positions.

North Branch Primary School was opened January 4, 1869, in the building known as the North Star Mission, on Division Street, corner of Sedgwick. In 1870, the location was changed to Vedder Street, east of Halsted, and the next year it was swept away by the great fire. F. Emma Coss had charge of the school at the time of its destruction.

The West Fourteenth-street School, formerly known as the Mitchell-street Primary, was opened in November, 1869, being located on Mitchell Street, between Union and Jefferson streets. Its principal was Miss Tammie E. Flowers, who previously had charge of the DeKoven-street Primary. She continued at the head of the West Fourteenth-street School until after the period covered by this volume.

LaSalle-street Primary School was located on Clark Street, near North Avenue, and opened in November, 1869. Elizabeth C. Rust acted as principal until the building was destroyed by the great fire. Its value was then placed at $32,650.

The Third-avenue Primary School was organized February 28, 1870. The building was located on Third Avenue, near Twelfth Street. Mary J. Dewey, the first principal, still continues in charge of the school.

The Lincoln-school building was erected in September, 1870, on Lincoln Street, between Belden and Fullerton avenues. The structure was of brick, three stories high, eighty-two by seventy-six feet, with a wing sixty by fifty-two feet. Corydon G. Stowell was principal of the school about one month, when he was transferred to the Newberry School. Miss Maria H. Haven, his successor, held the position until after the fire.

Douglas School.—The building was erected in 1870, being located on the corner of Forest Avenue and Thirty-second Street. The structure was of brick, three stories in height, eighty-two by seventy-six feet, with wing sixty by fifty-two feet. Its first principal, N. C. Twining, served until June, 1871, when he was succeeded by Alfred P. Burbank, the famous elocutionist. Mr. Burbank held the position until 1873, when he resigned, to pursue his specialty.

Deaf Mute School.—In September, 1870, the first step was taken toward the establishment of a school for the instruction of deaf mutes in the city, at which time the use of a room in the LaSalle-street Primary-school building on North Clark Street, opposite Lincoln Park, was obtained for this purpose. This class was afterward removed to the new Franklin-school building, and then to a room occupied as one of the offices of the Board of Education, where it remained until the great fire of 1871.

THE GREAT FIRE destroyed ten school buildings owned by the city, one in the South Division (Jones), and nine in the North Division, leaving but two structures devoted to public education in the latter section—the Newberry and Lincoln. The following figures show the extent of the calamity, setting forth the value of property destroyed: "Jones," corner Clark and Harrison streets, $13,170; "Kinzie," corner of Ohio and LaSalle streets, $21,390; "Franklin," corner Division and Sedgwick streets, $77,195; "Ogden," Chestnut Street, between State and Dearborn streets, $39,675; Pearson-street Primary, corner of State and Elm streets, $16,750; LaSalle-street Primary, Clark Street near North Avenue, $32,650; North Branch Primary, Vedder Street near Halsted, $32,000. Total, $249,780. The schools were closed for two weeks after the fire, re-opening October 23; and inasmuch as the number of teachers employed was largely in excess of the rooms to which to assign them, they were divided into four classes: First, those who were burned out and were homeless; second, those who had parents or younger members of the family dependent upon them for support; third, those who had to depend upon their own earnings for a livelihood; and fourth, those who had friends or relatives who could provide for them for the present.

Josiah H. Pickard, superintendent of schools, who succeeded Mr. Wells in September, 1864, gives the following account of the fire as it affected the workings of his department:

"Upon the evening of Saturday, October 7, 1871, the key to the office of the Board of Education was turned as usual, and rooms, admirably adapted to the several uses of the Board, newly and neatly fitted up, were locked against intruders. These rooms contained a full supply of blanks for the year; a large number of class books and registers; nearly two thousand copies of our Course of Instruction; full files of state and city reports upon education, gathered during many years; a good supply of copies of the several reports of our own schools; the nucleus of a school library for which provision had just been made; manuscript records of the proceedings of the Board of Education from its origin; minute records of examination of teachers for seven years preceding, and partial records of other examinations covering a period of fifteen years; all the papers written by teachers and pupils at the regular examinations, except those for admission to the High School; files of all questions used for examination of both teachers and pupils; files of an extensive correspondence; copies of monthly and annual reports from the several schools of the city; and a few copies of the report for 1870-71, to the preparation of which the long vacation had been devoted. At the usual time for opening the schools on Monday morning, nothing of all these remained save a mass of smoking ruins and one safe, in which were preserved, in recognizable form, the records of the proceedings of the Board. The same intruder, against whose entrance locks and bolts availed nothing, had sought at the bindery the full edition of our annual report, and the printed account of our year's work was entirely destroyed, with the exception of a very few copies that had been taken home by members of the Board and the principals of the schools who were at the rooms upon Saturday afternoon. Before ten o'clock of Monday evening, fifteen buildings used for school purposes, with reference books, and all the books belonging to the children, had been consumed. Of these buildings, ten were owned by the city and five were rented. Of the buildings owned by the city, five were comparatively new, two were erected about thirteen years before, and three were among the oldest school structures of the city. The fourteen school buildings furnished accommodations for about ten thousand pupils, nearly one-third of our entire enrollment. One hundred and thirty-five teachers were employed in the buildings destroyed. During the afternoon of Monday, while one hundred thousand people were fleeing before the devouring element, many of them without hope of shelter even, the president of the Board of Education promptly ordered the opening of all the school-houses of the city, and thousands of people upon the prairies about the city were visited, and invited to take shelter therein. During almost the entire Monday, some of our lady teachers, with their friends, sought safety, from the clouds of hot smoke filled with burning cinders, in the waters of the lake. Standing in the water, and using a covering of wet waterproofs, they saved their persons and the clothing they wore from destruction. Tuesday morning dawned upon the most perfect desolation. The school buildings were thronged with homeless, and well-nigh hopeless, people. In the school-rooms, the corridors and dressing-rooms, families had settled themselves with what little had been saved from the fire. One house furnished quarters for more than six hundred people; several others, for scarcely less numbers. For a little time, we were stupified; but the conviction that the things which remained must be strengthened, and that, if possible, the city must be spared the demoralization which would follow even a temporary closing of our schools, together with the thought that now, more than ever, parents needed such aid in the care of their children as the schools could furnish, urged upon us the necessity of immediate action. Temporary quarters were secured for the use of the Board, and the teachers were called together upon the afternoon of Thursday. Bank vaults were as yet too deeply buried in hot debris to reveal the condition of the city deposits. Whether a single dollar remained for public purposes was not yet determined. In the midst of this uncertainty, the teachers nobly tendered their services to the city for such pay as the city might find herself able to give. Since all could not be employed, many cheerfully relinquished their claims to positions in favor of others who might be more unfortunate than themselves. Immediately upon this action of the teachers, the Board of Education resolved to open the schools at the earliest practicable moment."

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.—In December, 1850, the Common Council passed an ordinance making it the duty of the teachers of the public schools to meet on Saturdays and hold a teachers' institute, under the direction of the school inspectors, and by a rule of the Board they were required to meet on the first, second and third Saturdays in each month, and remain in session not less than two hours at each meeting. In October, 1852, it was resolved to hold the meetings on the first and third Saturdays of each month, and, in 1856, they were reduced to one a month. At first the meetings of the institute were held in school No. 1, opposite the present site of McVicker's Theatre, and, as stated, under the direction of the Board of School Inspectors. In May, 1854, John C. Dore, Chicago's first superintendent of public schools, took charge of it, and, when the high school was completed in the summer of 1856, the place of meeting was transferred to that building. Mr. Dore had, in the meantime, resigned his position, and William H. Wells was chosen his successor. The exercises at the teachers' institute consisted of instruction in the branches of education taught in the public schools, discussions and exhibitions of model classes of pupils, taken alternately from the primary and grammar schools. These meetings were not only productive of mutual improvement, but afforded an opportunity for the superintendent to communicate freely with the teachers on all matters of general educational interest. The teachers themselves became better acquainted with one another, and, all in all, the institute has been the means of welding into more compact shape the public school system of Chicago. By 1862, the teachers had so increased in numbers, that Superintendent Wells adopted the plan of having general exercises, which would benefit all, during the first of the forenoon, and dividing the institute into five sections, during the last hour, for drill exercises, and discussions adapted to the wants of the several grade teachers; and although the management of the institute had always been left by the Board in his hands, it was his uniform practice to invite a committee of the teachers to aid him in arranging the successive programmes of exercises, and thus giving to the institute, except in the matter of attendance, much of the freedom of a voluntary association. To give an idea of the increase in the attendance of the institute for the twelve years, during which it had already been in existence, it may be stated that when first organized, in 1850, the membership was twenty-four, while at this time it was over one hundred and seventy-five, with an attendance of about one hundred. In 1867, the attendance had increased to one hundred and seventy-five. Different topics were taken up and treated, the teachers gathering in sections corresponding in number to the number of grades. In 1868, the average attendance at every institute was two hundred and thirty-nine, and the meetings had become so instructive and popular that it was found necessary to hold gatherings at other localities. During the year 1869, five institutes were held at Crosby Music Hall. In 1870, the lack of a suitable hall was felt more than ever, and for three months of the school year the teachers met in their respective divisions of the city. During the winter a series of lectures were given at Farwell Hall by Edmund Andrews, M.D., Col. J. W. Foster, J. V. Z. Blaney, M.D., W. H. Ryder, D.D., Rev. David Swing, and Major J. W. Powell, for the benefit of the institute. The condition of this valuable annex to the public school system, in June, 1871, is thus described by Josiah L. Pickard, then superintendent of schools:

"At no time since the organization of this institute, until the past year, have we failed to bring together, for at least half the sessions, all the teachers of the city. Having no hall large enough to accommodate all, we have during the past year met in different parts of the city. The teachers of the West Division have met at the Skinner-school building. Those of the North and South divisions have met alternately at the Haven and the Franklin school buildings. No outside help, with one or two exceptions, has been called in, but the exercises have been conducted within ourselves."

The number present at every institute was four hundred and one teacher.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS.

The following list of private schools and teachers in Chicago, during the years 1857-71, has been prepared with much care, and is believed to be both complete and accurate. Recourse has been had to the directories of the period, and the information obtained from them supplemented and in some instances corrected by that derived from private sources. Great pains has been taken to avoid duplication of any school under another name, and changes in title have been noticed under that of the earliest date. In the majority of cases, the names of teachers could not be obtained; and in many instances where the names have been given, the name published may not be the one most familiar to some reader who may have attended any given school "in the days of his youth." Not a few of the residents of Chicago, however, may here find information which will awaken pleasant reminiscences of school-boy days that have long slumbered.

LOCAL TRANSPORTATION.

OMNIBUS ROUTES.—From 1858 to 1864, a number of omnibus routes were maintained by F. Parmelee & Co., and M. O. & S. B. Walker. As the lines of street railroads were extended, the omnibuses were gradually driven from the field, until, in 1864, the Walkers, who were the last to withdraw, sold out their entire stock of horses to the West Division Railway Company. After this time, there were one or two spasmodic attempts to establish an omnibus opposition to the street cars on particular routes, but they resulted in nothing definite. The omnibus routes extended as follows, for the years mentioned :

1858.—Lake Street and Blue Island Avenue ; from the corner of Madison and Dearborn streets to Hastings Street and Blue Island Avenue, every half hour.

Canal Street; from the corner of Madison and Dearborn to South Canal and Meagher streets, every half hour.

1859-60.—Lake Street and Blue Island Avenue; from City Hotel to Twelfth Street, on Blue Island Avenue, every hour.

East and West Randolph streets; on Randolph to Robey Street, every fifteen minutes.

South Clark Street, to the corner of Twelfth and Clark, every ten minutes.

1861-62.—Lake and Randolph streets ; on Randolph to Robey Street, every fifteen minutes.

East and West Lake streets ; from City Hotel to corner of Robey and Lake streets, every half hour.

Canal Street; from Post-office Exchange to Meagher Street, every half hour.

Madison Street; from Garrett Block to Union Park House, every thirty minutes.

South Clark Street, to the corner of Twelfth and Clark, every ten minutes.

1863.—Lake and Blue Island Avenue, to Hastings Street, every half hour.

Canal Street; from Post-office Exchange to South Branch, every half hour.

South Clark Street, to Twelfth Street, every ten minutes.

The year 1864 saw still greater diminution in, and before the end of the year the last of, the omnibus routes. In that year, the only lines maintained were those on Canal Street and on South Clark Street.

Before the close of the year, these were abandoned, and from that time the street cars have formed the ordinary means for getting about the city.

SAMUEL B. WALKER is an old and highly respected resident of Chicago, his associations with the business affairs of the city extending over a period of more than two-score years. Late in the fall of 1841, Mr. Walker, accompanied by his mother, a sister, and a brother, came to Chicago from Whiting, Vt., bringing with him a stock of dry goods and groceries. He rented the building at No. 143 Lake Street, and began business, carrying a general stock, and continued for three years. At the end of that time he disposed of his merchandise and in company with his brother, purchased the livery stable of J. Y. Sanger, near the old Matteson House, the firm name being S. B. & M. O. Walker. It was soon long after, a line of vehicles was placed on North Clark Street, then on Lake Street as far west as Peoria, followed by the Blue Island Avenue line, running by the way of Canal and Harrison streets, and the Canal Street line as far south as Eighteenth Street. In 1857, the livery business was abandoned, and the same year an omnibus barn was built on the corner of Desplaines and Pierce streets. The line of omnibuses was successfully continued up to 1864, when the entire stock of horses was sold to the West Division Railway Company, and also a number of conveyances, the balance of the vehicles being disposed of to hotels throughout the surrounding country. After selling the omnibus line, Mr. Walker engaged in the cigar and tobacco business on Randolph Street, between State and Dearborn, the firm name being Walker, Hart & Rice. In this enterprise Mr. Walker was not as successful as he had anticipated, and after three years of existence the partnership was dissolved. He next became associated with E. N. Blake, and together they bought the Dake Bakery, November 14, 1869, purchasing the property from the administrator of the Dake estate, the firm being Blake, Walker & Co. The business was carried on in the rear of McVicker's theatre until the great fire destroyed the plant. After the fire, the firm resumed business on Clinton Street, continuing until January 21, 1879, when a sale was effected to Blake, Shaw & Co., since which time Mr. Walker has retired from active participation in commercial business. Mr. Walker was born in Whiting, Addison Co., Vt., February 21, 1807, the son of Samuel B. and Patty (Bent) Walker. His father was a miller, a lumber-merchant and a farmer, and during a part of his life had also kept a general store in the state of Vermont. He followed his family to Chicago in 1842, and died in this city on October 16th of that year, at the age of fifty-seven years. His mother, who came with him to this city in 1841, died August 7, 1857, at the age of seventy-two years. Until he had attained his seventh year, Mr. Walker received very little schooling, and at that time moved with his family to Hubbardton, Rutland County, ten miles distant, where he became a pupil at the schools of that town, until he arrived at the age of nineteen. He then apprenticed himself to learn the trade of a wool carder and dyer, serving a term of three years. At the end of that time he opened a business for himself, working at his trade during the summer and farming during the winter. In 1838, he closed out his business to a brother, and returning to Whiting, opened a store, carrying a stock of general merchandise. This he continued until 1841, when he brought his stock to Chicago, and in November of that year, established himself in business in this city. Mr. Walker was married March 5, 1828, to Miss Jennette Hamlin, of Rupert, Vt., who died February 3, 1885, at the advanced age of seventy-five years. There are three daughters, Chastina B. Walker, Mrs. John Duppe and Mrs. Henry T. Whitmore. Mr. Walker is an honored member of Excelsior Lodge, No. 22, I. O. O. F., and for many years has held a high position in the Chicago Encampment, No. 12, of that order, surrendering his membership in January, 1885, on account of his inability to attend to the duties of his office. He has always lived an upright life, and belongs among those whose sterling virtues have helped to make Chicago what it is.

FRANKLIN PARMELEE, the head of the great transfer system which bears his name, was born in Byron, N. Y., August 11, 1816, being the son of Edward and Mercy (Hopkins) Parmelee. His father, one of the pioneer farmers of Genesee Valley, had removed to this place from the State of Vermont. Young Parmelee's education was scant, so to speak, as before he was twelve years of age he was obliged to leave his school days behind him, and going to Avon Springs, engaged himself as a driver. After being employed for a time in a public house, he entered a stage office in Batavia, where he remained five years. He next settled in Erie, Penn., where he served for the same length of time under General Reed, the famous stage proprietor of that region, and owner of various steamers. Mr. Parmelee's first visit to Chicago was due to his intimacy with General Reed. Through him he obtained a position as clerk on the steamer "James Madison," which, in 1837, was running between Buffalo and Chicago. He thus continued as clerk on various steamers until 1850, when he settled in Will County, to engage in mercantile pursuits. After three years of this life, he decided to come to Chicago and conduct his operations in a larger field. In the spring of 1853, he arrived in this city and started the Chicago Omnibus Line, the first one in this city. His outfit consisted of six omnibuses and wagons. In addition to furnishing facilities for depot travel, in 1854, Mr. Parmelee established a line of omnibuses on Madison Street, which ran as far west as "Bull's Head," or the present Union Park. A four-horse omnibus was put on in 1855, and extended to Cottage Grove, by way of State Street, to Twelfth then the outskirts of this city. This line he maintained until 1858, when the right-of-way was granted to the Chicago City Railway Company, to lay tracks on State Street and Cottage Grove Avenue, on Archer Avenue, and on Madison Street to the city limits. The permission to construct the tracks was granted to Henry Fuller, Franklin Parmelee and Liberty Bigelow. In 1856-57, Mr. Parmelee placed another line on Clark Street, N. O. & S. B. Walker put on an opposition line, and Mr. Parmelee withdrew from the field. Since 1863, when the horse-railway charter, covering the west side lines, was sold, he has devoted himself exclusively to the transportation and transfer business. His splendid slate-roofed building, corner of State and Randolph streets, in which this was transacted, was destroyed by the great fire. At that time Liberty Bigelow was his partner. In eleven weeks from the destruction of his property by the fire, the commodious brick structure, one hundred by one hundred and fifty-three feet, now occupied by him, was erected. In 1881, an addition of eighty-eight by one hundred and fifty-three feet was made to the original building. Mr. Parmelee now occupies nearly one-half a square block, between Franklin Street and Fifth Avenue. He has contracts for the transfer business with all the railroads centering in Chicago, and something of the immensity of his transactions may be inferred from the fact that he has in his employ seventy-five omnibuses and seventy-five wagons, two hundred and fifty horses and one hundred and thirty men. Mr. Parmelee was married in September, 1840, to Miss Adeline Whitney, of Hindsburg, Orleans Co., N. Y., who died in January, 1864, leaving one daughter and three sons. In October, 1868, he married Miss Roxana W. Smith, of Kenosha, Wis. Mr. Parmelee's sons are with their father in business, although they are not interested with him as partners.

CITY RAILWAYS.

THE CHICAGO CITY RAILWAY COMPANY.—The first ordinance regarding horse-railways was passed March 4, 1856, and granted to Roswell B. Mason and Charles B. Phillips, the privilege of laying a track or tracks from the corner of State and Randolph streets, along the former, to the southern city limits, and from the corner of Dearborn Street and Kinzie, and the corner of Kinzie and Franklin streets, to the northern city limits, with various connecting sections; the principal one being the line extending from the corner of State Street and Archer Avenue, along the latter thoroughfare, to the southern city limits. Colonel Mason was at this time actively engaged in the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad, and therefore left the prosecution of the horse-railway enterprise principally to Mr. Phillips. A short section of track was laid on the North Side, as a legal compliance with the ordinance, but the panic of 1857, and the preceding and succeeding instability of business, made of this first "enterprise" a very dead one indeed. Colonel Mason sold out his interest, for a nominal sum, to his associate, Mr. Phillips, who afterward unavailingly sought to establish the validity of a title by legal proceedings.

Matters lay dormant until August 16, 1858, when the Common Council passed an ordinance, granting permission to Henry Fuller, Franklin Parmelee and Liberty Bigelow to lay tracks on State Street and Cottage Grove Avenue, on Archer Avenue and on Madison Street, to the city limits. It was required that the construction of one of these lines should be commenced on or before November 1, 1858; that the State-street line should be completed to Ringgold Place (Twenty-second street), by October 15, 1859; the Madison-street line by October 15, 1860; and the Cottage Grove-avenue line by January 1, 1861. Ground was broken for the State-street line November 1, 1858, in front of Garrett Block, near Randolph Street. As a portion of the appropriate ceremonies which there took place, Henry Fuller wielded the spade and ex-Governor Bross drove the first spike. A section of track was first laid between Randolph and Madison streets, and two cars that had been brought from Troy, N. Y., were placed on this brief initial line and run back and forth, greatly to the amusement of the people. There were not lacking, however, property owners on State Street, who did not join in this good-natured greeting, but were preparing to fight the enterprise. Its projectors obtained from the Legislature a confirmation of their rights by an act, approved February 14, 1859, which incorporated Franklin Parmelee, Liberty Bigelow, Henry Fuller and David A. Gage, in the order named, as the "Chicago City Railway Company," for a term of twenty-five years, to operate street lines "within the present or future limits of the South and West divisions." Section 8 of this act recited, that "Nothing herein contained shall authorize the construction of more than a single track with the necessary turnouts, which shall only be at street crossings upon State Street between Madison and Twelfth streets, by the consent of the owners of two-thirds of the property, in lineal measurement, lying upon said State Street between Madison and Twelfth." State Street to Twelfth—beyond which the city limits had but recently been moved southward—was then a busy thoroughfare, in transformation from residence to business property; and the feeling of opposition to the railway, among many property owners, was such that their consent had to be bought on private terms. Harmony being restored, the line was opened to Twelfth Street on April 25, 1859. State Street was then paved with cobblestones to Twelfth, and beyond was a plank road to the Cottage Grove suburb, since better known as Camp Douglas, and the scene of stirring war incidents. The entire line, from Randolph Street south, as first laid, was a single track, with turnouts at street crossings, somewhat similar to the present Indiana-avenue line.

Of the projectors of this second, and now successful, street railway enterprise, Messrs. Parmelee, Bigelow and Gage constituted the firm of F. Parmelee & Co., owning street omnibuses and depot transfer wagons, and Mr. Fuller was a large owner of real estate. Street travel in Chicago was then a thing of vexation to man and of weariness to beast. Even a paved street (with cobblestones) like State Street had little to boast of, and the most aristocratic plank road was too often a delusion and a snare. Street railways were thus already a public necessity, and were certain to become more and more so. It is a reminder of those days, however, and has been true of many an enterprise of greater moment, that stock subscriptions to the Chicago City Railway Company did not open with a rush, in 1859; and as human nature ever repeats itself, so it must be written that rights to stock subscription were afterward claimed by some who had at first refused to come in.

On the 25th of April, 1859, as stated, cars were running along State to Twelfth Street and in June to the city limits. By May 1, a single track had been completed from Madison to Twenty-second Street, on State, and two horse cars were run every twelve minutes. In the summer, the track was extended, on Twenty-second Street and Cottage Grove Avenue, to Thirty-first Street, and, by fall, cars were running every six minutes as far as Twenty-second Street. A state fair was to be held at Cottage Grove in the autumn of 1859, and in order to be ready for it the company spiked down the rails on the planking as it lay.

An ordinance of the City Council, passed May 23, 1859, specified additional streets on which lines might be laid in the West and South divisions,—on Lake, Randolph and Van Buren streets, in the South and West, and on Milwaukee and Blue Island avenues in the West. This ordinance prescribed the time when each of these lines should be commenced and opened; but as Clark Street was then occupied by the Michigan Southern Railroad, below Harrison Street, and property owners were themselves fighting for a thoroughfare, it was agreed that the street railway company should defer action, as to Clark Street, for ten years; and in pursuance of that purpose an ordinance of the Council, February 13, 1860, extended the rights of the company in that thoroughfare to cover the proposed period of delay. The Madison-street line, built under the original charter, was opened to Halsted Street on May 20, 1859, and reached Robey Street August 8 of the same year. The Randolph-street line began to come into use on July 15, 1859. Meanwhile the State-street line was not neglected.

In 1861, the financial medium was first vitiated. The daily varying quotations of "stump-tail" made its possessors often glad to be rid of it on any terms. The city railway company was of necessity made the recipient of much of this poor paper. Up to this time the company had not issued "punch tickets" for fares, and so long as silver change held out, it had not thought of doing so. When, however, silver disappeared, and recourse was had to postage stamps as the readiest expedient, the Chicago City Railroad Company may be said to have come to the rescue of the people. Their earliest issue of tickets, hastily flung from a job press and as hastily stamped, were hailed as a public boon. An uncanceled ten-ride ticket was good in the city or vicinity, and unquestioned for its face value of fifty cents. It would pass in almost any transaction; indeed, anywhere in preference to a greasy little envelope of postage stamps that were certain to be damaged if they were not short in the count. It is even related that church contributions brought in no small store of them. Though redeemable only in rides, so much were they in demand as a circulating medium that they were counterfeited, and it is a tradition that known counterfeits have been unhesitatingly accepted in trade. This issue of what may be called "the emergency tickets of 1861," amounted to about $150,000, and because of counterfeits they were, as soon as possible, called in for redemption in other tickets of more elaborate preparation. The second issue was readily divisible into denominations of twenty-five, fifteen and ten cents, to the greater convenience of the people; and until the postal currency of the United States came into circulation, in the summer of 1862, the issues of the Chicago City Railway were the most acceptable small change Chicago had or could furnish. Long after their use as currency had ceased, Mr. Fuller, the treasurer, continued to receive these tickets, by letter, from distant points. Many have doubtless been retained as souvenirs of an eventful time.

In 1863, a comprehensive scheme was carried through the Legislature, under the title of the "Wabash Railway Company," which gave to the incorporators—Thomas Harless, Horace A. Hurlbut, and Charles Hitchcock, and to their associates, etc.—the right to occupy Wabash and Michigan avenues, and other principal streets in all directions from the center, and to extend their lines into indefinite suburbs. The act passed the Senate on January 22. Being reported by a senator from southern Illinois, and read only by its title, it went through under a misapprehension. The Legislature took a recess from February 14 to June 2, and upon its re-assembling the fact for the first time dawned upon Chicago that a vast franchise was hidden under a misleading title. The bill passed the House on June 8, and not until then were its provisions publicly known. It was at a time of intense excitement, in a critical period of the war, and the Legislature was not in harmony with the administration on war measures. On Wednesday, June 10, Governor Yates prorogued the two houses, and the incident was perhaps the most exciting ever known in the legislative history of the State. The Tribune of June 11 said:

"We were to have seen a peace commission instituted, peace measures set on foot, and a deep and deadly stab inflicted upon the loyal history of our State. * * * But huge above all, the roc's egg of this whole affair, looms up the Wabash Horse Railroad swindle."

A public meeting in Metropolitan Hall, on the evening of June 11, indorsed the Governor's action and denounced the Wabash bill. The Common Council, by resolution, requested the Governor to veto it. The veto, dated June 19, says:

"The fact that over three months intervened between its passage in the Senate and in the House, and that during this long interval, the citizens of Chicago were not even apprised of its existence, is evidence that those having control of it were unwilling to have it submitted to the test of public scrutiny."

The Chicago City Railway Company continued to extend its line in the South Division. During the month of October, 1864, a branch track was laid upon the Archer road from State Street to Stewart Avenue, and completed to Bridgeport, during the ensuing year. At the end of 1869, the company was operating seven-tenths and one-quarter miles of track.

In the early part of 1871, the running time table was as follows: "Cars leave corner State and Randolph, via State, to Twenty-second, every minute, and to Cottage Grove Avenue and Douglas Place every four minutes; leave southern limits every four minutes for Twenty-second, Twenty-second every minute, and Archer road every eight minutes for corner of State and Randolph streets."

THE NORTH CHICAGO RAILWAY COMPANY.—The same act of the Legislature of February 14, 1859, which incorporated the Chicago City Railway Company, conferred like immunities and privileges upon William B. Ogden, John B. Turner, Charles V. Dyer, James H. Rees and Voluntine C. Turner, by the name of the North Chicago Railway Company, for the North Division of the city of Chicago.

On the 23d of May, 1859, the Common Council, by ordinance, authorized the company to construct a horse railway in the North Division, on the following streets:

1. On Clark Street, from North Water Street to Green Bay road, and then to present and future city limits.

2. From Clark Street west, on Division, to Clybourn Avenue, and thence on Clybourn Avenue to city limits.

3. From Clark Street east, on Michigan, to Rush, thence north on Rush to Chicago Avenue.

4. Commencing on Wells Street at North Water, thence north to Division Street, west to Sedgwick and north on Sedgwick to Green Bay road.

5. West on Chicago Avenue, from Rush Street to the North Branch of the Chicago River.

At this time Clark Street was planked, and the first railway was laid, by spiking the rails to the planks, an additional thickness of plank being placed in the horse-path. The track was laid double to Division Street; beyond that, a single track to Fullerton Avenue. Eaton, Gilbert & Co., of Troy, N. Y., furnished the first car.

The Clark-street line to city limits, the Clybourn Avenue and the Chicago-avenue lines were completed in 1859; the Sedgwick-street line in 1861, and a line to Graceland, with a steam dummy, in 1864. The Michigan and Rush-street lines were never built, and the rights thereon were forfeited.

In 1864, the company was authorized to connect their tracks with those of the Chicago City Railway, thereby making continuous lines of horse railway between the different divisions of the city.

The same year, also, permission was granted to lay a single, or double, track on Larrabee Street, from Chicago Avenue to Little Fort road, and on Little Fort road to present or future city limits. This branch was completed the same year. The lines were gradually extended on the streets, and in the directions specified, until, in 1871, the company was operating about twelve miles of road.

By the great fire, the company lost $350,000, their stables, rolling stock and tracks being entirely consumed. Their vigorous and energetic recovery from the great disaster, and the complete re-habilitation of their system will be recounted in the third volume of this history.

VOLUNTINE C. TURNER, president of the North Division Horse Railway Company, was born in Malta, Saratoga Co., N. Y., February 25, 1823. Previous to preparing for college, he received a good primary education, and also was employed by his father, while engaged upon the construction of the Erie Railroad and the Genesee Valley Canal. Young Turner prepared for college at the Troy and Oxford academies, New York, graduating at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., in the year 1846. In the fall, he removed to Chicago, and soon afterward commenced the practice of law, which he continued for a period of twelve years. From 1848 to 1858, he was in partnership with H. A. Clarke, and from that year until 1860, with the exception of a short time, during which he was in partnership with B. F. Ayer, Mr. Turner engaged alone in the general practice of his profession. In February, 1859, he first became connected with the North Side Railway Company, as its secretary and treasurer, continuing thus to act until July, 1865. From that date until January, 1867, he was vice-president of the company, and has been president from that time up to date. During all this period, he has been general manager of the road—in fact, being its active and untiring superintendent, and confining himself to the upbuilding of its interests. He has never held a public office, and never aspired to one. Mr. Turner was married to Eliza Smith, daughter of Colonel Henry Smith, the old partner of William B. Ogden, on the 20th of May, 1851. For twenty-five years they were prominent members of the St. James (Episcopal) Church. At present, however, they are members of Professor Swing's congregation.

THE CHICAGO WEST DIVISION RAILWAY COMPANY.—On the 21st of February, 1861, the Legislature of Illinois enacted, that Edward P. Ward, William K. McAllister, Samuel B. Walker, James L. Wilson, Charles B. Brown, Nathaniel P. Wilder, and their successors, be created and constituted a body corporate and politic, by the name of "The Chicago West Division Railway Company," for the term of twenty-five years.

This company was authorized to acquire any of the powers, franchises, privileges, or immunities conferred upon the Chicago City Railway Company by the act of February 14, 1859, as may by contract between the said railway corporations be agreed upon. Nothing seems to have been done by this company, under their charter, until the summer of 1863. At that time, the gentlemen composing the company sold out their stock to J. Russell Jones, John C. Haines, Jerome Beecher, W. H. Bradley, Parnell Munson, and William H. Ovington, of Chicago, and E. B. Washburne, Nathan Corwith, and Benjamin Campbell, of Galena. The new company organized with J. Russell Jones as president and superintendent, and William H. Ovington as secretary and treasurer.

On the 30th of July, 1863, a sale was made to this company by the Chicago City Railway, of their road and franchises in the West Division, for the sum of $200,000, cash. The deed of transfer was dated the 1st of August, 1863, and had a border of United States revenue stamps amounting to $580.

The tracks laid at that time were on Randolph and Madison streets, extending to Union Park.

The new company entered vigorously upon the work of extending the lines. A track was laid upon Blue Island Avenue, and cars were running to Twelfth Street by December 22, 1863. In June, 1864, the Milwaukee line was opened, and in October, the Clinton and Jefferson-street lines. Year after year the lines were extended, until, in 1871, the company owned and operated over twenty miles of track. By the charters of February 14, 1859, and February 21, 1861, passed by the Legislature, incorporating the foregoing horse railway companies, the franchises and privileges were granted for a term of twenty-five years. On the 6th of February, 1865, the legislature passed, over the Governor's veto, an act amending the charters in respect to time, and granting terms of ninety-nine years instead of twenty-five.

J. RUSSELL JONES, president of the Chicago West Division Railway Company, is descended from an old and noted English family. Colonel John Jones, one of his ancestors, married the second sister of Oliver Cromwell, in 1623, and was put to death October 17, 1660, upon the restoration of Charles the II. The son, Honorable William Jones, came to this country with his father-in-law, Honorable Theophilus Eaton, first Governor of the colony of New Haven and Connecticut. Mr. Jones acted as deputy governor for years, and died October 17, 1706. Samuel, the grandfather of J. Russell Jones, was an officer under George II., and served with credit in the French and Indian and the Revolutionary wars. His parents were Joel and Maria (Dart) Jones, J. Russell being the youngest of four children. He was born at Conneaut, Ashtabula Co., Ohio, February 17, 1823. When he was thirteen years of age, his mother, who had been left a widow, removed to Rockton, Winnebago Co., Ill. The young boy was left at home to support himself, and when, in 1838, he announced his determination to join the family in the Far West, he had so established himself in the confidence and love of the community, that the members of the Conneaut Presbyterian Church offered to educate him for the ministry if he would remain with them. But even at this early age, to determine was to act, and he accordingly took passage for Illinois, in the schooner "J. G. King," and arrived at Chicago August 19, 1838. After some difficulty he reached his new home in Winnebago County, where he faithfully assisted his family for about two years. In June, 1840, with one dollar in his pocket, but with a hardy constitution and an iron will, he removed to Galena. First going into a retail store, he soon after went into the employ of Benjamin H. Campbell, a leading merchant of that flourishing town, and subsequently became a partner in the firm. Until 1856, the business transacted was on a scale commensurate with the importance of Galena as the leading commercial emporium of the Northwest. The partnership was then dissolved. Ten years previous to this date, Mr. Jones had been appointed secretary and treasurer of the Galena and Minnesota Packet Company, which position he retained until 1861. In 1860, he was elected to represent Jo Daviess and Carroll counties in the Twenty-second General Assembly, and the next year was appointed United States Marshal for the Northern District of Illinois, commencing his term of service in April. In the fall of that year he removed to Chicago, and, in 1863, organized and was elected president of the Chicago West Division Railway Company, retaining that position until June, 1869, when he was appointed minister to Belgium by President Grant. He was also re-appointed United States Marshal in 1865. Upon his return from abroad, in 1875, he was tendered the position of Secretary of the Interior, but declined and was appointed Collector of the Port of Chicago, and was again elected president of the Railway Company, which position he now holds. Mr. Jones was married, in 1848, to Elizabeth Ann, daughter of the late Judge Andrew Scott, of Arkansas. They have had three sons and three daughters.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

In the first volume of this history, record has been made of the so-called "unlawful funding of canal indebtedness," and Ex-Governor Matteson's connection with it. This concluded the chief events of the period up to the latter portion of 1857. By that year the complete success of the "canal scheme" was assured. As yet its channel was "shallow-cut"; but soon the original intention of a "deep-cut," which poverty only prevented from being carried out, was to be realized. An impetus to this inclination was given by the threatened digging of a ditch from the Calumet River, the principal feeder of the canal, to Lake Michigan, in order to drain a valuable tract of swamp land in Indiana. Its effect would have been to almost destroy the usefulness of the Calumet feeder, but in 1859, to guard against any such danger, in the future, two steam engines were added to the hydraulic works and other improvements made, so that the canal would not be obliged to depend so much upon that feeder for supplying the summit level. In later years, they were also made to serve the purpose of flushing the Chicago River. The sanitary safety of the city also forced the deepening of the canal; which work was finally accomplished in July, 1871. The great War Convention, held in Chicago, June 2, 1863, was the first decisive movement toward the accomplishment of this end. Five thousand delegates attended from the states of the North, it being the design to transform the canal into a national waterway, which might float the largest gun-boats on their passage from the great lakes to the Mississippi River. However, the various plans proposed fell through, and in February, 1865, a legislative act was passed, and approved by Governor Oglesby, authorizing the City of Chicago to enter into arrangements with the Canal Board of Trustees, with a view to the speedy accomplishment of the work on the deep-cut plan. An agreement entered into by the city and the board during this year was, in 1868, extended for an additional period of three years. The contract by which the summit was to be cut down so that twenty-four thousand feet of water a minute could be drawn from the lake at its lowest stage, was let September 26, 1865. The contractors having abandoned or forfeited their contracts, the work was re-let in July, 1867. The work proceeded, with the interruptions incident to such enterprises, until, in pursuance with law, on May 1, 1871, the Board of Trustees turned over the canal to the following Board of Commissioners: Joseph Utley, president; Virgil Hickox, treasurer; and Robert Milne, secretary. No change was made in the general officers of the canal, and the work of cutting down the summit, or deepening the canal, went on.

There were few changes, in fact, in its officers from 1857 to 1871, when the Board of Trustees had performed the duties imposed upon them and turned the canal, with all its improvements, over to the Canal Commissioners. In 1858, the trustees were as follows: William H. Smith, of Boston, president; David Leavitt, of New York, treasurer; Charles H. Ray, State trustee, Chicago. The secretary of the board was William Gooding, the general superintendent John B. Preston, the agent for the sale of canal lands E. S. Prescott, and the auditor of accounts Joel Manning. In May, 1859, Henry Grinnell was elected in place of David Leavitt, and in January, 1861, Martin H. Cassel, of Jacksonville, was appointed State trustee, to succeed Charles H. Ray. In October, 1864, John B. Preston, who had been general superintendent of the canal nearly ten years, resigned his position, and was succeeded by William A. Gooding, who, for four years, had been assistant superintendent in charge of the eastern division. Sheridan Wait was appointed State trustee in February, 1865. Joel Manning, who had been connected with the canal management almost continuously since 1836, died in January, 1869, holding, at the time of his death, the position of auditor of accounts. In December, 1868, William Gooding became general superintendent (temporarily) of the canal, and was appointed permanently to the position in January, 1869. During that year, also, Robert Rowett was appointed State trustee by the Governor.

To continue the narrative where it was left when the old Board of Trustees turned the canal over to the new Commissioners, nearly completed:—The superintendent of the canal was ordered, in pursuance of a notice given by the Chicago Board of Public Works that their work was completed and that they wished to remove the locks, to close the navigation of the canal for one month from the 15th of June, 1871. The canal was closed, however, on June 26, and kept closed until July 18, the labor of removing the locks being greater than was anticipated. On the morning of the 18th of July, the level was full, and the Chicago River, with all its filth, had taken the place of the heretofore clear water at Lockport, the people of Chicago rejoicing in the great relief furnished by the deep-cut, which caused the South Branch of the river to run "up stream." Within three or four days, the water from Lake Michigan filled the canal at Lockport and was thrown off there, over the rocks, almost as clear and blue as the waters at the Falls of Niagara. Navigation was at once resumed, but as the banks had not been trimmed and refuse was still lying along the edge of the canal, and even in its prism, the Commissioners finished the work according to contract, and the city paid for it. On the 16th of August the Canal Commissioners certified to the correctness of all accounts, and, on the 19th of that month, the release deed of the canal was transmitted to the Governor. In May, 1873, there was a change in the Board of Canal Commissioners. Mr. Utley was re-elected president, but H. G. Anderson was chosen treasurer, and W. N. Brainard, secretary. The board and the duties of its members remained unchanged until May, 1877, when it was reorganized by the election of J. O. Grover, president; Martin Kingman, treasurer; and B. F. Shaw, secretary. William Thomas was continued as general superintendent, Daniel C. Jenne as chief engineer, and William Milne as chief clerk.

The subject of cleansing the river continued to be agitated by Chicago sanitarians, and it was decided by the city to construct pumping works at the junction of the canal and the South Branch. The works were completed in August, 1883, at a total cost of about $270,000. They are located across the old channel of the canal, west of the South Branch.

The various improvements accomplished during late years at Copperas Creek in the Illinois River, and at various points along the line of the canal, have not been noticed, because, since the stupendous development of railroads, they have become of comparatively small local interest. The canal has also greatly declined in importance as a state highway of travel.

From 1837 up to 1866, the tolls of the canal gradually increased from $197,000 to $302,000; although there was a falling off during some of the years, noticeably in 1864, when they amounted to only $156,000. The year 1866 was the most prosperous in the history of the canal, but, with the close of the War, railroad traffic was again untrammelled and the railway system, especially in Illinois, commenced its marvelous growth. Consequently, the canal fell away from its former position of great prominence as a highway of travel and commerce. Speaking in general terms, its tolls had gradually declined in amount until, in 1882-83, they amounted to only $86,000.

At the last meeting of the Commissioners, held October 9, and October 10, 1884, it was stated that the receipts would be $8,000 more than during the previous year, notwithstanding tolls had been reduced fifty per cent. During the year, eleven of the ninety miles had been supplied with rip-rap work as a protection against the wash created by steam craft. By the canal has been carried most of the lumber transported from Chicago to Peoria and river points. During the year 1883-84, the Commissioners constructed fourteen hundred feet of dockage from Ashland Avenue to the river, and also a new dock of four hundred feet around Armour's elevator, Chicago. The Commissioners have also voted to build a dock of six hundred feet at Peoria.

The present management of the canal, who took charge in April, 1883, is as follows: Charles Bent, president of the Board of Commissioners, Morrison; George F. Brown, secretary, Morris; D. J. Calligan, treasurer, Peoria; William Thomas, general superintendent, and William Milne, chief clerk, Lockport.

TELEGRAPH AND EXPRESS.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.—In 1858, there were but two telegraph companies doing business in the city of Chicago,—The Illinois and Mississippi and The Western Union. The history of The Western Union, since that year until 1871, would include almost all that could be written of the other companies, for each in turn has been organized only to be absorbed by that corporation.

A few years before the first mentioned date, the wires of The Western Union had been brought into the city with great display of enthusiasm, a brass band playing gaily as the laborers reeled off the connecting wire. No city ordinance was then required before work could be begun within the city limits, permission of the Board of Public Works alone being necessary. No trouble was experienced, however, as the new organization, by an arrangement with the Illinois and Mississippi Company, brought its wires into the city upon the latter's poles. The two companies were in no sense rivals, since their lines covered different territory, and they maintained friendly relations under what was known as the "Seven Company Contract," whereby the principal telegraph companies then existing in the United States pooled their earnings according to an equitable plan, and thus secured continuous and connecting lines. In 1858, the offices of both companies were at No. 11 LaSalle Street, and, though they were operated as one, a separate organization was maintained by each—E. D. L. Sweet being superintendent, and George D. Sheldon, manager, of the Illinois and Mississippi Company; and Emory Cobb, superintendent, and R. C. Rankin, manager, of The Western Union.

In 1860, their offices were removed to Lake Street, at the southeast corner of Clark. In 1861, F. H. Tubbs became manager of the Illinois and Mississippi Company. In 1864, the United States Company, after a severe struggle with The Western Union, succeeded in establishing itself here, having offices at No. 66 Clark Street; E. P. Porter being manager.

In 1866, William H. Hall took Mr. Tubbs's place in the Illinois and Mississippi Company, to be succeeded the next year by J. E. Ranny. There were also changes in the Western Union, Mr. Cobb retiring, and being succeeded as superintendent by Mr. Rankin, whose place as manager was filled by Fred. Swain.

In April, 1866, the United States Company was absorbed by the Western Union, and in the following July, the Illinois and Mississippi was merged into the same corporation, under a perpetual lease, and all the offices of those companies were moved to Nos. 32–33 Chamber of Commerce. In 1869, they were again moved to the northwest corner of Washington and LaSalle streets. In that year, a new rival appeared, in the shape of the Great Western Company, and a little later a local company, known as the Metropolitan, began doing business at No. 126 Washington Street.

In 1870, the following named companies were doing business here: Western Union, corner LaSalle and Washington streets; William Orton, president; O. H. Palmer, secretary; Anson Stager, general superintendent; J. J. S. Wilson, district superintendent; and R.

C. Rankin, Chicago manager. Metropolitan, Room 19, Merchants' Insurance Building; Murry Nelson, president; S. G. Lynch, secretary; and L. B. Firman, superintendent. Great Western, No. 84 LaSalle Street; David A. Gage, president; J. Snow, secretary; A. H. Bliss, general superintendent. Atlantic and Pacific, a powerful rival of the Western Union, and which the latter had succeeded in keeping out of the city for some months, No. 128 Washington Street and corner of Wabash Avenue and South Water Street; M. L. Ward, general superintendent; C. A. Harper, secretary; B. F. Cogger, manager.

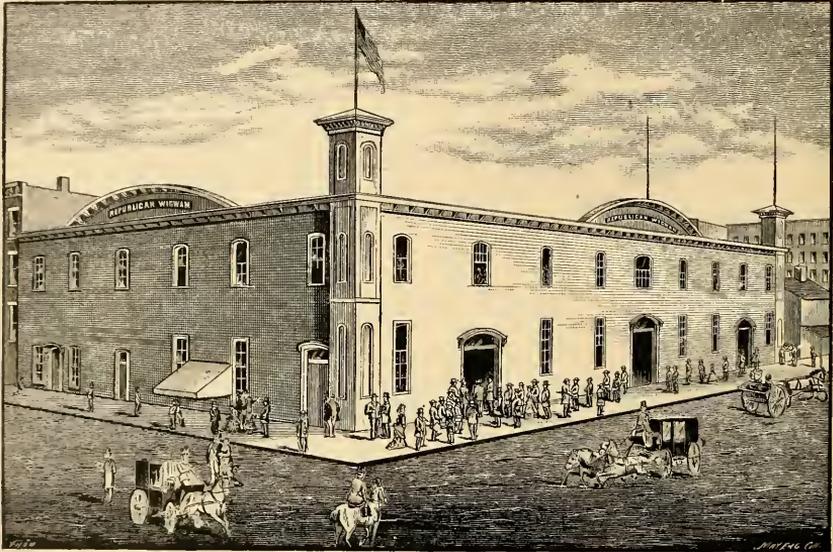

In 1871, first appeared the Pacific and Atlantic Company, with offices at No. 91 Clark Street; R. R. Myers, manager. During that year, the Western Union secured control of all the companies except the Atlantic and Pacific, the Great Western, and the Pacific and Atlantic. For a long time a determined effort had been made by the city to compel the various companies to make concessions to it, for allowing the lines to be operated within the city limits, but the companies successfully resisted all such attempts; and it was not until the completion of the first tunnel under the river, when the companies found that they could lay their wires in it to much greater advantage than to maintain cables, that they yielded, and agreed to do a certain amount of business for the city free of expense. The amount fixed upon as the Western Union Company's share was $600 per annum. During the war period, great difficulty was experienced in securing enough operators to handle the increased business, and the pay of a first class operator sprang from $55 to $85 per month. In 1858, six operators handled all the business of the two companies (Illinois and Mississippi, and Western Union); in 1871, the latter company alone employed between seventy-five and one hundred operators, besides a proportionate increase in the number of clerks, messengers and other employés. In 1863, the Western Union handled one hundred and sixty-six thousand nine hundred and eighty-three messages, at a cost of ninety-one cents per message, and in 1871, five hundred and fifty-two thousand eight hundred and forty-eight messages, costing an average of forty-eight cents each. Chicago has long been the second city in the United States in point of telegraphic importance, New York alone surpassing her in volume of business.

And here have lived many who have occupied most prominent positions, either as officers, superintendents or managers in the various organizations, and to whose energy and ability is due the rapid progress made in telegraphy throughout the country. Perhaps more than to any other man in this connection, honor is due to Judge J. D. Caton; for, by his industry, courage and perseverance, the Illinois and Mississippi Company was made a profitable investment.

Well advanced in years before he became interested in telegraph matters, he mastered the intricacies of the subject and was able to make himself one of the foremost presidents of his time, only retiring after he had succeeded in transferring his company, advantageously, to the Western Union. As assistants in this great work, he had such men as Colonel J. J. S. Wilson,* E. D. L. Sweet, Colonel R. C. Clowry, and F. H. Tubbs. To Hiram Sibley belongs the credit of having first conceived, and, almost single-handed, by indomitable strength of will and untiring energy, brought to completion the trans-continental line. And the list would indeed be incomplete if the name of General Anson Stager were omitted, since it is to the force of his logic and his practical knowledge of the subject, that the railroad companies owe their present intimate con-headquarters at Washington. Until November, 1861, he remained in charge of the latter, when he was commissioned Captain and Assistant Quartermaster, and appointed chief of the military telegraphs throughout the United States. He was subsequently commissioned Colonel and Aide-de-Camp, assigned to duty in the War Department, and also placed in charge of the cypher correspondence of the Secretary of War, the peculiar cryptography of which was his own invention. Colonel Stager remained in the service until September, 1865, and was breveted Brigadier-General for valuable and meritorious services. Soon after the war closed the Northwestern and American Telegraph consolidated with the Western Union, and the general superintendency was offered to him, but nection with all telegraph systems, and were shown the importance of being able to direct the movements of their trains by telegraph.

ANSON STAGER, deceased, for nearly a quarter of a century general superintendent of the central division of the Western Union Telegraph Company, was a native of the Empire State, having been born in Ontario County, April 20, 1825. His father, Henry W. Stager, was a manufacturer of edge tools, at Rochester, N. V., and died in 1843, while his mother, Almira (Anson) Stager, lived until 1874, being, at the time of her death, in her eighty-third year. As a boy, Anson learned the printing business with Henry O'Reilly, afterward among the first builders and operators of telegraph lines in America. In 1846, Mr. Stager commenced his career as a telegraph operator in Philadelphia, and subsequently worked in Pittsburgh as the pioneer of his trade or profession. From 1848 to 1852, he held the position of chief operator of the "national lines," at Cincinnati, and during the latter year became superintendent of the lines of the Mississippi Valley Printing Telegraph Company, his supervision soon extending over the state of New York. Mr. Stager was prominent in organizing the various lines consolidated with the Western Union Telegraph Company, and when that company was founded was called to assume the general superintendency. The system of railroad telegraphs is also the work of his brains and hands. When Sumter was fired on, the telegraph lines of Ohio, Illinois and Indiana were placed in his hands by the governors of these states, and he continued to hold those vast interests during the entire period of the war. He also organized the first system of field telegraphs for General McClellan, and the military telegraph, with he declined the flattering offer, preferring to live in the west; whereupon the system was divided into the central, eastern and south grand divisions, and General Stager assumed charge of the first named, with headquarters at Cleveland. In 1869, the transfer of the center of business westward made it necessary to change the headquarters to Chicago, and he therefore became one of our citizens. What he has done in the development of Chicago and the Northwest, is best told in the part which has been taken by the Western Union in such a grand progress. In fact, there were few men in the country who possessed a more far-seeing, executive ability than General Anson Stager. In addition to his connection with this wonderful corporation, he was president of the Western Electric Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, the largest manufactory of the kind in the United States. He was also president of the American Electrical Society and vice-president of the Babcock Manufacturing Company. General Stager was married, November 14, 1847, to Miss Rebecca Sprague, daughter of the late William Sprague, of Buffalo. His wife died November 22, 1883, and his death occurred on March 26, 1885. He left three daughters, one the wife of Frank S. Gorten, president of the Chicago Forging Company; the second married to Ralph W. Hickox; and the third, Miss Ellen Sprague Stager. General Stager's funeral took place at his residence, corner of Michigan Avenue and Eighteenth Street, his remains being borne to Lake View Cemetery, Cleveland. The newspapers describe in full the impressive ceremonies attendant upon his obsequies, which were participated in by a vast concourse of Chicago's eminent citizens, who assembled to show their sorrow for their peer.

EXPRESS COMPANIES.—The first express west of Buffalo was commenced in April, 1845, by Messrs.

* Colonel Wilson was the gentleman who sent the historic telegram from the Wigwam to Abraham Lincoln, announcing his nomination to the presidency.

Wells, Fargo & Dunning, under the firm name of Wells & Co. The next year, they began to run their four-horse express wagons once a week, from Detroit to Chicago and Milwaukee. The trip by rail and by express wagons between Buffalo and Chicago occupied just one week, the charges being $3 for one hundred pounds, on all ordinary packages of over fifty and under two hundred pounds. As the freight was $3 between Buffalo and New York, the total charge between the eastern and western points was $6. The same rate was charged to Milwaukee as to Chicago. At that time, the agents here were A. H. & C. Burley, who relinquished a few shelves in their book-store to the business of the company. In 1847, the company passed into the hands of William G. Fargo and William A. Livingston, who continued it under the firm name of Livingston & Fargo until March 18, 1850, when it was consolidated with the interests of Wells & Co. and Butterfield, Wasson & Co. The three concerns, when united, were called the American Express Company.

H. D. Colvin

In May, 1851, Harvey D. Colvin was appointed agent of the company, and continued to hold the position until the organization of the United Express Company, just three years thereafter.

The company had now so outstripped the mails that the newspapers of Chicago often had occasion to thank them for receiving papers from St. Louis and the west in advance of Uncle Sam's conveyances. In 1855, it began to run four messengers daily from Louisville to Chicago; also using the passenger trains from Michigan City to Chicago and those on the New Albany & Lake Michigan Railroad. The company was incorporated by the Illinois Legislature in 1859, with a capital of $1,000,000, with power to increase it to $2,000,000. In the year 1860, a reorganization was effected under this act as follows: Manager of the Western Division, W. G. Fargo, Buffalo; Assistant Manager, James C. Fargo, Chicago; Agent, D. B. Cooke, Chicago; Superintendent of Illinois Division, Edwin Hayden, Chicago.

Mr. Fargo continued agent until 1866, when he became general superintendent and O. W. Barrett, the present incumbent, agent. By 1863, however, the business of the company had so increased that its office was removed from No. 20 Dearborn Street to the corner of Lake and Dearborn streets. In 1864, as remarked by an authority on the subject, "the number of hands had increased to one hundred and forty, as is proven by the number of turkeys called for last Christmas."

ADAMS EXPRESS.—Adams & Co.'s California Express, established in 1849, was succeeded in 1855 by that of Freeman & Co. In 1854, Adams & Co., the Harnden Express (then owned by Thompson & Livingston), Kinsley & Co. and Hocy & Co., were consolidated in a joint stock company, afterwards famous as the Adams Express Company. The office of the company in Chicago was at the corner of Lake and Dearborn streets, and John L. Hopkins was the agent during the period covered by this volume.

MERCHANTS' DESPATCH.—This was a fast freight line, originally established, in 1850, as Kasson's Express, and afterward owned and operated by the American Express Company. The agents for the American Express Company were agents for this line; hence their routes were the same as those of the American, and they forwarded freight at regular railroad rates. On December 1, 1863, the company occupied the building at the foot of South Water Street.

UNITED STATES EXPRESS COMPANY.—This company was organized in New York, and a branch office opened in Chicago at the same time—May 1, 1854. The local office was at Nos. 12-14 Dearborn Street, being in charge of Harvey D. Colvin, who still holds the position. At first the line was from the Mississippi River to New York City, by way of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and the Michigan Southern railroads. The business at this point increased so rapidly that, in 1862, the company removed to more commodious quarters on the northwest corner of Clark and Lake streets. Thirty-six drivers, messengers and clerks were then employed in the transaction of its business. Its routes were then, also, covering a great portion of the western country from Chicago to Fort Kearney, making a continuous route from New York of over two thousand miles, and the amount of freight handled at this office had increased from ten to forty tons, daily, in 1864. Its officers, who remained the same up to and including the year 1871, were: D. N. Barney and A. H. Barney, president and vice-president, New York City; Henry Kip, general superintendent, Buffalo. Its capital was $1,000,000, and its business had increased at a rate commensurate with the growth of the Great West, whose patronage it had been striving for with such marked success.

UNION DESPATCH COMPANY.—This company was incorporated March 20, 1859, under the laws of Illinois, their charter extending for one hundred years; authorized capital, $1,000,000, of which $80,000 were subscribed by four hundred stockholders. At first, the home office was at No. 60 South Dearborn. After remaining there five years, the company removed to Nos. 54-58 Randolph Street, under the management of Charles B. Bingham, president, R. N. Booth, secretary, and about three hundred local agents in the principal towns and cities of the United States, from Bangor, Me., to St. Louis, Mo. The company was in the habit of transporting to market, selling and collecting for producers, shippers and manufacturers, charging regular railroad rates for transportation.

GREAT CENTRAL DEPOT IN 1868.

RAILROAD HISTORY.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.—In the first volume of this history have been detailed the successful efforts of the people of Illinois, assisted by Eastern capitalists, to build a great central railroad through the then developed portions of the state. In 1852, when the company received permission to lay their tracks along the lake-front, and which were originally placed on piles, almost the entire area, now devoted to the park, the railroad tracks, the Exposition building and Illinois Central and Michigan Central depots, was submerged. The land was gradually reclaimed, at great expense, and in 1869 that portion between Park Row and a continuation of Monroe Street was conveyed to the city, and the submerged land, east of the four hundred feet limit, to the Illinois Central Company. The title of the state to the lake-front, between Monroe and Randolph streets and Michigan Avenue and the Illinois Central track, was granted to this company, also to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and the Michigan Central companies, by an act, passed in 1869, for depot accommodations, in consideration of the payment of $800,000 to the city of Chicago. In 1873, the act of 1869 was repealed, although it is claimed that the repeal did not affect the grant just mentioned.

Returning to 1857, it is found that by the completion of the section between Mattoon and H. L. Junction in September, 1856, there were seven hundred and four miles of road in operation, and, up to January 1, over $25,940,000 had been expended upon the road. The earnings for the year show an increase of about sixty per cent. over those of the previous year. On the 1st of January, 1857, the Chicago branch was opened between Mattoon and Centralia. By March of that year, forty miles of the Dubuque & Pacific Railroad had been completed, and thirty-nine miles of the Mineral Point road, which joined the Illinois Central at Warren, were in operation. The western connection with the Peoria & Oquawka road had been made. The utmost exertions of the Illinois Central Company were next directed toward the development of the mineral resources of southern Wisconsin and the coal trade of southern and eastern Illinois and the adjacent country. In May, 1857, connections were established at Pana, Christian County, with the Terre Haute, Alton & St. Louis road, and an exchange of business was arranged with the Ohio & Mississippi road at Sandoval, Marion County. At that time the officers of the company were as follows: W. H. Osborn, president; E. Lane, resident director; J. N. Perkins, treasurer; W. K. Ackerman, secretary; George B. McClellan, engineer-in-chief; J. C.

ion; Silas Bent, superintendent of Chicago division; George Ackerman, assistant treasurer; Joseph Kirkman, auditor. The officers of the land department were: John Wilson, commissioner; P. Daggy, secretary; George M. Reed, cashier; J. B. Austin, registrar; John M. Douglas and David Stuart, solicitors.

Previous to 1857, the main line north of Centralia was without a direct connection with Chicago. In March of that year, arrangements were made with the Peoria & Oquawka Railroad Company to enable them to complete their road between the main line and the branch. This was done, the road crossing the main line one hundred and fifty-four miles north of Centralia and one hundred and eighty-nine miles south of Dunleith, and intersecting the branch eighty-one miles south of Chicago and one hundred and seventy-one miles north of Centralia. The year 1857 is marked by the completion of the extensive basin opening into the Illinois River at LaSalle, and the branch track from the Illinois Central to that point, which was the head of navigation of the Illinois & Michigan Canal. The new levee at Cairo, washed away in December, 1857, was finished during the spring of 1858. In April, an important change in the working of the company was made, by which all construction and repairs, except of rolling equipment, were placed in a separate department, under the chief engineer. The road was divided into four divisions, each in charge of a resident division engineer, who also acted as road-master. The first line extended from Cairo to Wapella, two hundred and thirty miles; the second, from Wapella to Dunleith, two hundred and twenty-five miles; the third, from the junction to the main line with the Chicago branch to Kankakee, one hundred and ninety-four miles; the fourth, from Kankakee to Chicago, fifty-six miles. The divisions were separated into sub-divisions, varying from forty to fifty miles, and the sub-divisions into sections of from three to six miles each. At that time, about one-half of the original grant of land (2,595,000 acres) remained unsold. The financial crisis of 1857, followed by the successive failures of two crops, told severely upon the prosperity of the road, which looked to the farmers for support. During 1857, in fact, the company was obliged to make an assignment of its property. The settlers themselves had cause for despondency in 1858, as many of them had made advance payments of interest on their tracts of land, expending the balance of the money they had brought with them in erecting their houses, fencing their farms, and purchasing stock. The farmers depended solely upon their crops to meet accruing payments to the company, and when these failed, ruin stared them in the face. The company seeing, that to press the farmers was to drive them away, and embarrass the future, in many instances wisely extended the contracts: notwithstanding this, twenty-three thousand four hundred and sixty-eight acres, representing $375,000 purchase money, reverted to the company. This amount, however, did not represent a wide-spread disaffection and an alarming exodus; for the cancellations included the contracts of two individual speculations amounting to over twenty thousand acres, which sold for $330,000. But the times were dark for those who remained upon their lands, many of the farmers actually suffering for the necessities of life; immigration was almost checked, and the prospect was, indeed, gloomy for the Illinois Central Company, which had seemed about to advance along such a bright career. The alarm spread to the foreign shareholders, and a committee was appointed in London to visit Chicago and New York, and look over the books of the company. Principally through the good offices and sound judgment of Richard Cobden, who was largely interested in the road, the foreign investors were placated, and brighter times brought complete satisfaction with their investment in the enterprise. After the harvest of 1859 had been garnered and sent to market, the business of the road showed a marked and encouraging increase — the Indian-corn crop being especially prolific. By the commencement of 1860, connection with Memphis and New Orleans had been completed; the Grand Trunk line, constructed to Detroit, had given the Illinois Central an outlet to the Great East, and the extension of the Dubuque & Pacific into Iowa was creating an important Western outlet and feeder. In that year, the increase in passenger traffic from the South, and in heavy river freights, was very great, and gladdened the hearts of the managers. The coal trade was also increasing, the company was striving for the cotton trade, and it was expected that trains would be running between Chicago and New Orleans, over the Mississippi Central, in February, 1861. The Mobile & Ohio line was rapidly approaching completion. In fact, the Illinois Central seemed destined, before the conclusion of the year 1861, to become the great connecting link between the Northeast and the Southwest, and an important factor in the Middle Western system. In April, 1860, the company met with a severe loss in the burning of the extensive car-shops at Chicago. In February, 1861, President Osborn announced that the company was relieved from its floating debt, and that its funded debt and its capital stock were each over $15,000,000. But the Illinois Central was destined to pass through another season of financial depression, for, with the opening of the war, its increasing passenger and freight traffic from the South was suspended, and many of the most important of the grain markets were closed to the farmers. In April, 1861, the Government placed a force of troops in Cairo and from that time until the close of the war, over two hundred and fifty miles of the Illinois Central road, south of the Terre Haute line, were mainly used for the transportation of men and military stores. With the very abundant harvest of wheat and corn, the local traffic of the line north of the points named, would have supported the entire road, with ordinary market prices for the products of the country; but the surplus crops of the Northwest were thrown on to the lakes. The supply of vessels and canal boats was inadequate to the sudden and unexampled demand for transportation, whose rates consequently rose rapidly and reduced the net price of products to the Illinois farmer to so low a point as to leave no margin for profit. And the withdrawal of $12,000,000 of the State-bank currency, based largely upon the securities of the Southern States, was another reason why the company had cause for uneasiness. At the close of the year 1861, although the company had been transporting troops at less than one-fifth of a cent per mile above the actual cost, the War Department still was indebted to it in the sum of $207,000. No complaints were made, for the Illinois Central was noted throughout the war for its patriotism and the number of brave men whom it sent to the front; but this point is merely noticed to impress upon the general reader the fact that this corporation was making a brave fight for existence.

The next two years showed an increase in passenger traffic. During 1863, the Mississippi River was opened to trade, which led to profitable traffic upon the main line, good markets for the farmers and renewed immigration. Although the local traffic was interfered with by the requirements of the Government in sending forage and supplies for the armies in the Southwest, the general business was increasing and the rolling stock of the company assuming large proportions. The property consisted of seven hundred and six miles of railway, one hundred and thirty-three engines and three thousand five hundred cars. The machine shops were well furnished and the depots and station-buildings in excellent shape. The property of the company was valued at $50,000 per mile, and a dividend of five per cent. had been declared during the year. In 1865, arrangements were entered into with the American and the Adams Express Companies for the carrying of money and parcels after May 1. For the year ending December 31, there was an increase of $850,000 in gross earnings over the amount received in 1864. The Southern trade promised to be again restored; the equipment was increased by twenty-two new locomotives; over $1,200,000 had been expended upon the repairing of the tracks; the debt had been reduced $7,200,000 during the past seven years; and, altogether, the outlook for the Illinois Central Railroad Company, at the close of 1865, was encouraging in every aspect. The next year's exhibit was less promising, as there was no transportation of troops and supplies and little travel came from the shattered South. There was an increase of local freight business, but the net earnings of the road were about the same. For the years 1867 and 1868, the net earnings were about $2,400,000, and the management continued to re-lay the road. In November of the former year, the Illinois Central had leased the Dubuque & Sioux City Railroad, one hundred and forty-two miles in length. On the 1st of January, 1869, the bridge across the Mississippi, between Dunleith and Dubuque, was opened. The funded debt had been reduced to $9,377,000 and 1,124,446 acres of land sold, leaving 526,690 acres still on the market when the year closed. In August, forty-eight miles of the Iowa Falls & Sioux City Railroad had been leased, and in December twenty-five more miles were acquired by the same legal process. By October, 1870, one hundred and fifty-nine miles of this road had been leased and were in operation; within the state of Iowa there were four hundred and two miles in operation; and the Illinois Central was now enabled to compete for the trade of Dakota and the Northwest. Arrangements had also been perfected with the Belleville & Southern Illinois Railroad, by which through passenger and freight trains were to run between St. Louis and Cairo; and negotiations were pending for the construction of the road between Cairo and the Mobile & Ohio Railroad. The ambition of the Illinois Central, so rudely dashed by the Rebellion nearly ten years previously, was soon to be realized. In 1870 and 1871, the State produced large harvests of corn, while other cereal crops were fair; the consequent increase of freight traffic in Illinois, however, but just met the decrease in Iowa, caused by the partial failure of crops in that state. Then came the Chicago fire, in which the company lost its passenger and freight depots, land office, several small buildings and twenty-six freight cars. Except the land office, the property was all insured. Elevator A, on the station grounds, owned by private parties, was also destroyed, seriously crippling the grain receipts. The grand total of the system operated at that time by the Illinois Central Company was over one thousand one hundred miles. The rolling stock consisted of one hundred and ninety-three locomotives, one hundred and sixty-two passenger coaches, and four thousand three hundred and forty-four freight cars. The number of acres of land sold in 1871 was 48,927, yielding $459,404. The aggregate amount of land sold was 2,215,790 acres, leaving 379,210 acres at the disposal of the company, not including right of way and depot grounds.

The following table shows the amount of gross earnings of the Illinois Central Railroad, from all sources, since its completion, in March, 1855, up to December 31, 1871, with the amount of tax on its Illinois earnings, paid into the State Treasury in accordance with its charter provisions:

JOHN M. DOUGLAS, one of the oldest of the railroad men of Chicago, was born at Plattsburg, Clinton Co., N. Y., August 22, 1819. His maternal grandfather, Elijah Weaver, was second lieutenant in the Revolutionary War, and his father, Congdon Douglas, served in the War of 1812, and fought at the Battle of Plattsburg. At the age of seventeen, he entered the law office of Sweatland & Beckwith, at Plattsburg, and read law for three years. He then came west and settled in Galena, Ill. After examination by the Supreme Court of the State, he was admitted to the Bar, at Springfield, in 1841, and opened a law office in Galena. In 1856, he came to Chicago, and, in 1857, was appointed general solicitor for the Illinois Central Railroad. He was afterward elected vice-president, and served in both offices until elected president of the company in 1865. In 1871, he retired from the service of the company, but was re-elected in 1873 and served until 1876, when he retired permanently from active management of the company and from business life. In 1881, he was appointed by Judge Drummond receiver of the Ohio & Mississippi Railway. Mr. Douglas was a sufferer, in common with thousands of others, by the great fire, losing his elegant mansion on Erie Street, with all its valuable contents. He is a Democrat in politics, but is not inclined to active political life. Mr. Douglas was united in marriage to Miss Amanda Marshall, of Plattsburg, N. Y., and has had three children; Helen, the wife of James Charney, the lumber dealer; Anna, the wife of Walter Neef, the western manager of the Associated Press; and John Marshall Douglas.

JAMES C. CLARKE, president of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, has been pronounced by competent authorities one of the most practical and discriminating railroad men in the country. He was born in 1826, in Montgomery County, Md., and commenced his long and successful career, when only eighteen years of age, in the employ of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. For ten years he remained in the employ of this corporation in various subordinate positions, and, in 1854, became superintendent of the Central Ohio Railroad, and in 1855, came west to Chicago as superintendent of the northern division of the Illinois Central Railroad. In 1850, he assumed the general superintendency of the employ of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. For ten years he remained in the employ of this corporation in various subordinate positions, and, in 1854, became superintendent of the Central Ohio Railroad, and in 1855, came west to Chicago as superintendent of the northern division of the Illinois Central Railroad. In 1850, he assumed the general superintendency of the same road, which position he continued to hold for three years, thus carrying the enterprise through the most trying period of its existence. In 1850, he severed his connection with the Illinois Central, to become superintendent of the Northern Central Railroad. He discharged the duties of this important trust with his usual energy and success until 1862, when he withdrew from the railroad field for some years and devoted himself to private business. From 1870 to 1872, he was president of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company, and from 1872 to 1874 vice-president and general manager of the Erie Railroad. In September, 1874, he assumed the management of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and continued as general manager of the road until January, 1877. From January, 1877, to August, 1883, Mr. Clarke was vice-president and general manager of the Illinois Central and Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans railroads. In August, 1883, he was chosen to his present position, at the head of the great Illinois Central system of railroads.

PETER DAGGY, land commissioner of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, was born October 25, 1810, on a farm about two miles west of the village of Mount Solon, Augusta Co., Va. His parents, Michael and Sybil Daggy, were of remote German descent, but of American birth. The son, Peter, worked on his father's farm during his boyhood, and obtained his education by attending the country school during the winter terms. The parents resided there until Peter was sixteen years old, and then they came west, locating at Frankfort, Ind. The senior Daggy had been brought up to the trade of stonemason and bricklayer, but after his marriage he betook himself to farming, which occupation he followed the rest of his days. The family resided in Frankfort about a year, and while there Peter wrote in the County Recorder's office. In 1837, his father purchased a farm near Greencastle, and Peter went with him; but he was discontented with farm work, and he persuaded his father to let him learn the printing business. He went to work on an agricultural paper at Greencastle, and was there for several years. He was afterward employed in a dry goods store for a short time, and then entered the Asbury University, at Greencastle, where he remained about a year. His education remained uncompleted, owing to his means being exhausted, and he went to working in the office of the Clerk of the Circuit Court, where he remained for several years. During this time he studied law and was admitted to the Bar. During his fifteen years' residence in Indiana, he was elected Presiding Justice of the County Court, and resigned the office in January, 1850, to accept a clerkship in the government land office, at Washington, D. C. He remained there until June 30, 1853, and at the time of his removal he was at the head of the swamp land division in the land department. In the latter part of 1855, he came to Chicago to accept a position as clerk in the land department of the Illinois Central Railroad. He was a clerk for about two weeks, and on January 10, 1856, was made secretary of the department, which office he held until March 4, 1871, and was then elected commissioner of the land department. This position he now occupies, and in all his various connections with the Illinois Central has performed his duties with the utmost satisfaction. In December, 1860, Mr. Daggy was elected alderman in this city, and served until December, 1872. During his term of office, the court house and city hall building was erected, and just completed prior to the fire of 1871. Mr. Daggy was married at Danville, Ind., April 23, 1843, to Miss Nancy Jane Matlock. She died in the city of Washington, January 26, 1851, leaving two sons, Henry Clay Daggy and Charles. The former enlisted in Company "D," 19th Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers, at the age of seventeen, and at the battle of Stone River, Tenn., received his death wound. The son Charles died in this city November, 1864, at the age of eighteen. On December 4, 1851, Mr. Daggy was married to Miss Julia Lunt, of Washington, D. C. They had six children, but only one is now living. This is a son, John Julian Daggy. Mr. Daggy was admitted to the Masonic Order at Greencastle, Ind., where he was made a member of Temple Lodge, No. 47, in April, 1843. He is a member of Landmark Lodge, No. 422, A. F. & A. M.; of Fairview Chapter, No. 164, R. A. M.; of Temple Council, No. 65, R. & S. M., and of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., of this city. He has passed all the chairs of subordinate lodge, chapter and council. Mr. Daggy has always been a Whig-Republican, and did a great deal of hard work for the cause during the rebellions times.

HORACE TUCKER, general freight agent of the Illinois Central Railroad, was born May 20, 1842, in Salem, Mass. Mr. Tucker, during his boyhood, attended the common schools of his native town, and when a youth was employed in a crockery store in Salem. He remained in that employment for about six years, and when he was twenty years of age, he came west "to make his fortune." Although he has had hard work in the railroad service he has doubtless satisfied his ambition to make a success in life, at least the public so consider his experience, for certainly no western man stands higher in the estimation of the shipping public than Horace Tucker. He has always been in the service of the Illinois Central Railroad, commencing with that corporation January 8, 1862, as ticket agent in the Central Depot, Chicago. He held that post until January 1, 1870, and was then made cashier in the treasurer's office. He retained that position for nearly four years, during which time he gained a considerable knowledge of the proper management of the affairs of a railroad. He concluded to identify himself with a department of the Illinois Central, and September 15, 1874, took a clerkship in the freight office, and, during his short term of employment in that capacity, mastered the details of the freight business. Three months after his appointment as clerk, or on January 1, 1875, he was made general freight agent of the Iowa and Illinois Division of the Illinois Central, and he occupies that prominent and responsible office at the present time. Mr. Tucker is an agreeable, courteous official, and has won the esteem of all who have had business relations with him. He was married at Salem, Mass., September 11, 1866, to Miss Carrie P. Kowell; they have three children—Fred, Bessie and Sadie.

WILLIAM K. ACKERMAN, ex-president of the Illinois Central Railroad, dates his connection with this corporation from May 28, 1852. Actual work upon the line was commenced May 14, 1851, and the very first train that entered Chicago over the Illinois Central Company's track was on May 21, 1852. So it is readily seen that Mr. Ackerman was in the service of the company almost from the date of its inception. The main office of the corporation was then, as it is now, located in New York. Mr. Ackerman, who was born in that city on January 29, 1832, took a position with the Illinois Central Railroad Company when he was twenty years of age, shortly after completing his education in the male high school of Gotham. From May 28, 1852, to November 21, 1855, he was assistant secretary and transfer clerk, and from the latter date was the secretary up to the time of his removing west, September 10, 1860. Upon coming to Chicago, he was appointed local treasurer, and held that office until April 14, 1871; then he took the trusteeship of the corporation, and handled its finances till January 28, 1875. On May 20, 1872, he was elected a director of the company, and so continued up to the time of his withdrawal from active service. In January, 1875, having been appointed general auditor of the road, he assumed the duties of his new position, introduced a new system of accounts, and directed the work of that office until July 17, 1876, when he became vice-president. He was elected president October 17, 1877, and filled that chair until August 15, 1883, and then returned to the vice-presidency, which he held until his retirement from the road, January 1, 1884. During his thirty-two years connection with this company, Mr. Ackerman has undoubtedly done as much toward bringing the Illinois Central up to its present high standard as any other one man. Energetic in developing its facilities, consistent in forming new plans for the benefit of the road and the public, and always endeavoring to improve its system, he retired from the management and connection with a most creditable record. It was largely owing to his efforts that the splendid suburban system of the Illinois Central Company was introduced. At the present time, Mr. Ackerman is connected with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in an advisory position in the management of its western affairs, with headquarters in this city. He was married, November 30, 1858, to Miss Alida Reynolds Lewis, of Cortland, N. Y. They have two daughters, Mrs. George W. Meeker, of this city, and Miss Gertrude McKinley Ackerman. Mr. Ackerman is an active member of the Chicago Historical Society, and has always taken an interest in all matters relating to the history of this State. He is the author of a valuable work, entitled "Early Railroads of Illinois," and has also contributed a large number of articles on the subject of railroads and their management to the North American Review and other periodicals, as well as to the daily press. He is regarded an authority on railway questions, and his opinions are given the credit which they well deserve.

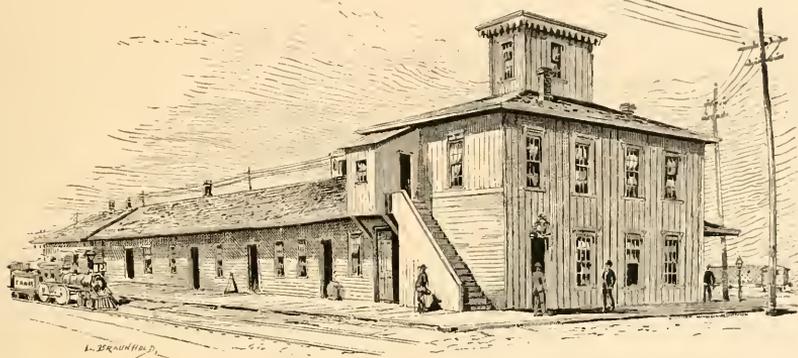

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN AYER, general solicitor of the Illinois Central Railroad, was born in Kingston, Rockingham Co., N. H., April 22, 1825. His family is one of the oldest in New England, he having descended, in the eighth generation, from John Ayer, of England, who settled in Haverhill, Mass., in 1645. After preparing himself at the Albany (New York) Academy, Mr. Ayer entered Dartmouth College, where he graduated in the year 1846. On completing his literary studies he determined to make the law his profession, and spent three years in perfecting himself, part of the time attending the Dana Law School of Harvard College. He was admitted to the Bar in July, 1849, and then went to Manchester, N. H., to practice his profession. Having received a splendid education, both general and legal, and being endowed with natural abilities for the profession, he soon made a high reputation; and so won the confidence and esteem of the people of Manchester, that he was sent to the Legislature in 1853. In 1854, he was appointed prosecuting attorney for Hillsborough County, N. H., and held that office until the date of his removal to Chicago, in 1857. He was admitted to the Bar of this State on May 15 of that year, and he as rapidly rose in the regard of our people and of the profession as he had in his Eastern home. In 1861, he was appointed corporation counsel, and served as such five years, during which time he prepared the revised charter of the city, in 1863. He was afterward of the law firm of Beckwith, Ayer & Kales, and in 1875 of the firm of Ayer & Kales. In December, 1876, he was tendered the office of general solicitor of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Prior to this he had devoted his attention to corporation and railroad law, and had distinguished himself in this class of legal practice. He accepted the offer of the Illinois Central Company, gave up all other practice, and since 1876 has devoted himself to the legal department of that corporation. For the past four or five years, he has been president of the Western Association. He is a member of the Chicago Club, Chicago Literary Club, and Kenwood Club. Mr. Ayer was married in 1868, to Miss Jennie A., daughter of Judge Hopkins, of Madison, Wis. They have three children, Walter, Mary Louise and Janet. The family have resided in Hyde Park since 1873, and they are attendants of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of which Mr. Ayer is a vestryman.

HENRY DEWOLF, assistant treasurer of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, is the son of William F. DeWolf, an old Janesville, fifty-two miles. This road, sold under foreclosure in June, 1859, became the basis of the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company.

Returning to the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company, at the point in 1857 where it was left in the first volume of this work, it is found that at the annual meeting of the directors, chosen in June of that year, the following officers were elected: John Bice Turner, president; William H. Brown, vice-president; William J. McAlpine, chief engineer. The additional officers were: Secretary, William M. Larrabee; treasurer, Henry A. Tucker; auditor, George M. Wheeler. During the next six months the whole of the second track between Chicago and Turner, thirty miles, was completed and used. Over nine millions dollars had already been expended on the line. By the year 1858, the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad had been constructed from Chicago to Freeport (main line), one hun-and honored resident of Chicago and a law practitioner of long standing. He was born in Alton, Ill., in 1846, and came to Chicago, with his parents, four years later. Mr. DeWolf received his education in this city, and graduated from one of the high schools. In 1868, he went into the land department of the Illinois Central Company, where he remained for about four years. He first held the position of clerk, then private secretary to Commissioner John C. Calhoun, and at the time of his leaving that office he held the position of cashier. On January 1, 1872, he was promoted to private secretary to the president of the road, John Newell, now of the Michigan Central. Mr. DeWolf was in the president's office until January, 1874, when he took the post of cashier in the treasurer's office. He was made assistant treasurer upon the promotion of J. C. Welling to the office of general auditor, and has had charge of the Illinois Central's local financial business for the past nine years. Mr. DeWolf is a member of the Union League Club of this city, and is held in high esteem by his personal associates. His business relations with the company have effectually demonstrated the perfect confidence in which he is held for his business and personal integrity.

CHICAGO & NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.—The Illinois and Wisconsin Railway Company was organized December 30, 1851, and the road built from Chicago to Cary, a distance of thirty-eight miles, in 1854. In March, 1855, it was consolidated with the Rock River Valley Union Railroad Company, which, during the previous year, had constructed its road from Minnesota Junction to Fond du Lac, a distance of twenty-nine miles. The new company was called the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac Railroad Company, and during 1855 it extended its line from Cary to dred and twenty-one miles; Belvidere to Magnolia (Beloit and Madison branch), one hundred and eighteen miles; Junction to Fulton (Dixon and Iowa Central branch), one hundred and thirty-six miles. The entire equipment consisted of sixteen locomotives, forty-one first-class passenger cars, twenty-two second-class and baggage cars, eight hundred and sixty covered freight cars, one hundred and fifty platform and one hundred and one burden freight cars, one hundred and twenty-two hand repairing cars, one hundred and thirty-four small gravel cars, one paymaster's and one wrecking car. At that time, also, the company owned real estate as follows: Near Harlem Station, nine miles west of Chicago, three thousand three hundred acres; main line and Beloit branch, including sixty-two acres in Chicago, one hundred and sixty-five acres; one hundred and sixteen acres on the Chicago, Fulton & Iowa line; sixty-eight acres of gravel pits; miscellaneous, three thousand four hundred and ninety-one acres; total, eight thousand and eighty acres. The miscellaneous item included "wooded land," which, when cleared, was re-sold by the railroad company. Contracts were in force with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, requiring the company to transport all business to and from Chicago over that portion of the Galena & Chicago Union east of the Junction, and prohibiting them from competing for business on the Illinois Central north of Amboy. A joint contract was in force with the Mineral Point and Illinois Central companies, providing that the former should send all its business, the destination of which it could control, for twenty years, over the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad. The Fox River Valley Railroad Company was to send all its business over the Galena & Chicago Union, the latter to allow fifteen per cent. of its earnings over the road more than two miles north of Elgin. For the use of the Beloit & Madison, the Galena & Chicago Union was to pay ten per cent. of its earnings on the road more than six miles north of Beloit, passing over the main line between Belvidere and Chicago, when it should be put in operation between Beloit and Madison. Besides the above contracts, a running arrangement was in force with the Illinois Central, by which the roads from Chicago to Dunleith were worked as a complete line. By December 31, 1858, there was no floating debt, the funded indebtedness of the company being $3,783,015. Connection had been formed at Bass Creek, Wis., between the line of the Beloit & Madison Railroad, operated by the Galena & Chicago Union and the southern Wisconsin branch of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, so that cars were running to Janesville, Wis., May 17, 1858. In November of that year, the Fox River Valley Railroad Company reorganized under the name of the Elgin & State Line Railroad Company, and a contract was made with the Galena & Chicago Union, to run for five years.

The hard times of 1857 were having their effect upon the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac Railroad Company, making it impossible to meet the interest on its bonds. An act was passed by the Legislature, February 19, 1859, authorizing the sale of the road, and on the 14th of March another was passed to facilitate the formation of a corporation which should operate it. By agreement of the bondholders and stockholders, Samuel J. Tilden and Ossian D. Ashley were appointed their agents to attend and supervise the sale. This took place on the 2d of June, when William B. Ogden, James F. D. Lanier, William A. Booth and James Winslow, trustees of the road, turned over all the property to these parties. Five days later, the Chicago & North Western Railway Company was formed by the purchasers, the road extending from Chicago to Oshkosh, Wis., one hundred and ninety-three miles, and from Oshkosh to Appleton, twenty-eight miles. Its officers were as follows: William B. Ogden, president; Perry H. Smith, vice-president; George L. Dunlap, superintendent; George P. Lee, treasurer; James R. Young, secretary; E. DeWitt Robinson, general ticket agent; and N. Gup-till, general freight agent. The plan adopted for the completion of the line to Oshkosh provided for a fund of $600,000, to pay for right of way, construction, depots, and other buildings. The line was put in operation during the year 1860, at an additional expenditure of less than $350,000. This was less than $9,000 per mile, the uncompleted section being sixty-three miles. In order to obtain the land granted by Congress to the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac road, it was necessary to extend the line some three miles beyond Oshkosh. The total expenditure up to January 1, 1860, on the line between Janesville and LaCrosse now Minnesota Junction, was $536,086, and from April 1, 1860, to January 1, 1861, from Chicago to Oshkosh, $87,487. Add to this the amount previously laid out, and nearly $700,000 is found to have been expended on these sections. Up to January 1, 1861, over $134,000 had been expended on new equipment, the total debt of the road, except funded, being $331,491.01. The funded debt now amounted to $3,524,200; the capital stock of the company to $6,028,300; the net surplus to $335,212; and length of its track to three hundred and thirty-five miles. Since the organization of the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company in June, 1859, the equipment of the road had been increased by the addition of fifteen locomotives, three passenger cars, one baggage car, two hundred and fifty six box cars, and seventy-five platform cars, making twenty-nine first class locomotive engines, nineteen first class passenger cars,—in all over seven hundred cars. By act, approved by the Wisconsin State Legislature in April, 1861, the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company was authorized to locate a line of its road, or a branch, by way of Fort Howard or Green Bay, Wis., to the north line of the State, at the Menominee River. It was not built until in the fall of 1862, as at that time (the spring of 1861) the road was unable to meet the interest on its first mortgage bonds, and on April 11, 1861, the bondholders held a meeting in New York City. The committee then appointed visited Chicago, to look over the valuable grounds of the company in this city, to report upon the best way out of the financial embarrassment, and to ascertain whether it was expedient to extend the road from Appleton to Green Bay and west from Neenah to Waupaca, Wis. As was to be expected, although the extension was looked upon as important, and as a necessary development of the system soon to be made, the committee, after visiting the towns and attending enthusiastic meetings, "withheld their recommendation." In December, 1861, the Chicago & North-Western Company proposed to Brown County to exchange $49,500 of its stock for an equivalent in county bonds, and the proposition was accepted in the next month. The road was formerly opened to the public on November 13, 1862. Congress had granted eighty acres of land for depot purposes from the military reservation, and the line was already stretching toward Marquette. In Chicago, arrangements had been made with Munn & Scott for the erection of a large grain elevator on the depot grounds, this firm being already the owners of another elevator connected with the company. One was also to be erected at Green Bay.

In the meantime (in January, 1862), forty miles of the Cedar Rapids & Missouri River Railroad had been completed and leased to the Galena & Chicago Union. The lease dated from July, so that in the summer of 1862 the Galena & Chicago Union Company controlled a direct line from Chicago to Marshalltown, Iowa, one hundred and fifty-one miles west of the Mississippi River. A partition of land held jointly by the Galena & Chicago Union, the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad companies, on the South Branch of the Chicago River, was made during that year. The latter company was then constructing a new line of road into Chicago from Aurora, to be used in lieu of the thirty miles of the Galena & Chicago Union line. Notice had been given of a discontinuance of the use of this line after May, 1864. By the opening of the Chicago, Iowa & Nebraska Railroad, which was leased to the company in July, 1862, the Galena & Chicago Union operated a continuous line from Chicago to Cedar Rapids, via Clinton. During the year, also, the passenger depot of the company at Chicago, which had been built before the completion of the Freeport line, was enlarged so as to give an additional story and bring together under one roof all the general offices.

The Dixon, Rockford & Kenosha Railroad Company, whose line was built from Chicago to Rockford, seventy-two miles, was consolidated with the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company, January 19, 1864.

On the 2d of June, 1864, the two corporations whose history has been traced, in a general way, up to this time—the Galena & Chicago Union and the Chicago & North-Western companies—were consolidated. At the time of the consolidation, the system controlled by the new corporation was as follows: From Chicago via Janesville, Fond du Lac, Oshkosh and Appleton, to Green Bay, two hundred and forty-two miles; Kenosha to Rockford, the junction of the old Galena road on Rock River, seventy-three miles; the Galena & Chicago Union lines, both owned and leased, five hundred and twenty-one miles; the Peninsula Railroad, seventy miles; total, nine hundred and six miles. The new company assumed the name, "Chicago & North-Western Railway," because the outlet to the Mississippi River, by way of Galena, had long since passed under the control of the Illinois Central road. The Dixon Air Line, built west from the Junction to the Mississippi River, at Fulton, had been put in operation to meet this demand. All the roads branching out from Chicago now controlled by this company run in a general northerly or westerly direction—hence the name. The adoption of the name also involved no change of books or blanks from those used by the old Chicago & North-Western Railway Company.

At the time of the absorption of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company, its officers were: William H. Brown, president; Edward B. Talcott, general superintendent; Augustine W. Adams, general freight agent; George M. Wheeler, auditor; Willard S. Pope, engineer; Elliott Anthony, attorney; W. M. Larrabee, secretary; Henry A. Tucker, treasurer.

The officers of the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company in June, 1864, were as follows: William B. Ogden, president; Perry H. Smith, vice-president; George L. Dunlap, superintendent; George P. Lee, treasurer; James R. Young, secretary; B. F. Patrick, general ticket agent; Charles S. Tappen, general freight agent. Since the lease of the Cedar Rapids & Missouri River road to the Galena & Chicago Union, in 1862, the line had been extended to Boonesboro', two hundred and four miles west of the Mississippi River, leaving about one hundred and thirty miles of road to complete to the Union Pacific at Omaha, so that this has been added to the North-Western system. Just previous to the consolidation, the Galena road had commenced the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi at Clinton, and during the year 1864 it was completed by the Chicago & North-Western. The Peninsula Railroad Company, of Michigan, operating a line sixty-two miles in length from Escanaba to Negaunee, was consolidated with this voracious corporation in October of that year. In June, 1865, Joseph B. Redfield, now auditor of the road, became assistant secretary.

No changes of importance were made among the officers from June, 1865, until June, 1867, when they were as follows: William B. Ogden, president; Perry H. Smith, vice-president; M. L. Sykes, Jr., second vice-president; James R. Young, secretary; Albert L. Pritchard, treasurer; George L. Dunlap, general superintendent; James H. Howe, general solicitor; William H. Ferry, acting director of the Galena Division; George P. Lee, local treasurer; Charles S. Tappen, general freight agent; B. F. Patrick, general passenger agent. The company now held the stock of the Green Bay Transit Company, transacting business between Fort Howard and Escanaba, the terminus of the Peninsula Railroad, now "Division." It also controlled the Chicago & Milwaukee Railway Company, eighty-five miles.

Up to this time, the entire amount expended upon the Chicago & North-Western Railway system was, in round numbers, $49,232,000. Since the consolidation, $2,777,000 has been laid out upon it. In June, 1870, John F. Tracy became president of the road, while the other officers were as follows: M. L. Sykes, Jr., vice-president; Albert L. Pritchard, secretary and treasurer; James H. Howe, general solicitor; George L. Dunlap, general manager; John C. Gault, general superintendent; J. B. Redfield, auditor; C. C. Wheeler, general freight agent; and H. P. Stanwood, general passenger agent. The year 1870 marks the completion and connection of the road with the Winona & St. Peter line, making one hundred and twenty-one miles included in its Minnesota Division. By June, 1871, the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company operated one thousand two hundred and twenty-six miles of road, having during the previous January absorbed the Beloit & Madison Railroad Company. Its rolling stock, since the date of the Galena & Chicago Union consolidation, had increased from two thousand four hundred and twenty cars to six thousand four hundred and sixty, and over $54,000,000 had been expended upon the entire system during the past twenty-five years. Its common stock amounted to $14,720,000, its preferred to $20,415,000, and its funded debt to $12,800,000.

In June, 1871, at which time this history of the road closes in this volume, the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company was officered as follows: John F. Tracy, president; M. L. Sykes, Jr., vice-president; Albert L. Pritchard, secretary and treasurer; James H. Howe, manager; John C. Gault, superintendent; E. H. Johnson, chief engineer; B. C. Cook, solicitor; M. M. Kirkman, treasurer; Joseph B. Redfield, assistant secretary and auditor; R. W. Hamer, purchasing agent; C. C. Wheeler, freight agent; and H. P. Stanwood, ticket agent.

ALBERT KEEP, president of the Chicago & North-Western Railway system, was born in Homer, Cortland Co., N. Y., in 1826, and received his education at the common school and the academy of his birthplace. From 1841 to 1846, he was a clerk in a general country store in his native town. In 1846, he came west and located at Whitewater, Wis., immediately engaging in mercantile pursuits. He remained thus employed at that town until 1851, when he came to Chicago and entered the wholesale dry goods business as a member of the firm of Peck, Keep & Co., which comprised Philander Peck, Albert Keep, and the latter's brother, Henry Keep. The business house was No. 211 South Water Street, and Mr. Keep remained therein until 1857, when he closed out the interests of the firm and sold to their successors, Harmon, Aiken & Gale. Mr. Keep then invested largely in real estate, and erected numbers of buildings, which he rented or sold as the real estate market proffered advantages for doing. When the fire of October, 1871, swept over the city, it destroyed his office and a number of his buildings. He immediately erected others, and continued in real estate and building enterprises until June, 1873, when he was proffered the position he at present occupies. Mr. Keep was also a director of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad from 1865 until 1882.

MARVIN HUGHITT, second vice-president and general manager of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, and president of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway and of the Sioux City & Pacific, and Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railroad companies, was born in August, 1837. He commenced his business life as a telegraph operator, was one of the first operators connected with the service in the west, and left the telegraph business proper to take service with the Chicago & Alton Railroad in 1856, with which he was employed as telegraph operator, superintendent of telegraph, and chief train-despatcher. He entered the service of the Illinois Central Railroad in 1862, and was successively superintendent of telegraph, train master, assistant general superintendent and general superintendent. In 1871, he became assistant general manager of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, and in the autumn of 1871 was appointed general superintendent of the Pullman Palace Sleeping Car Company. In February 1872, he became connected with the Chicago & North-Western Railway; was general superintendent until June, 1876, when he was also appointed general manager, and in 1880 was elected one of its vice-presidents. Since that date, he has been its second vice-president and general manager. In December, 1882, he was elected president of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway; and in July, 1884, he was elected president of the Sioux City & Pacific Railroad and of the Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railroad, and at present occupies those positions.

PERRY H. SMITH, who in his lifetime was one of Chicago's prominent and most influential citizens, was a man possessing rare qualities of both mind and heart. He was born, March 28, 1828, at Augusta, Oneida Co., N. Y.; his father was Timothy Smith, an influential business man of Augusta; his mother was Lucy Avery, a descendant of a well-known family of that name in Connecticut, and was in every way a worthy and estimable lady. When thirteen years of age, Perry entered Hamilton College, where, five years later, during one of which he was confined at home by illness from overwork, he graduated with high honors, standing second in his class. He then entered, as a student, the law office of N. S. Benton, a prominent attorney at Little Falls, N. Y., and on March 28, 1849, the day on which he attained his majority, was admitted to the Bar by Judge Peckham, at Albany, N. Y. In October of that year, he came west and after looking over Kenosha and Milwaukee, established himself at Appleton, in the practice of his profession, and almost from the time of his arrival took a prominent part in developing what then was a village of two houses and a part of Brown County. In 1851, he was elected the first county judge of Outagamie County, over Professor James M. Phinney, serving a fractional term and declining a re-election. In 1854, he was elected to the Assembly from the district composed of Outagamie, Oconto and Waupaca counties, and at once became one of its most influential members. In 1855, he was elected to the State Senate. He was both able and influential in that body. In 1857 and 1858, he was elected to the Assembly. The last year, a very bitter and acrimonious contest, partially of a personal nature, was waged upon him and upon the Democratic ticket, and he felt sore over it that he determined to, and did in 1856, remove from Appleton to Chicago. In 1856, a special session was held for disposition of the immense land grants made by the National Government to Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of railroads. Mr. Smith succeeded in maintaining legislation so that the "Superior" grant to aid the building of a road from Fond du Lac, Oshkosh, and Appleton to Lake Superior, was transferred to a new company, which, as was intended, was soon consolidated with the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac Railroad Company. Mr. Smith became vice-president of the company, and when, some time later, it was reorganized as the Chicago & North-Western, he took the same position with the latter. Milwaukee having opposed him in everything, in and out of the Legislature, Mr. Smith resolved to "get even" with its citizens. In that day, the "Milwaukee scheme" was to leave Neenah, Menasha and Appleton out of the line of road, and to strike northward from Oshkosh. Mr. Smith stood by the Lower Fox River region, and thus carried out his threat; for through the disposition of the grant, which he was chiefly instrumental in effecting, and the consequent extension of the Chicago road, a great deal of trade, naturally tributary to Milwaukee, was diverted to Chicago. After he was elected vice-president of the North-Western, he gained the confidence of William B. Ogden to such an extent that he was virtually the actual manager of the road and shaped its policy. It is said that during all the time he was a successful railroad manager he never forgot his hostility to Milwaukee. While living at Appleton, he made investments in lands and lead and iron mines, and these, together with his railroad connections, made him wealthy. In 1859, Mr. Smith removed to this city, and for two years lived on the southwest corner of Cass and Erie streets. He then bought a residence on the corner of Pine and Huron streets, and occupied it until it was burned in the great fire of 1871. After that event he built the magnificent residence on the same site, and which is still occupied by the family. It cost about $200,000, and was furnished with great elegance, and, in 1874, when it was finished, was regarded as one of the finest residences in the city. In 1868, he retired from the management of the North-Western Railway, and set about enjoying the wealth he had accumulated. He made several trips to Europe, and traveled extensively in this country. The relinquishment of business, however, acted unfavorably upon him, and about 1881-82 his mind began to fail him. This affection steadily grew worse until in 1883, when it became necessary to have a conservator appointed to look after his affairs. His wife accepted this trust under the appointment of the court, but later relinquished its responsible duties to their eldest son. The affection of Mr. Smith's mind showed itself chiefly in loss of memory. Up to within a few weeks of his death he could converse rationally on almost any subject. His ideas and intentions on politics and current events were clear and logical, and his conversation as entertaining as ever. His memory, however, was so treacherous that he often failed utterly to recall one day what he had said or done the day before. His malady, however, was of an incurable nature, and in March, 1885, had reached a stage extremely critical. His illness terminated in his death, which occurred on the 29th of that month, at the age of fifty-seven years and eleven days. At his death, Mr. Smith left a wife and four children, all of whom were comfortably provided for out of the handsome estate he had accumulated during the years of his active business life. Mr. Smith was married, in 1851, to Miss Emma A. Smith, daughter of Rev. Reeder Smith, of Appleton, Wis. The children, already mentioned, are Perry H., Jr.; Ernest F.; Emma, now the wife of F. A. Sawyer, of Boston, Mass., and William D. Thus briefly have been sketched the life and character of Mr. Smith, and though little or no attempt has been made at laudatory comment, yet the simple facts as they have been stated show his worth and ability, and that in every sense of the word he was a self-made man. He was always industrious, brave and self-reliant; it was not his nature to ask favors of any one, although no man prized true friendship higher than he. He won his way in the world by the force of his own genius and will, and being possessed of a fine education, comprehensive views, excellent judgment, great energy and geniality, these qualities brought to him not only his success, but a very large circle of warm and appreciative friends.

JOHN BICE TURNER, for many years one of the most able, public-spirited and trustworthy of Chicago's early citizens, stands as a corner-stone of the great Chicago & North-Western Railway system. William B. Ogden and himself are to day recognized as having been the most powerful agents in the establishment of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company, which may be called the foundation of its giant successor. It is full of interest as well as instruction to trace the life of such a man along the rugged pathway by which he reached his ultimate success. His record as a railroad pioneer commences as early as 1835, in the state of New York. Having not yet recovered from the business reverses sustained a few years previously, in April, 1835 being then a young man of thirty-four, he set to work, under contract, to build seven miles of the Ransom & Saratoga Railroad. This being accomplished, he was placed in charge of the entire road and had the honor of putting in service the "Champlain," a locomotive engine of five tons weight, and the second of his kind to appear in the northern states. Most of the "trains" were drawn by horses, of which the company purchased thirty; and Mr. Turner built a barn every ten miles along the road, for their accommodation. In November, 1835, ground was broken by himself and his partner, as contractors, for the construction of the Delaware division of the New York & Erie Railroad Company. The financial crash of April, 1837, however, carried that corporation with it and caused the temporary ruin of the young contractor and his partners. Subsequently, the company resumed operations, and the $16,000, which it was feared had been permanently lost, was recovered. His next venture was in partnership with his brother-in-law, John Veram, in the building of the Genesee Valley Canal. When, in 1840, the State suspended work upon it, Mr. Turner himself received another set-back. The enterprise was resumed, however, and finished, also a section of the Troy & Schenectady road, by the spring of 1843. This placed Mr. Turner in more comfortable circumstances, and he resolved to locate in the west. In company with his wife, he made a journey of observation as far west as the Mississippi River. Determining to settle in Chicago, he returned to Troy for his two younger children, leaving his oldest boy in Williamstown College. He arrived in the Garden City on October 15, 1843, boarding, with his family, at the old Tremont House. Early in the spring, Mr. Turner purchased one thousand acres of prairie land lying south of Blue Island and put upon it an immense flock of sheep which he had brought from Ohio. He was now in such comfortable circumstances that he was enabled to devote his active mind to larger projects connected with the improvement of the new country which he had made his home. A railroad from Chicago to the Fox River was the all-absorbing topic among the active and broad-minded men of the state and the city. The Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company had been inaugurated several years previously, and a small section of the road constructed, when the funds gave out and work was suspended. In 1847, ten years after the building of this crude excuse for a railroad, Messrs. Ogden and Turner resuscitated the enterprise, and on the 5th of April, 1847, the former was elected president and Mr. Turner acting director of the road. Soon afterward, Richard P. Morgan made a survey of the line, and the two enthusiastic and able officials, traveled through the country soliciting subscriptions. When Mr. Turner was elected president of the company, in December, 1850, the line had been extended from Chicago to beyond Elgin, and by September, 1852, it had reached Freeport, where it connected with the Illinois Central. Under his administration, the Dixon Air line was completed to Fulton, and during that period the line across the state of Iowa was partially finished. He resigned the presidency in 1858, after having been, with the exception, perhaps, of William B. Ogden, the most efficient laborer in laying the foundation of one of the greatest railway systems in the world. In 1853, he had organized, also, the Beloit & Madison Railroad Company, and continued in active connection with the Galena & Chicago Union Company and its successor up to the time of his death. When the consolidation of the Galena & Chicago Union and the Chicago & North-Western was effected in June, 1864, Mr. Turner was chairman of the managing committee. He subsequently served as a director and member of the executive committee of the new road, bringing to bear the same energy, ability and probity which he evinced in his younger days. One illustration of the confidence which he had gained, not only of his immediate circle, but even throughout the country, is here given. During the war, while Fremont had command in Missouri, and suspicions were abroad that the railways were swindling the Government, he made an investigation of the matter and the National Commissioners adopted his figures without alteration. In fact, the nature of his public enterprises since his settlement in Chicago had brought him into contact with capitalists and professional men scattered throughout the land, and the name of John Bice Turner had become a synonym for all that was honest and reliable. In addition to his other manifold labors, Mr. Turner's name appears as one of the directors of the North Side Street Railway Company, which was incorporated in February, 1859. V. C. Turner, his son, and now president, then became manager. Mr. Turner was born at Colchester, Delaware Co., N. Y., January 14, 1799. His father died when he was two years of age and his mother when he was fourteen, he having been adopted by a Mr. Powers soon after the death of his father. In a tan-yard and upon a farm, with an occasional term of schooling, the boy passed the early years of his life, and so well did he improve his opportunities that he was able, in 1810, to unite himself in marriage to Miss Martha Volentine, of Malta, Saratoga Co., N. Y. In 1821, he sold the interest he had obtained in the farm to his brother-in-law, bought a mill and built a distillery, which, with a store, he operated at Mattville, in the same county. Six years thereafter, business reverses came upon him, which at length induced him to embark in those railroad enterprises which brought him fame and fortune. While acting as an official, however, Mr. Turner studiously and conscientiously avoided the rock of speculation—a marked trait of his upright character being his often expressed fear, that some one would suspect him of abusing his position for the purpose of increasing his fortune through such means. In March, 1853, Mr. Turner lost his first wife by death. In 1855, he was married to Miss Adeline Williams, of Columbus, Ga. Six children were born to him, three of whom were daughters. Up to the day of his death, which occurred on February 26, 1871, he seemed hale and hearty. He died peacefully and quietly—a fitting end for one whose life was so filled with good and earnest works. His demise was the occasion for wide-spread grief—his railroad associates, especially, looking upon his loss as irreparable. As gracefully and feelingly announced by General Manager Dunlap, of the Chicago & North-Western road, its general offices and shops were closed in profound respect for the memory of this "judicious and faithful counsellor, genial companion, considerate friend and Christian gentleman. His devotion to the material interests of the country was excelled only by the patriotism which never lost sight of the highest duties of citizenship. His great works live after him, and will keep his memory green forever."

P. Smith

HENRY H. PORTER, the president of the Union Steel Company of this city, is a native of Maine, born in Machias, Washington Co., in 1837. His father, Rufus King Porter, was a lawyer and a man of considerable prominence in that profession. His mother, Lucy Hedge Porter, was a most estimable woman, and belonged to one of the oldest and best of New England families. Henry H. Porter was given a fair English education in the common schools of that day, besides enjoying the advantages of a short term in an academy at Andover, Mass. At fifteen years of age, he began clerking in a store in Eastport, Me., but a year later, having determined upon trying his fortune in the West, he, in 1853, came to this city and entered the offices of the old Galena & Chicago Union Railroad as a clerk, under the superintendency of John Bice Turner. Mr. Porter relates that, at that time, his salary was but four hundred dollars a year, and that the road, which is now one of the main divisions of the North-Western system, was then only seventy-five miles long, and the track for thirty miles out of Chicago was laid with the old strap iron, which had been previously used on what is now the New York Central Railroad, between Rochester and Niagara Falls, of the kind used in the days of primitive railroading. He remained with this road, filling various positions, until, in 1860, he was appointed station agent in this city for the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway and a little later became the general freight agent for the same corporation.

In 1863, he was made general superintendent of this line, which position he held until 1865. In the following year, in company with Jesse Spalding and others, he embarked extensively in the lumber trade, on the upper peninsula of Michigan, handling on an average nearly sixty million feet of lumber per annum. In 1867-68, he became a director of the First National Bank of this city, and also of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, in 1869 and of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, in 1870. He was connected for a time with the directory of the Union Pacific road, and about 1874, became the general manager of the Chicago & North-Western, continuing as such for a period of about two years. In 1875, he, with certain associates, purchased the old Western Wisconsin Railroad, and re-organizing it as the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha, operated it until 1882, when its control was purchased by the North-Western road; since which time, Mr. Porter, beyond being in the directory of certain railroads, has no active association with their interests. In 1884, he, with several other gentlemen, obtained control of the affairs of the old Union Iron and Steel Company, which under a reorganization is now known as the Union Steel Company, a sketch of which appears in another part of this work.

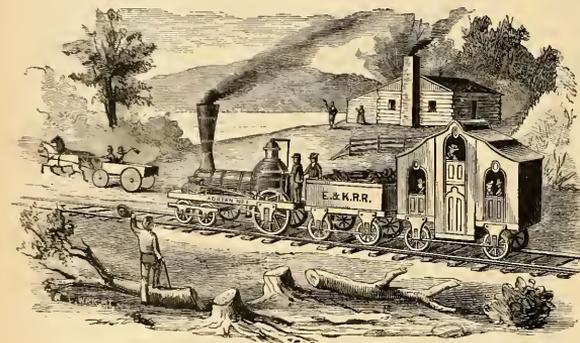

HONORABLE BURTON C. COOK, general solicitor of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway, was born in Rochester, N. Y., on May 11, 1810. He was educated at Rochester Collegiate Institute—since Rochester University—and graduated therefrom in 1834. He immediately commenced the study of the law, with the determination to make it his profession. In 1835, he came to this state, and passing through Chicago, went to Ottawa, and there was admitted to the Bar, and commenced practicing law. The career of Mr. Cook in that city is a part of the history of the state; he was State's Attorney of the Ninth Judicial Circuit, for eight years; member of the State Senate for eight years, and was a member of the Peace Congress in 1861. About 1850, he was the attorney for the Chicago & Rock Island Railway, and retained that position until 1864, when, being elected to Congress from the Sixth—now a part of the Seventh—Congressional District, he resigned his attorneyship and went to Congress. He was re-elected to Congress in 1866, again in 1868, and again in 1870, resigning his seat in 1871 to accept the general solicitorship he at present occupies, and which was proffered him by James F. Tracy, then president of the Chicago & North-Western road, who had been president of the Rock Island while Mr. Cook was its attorney, and consequently knew his eligibility and fitness for the position. Mr. Cook was married, in 1848, to Miss Elizabeth Hart, daughter of Judge Orris Hart, of Oswego, N. Y.; this lady died on February 11, 1879, leaving one daughter, Ellen E., the wife of Charles H. Lawrence, a practicing attorney of this city. Some of the important measures in which Mr. Cook participated during his public service, may be briefly stated, as follows: In 1855, John M. Palmer, Norman B. Judd and Burton C. Cook seceded from the Democratic party, on the question of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and succeeded in effecting an organization hostile thereto; on account of this action, Messrs. Judd and Cook were deposed from the Judiciary Committee. On January 15, 1856, these gentlemen—being at that time members of the State Senate—and Messrs. Baker and Allen, of the House, supported the nomination of Lyman Trumbull for the United States Senate, he, likewise, being an opponent of the repeal of the Compromise, this measure being taken upon the advice of Abraham Lincoln. On February 8, 1856, Mr. Palmer nominated Lyman Trumbull, the amendment was concurred in, and Mr. Trumbull elected. The first ballot, however, only gave five votes for Mr. Trumbull, they being those of Messrs. Judd, Cook and Palmer, of the Senate, and Messrs. Allen and Baker, of the House. The tenth ballot gave Mr. Trumbull the nomination, fifty-one votes being cast for, and forty-eight against, him. No resolutions were adopted instructing senators to vote for the restoration of the Missouri Compromise, but the members in favor of it constantly put the question to vote, thereby placing the members on record. As an evidence of the part taken by Mr. Cook during the crises of the Republican party, as well as by his confrère, Mr. Judd, it may be mentioned that the latter was the first chairman, and the nominator of Mr. Lincoln in 1860, at the Chicago Convention; while Mr. Cook, who was chairman of the Republican State Committee in 1864, appointed by the State Convention, placed Mr. Lincoln in nomination that year at Baltimore. Some of the general measures taken by Mr. Cook in the furtherance of public interests, were his opposition to the resolutions adopted at the Peace Conference, when he and one other member protested against their adoption going on record. He reported the bill which favored free schools; he assisted to draft, and subsequently introduced, the first bill which gave married women the right to hold property in their own names; he drafted and introduced the bill, which was adopted, fixing the basis of Congressional representation, and he reported a polygamy bill, such as was practically adopted after he left Congress. During his service there, he was twice a member of the District of Columbia Commission; he was a member and chairman of the Election Committee; twice a member of the Judiciary Committee; and was chairman of the Committee on Railroads and Canals. From this brief statement of some of the positions occupied by Mr. Cook, it is sufficiently easy to form a correct estimate of the cogency of his influence during his long and honorable career before the public.

PHILLIP A. HALL is one of the oldest railroad men now residing in Chicago. He is a native of Genesee County, N. Y., where he was born October 10, 1818. In May, 1836, he left Batavia, N. Y., and came to Chicago, where he obtained employment in the wholesale grocery store of Hall & Monroe, one of the partners being his brother. About 1848, he became connected with the Aurora branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road, as secretary and treasurer, and after the line was completed took the active management of the train service. He even went so far, at one time, as to run a gravel train himself, it being necessary to forward it to its destination without delay. Mr. Hall continued on the Chicago & Aurora line until 1852, being assistant superintendent under President John B. Turner. In 1854, he was appointed superintendent, as he had been, in fact, for some years. When Mr. Turner resigned as president of the road, Mr. Hall also relinquished the office of superintendent, which occurred in 1858. During the war, he was sum-which time he engaged with the New York & Erie Railroad, where he remained until January 1, 1855. At this date, he first became identified with railroading in the west, accepting the position of assistant engineer of the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company—then the Galena & Chicago Union—which he held nearly four years. In October, 1858, he became the general superintendent of the road, filling that responsible position with unquestioned ability for fourteen years thereafter (until 1872). He then became connected with the Montreal & Quebec Railway, then projected. He spent eighteen months in London in the interest of the enterprise, and had charge of the construction of the road to its completion. In 1870, he renewed his labors in the west, completing the Wabash Railroad during that year, and building, in 1880, the road between Chicago and Strawn, Ill. In 1881, he built the Wabash Grain Elevator, located on the South Branch of the Chicago River, near its intersection with Thirty-second Street. This elevator has a storage capacity of one million five hundred thousand bushels, and is the largest in the city, with one exception. Its cost was $400,000. Mr. Dunlap became a member of the Chicago Board of Trade in 1881. Thirty years of arduous and faithful labor and responsibility have brought him the well-earned recompense of an ample fortune, which he enjoys to the full extent possible to an American not yet retired from the active duties of business life. As proprietor of the Wabash Elevator he is one of the most prominent of Chicago's commercial gentlemen. In addition to his residence in Chicago, he owns a fine farm in Walworth Co., Wis., near Lake Geneva, which is his summer home. Mr. Dunlap is a master mason, a member of Blaney Lodge, No. 271, A. F. & A. M., of Chicago. In politics he is a pronounced Democrat, and a member of the Iroquois Club. He has, however, never entered political life. He married, in 1858, Miss Ellen M. Pond, who left, at her death, two daughters, both of whom are now married—Mrs. A. J. Hopkins of New York, and Mrs. Dr. F. W. Payne of Boston. In July, 1872, he married Miss Emma Blanche Rice, daughter of Hon. John B. Rice, of Chicago.

WILLIAM AUSTIN THRALL, general ticket agent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Sharon, Schoharie Co., N. Y., on August 3, 1834, the son of William and Eleanor E. (Huddleston) Thrall. He received his education at the common schools, and the academy of Schoharie County; and first engaged in business as an employe in a hotel at Guilderland, Albany Co., N. Y. He then was for a year in a store at Schoharie Court House, and also engaged in various other commercial duties until about 1851, when he went to New York City, and there held several clerical positions until the fall of 1854. From New York City, Mr. Thrall came to Chicago, and entered the freight depot of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, as check clerk, and there remained until the fall of 1855, when he was given a position in the general ticket office of that road. In 1856, he was appointed general ticket agent, and remained in that office until 1858, when he accepted a position on the Illinois Central Railroad. From the fall of 1858 until January 1, 1873, Mr. Thrall was with the Illinois Central Company, as assistant general passenger agent, and on the latter date received the appointment on the North-Western Railway which he at present holds; and, as a memento of his long acquaintance with the North-Western, has a passenger tariff rate compiled by him for the old Galena & Chicago Union road, thirty years since. It seems ridiculous, to any one acquainted with the railroad service in this city, to utter any eulogium on Mr. Thrall, so well he is known and so thoroughly is his aptitude for the position acknowledged; but as there exists many persons who only know him by the signature on their tickets, a few words of description of this gentleman may not be inapt. His gentlemanly, genial, yet decisive manner; his comprehensive acquaintance with the innumerable minutiae of his duties; and his accurate knowledge of the various needs and mutations of the passenger service, have rendered him, in conjunction with the extended experience he has acquired, a conceded authority, and a most valuable official of the road. Mr. Thrall is a life member of Oriental Lodge, No. 53, A. F. & A. M., and received the third degree in June, 1858, and is also a past master of that lodge; he likewise held several offices in Lafayette Chapter, the highest of which was Scribe; he demitted from that chapter in January, 1878; and is an ex-member of Chicago Council, No. 4. Mr. Thrall is a life member of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., having been one of the first Sir Knights to achieve that distinction, and is also a life member of Oriental Consistory, 32<sup>d</sup>, S. P. R. S., and the subordinate bodies, having paid dues therein for over twenty years. He was married, in 1859, to Miss Elmira Boyce, of Belvidere, Ill.; they have two children, Samuel E. and William A. Jr.

EARLY LOCOMOTIVE.

moned to St. Louis as an expert witness by the National Commissioners who were examining into the charges that, during Fremont's command in Missouri, the Government had been swindled. His testimony was principally regarding the prices which reasonably should be charged for the transportation of material and troops over what were termed "Land Grant Railroads," it being claimed in some quarters that such service ought to be free on the part of roads which had obtained Government land grants. In the spring of 1865, he returned to Chicago and was appointed assistant superintendent of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific road, and so continued until 1871. Since that year he has retired from active railroad business and been engaged in a variety of financial pursuits.

CHARLES C. WHEELER, general superintendent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, commenced his railroad experience as clerk and agent at Vergennes, Vt., in 1850, on the Rutland Railroad. He has successively been general freight agent of the Chicago & Alton Railroad; general superintendent of the Chicago & Milwaukee Railroad, until its consolidation with the Chicago & North-Western Railway, when he was made general freight agent; general freight agent of the Michigan Central Railway; assistant general superintendent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, and, in June, 1850, was made assistant general manager of that road, remaining in that position until July, 1881, when he accepted the appointment of general manager of the Atchison, Topoka & Santa Fé Railway. He remained there until October, 1883, when he returned to Chicago, and, December, 1883, was appointed to his present position.

GEORGE L. DUNLAP, son of John and Mary (Robinson) Dunlap, was born in Brunswick, Me., in 1828. Having acquired a good common school education, he took an academic course in mathematics and engineering at Gorham Academy; subsequently completing his preparatory education for his chosen profession, by a thorough course of practical training in active field work. In 1843, at the age of twenty, he entered the employ of the Boston & Maine Railroad Company, where he remained until 1851, at MARSHALL M. KIRKMAN, comptroller of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born near the city of Springfield, Ill., in 1842, and received his education at a common school and through private instructors. In February, 1856, he entered the employment of the North-Western (Galena) road, at Fulton, Ill., and remained there, and in that vicinity, until March, 1857, when he came to Chicago, and occupied various positions under the administration here. In 1860, he was placed at the head of the freight accounting department, and, in 1864, he became assistant general accounting officer, which position he retained until 1868. In 1868, he was general accounting officer and local treasurer, the titles being subsequently consolidated. He was then promoted to the position of general accounting officer, which he at present holds, the official designation having been changed to comptroller in 1881.

JOSEPH B. REDFIELD, assistant secretary and auditor of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, came from New York to this city in 1855, and entered the service of the road, with which he has been connected ever since, receiving the appointment to his present position in June, 1865.

W. S. MELLEEN, general freight agent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Crete, Ill., on February 26, 1846, the son of Reuben and Marian B. (Davis) Mellen, his mother being the daughter of Aaron and Rebecca Davis. Very shortly after his birth his parents moved to this city, arriving here in 1846, and here he obtained his education in the graded schools, his class in the high school being taught by George P. Wells, the present principal of the West Division High School. No academic or collegiate facilities were afforded Mr. Mellen, his experience having been one of hard work and his reward that which awaits industry, perseverance and unflinching attention to the interests committed to his charge. He first engaged in business as a bookkeeper for Bevans & Morey, a commission firm on South Water Street, in 1862, very shortly after the close of his school career, in 1861. He remained with Messrs. Bevans & Morey until 1864, when he became receiving clerk at the Chicago office of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and while there acquired a knowledge of telegraph operating. On December 21, 1865, Mr. Mellen first entered the employment of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, as telegraph operator at Milton Junction, Wis., and was afterward at Barrington, Ill., until June, 1866. He was then transferred to Kenosha, Wis., where he was also telegraph operator until March, 1867, on which date he was made agent at Racine, Wis., and there remained until September, 1871. At the latter date, he was made agent at Green Bay, Wis., and continued there until January, 1873, when he accepted the appointment of general freight and passenger and ticket agent of the Green Bay & Lake Pepin Railroad. On October 1, 1874, he was appointed general agent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway in Minnesota and Dakota, with headquarters in Winona, and on October 1, 1875, he received the appointment of assistant general freight agent of the same road, at Chicago, where he remained until December, 1881, when he accepted the position of assistant general superintendent in charge of the operating department of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad. The latter position Mr. Mellen retained until November 1, 1882, when he accepted that of general freight agent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, with headquarters at Chicago, and this position he still occupies. He is a member of Covenant Lodge, No. 526, A. F. & A. M.; Corinthian Chapter, No. 69, R. A. M.; St. Bernard Commandery, No. 35, K. T.; and Oriental Consistory, S. P. R. S. 32<sup>d</sup>, having been a member of the Scottish Rite bodies about seven years. He is also a member of Excelsior Lodge, No. 32, I. O. O. F. Mr. Mellen is chairman of the Joint Western Classification Committee, which office he has held for one and a half years, his occupancy of this responsible place sufficiently demonstrating the perspicacity of the North-Western officials in his selection. He was married in 1870 to Miss Gertrude Pratt, of Racine, Wis. They have two children, Gertrude and Henry Wicker.

CHARLES E. SIMMONS, land commissioner of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Lake County, Ill., near the town of Waukegan, on December 25, 1845, the son of Ichabod and Adelia (Frey) Simmons. He received his education at the common schools in the vicinity of his birthplace, and when he was sixteen years of age became a clerk in the office of the County Clerk of Lake County, Ill., and there remained until April, 1862. He then engaged in the war-claim business, in partnership with Homer Cook, at Chicago, and there remained until he enlisted in the army in January, 1865. He was then elected 2d Lieutenant of Company "H," 153d Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and mustered into service as such, at Camp Fry, in February; and, on March 7, 1865, the regiment left for the South and experienced some campaigning in Tennessee. On September 2, 1865, the regiment was mustered out, and then Mr. Simmons re-entered the office of the County Clerk of Lake County, and there continued until October, 1863, when he entered the abstract office of Messrs.

Jones & Sellers, of this city, as clerk. He remained in the same capacity with that firm until the time of the fire, and was then chief clerk for the combined abstract firms. On December 1, 1872, the three firms of Jones & Sellers, Shortall & Hoard and Chase Brothers leased their books to Handy, Simmons & Co., and of this firm of lessees Mr. Simmons was a partner. In September, 1876, he was proffered, and accepted, the position of assistant land commissioner of the Chicago & North-Western Railway; still retaining, however, his interest in the firm of Handy, Simmons & Co. On July 1, 1878, he was promoted to the position of land commissioner of the road; and on that date he withdrew from the abstract firm, in order to give his whole attention to the important duties of his office, for which his long experience has so evidently fitted him. Mr. Simmons is a member and past master of Lincoln Park Lodge, No. 611, A. F. & A. M.; and a member of Lincoln Park Chapter, No. 177, R. A. M.; and of Siloam Commandery, No. 59, K. T. He was married on May 14, 1866, to Miss Lucy J. Cleveland, of Rockford, Ill., daughter of Rev. Festus P. Cleveland. They have one son, Howard L.

GEORGE H. THAYER, superintendent of telegraph, Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Perkinsville, Vt., in 1843, the son of Henry A. and Marcia A. (Spafford) Thayer. When he was about nine years of age, he came to Chicago with his parents, and received his education in this city at the common and high schools. In 1858, he first engaged in business as a messenger for the Illinois & Mississippi Telegraph Company, and remained in that position for two years, during which time he gained a good knowledge of telegraph operating. In 1861, he received an appointment as telegraph operator on the line of the North-Western, and occupied that situation until 1873, when he was promoted to the superintendency he now holds. Mr. Thayer was married in 1865 to Miss Addie C. Miller, of Chicago. They have four children—George L., William J., Frederick and Mabel.

FRANK M. LUCE, general car accountant of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, is a gentleman whose proficiency in the details of those duties, and ability in their exercise, is not only recognized by the management of the road in his appointment and maintenance in his position, but is also well-known to railroad men throughout the United States. He is the author of Luce's System of Car Accounts, and of Luce's Book of Equipment Lists which are indispensable for car accountants on all the principal lines in the United States and Canada, and which have produced order out of the chaos to which such accounts were heretofore subject. The system was invented by Mr. Luce in 1863, and has grown into such great appreciation that it is now (1884) used by one hundred and eighty-two railroads and fast freight lines, and has received from them the highest eulogiums. Mr. Luce has received from railroad men the sobriquet of "the father of the car-accountant business." He was born in Marion, Plymouth Co., Mass., in 1846, the son of Elisha C. and Lucretia (Clark) Luce. He was educated at the Pierce Academy, Middleboro, Mass., and graduated from that institution. He first entered the railroad business in 1863, as an employé of the Cleveland & Toledo Railroad Company, and was speedily made car-mileage clerk, which position he retained until 1866, when he became car accountant of the Toledo, Wabash & Western Railroad. He remained with that road until 1871, when he was made general car accountant for the Chicago & North-Western. In 1866 he married Miss Emma S. McLean, of Cleveland. They have two children; Alfred M., and Frank M., jr. Mr. Luce is a member of Home Lodge, No. 508, A. F. & A. M.; of Chicago Chapter, No. 127, R. A. M.; of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., and of Oriental Consistory, S. P. R. S. 32<sup>d</sup>, and of Medinah Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S.

CHARLES MURRAY, superintendent of the Galena Division of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Wheeler, Steuben Co., N. Y., on January 21, 1833, the son of William Murray, of Schoharie County, and of Abigail (Hickox) Murray, of Oneida County. William Murray was a prominent woolen manufacturer, not only in New York State, but also in Joliet, Ill., where he was employed in the management of that branch of business under the late Governor Joel A. Matteson. He received but little education in the common schools, but his natural desire for knowledge and his studious characteristics more than atoned for his lack of educational advantages, and his ripe culture and thorough acquaintance with the affairs of the world proclaim that, if Mr. Murray is a self-made man, no care has been withheld and no study ignored during his progress to his present status. At the age of twelve, he removed with his parents to Joliet, Ill., traveling across the country in wagons and sleighs; at which place his father died. In 1847, the family removed to Elgin, Ill., where Mr. Murray entered upon his first business experience in the employ of the Elgin woolen factory, where he remained for about one year; he then entered the mercantile business as clerk and continued in that line until 1853, when he removed to Freeport, Ill., and engaged in mercantile business on his own account, remaining there about one year; when he returned to Elgin,* and was again engaged in mercantile pursuits for about one year; and on March 24, 1855, he came to Chicago and entered the service of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company as clerk in the freight department office, at the foot of Dearborn Street. He occupied that position until March 5, 1861, when he was appointed agent of the same company at Dixon, Ill., where he remained until November 13, 1873. During his residence in Dixon, he became identified with the city government and was a member of the City Council and also a member of the Board of Education, as well as its president at the time he left Dixon. On November 11, 1873, he was appointed local freight agent of the company at Chicago, which place he occupied until December 11, 1876, when he was appointed superintendent of the Galena Division, which position he now fills. His thirty years of continuous service place him among the oldest employes of the company. Mr. Murray was married on December 14, 1857, at Muscatine, Iowa, to Miss Cordelia F. Cox, of New York City; they have two daughters, Carrie and Kittie.

EDWARD J. CYLER was born in Essex County, N. Y., in 1829, the son of Edward S. and Emily E. (Parkhill) Cyler. His education was obtained chiefly in New York City, although the advantages enjoyed by him were not great. At the age of seventeen, he became clerk in the Deadwater Iron Works, in Essex County, and was in the iron business for three years in that county. In 1849, he went to New York City as agent for a transportation line, and there remained until 1855, in which year he came to Chicago as construction paymaster for the Chicago & North-Western Railway, and retained that position until the road was completed to Janesville, Wis., a period of about three years. He was then a sort of pioneer station-agent for the road, being assigned to the various defined termini, as rapidly as the road was completed to such established stations; the first of which was Watertown, Wis., and the last, Oshkosh, Wis. He remained at Oshkosh until 1864, and then was made assistant superintendent of the Galena Division of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, with his headquarters at Chicago—the position being given him after the purchase of the road by the North-Western. He remained in that capacity until 1876, and was transferred to his present position, as superintendent of the Wisconsin division. Mr. Cyler was married, in 1853, to Miss Josephine Quill, of Janesville, Wis., who died in 1869. Mr. Cyler had two children, who also died.

THOMAS STUART RATTLE, contract and freight agent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Chicago, in 1854, the son of Samuel and Anna M. (Dobbins) Rattle. Samuel Rattle was an old settler of this city, and was a descendant of English ancestry; his arrival in this city occurred about 1849, and he afterward resided in Harlem, now Oak Park, where his son was educated. T. S. Rattle first entered upon his business career, as an office-boy, in the employment of the North-Western road, in 1868, and by dint of hard work and attention to the duties devolving upon him, he rose, step by step, to the position of assistant contract and freight agent, to which he was appointed in November, 1877. He retained that position until August, 1880, when he was promoted to his present office, which is conceded to be a just recognition of his perseverance and strict attention to the interests of the road. He was married, in 1877, to Miss Sarah Adele Archdeacon of this city; they have one child, Paul Stuart.

JENKS D. PERKINS, trainmaster of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in the village of Oriskany, Oneida Co., N. Y., of which village his parents were among the first settlers. His father was David Perkins, and his mother Elmira (Stacy) Perkins, and the date of his birth was February 17, 1823. He received his education at the common schools of his native village, and then commenced his business experience by driving piles along the Susquehanna River for the old Erie Railroad Company; this was in 1841. In the spring of 1842, commenced a three years' apprenticeship as bridge-builder, joiner, and railroad carpenter, serving one season with Rogers Brothers, and during the balance of the period with his father. In 1845, he worked for the state of New York for one year, and in the spring of 1846 went to work for the old Syracuse & Utica Railroad, of which John Wilkerson was president. He remained with that road until May, 1851, when he came on a furlough to Chicago, and was solicited by the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad to enter its employment; this he did, after securing the permission of the Syracuse & Utica Railroad, the consent of this road being made an essential part of the contract with the Galena road—Mr. Wilkerson making it a part of the agreement that Mr. Perkins should return to his employment whenever he desired to do so, as he was the best man he ever had in that capacity. Mr. Perkins then went to work for the Galena road, and laid the first T. rail on June 9, 1851, that was laid west of the lakes, at the Fox River, with the junction of the old Fox River road, two miles east of Elgin and the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad. This was the first work he performed for the road, and to achieve it he had to make all his own tools for the T rail laying, as none were to be found in this country. He whittled out the models, and the company's blacksmith forged them under his supervision. For two years he was in charge of the tracks, and then, in 1853, was placed in charge of the road's docks and the tracks inside the city. He remained in that position until 1854, and was then transferred to the West-side lumber yards as freight agent for West Chicago, and there remained until 1864, when he was made trainmaster. In 1861, he took a trip of two weeks to the East, his sole holiday in fifteen years. Mr. Perkins has been in constant employment ever since his entry into the service in May, 1851, and it is a matter of just pride with him, and commendation from the officials of the road, that he has never omitted signing the monthly roll. When the new depot was built on North Wells Street, Mr. Perkins took charge of all the training, and still acts as general superintendent of that service, except the handling of freight trains, and to this matter gives his personal and unremitting supervision. Notwithstanding his sixty-one years, he is as active and hale as a young athlete, and is a splendid specimen of energetic manhood, never employing medical aid for himself. He is a master mason, and a life member of Cleveland Lodge, No. 211. He was married, on April 22, 1844, to Miss Phoebe Jane Wiggins, of Oriskany, N. Y.; they have two children living, William Francis, now an engineer of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, and Martha Maria.

JOHN HICKEY, superintendent of bridges of the Galena Division of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, was born in Waterford County, Ireland, in 1832, the son of James and Kate (Walsh) Hickey. He came to the United States in 1851, prior to which he had received a little education at primary and night schools, the educational advantages in those years, and in that country, being of the most primitive character. This lack of tuition, however, Mr. Hickey has supplanted by study and an extensive course of reading in his later years. From 1851 until 1855, he remained in New York working at such things as presented themselves; and, in July of the latter year came to Chicago. About August 15, 1855, he commenced working for the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, under the supervision of George Basset, who was at that time the superintendent of bridges and buildings on the Galena Division. Mr. Basset succeeded Major Hunter, who was the first incumbent of that position, and who built the first railroad bridge over the Chicago River. This bridge was constructed for the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, and was an excellent arrangement at high water, but when there was any great subsidence of the water it would not swing. It occupied nearly the same position that the present railroad bridge, near Kinzie Street, does. But the days of 1855, and antecedent thereto, were days of primitive arrangements; Mr. Hickey has frequently filled the locomotive tank by bailing out the ditches by the roadbed; and often when the engine arrived at a water station, the tank would be found empty and the attendant slumbering, when the engineer or fireman would pump water into the water-tank, and thence let it run into the locomotive tank. And this was no unusual occurrence, but an every-day happening. After working for fifteen years in that department, Mr. Hickey was, in 1870, appointed superintendent of bridges of the Galena Division, and has since retained that position. He has never lost any time since his employment on the road, save a few days from sickness, and has so assiduously attended to his duties that he has not even taken a vacation. He was married, in 1866, to Miss Elizabeth McCarthy, of Chicago. They have four children: Kate, Gertrude, Walter and Mary.

N. A. PHILLIPS, general baggage agent of the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company, was born in West Bloomfield, Ontario Co., N. Y., on December 10, 1836; being the son of Hubert R. and Lydia (Douglas) Phillips. After receiving a common school education, he went into the hotel and passenger transportation business, and in May, 1851, located in Chicago. In 1854, Mr. Phillips first became connected with the railway service as a train baggageman. He also acted as freight and passenger conductor and passenger agent, previous to his appointment to his present position in December, 1874. Mr. Phillips was married, January 12, 1857, to Annie M. Walters.

THE CHICAGO & ALTON RAILROAD COMPANY.—The charter of the Alton & Sangamon Railroad was granted February 27, 1847, and was completed from Alton to Springfield in 1853. This road was the first section of the present system opened to the public. The Chicago & Mississippi Railroad Company was chartered June 19, 1852. It was finished from Springfield to Bloomington in 1854, and from Bloomington to Joliet in 1856. In the spring of 1857, the Joliet & Chicago Railroad Company, chartered by the Legislature of 1854–55, obtained the right of way into Chicago, and was finished at that time. By act of February, 1855, the name of the Chicago & Mississippi Railroad Company had been changed to the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Company; the intent of the new corporation was to build a railroad from Alton to Joliet and to a point on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, opposite St. Louis. The line was mortgaged, and the company became so embarrassed that, in August, 1855, a lease was made to Hamilton Spencer, of Bloomington, to run twenty years. Mr. Spencer was to advance certain sums of money and pay the interest on the income bonds of the company; to operate the road and pay the expenses. This was done, and he made an assignment of the lease to Brown, Brost & Co. It passed into the hands of Governor Joel A. Matteson and E. C. Litchfield, in December, 1857. Up to that time, the line had been completed from Springfield to Joliet at a cost of nine and a half million of dollars. This, with the Joliet & Chicago Company, formed a continuous line from Springfield to Chicago. In the spring of 1858, a bill was filed complaining that the property of the St. Louis, Alton & Chicago had been perverted from its original purpose. All allegations, however, terminated in November, 1859, and the road was placed in the hands of James Robb and Charles Congdon, receivers, they to operate it under the direction of the court. By an incorporating act, approved February 18, 1861, James Robb, Charles Moran, Adrian Iselin, Nathan Peck, Louis Von Hoffman, Lewis H. Meyer, Septimus Crookes, William B. Ogden, Jacob Bunn, J. J. Mitchell, Joseph B. White and E. M. Gilbert were constituted the commissioners to organize the Chicago & Alton Railroad Company. On the 7th of August, 1862, a decree was entered in the United States Court, by which all claims against the road were brought before it. The property was directed sold, and was purchased by the above parties. On the 16th of October, an organization was effected as follows: James Robb, president; Joseph Price, secretary and treasurer; C. N. Allen, superintendent; Robert P. Tansey, general freight agent; Thomas Warnock, general purchasing agent; Fred. Hudson, auditor. The directors for the year ending December 31, 1863, were: James Robb, John B. Drake and John Crerar, Chicago; George A. Robbins and Albert Havemeyer, New York. The first annual report for that year shows the capital of the company to have been $8,200,939; receipts from all sources, $2,021,770; operating expenses, $971,840. On the 1st of January, 1864, the Joliet & Chicago line was leased. The Alton & St. Louis Company, which had been organized six years previously, commenced the line between these two places in May, 1864, and the road was opened to the public January 1, 1865, being leased to the Chicago & Alton Railroad Company. During the year 1864, there had been a change in the management of the road, T. B. Blackstone, the present incumbent, being elected president; W. M. Larrabee, secretary and treasurer; Robert Hale, general superintendent; O. Chanute, chief engineer; H. C. Wicker, general freight agent; Augustus Newman, general ticket agent; C. N. Pratt, general passenger agent; and A. W. Church, attorney. The St. Louis, Jacksonville & Chicago Company, although incorporated in 1851, did not complete its line to Petersburg until January 1, 1866. In September, 1867, a connection was made with the Chicago & Alton line at Bloomington, and the road was leased by that corporation in April, 1868. Having obtained control of this connection, the Chicago & Alton Company had virtually no competitors for the traffic between Chicago and St. Louis. The passenger business greatly increased and the coal trade was a growing item in the freight traffic. The latter had grown from six thousand tons, in 1865, to over one hundred and sixty-six thousand tons, in 1868, being more than half of the whole amount of bituminous coal received by rail in Chicago during that year. Its financial status for the year ending December 31, 1868, was as follows: earnings, $4,508,642.97; expenses, $2,463,182.64; net earnings, $2,045,460.33. Its income account showed receipts of $2,969,812.61, and its disbursements were $1,985,145.24. In September of that year, J. C. McMullin was appointed general superintendent of the road, to succeed Robert Hale, who resigned in December, 1867. K. F. Booth, the chief engineer, had succeeded Mr. Chanute in 1866, and James Smith, general freight agent, followed Mr. Wicker. The year 1869 witnessed no change in the officers of the road, but there was a large increase in freight and passenger traffic. At the commencement of 1870, the Chicago & Alton Railroad Company operated four hundred and thirty-one miles of road—Chicago & Joliet (leased), thirty-eight miles; Joliet to East St. Louis, (owned), two hundred and forty-two miles; Bloomington to Godfrey, a few miles above Alton, where it connected with the main line—being the St. Louis, Jacksonville & Chicago (leased)—one hundred and fifty-one miles. During 1870, there was acquired the section from Dwight to Wenona, by purchase in March, thirty-five miles; from Wenona to Washington and from Varna to Lacon, forty-five miles, completed in December. So that, on January 1, 1871, there were five hundred and eleven miles in operation, owned or leased by the company. Desiring another outlet to the Mississippi River, the company made a contract with the St. Louis, Jacksonville & Chicago road, for the use of its franchises in the construction of a line from Roodhouse west to Louisiana. A contract was also entered into with the Louisiana & Missouri River Railroad for the completion of the line from Louisiana to Mexico, Mo. An agreement was also made between the Chicago & Alton Company and lines in northern Missouri, by which a through line for passengers and freight was to be operated between Chicago, Alton and Kansas City, as soon as the line should be constructed to Mexico. These contracts were still in force at the time of the great fire, the Roodhouse line being finished. By this casualty, the company lost $100,000 above the insurance upon its property, about one hundred and thirteen of its cars being destroyed. By the end of the year, the company operated five hundred and ninety-five miles of road, the line to Mexico being opened October 30, 1871.

At first, this road occupied the Michigan Southern Depot, on Van Buren Street, but after 1858 used the Union Depot for its passenger business. Its freight depot was on Charles Street, corner of Van Buren, and its round-house on Stewart Avenue, between Wilson and Twelfth streets.

TIMOTHY B. BLACKSTONE, president of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, is one of the most practical, clear-headed and successful railroad men of our country. He is a typical American, a son of sturdy and self-reliant parents, and from his infancy there were instilled into his nature determination and energy. These attributes, now so seldom found, are what made Mr. Blackstone the successful man of to-day. He is a native of Branford, Conn., born March 28, 1829. He received what little education he could obtain during his boyhood in the common schools of Branford, and took a course in an academy. At the age of eighteen, he commenced to take care of himself, and engaged as rodman of the engineer corps of the New York & New Haven Railroad, thus commencing at the very lowest round of the ladder he was destined to climb. Such beginnings in life represent the truest type of an American—the lower down they commence, the higher their ultimate attainments. Of course, the subject of this sketch knew not what was in store for him, but when he went to work it was with a determination to make his way; and, being ambitious, he succeeded in securing gradual promotion in the engineering service, until, at the end of a year, he was appointed to the post of assistant engineer on the Stockbridge & Pittsfield Railroad. He occupied this position until December, 1849, in the meanwhile devoting himself assiduously to the study of the science of engineering. He was then offered a similar position on the Vermont Valley Railroad, which he accepted and occupied until the following April. In May, 1851, Mr. Blackstone recognizing the grand possibilities of the West, decided to remove to Illinois, and he came here to take the position of engineer of surveys, location and construction of the Illinois Central Railroad. Work was then being done on the main line, and his division was from Bloomington to Dixon, with headquarters at LaSalle. In December, 1855, the work was completed, and the main line of the Illinois Central was ready for the transportation of traffic, the general supervision of survey, location and construction of the road having been in charge of Roswell B. Mason, chief engineer. In 1856, Mr. Blackstone connected himself with the Joliet & Chicago Railroad, took the position of chief engineer, and became financially interested in the building of the road. He supervised the location, construction and maintenance of the road, and five years later was elected president of the company. For three years thereafter he remained at the head of this corporation, and in January, 1861, resigned and severed his connection with it, owing to his having been elected a director of the Chicago & Alton Railroad. He became heavily interested and strongly identified with the management of its affairs, and three months later was elevated to the presidency of this corporation—now one of the largest and most successful companies of the West. For twenty-one years he has been at the head of the Chicago & Alton, and to his management is undoubtedly due its chief success. One-half of his life was spent in reaching a goal of honor, and he now enjoys the fruits of his labors. This is one of the instances where men are self-made; and when all young men look to such an example of energy, determination and persistent devotion to duty, there will be fewer failures and better results in business life.

"OLD IRONSIDES," 1832.

JAMES C. McMULLIN, vice-president of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, was born in Watertown, Jefferson Co., N. Y., November 13, 1836. While a lad, he attended the country schools, and later, was a student at the Jefferson County Institute. When nineteen years old, he went to Danville, Livingstone Co., and commenced working in a drug store, with the intention of studying pharmacy and making it his profession. He remained there but two years, however, at the end of that time deciding to come West. On May 27, 1857, he commenced work in the depot of the Great Western Railroad, at Decatur, Ill., as freight and ticket clerk, and from that time to the present, has always been identified with railroads. He remained with that road until March 30, 1860, and then became connected with the Chicago & Alton Railroad, with which corporation he has been associated for twenty-five years. He first occupied the position of freight agent at Springfield, which he held until January 1, 1863; then he came to Chicago in a similar capacity, and so acted until September 1, 1864, when he was made division superintendent of the northern division, from Bloomington to Chicago. He served in that capacity until December, 1867, and was then made assistant general superintendent. In September, 1868, he was elected general superintendent of the road, and he filled that important and responsible office for ten years. On May 9, 1878, he was made general manager, which position he occupied until May 28, 1883, when he was made vice-president of the road, and he has held the office up to the present time. Thus, from the date of his entrance into the railway service, Mr. McMullin has steadily won promotion, until he has attained a position and prominence of which any man may well feel proud. Mr. McMullin was married in Decatur, Ill., March 27, 1860, to Miss Etie A. Mason. They have two children, Frank R. and Louie E.

CHARLES H. FOSTER, secretary and treasurer of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, was born in Rochester, N. Y., April 14, 1835. During his boyhood, he attended the Wadsworth School and Dewey's High School of Rochester, and at the age of seventeen went to Albany, N. Y., taking the position of agent of the Mercantile Canal-boat Line. Although but a youth, he proved capable of attending to his duties, and he retained this position for three years. In 1854, he went to New York City, and engaged in the forwarding business on his own account, for a year being occupied in the transportation of coal and lumber from New York to Philadelphia for the Rochester market, and in the summer of 1855, he went out of business. On July 11, of that year, he came west, and took a position with the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad. He first commenced checking goods in the freight department of that road in this city, and was promoted from time to time. For one year and a half he was check and bill clerk in the local freight office. In January, 1857, he was made assistant cashier in the same office; in 1858, was chief clerk in the general freight office; in 1859, chief clerk in the general ticket office; and from January, 1860, to January 11, 1863, was general bookkeeper in the secretary's office. He was with the Galena & Chicago Union road until the spring of 1863. During 1863 and 1864, he was employed as chief clerk in the office of Samuel T. Atwater, agent of the Buffalo Mutual Insurance Company, and on January 1, 1865, was tendered the position of general accountant under W. M. Larrabee, secretary and treasurer of the Chicago & Alton Railroad. Mr. Foster had been with Mr. Larrabee for over twenty years, five of which were with the Galena & Chicago Union, and recognizing Mr. Foster's superior abilities and experience, the latter offered him the position with the Chicago & Alton road. Mr. Foster commenced his work with Mr. Larrabee, and was under him until 1879. For some time prior to the latter year, Mr. Larrabee's health was very poor, and the duties of secretary and treasurer fell upon the shoulders of the chief clerk, Mr. Foster, who was made secretary pro tem. In May, 1879, the health of Mr. Larrabee continuing to fail, Mr. Foster was elected to the office, and he has since held this responsible position. Mr. Foster is also secretary of the Joliet & Chicago Railroad Company; secretary and treasurer of the Mississippi River Bridge Company, whose bridges are located at Pike, Mo.; and is also secretary and treasurer of the Louisiana & Missouri River Railroad—the above corporations being auxiliaries of the Chicago & Alton Railroad. Mr. Foster was married in this city to Miss Caroline Van Inwagen, daughter of Anthony Van Inwagen, on December 11, 1864. Her death occurred November 7, 1884. Three children survive the mother, their names being Gertrude, Harry C. and Eugene.

HENRY H. COURTWRIGHT, general freight agent of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, was born in Wyoming Valley, Penn., in 1837. He attended the common schools until he was sixteen years old. In 1856, he came west and commenced business life by entering the railway service. In July of that year, he was appointed station agent at Dement, on the line of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, and afterward was sent to Morrison as agent. He was with that road three years, and in January, 1860, was appointed station agent at Lincoln, Ill., on the line of the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad, which position he occupied until July 31, 1860. In August of that year, he took the position of local agent of the Hannibal & St. Joe Railroad, at Hannibal, and later was local agent at Quincy, Ill., for the same road. He was local agent for four years, and for about one year was acting division superintendent of the eastern division of the Hannibal line. In August, 1865, he was made general freight agent of the road, with headquarters in Kansas City. In December, 1873, he was general freight agent of the St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern Railway, and at the end of that time was re-appointed to his former position on the Hannibal & St. Joe road. He was with the latter, in the capacity of general freight agent, for about ten years, and at one time was acting superintendent for a brief period. In March, 1878, Mr. Courtwright was offered the position of commercial agent of the Missouri Pacific line and the St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern Railway, with headquarters at Kansas City. He accepted the trust and served the companies until he received the appointment of general agent of the Southwestern Railway Association. He remained as general agent until March, 1879, when he received the appointment of general western freight agent of the Chicago & Alton road, with headquarters at Kansas City and St. Louis. His ability as a manager was of such a high character as to be quickly recognized by the Chicago & Alton Company, and he was called to the office of general freight agent, with headquarters at Chicago, in September, 1851. This position he now maintains. Mr. Courtwright's experience as a railroad man is varied and extensive, and he is possessed of complete knowledge of the minute details of a business which is almost gigantic. Mr. Courtwright was married at Morrison, Ill., in 1860, to Miss Nettie M. Burton.

AUGUSTUS NEWMAN, assistant general freight agent of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, was born in New York City, December 1, 1840. During his boyhood, he attended the common schools of his native city, but at the early age of thirteen he commenced to earn his own living, and went into the employment of Moran Brothers, foreign bankers. He took the position of bank messenauditor, and, at the time of his resignation, held the office of general passenger agent. He then came to the United States, and two years later re-entered active service, taking the position of general ticket and passenger agent for the North Missouri Railroad. He held that place from March 22, 1870, to July 13, 1871, and then was called to take charge of the general passenger department of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, with headquarters in this city. Mr. Charlton, who has passed more than one-third of his life in the railway service, has lost none of his youthful energy and activity, but gives the business of his department his constant and active supervision. He has for a number of years had a valuable assistant in his son, James Charlton, Jr., who now holds the office of assistant passenger agent, and who possesses in a high degree the diversity of talents required in the management of the passenger traffic.

ger, and by prompt and careful attention to his work was rewarded with a promotion to assistant bookkeeper and correspondent, remaining with this firm from March 21, 1854, to April, 1862. He then came west, and on May 1, 1862, entered the railway service. He took a clerkship in the treasurer's office of the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad in this city, and by devoting the same careful attention to his work as in his past business experience, he won the favor of his superior officers, and was gradually promoted until he obtained the position he now holds. From clerk in the treasurer's office, he was elevated to the post of military freight and passenger accountant, and also to that of general bookkeeper. From January, 1865, to June, 1871, he was the general ticket agent of the company in this city, and then received the appointment of assistant general freight agent. Mr. Newman has worked steadily and faithfully for the Chicago & Alton Railroad for twenty-three years, and his persistency and devotion to his duties make a fitting example which the young men of to-day may well follow. Mr. Newman was married to Miss Chanley, of Buffalo, N. Y., in 1873. They have two daughters living, named Ada and Stella; the eldest daughter, Margie, died June 1, 1884.

JAMES CHARLTON, who for the past fourteen years has held the position of general passenger and ticket agent of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, is one of the oldest officials in point of service of any of the representatives of lines leading to this city. Mr. Charlton is an Englishman by birth, having been born at Bothal, Northumberland, May 15, 1832. He received his school training in the public institutions of his native town, but at the age of fifteen commenced to earn his own living by entering the railway service. In April, 1847, he took a position as junior clerk on the Newcastle & Carlisle Railway, at Newcastle-on-Tyne. He was in the service of that road for ten years, and from the inferior position of clerk was elevated to the chief clerkship of the freight department, and afterward to cashier of the road. In the early spring of 1857, Mr. Charlton emigrated to America, took up his abode in Canada, and obtained the post of assistant to the chief clerk of the auditing department, and was given charge of the statistics and freight accounts of the Great Western Railway of Canada, at Montreal. During his eleven years of service with this, Canada's greatest railway corporation, Mr. Charlton was promoted to the higher positions which his ability and energy easily won for him. As the routine promotions occurred, he ascended to the rank of chief clerk of the auditing department, then was made tary Tract road was completed to Galesburg in December, 1854, and in July, 1855, trains commenced to run to Burlington, Iowa. It had been the intention of the Peoria & Oquawka Company to construct the road from Peoria to Burlington, but it became embarrassed, and entered into an agreement with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and the Central Military Tract roads, by which the section between Galesburg and Burlington was completed by the latter corporation. A conditional agreement was also entered into by which the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Central Military Tract and the Northern Cross roads also completed the latter (at about the same time), from Galesburg one hundred miles west to Quincy. In the meantime, by act of the Legislature, passed February 14, 1855, the name of the Chicago & Aurora was changed to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, and on July 9, 1856, that corporation and the Central Military Tract were consolidated, under the former name. The Northern Cross and the Peoria & Oquawka companies were purchased after several proceedings against them, culminating in foreclosure by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, which now operated two hundred and ten miles of road, including the thirty miles from Chicago to the Junction, used in common with the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad Company. The depot of that company was also used by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.

In 1856, ten acres of land were purchased of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Company, on the South Branch, adjoining North Street and Stewart Avenue, for the accommodation of the grain elevator business and of a rapidly increasing lumber trade, and a contract was entered into with the Illinois Central for

THE CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD COMPANY was formerly known as the Aurora Branch road. At the time of declaring its first semi-annual dividend, in June, 1854, when the Aurora Branch (and by change of name to Chicago & Aurora) line had been completed to Mendota, the earnings amounted to $60,700. This point was at the junction of the Illinois Central and the connection with the Central Military Tract road, eighty-three miles west of Chicago. The dividend of $3 per share was paid in July. The Central Military the use of their grounds for the passenger traffic. The large increase of business had made it necessary to purchase land adjoining the lumber grounds on the South Branch, the tract extending westerly along North Street, about two thousand feet, and comprising the south half of blocks 48, 49 and 50. Before the consolidation there had been expended upon the Central Military Tract and the parent road $1,294,668. By June, 1858, the whole amount expended upon the entire system was over eight million dollars. The officers of the company for 1857-58 were: John Van Nortwick, president; Chas. G. Hammond, superintendent; Amos T. Hall, secretary and treasurer; Samuel Powell, ticket agent; and William Martin, general freight agent. During the next year the company purchased the Burlington ferry boats, to run between Quincy and Hannibal, in connection with the Hannibal & St. Joe Railroad. In the spring of 1861, Messrs. Munger, Armour & Dole finished the largest elevator in the city, with a capacity of eight hundred thousand bushels. It was leased by the company for ten years. A slip was also built into the depot grounds, that the grain might be elevated from vessels directly into the warehouses.

It was during this year, that James H. Stipp, representing the Jacksonville & Savannah Railroad, and Judge Henry L. Bryant, acting for the Peoria & Hannibal Railroad, entered into a contract with James F. Joy and J. W. Brooks, in behalf of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Company, giving them a perpetual lease of that portion of both roads upon which labor was expended, on condition that the purchasers should complete and equip the road; which was accordingly done, to Lewiston, in June, 1862. By June, 1863, the construction and equipment account had amounted to $12,373,000; capital stock, $5,738,000; funded debt, $11,841,000. The great increase in business during that year made the addition of sixteen locomotives necessary; also of many cars to replace a number taken for government use, on a requisition from Major-General U. S. Grant. The depot grounds were enlarged by the purchase of the south one-half of block 47, and fifteen hundred feet further west on North, now Sixteenth, Street. In July, 1862, the extensive new freight and transfer houses were occupied, and between that time and the spring of 1863, a second huge elevator was constructed by Messrs. Armour, Dole & Co. In October of this year 1863, that portion of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road, between Peoria and Burlington, was sold under foreclosure of the mortgage held by Messrs. Moss & Harding, the contractors, and purchased by the trustees of this company. In the fall of 1862, another purchase of land was made, near the Peoria & Burlington line, and in June, 1864, a consolidation was effected with that company. The system then included the line from Chicago to Burlington, via Galesburg, the Chicago & Aurora line, being in course of completion, amounting to two hundred and four miles, Galesburg to Quincy, one hundred miles; Galesburg to Peoria, fifty-three miles; and Yates City to Lewiston, thirty miles. The total number of miles then in operation was four hundred, and the outlay, up to April 30, 1864, exceeded $15,000,000. The company then owned all the land lying between the Galena & Chicago Union road, the river and Sixteenth Street, formerly North Street. Including the ground which it had recently purchased for stock yards, on Western Avenue, just within the city limits, and near the Chicago & Aurora track, the company owned seventy-five acres in the city. It also owned a water front of three thousand and two hundred feet. During the year, the new line from Chicago to Aurora was entirely completed, and the ten miles of double track to Lyons finished. A new set of officers also was elected: James F. Joy, president; Robert Harris, superintendent; Amos T. Hall, secretary and treasurer; Henry Martin, general freight agent; and Samuel Powell, general ticket agent. In June, 1865, a contract was entered into with the Burlington & Missouri Company, to extend the road fifty-six miles west, to a point one hundred and thirty-two miles west of Burlington. During the year 1866-67, an agreement was entered into with the Hannibal & St. Joe Company, by which the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company should become purchasers of its securities for ten years, convertible into preferred stock, at $120,000 per year.

The first pile under the east abutment of the Burlington bridge, was driven January 30, 1867. High water drove off the workmen, but in March, 1868, the last stone was placed in the main structure. Its total cost was $1,227,000. The first train passed over the bridge August 13, 1868. In June, 1869, the bridge at Kansas City, the western terminus of the Hannibal & St. Joe Company, opened the connection from Chicago to all the Kansas roads. The Burlington & Missouri line was being rapidly completed to Omaha. The bridge at Quincy, which was completed soon after, was built by a bridge company, and did not interfere with the finances of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road. The road from Lewiston to Rushville was opened to the public July 18, 1869, at an additional cost of $340,000 to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; the Keokuk & St. Paul, bought by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, was completed to Burlington, October 27, 1869, at a cost to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy of $562,000; Dixon, Peoria & Hannibal Railroad, from Buda to Elmwood, February 1, 1870, at a cost of $895,000. During 1869-70, about one hundred and twenty-five miles of road were built, making over six hundred miles in operation.

In June, 1870, the St. Louis division of the road, which had been constructed as the Rockford, Rock Island & St. Louis Railroad, was thrown open to traffic from Beardstown to Busnell, the money for its construction being raised principally by the citizens of Fulton County. The road was not purchased by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy until six years thereafter. During the succeeding year the Quincy & Warsaw line was constructed from Quincy to Carthage; the Ottawa, Oswego & Fox River Valley Road from Aurora to Streator, January 15, 1871, and from Aurora to Geneva, May 1, 1871, there connecting with the Chicago & North-Western; and the Illinois & Grand Trunk, from Mendota to Prophetstown. On May 14, 1871, the system in operation embraced seven hundred and sixty-one and one-half miles of road, the local traffic was maintained, and the through business was rapidly increased.

That year is marked by a change in the management of the company, James M. Walker succeeding Mr. Joy as president.

The following table, bearing upon the business of the road, is self-explanatory.

CHARLES GOODRICH HAMMOND, deceased, the son of Chester and Fannie (Goodrich) Hammond, was born at Bolton, Conn., June 4, 1804. At the age of four years, his father removed to Smyrna, Chenango Co., N. Y., where young Hammond attended the District School and the Academy at Whitesboro', of which latter institution he subsequently became principal. Mr. Hammond's parents intended him for the ministry, but failing health induced him to decide upon a less sedentary occupation, and he therefore established himself in Canandaigua as a merchant. As a business man he met with no great success, and in his mercantile career he removed to Detroit, in 1834, and to Union City, Branch Co., Mich., in 1836. The bent of his mind was quite intellectual as well as executive, and it was soon seen by his fellow citizens that he was fitted to conduct public affairs and to manage large interests. In 1839, he was sent to the Legislature where he soon became a leading member of the Judiciary Committee. He became auditor general, under Governor Barry, and did much to reform the tax and financial systems of the state. During President Polk's administration, he served as deputy-collector at Detroit, and in May, 1852, he brought the Michigan Central Railroad into Chicago, removing to this city and taking charge of the freight department of the road. As this was the first line opened from the east, it required a man of great energy and executive ability to systematize its business. Mr. Hammond was equal to the task, however, and made such a reputation for himself within the next three years, that when the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad was opened between the first two points, in March, 1855, he was chosen to become its superintendent. Under his management, the road became one of the most prosperous in the West, the superintendent inspiring his energy and fairness of dealing into the actions of his humblest subordinates. His great labors, however, had so worn upon him that he was obliged to resign his position and take a trip to Europe for his health. Restored in strength, his activities did not long languish, for, in the fall of 1869, he was chosen to the general superintendency of the Union Pacific road. After putting it into good working order, at the expense of a second shattering of health, he was forced to resign, and soon afterward accepted the vice-presidency of Pullman's Palace Car Company, a position not so arduous in its labors. At the re-organization of the Relief and Aid Society, soon after the great fire, Mr. Pullman was elected treasurer. The actual burden of the labor fell upon Colonel Hammond, who there showed his usual foresight, ability and kindness of heart. In 1871, also, he was elected one of the inspectors of the House of Correction. From early manhood, Colonel Hammond had been marked by his faithful, religious and benevolent work. He was one of the committee which, in May, 1853, drafted articles of faith, covenant and rules for the establishment of the New England Congregational Church, and was ever an earnest supporter of that denomination and organization. He was one of the founders of the Chicago Theological Seminary, and, in 1858, when that noble institution was threatened with financial ruin, he, with a few other generous citizens, rescued it from its peril. Colonel Hammond also served as president of the Home for the Friendless for a number of years previous to his death. The following account of Colonel Hammond's death is taken substantially from the Chicago Tribune of April 16, 1884:—"Colonel C. G. Hammond died suddenly yesterday afternoon, in the eighth year of his age. Entering Marshall Field's retail establishment, accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Max Hjortsberg, he sat down on the bench near the entrance, to wait until she completed her shopping. He was approached by two acquaintances, and they began chatting, Colonel Hammond repeating a formerly expressed opinion, that it was better to give to charitable objects during life than to wait until one drew up his will. He then mentioned the name of a friend who had died recently, and his head suddenly dropped on his breast. His companions took it for a sign of grief, but the next moment saw that the aged gentleman had fainted. Assistance was called for, and in five minutes the stupor had deepened into death, notwithstanding all that medical skill could do. The body was laid out on the counter, and shortly afterward was removed to the house of the deceased. The funeral services took place from the New England Congregational Church, which Colonel Hammond had been so instrumental in establishing more than thirty years previously." At Whitesboro', N. Y., while principal of the academy, the deceased met his wife, Charlotte B. Doolittle, daughter of General Doolittle of revolutionary fame, a highly accomplished lady, who, with two daughters, Mrs. Hjortsberg, of Chicago, and Mrs. J. R. Nichols, of Salt Lake City, survive him.

THOMAS J. POTTER, vice-president and general manager of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born in Carroll County, Ohio, August 16, 1840, the son of John and Nancy Potter. He received his education at the common schools of that county, and, in July, 1862, entered the employment of the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad, as lineman in the engineer's corps, where he remained for six months. In January, 1866, he entered the service of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, as station agent at Albia, Iowa, from which position he was advanced to that of fuel and claim agent of the same road, at Burlington, Iowa, occupying that position until January, 1873, when he was made general agent at Creston, Iowa. In August, 1873, he became assistant superintendent of the Iowa Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, with headquarters at the same place, and retained that situation until February, 1875, when he was promoted to the superintendency of that division, comprising the various lines operating in Iowa. In June, 1878, Mr. Potter became general superintendent of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, with his headquarters at Burlington, Iowa, and, in December, 1879, was made assistant general manager, with his headquarters in Chicago. In November, 1880, he was made general manager, and, in November, 1881, was also made third vice-president, and, in September, 1884, was made first vice-president and general manager as above. Mr. Potter is likewise vice-president and general manager of the following railroads: St. Louis, Keokuk & Northwestern; Kansas City, St. Joe & Council Bluffs; Chicago, Burlington & Kansas City; Chicago & Iowa; and is vice-president of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad. Mr. Potter was married on May 21, 1863, to Miss Urdilla J. Wood, of Ottumwa, Iowa; they have three children, William T. S., Fannie H., and Mary.

WILLIAM MCCREDIE, freight auditor of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born in Wigtonshire, Scotland, in 1832, the son of William and Margaret (McKinnon) McCredie. He received a country school education during his very early years, but at the age of thirteen hired out as a farmer's boy, and worked during the summer and attended school in winter, and thus acquired the most of his scholastic training. In 1848, he left his native shire and went to Glasgow, where he made his entry into the railroad business, as an office-boy of the Edinburgh & Glasgow Railway. He remained there nine years, with the exception of one year, when he was an employe of the Caledonian Railway, of Scotland. During this period, also, Mr. McCredie was gaining additional learning, as for five years he attended to his office duties during the day, and studied at night-school after office hours. It is, therefore, easy to comprehend how he rose from office-boy, through the various gradations, to the position of senior clerk. On April 8, 1857, he left Scotland and came to the United States, landing in New York; from whence he went to London, Canada, and stayed for a month; after which he came to Chicago, and immediately entered the employment of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway, as clerk in the general freight office, being promoted to various positions until, in 1865, he was appointed to his present position. Mr. McCredie was married, in 1869, to Miss Jeanie Logan Stewart, of Aurora, Kane Co., Ill. They have had two sons, who died, in 1881, of scarlet fever, aged seven and eight years respectively, and the sudden loss of whom caused the one great agony of their parents' lives. One daughter, Jeanie, still remains to them.

L. A. HOWLAND, assistant superintendent of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born in October, 1834, at Barre, Vt., the son of Arnold and Harriet (Wright) Howland. He received a partial education at the common schools of Burlington, Vt., and commenced his first permanent employment as passenger brakeman on the Rutland & Burlington Railroad, where he remained three years, and then went as baggageman on the Boston & Burlington Railroad, where he continued for two and one-half years. In the winter of 1856-57, he came to Chicago, and became a freight conductor on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, continuing in that capacity two and a half years, and, in the fall of 1859, was made passenger conductor, which situation he retained until February 17, 1879, when he was appointed trainmaster, at Chicago, in charge of the passenger service. On November 15, 1880, he was further promoted to the assistant superintendency of the Galesburg division, with headquarters at Galesburg, remaining there for seven months, when he was made assistant superintendent of the passenger service, at Chicago, and was transferred here June 20, 1881, since which time he has remained in that position. He took Masonic degrees in Alpha Lodge, No. 55, A. F. & A. M., and in the chapter and commandery, at Galesburg; subsequently jettimiting from the commandery, and affiliating with Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., of this city. He was married on January 15, 1860, to Miss Ellen Jane Keyes, of Bellows Falls, Vt.

JAMES M. WALKER was born in Claremont, N. H., February 14, 1820. While still quite young, he removed, with his father, to Farmington, Mich. Entering the University of Michigan as a sophomore, he graduated with unusual honors in 1849. His prospects were of the most brilliant nature, and when he was admitted to the Bar, at Ann Arbor, he at once took his place among its leaders. In a comparatively short period of time, he was made State's Attorney for Washtenaw County. He became also local attorney for the Michigan Central Railroad. So successful was he in his practice that the railway looked for a larger and more important field for the lawyer who promised to be of so great service to them. In 1853, he came to Chicago, as the attorney for that road in this city. Very shortly after settling here, he was appointed general solicitor for the company. From the inception of the railroad—now known as the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy—he became its general solicitor, and so continued to the day of his death. He was elected president of the company in the year 1871. He was also president and legal adviser of the Union Stock Yards of Chicago, from the time they began business, and bore the same relations to the Chicago & Wilmington Coal Company. During the years 1870-75, he was president, as well, of the Leavenworth, Lawrence & Galveston Railroad, and managing director of all the so-called "Joy roads," in Kansas. It was as early as 1855, that Wirt Dexter entered Mr. Walker's office as a student, soon to become a junior partner and the life-long friend of his instructor. From that time, their names were constantly associated, even after Mr. Walker had retired from the active pursuit of his profession. Identified for years with so many great corporations, he became a complete master of the complicated law which governs their being, and which he had been largely instrumental in creating. It was the willing tribute of the profession and the country that, in corporation law, his opinion was final and his authority unexcelled. Coming suddenly, January 22, 1881, his death was a sad blow to the hundreds of loving friends his sterling traits had won and a loss to the community he had honored.

L. O. GODDARD, assistant solicitor of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born in 1845, in Wayne Co., N. Y., the son of Lester O. and Mabel (Robinson) Goddard. In 1854, he was brought to Lenawee County, Mich., and there received his primary education in the common schools. He subsequently attended Adrian College for one year, and then matriculated at the University of Michigan, from whence he graduated, with the degree of B. A., in 1867. He then accepted the appointment of superintendent of public schools in the city of Monroe, Mich., in 1868, and remained there until January, 1870, when he went to the University of Michigan again, and attended the law school. In March, 1870, he came to Chicago, and entered the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, as assistant to James M. Walker, who was then general solicitor. He, however, neglected to be admitted to the Chicago Bar until March, 1881; and in 1882 was made assistant secretary of the road. Mr. Goddard has never sought political office or preferment. He is retiring in disposition, carefully avoids newspaper notoriety or comment, and makes the conscientious performance of his duties, and their successful culmination in the interests of the road, his one aim and object. Hence, he daily becomes more valuable as an official and more thorough as a lawyer. Mr. Goddard was married in 1871 to Miss Martha E. Sterling, daughter of Joseph M. Sterling, of Monroe, Mich. They have two children, Joseph Sterling and Emma.

GEORGE C. SMITH, chief engineer of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born at Potsdam, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., on December 31, 1837, the son of Justus and Fanny (Chipman) Smith. He received the principal part of his early education in Potsdam, although he attended school in Burlington, Vt., whither he removed, with his mother, in 1854, his father having died in 1851. His curriculum comprised the common and high school studies, and his first entry into business was as an apprenticed machinist, at Burlington, Vt., in 1854, and as an advanced apprentice, at Lawrence, Mass., in 1855. He came from that city to Chicago in 1857, and worked here as a machinist, afterward occupying the same position on the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad, then known as the Terre Haute, Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad. In 1859, Mr. Smith went to Aurora, and worked for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, and, in 1860, worked as machinist for the Chicago & North-Western Railway, continuing in its employment until 1861. In the early part of that year, he enlisted in Company "E," 17th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, recruiting at Galesburg, which company he was elected orderly sergeant. He was a participant in the battles of Frederick, Mo., Fort Donelson, Sals., and was also in many minor engagements and skirmishes at, in the investment of Vicksburg. About June, 1861, he was commissioned second lieutenant of his company, and was subsequently made captain of the same company. In the commencement of 1864, Captain Smith resigned his commission, and, after working for the Chicago & North-Western Railway as machinist for a short time, went to Colorado, where he remained three years, returning to Chicago early in 1865, and again working at his trade. In December, 1868, he worked for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad in the engineer department, where he has since remained, successively occupying the positions of assistant engineer, assistant chief engineer of the lines in Illinois from 1881 until 1882, and being appointed to his present position in January, 1884. During this period in the engineer department, however, he acted for about five months as purchasing agent. He was married on March 16, 1871, to Miss Amelia Richburg, of Chicago.

F. C. SMITH, cashier of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born in Potsdam, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., in 1834, the son of Justus and Fanny (Chipman) Smith. His father was a merchant of Potsdam, and a man of prominence, not only in that town, but in the country surrounding. Mr. Smith received his education in St. Lawrence Academy, Potsdam, and, when he was eighteen years old, went to Boston, and became an employé of the firm of Pierce & Bacon, general commission merchants and cotton dealers, where he remained for about three years, and then came to Chicago. At that time, he had two brothers in this city, J. H. and S. C. Smith, who were engaged in the grain and commission business, under the firm name of J. H. Smith & Co. and with this firm Mr. Smith engaged; but upon the death of one of his brothers, in 1857, the firm was dissolved, and, in July of that year, he entered the employment of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road, as general accountant in the treasurer's department, in this city—Amos T. Hall being, at that time, treasurer. Mr. Smith occupied that position until about 1864, when he was made receiving cashier in the same office, and held that situation until 1872, when he was made cashier, which position he has since retained without intermission. Mr. Smith was married, in 1862, to Miss Martha L. Parks, of Whitehall, N. Y., the daughter of an old settler of that region. They have two children, William Parke and Clarence Warren.

E. P. RIPLEY, general freight agent of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1845, the son of Charles P. and Ann R. (Payson) Ripley, both of whom were residents of Boston. In that city, young Ripley received his education at the renowned common and high schools; and there, also, made his entry into commercial life as a dry goods clerk, in 1863. This business, however, was not congenial to him, and, therefore, after giving it a thorough trial, he entered into the railroad business as contracting agent of the Union Line at Boston, his office being located in that city. This was in 1866, and he remained in that position two years, after which he became clerk in the office of the general eastern agent of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, at Boston, and remained there about two years, after which he was appointed New England agent of the same road at Boston, and occupied that situation until 1876, when he was appointed general eastern agent of the road at Boston and New York, and there remained until 1878, in June of which year he was appointed to his present position, and came to this city. Mr. Ripley was married, in 1870, to Miss Frances E. Harding, of Boston. They have four children, Alice H., Frances P., Robert H. and Fred. C. Mr. Ripley is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and belongs to Union Lodge, of Dorchester, Mass.

THE PITTSBURGH, FORT WAYNE & CHICAGO RAILROAD (operated by the Pennsylvania Company) was originally chartered as the Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, in 1852, and consolidated with the Pittsburgh Division, in November, 1856, under the title of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad Company. The line was opened to Pittsburgh, four hundred and sixty-seven miles, on Christmas morning of the year 1858. The first train of cars which left the West Side for the seaboard, started at 7:20 a. m. on that day, from the Rock Island Depot, on Van Buren Street, corner of Sherman, carrying the United States mail for Philadelphia. A salute of thirteen guns was fired in honor of the occasion.

Although terminating in Chicago this line is not considered peculiarly a home institution, its general offices being in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. After passing through a struggling existence for a number of years, the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, with William B. Ogden as receiver, was reorganized under special enactments of the Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. On the 24th of October, 1861, the road was sold at auction, at Cleveland, by John Ferguson and Thomas E. Walker, trustees and master commissioners. The sale took place at the south door of the Court-House, there being four bids; $60,000, $75,000, $80,000 and $2,000,000. The purchaser was J. F. D. Lanier, of Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York, in behalf of himself, Samuel J. Tilden, John Edgar Thompson (who had been president of the old road), Samuel Hanna and L. H. Meyer. The Ohio & Pennsylvania, Ohio & Indiana and the Fort Wayne & Chicago companies' first-mortgage bonds, with accrued interest, were merged into a new issue of $5,350,000 sinking-fund bonds, secured by a first mortgage over the whole road. A second mortgage of like amount, secured bonds to be awarded to the holders of the second-mortgage bonds of the old companies, and a third mortgage of $2,000,000 secured the interest on bonds to be given to the holders of the old real-estate bonds and other classes of old indebtedness. Stock for $6,000,000 drew six per cent. dividend, the balance of the net earnings.

In 1871, the main line from Chicago to Pittsburgh was four hundred and sixty-eight miles in length, with thirty-two miles of connecting roads, made up a system of five hundred miles. The officers of the road that year were: Thomas A. Scott, president; William Thaw, vice-president; J. N. McCulloch, general manager; F. R. Myers, general passenger and ticket agent; W. P. Shum, general agent; W. Stewart, general freight agent.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY.—The Milwaukee & Mississippi Company was formed in the Cream City, in 1849, with Edward D. Holton as president. Seven and a half years from the time ground was first broken in Milwaukee, in April, 1857, the road was completed to Prairie du Chien. In 1859–60, the company being unable to pay its interest, a mortgage sale was advertised. To take advantage of this forced sale, a new company was chartered by the Legislature on April 14, 1860, under the name of the Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railway Company, and its members were Lewis H. Meyer, William P. Lynde, Allen Campbell, William Schall, John Wilkinson, John Catlin, Hercules L. Dousman and N. A. Cowdrey. The purchase was effected January 21, 1861, and the road to Prairie du Chien was managed by them until it was absorbed by the present corporation (then called the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company) in 1866. Byron Kilbourn was president of the line to Prairie du Chien from 1849 to 1851; John Catlin, 1852–56; E. H. Brodhead, 1857; John Catlin, 1858–59; L. H. Meyer, 1860–65; Alexander Mitchell, 1866. The Milwaukee & Watertown Railroad, now the LaCrosse Division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, was incorporated in March, 1851, and the preliminary survey made in 1853. By the latter part of 1856, trains were running from Milwaukee to Columbus. After going through a variety of changes, the road became the Milwaukee &

St. Paul Railroad in 1863, and the LaCrosse Division of the present company in 1866. In April, 1852, the LaCrosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company was incorporated; and in June, 1853, by a consolidation of two other railroad charters, the Milwaukee, Fond du Lac & Green Bay Railroad Company was formed and work begun on a line from Milwaukee toward Fond du Lac. In 1854, the LaCrosse & Milwaukee was consolidated with the Milwaukee, Fond du Lac & Green Bay road; assuming the name of the latter, and pushing on toward LaCrosse, the work begun by the former in the direction of Fond du Lac. In December, 1856, the line was completed to Horicon, fifty-one miles from Milwaukee. The financial crash of 1857 brought a long series of litigations, and the road was in the hands of two rival sets of officers in 1859, having been opened to LaCrosse in 1858. In 1860, it was operated by Hans Crockert, who was appointed receiver by the Court. He continued receiver of the line until 1863, when the Milwaukee & St. Paul Company obtained possession, by purchase, of that portion lying between Portage and LaCrosse. In 1867, the same company secured possession of the balance of the line, or that lying between Portage and Milwaukee. It still remains a part of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway line, designated as its LaCrosse Division. In 1852, the Milwaukee & Horicon road was chartered, and was built from Horicon to Berlin in 1856 and 1857. Remaining in the hands of a receiver, Lindsey Ward, for some time, it was sold to the Milwaukee & St. Paul Company in 1863, and now forms a part of the Northern Division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul lines.

The present Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company grew out of the organization formed May 5, 1863, for the purpose of purchasing all the roads thus far described. That organization consisted of Isaac Seymour, N. A. Cowdrey, Horace Galpen, D. M. Hughes, William Gould, F. P. James and George Smith, of New York; Asahel Finch and William N. White, Milwaukee. They received authority for the purchase of all these lines; but the word "Chicago" was not prefixed until February, 1874, the line between the two cities having been constructed during the previous year. D. M. Hughes was president of the road in 1863 and 1864, and Alexander Mitchell has filled that position since, including 1865. The vice-presidents of the road, up to 1872, were, G. W. Rogers, 1863–64; Russell Sage, 1865; Walter S. Gurnee, 1866–67; and Russell Sage for seven years thereafter. Russell Sage, Jr., was secretary for the first two years; A. Cary from 1865 to 1868, inclusive; and R. D. Jennings from that year until long after 1871. The treasurers have been A. Cary, 1863 to 1867, inclusive; succeeded by R. D. Jennings. E. H. Goodrich was general manager for the first two years, and S. S. Merrill from that time to date, with the exception of 1873, when John C. Gault held the position.

JOSEPH FRANCIS TUCKER, assistant general manager of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, is perhaps better known to the shippers, and western people generally than any other railroad man in the west. His long connection with the Illinois Central Railroad, covering a period of over twenty-eight years, has served to make his name most familiar with those who have been at all concerned in railroad matters. Mr. Tucker was born in the Pine Tree State, the place of nativity being Saco, Me. The date of his birth is September 29, 1835, and he passed his boyhood in his native town. When Mr. Tucker became of age he was a resident of Illinois, and on September 15, 1856, he entered the railroad service. From 1856 to 1861, he was ticket agent, and during the following two years he was secretary to the president of the road. In 1863, he was appointed general freight agent of the company, and held that position for ten consecutive years. In 1873, he was made general superintendent, and he vacated that office, to take the important post of traffic manager, in 1876. Mr. Tucker remained in that capacity for a little over seven years, and then terminated his connection with the Illinois Central Railroad. In October, 1884, he was selected as arbitrator of the Trans-Continental Traffic Association and California, Colorado and Utah Pool. In 1885, having been tendered the position of assistant general manager of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road, he resigned his office as arbitrator, and again entered into active service as a railroad manager.

T. W. WADSWORTH, general agent of the passenger department of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, was born in New Hartford, Conn., December 28, 1828. His father was Tertius Wadsworth, who died in Hartford, in 1872. The subject of this sketch passed his boyhood in Connecticut until he was eighteen years of age, and received his education at the common schools of his native state. In 1847, he decided to come to Chicago, where his brother, Elisha S. Wadsworth, had located in 1836. Upon arriving here, he first engaged in the employ of Wadsworth, Dyer & Chapin, and afterward in the insurance business, remaining in that about three years, when he went into the wholesale boot and shoe trade with George M. Wells, now a resident of Massachusetts. The firm of Wadsworth & Wells continued successfully for a number of years, and then Mr. Wadsworth became interested in an omnibus company which did business between the South and West sides. In June, 1862, C. F. Loomis, W. R. Loomis and Mr. Wadsworth, under the firm name of C. F. Loomis & Co., opened the Cottage Grove Stock Yards. They continued until the establishment of the Union Stock Yards a short time later, when all the small yards of the city closed up. Mr. Wadsworth was actively engaged up to this time in business, and during his connection with the enterprise in which he was interested, he came in contact with the leading business men of the country, and his character as a man of integrity and ability was recognized as of the very highest standard. During the past ten years, he has been connected with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, of which corporation his brother, Julius Wadsworth, is now vice-president. He was contracting agent in this city for the company, and later was made assistant general agent of the passenger department. In April, 1855, he was appointed general agent, which office he holds at the present time. On June 16, 1855, Mr. Wadsworth was elected a director of the Fargo & Southern Railway, of which corporation he has been secretary and treasurer since 1852. He is also a director in the Chicago & Evanston Railway, and has held the offices of secretary and treasurer for some years past. In the early days when the property owners of Chicago were the chief components of the fire department, Mr. Wadsworth was among those who belonged to a company and "ran" with the machine. He was a member of Engine Company No. 3 for about ten years, and was one of its most active members, participating in every fire that his engine was called to (see page 233, vol. 1). He was secretary of the Firemen's Benevolent Association in 1853-4, and is still a member of that body (see page 236, Vol. 1). Mr. Wadsworth was married July 10, 1855, to Miss Caroline B. Ellsworth, of Chicago, at Binghamton, N. Y. They have two daughters—Helen C. and Georgiana. It must be a great source of pleasure to such men as Mr. Wadsworth, when they can look back upon a life devoted to the pursuits of a business which has brought its rewards—rewards not only in a handsome competence, but rich in the thoughts of achievements against great odds and triumphs over hardships which may be the source of vital encouragement to the younger generation which follows.

UNION DEPOT.—In July, 1858, specifications were drawn up for a new union depot, to accommodate the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago, the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac, the Chicago & Milwaukee and the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis railroad companies. It was to be the largest depot in the west, eighty feet wider than the Central depot, at the foot of Lake Street, and about the same length. This depot, however, got no further than the plans. There was so much rivalry between the West and North divisions of the city for the location, that ground was not broken on Canal Street, near Madison, until 1861. A temporary structure was erected during the latter part of that year, and in March, 1862, it was struck by lightning and burned. The fire occurred shortly after one o'clock a. m., and Captain H. J. Spaulding, formerly connected with the Michigan Central Company, then depot master, had a very narrow escape from death. At first he saved the tickets and office effects, and then returned for books and papers. A current of air closed the door, and Captain Spaulding would have been suffocated had he not been rescued by the watchman. He was seriously burned about the head and shoulders. A large amount of baggage was destroyed, as well as the entire eastern mail and about $10,000 worth of other property. The damage to the depot was at once repaired, and served the public, after a fashion, for many years—in fact, with additions and slight improvements, until the present magnificent brick structure was erected, in 1881.

During the fall of 1862, the Fort Wayne Company extended the new freight house several hundred feet south, and, finally, from Madison Street, along the river bank, to Adams Street.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.—The original charter in Illinois was granted February 27, 1847, to the Rock Island & LaSalle Railroad Company. This road was chartered for fifty years, the line to extend from Rock Island to "the Illinois River, at the termination of the Illinois & Michigan Canal." The capital stock was $300,000, and the commissioners appointed to receive subscriptions were Joseph Knox, F. R. Burnet, N. B. Buford, William Vandever and Nathaniel Belcher, of Rock Island County; Joshua Harper and James G. Bolmer, of Henry County; Cyrus Bryant, Justus Stephens and R. T. Templeton, of Bureau County; John V. A. Hoes and William H. W. Cushman, of LaSalle County. Although nothing was done under this charter, in the way of actual railroad construction, public attention was called to the feasibility of a line stretching toward the Pacific. The project had been almost slumbering since its inception in 1830, when William C. Redfield, of New York, a traveler in the West, published a report, in which he proposed a route nearly identical with the one finally adopted by the successor of the Rock Island & LaSalle Company; while the feasibility of bridging the Mississippi River at Rock Island had been recognized ever since the first explorers and travelers wandered over to its western banks. The charter of 1847 revived the grandeur of the enterprise, the meetings held in Chicago in favor of "a railroad to the Pacific" being especially enthusiastic, the voice of the "Little Giant" being often heard as an inspiration to the public spirited men of Illinois to "push on." In those days, however, although the spirit was willing indeed, the pocket-book was too weak to sustain it in the accomplishment of so great a work. But the men of the State gifted with the powers of persuasion and foresight, headed by William A. Ogden, were equal to the occasion. In 1850, during the market revival in railroad matters, occasioned by the Illinois Central land-grant, Henry Farnam came to Chicago from New Haven, upon Mr. Ogden's invitation, to assist in the construction of the Galena & Chicago Union road. While here he examined the Rock Island route, and was so impressed with its advantages that he wrote to his friend, Joseph E. Sheffield, a rich capitalist of New Haven, to come to Chicago and also look over the proposed route. This resulted in obtaining a charter and building a road, but not before the charter was so amended as to authorize the construction of the line to Chicago. This amendment was granted February 7, 1851, the name of the road being at the same time changed to the "Chicago & Rock Island." Additional subscriptions of $300,000 were also required and the number of directors increased. Certain tolls were to be paid to the Illinois and Michigan Canal, upon condition that the trustees should grant to the railroad the right of way through the canal lands by the first Monday in June, 1851. By the 13th of February, the requisite amount of new stock had been taken, and by April the surveys, which had been progressing since December, 1850, were nearly completed. During April, 1851, the company was reorganized with John B. Jervis, of New York, president, and William Jervis, chief engineer. On account of high water, the survey was not entirely completed until August. During that month, all surveys and estimates of the line had been made, and on the 25th the executive committee met Messrs. Farnam and Sheffield in New York City, and concluded a contract with them for the construction of the road. They agreed to build and equip the line from Chicago to the Mississippi River for $3,987,688, or nearly $22,000 per mile, to be paid as follows: seven per cent. first mortgage bonds at par, $2,000,000; cash, at the rate of $25,000 per month, $500,000; certificates of full stock at par, bearing interest at ten per cent. and payable in stock when the road was finished, $1,487,688. This contract was approved by the board of directors, who met at Rock Island, on September 17.

The directors and officers of the road, chosen December 22, 1851, were as follows: John B. Jervis, president, New York; James Grant, vice-president, Davenport, Iowa; Elisha C. Litchfield, Detroit; John Stryker, New York; Isaac Cook, assistant treasurer, Chicago; George Bliss, Springfield, Mass.; Lemuel Andrews, Rock Island; N. D. Edwood, secretary, Joliet; T. D. Brewster, Peru; John Stevens, Indiantown; Charles Atkinson, Moline; P. A. Whittaker, Rock Island; Ebenezer Cook, Davenport, Iowa—all the above being directors; Azariah C. Flagg, treasurer, New York; William Jervis, chief engineer.

Work was finally begun on the line from Chicago to the Mississippi River, April 10, 1852, under the superintendency of Mr. Farnam; and in October of that year, the first passenger train passed over the road to Joliet, forty miles. The line was opened to Morris, sixty-two miles, January 5, 1853; to Ottawa, eighty-four miles, February 14; to Peru, one hundred miles, March 21; to Tiskilwa, one hundred and twenty-one miles, September 12; to Sheffield, one hundred and thirty-seven miles, October 12; to Geneseo, one hundred and fifty-nine miles, December 19; and to Rock Island, one hundred and eighty-one miles, February 22, 1854. The original estimate of the cost of the road, including right of way, fencing, and interest on stock to the time of completion, was $4,289,436. On account, however, of the phenomenal success of the enterprise from the start, it was found that the equipment of the road would have to be increased to meet a constantly growing business, and extra locomotives and cars were therefore ordered from Messrs. Farnam and Sheffield, contractors. For other extra work not provided for in the contract or original estimates, they were allowed $291,000. These sums, with the increased cost of right of way and station grounds, and interest on stock issued during the construction of the road, swelled the cost to four and a half million dollars, before the road was finally turned over to the company, July 10, 1854. This was eighteen months earlier than specified in the contract—a rare and commendable instance of energy, ability and good fortune in the history of railroad building. In December, 1854, Henry Farnam, who had been the superintending power in its construction, became president of the road. For the past two years there had been no change in the general officers. The bridge across the Mississippi River at Rock Island was completed April 21, 1855, and on the 6th of May, fifteen days after, trains commenced crossing. One span of two hundred and fifty feet was destroyed by the burning of the steamer "Effie Afton," but, by fall, the damage was repaired. The bridge was placed under the joint control of the Chicago & Rock Island and the Mississippi & Missouri Railroad companies, having been constructed by the issue of the bonds guaranteed by them, and further secured by a deed of trust, executed to A. C. Flagg, treasurer of both corporations.

In the meantime, the first section of the Mississippi & Missouri line, which was afterward to be consolidated with the system east of the river, had been surveyed and the road built. Early in the fall of 1852, parties who wished to put a western extension through Iowa, placed engineers in the field, under Mr. Farnam's direction. Three routes were surveyed, Davenport being the starting-point. The general result having been reported at a meeting held at Davenport, on December 22, 1852, an association was formed, under the general laws of Iowa, its articles being filed February 1, 1853. The route named in the articles of association was from the eastern line of the state of Iowa, at or near Davenport, to the western line of the state, in the vicinity of Council Bluffs. In June of that year, the subscription books were opened, and $500,000 received. A committee, consisting of William B. Ogden, William Wolcott, and Ebenezer Cook, directors, and Henry Farnam, chief engineer, went to Iowa to obtain the necessary rights of way. Upon consultation with citizens of Davenport, Muscatine, Iowa City, and Cedar Rapids, the articles were so amended as to authorize the extension of the line, via Muscatine, to the southern or western boundary of the state, and in a northwesterly direction by way of Cedar Rapids; thus organizing a system of railroads for Central Iowa, whose eastern terminus was the bridge at Rock Island. The first section, that from Davenport to Iowa City, fifty-five miles, and from the junction to Muscatine, twelve miles, was put under contract, August 16, 1853, and completed January 6, 1856. Upon that day, General John A. Dix, of New York, president of the company, delivered speeches at the principal cities interested, and there was general rejoicing by the people all along the line. During the following summer, the land granted by Congress, to aid in the construction of the road, was accepted, in trust, by the state, upon condition that the Mississippi & Missouri line be completed by December 1, 1865.

It will thus be perceived, from this general summary, how a continuous line of road, now a portion of the great Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific system, was completed by the first portion of 1856, and it is necessary to return to a specific narrative of the Chicago & Rock Island road. During 1855, according to the instructions of the stockholders, a grain-house, or elevator, was erected in Chicago, at a cost of $125,000, capable of containing over seven hundred thousand bushels of grain. On the 1st of July, 1856 the time of holding the annual meeting having been changed, the general officers of the road were: Henry Farnam, president; A. C. Flagg, treasurer; Francis H. Tows, secretary; John F. Tracy, superintendent; James L. Elwood, cashier; John P. Babcock, general freight agent; W. L. St. John, general ticket agent. For the first two years, the company's business exhibited as follows: From July, 1854, to July, 1855—passengers, $750,600.51; freight, $473,205.68; mails, $19,000; total, $1,242,906.19. In 1855-56—passengers, $742,722.88; freight, $652,296.86; mails, $21,284.34; total, $1,416,304.08. For the year ending July, 1857, the receipts from all sources increased over $400,000. The only change among the general officers was, that Frank D. Sherman became cashier in place of James L. Elwood, who took Mr. Babcock's place as general freight agent. In July, 1858, E. W. Dunham was elected treasurer, in place of Mr. Flagg. The gold excitement of the next spring induced the company to make extra exertions to obtain its share of the great emigration westward. In March, 1859, therefore, in connection with the Mississippi & Missouri road and the Western Stage Company, it sent passengers through from Chicago to Pike's Peak for the sum of $100, furnishing meals beyond the Missouri River. This, considering the length of the route and the country through which it ran, was so cheap that hundreds, who were preparing wagons and teams for the trip, went by rail and stage instead. About this time, the opposition which the people of St. Louis had shown to the existence of the railroad bridge, which they claimed impeded the navigation of the river, upon which the city depended for the bulk of its business, broke forth into open acts of violence. Various crafts were wrecked, intentionally, it is supposed, and suits for damages were brought against the company. Finally, in June, 1859, the watchman of the bridge found, on the sidewalk and track, a quantity of powder and sulphur, oakum, saltpetre, camphene, brimstone, lath, etc.; in fact, all the paraphernalia of a professional incendiary. It is not known who was the guilty party. The St. Louis Chamber of Commerce embodied the respectable elements of the opposition, employing attorneys to prosecute the bridge company, where navigators brought their suits for damages and were willing to swear that the wrecks which their crafts suffered resulted entirely from the presence of the bridge and were not caused by their carelessness. The principal attorney thus employed in the "legal removal of the Rock Island bridge," was Josiah N. Bissell. In August, 1860, he and his assistant, a Mr. Chadwick, were arrested, through the detective agency of Cyrus P. Bradley, of Chicago, charged with conspiring to burn the bridge. The arrest was made upon the testimony of Captain Bradley, supported by that of John F. Tracy, superintendent of the road; John P. Chapin, W. H. Bradley, a reporter in the United States Court, and others, who had been allowed, through a slit in a very thin partition, both to see and hear a number of interviews between Messrs. Bissell, Chadwick, and Captain Bradley, "the conspirators." According to the case presented by the prosecution, an attempt was to have been made to burn the bridge in September, by one of Mr. Bradley's men, that gentleman undertaking the job in consideration of $10,000, promised by said Bissell. On the 8th of August, however, Mr. Bradley having played into Mr. Bissell's hands long enough to obtain what he supposed was conclusive testimony, the latter was arrested in Chicago, Mr. Chadwick was brought a captive from Rock Island, and the defendants were bound over for trial. Their cases were called in December, but they—especially Mr. Bissell—were given such good characters by Derrick A. January, president of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, and others, that on the 13th of December, 1860, a jury agreed upon a verdict of "not guilty." Although the verdict caused considerable surprise, the cases disappeared from the courts, and gradually from notice.

In April, 1864, the early completion of the Mississippi & Missouri Railroad to the point where it connects with the Union Pacific being assured, and the line being considered of special importance to the interests of the company, the directors entered into a twenty-year contract for a business connection, agreeing, for this privilege, to advance the road $500,000 to aid in its construction. In October, the Mississippi & Missouri Company agreed to transfer its property, with clear title, to any organization which the Chicago & Rock Island might incorporate and designate by December 1, 1865—the road to be purchased for $5,500,000, and completed to Des Moines. The consolidated company was to issue bonds in the sum of $9,000,000, and create a sinking fund sufficient to retire them. In case the consolidation could not be effected, the company to be incorporated by the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company was to issue $7,000,000 in bonds. It was further agreed that the Chicago & Rock Island should operate the road after December 1, 1865, and that unless the mortgages upon the property of the Mississippi & Missouri should be foreclosed by December 1, 1866, and everything done so that a clear title of the road could be given, the contract should be null and void, unless the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company should agree to extend the time for such sale.

The election of officers, held April 1, 1865, resulted as follows: Charles W. Durant, president; John F. Tracy, vice-president; E. W. Dunham, treasurer; Francis H. Tows, secretary; W. L. St. John, superintendent.

By the death of W. L. St. John, on the 15th of August, 1865, the Chicago & Rock Island road lost one of the most promising young men ever connected with the railroad business. Although but thirty-three years of age, he had acquired a name throughout the country for rare executive ability. The deceased was a native of Connecticut, and came to Chicago in 1855, first entering business as a clerk in the general ticket department of the road. He soon gave such marked evidence of his ability that he became general ticket agent, then general freight and ticket agent, and, in 1864, general superintendent. Mr. St. John was unmarried, but left a mother and one sister to mourn his death.

The articles of association of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, of Iowa, were formed May 28, 1866. Charles W. Durant and Francis H. Tows, of New York; John F. Tracy, of Chicago, and Ebenezer Cook, of Davenport, were the parties who formed themselves into an association, in order to purchase the road built by the Mississippi & Missouri Railroad Company also to acquire the lands granted by Congress, May 15, 1856. The capital stock of the corporation was $12,000,000; and the first Board of Directors consisted of Ebenezer Cook, John F. Tracy, David Dows, Thomas T. Sturges, and Oliver Charlick, who were empowered to lease the railroad to any company they might designate. The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and the Chicago & Rock Island companies were consolidated August 20, 1866, the new association being called the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company, its board of directors made to consist of thirteen members, and its capital stock the aggregate amount of both roads. The increase, however, was only $100,000, that being the amount required to be issued by the Iowa company.

For the year ending April 1, 1867, the president and general superintendent of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific was John F. Tracy; treasurer, E. W. Dunham; secretary, Francis H. Tows; assistant general superintendent, P. A. Hall. W. F. Coolbaugh succeeded Mr. Dunham as treasurer the next year, and Ebenezer Cook followed Mr. Tows as secretary.

During the year 1867-68, several important improvements were made. The road was extended to Des Moines, and opened for business on the 9th of September, 1867. New shops were erected also on the thirty acres of land situated about four and a half miles south of its passenger depot. The machine shop was 336 x 112 feet in dimensions; the blacksmith and boiler shop, 344 x 80 feet; car shop, 253 x 80 feet, with a wing of 200 x 80 feet; the round-house had a diameter of 278 feet, with stalls for forty engines. On the 17th of March, 1868, a tornado passed over the new buildings, unroofing a large portion of the machine shop, destroying about three hundred feet of main wall, and demolishing the blacksmith and boiler shops. The damage was so far repaired that the shops were again occupied during the winter of 1868-69.

In 1870, the officers of the road were as follows: John F. Tracy, president; Hugh Riddle, general superintendent; Francis H. Tows, secretary and treasurer; and P. A. Hall, assistant general superintendent.

During the year 1869, a contract was entered into between the company and the United States Government for the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River between Rock Island and Davenport, with a view of changing the location across the island of Rock Island, to accommodate the government works. The proportion to be paid by the railroad company was about $600,000, of which $300,000 was required that year. The bonds of the Railroad Bridge Company were also guaranteed to the amount of $400,000. They were to mature January 1, 1870, and the first mortgage bonds of the Chicago & Rock Island Company, amounting to $1,397,000, on the 10th of July, 1870.

The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific road was opened for business to the Missouri River, at Council Bluffs, June 7, 1869. November 1, 1869, Hugh Riddle was made general superintendent of the road. By this time, also, the land grants made by Congress and the state of Iowa to the Mississippi & Missouri Railroad Company had been adjusted, except in one land district of Iowa, so that the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Company had received, by legislation and purchase, five hundred and fifty-two thousand six hundred and forty-nine acres. A new set of by-laws was adopted, June 4, 1870, and the following officers were elected: John F. Tracy, president; Ebenezer Cook, vice-president; Francis H. Tows, secretary and treasurer; F. D. Sherman, assistant treasurer; Corn Exchange Bank, of New York, register of stock; Hugh Riddle, general superintendent; P. A. Hall, assistant superintendent; George C. Campbell, solicitor.

The year ending April 1, 1871, was an important one in the history of the company. The receipts of the road were $6,028,287.29, and the expenditures $3,495,459.06. On account of construction and equipment, the company expended $1,718,184.51; adding six locomotives to the rolling stock. At this time the equipment of the company consisted of two thousand eight hundred and fifty freight cars, one hundred and forty-five locomotives, fifty-three day coaches and ten sleeping coaches. Over four thousand men were employed. During the year, 1,828,690,104 pounds of freight, and more than 708,000 passengers were transported over the road.

The new bridge, being built by the Government and the railroad company, was not yet completed, although the work being done by the latter to approach the main structure was well advanced. Good progress had been made in the construction of the Chicago & Southwestern Railway, from Washington, Iowa, to Leavenworth, Kas., one hundred and forty-five miles being in operation from the first named point to Princeton. During the year the Land Department had received certificates from the Interior Department for one hundred and sixty thousand three hundred and seventy-three acres, under the act of Congress of June, 1864. The sales amounted to twenty-eight thousand and twenty-two acres, for the sum of $213,575.

The division of the road known as the Chicago & Southwestern was opened October 9, 1871. The branches begun or completed in 1871 equaled in distance two hundred and thirty-nine miles, which includes the road between Centerville, Iowa, and Cameron, Mo., and the connections with the new bridge at Leavenworth, Kas. The system, then actually operated by the road, was as follows: Chicago to Davenport, one hundred and eighty-three miles; Davenport to Council Bluffs, three hundred and ten miles; Washington, Iowa, to Leavenworth, Kas., two hundred and seventy-three miles; DeMoines, Indianola & Winterset line, forty-seven miles; Bureau Junction & Peoria, forty-six miles; Washington & Sigourney, Iowa, twenty-nine miles; Atchison branch, twenty-nine miles; from Centerville, Mo., to Cameron, Iowa, one hundred and twenty-nine miles. Total, one thousand and forty-six miles.

RANSOM R. CABLE, president of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, was born in Athens County, Ohio, in 1834, the son of Hiram and Rachel (Henry) Cable. During his early life he received but sparse educational advantages, the tuition imparted at the common schools of Athens County being all that he obtained. But a desire for liberal attainments, and a determination to acquire them, united to a rare faculty for study and the retention of the valuable part of the study pursued, matured the intellect of the student, and more than supplied the early want of an imparted course of science and literature. Hence, at the age of seventeen, he is found engaged as a partner in the lumber business, superintending the work in the forests, and actively participating in the general management. These supervisory duties he retained until 1856; and came west, in 1857, to Rock Island, and from thence went to Valley City, nine miles north of Davenport, where he remained as the proprietor of a flouring mill, until 1859. He then became engaged in the coal and railroad business at Rock Island, Ill., and subsequently accepted the position of president of the Rock Island & Peoria Railroad, which he retained until 1880. In connection with these offices, he was also manager of the old Rockford, Rock Island & St. Louis Railroad, for the four years from 1871 until 1874. His extensive railroad experience and manifest capability in the management of railroad business, led to the proffer of the position to Mr. Cable, in 1880, that he now occupies, and which he, in that year, accepted. During 1880, also, Mr. Cable removed to this city, of which he has since been a permanent and valuable resident, prominent chiefly by his unostentatious performance of all the duties, official, social and political, which have devolved upon him, and becoming honored and esteemed by all with whom those duties have brought him in contact. Mr. Cable was married twice; the second time to Miss Jane Binford, of Rock Island; and has four children, Hiram S., Josephine, Fanny and Benjamin.

HUGH RIDDLE is one of the oldest railway men in the western country, and commenced his experience in the engineering department on the construction of the New York & Erie Railway, in 1846, and remained in that connection until the completion of the road. In 1851, he was appointed resident engineer of the Silver Creek and State Line Division of the Buffalo & State Line Railroad, and occupied that position until the road was completed to the Pennsylvania state line, when, in 1852, he entered the engineering department of the Canandaigua & Niagara Falls Railroad. In 1853, he returned to the Erie Railway, to accept the position of assistant engineer, which he retained until he was made division superintendent, in 1855. In 1865, Mr. Riddle was made general superintendent of the same road, which position he resigned in 1869, and, on November 1, accepted the position of superintendent of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway. Mr. Riddle subsequently occupied the positions of vice-president and president, resigning the latter position in June, 1883. He is still a member of the directorate of the road, and also a member of the Western Truck Line Committee of Arbitration.

AEL KIMBALL, vice-president and general superintendent of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, is a native of New Hampshire, and his boyhood and the early years of manhood were passed in the New England States. Mr. Kimball is one of the oldest railroad men in the west, having been connected with different corporations all through his life. When a young man, he went into service on the Connecticut River Railroad, remaining there for a short time. He next engaged with the Cocheo (New Hampshire) Railroad, and subsequently was connected with the Newburyport (Massachusetts) Railroad. In 1836, realizing the grand opportunities presented to energetic and ambitious young men in the Great West, he concluded to cast his lines among the stirring people of Iowa. In that year he went into the employ of the Mississippi & Missouri Railroad Company, which operated a railway from Davenport to Iowa City. He took the position of master mechanic, and held the same for two years. In 1838, he was promoted to the superintendency of the same line, and filled that office for eight years. In 1866, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific commenced its rapid stride forward as a successful railroad, and the demand for men of superior ability and tried experience, to take its management, became necessary. The excellent reputation which Mr. Kimball had won during his ten years' residence in the West, was well known to the Rock Island people, and, in 1866, he was tendered the position of superintendent of one of the divisions of the road. He accepted, and for a number of years filled the office. Subsequently, he was made assistant general superintendent of the road, and, in April, 1877, was elected general superintendent. He has filled that office up to the present time; and his rare executive ability, combined with his sterling character, as an upright man, and his energetic labors in behalf of the great Rock Island road, have made him recognized and esteemed by the directors, as is no other official of that corporation. In June, 1882, Mr. Kimball was elevated to the office of vice-president, and in conjunction therewith performs the duties of general superintendent. In a work of this kind, representing the leading and most prominent officers and managers of railroads, it would be a serious error to omit the well known and highly esteemed name of Abel Kimball. To him, as much, perhaps, as any other man, is due the credit and honor of making the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific route what it now is.

EVERETTE ST. JOHN, general passenger and ticket agent of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, was born in Litchfield Co., Conn., February 4, 1844. He resided there until he was sixteen years of age, but he did not enjoy the advantages usually allotted to the youth of this day. During his boyhood, he was employed in a store and the post-office of his native town, and although he was unable to obtain the education he so much desired, his young business experience deeply impressed upon his mind the principles which have been conspicuous in his manhood. His parents were the descendants of one of the oldest families of New England, and they possess those sturdy virtues which were characteristic of the natives of that section of our country. The son found it necessary that he should "work out" in order to assist in the support of his family, and he nobly applied himself to the discharge of this duty. When he was about eighteen years of age, he came west and was offered a position as clerk in the general ticket office of the Quincy & Toledo Railroad, at Quincy, Ill. This was in 1862, and during that year the Great Western Railroad of Illinois succeeded the above named corporation, and Mr. St. John went into the general ticket department of the new company. On July 4, 1863, having been offered a more lucrative position in the ticket department of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, he came to this city, where he has since resided and has been connected with the same road up to the present date. He first took a position as clerk at a salary of forty dollars a month, but within two years had, by his competent and faithful work, won the post of chief clerk, the date of his promotion being November 1, 1864. This position he held for five years, and was then given entire charge of the general ticket office. The title of general ticket agent was not conferred until September, 1869, although he virtually held that office. He so continued up to January 1, 1879, when he was made general passenger and ticket agent of the line, which office he holds at the present time. No man has had more to do with the great passenger traffic of Chicago than Mr. St. John; and his twenty-three years of service in this department has not been without its rewards, for he has gained a handsome competence, won the highest esteem of his co-laborers, and enjoys to the fullest extent the regard and confidence of all who know him. Mr. St. John was married at North Brookfield, Mass., to Miss Emiline B. Lamson, of Andover. He has for many years been a member of the Masonic Order, is a past master of Waubansia Lodge, No. 160, A. F. & A. M., was a member of Apollo Commandery, No. 1, K. T., and is at present a member of Montjeo Commandery, No. 53, K. T. Mr. St. John is a member of the Union League Club, and personally is a most genial and courteous gentleman. In the midst of his responsibilities and the urgent duties of his office he is at all times approachable; seemingly with more demands upon his time than time will allow, he yet finds time to listen to the requests of all. On July 1, 1885, he was appointed assistant to the general manager.

WARREN G. PURDY, local treasurer of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1843; the son of John H. and Louisa A. Purdy. He received his education at the public schools of his birthplace, graduating from the high school in 1859. In that year, he came to Chicago, and, on August 1, became a clerk for the Illinois Central Railroad Company, with which he remained until February, 1863. He then went to St. Louis, as chief clerk of the machinery department of the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad. In 1864, he returned to Chicago and accepted the position of chief clerk in the Quartermaster's Department at Camp Douglas, with Captain Charles Goodman, a Q.M. After three years of service with the Quartermaster's Department at Chicago and on the frontier of Texas, he re-entered the railroad service in January, 1867, as general bookkeeper for the Rock Island road. This situation he occupied until December 1, 1867, when he received the appointment of cashier, and, on April 1, 1877, was further advanced to the position he has since retained. Mr. Purdy is one of the oldest members, and a past master, of Landmark Lodge, No. 422, A.F. & A.M.; a member of Fairview Chapter, No. 161, R.A.M.; has taken the Council Degrees; is a member, and was the first Eminent Commander, of Montjeo Commandery, No. 53, K.T.; was First Lieutenant of the Consistory for six years, and is now a member of Oriental Consistory, S.P.R.S., and received the honorary 32° A. & A.S.K. in 1879. He was married in 1865, and has four children—two sons and two daughters. He resides at Kenwood, and is a member of the Kenwood Club and also of the Union League Club in this city.

TITUMAS F. WITHROW, the general solicitor of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, was born in what is now Western Virginia, in 1832. While he was quite young, his parents emigrated to Indiana and afterward to Ohio. When he attained his majority he was editor of the Republican, a newspaper published in Mount Vernon, O. In 1855, he became a citizen of Wisconsin, and was connected editorially with the Janesville Free Press during the presidential campaign of 1856. While engaged in editorial work he also studied law. In September, 1857, he completed his preliminary study in the office of Miller & Beck, at Fort Madison, Iowa, and was admitted to the bar. In November in the same year, he settled in Des Moines which had just become the capital of the state. During the entire administration of Governor Ralph P. Lowe, and a portion of that of Governor Samuel J. Kirkwood, he was private secretary in the executive office. In October, 1859, he was married in Hamilton, Madison Co., N.Y., to Miss Jennie F. Goodwin, of that place. In 1860, he was appointed by the Supreme Court of Iowa the official reporter of its decisions. During his term of seven years, he published thirteen volumes of Iowa Reports. In 1863, he was chairman of the Republican State Central Committee of Iowa. In 1866, he became the local attorney of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, which was then constructing its line through Central Iowa. In 1868, he was prominent in the struggle between the Tracy directory of that company, and a syndicate which embraced nearly all of the operators in Wall Street. The Tracy party proposed to extend the railroad from Des Moines to Council Bluffs, and the Wall Street syndicate attempted, by numerous injunctions, to prevent such extension, with a view to applying the moneys which had been provided for that work to the paying of large dividends to the stockholders. After the success of the Tracy party, Mr. Withrow became the division solicitor of the company, in charge of the litigation on the central and western Iowa divisions, extending from Brooklyn to Council Bluffs. These duties he performed in connection with his general practice as a lawyer in the Federal and State Courts of Iowa. In 1872, he became the principal law officer of the Rock Island Company, and removed to Chicago, where he still resides.

LAKE SHORE AND MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILWAY.—The Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana, the Erie & Northeast, and the Buffalo & State Line railroads were consolidated as the Buffalo & Erie, June 28, 1867. The Cleveland, Painesville & Ashtabula Railroad Company was chartered in 1848, opened in 1852, leased to the Cleveland & Toledo Railroad Company, October 8, 1867, and its name changed to the Lake Shore Railroad Company, June 22, 1868. The two roads were consolidated, April 6, 1869. The present road was formed by these consolidations, May 27, 1869, and of the Buffalo & Erie on August 10.

The authorized stock in 1871 was \$50,000,000, of which amount, shares equal to \$35,000,000 were issued to consolidating companies. The directors were empowered to dispose of the \$15,000,000 remaining and, on October 7, 1871, the holders of common stock purchased the entire offer at 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent.

The presidents of the Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana Railroad Company, from 1855 to 1869—the year of its consolidation with the Lake Shore—were as follows: John Wilkinson, April, 1855, to April, 1857; Edwin C. Litchfield, April, 1857, to August, 1857; Jonathan H. Ransom, August, 1857, to September, 1857; John B. Jervis, September, 1857, to April, 1858; George Bliss, April, 1858, to April, 1860; Elisha M. Gilbert, April, 1860, to June, 1863; Martin L. Sykes, Jr., April, 1864, to August, 1865; Elijah B. Phillips, October, 1, 1865, to consolidation in April, 1869. Mr. Phillips remained president of the newly organized Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company until May, 1870, when he was succeeded by Horace F. Clark, who served up to the time of his death, June 19, 1873.

The general superintendents of the road were as follows: James Moore, April, 1855, to May, 1856; Sam. Brown, May, 1856, to July, 1858; John D. Campbell, August, 1858, to August, 1863, the time of his death; Henry H. Porter, November, 1863, to October, 1865; Charles F. Hatch, October, 1865, to March, 1872. John H. Devereaux, vice-president of the road, was also general manager from May, 1870, to June, 1873.

UNION DEPOT BUILDING.—In April, 1866, the buildings for the depots of the Michigan Southern and Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific companies were commenced, between Jackson and Van Buren streets, with Sherman street on the west and Griswold on the east. The depot building proper, built of Joliet stone, was not entirely completed until the next spring. It was an imposing three story structure, with mansard roof, having three towers, the central one being higher and more elaborate in design than the others. The passenger room for the joint accommodation of the two roads, was spacious and convenient, the office portion of the depot being divided between the companies by a wide hall. On the second floor were the principal general offices; on the third, quarters for the subordinates; while above them were the attic, store rooms and several private apartments. The entire cost of the structure was about $225,000. The car-shed was five hundred and forty-two feet in length, being over sixty feet from the ground to the top of the arched roof. Dormer windows gave the necessary light. The designs for the buildings were drawn by W. W. Boyington.

In addition to the above, the Michigan Southern Company, during the fall of 1866, constructed a freight depot from Harrison Street, six hundred feet south to Polk, capable of storing two thousand tons.

JOHN NEWELL, president of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, is a gentleman who has arrived at his present position through no favoritism or undue financial influence, but simply by earnest application to the various duties he was called upon to perform in his long and diversified railroad experience. Mr. Newell is thus an exemplar of the position to which a man can attain from small beginnings, as a recognition of his fitness for it. In 1846, he first entered upon his railroad experience as rodman in the engineering department of the Cheshire (N. H.) Railroad, where he remained for one and one-half years. He then became an employe of the Vermont Central Railroad, as assistant engineer in charge of the construction of the division extending from Montpelier to Northfield. Afterward, he had supervision of the completion of the terminal section of this road, with headquarters at Burlington, Vt., and remained in such position until it was finished, in 1850. Mr. Newell then went on the extension of the Champlain & St. Lawrence Railroad, in course of construction from near

John Newell

LaPrairie to Montreal, Canada, remaining there for one year. On the completion of that duty, he went to Kentucky, to make surveys for the railroad from Louisville to Cincinnati, and was there in 1852-53; and subsequently, in 1853-54, was engaged in making surveys for the Saratoga & Sackett's Harbor Railroad. On the completion of his duties on that road, Mr. Newell went to Cairo, Ill., as engineer for the old Cairo City Company, and remained with that corporation one year; after which, in 1856, he accepted a position with the Illinois Central Railroad, as engineer, in charge of the maintenance of way for the northern section of the line, from Wapella to Dunleith—now East Dubuque—and occupied that situation until 1863. In the same year, Mr. Newell superintended the construction of the Winona & St. Peter Railroad, in Minnesota, and continued that duty until the spring of 1865, when the road was opened to Rochester, Minn. He then went to Cleveland, Ohio, as president of the Cleveland & Toledo Railroad, occupying that official station until 1868; he was also engineer and superintendent of the New York Central Railroad, during that year. In 1869, he returned to the Illinois Central Railroad, as vice-president, and remained in that position until 1871, when he was elected president of the road, and continued as president until 1875. Following his retirement from the Illinois Central, Mr. Newell was, for about six months, in general charge of the affairs of the St. Louis Bridge Company. In 1875, he accepted the position of general manager of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, holding the title of manager until May, 1883, when he was elected to his present position of president—a culmination which is the result of years of preparation, study, and toil, bestowed upon the railroad business. Mr. Newell was born in West Newbury, Essex Co., Mass., in 1830; the son of Moses and Sally (Moody) Newell. His father was occupied a great deal with the duties of the various offices to which he was successively elected by his fellow citizens, in the Legislature and elsewhere. He was a man of good education, sterling probity and worth. Necessarily, the performance of public duties took Moses Newell away from the home-farm a great deal, and John Newell was left in charge of it. He also attended the schools of Essex County until his entry into business in 1846; and, during his experience in actual business, his scholastic education was augmented and made fruitful. Mr. Newell has never had any ambition to enter public life, or, perhaps it would be more correct to say, he is such a firm believer in the necessity of doing one thing well, that he has never found time to spare from his railroad duties, to devote to a political career. This fact is the secret of his success; and those young men who deplore their inability to "get on" in the world may find a panacea for their complaint, in emulating the example of John Newell. He was married, in 1857, to Miss Judith P. Hills, of the town of West Newbury, Mass. They have four children—Anna, John E., Helen, and Ashbel Barney.

CHARLES M. GRAY, assistant general freight agent of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, was born in Chenango County, N. Y., in 1807. He received his education in Ontario County, at the common schools, and went to Philadelphia, at the age of nineteen, and engaged in the building business until 1832. In that year, he went to New York State, and staid until the spring of 1835, when he came to this city, arriving here on June 12 of that year. Since becoming a resident of Chicago, Mr. Gray has been thoroughly identified with the progress and interests of the city, and his name is frequently found in the first volume of this history. Shortly after his arrival, he became a building contractor, and erected Sherwood's and James A. Smith's stores. During the construction of the latter, he was injured, from which hurt he contracted sciatic rheumatism. This necessitated his seeking some occupation where a large amount of activity would not be requisite, and the out-going street commissioner, McClintock, helped Mr. Gray to secure that office, which he held for three years, until 1840. During his tenure of office, he built the first bridge on Randolph Street, over the river, from which any benefit was derived; he bought the timber of Augustin Deodat Taylor, and ripped out plank with a whipsaw to make the floating pieces. In 1840, he carried on the manufacture of grain cradles, and continued it until 1847, when he went into the reaper business with Cyrus H. McCormick (see page 569, vol. 1). Mr. Gray built the factory on the pier, having purchased the property from William B. Ogden, and sold out his interest in the factory and business to Mr. Ogden, in 1843. In March of that year, also, Mr. Gray was elected first assistant of the City Fire Department, and was, for some time subsequently, prominently connected with that branch of the civic interests (vide page 225, vol. 1). In 1843, he went to California, and remained there until the following year, when he returned to Chicago and went into business with A. T. Spencer, as agents for Charles M. Reid's line of side-wheel steamers, that plied between Buffalo and this port; their wharf was at the foot of State Street. Mr. Gray remained in that business until 1852, when he sold his interest to Mr. Spencer, and remained out of active mercantile pursuits for a brief time, being mayor of the city in 1853, elected on the Democratic ticket. In 1854, he entered the freight department of the old Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana Railroad, and, except for about one and one-half years, has been with the road since that date, through its consolidation and various administrations. In connection with the long and faithful service of this gentleman in the freight department, too much credit can not be attributed to Mr. Gray for the successful working of the present system, always realizing that he was the servant of the people as well as of the corporation which he represented. From the time the Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana Railroad entered this city, George M. Gray, the brother of Mr. Gray, was connected with the road; he is now with the Pullman Company. As narrated on page 515 of the preceding volume, Mr. Gray was one of the incorporators of the Mechanics' Institute, and was an earnest worker in its behalf. He has always resided in the city, and has watched with interest its marvelous growth and development, and whenever an opportunity has occurred wherein its interests could be conserved or advanced by unostentatious but effective work and influence, Mr. Gray has always lent his assistance thereto. He was married, in 1832, to Miss Mary A. Haines, of Philadelphia. During the early years of Odd Fellowship in this city, Mr. Gray joined Union Lodge, but he has not actively participated in the ceremonies of the Order for many years.

GEORGE M. GRAY enjoys two distinctions in connection with the history of Chicago—one, that, of being among the oldest living settlers; the other, that of being one of the oldest railroad men. He was born in Sherburne, Chenango Co., N. Y., in 1818; the son of Alfred and Mary (Olmsted) Gray. At the age of twelve, he entered a store in Monroe County, N. Y., where he remained until 1834, when he came to Chicago—his parents, with the remainder of the family, having arrived here during the preceding year. Since coming here, Mr. Gray has fought the battle of life, as was inevitable with the early residents of Chicago, and now enjoys the position he occupies, with the Pullman Palace Car Company, as a reward for his earnest labor in the interests of the railroads with which he has been associated and as a deserved recognition of the aptitude and knowledge acquired by such experience. Shortly after his arrival, Mr. Gray became a clerk for Gurdon S. Hubbard, at that time a general storage and commission merchant as well as a mercantile dealer in the various provisions, breadstuffs, etc., needed in a frontier settlement. With Mr. Hubbard he remained two years, and then was employed by "Uncle" Peter Cohen, a merchant, for about one year; after which he was with O. H. Thompson, for about the same period. Business then became depressed, and he did anything that would result in achieving a livelihood; and, in advertising to this epoch of his residence, Mr. Gray remarks: "That the inhabitants of the Chicago of to-day can not understand the straits and makeshifts that had to be resorted to by the early settlers of the city, and what a large amount of persistence and dogged determination was needed to adhere to the fortunes of our city, despite the numberless actual and prospective discouragements of its early growth." But he, with the other members of that little phalanx, stuck to the "cradled infant," being always employed, in various capacities, during his long residence, and now rejoices in its magnificent maturity. In 1848, he engaged as a traveling agent with the McCormick Harvester Manufacturing Company, performing the duties necessary during the winter, while during the continuance of navigation, he ran the "Illinois," a packet-boat on the Illinois and Michigan Canal. These two business engagements he continued until 1851, when he became connected with the Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana Railroad, the embryo of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, whose office was then under the Tremont House. As a matter of correlative history, it may be stated that at that time a line of stages was run from the termination of the road, twenty miles; then the railroad again connected with Michigan City; then omnibuses were run for twelve miles, over a plank road, to La-Porte, Ind., from which point the railroad was complete to Toledo, O., a large portion being laid with strap rail; and from Toledo it ran to the Maumee Swamp, where stages were again employed. Thus, three interregnums of staging occurred between Chicago and Buffalo, and in these stage lines Mr. Gray was actively and financially interested. On February 22, 1852, the through line to Chicago was opened, being the first uninterrupted railway communication between New York and this city. The technical designation of Mr. Gray's office, with the Michigan Southern & Northern Indiana and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroads, was general western agent, which he retained until 1862, when he resigned. One incident of his trials, in connection with this office, was the prevalence, in early days, of the "Wild Cat Currency," which was a constant source of anxiety and worry to him; as a bank arose and fell so rapidly, that what was quoted as good money in the morning might be worthless by the evening; and Mr. Gray was annoyed by the apprehension that such depreciation might transpire, at any moment, in the large amounts of money he handled on the company's account. In 1865, he resumed his association with the Lake Shore road, being made general western agent of the through line to Buffalo, which he retained until his resignation in 1867. In that year, he became general agent of the Pullman Palace Car Company, at Chicago, and occupied that situation until his appointment, in 1873, to the one he at present occupies, that of general ticket agent. In 1854, Mr. Gray was one of the founders of the present hardware house of Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co. then inaugurated as Tuttle, Hibbard & Co., and comprising Nelson Tuttle, Fred. Tuttle, H. C. Hibbard, and George M. Gray; Mr. Gray remaining as a silent partner until 1864. He was married, in 1850, to Miss Maria Louisa Johnson, of Brownsville, Me. Mr. Gray has for many years been an Odd Fellow, having taken all the degrees in that organization.

W. P. JOHNSON, general passenger agent of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, was born on June 22, 1834, at Whitehall, N. Y. At seventeen years of age, he entered the service of the Bennington & Rutland Railway (then the Western Vermont Railroad), as office boy in the general office at Rutland, Vt. In August, 1854, Mr. Johnson came to Chicago and entered the employment of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad (then the Chicago & Aurora Railroad), as clerk in charge of ticket reports and tickets. He retained this position until 1855, when he entered the service of the Illinois Central Railroad, as bookkeeper for the passenger department, and the same year was appointed general passenger agent of that road. He retained this position until June 1, 1880, when he resigned, for the purpose of accepting the position he at present occupies.

L. H. CLARKE, chief engineer of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, was born in Becket, Mass., in 1830, the son of Abijah and Judith (Hayward) Clarke. He received his education at the common schools of his native place and subsequently at the Lee Academy. His first business experience was precisely that of so many of the Eastern boys—clerk in a general country store; which position he only retained for a few months, however. He then, about 1849, commenced his railroad experience as roadman on the Vermont & Massachusetts Railroad, from Fitchburg, Mass., to Brattleboro', Vt., and remained there for about six months; after which he occupied the same position on the Vermont Valley Railroad, from which he was promoted to leveler, and remained with that road about eighteen months. In the spring of 1851, Mr. Clarke came to Illinois, and entered the employ of the Illinois Central Railroad as assistant to the division engineer, whose division comprised the line, from about thirty-five miles south of the Illinois River, in the vicinity of Ninon station, to Decatur. He remained there two years, and then received the appointment of chief engineer of the Racine & Mississippi Railroad, where he remained for about eighteen months, until the road became bankrupt. He then, in the spring of 1855, returned to the Illinois Central, and was division engineer in charge of the completion of the line from Mattoon to Centralia. After the finishing of this last section, in the fall of 1856—it was opened for traffic about January 1, 1857—Mr. Clarke became division engineer in charge of the maintenance of the road—track, bridges and buildings—between Kankakee and Centralia, and occupied that position until early in 1859, when he was appointed chief engineer of the entire line. This appointment Mr. Clarke retained until May 1, 1877, when he accepted his present office, which he has retained since. Mr. Clarke was married, in 1853, at Bloomington, Ill., to Miss Rosan Brown, of Geneva, Ill.; they have one daughter, Mary Judith, now Mrs. C. H. Babcock, of this city. About 1862, Mr. Clarke became a member of Oriental Lodge, No. 33, A. F. & A. M.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.—In the first volume of this history, the building of the main line by the State of Michigan and the Michigan Central, from Detroit to Kensington—then called Calumet—fourteen miles south of Chicago, has been stated. Upon its completion, in May, 1852, running arrangements were made with the Illinois Central for the use of its track from Kensington. The only road operated in Illinois by the Michigan Central Company is the Joliet & Northern Indiana, from Joliet, east twenty-nine miles, to the state line at Lake, where it connects with the Michigan Central, and is operated under perpetual lease, $89,000 annual rental being paid. It commenced operation in 1854. The roads owned and operated by the Michigan Central Railway Company in 1871 were: Chicago & Detroit, two hundred and eighty-four miles; Jackson & Niles, or the Air Line, one hundred and three miles; Grand River Valley, Jackson to Grand Rapids, ninety-seven miles; Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw, one hundred and forty-four miles; Kalamazoo & South Haven, thirty-two miles; Niles & South Bend, ten miles; Joliet & Northern Indiana, forty-four miles—all aggregating seven hundred and fourteen miles. The company had, in addition to the lines mentioned, the use of the Chicago & Michigan Lake Shore road to Pentwater, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles, which brought the mileage of roads actually operated up to eight hundred and sixty-four miles. The construction of second tracks between Lake Station and Niles and Ypsilanti and Detroit, was begun in 1871, and the introduction of steel rails marked the history of the road during the same year. Under the Illinois State act of 1869, the Michigan Central, Illinois Central and Chicago, Burlington & Quincy companies were, in 1871, using the same grounds for depot purposes in Chicago, the land lying between the main river and Randolph Street, east of Michigan Avenue. The principal officers of the company in that year were: James F. Joy, president; N. Thayer, vice-president; Isaac Livermore, treasurer; H. E. Sargent, superintendent; Joshua Crane, assistant treasurer and secretary; and William Boott, auditor.

HOMER EARLE SARGENT, capitalist and president of the Fargo & Southern Railway, was born in Leicester, Mass., and received his education at the academy in that town. When Mr. Sargent became of age, he decided to enter into the railroad service, and in 1845 he took his first position. It is a general rule, where a man commences a trade or profession in early life, is unflinching in the prosecution of his calling, and never loses sight of his original intentions, that that man is the one who will most surely be successful. Mr. Sargent is no exception to this rule, for he has devoted forty years of his life to his first adopted vocation. He entered into the service of the Boston & Worcester Railroad as station agent, in 1845, at Millbury, Mass. Later he was transferred to the office at Worcester; and afterward, for eight years, was general freight agent of the company at Boston. He was connected with this company for thirteen years; and while general agent personally prepared the first through freight tariff ever inaugurated, by which merchandise was shipped across the country from Boston to St. Louis. The maiden venture of Mr. Sargent, from which has grown a through traffic business unequalled in any other country of the world, made an indelible impression upon his mind. The first shipment was a consignment of boots and shoes for North & Scott, of St. Louis. In making the tariff, Mr. Sargent visited the offices of the New York Central, at Albany, the Great Western Railroad of Canada, the Michigan Central of Detroit and Chicago, and Chicago & Alton, also in Chicago. He conferred personally with Mr. Druland, since deceased, of the New York Central; C. J. Brydges, general manager of the Great Western, who is now the chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company, at Montreal; with Superintendent Rice, of the Michigan Central, at Detroit, who is now a resident of Concord, Mass.; and then with Governor Matteson, who was president of the Chicago & Alton road, and who also controlled the interest of the steamboat line from Alton to St. Louis, the place of destination of the goods. Thus the above named gentlemen formed the first tariff sheet, through and by the exertions of Mr. Sargent. The business, of course, was not thoroughly systematized, and it was agreed by the representatives of the different roads that a special mark should be placed upon the packages so they could be easily identified. The tariff amounted to about a combination of the different local rates. It was two dollars and forty-five cents for one hundred pounds from Boston to St. Louis, the same goods now being shipped for fifty cents, or less, a hundred, and is an every-day occurrence. From this shipment, originated by Mr. Sargent, has grown the through bill-of-lading system which is now generally in vogue. In 1858, Mr. Sargent was called by the Michigan Central Railroad Company to take the office of general freight agent at Chicago. He held that position for eight years, and was then made general superintendent and general manager, which position he held for the same length of time, his service with the Michigan Central road covering a period of sixteen years. Another event occurred in Mr. Sargent's career, while with this road, which served to place his name prominent among the energetic and enterprising railroad managers of that time. While acting as general manager of the Michigan Central, George M. Pullman had put his sleepers on the Chicago & Alton line. When the third rail was laid on the Great Western Railroad, Mr. Sargent—who was one of the incorporators of the Pullman's Palace Car Company and for many years afterward a director—was largely instrumental in securing the first Pullman sleeping-car service eastward from Chicago over his road, Mr. Pullman running his cars over that line, the Great Western and New York Central, to Rochester, New York. This was considered a marked event. The friends of Mr. Sargent count among the many prominent efforts of his life none greater than the origination of the Union Stock Yards of this city, the success of which was entirely due to his initial labor. Chicago, up to 1864, had several very extensive stock yards, owned by different corporations, but these were so badly located and inaccessible that it was deemed necessary that something should be done to concentrate this growing traffic. It was thought advisable, in order to secure the very best advantages, to establish union yards, where the location and space would be all that was required for years to come. Mr. Sargent, with keen perception of what was necessary and essential to the success of such a scheme, decided that no better location could be found for the union yards than where they are now situated. The land was then far away from the outskirts of the city, but midway between the incoming and out-going stock-carrying roads, and it was adjacent to the packing interests then located on the South Branch of the Chicago River. The Union Stock Yards and Transit Company was organized in 1864, and the stock of the corporation was almost all immediately subscribed by the leading railroads of Chicago. Mr. Sargent was chairman of a committee of three who purchased the present location of John Wentworth for $100,000 for a half-section of land. It is now worth a score of millions, the center of a great population, and the largest interest of the kind in the world. H. H. Porter, now one of the leading railroad men of the west, and who was then general freight agent of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad, and John Houston, then the representative of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago line were the other members of this committee. The purchase of this land was made prior to the organization of the company, which received a special charter from the State Legislature on February 13, 1865. Mr. Sargent was made one of the directors and was a prime mover in the management of the stock yards until a few years ago, when he gave way to younger men. It took several years for the originators to complete the stock-yard system, but Mr. Sargent may look back with the greatest degree of pride to what he did toward the establishment of an interest, now grown to magnificent proportions, and which is a criterion and model for further enterprises of a like nature. After leaving the Michigan Central, Mr. Sargent was offered the general management of the Northern Pacific Railroad. This was in 1877. He at first declined, but later in the year he was prevailed upon to accept the position, in which he continued until May, 1881, just previous to the completion of the road. He tendered his resignation upon the retirement of C. B. Wright, president of the road, who was succeeded by Frederick Billings. In September, 1883, Mr. Sargent became interested in the projected railroad which was destined to run from Fargo, Dakota, to Ortonville, Minnesota. This road, which is one hundred and twenty miles in length, is owned by a syndicate of less than a dozen persons, residents of New York and Chicago. Mr. Sargent is president of the company; and at the time he became identified with the Fargo & Southern there had been but thirty-five miles graded. In less than ten months, or on July 3, 1884, the entire line was completed and ready for operation. The road connects at Ortonville with the Hastings and Dakota division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, thus making a through line between Fargo, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Chicago. Through passenger trains were put on this line August 17, 1884, and the business of the road has constantly and rapidly increased since its inception. It has been of great value to Fargo; and the Argus of that city, speaking of Mr. Sargent and his connection with the Fargo & Southern Railway, says:—"The people of North Dakota know Mr. Sargent well. The people of Fargo have a right to claim him as one of her greatest benefactors and somewhat of a citizen, because he has always had a warm spot in his heart for the city, and spends much of his time here now, as president of the Fargo & Southern railway system, in which he takes great pride. The Fargo & Southern, although originated by Fargo men, owes its great success to Mr. Sargent taking hold and engineering its financial operations and securing its completion. Besides his heavy railroad interests in Dakota and Minnesota, this gentleman is identified largely in this city, in several corporations. Mr. Sargent was first married at Worcester, Mass., to Maria, daughter of Thomas Bottomly, Esq., in 1848. Her death occurred in 1852. On December 2, 1861, Mr. Sargent was again married, his wife being Rebecca E. Wheaton, of Warren, R. I. They have four children, the eldest of whom, Fredrick Sargent, is now in the lumber trade at Needah, Wis. and who is a graduate of the U. S. Naval Academy, of Annapolis, Md.; the second son, John Sargent, is attending the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale College; and the other two children, William and Homer E., Jr., are at home.

NATHAN A. SKINNER, commercial agent of the Nickel Plate Line of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, was born in Ontario County, N. Y., March 22, 1829. Mr. Skinner was brought up at home until he attained his majority, receiving his education at the schools of his native town. About 1851, Mr. Skinner began business life by taking a position with the Rochester Transportation Company, shippers of freight by canal between Rochester and New York City. He clerked in their office until 1854, when he went to Suspension Bridge, New York, as agent of the Union Express Company, the first organized fast freight line in America. A circular issued by that company, in August, 1855, states that they were ready to make contracts for delivering freight direct from Detroit, without change of cars, to points on the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis and Illinois Central railroads; that it was the only messenger freight express between New York or Boston and the West. Goods shipped on those days, even by the so-called fast freight line, were obliged to be transferred several times before reaching their destination. The capital stock of the Union Express Company was $150,000, and the rates on first class freight, from New York to Chicago, were $7.71 a hundred. Among the names of agents announced in this circular—there were only thirteen—is that of N. A. Skinner, Suspension Bridge. Mr. Skinner was agent of this company for about three years, and then took a position with a banking house at Suspension Bridge, with which he remained until December, 1861. In that month, he came to Chicago, and went to work as bill clerk for the Michigan Central Railroad. He held that place for some time, and was then promoted to a chief clerkship in one of the departments, which he held for about two years. Mr. Skinner then received an appointment as contracting agent for the Blue Line Fast Freight, an auxiliary of the Michigan Central, with headquarters in this city. He remained in that office for some years, and was then made freight agent in this city for the Great Western Railway, in whose service he remained until the opening of the Nickel Plate Line, in October, 1882. He was appointed commercial agent of that line, now controlled by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad, and has held the position up to date. Mr. Skinner is a most affable, genial and obliging railroad man, and has always stood in the highest estimation of his employers and co-laborers. During his fifteen years' connection with the Michigan Central Railway, he won hosts of friends, who took occasion, on the first day of January, 1871, to express their admiration for him by the presentation of a very handsome gold watch and chain as a slight token of the high regard in which he was held by the donors.

JOHN H. COOK, now general northwest freight agent of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway, is among the oldest railroad men in Chicago, having been in service nearly thirty-six years. Mr. Cook was born in Otsego County, N. Y., on June 25, 1830. In 1849, he went to work with the Michigan Central Railway, when that company's line was only completed to Kalamazoo, and he commenced on the construction of the road running west from the above mentioned point. He was so employed until the Michigan Central line was completed to New Buffalo, and then was given a freight conductor's position, which he held until 1857. He was then made assistant train manager on the division between Marshall and Chicago, the line having been completed to this city early in 1852. He acted in that capacity for about two years, and was then given charge of a passenger train which he ran until the breaking out of the war in 1861. The Michigan Central, at that time, leased the northern division of the Louisville, New Albany & Chicago road, and for three years Mr. Cook was their representative in the south, southeast and southwest territory, with his headquarters at Indianapolis. In 1865, he took the position of joint western passenger agent for the Michigan Central and the line then known as the Indianapolis & Cincinnati Line, with headquarters in Chicago, which office he held for about two years, at which time the line was abandoned. He then connected himself with the Pennsylvania Company, and acted as their ticket agent in this city, with his office under the old Tremont House up to the time of the fire of 1871. His office was then removed to the temporary Tremont House, on Michigan Avenue. When the burned district was being rebuilt, a little brick building was erected on the corner of Madison and Canal streets, and Mr. Cook moved his office thereto, selling the first ticket from that building himself, as well as the very last, when the house was torn down to make greater improvements. He was with the Pennsylvania line until 1875, and then took the position of general agent for what was then known as the Rockford, Rock Island & St. Louis Railroad. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad ultimately obtained possession of the Rockford line, and Mr. Cook was sent to St. Louis as their general southern agent, and remained there three years. In 1880, he returned to Chicago to accept the office of general northwest freight agent of the "Frisco Line, and he holds that position up to the present date. Mr. Cook resides at Hinsdale, and is a member and treasurer of the Royal Arcanum Lodge, No. 785. He was married at Summerville, Cass Co., Mich., June 3, 1852, to Miss Hannah Moore. They have a son, John H. Cook, Jr., an artistic painter by profession, and a resident of California, and one daughter, Hattie Cook.

THE CHICAGO & EASTERN ILLINOIS RAILROAD was first organized and constructed as the Chicago, Danville & Vincennes. It was chartered, February 16, 1865, and the main line from Chicago to Terre Haute was put in operation in the fall of 1872. In 1871, the road was completed to the Terre Haute and Chicago railroad junction, one hundred and forty miles, giving the block-coal region of Illinois and Indiana direct connection with Chicago. The total number of miles operated by the company, in that year, was two hundred and five. The officers of the road were: W. D. Judson, president; Amos Tenney, treasurer; F. E. Irwin, secretary; J. E. Young, manager; C. B. Mansfield, ticket agent; Charles Greenwood, freight agent; C. E. Charlesworth, superintendent; W. L. Robbins, chief engineer.

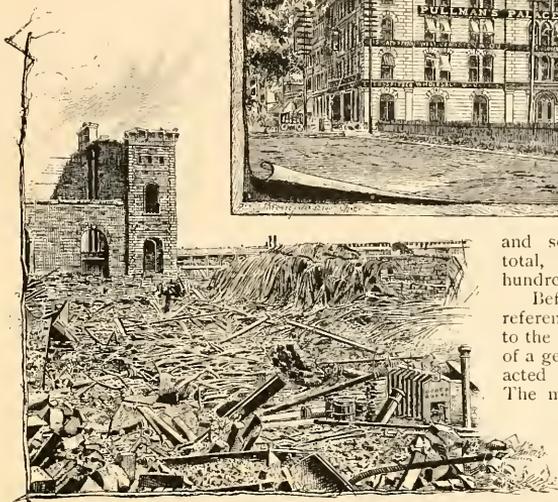

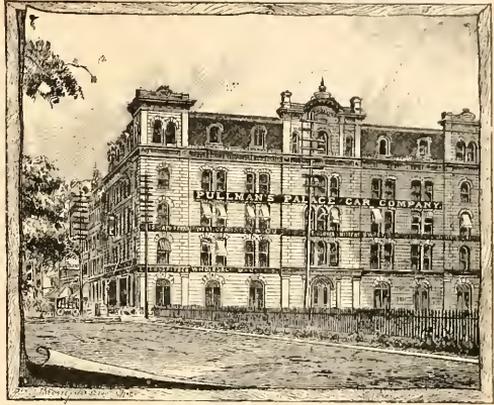

THE PITTSBURGH, CINCINNATI & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY has its origin in the Chicago & Cincinnati Air Line, afterward the Chicago & Great Eastern Railroad Company. Up to 1866, the former organization used the Chicago, Pittsburgh & Ft. Wayne track from Valparaiso to this city. During that year, the track from Richmond, Ind., to Chicago, two hundred and twenty-four miles, was completed, trains running into the Chicago & North-Western depot, on Wells street. In 1867, the Chicago & Cincinnati Air Line, and the Columbus, Chicago & Indiana Central (formerly the Chicago & Great Eastern Railroad) were consolidated. In 1871, the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company operated the Columbus, Chicago & Indiana Central road, embracing the Pittsburgh & Columbus, one hundred and ninety-three miles; the Columbus & Cincinnati, one hundred and twenty miles; the Columbus & Indianapolis, Richmond & Logansport, Logansport State Line and Bradford & Chicago roads, five hundred and eighty-eight miles; and the Jeffersonville, Madison & Indianapolis Railroad, three hundred and ten miles; total, one thousand two hundred and eleven miles.

THE CHICAGO & IOWA RAILROAD COMPANY was chartered in March, 1869, and consolidated with the Ogle & Carroll County Railroad in June, 1870. In December of that year, the first train ran to Rochelle, and on April 1, 1871, regular trains passed over the road to a point opposite Oregon, on the Rock River. When, in May, 1872, the main line was put in operation from Aurora to Forreston, eighty miles, a connection was sought with the Illinois Central, and a route thus opened from Chicago to Sioux City. An attempt was made to run trains into Chicago over the tracks of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and the Northern Division of the Illinois Central. But before this plan could be carried out, the Chicago & North-Western Railway Company served an injunction which was in force in 1871, and which rendered inoperative the proposed arrangement.

GENERAL SUMMARY.—In the year 1871, when the period covered by this volume closes, over ten thousand seven hundred miles of road centered in, and was directly tributary to, Chicago. Seventy-five trains were leaving the city daily. The aggregate earnings of all the railroad companies were $82,776,984, of which sum, $29,175,119 represented the net profits.

The roads projected into Chicago in 1871, but not built, were as follows: Chicago, Decatur & St. Louis, one hundred and thirty-five miles; Chicago & Paducah, two hundred and fifty miles; Chicago, Pekin & South-Western, seventy miles; Chicago, Omaha & St. Joseph, four hundred miles; Chicago & Canada Southern, two hundred and twenty-five miles; Chicago & Pacific, one hundred and forty miles; Baltimore & Ohio, two hundred and sixty miles; Chicago & Illinois, three hundred miles; Chicago & LaSalle, two hundred and fifty miles; Wisconsin Midland (Chicago & Portage), one hundred miles; Continental, three hundred miles; Chicago, Danville & Vincennes (extension), one hundred and seventy-five miles; total, two thousand six hundred and five miles.

Before closing, a brief reference must be made to the railroad legislation of a general character, enacted previous to 1871. The most important was that undertaken pursuant to the Constitution of 1870, which made provision for the regulation of railroad traffic by the State. In July, 1871, an act was passed establishing the rates for freight and passenger traffic. At the same time authority was given to the Governor of Illinois to appoint three railroad commissioners, who were to annually receive the certified reports of the different companies. The legislation caused much commotion and not a little indignation among the railroad companies, and although they made their reports to the commissioners, it was under protest, and with the expressed determination to appeal the constitutionality of the law to the Supreme Court. A presentation of this interesting question, which became one of national importance, will be treated in the next volume.

PULLMAN'S PALACE CAR COMPANY.—In order that the narrative of this corporation may be presented in complete form, its publication is deferred until the third volume.

RAILROAD TRAFFIC.—Until the railroad and warehouse commission was established, in the summer of 1871, there was absolutely no official source from which to obtain statistics exhibiting the traffic, by freight and passengers, which passed over the roads centering in Chicago. The panic in 1857 seriously crippled the operation of the railroads, so that for several years thereafter their earnings show a marked decrease. In 1857, speaking in round numbers, the passenger earnings amounted to eight million dollars, and the freight to eight and three-quarter millions. By the next year, the passenger earnings had fallen off nearly a million of dollars and the freight nearly two millions. In 1859, the passenger earnings were $5,900,000, and the freight $8,000,000; while in 1860 the items were: for passenger traffic, $5,800,000; for freight, $10,800,000. The period of the war is no criterion by which to judge of the normal and permanent increase of railroad traffic; but, by 1869, the passenger earnings amounted to $11,967,730, and the total dividends of the roads $13,967,735, thus showing that their freight business about paid all operating expenses. For the year ending June 30, 1871, the passenger earnings were $14,655,000, and the freight $35,024,000.

FIRST REGULAR TIME TABLE.—As a matter of interest in this topic, an account is inserted of the first regular time table issued in Chicago. The Galena & Chicago Union line was completed to Elgin on January 22, 1850. At that time, four locomotives and about forty freight cars were "running on the road." John Ebbert, the first engineer on the line, who is still living, had been giving verbal directions for the running of trains; and A. W. Adams, now in the ticket auditing department of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, is quite positive that previous to 1850 he prepared a rough time table, to apply as far as St. Charles. But the combined efforts of the "management," consisting principally of the employes and clerks stationed at the depot, and Mr. Ebbert, the engineer, resulted in the first general time table ever issued by a Chicago railroad. By the common consent of those now living, who are conversant with the facts in the case, the credit of making the perfected draft of the table is given to Norman K. Turner, now of Ypsilanti, Mich., his co-laborers in its preparation being Mr. Adams, Charles Wade, now a bookkeeper at Norton's Mills, and C. D. Smith, also a resident of Chicago. The original document long afterward passed into Mr. Ebbert's possession, who in turn presented it to Phillip A. Hall, assistant superintendent of the Galena & Chicago Union road under President Turner. In 1884, Mr. Hall deposited it with the Chicago Historical Society, and thus it has fallen to the publishers of this history to reproduce this fac-simile.

MILITARY HISTORY.

AWAKENING OF THE WAR SPIRIT.

During the last week of 1860, the smouldering fire of indignation and wrath, kept burning in the hearts of patriotic Union men by the pusillanimous and aggravating conduct of national affairs, was kindled into a flame that burned clear and bright, until the necessity for its duration was terminated by the surrender of General Lee. In that week, the heroic Anderson abandoned Fort Moultrie, and, loyal to his country and his flag, took possession of the ocean fortress, Sumter; for this act, receiving the censure of the President of the United States. In that week, the Palmetto flag was hoisted over Fort Moultrie and Castle Pinckney, and the United States Arsenal, at Charleston, with seventy-three thousand stand of government arms, passed into the hands of the insurgents. During that week, South Carolina held her first Treason Convention, absolved United States officers from their oath of allegiance to the Constitution, and lowered the Old Flag from the Custom House and Post-office, at Charleston—the collector of customs announcing to the Convention there sitting, that he and his subordinates had commenced receiving duties under the authority of South Carolina, and granting clearances to vessels in the name of the same State. During that week, John B. Floyd resigned his seat in the cabinet, as Secretary of War, enraged that he was not strong enough to remove Major Anderson from Fort Sumter and remand its garrison to Fort Moultrie. The citizens of Chicago, eager to define their position before the country, and to publicly avow their loyalty, called a meeting, to be held at Bryan Hall, on Saturday evening, January 5, 1861, for the purpose of expressing their views in relation to this crisis in National affairs. The meeting was called without distinction of party, and had the cordial indorsement of men of all shades of political faith, but who were united in favor of sustaining the Union and the Constitution, and enforcing the laws of the United States.

The call was signed by the following citizens: C. H. Ray, Benjamin F. Taylor, William Bross, L. C. P. Freer, E. I. Tinkham, O. Kendall, George A. Ingalls, E. R. T. Armstrong, D. W. Lamberson, M. C. Eames, Edward Voss, J. Q. Hoyt, W. B. Keen, A. Bigelow, L. P. Hilliard, J. F. Campbell, C. B. Farwell, A. Gibbs, John Grey, William T. Barron, A. L. Coe, C. Follansbee, William H. Rice, George A. Meech, James A. Hoes, S. S. Hayes, Grant E. Garlock, J. K. Botsford, Hooker & Jones, H. D. Colvin, Horace

White, S. A. Irwin, Thomas B. Bryan, George P. Hansen, John A. Bross, T. B. Carter, Mathew Laffin, D. V. Bell, A. G. Throop, H. B. Stearns, R. A. Mills & Co., E. G. Hook, H. F. Mather, Benjamin F. Quimby, John H. Kinzie, John A. Nichols, Thomas Lonergan, J. W. Waughop, George McElvaine, Elliott Anthony, Robert Hervey, S. P. Warner, John Long, J. R. Mills & Co., John VanArnam, John Nutt, Warren Miller, E. P. Towne, Root & Cady, C. Bently, S. A. Goodwin, E. C. Larned, I. N. Arnold, E. VanBuren, George Manierre, John C. Haines, C. W. Clark, E. Salomon, L. Brentano, C. L. Diehl, Leopold Mayer, Ernst Prussing, E. Bome-manus, George Schneider, Heinrich Bendly, R. Nelligar, E. Schlaeger, Adolph Loeb.

The meeting was one of the largest ever assembled in the city. All trades, professions, and business interests, as well as antagonistic political parties and opinions, were represented at this, the first Union meeting in Chicago, but all were united on the question of abiding firmly by the Constitution and the Union. S. S. Hayes, Esq., a prominent Democrat of the city and state, officiated as chairman. The members of the Committee on Resolutions, were S. A. Goodwin, W. K. McAlister, J. Lyle King, J. W. Sheahan, E. VanBuren, John C. Rogers, E. C. Larned, J. VanArnam and Digby V. Bell.

While the committee were preparing resolutions, speeches were made by General R. K. Swift, and by William Bross, of the Chicago Tribune. General Swift also offered a resolution indorsing the course of Major Anderson, which was received with the most tumultuous enthusiasm. A few short and radical resolutions were presented by A. D. Bradley, one of which contained the following sentence:

"We have neither compromise nor concession to offer disunionists arrayed in open rebellion to the Government, or their aiders and abettors."

Among the resolutions presented by the committee, were the following:

"Resolved, That in view of what is now transpiring in South Carolina, and other of the Southern States, and of the threats to prevent the inauguration of a President constitutionally elected, it is incumbent upon the loyal people of the several States to be prepared to render all the aid, military and otherwise, to the enforcement of the Federal laws, which may be necessary when thereunto constitutionally required.

"Resolved, That as long as men in any part of the country are plotting the destruction of the Government, or engaged in lawless outrages upon the public property—while the flag of the nation is insulted, and its public defenses seized upon—while the authority of the laws is denied and resisted, we will ignore all political distinctions and divisions, and, forgetful whether we are Democrats or Republicans, remember only that we are citizens, and stand shoulder to shoulder in defense of the Constitution, the Union and the laws.

"Resolved, That while we freely and fearlessly express our opinion as to what is the duty of citizens and States, in case of an illegal and unnecessary disruption of the Union, we most distinctly declare that in our judgment there should be an exhaustion of peaceful measures before the sword shall be drawn, and, therefore, we are in favor of any just, honorable and constitutional settlement of the entire question of African slavery, that Congress shall adopt, and the people ratify."

Resolutions followed, approving and indorsing the course of Major Anderson, and of all loyal men at the South, and also one which caused much debate and difference of opinion. It was as follows:

"We regard none of the alleged grievances, of which either section complain, as any sufficient ground for a dissolution of the Union. We believe that all these mutual subjects of difference can be better settled in the Union than out of it. That all such difficulties should be considered and arranged in a spirit of mutual forbearance and good will. That whatever these difficulties may be, they will only be aggravated by a dissolution of the Union, and that men of all political parties, in both sections of the country, should be ready to make great concessions to restore peace and harmony between the different sections of the country."

The expression, "make great concessions," caused the last resolution to be vehemently opposed by many present, and the resolution of Mr. Bradley, ending with "no compromise to offer disunionists," was received with renewed applause when again offered to the assembly. The discussion that followed was warm and earnest, but the report of the committee was finally adopted, although against the protest of many Union men present.

After the excitement of the Bryan Hall meeting had partially subsided, many who had finally voted for the disputed resolution, began even more seriously to consider what "Great Concessions" might mean to the great mass of people, to whom this meeting would voice the sentiment of Chicago. The Tribune, while giving full credit for sincerity and purity of purpose to all Union men, both those who drew up and those who voted for the resolution, condemned the resolution itself, in strong terms, as liable to abuse and misconstruction, and as committing all its avowed supporters to its meaning, as construed according to the ordinary interpretation of the language in which it was clothed. The feeling on the subject strengthened daily, culminating January 10, in a call for another meeting, signed by many of the citizens whose names were affixed to the former call, and also by others who had had no participation in it. This was headed "The Constitution as it is," and read as follows:

"The undersigned, citizens of the United States, being opposed to sending forth to the people of the Union as the sentiments of the people of the city of Chicago, and the Northwest, the resolutions passed at the so-called "Union Meeting," held Saturday last January 5, at Bryan Hall, would ask those citizens opposed to granting "Great Concessions," where no usurpations of powers or rights are acknowledged, to meet at Metropolitan Hall, on Monday evening, the 14th instant, and give to the world their views and sentiments concerning the dangers now besetting our country."

Hon. George Manierre presided at this meeting, which was a most enthusiastic one. It was entirely under the control of the most radical and decided Union men of the city—and the resolutions were radical accordingly. The speeches of the evening were by Judge Manierre, John Lyle King, Grant Goodrich, A. D. Bradley and John Wentworth, of Chicago.

April 13, 1861, terminated all uncertainty as to the necessity for preparations for war. At noon on that day, the Union flag was lowered from the walls of Sumter at the summons of traitors, and Major Anderson and his little command forced to surrender the crumbling fort.

On Saturday evening, April 13, telegraphic dispatches announced the bombardment of the fort. The following day was one to be long remembered in Chicago. It was one of those beautiful, cloudless spring days that so rarely visit the west, and in the sweet April air floated the old flag from spire and balcony, office and warehouse, mast and dwelling. From early morning until late at night, the usually quiet Sunday streets were thronged with an eager, indignant, troubled people, all intent on one subject, and swayed by a common feeling. Men of all parties talked only of the indignity done the flag of the country, and the necessity of preserving its honor as a priceless heritage. The dispatches of the evening before had wrought every one up to a state of most intense excitement, and how it was faring with beleaguered Sumter was the all-absorbing topic of interest. Governor Yates was in the city, and his headquarters at the Tremont House were besieged by crowds of citizens, anxious to know what the State would do in this crisis. Even thus early, he was tendered the services of several Chicago companies. The Germans congregated in their halls and saloons, and gave full expression to that patriotism and zeal for their adopted country, which they later proved by heroic conduct on the field. Dr. Patton, at the First Congregational Church, told his congregation that the crisis had arrived in which every Christian might rise from his knees and shoulder his rifle, and that Sumter, if taken by the foe like Bunker Hill, so, like Bunker Hill, it must be retaken. Robert Collyer, at the Second Unitarian, Rev. Mr. Corning, at the Plymouth Congregational, and, indeed, the preachers at nearly every church in the city, spoke only of "war and rumors of war."

On Monday, the 15th, Governor Yates was called upon for six regiments of militia for immediate service. A grand rally of the people at Metropolitan Hall was called for the evening of the 16th. After the exciting events of the last two days, no hall in the city could hold the thronging multitudes, and a double meeting was held—the second assemblage gathering on Randolph Street. Hon. Norman B. Judd was president of the Metropolitan Hall meeting. The enthusiasm of the people knew no bounds—speeches, songs, resolutions, were received with cheers, such as the building never heard before. Hon. Owen Lovejoy made the grand speech of the evening. He was followed by Hon. I. N. Arnold, then Representative in Congress from the Chicago District; by Julian S. Rumsey, republican candidate for mayor; and by Messrs. T. J. Sloan, A. D. Bradley, B. F. Millard, George W. Gage, S. M. Wilson, and Hon. U. F. Linder. The new song, by George F. Root, "The First Gun is Fired! May God Protect the Right," was sung by Messrs. Lumbard, and was received with redoubled cheers. On April 15, the day upon which Governor Yates was called upon for six regiments as the quota assigned to Illinois, he issued a proclamation, calling a special session of the Legislature, members to convene on the 23d of April, for the purpose of enacting laws and adopting measures—

"For the more perfect organization and equipment of the militia of the State, and placing the same upon the best footing to render efficient assistance to the General Government in preserving the Union, enforcing the laws, and protecting the property and rights of the people; and, also, to raise such money or other means as may be required to carry out the foregoing objects."

General Order No. 1 was issued on the same day, from headquarters at Springfield, directing all commandants of divisions, brigades, regiments, and companies to hold themselves in readiness for actual service. On the 16th, General Order No. 2 was issued, calling for the immediate organization of six regiments, to be mustered into the service of the United States on the 19th.

WAR MATERIAL IN CHICAGO.—At the opening of the year 1861, the various companies of citizen soldiery, which, in the "piping times of peace," had gaily paraded the streets of Chicago, or, as dashing Zouaves, won prizes and praises in other cities, had ceased to actively exist. As the shadow of the rising cloud of war in the East reached westward, it was time to look about and see what military material was still left in the city.

The old military companies had been enrolled in two regiments—the 60th Regiment, I. S. M., and the Washington Independent Regiment, No. 1.

THE 60TH REGIMENT was now commanded by Colonel Joseph H. Tucker, Colonel Ezra Taylor having resigned. The balance of the field and staff offices were vacant. The companies composing it were the Chicago Light Dragoons, Chicago Light Guard, Emmet Guards, Montgomery Guards, Shields' Guards, U. S. Zouave Cadets, and Chicago Light Artillery. The boundaries of the 60th Regimental District were as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of fractional Section 33, 40, 14, on the shore of Lake Michigan, and running west along north line of Sections 33, 32, and 31, to the north branch of Chicago River; thence northerly up said river to west line of Township 40, 14, and Township 39, 14; thence south to southwest corner of Township 39, 14; thence east along south line of said Township 39, 14, to Lake Michigan; thence northerly along said lake to place of beginning.

THE WASHINGTON INDEPENDENT REGIMENT was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Shirley, its colonely being vacant by the death of Colonel William H. Davis. Its Major was W. H. Wallis, and there were no other regimental officers. Its companies were the Highland Guards, Washington Light Cavalry, Washington Rifles, Washington Grenadiers, and Black Yager Rifles.

These two regiments formed the Second Brigade of the Sixth Division, Illinois State Militia, commanded by Brigadier-General R. K. Swift, who had three aides with rank of major. These were William S. Johnson, Jr., John Ross and E. W. Griffin. Major Charles B. Brown was quartermaster.

In January, 1861, the status of these several companies, formerly the pride and glory of Chicago, was anything but satisfactory. The old militia system had borne heavily on both the time and finances of men and officers, and as the belief had been forced upon all that the showy glories of parade and drill did not compensate for a depleted purse or the possible neglect of more important duties, the military spirit had gradually died out, and the drill room had been abandoned.

THE CHICAGO LIGHT DRAGOONS, organized by Captain Charles W. Barker, in April, 1856, and still commanded by him, had rapidly risen in favor and popularity. With their scarlet hussar pelisses and gay accoutrements, they formed a brilliant feature in a holiday parade, and the strict discipline and thorough training of Captain Barker had made them proficient in each feature of company drill. The money pressure had proved too much for them, however, and now their equipments were seldom taken from the racks where they lay in the old Armory Building, on the corner of Monroe and LaSalle streets, in which had been the drill room of nearly every city company. The arms of the dragoons—pistols and sabres—belonged to the State, the latter being in good condition, the former worthless.

THE CHICAGO LIGHT GUARD, organized by Captain J. B. Wyman, in February, 1854, was par excellence, for years the crack corps of the Northwest. In the old Armory Light Guard Hall, in Couch's building, the company formerly drilled, and to be a guardsman then was to be envied by all less favored mortals. Now the few left, who were faithful to the tradition of their former greatness, occasionally drilled at the Armory Building, under the leadership of Lieutenant George W. Gage. Forty-two Minié muskets, well kept and in good condition, a gallant prestige and unblemished name, were all the Light Guards' could now bring to the service of the country.

THE EMMET GUARDS, organized May, 1854, by Captain Patrick O'Connor, and commanded as late as 1858 by Captain D. C. Skelly, as a corps was extinct. Dust and devouring rust had brought their forty altered-over muskets to a state more formidable to friend than foe, and they were allowed to keep ward and watch over the vacated room in the upper floors of the block on the corner of Randolph and Wells streets, where their owners once drilled with Irish energy. In the same room was another case of forty equally valuable muskets, carried for many years by the Montgomery Guards—the longest established company in the city, its existence dating back to the spring of 1842, when it was organized by Captain Patrick Kelly. Under Captain Michael Gleason, it had maintained its reputation as one of the best Irish companies in the Northwest, from 1850 until three years before the breaking out of the war, when it succumbed to the pressure of hard times, and was now practically among the things of the past.

THE SHIELDS GUARDS, a company composed mostly of mechanics, and organized November 25, 1854, under Captain Charles E. Moore, was still alive, officered and keeping up its drill. Thirty-six names were on its roll, and its officers were: Captain, James Quirk; First Lieutenant, D. Crowley; Second Lieutenant, James H. Lane. Their armory and drill room was in North Market Hall, and their arms fifty old-style muskets, worth about the value of their weight in old iron. The Shields Guards was the first Chicago Company that took measures to offer its services to the Government. This was done in accordance with resolutions passed at their Armory on the evening of January 14, 1861, while the excitement in regard to the treasonable proceedings at Charles-ton was at its height. Their fourth resolution was:

"Resolved, That we, the Shields Guards of the City of Chicago, laying aside for the present our individual political predilections, and having in view only the interest and demands of our common country, tender our services as citizen soldiers, to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, to be by him placed in whatever position our country calls upon us to fill."

THE UNITED STATES ZOUAVE CADETS had disbanded soon after their return from their Eastern tour, and their arms had passed from their possession.

THE CHICAGO LIGHT ARTILLERY, one of the oldest and best of the city military companies, organized in 1854, with James Smith as captain, was alive and in good shape for duty; its officers being—Captain, Ezra Taylor; First Lieutenant, Amos Grannis; Second Lieutenant, Darius Knights; Third Lieutenant, Cyrus P. Bradley. Fifty men were enrolled, and at their rooms at the Armory, corner Franklin and Cedar streets, were four brass six-pounders, with caissons and harness complete, all in excellent order. This company was made up of reliable material, and was conceded to be one of the best organizations of the kind in that branch of military service. The companies described constituted the 60th Regiment. But one company—the Artillery—had both men and arms fit for immediate service. The Light Guard had arms, but no men; the Shields Guards had men, but worthless arms; and the remaining four companies were, to all outward appearance, extinct as organizations.

Of the companies constituting the Washington Independent Regiment, the Highland Guards, organized

May 10, 1855, still retained a military organization, its officers being—John McArthur, captain; Alexander W. Raffin, first lieutenant; John Wood, second lieutenant. Captain McArthur was an excellent officer, and the Highland Guards had ranked among the best of the city military companies. It was now reduced to thirty-five members, who still kept up their drill at their Armory in Lind's Block, South LaSalle Street, where they had a neatly furnished reading room and a well-selected library. The company offered their services "for the preservation of the Union and the enforcement of the laws" a few days after the Shields Guards, and immediately commenced extra drill, and took measures to fill their ranks. This company had no arms fit for service.

THE WASHINGTON LIGHT CAVALRY, a German company, commanded by Captain Frederick Schambeck, with Henry Stupp as first lieutenant, was composed of forty mounted men, each armed with carbine, sabre and pistol.

The Washington Rifles, Washington Grenadiers and Black Yager Rifles were also German companies. The Washington Rifles, commanded by Captain Fred. Matern, with John Morat as first lieutenant, mustered twenty-five men, armed with United States rifles. Twenty men were on the roll of the Grenadiers, their officers being—Captain, T. Weiler; First Lieutenant, John Schmidt; and Second Lieutenant, Martz Franzen. The Black Yagers numbered twenty-two men, also armed with United States muskets. They were commanded by Captain M. Marx.

In addition to the companies comprised in the two regiments, an independent company of Zouaves had been organized in the city, of which James R. Hayden was captain; S. Hosmer, first lieutenant; and B. F. Yates, second lieutenant. This corps was organized on the ruins of the Zouave Cadets, the drill and uniform being the same. The Minié muskets and a brass mounted howitzer, originally borrowed from Missouri for the drill of the Cadets, were now in the possession of the new company of Zouaves.

Probably the united military organizations of the city, at the opening of 1861, could not muster over one hundred and fifty men, fully equipped according to their regulations. Four brass six-pounders, one mountain howitzer, about fifty good muskets, and as many inferior rifles, constituted the arms ready for immediate service.

REORGANIZATION OF REGIMENTS.—On the receipt of the news from South Carolina, the military spirit became freshly aroused. Old companies revived, and new ones sprung into life. During the first week of February, a meeting of citizens was held for the purpose of procuring arms from the State, and measures originated, in order to place the Highland Guards in proper condition for active service, if required. The first new military company formed was that of Captain Frederick Harding, which received the silk flag promised by J. H. McVicker to the "first company organized in Chicago for the support of the Government," he, at the same time, pledging himself to "make one of twenty who will clothe the company during the war."

The Zouave Cadets also revived, the old members uniting with the already existing company of Independent Zouaves under Captain Hayden. Measures were set afoot for the formation of a Zouave regiment, and a call issued for the reorganization of the corps for sterner duties than had hitherto fallen to its lot. Following are the names of the old Zouaves who signed this call, among them those who proved through the coming years of strife that they were no Carpet Knights, but earnest, loyal and brave men, and that the discipline to which they had been subjected was such as would stand the test of war; James V. Guthrie, Presly N. Guthrie, William Dehrend, Henry S. Wade, Charles H. Hosmer, James W. Dewitt, A. A. Bice, G. True, Samuel I. Nathans, Charles C. Smith, R. R. W. Lock, W. M. Olcott, Frank Rogers, W. B. Smith, L. B. Hand, William H. Cutler, John A. Baldwin, Albert B. Hatch, Edwin L. Brand, I. B. Taylor, G. Q. White, L. L. James, William Inness, John C. Long, Charles Vargas, John H. Clybourn, James A. Clybourn, Henry Kelly, William N. Danks, John Parsons, James G. McAdams and Lucius Larrabee.

On the evening of January 8, 1861, the Germans held their first war meeting in Chicago, in their hall on the corner of Indiana and North Wells streets. They organized by appointing Fidel Schund as chairman and W. S. Eschenburg as secretary. Casper Butz and E. Schlaeger addressed the meeting in German, and patriotic resolutions were drawn up and adopted with true Teutonic fervor. They emphatically announced to Chicago and the world that they had "no concessions to make," and expressed their approval and admiration of the course of Major Anderson, not alone by resolution, but by voting him the gift of an elegant sword.

On the 1st of February, the Hungarians, Bohemians and other Slavic nationalities organized themselves into a rifle company, under the lead of Geza Mihalotzy, who afterward followed the flag of his adopted country from Missouri to Georgia, and finally laid down his life in its defense while leading a charge at Tunnel Hill. The old companies drilled diligently, and filled up their ranks during the early months of the year, fearing, yet hardly believing, that war would come in earnest.

When Sumter was fired on, and Governor Yates issued his proclamation, on April 15, calling for volunteer troops to aid in preserving the Union, Chicago lost no time in responding to the call. On the 16th, the infantry company of Captain Fred. Harding, and the Chicago Dragoons, Captain Charles R. Barker, offered their services to the Governor, and were accepted. A day or two later the Washington Independent Regiment was tendered entire. The ranks of the Zouaves rapidly filled; companies "A" and "B" were already ready for service, under Captains Hayden and Clybourn, and, by the 18th, sufficient names had been offered to commence the formation of a Zouave regiment, which was to be organized under their old commander, Captain Joseph R. Scott. Captain Ezra Taylor's company of Light Artillery, which had during the winter added two howitzers to its four brass field-pieces, and was acknowledged to be one of the best drilled companies in the Northwest, formally tendered its services to the President for the defense of Washington. New companies were rapidly formed, recruiting offices were thronged with men, ready and anxious to enroll their names among the defenders of the old flag, and only fearful lest the requisite number would be made up and their names left out.

ACTION OF THE CITIZENS.—War meetings, crowded with patriotic, excited multitudes, were held in the various city halls. On the evening of April 18th, a double meeting, for the purpose of taking measures to arm and equip the Chicago volunteers, was held at Bryan and Metropolitan halls. Committees, representing the various interests of the city, vied with each other in the magnitude and liberality of their offerings.

The Chicago Bench was represented by Judges Thomas Drummond, J. M. Wilson, and George Manierre; the banks, by Lieutenant Governor Hoffman, B. F. Carver, and E. I. Tinkham; the railroads, by William R. Arthur, George M. Gray, and C. G. Hammond; the citizens, by William B. Ogden, Samuel Hoard, and E. H. Haddock; the surgeons, by Drs. Daniel Brainard, N. S. Davis, and Levi D. Boone. The committee representing the Board of Trade was composed of one hundred of the most influential members of that body. The two halls were densely packed, with earnest, loyal men, ready, and more than willing, to do their utmost for their country and all who helped to defend it. Judge Drummond presided at the meeting held at Bryan Hall. After patriotic speeches, made by Rev. Mr. Corning, S. S. Hayes, John Wentworth, I. N. Arnold, George W. Gage, and others, the regular business of the meeting commenced. About $9,000 were subscribed within a few minutes, which was increased to $36,000 in the next twenty-four hours. The banks of Chicago, through their committees, made a tender of $500,000 to the Governor, that the State might be enabled to respond to the requisition from Washington in advance of the assembling of the Legislature. A Military Finance Committee was appointed, in whose charge the city fund was to be placed, and whose special duty was the equipment of volunteers and the care and support of their families. This first War Finance Committee was composed of the following gentlemen: Julian S. Rumsey, E. H. Haddock, Thomas B. Bryan, L. P. Hilliard, Orrington Lunt, B. F. Carver, Philip Conley, Fred. Letz, P. L. Underwood, George Armour, J. J. Richards, Hiram E. Mathers, F. G. Adams, J. L. Hancock, E. B. Loomis, Robert Law, George W. Gage, Alexander White, C. G. Wicker, Redmond Prindiville, G. S. Hubbard, Samuel Hoard, E. I. Tinkham, T. J. Kinsella, R. M. Hough, Eliphalet Wood, Nelson Tuttle, H. E. Sargent, J. Gale, U. H. Crosby. The Finance Committee elected E. H. Haddock, H. F. Mather, Samuel Hoard, J. S. Rumsey, A. E. Kent, Thomas B. Bryan, L. P. Hilliard, and O. Lunt as their executive committee.

On the 19th, Governor Yates was ordered by the Secretary of War, to send immediately to Cairo a brigadier-general and four regiments of militia. This place, at the extreme southern point of free territory and commanding the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, was subject to hostile invasion from either Missouri, Kentucky or Tennessee. It was necessary that it should be occupied by loyal troops, and it was imperatively the duty of Illinois to protect her own border.

"GENERAL SWIFT:

"As quick as possible have as strong a force as you can raise, armed and equipped with ammunition and accoutrements, and a company of artillery, ready to march at a moment's warning. A messenger will start to Chicago to-night.

"RICHARD YATES,
"Commander-in-Chief."

At noon on the 21st, only forty-eight hours after this dispatch was delivered, General Swift left Chicago with a force of five hundred and ninety-five men and four six-pounder pieces of artillery, his command consisting of the following companies: Co. "A," Chicago Zouaves, Captain James R. Hayden; Co. "B," Chicago Zouaves, Captain John H. Clybourn; Chicago Light Infantry, Captain Frederick Harding; Turner Union Cadets, Captain Kowald; Lincoln Rifles, Captain Geza Mihalotzy; Co. "A," Chicago Light Artillery, Captain James Smith.

In spite of the efforts of citizens and friends, these companies left the city in poor shape for active service. No arms could be procured, except such as could be hastily gathered from stores and shops in Chicago, and the battery was only provided with slugs, and a small quantity of canister manufactured for the emergency by Miller Brothers, hardware merchants on State Street. The boys had the best that could be found, however, and left Chicago in good spirits, sure that better would come. The expedition arrived at Big Muddy Bridge, on the Illinois Central Railroad, at five o'clock on the morning of the 22d, and detaching there Captain Hayden's company and a section of Chicago Artillery to guard the bridge, reached Cairo at eight o'clock the following morning. A day later the force was joined by three additional batteries: Captain Houghtaling's, of Ottawa, Captain Hawley's of Plainfield; and Captain Carr's, of Sandwich—all of Illinois.

RECRUITING IN CHICAGO.—The work of recruiting in Chicago progressed rapidly. Captain Joseph Kellogg opened a recruiting office, on the corner of Clark and Randolph streets, on the 18th of April, and on the 20th offered his filled company to the Governor, which was accepted; James R. Hugunin also raised a company, which was accepted—these two being the only Chicago companies in the first six regiments organized under the first call from the Government. They were mustered into the service of the United States at Springfield, May 2d; Captain Kellogg's company being designated Co. "A," and Captain Hugunin's, Co. "K," of the 12th Illinois Regiment, Colonel John McArthur. On the 10th of May, the regiment, forming a part of the First Brigade, Colonel Benjamin M. Prentiss commanding, was ordered to Cairo.

The officers of Co. "A" at the time it was mustered into service were: Captain, Joseph Kellogg; First Lieutenant, John Noyes; Second Lieutenant, J. B. Rowland. On May 11th, Arthur C. Ducat was mustered in as second lieutenant in place of J. B. Rowland.

The officers of Co. "K" were: Captain, James R. Hugunin; First Lieutenant, William E. Waite; Second Lieutenant, Eben Bacon.

The companies of Captains Harding, Hayden, and Clybourn returned from Cairo to Springfield on the 2d of May, with the expectation of joining this regiment, but were too late; and were mustered out of the State service, with allowance of one month's pay, under a special act of the Legislature, then in session.

On the 20th of April, the loyal Irishmen of Chicago commenced the formation of the celebrated Irish Brigade, the already organized Irish companies in the city forming its nucleus. With the brave and devoted James A. Mulligan as leader, it took but little time to organize the regiment that made the name of Lexington famous anew in the war annals of the United States.

On April 20th, the Scandinavians, too, organized, under the leadership of C. J. Stoltrand, who had served in the Swedish army, as artilleryman, many years. Swedish Consul Rundell was untiring in his efforts to make this company an honor to his own and to his adopted country. Another Swedish company was organized, somewhat later, in Chicago, under Captain Andrew Torkilsson, and became, as Co. "A," a part of the celebrated Scandinavian Brigade raised in Wisconsin. Not only were military companies formed for active service abroad, but those exempted from such duty, by age or other circumstances, formed themselves into home companies, and drilled as diligently and faithfully as their sons or younger neighbors.

One of these organizations, composed of citizens over forty-five years of age, and called "The Old Guard," or "The Home Guard," was formed on the 20th of April, and the following names signed to the muster-roll on the same day, at the meeting of the Board of Trade: Van H. Higgins, James H. Rees, Daniel H. Boss, G. Herbert, H. N. Heald, F. B. Gardner, William Arbuckle, L. C. P. Freer, L. Doyle, George Anderson, Edward Croft, William Osborn, J. G. Hamilton, R. P. McLean, J. B. Gookins, J. S. Bangs, William H. Bradley, J. O. Humphrey, Reuben Tayler, Benjamin F. Hadduck, Walter Kimball, J. W. Chickering, Joseph H. Moore, Joel A. Kinney, Giles Fitch, Samuel Stone, G. A. Springer, A. Huntington, O. Kendall, J. W. Van-Osdel, John B. Rice, Samuel McKay, T. Drummond, James Campbell, J. Johnson, Samuel Miles, H. H. Yates, S. A. Ford, Bradford Stone, R. M. Carter, P. L. Yoe, J. H. Woodworth, William James, Caleb Shaw, Alfred Dutch, William A. Ingalls, W. Hutchings, Albert Smith, C. E. Thompson, Andrew Akin, J. C. Cunningham, W. L. Felton, Ebenezer O. Nash, Luke Colburn, Luther Nichols, J. C. Walter, E. S. Wadsworth, G. N. Reading, E. O. Sullivan, A. S. Fay, C. Rees, S. Marsh, M. E. Coe, J. Speer, Harvey Danks, Timothy Hamlin, M. Grants, Joseph McPherson, Sylvester Lind, J. Cartwright, T. Doty. The officers of this organization, elected April 22, were: Captain, Charles E. Thompson; First Lieutenant, William Hutchings; Second Lieutenant, D. V. Bell; Third Lieutenant, B. B. Morris; First Sergeant, H. W. Zimmerman; Second Sergeant, H. H. Yates; Third Sergeant, J. B. Rice; Fourth Sergeant, Luther Nichols; First Corporal, J. W. Chickering; Second Corporal, Thomas Hoyne; Third Corporal, Andrew Harvie; Fourth Corporal, John H. Kinzie; secretary, H. W. Zimmerman; treasurer, J. H. Woodworth; executive committee, J. A. Smith, J. M. Wilson, R. T. Blackburn, J. B. Rice, S. B. Cobb; finance committee, J. H. Woodworth, William Wheeler, B. B. Morris, Joseph H. Moore and B. W. Raymond.

The Home Guard increased until it numbered some twelve companies, in different sections of the city, comprising many of the best and most solid citizens found amid the judges, lawyers, bankers, merchants, and mechanics.

During April, the formation of an Engineer, Sapper and Miner Corps, was commenced by Arthur C. Ducat, Adolph M. Hirsch, and Anton Nieman, which was soon filled with the best class of mechanics in the city. The Sturges Rifles, a company of sharpshooters, many of whom were members of the Audubon Club, was organized through the liberality and loyalty of Solomon Sturges, Esq., who offered to arm, equip, and defray the whole expense of their outfit, drill and transportation to any point to which they might be ordered. The Yates Phalanx was formed, and fast filled up; the Chicago Tigers, the Chicago Guards, the old Light Guard, and the German companies, were drilling and lengthening their muster-rolls day by day. The few companies alive in the city, at the opening of the year, so multiplied, that on the first day of May, 1861, Chicago had thirteen companies in actual service—Government or State—and a reserve corps of twenty-five full companies, exclusive of the Home Guard, the companies of the 60th Regiment, and the nucleus of a regiment (127th, of which Colonel Van Arnam was then laying the foundation. Of these companies, enrolling over thirty-five hundred strong, active young men, fourteen had responded to the first call of Governor Yates, and were in the service of the State, at Cairo, Springfield, and Alton. These companies were Co. "A," Chicago Light Artillery, Captain James Smith; Chicago Dragoons, Captain Charles R. Barker; Chicago Light Infantry, Captain Fred. Harding; Rumsey Guards, Captain Joseph Kellogg; Infantry company of Captain James Hugunin; Union Cadets (German), Captain Kowald; Lincoln Rifles (Hungarian), Captain Geza Mihalotzy; Washington Light Cavalry, Captain Frederick Schamberg; Highland Guards, Co. "A," Captain Alexander Raffan. Zouaves: Co. "A," Captain James R. Hayden; Co. "B," Captain John H. Clybourn; Co. "C," Captain Freeman Conner; Co. "H," Captain William Inness; Union Rifles (German), two companies, Captains Anthony Sten and Lothar Lippert.

The following companies, filled and ready to march at short notice, were drilling and equipping in Chicago, several having been already accepted by the War Department: the Emmet Guards, Captain C. R. Walsh; O'Mahony Rifles, Captain J. C. Phillips; Shields's Guards (two companies), Captains James and Daniel Quirk; Jackson Guards, Captain Francis McMurray; Montgomery Guards, Captain Michael Gleason. These seven companies belonged to the Irish Brigade.

Five companies of the original "Yates Phalanx" were full: Co. "B," Captain T. O. Osborn; Co. "E," Captain Light; Co. "F," Captain J. O. Felton; Co. "G," Captain W. B. Slaughter; Co. "H," Captain David Vaughn. Also the Washington Grenadiers, Captain Marschner; Union Cadets, Captain Large; Chicago Light Artillery, Co. "B," Captain Ezra Taylor; Illinois Rangers, Captain G. A. Fuller; Sturges Rifles, Captain James Steele; Highland Guards, Co. "B"; and companies "D," "E," "F," "G," "H," of the Zouave regiment, under Captains Bell, Scott, Wade, McAdams and Travers, respectively. These were all Chicago companies, waiting and eager to be called into active service as early as the first day of May, 1861.

ACCEPTANCE OF SOLDIERS.—At the special session of the Legislature, in April, in addition to the act providing for the organization of the six regiments assigned to the State as its quota, another, called the "Ten Regiment Bill," was adopted. This authorized the acceptance for State service—with the provision that, if called upon, they should tender their services to the General Government—of ten regiments of infantry, one regiment of cavalry, and one battalion of light artillery. One regiment was to be raised from each of the nine existing congressional districts, and one from the volunteer companies, still in camp at Springfield. This act took effect May 2. On the following day, the President issued his proclamation, calling for 42,032 volunteers, to serve for three years, or during the war. The waiting companies in Chicago, with multitudes of others from all parts of the State, hastened to offer their services to the Governor, and by May 6, the regiments from the various congressional districts were filled and ordered into camp, and the companies to constitute the regiment of the State-at-large, were selected and assigned. In the regiment of the Second Congressional District, Chicago had one company—that of Captain Samuel Wadsworth. Of the regiment of the State-at-large, made up from companies then waiting at Camp Yates, as originally organized, eight were from Chicago, viz.: Co. "A," Highland Guard, Captain A. W.

* The Yates Phalanx, not being accepted under the "Ten Regiment Bill," disbanded, and when reorganized many of the Chicago companies had joined other organizations.

Raffen; Chicago Light Infantry, Captain Fred. Harding; the infantry company of Captain Fred. Mattern, and the Zouave companies of Captains Hayden, Clybourn, Inness, Sten and Connor.

Officers were elected for the regiment on the 8th of May, as follows: Joseph R. Scott, colonel; Frederick Harding, lieutenant-colonel; Silas D. Baldwin, major. The regiment was tendered to the Government for three years' service, on May 17th, ordered into camp at Chicago, June 13th, and its original organization essentially changed in the course of a few weeks.

On the 11th of May, the formation of the "Hecker Jæger Regiment" was commenced by Captain Charles Knobelsdorf, four companies enlisting for the war that day. It was intended to make this a Hungarian regiment, commanded by officers of that nationality who had served in European campaigns. Knobelsdorf, an old officer of the Prussian army, who had served in the Schleswig-Holstein army during the revolutions of 1848-51, with Mayor Rumsey, I. N. Arnold, Lieutenant-Governor Hoffman, A. C. Hering, and others, were instrumental in its formation. Frederick Hecker, also a veteran officer, was finally elected colonel, and the regiment was soon ready for service.

The Illinois troops, authorized by the Legislature, were tendered to the General Government on the 2d of May. The cavalry was immediately and peremptorily declined. On the 15th of the same month, a dispatch from the War Department announced that only six regiments of infantry had been assigned to the State as its quota under the second call of the President for three years' troops, and only that number could be accepted.

On the 21st of May, the following six, out of the ten, regiments organized under the "ten regiment bill," were selected to be immediately mustered into service: First Congressional District Regiment, Colonel Thomas J. Turner; Second, Colonel John B. Wyman; Fourth, Colonel Leonard F. Ross; Fifth, Colonel Robert F. Smith; Sixth, Colonel John M. Palmer; Ninth, Colonel Michael Lawler. This action, by throwing out the regiment of the State-at-large, composed mainly of Chicago companies, left the city with but two companies of three-months men in the 12th regiment, and a single company in the Second Congressional District Regiment, to be mustered into United States service under the two calls of the Government. The refusal of the Secretary of War to authorize Governor Yates to accept more troops caused many companies to disband, and leave the State to enlist elsewhere, principally in Missouri and Kansas. H. N. Snyder's Chicago company of Sappers and Miners, by order of General Hunter, was attached to the 9th Missouri, and Captain McGinness's company—entirely Chicago men—was attached to the 6th Missouri. Many military organizations, filled, armed and equipped, tendered their services directly to the War Department, and were accepted as independent companies.

On the 6th of May, the Sturges Rifle Corps was thus accepted, to serve during the war, and on the 9th went into camp just south of the University buildings on Cottage Grove Avenue. The Yates Phalanx tendered its services directly to the Government, through the medium of W. S. Peaslee, who had been elected its Colonel, and was accepted, contingent upon the Sturges Rifles forming the tenth company of the regiment, when it would be composed exclusively of Chicago companies. This was not accomplished, and after many vexations, delays and disappointments, this regiment was finally accepted on the day following the Bull Run disaster, when nearly all its companies had disbanded and scattered.

The Irish Brigade, on receiving the intelligence that it could not be mustered into service under the second call of the President, held a meeting, at which the entire force was present. After several patriotic speeches were made, a vote was taken as to whether the brigade should disband. Only four, out of eight hundred and sixty-four, men voted aye; the rest determining to retain their organization, continue their drill and perfect their equipment. Colonel James A. Mulligan visited Washington to urge the claims of his command, and on the 17th of May it was accepted by the President, as an independent regiment for the war.

AID BY THE CITIZENS.—The following statement of the War Finance Committee, published in the Chicago Tribune, May 17, 1861, shows what Chicago had done for the soldiers up to this time:

"When our citizens reflect that the State law, organizing the ten regiments now in camp, has not made any provision for uniforming or clothing the soldiers, and that the compensation for services is only at the mere pittance of eleven dollars per month, out of which they must support their families, uniform and clothe themselves while drilling and preparing for efficient service in the army, they will see, at once, that the people of Chicago must come to their aid, promptly and largely, if they expect to render the condition of our patriotic soldiers and their families at all comfortable.

"Of the ten regiments called for by the State, one (10th) is composed almost wholly of men from Chicago, a large portion of whom, at the instance of the Governor, proceeded to Cairo nearly a month since, and took possession of that important point most opportunely. This gallant achievement was accomplished when the State was destitute of any military organization, without arms of any kind, without munitions of war, without camp equipments, or any provisions to render their condition comfortable, by the patriotic young men of Chicago who were fitted out almost at a day's notice by the generous contributions and active energies of our citizens. To Chicago alone is due the credit and honor of this strategic movement, now acknowledged by the National Government to be one of the most important steps that could have been taken to secure a successful prosecution of the present war.

"The men from Chicago who were first in the field—whose hardships were the greatest, and who, it would be supposed, would have been the first mustered into the United States service, were rejected in the formation of the six regiments, and all now, after having spent an entire month in active duty, are almost destitute of clothing, their citizens' dress having been worn out in the hardships they have endured at Cairo and vicinity. The committee have determined that such of the Chicago soldiers, as have not been mustered into the United States Army, shall be uniformed from the funds contributed by our citizens for war purposes; and they felt this to be a duty imperative upon them in consequence of the neglect of the State Legislature to make necessary provisions for them. * * * * * It will be seen that the entire amount of subscriptions for war purposes and support of families is $36,466.12. Of this sum $25,917.12 has been paid into the hands of the committee, leaving uncollected the sum of $10,449. The amount specially subscribed for family support is $2,950, which has been donated in many instances by gentlemen who have contributed liberally to the general fund also.

"There has been disbursed, to arm, equip and support the men sent to Cairo, before they were mustered into the United States service—for their Quartermaster's department—$19,407 83, and for the Commissary Department for Cairo, $157.34. All, or most of what we expended, will be refunded to us by the State.

"There has been expended, thus far, to aid companies while procuring enlistments, and for music, sustenance of soldiers, expenses of the meeting at National Hall, telegraphing and other incidental expenses, the sum of $4,178.55, and the further sum of $7,465.00 for the support of families, making a total expenditure of $24,490.22. The committee contracted for five hundred and fifty uniforms at an early day, designed for Captain Smith's Artillery, for two companies Chicago Zouaves, and for Captain Harding's company, which have been delayed longer than was expected—these are now expected daily. They also contracted for one thousand one hundred shirts, which have arrived and a part of them are delivered. They have contracted for uniforms—in addition to the five hundred and fifty—enough to supply all the companies in Colonel Scott's regiment. These uniforms are all unpaid for, and will cost probably about $10,000.

"In addition to what has been done by the committee, it is understood that individuals have raised enough to uniform Captain Wadsworth's company (13th Illinois Infantry) at Camp Dement, and that about $1,500 have been given to equip a company of light artillery; in addition to which a very considerable amount has been raised to aid the Irish Brigade, which, with the outfit for the Sturges Rifles, will swell the contributions of Chicago to nearly $50,000."

Through the influence of Governor Yates, Senator Trumbull and Hon. Isaac N. Arnold, the following order was obtained from the War Department, May 30, 1861:

"The four regiments of troops organized under the authority of the Illinois Legislature, and commanded respectively by Colonels Scott, Goode, Marsh, and Dougherty (the latter of the Belleville District), and the Independent Regiment, at or near Chicago, Ill., and commanded by Colonel Hecker, or any one or more of said regiments, may report to Major-General McClellan, and by him, or under his order, be mustered and received into what is commonly called the three years' service of the United States.

"General McClellan may, also, in his discretion, receive and attach to the same service any artillery and cavalry companies in Illinois, not exceeding five in number, which are at this date in actual organization, ready for service, and seeking to enter it; provided this does not authorize the raising of new companies, or the calling out of dormant ones under old organizations.

"By special order of the President.

"SIMON CAMERON,
"Secretary of War."

Under the provisions of this order, the so-called "Chicago, or Zouave, Regiment," hitherto commanded by Colonel Joseph R. Scott, was mustered into service as the 19th Illinois Infantry, on the 17th of the following June (Colonel Scott resigning in favor of Colonel John B. Turchin), and the Hecker Regiment on the 8th of July. The Chicago Dragoons, on duty at Cairo; the Washington Light Cavalry, at Camp Yates; and Companies "A" and "B," Chicago Light Artillery, at Cairo, also came within the provisions of the order, and were soon mustered into the service of the United States.

All of the companies above mentioned, except a part of those in the Hecker Regiment, were tendered the Government under both the first and second calls.

CHICAGO'S PERFORMANCE OF ITS DUTY.—From the opening of the summer of 1861, it would be impossible to follow in detail the progress of the work done in the city to aid in carrying on the war. It was continuous, faithful, and nobly generous. The special work of the Board of Trade, Mercantile Association, Young Men's Christian Association, Christian Commission, Soldiers' Home, and other associations, public and private, instrumental in carrying on the immense labor of the war, is described in the sketches of these several organizations, and need be but briefly mentioned here.

Fremont's campaign in Missouri, during the summer of 1861, made the first loud appeal to the sympathies of the people of Chicago in behalf of her soldiers in active service. The 23d Irish Brigade), 37th (Fremont Rifles, 42d one of the regiments of the "Douglas Brigade", were all in Missouri, and in each of these Chicago felt a special interest. After the battle of Lexington, Mo., in September, 1861, in which the 23d lost so heavily, and where it won its first laurels, a large deputation of Sisters of Mercy, assisted by the city, proceeded to the scene of the battle, to care for the wounded and sick left in the hospitals. Robert Collyer, Mrs. O. E. Hosmer, and others, visited the hospitals along the route of Fremont's disastrous marches, bringing back a piteous tale of suffering, which stimulated the citizens to fresh exertions, and made that field the special care of the Chicago Commission until the prevalent misery was, at least partially, alleviated. The care of our soldiers at Cairo, Paducah, Mound City, in camps and hospitals, many of whom were suffering from the ordinary diseases incident to camp life, in addition to the work of organizing, equipping and filling out new regiments, had kept men, women, and even children, active; but it was not until blood was actually shed on the battle-field, and the citizens knew that their wounded heroes were suffering from neglect and lack of the comforts required by sick and disabled men, that they were fully aroused to the magnitude of the home work to be performed. As winter came on, soldiers' wives and children needed more help. With the establishment of Camp Douglas, came an immense amount of sickness among the troops there quartered, and to alleviate their suffering, various aid societies were organized; men and women of Chicago visiting, day after day and month after month, the hospitals of the camp, to carry medicines and delicacies which Government was unable to provide. The Chicago Sanitary Commission was organized late in the fall of 1861; which, although reaching out to the whole Northwest, eventually, made its earliest and most pressing appeals to "the people of Chicago and vicinity." Headquarters being established in the city, it inevitably followed that a large share of the responsibility and labor connected with the organization centered here, and that, in every crisis of the war, the people of the city were expected to rally to its support, as they ever did most generously.

The first decisive battle of the Western Army, on February 14-15, at Fort Donelson, will not soon be forgotten in Chicago. The people had grown very weary with waiting, and every nerve was strained to its utmost tension with anxiety. When the wires flashed back the joyful tidings that the Fort was really ours, for a brief time the cost of the prize was unthought of. "Fort Donelson is taken! Fort Donelson is taken!"—the shout was echoed and re-echoed from one division of the city to another. Business was suspended. The Board of Trade resolved itself into a war meeting. Men shook each other by the hand, and rushed around the next corner to shake again. Children screamed for joy, not knowing why they were glad; women joined in the general jubilee, even while they said, under their breath, "Who are killed and wounded?" Fortunately for Chicago, she was not called upon to mourn for many of her citizens. But one was killed, Oscar Becker, a soldier of Taylor's Battery; and the list of wounded was not large. For the relief of the wounded at Fort Donelson, a large number of nurses and surgeons, with liberal supplies, were sent to the field from the city; the Board of Trade and private citizens joined with the Sanitary Commission in the work of providing and forwarding such. These supplies arrived with the first voluntary contributions that reached the battle-field. After this battle, a large number of Confederate prisoners were sent to Camp Douglas, which then first assumed the aspect of a military prison, it having been occupied, prior to that time, as a rendezvous and school of instruction for Federal recruits. The battle of Shiloh, or Pittsburg Landing, followed close on that of Fort Donelson. Too many of Chicago's sons were stricken down there, to make the victory a glad one; but she worked all the more steadfastly to carry help to the wounded, while she mourned for the dead; and, as at Fort Donelson, her supplies were among the first to reach the field. In April, 1862, when this battle was fought, the regiments in which the city was most largely represented were located as follows:—The 12th, 57th and 58th Infantry, with Batteries "A," "B" and "I," were at Pittsburg Landing and engaged in the battles of the 6th and 7th of April; 19th and 24th, in camp with Mitchel's division, in Kentucky; 37th, in Missouri; 23d, reorganizing at Camp Douglas; 39th, on the Potomac; 42d and 51st, with Pope's Army of the Mississippi. The 8th Cavalry, in which there were two Chicago companies, was with the Army of the Potomac. Before the close of 1862, and ere the fearful struggle at Stone River, the following regiments,—all in part, some wholly, recruited in the city—were in the field: 72d, 82d, 88th, 89th, 90th, 113th and the 127th Infantry; the 9th, 12th and 13th Cavalry, and the Chicago Board-of-Trade, Chicago Mercantile and Rourke's Batteries.

The 19th, 24th, 42d, 51st and 89th Infantry, Board-of-Trade and Bridge's Battery were engaged in the battle of Murfreesboro'; the 72d, 90th, 113th and 127th Infantry were with Sherman on the Mississippi, as were Batteries "A," "B," "I," "L," and the Mercantile. The other regiments in which the city was most interested were at Corinth, on the Potomac and in Missouri. After the battle of Murfreesboro', the Board of Trade sent a delegation to look especially to the wants of the Second Board-of-Trade Regiment (88th) and the Board-of-Trade Battery. In September, 1862, the "Ladies' War Committee" had been organized, which undertook, under the auspices of the Board of Trade, to make garments and otherwise provide for the regiments under the patronage of that body—the ladies doing the work, and the Board furnishing the material. The sewing rooms were superintended by Mrs. O. E. Hosmer. This lady and Mrs. Smith Tinkham were sent by the Board to the field, after the battle of Murfreesboro', to attend personally to the wants of the wounded of the 88th Infantry and Board-of-Trade Battery, and report their condition. They left Chicago, January 6, 1863, and proceeded, via Louisville and Nashville, to their destination, remaining at Murfreesboro' about two months, employed in their work of kindness and mercy. During the first year of its existence, the Ladies' War Fund Association made eight thousand and thirty-four garments for the soldiers, supplying three regiments and a battery.

Relief societies, for the care of soldiers' families, Loyal Leagues, Soup Houses, a Soldiers' Home and Rest, societies and innumerable other agencies for the amelioration of suffering at home, on the field, and in camp and hospital, were established, supported and carried on by the men and women of the city. After every battle, during any long and exhaustive encampment, Chicago was on the field, with her hand outstretched, filled with blessings. Wherever her boys went, she followed; and when they returned, she stood waiting to receive them, generously and gratefully.

The names of the first "War Finance Committee," elected on the evening of April 18, 1861, at Bryan Hall, in whose charge the city fund (subscription fund), for the equipment of volunteers, and the support of their families, was first placed, have been already given, also their statement of May 17th, a month later. On August 10, 1861, the "War Finance Committee" was merged into the "Union Defense Committee," the members of the former being relieved, at their own earnest request, with a unanimous vote of thanks for the faithful manner in which they had performed their duties.

The Union Defense Committee was composed of the following gentlemen: Judge John M. Wilson, Judge Grant Goodrich, Judge Van H. Higgins, Judge Thomas Drummond, Judge George Manierre, E. W. Willard, J. M. Douglas, Thomas Hoyne, Thomas B. Bryan, A. H. Burley, E. C. Larned, J. H. Bowen, J. C. Dore, H. D. Colvin, John Van Arnam, George Schneider, Eliphalet

Wood, Rosell M. Hough, P. S. Yoe, C. G. Wicker and Colonel Joseph H. Tucker. Some time later, a "War Fund Committee" was appointed, to disburse funds raised for war purposes by county and city tax as well as by public and private contributions. From the fund thus raised, by tax, by Board of Trade, Mercantile Association, Young Men's Association, Young Men's Christian Association, and other public institutions, as well as by private contributions, over fifteen hundred soldiers' families, averaging four in a family, derived aid during the continuance of the war. Up to September, 1865, the city and county paid for relief of soldiers' families, $256,000. The Board of Trade disbursed, in the same space of time, for the same purpose, $220,000. In December, 1865, the War Fund Committee passed over to the County Agent the sum still remaining in their hands, he assuming the responsibility of affording such relief to their families as should be thereafter needed.

THE DRAFT.

From Colbert's History of Chicago is quoted the following sketch of the enforcement of the draft in Cook County, in 1864.

THE DRAFT.—On July 4, 1864, President Lincoln issued a call for five hundred thousand men. The quota of Illinois was fixed at 16,182—of which number Cook County was ordered to raise 4,250. It became evident that this excessive quota was deduced from a false basis, purging the enrollment lists of the names of those not liable to military duty. At the same time the legitimate credits of the county were accurately determined. The fact having been demonstrated that the district had been unjustly assessed, a reduction of fifty per cent. was ordered by the Provost-Marshal General. By September 1, the quota of the county had been reduced to 1,818—the sub-district quotas and enrollments being as follows:

On September 5, the Board of Supervisors passed an ordinance authorizing the issue of county script, to the amount of $300,000, and providing that each recruit thereafter sworn into service and credited to Cook County should receive a bounty of $300. In the city, a Board was organized under the title of "The Citizens' Enrollment Committee." This heartily co-operated with the Supervisors, and a joint dispatch to Provost-Marshal General Fry secured the consolidation of the sub-districts of the county on September 16. Drafting was inaugurated on September 26, at which time Cook County was in arrears to the extent of 1,650 men. Although the drawings were spasmodically continued, 1,550 volunteers were obtained in three weeks—leaving a margin of 59 conscripts held to service. On October 22, the district was officially declared free from the draft. The last call, issued in December, 1864, for 300,000 men, found Chicago in trouble. Cook County had already furnished, under previous calls, 10,477 men, towards the 107,300 called for from the whole State, being nearly one-tenth of the whole number, whereas her population was only about one-twelfth of the whole. On the last call, she was assigned 5,200 men as her quota, in reality fifty per cent. more than she was justly entitled to furnish. It is well known that the enrollment in Cook County, and especially in the city—on which basis the quotas were assigned—had been in every case excessive, owing to the fact that aliens, and persons otherwise disqualified from service, were enrolled in common with those liable to military service. This error has frequently been pointed out, and the people called upon to come forward individually, and purge the enrollment list of all spurious names, but the exemptions exhibited little inclination to do so; partly from the indisposition to avail themselves of the very limited facilities furnished for doing so, and partially because they did not wish to expose themselves unnecessarily to the sneers of some who had raised an outcry—they preferred to risk their chances of draft, and procure exemption after the drawing, if needed. Many meetings of the citizens were held, and committees appointed to visit Springfield and Washington to procure a remission of the tax so unjustly levied. But their labors were of little avail, save in procuring a tacit suspension of one-half of the claim, on condition that the other half were raised speedily. Meanwhile recruiting had gone on slowly; the assessment was so enormous that people generally despaired of being able to fill it without a draft, and thought it useless to saddle themselves with additional debts in the vain attempt to avoid the dreaded conscription. Nevertheless, spasmodic efforts were made to fill the quota, and, availing itself of the provisions of an act passed at the recent session of the General Assembly, the Board of Supervisors of this county met in special session on the 7th of February, and voted a bounty of four hundred dollars to each recruit, to apply on the quota—up to that date (February 8,) five hundred and twenty-eight men had been furnished. Recruiting was now stimulated somewhat. It was not till March 2, that the Common Council considered the propriety of offering an additional city bounty, and then the subject was laid over. The quota would have been filled without any great difficulty, had it not been for the wholesale carrying off of recruits to the credit of other localities by the flesh-brokers, most of whom operated through the naval rendezvous. They averaged an abstraction of fully forty men per day from the city, many of whom would have enlisted to the credit of this county, but were allured by higher bounties to swear falsely and be credited elsewhere. Under the stimulus of high bounties, the "jumping" business raged in full force, and patrols were made nightly, for the arrest of bounty-jumpers, two of whom were shot near Camp Fry, on the night of March 13. Recruiting gradually became more vigorous under the constant threat of the draft, and brokers were kept busy in procuring substitutes. The Soldiers' Rest, as well as the County Jail, were used as places of rendezvous for recruits, and the former place was prepared for the turn of the "wheel" in the office of the Provost Marshal. The quota was not filled in spite of all efforts, and the box of fate, used instead of the wheel, was ordered to turn, when the fall of Petersburg gave a temporary cessation. There was no official order to stop, but everybody felt that the end of the rebellion was near, and the quickly succeeding fall of Richmond, on the 2d of April, put an effectual bar on the draft. The order to stop was not, however, sent, and the bounties were still paid to large number of recruits, who pressed forward all the more numerous as the chances of fighting diminished. On the 12th of April, the Board of Supervisors ordered that the payment of bounties should cease, and the next day came the news that no more recruits would be insisted on. Cook County sent in all 22,532 men to the Union ranks, with only one partial draft, and for all, except fifty of those then drafted, substitutes were procured by the draft committees before the time of departure arrived; and of those drafted men, seven were relieved at Springfield. The unjust enrollment fell with especial hardship on the towns in the country, in some of which one soldier was called for out of every five men enrolled, and they had previously furnished nearly the same proportion but a few months before. To their credit be it said, they never complained of the manifest hardship, but went to work manfully and raised the men. By liberal subscription among themselves, and hearty working, the majority of the towns cleared themselves of the draft, while the people inside the city were talking about it.

MEN FURNISHED.—The number of men furnished from the county was:

Previous to the establishment of the Provost Marshal's office, end of October, 1863	16,660
November 1st, 1863, to December, 1864	1,817
On call of December, 1864	3,572
Total furnished	22,532

Of those furnished under the call of December, 1864, nearly, or quite, all were enlisted during 1865.

The following table shows the men enlisted under the eighteen months' regime of the Provost Marshal:

White volunteer recruits	4,527
Colored volunteer recruits	116
Representative recruits	44
Substitutes for enrolled men	655
Drafted men forwarded	59
Substituted for drafted men	428
Recruits for veteran reserve corps	43
Total	5,872

To which we may add, that 794 deserters were arrested and returned to their regiments, and that Cook County probably furnished one thousand unaccredited men to the navy.

The following is Mr. Colbert's estimate of the money actually expended by Cook County for the war, outside the cost of the Provost Marshal's department ($77,089):

Paid by city for bounties, from October, 1863	$ 119,742
Paid by county, from October, 1863	2,571,172
Paid by towns and wards, from October, 1863	734,453
Paid by representatives and substitutes	56,350
Paid by county to families	166,034
Paid by city to families	90,809
Paid by Board of Trade to families	220,000
Paid by Mercantile Association to families	75,000
Total	$4,027,560

This was the estimated cost to the county, outside its share in the actual cost of the war to the General Government, that being in round numbers $3,350,000,000, and Cook County's share of payment into the Federal Treasury being, in 1865, in the proportion of 58 to 3,350, gives $58,000,000 as its share in the Government expense, making a total of $62,000,000 borne, or assumed, by Cook County for the suppression of the Rebellion.

The following regiments, in which Chicago was largely represented in either officers or men, or in both, and many of which were under the especial care of city organizations, were mustered into United States service, and left for the field at the dates mentioned. The particulars of their organization, and their war record, is given in the sketches of the several regiments. As a preface to the recital of regimental prowess, it is but justice to one of our "Boys in Blue" that he should receive a mention—the more especially as his name is one cherished in the heart of every soldier and honored by the State and Nation.

JOHN A. LOGAN, it is needless to say, is one of those national characters firmly established in the hearts and confidence of the people. He is a rare combination of the plain, blunt soldier, and the straightforward, able and successful statesman, whom men delight to honor, for affection and judgment work hand in hand to perpetuate his fame. Before the conclusion of the war, he acquired the proud distinction of being promoted to a major-generalship of volunteers, and this honor will be the more appreciated when it is remembered that, previous to the war, General Logan had little military experience or instruction, but had been educated in the law, in which profession it was his design to make his record. Senator Logan was born in Jackson County, Ill., February 9, 1826, his father, Dr. John Logan, having emigrated from Ireland previous to his son's birth. Dr. Logan was a man of education, and believed in thoroughly drilling the mind as well as the body; consequently, he instructed his son so as to enable him to enter, at an early day, Louisville University, whence he subsequently graduated. At the breaking out of the Mexican War, John A. Logan's military instincts were aroused, and he enlisted as a private in the 1st Illinois Infantry Volunteers, but was chosen lieutenant of one of the companies. Even at that early age, and without previous instruction, a novice in the art of war, he attracted general attention by his bravery and ability, and soon rose to a place on the regimental staff, and to the positions of quartermaster and adjutant. Entering the office of his uncle, Governor Alexander M. Jenkins, in 1849, he commenced the study of law, and was admitted to the Bar in 1852. In 1849, while still pursuing his studies, he was elected county clerk of Jackson County, and, in 1852 was chosen prosecuting attorney of the Third Judicial District, holding the position for five years. Commencing with that year, he was elected to the Legislature for three successive terms, being chosen a presidential elector, on the Democratic ticket, in 1856, and a member of Congress in 1858. At that time, in connection with his uncle, he had acquired an extensive law practice, and was among the most popular public men in Southern Illinois. When the war broke out, he still held his seat in Congress, but had boldly abandoned his former associates, many of whom were in full sympathy with secession, and stood up firmly and eloquently for the Union. It is due as much to his bravery upon the floors of Congress as to any other cause, that the people of Southern Illinois held unflinchingly to the support of the Union. But this was not the sort of warfare that Senator Logan proposed to wage against secession, and, consequently, in the summer of 1861, he fought at Bull Run, in the ranks. After fighting at Bull Run, he returned to Congress; but still feeling that sturdy arms were needed at the front more pressingly than brave words at Washington, he entered the service as colonel of the 31st Illinois Infantry Volunteers. On September 18, 1861, he was mustered into the service by Captain T. G. Pitcher, U. S. A., his regiment being assigned to the brigade of General John A. McClernand. In November, the 31st Regiment was engaged in the battle of Belmont, Colonel Logan's horse being shot from under him. He shared in the sufferings from cold and exposure of the winter campaign in Kentucky, and, in February, 1862, embarked with his command for Fort Henry. That stronghold was occupied on the 6th of the month—Colonel Logan evincing the same gallantry in action, which made him so prominent a mark for rebel bullets, a week later, at Fort Donelson. There he shared in General Grant's honors, being severely wounded while leading an assault. On March 21, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, commanding the First Brigade, First Division, Reserve Army of the Tennessee, his old regiment still being under the general command. In the fall of 1862, during the Mississippi campaign, General Logan was placed in command of the Third Division, Seventeenth Army Corps, his corps commander being General J. B. McPherson. During the latter portion of the year, the troops remained in camp on the Tallahatchie River. At Port Gibson, Raymond, Jackson, and Champion Hill, up to the siege of Vicksburg, from May 19 to July 4, 1863, General Logan increased the reputation for bravery and ability which already had made his name dear to the entire Army of the Tennessee. Upon the latter day, his column was the first to enter Vicksburg, and he himself was made military governor of the city. In November, 1863, he succeeded General Sherman in the command of the Fifteenth Army Corps, leading the advance at Resaca, repulsing Hardee at Dallas, and dislodging the enemy at Kennesaw Mountain. In July, 1864, when General McPherson fell at Atlanta, General Logan took command of the Army of the Tennessee. With Sherman, during the remainder of the war, General Logan led his troops and shared in the glory of the grand and effectual movements, and his farewell address to the Army of the Tennessee will long be remembered by war-scarred veterans as a model of eloquence and manly pathos. In 1866, 1868 and 1870, having been mustered out of the service with a record which stands highest in the list of volunteer generals, General Logan was elected to Congress by the Republican party, and commenced again to up-build that reputation for statesmanship which had been temporarily eclipsed by his military renown. Before he had taken his seat in the Forty-second Congress, however, he was elected to the United States Senate, where he has since been among its most prominent figures. As the Republican nominee for the vice-presidency, his canvass during the Fall of 1884 will go into history as an exhibition of dignity, both in uncertainty and defeat, which has more than ever raised him in the estimation of the Nation; and his election to the Senatorship in 1885, after the protracted contest in the Legislature, but added to the National honor accorded him. Senator Logan was married, in 1855, to Miss Mary Cunningham, daughter of Captain Cunningham, of Marion, Ill., an officer of the Mexican War. In every sense of the word, Mrs. Logan has been a helpmate to her husband, there being few women in this, or any other, country, whose opinion on public affairs and public men is more valued, or who has been more actively engaged as an actual manager of political events, momentous to the country's interests. They have two children, a daughter and a son.

TWELFTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE TWELFTH ILLINOIS was organized as a three months' regiment in accordance with General Order No. 2, issued at a special session of the Illinois Legislature, April, 1861, providing for the immediate organization of six regiments of Infantry; that being the quota assigned to the State under the first call of President Lincoln for seventy-five thousand troops to serve one hundred days.

These regiments were speedily raised, and, as the Illinois regiments formerly serving in the Mexican War were designated by numbers up to seven, these, although the earliest that entered the United States service from the State at the breaking out of the Rebellion, were called the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th Infantry, composing the "First Brigade, Illinois Volunteers," commanded by Colonel B. F. Prentiss.

The 12th Illinois, while not distinctively a Chicago regiment, was the first mustered into service, in which the city was represented, consisting of two companies, "A" and "K" and most of the field and staff officers. The regiment was mustered-in at Springfield, Ill., May 2, 1861. Following is the original roster of officers:

Colonel, John McArthur, Chicago; Lieutenant-Colonel, August L. Chetlain, Galena; Major, William D. Williams, Rock Island. Company "A," Captain, Joseph Kellogg, Chicago; First Lieutenant, John Noyes, Jr., Chicago; Second Lieutenant, Arthur C. Ducat, Chicago. Company "K," Captain, James R. Hugunin, Chicago; First Lieutenant, William E. Waite, Chicago; Second Lieutenant, Eben Bacon, Chicago.

The 12th left camp at Springfield, May 10, and proceeded with the First Brigade to Cairo, where Colonel Prentiss relieved General Swift in command of the post. The services of the troops at Cairo and in its vicinity were peculiarly disheartening. An unhealthy climate, bad water, unsuitable food, and poor shelter, combined to make their first experience of military life a trying one. The ranks of the sick in the hospitals rapidly filled up, the lines grew thin, and in the absence of the excitement attendant upon hostilities, it seemed as if they were suffering to no purpose. Therefore, when on the 28th of the month, an arrangement was made by the War Department, whereby the regiment might reenlist immediately for three years, provided four-fifths were willing, the proposition was declined. By the latter part of July, however, before its term of service had expired, the necessity for soldiers was plainly seen, and the 12th offered its services. The offer was accepted, and the regiment was mustered-in accordingly at Cairo, Ill., on August 1, for three years; the field and staff officers, and officers of Companies "A" and "K" (Chicago), being

Colonel, John McArthur, promoted brigadier-general, March

21, 1862; Lieutenant-Colonel, A. L. Chetlain, promoted colonel, April 1, 1862; Major, William D. Williams; Adjutant, J. Bates Dickson; Quartermaster, S. R. Wetmore; Surgeon, Horace Warden, promoted brigade-surgeon; First Assistant Surgeon, James H. Farris; Chaplain, Joel Grant.

Co. "A": Captain, Arthur C. Ducat, promoted major and lieutenant-colonel; First Lieutenant, William Fisher, promoted captain; Second Lieutenant, Duncan McLean, promoted first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, and to captain; Second Lieutenant, Washington Van Horn, promoted first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant, James B. Johnston.

Co. "K": Captain, James R. Hugunin, promoted major and brevet brigadier-general; First Lieutenant, William E. Waite, promoted captain; Second Lieutenant, Eben Bacon, resigned November, 1861; Second Lieutenant, C. E. Beaumont, promoted first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant, Henry B. Wager, promoted first lieutenant; Second Lieutenant, Leroy Clark, died August, 1862; Second Lieutenant, Francis Rutgers.

The regiment remained at Cairo until September 5, when, with the 9th Illinois Infantry, Colonel E. A. Paine, it was sent to occupy Paducah. The invasion of the sacred soil of Kentucky by "Lincoln's hirelings" was a highly improper proceeding, from the stand-point of some of the residents of that town, and the necessity they were under of hauling down various ensigns of rebellion was not at all to their liking. The camp of the 12th was on the left bank of the Ohio River, about half a mile west of the United States Marine Hospital, between which and the camp lay a gently undulating, grassy tract, some forty acres in extent. On this plot were held reviews and exercises in arms; it was the practice ground of Battery "A," Chicago Light Artillery, which here acquired that proficiency in drill which was one of its characteristics throughout a long and splendid career. The regiment was armed with smooth-bore muskets (calibre 69, which bore the government stamp "Harper's Ferry," and were known by this name.

The uniform at this time consisted of a short-skirted gray jacket, light blue trousers, and gray felt hats with leather visor, the rim, back of the visor, being fastened by buttons at the side. Overcoats of regulation pattern were supplied in due time. On the 24th of September, a detachment of the 12th (four companies), under Lieutenant-Colonel Chetlain, was sent by General C. F. Smith, then commanding at Paducah, to occupy Smithland, a quiet old town at the junction of the Cumberland and Ohio rivers, in Kentucky. Taking position on the heights commanding the rivers and all avenues leading to the town, it erected batteries, and made the point a rendezvous for the Union men of the surrounding country.

On the morning of the 5th of November, that portion of the regiment remaining in Paducah was ordered to prepare three days' rations and be ready to march at an hour's notice. At half-past ten the following day, General Paine received orders from General Smith to report at headquarters at two o'clock p. m., with the 9th, 12th, 40th and 41st Illinois Infantry, four pieces of Buell's Battery, and Thieleman's Cavalry, in marching condition. Reporting at the designated time, General Paine was ordered to take the troops, march to Melvin, thence to Blandville, and thence, through Loudenville, back to Paducah, not avoiding the enemy, but in no case to engage unless attacked in corresponding force.

That evening the command marched fifteen miles; and the following morning, when approaching Melvin, heard the roar of the conflict at Belmont. General Paine changed the direction of his march toward Columbus, which was opposite Belmont and thirty-four miles distant. When he reached Milburn, thirteen miles northeast of Columbus, he was met by scouts, who reported the battle ended; and, it being then too late to be of service, the command returned to Paducah, arriving the following day. The following account of this march, from unpublished papers of an old member of the regiment, may be interesting:

"Early one morning in November, the camp was thrown into great excitement by marching orders. All sorts of rumors were afloat. The 'greenhorns' packed their knapsacks till the straps would hardly buckle over them—three days' rations and forty rounds of ammunition were served out. Those unlucky fellows who were obliged to remain as camp guards looked wofully at the busy preparations and bewailed their fate. No glory for them! Early in the afternoon of November 6, General Paine's brigade filed past General Smith's headquarters on the road leading south. A southwesterly direction was held till about fifteen miles had been paced off, when the troops bivouacked for the night.

"The march was resumed in the morning and kept up without any unusual circumstance till about the middle of the afternoon, when the sound of cannon was plainly heard. 'Who can forget it? The first sound of battle! We were headed toward Columbus; we were marching to the support of our comrades! Should we be there in time? An altered demeanor was visible at once, chaffing and frivolity gave place to earnest conversation and eager conjecture. The men drew together in close order. The step was quickened, and mile after mile was paced off without a halt. The great guns were at it still. The sounds were plainly nearer and more distinct. 'How far to Columbus?' we demanded from a Kentuckian, who gazed stolidly at us from behind a rail fence. 'About fourteen miles, I reckon,' was the reply. It sounded like a long distance to men who had already marched since daylight; and still as the question was repeated, from time to time came back the same answer from others further on, 'about fourteen miles,' or 'fourteen miles and a right smart.'

"We must have marched five miles, during which the same aggravating replies were made. Night was falling and the roar of the guns had ceased when the troops halted for the night.

"It had been a trying day for men unaccustomed to the march, and sleep was sweet. Although stiff and footsore, they were, when morning dawned, still eager for the fray. What was their disappointment and chagrin when, a few hours after, they were asked and took up their line of march for the camp they had so recently quitted with such martial ardor. On the afternoon of the third day the brigade reached their old quarters in Paducah.

"The return march had not been altogether orderly; great numbers had fallen behind, to favor aching joints and blistered feet, and it is not surprising that there was an active demand for such refreshments as the country afforded. These were appropriated, as the exigencies of the service seemed to require, by the various stragglers, and loud and long complaints at General Smith's headquarters by the aggrieved countrymen, was the result. The 41st seemed to have been settled upon as the prime depredaters, and there was some talk of a stoppage of pay, but nothing came of it.

"Not long after, the regiment was visited by a delegation of the Scotch citizens of Chicago, and presented with a stand of colors. This was not only a graceful and patriotic act, but distinctively a recognition of the influence which their fellow countryman, Colonel McArthur, and other members of the old Highland Guards, of Chicago, had exercised in the formation of the regiment.

"About the middle of January, a demonstration in force upon Forts Henry and Heiman, on the Tennessee River, was made by the troops from Paducah, under Brigadier-General C. F. Smith. This march (to Calloway Landing and return) was made under great difficulties, by reason of the terrible condition of the roads and the great length of the wagon-train, and has some significance as having so soon preceded the more general forward movement which resulted in the destruction of these forts and capture of Fort Donelson. It was on the night following the return from this march, that one of the camp guards, a soldier of Co. 'A,' was fired on from the bush, a few yards from his beat. The shot was well aimed, and only failed of its purpose from the fact that the sentry was at the moment carrying his piece diagonally across his body. The ball struck the musket-barrel and glanced off, wounding the fingers of one hand in its course. Whoever perpetrated the deed, escaped under cover of the darkness."

On the 25th of January, 1862, Lieutenant-Colonel Chetlain rejoined the portion of the regiment at Paducah. Colonel McArthur had been assigned to the command of a brigade in General Smith's division, and Chetlain was in command of the regiment, when, on the 5th of February, it embarked on the Tennessee, and proceeded toward Fort Henry. Arriving within four miles of the fort, the troops landed, and in the midst of a violent thunderstorm, with the rain pouring in torrents, encamped for the night. In the morning, the Second Division moved up the west bank of the river, and occupied Fort Heiman, on the high ground opposite Fort Henry—Foote, with his gun boats, having forced the rebels to evacuate both. The regiment remained at Fort Heiman until the 12th, and on the morning of that day, with the 9th and 41st Illinois Infantry—constituting McArthur's brigade—crossed the Tennessee and marched for Fort Donelson, being in the rear of the troops that proceeded from Fort Henry. The brigade encamped that night about a mile and a half from the battle-field of Fort Donelson. On the morning of the 13th, it was detached temporarily from General C. F. Smith's division, and ordered to support the batteries of Major Cavender (Callender?), then in position against the center of the enemy's works.

Late in the afternoon, the 12th was moved toward the left of General McClernand's division, and nearer the enemy's lines, where it threw up, during the night, two small earth-works on a hill in front of its camp, in which were planted two field-pieces, which, however, were never used. The other regiments of the brigade were moved to another point, and the 12th occupied this position twenty-four hours, remaining under arms all night in the midst of a driving snow storm. Just before nightfall on the following day, the entire brigade was moved, in compliance with the order of General McClernand, to the extreme right of the Union line, where it arrived about seven o'clock in the evening.

The 12th, which had at that time six hundred and twelve effective men, besides its officers, camped that night within four or five hundred yards of Indian Creek. From the position occupied by the regiment could be seen the dome of the Court House in Dover, a village within the rebel lines, and about a mile higher up the river. On the right of the 12th was the 9th Illinois—in column by companies; between the two ran the road which led into Dover. On this road, and at this point, was first felt the fury of the rebel attack, which was made in the gray light of the morning of the 15th of February. Nothing could have been more sudden or startling. The men, who were trying to keep life in their benumbed limbs by the dying embers of the camp fires, leaped to their feet and grasped their arms. "Left half wheel! Forward into line!" shouted the colonel of the 9th Illinois. To gain time for formation, two companies of the 12th—"A," Captain William Fisher, and "B," Captain John T. Hale—were deployed forward. The maneuver was executed, and the object accomplished, but at a dreadful loss of life in proportion to the number engaged. Captain Hale, a valuable and highly esteemed officer, was among the slain. The troops to right and left were soon engaged, and the battle in McClernand's front became general.

What follows is already history. This portion of the line bore the brunt of the deadly struggle. A few only of the enemy escaped, and most of them who were left alive were driven within the defenses, to be surrendered as prisoners of war. In the afternoon of the same day (the 15th), the brigade (McArthur's) was ordered to rejoin its own division on the left, where the remaining brigade, under General C. F. Smith, had already rendered such splendid service that, taken in connection with the event of the battle on the right, the enemy was forced to surrender. Among those especially commended for gallant conduct in this engagement, were Major Ducat, Lieutenant James N. McArthur, of Co. "G," and Lieutenant Duncan McLean, of Co. "A"—all of whom displayed wonderful bravery and efficiency, and whose record was alike honorable to themselves and the city which sent them to the field. Co. "A" lost nearly half its men, killed or wounded, during the struggle on the morning of the 15th.

The total loss of the regiment was one officer, Captain John Tyler Hale, and eighteen enlisted men killed; one officer and sixty-one enlisted men wounded, and eight enlisted men missing. On Sunday morning, February 16, 1862, Colonel McArthur marched his brigade into Fort Donelson, where the 12th was employed for a week in guarding prisoners and stores. On the 22d of February, it was moved, with other troops of General Grant's command, up the river to Nashville, but, without leaving the steamer, returned to Clarksville, Tenn., where it occupied Fort Sevier until March 6, at which time it embarked for Pittsburg Landing.

On the way up the Tennessee, the steamer "Glendale," which bore the 12th, was in the advance, if we except the black and sullen gunboats which, with open ports, convoyed the fleet. In due time the fleet arrived at Pittsburg Landing, where the troops disembarked and went into camp, the position of General Smith's division being about one mile west of the Landing. Several weeks of inaction followed, during which the force was increased by the arrival of new troops, many of whom were to experience, for the first time, war's alarms and terrors, with scant preparation and on uncommonly short notice. The morning of Sunday, April 6, 1862, broke brightly upon the camp at Pittsburg Landing. After morning-calls and breakfast, the regiment paraded for the regular Sunday inspection. It could hardly have been earlier than eight o'clock, and the battle, unknown to the troops near the Landing, had been in progress for hours. If any firing had been heard in the regimental camp, it had, up to this time, been so distant and fitful, as to attract no attention; but now, questioning looks were exchanged, and while all were wondering what the threatening sounds might portend, the summons came. From the parade ground, where it had assembled in all the promise of another pleasant, uneventful day, the regiment marched to battle. While the division (then commanded by General W. H. L. Wallace) was on the way to the front, Colonel David Stuart, whose brigade occupied the extreme left of the Union line, sent to General Wallace for reinforcements. McArthur's brigade was ordered to his support. Thus again it happened, as at Fort Donelson, that untoward circumstances prevented united action on the part of the brigades of this division. On reaching Colonel Stuart's position, McArthur's brigade formed in line with that officer's command. The ground on McArthur's right, for a space equal to a regimental front, was open, and to prevent undue exposure, the 9th Illinois, which occupied this part of the line, was advanced to the cover of timber, which skirted the space in front. The 12th Illinois formed the right of what remained of McArthur's brigade. In front, the ground fell rapidly away for two or three hundred yards, then rose again—the opposite elevation, as well as most of the intervening space, being well wooded. The trees, however, had not put forth their leaves, or the enemy could have masked his movements beyond all discernment. The firing had not as yet extended so far to the Union left, and there was time to note that, although it was continuous, it was not regular, but rose in volume at intervals of time and space, in such a way as plainly to indicate rapid and heavy concentrations. Indeed, the enemy could occasionally be seen, as on the opposite side of a fenced field, moving by the flank, in double-quick time. An attack would follow such a movement, so vigorous and persistent, that the Union line, hastily formed, as it had been, and with no provision for adequate support, almost invariably, if not inevitably, gave way, sometimes hopelessly shattered, generally to re-form, and with diminished numbers to continue the struggle. Notwithstanding all that has yet been written of this battle, few realize the determined, protracted and bloody resistance offered by some of the troops engaged; not otherwise could the rebel host have been held at bay throughout those long hours, till the death of their gallant leader brought some respite. Gradually the firing extended toward McArthur's brigade. It was probably between nine and ten o'clock a. m. The troops to the right and front were all engaged. The din of battle was terrible. The frightened hares sprang from the thicket, and crouched bewildered at the feet of the waiting men. The wounded began to stream back from the 9th. On the right of the 9th was a battery, which had been well served; now its firing grew more rapid and nervous. All eyes were strained to catch the first glimpse of the foe. A bit of color first caught the eye. It yielded to the breeze. There they were, the "Stars and Bars." As quickly as the intervening space could be traversed, the enemy broke cover, and the storm of battle fell.

The whole division was speedily engaged in one of the most bloody conflicts of that eventful day. General Wallace, after holding the enemy in check during four successful charges on his line, gave the order to retire about four o'clock in the afternoon, after his support, both on right and left, had given way. Just as he gave the order, and with cool, collected bravery was animating and encouraging his men, he fell, mortally wounded, and was borne from the field. General McArthur also being wounded, the command of the division devolved on Colonel J. M. Tuttle, of the Iowa brigade, as the ranking officer. He rallied what was left of his own regiment, and with the 12th and 9th Illinois, the 13th Iowa, and fragments of other regiments, formed in line on the road down which the rebels were advancing toward the Landing, and held them in check until the line was formed that successfully resisted the last charge of the enemy just before dark. The 12th may justly claim the proud distinction of being one of those regiments that held their ground amid the general break of the Union lines on that dismal Sunday afternoon. On Monday, the 7th of April, Lieutenant-Colonel Chetlain being ill, Major Hugunin (formerly Captain Hugunin, Company "K") took command of the regiment, which then formed a part of the reserve force of General Buell; in the course of whose attack the 12th occupied nearly the same position as on Sunday morning. On Tuesday, the regiment was on duty all day, and not until after dark was ordered to camp. The loss of the 12th in the engagements at Shiloh was one hundred and nine men killed and wounded, and seven missing. Among the killed was Lieutenant Wright Seamen, of Co. "C," and Captain Frank B. Ferris, of Co. "L." Captains Duncan McLean, of Co. "A," and William E. Waite, of Co. "K," both of Chicago, were wounded. Among the rebel dead nearest the last line held by the Federals, were some of a singularly foreign aspect—clear-skinned, dark-complexioned, oval-faced young fellows. They evidently were of one race, and that unlike any in the Northern army. They wore Zouave jackets, dark blue in color, as were also the trousers, well-made shoes that laced above the ankles, and woolen underclothing of a red and white check. They were evidently from Louisiana, as the waist-belt plate bore the arms of that State,—a pelican feeding her young.

After the battle, Brigadier-General Thomas A. Davies succeeded General Wallace in the command of the division. The following incident, which occurred during the advance on Corinth, will serve to illustrate the character of the man, who, throughout the remainder of the war, commanded the brigade to which the 12th belonged, oftener and for longer periods than any other officer. This was Colonel Aug. Mersey, of the 9th Illinois Infantry. The division was in line of battle at the time, a lively fire was going on among the skirmishers, and the wounded were dropping in considerable numbers to the rear. At this stage of the war, a wound, however slight, was very likely to result in a furlough, if the soldier asked it, and he could go home and be sure of a warm welcome and many flattering attentions. The temptation to risk a slight wound was consequently great. The 9th was on the right of the 12th, and, as the firing increased, Colonel Mersey was seen to move to the front of his regiment, where officers and men were standing, watchful and expectant. He had not been there long before he sent for his Assistant Surgeon. This officer came, provided with appliances for dressing slight wounds, and as the wounded approached, some with well-assumed ruefulness, the Colonel hailed them in his well-known accent, and proceeded with the assistance of "saw-bones" to find out just how badly wounded they were. If the case was at all serious, the soldier was directed to the hospital; but, if otherwise, plaster or bandage was applied on the spot, and the unlucky candidate for honors was directed to shoulder his gun and report at the front, and try to give some fellow on the other side a chance for a furlough.

After the evacuation of Corinth, which was announced by loud and frequent explosions, and the smoke of burning stores, pursuit was begun, but soon abandoned, and Davies's division went into camp on the line of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, about two miles south of the town. During the preceding months the men had been so often under fire, or in such proximity to the enemy, that a strain upon the nervous system was inevitable. They were glad of an opportunity to make themselves comfortable once more. Five months of such campaigning take the edge off the keenest appetite for war. General Davies, however, was not disposed to let his command rest upon their laurels, much less allow their arms to rust in idleness. His standard of military efficiency was high, and he was impatient of any shortcomings. Regulations were strictly enforced, and the utmost circumspection was required of all officers and men while on duty. Guard-mount and dress-parade became impressive affairs, while drill, by company and regiment, was as much a daily duty as attendance at roll-call. The General from time to time manoeuvred his command in person, interspersing his exercises with inspections and grand reviews, when the division appeared in all its glory. As a result there was a marked improvement in the dress and bearing of the men. On one occasion, the camp guard of the 12th having turned out to salute General Rosecrans, that officer stopped, and having inquired to whose command the guard belonged, made some very complimentary remarks on the neat appearance of the camp and the soldierly bearing of the men on duty. A company officer, in a private letter, written about this time, speaks of his comrades as follows :

"I have never seen a regiment which could execute the manual of arms as well as we can, and only one that can perform the evolutions better, and that one is the 9th Illinois, with which we have been so continuously associated."

Notwithstanding the attention paid to the police of the camp and to other conditions of health, there was much sickness. The climate was so enervating that few had vitality enough to resist its influence, in the absence of any incentive to exertion. The appetite failed, and men became listless, low-spirited and homesick. Imprudence in diet was apt to result in diseases to which, in their apathetic state, men rapidly succumbed. The hostilities of an active campaign seem hardly to reduce the effective strength of an army more rapidly than camp life under such conditions. But more stirring times were at hand. On September 17, the division broke camp on short notice and marched with other troops from Corinth, in the direction of Iuka, distant southeast about twenty miles. General E. O. C. Ord, who was in command, expected to co-operate with General Rosecrans in an attack upon General Sterling Price, at that place; but Price, becoming alarmed, attacked Rosecrans before the junction could be made, and succeeded in effecting his escape. In the disposition of the troops after this battle, the 12th was left as a garrison at Burnsville, a station on the railroad between Iuka and Corinth.

On the morning of October 3, the day of the opening of the battle of Corinth, Colonel Chetlain arrived at that place, from Burnsville, with six companies of the 12th Illinois, the other four being ordered to move across the country as guard to the baggage train. At nine o'clock the regiment joined its brigade, and moved out to the old Confederate line of breastworks, north of the village, where Rosecrans' line of battle was formed, Davies's division holding the center. Oglesby's brigade, to which the 12th belonged, formed the right of the division, supporting Richardson's 1st Missouri Battery. In the attack of the Confederate army that morning, McArthur's brigade, to the left of Davies's division, was first struck by the Confederate troops, and after hard fighting forced back, leaving Davies's left flank exposed. Upon this division a heavy front and flank attack was made, and it also, after a long and obstinate resistance, fell back about a thousand yards, with the loss of two heavy guns. The command continued contesting against tremendous odds, and receded from one position only to defend another until night. Every brigade commander was either killed or wounded, General Oglesby among the latter. The loss in the 12th was ninety killed and wounded. The strength of the regiment, as reported for duty at the close of the first day's engagement, was two hundred and fifty-six men and sixteen line officers. In the formation of General Rosecrans's line on the morning of October 4, General Davies's division still held the center. On the right of the division, and in rear of Fort Powell (an unfinished redoubt), the 12th was posted. This redoubt, and the fort on the left, known as Battery Robinet, were the salient points of General Rosecrans's line. Upon these, therefore, after desultory firing during the early morning, the serious attacks of the enemy were directed. A temporary advantage was gained in the assault on Fort Powell. At the crisis of the action, and before infantry supports could be pushed into the redoubt, the gunners decided that the time had come to save their pieces if they could, the enemy being at the embrasures. One of them had already been felled with a hand-spike, when the order to limber up was given. It could only partially be obeyed, for the horses were in a high state of excitement. They were with difficulty restrained, and, finally, becoming unmanageable, they dashed through the ranks of the 12th, and threw the right and center of the regiment into confusion. Before it could rally and re-form, the front line had been driven back and the battery captured. While the scattered portions of the regiment were re-forming, the left, under Captain Guy C. Ward, rushed forward, and the 52d and 55th Illinois coming up to his support, the enemy was driven from the battery at the point of the bayonet, the regimental colors planted on the redan, the guns manned, and, with the help of the artillerymen, turned upon the rebels, now in full retreat. A portion of the 12th pushed forward in pursuit, and Private David Osby, of Co. "K" (Chicago, captured the color-bearer and flag of a Louisiana regiment. Captain William E. Waite, of Co. "K," was one of the first men in the redan, and assisted in working the battery. Captain Ward was killed while rallying his men to the charge for the recapture of the battery. With Battery Powell again in its possession, the whole line advanced, and the rebels, foiled at all points, gave up the contest and commenced their retreat toward the Hatchie.

On October 21, Colonel Chetlain was placed in command of the post of Corinth, where the regiment remained, with occasional expeditions into the surrounding country, until June, 1863. It then moved to Pocahontas, Tenn., where it guarded a line of railroad until the 26th of October, moving thence, with a portion of the Sixteenth Army Corps, under General G. M. Dodge, to Pulaski, Tenn., where it arrived November 11. During November, the 12th was ordered to Richland Station, on the Nashville & Decatur Railroad, where it remained two months, guarding a portion of that road. In December, Colonel Chetlain was appointed brigadier-general.

In January, 1864, three hundred and eleven men and twenty-four officers of the regiment, after re-enlisting, returned to Illinois on veteran furlough, the remainder—about ninety men—remaining at Pulaski, under command of Captain J. D. Towner. The regiment remained in Illinois on furlough until March 1, when, having reorganized at Camp Fry, Chicago, with Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Van Teller, formerly Captain of Co. "E," in command, it rejoined its division at Pulaski, March 3; and, on the 28th of April proceeded to Chattanooga to engage in the Atlanta Campaign. It was there assigned to the Second Brigade (Colonel P. E. Burke); Second Division (Brigadier-General Thomas W. Sweeney); Sixteenth Army Corps (Major-General G. M. Dodge), forming a part of the Army of Tennessee, under McPherson.

In the forward movement toward the enemy, McPherson's command formed the extreme right of Sherman's Army, and moved from headquarters at Lee and Gordon's Mills on May 4, under orders to pass through Ship Gap, in Taylor's Ridge, march, via Villanow, to and through Snake Creek Gap, seize the railroad in rear of Dalton, where Johnston had concentrated his army, and, finally, move upon and hold Resaca, farther south; thus flanking his position, which, guarded in front by Rocky Face, with its single narrow pass—Buzzard Roost—strengthened by batteries and defended by the veterans of the Confederate Army, was impregnable to direct assault. Snake Creek Gap, about fifteen miles south of Buzzard Roost, is a narrow picturesque defile, nearly five miles in length, through the Chattanooga Mountains. Its sides, high, rugged and densely wooded, shut out the sun from the wagon track at their base, save at mid-day. Snake Creek, running through the gap, enters the Oostenaula River below Resaca. On Monday, May 9, McPherson reached the western entrance of the pass, and, the following day, Sweeney's division leading the advance, with the 9th Illinois Mounted Infantry deployed in front as skirmishers, moved through the gap, meeting with no resistance. In the battle before Resaca, May 14-15, Sweeney's division took no part, having been sent, on the morning of the 14th, to Lay's ferry on the Oostenaula, below Resaca, to cover the laying of a pontoon bridge. The opposite bank of the river was lined with the enemy's skirmishers, who watched every movement and threatened every avenue of approach. As soon as the pontoons were ready, the division moved rapidly from under cover to the brink of the river, and silenced the riflemen on the other side, compelling them to "lie low" till the bridge was laid. The crossing commenced immediately, and the troops to the right and left of the bridge were ordered back, too soon it proved, for the enemy—except at the bridge and for a short distance above and below—was unaware of the crossing and in ignorance of his own danger, but still awaiting his opportunity to strike. This was the situation in front of the 12th. As soon, therefore, as the regiment faced to the right about, to withdraw, the enemy rose and commenced fighting. It is doubtful whether the regiment ever gave a better proof of its steadiness, than it did in marching out of the range of that fire without a break in its ranks. Brief as was the time required, there was the inevitable loss of life. One of these vengeful shots it was which caused the death, soon after, of Lieutenant Charles Farr, of Co. "F." "Tell the Colonel," said this gallant young officer, a few hours before his death, "tell the Colonel I'll be back in three weeks." The loss to the regiment in this affair was two killed and twenty-one wounded.

The enemy had evidently intended to hold the line of this river, and was greatly annoyed at their failure to prevent a crossing. The 12th had scarcely joined its comrades on the other side when a considerable body of rebel infantry came in sight. Unfortunately for them, they exposed themselves to the fire of artillery, which had been concentrated in view of such a contingency, and they retired in undignified and amusing haste—"skedaddled," in fact, and abandoned all further attempts at this point. Toward noon of the 16th, the division started toward Calhoun—the other division (the Fourth) of the Sixteenth Corps being considerably in the rear. At about one o'clock, the advance became engaged, and, at about the same time, General Dodge reached the front, having ridden all the way from Resaca. The division had now reached a point known as Rome Cross Roads, where the Calhoun road, running toward the southeast, crosses another leading southwest to Rome. A little in rear of the Rome road, above its intersection with the Calhoun, was passing a heavy train of the enemy's wagons, and Cleburne's and Walker's divisions, detailed for that duty, were posted along the Rome road in a strong position to protect the train.

Advancing down the Calhoun road, as it converged toward the position of the enemy, Sweeney formed his line, with Burke's brigade holding the right, Bane's the center, and Rice's the left. General McPherson, who, also had arrived at the front, gave orders that an engagement should not be risked against so heavy a force until more of his command came up. After about two hours, the skirmishers on the right advanced, and drove a portion of the rebel line from the Rome road, losing in the charge Captain George A. Taylor, of the 66th Illinois. Several companies of the 81st Ohio were sent forward to support this advanced line, and Colonel Burke went forward in person to reconnoiter. Finding that an attack was coming upon the advanced line, held by his own brigade, orders were given for its disposition. The following account of the battle is as cited in the Rebellion Record, vol. XI.:

"The 66th Illinois was scattered along a mile of skirmish line; the 81st Ohio was divided into three battalions, under Lieutenant-Colonel Adams, Major Evans and Captain Hill—each battalion separated from the others. The 12th Illinois still on the left of the 81st Ohio, was almost entire, only one or two companies out skirmishing. A change of front, by the battalions of the 81st, was ordered, so as to face upon the Rome road. Hardly was this done, when the rebels advanced in force on the right battalion of the 81st Ohio; under Captain Hill, and were pressing it hard, when the center battalion, under Lieutenant-Colonel Adams, joined it, and checked the advance. The 12th Illinois was hurried forward to fill the gap now made between Colonel Adams and Major Evans, who, with the left battalion of the 81st, was ordered to hold that valley until further orders. Before the 12th got into position, the rebel line had so overlapped the right of the 81st Ohio, that it was forced to fall back a short distance, which was done in good order, and a new position taken. By this time, Major Evans perceived a line advancing upon him, and, relying on the tried gallantry of his command, without stopping to think how many were in his front, he ordered a charge. With a cheer the line moved forward like one man, stopping for no obstacles. Volley after volley went rattling and thundering through the rebel ranks, as the line kept advancing. By this time, the 12th got in position on our right, and a volley from them told the rebel generals that our commanders understood their business. Back, back, fell the rebels, and on sped the gallant Second Brigade. Even when the rebel line was passed, and their right overlapped our left, there was no pause; but two companies, quickly changing front, having advantage of position, drove them like sheep before them. * * As it was now late, and the Second Brigade had driven the enemy in confusion, the order was given to withdraw it, and relieve the whole division with the Fourth Division (General Veatch), which had just come up. * * Colonel Burke was in the front from the beginning. Early in the engagement a ball struck his left leg, shattering the bone. The Colonel rode up to Lieutenant-Colonel Adams, 51st Ohio, and quietly remarking that he was wounded, turned over the command to him, and rode away. His leg had to be amputated."

From the effects of this wound Colonel Burke died. He was a warm-hearted man, a gallant soldier, an approved and trusted commander, and was colonel of the 66th Illinois Infantry, and senior officer of the brigade.

The loss of the brigade at Rome Cross Roads was seventy-five—comparatively light, by reason of the enemy's fire being too high. After the engagement of the 16th of May, the pursuit of Johnston's army was resumed, the 12th, with its command, passing over the barren country toward Adairsville and Kingston, on roads diverging toward the west from the direct line pursued by the center, reaching the latter point on the 19th. On the 22d, McPherson's command—the right of Sherman's army—crossed the Etowah, and marched for Dallas by the Van Wert road. On the 24th, the command encamped at Van Wert, twenty miles southwest of Kingston. There the line of march was changed to the southeast, pointing toward Dallas, the county seat of Paulding County, about thirty miles northwest of Atlanta.

"At Dallas," says one who knew, "the enemy was encountered in such force that careful preparation was made to resist an onslaught, if such should be attempted. The army was formed in two lines, nearly parallel, each commanding, by its elevation and angles, every avenue of approach. The space between the lines, which varied as the distance from one crest to another increased or diminished, had been cleared of underbrush and the smaller trees, so that the view was uninterrupted. Intrenchments breast-high were thrown up, and artillery posted in sections at proper intervals. Skirmishers were in our immediate front, and the firing all along the line was vicious and incessant. Between the Fifteenth Corps on the right, and the Twentieth Corps to its left, was posted General Dodge's command (the Second and Fourth divisions of the Sixteenth Corps). Our brigade, comprising the 12th and 66th Illinois, and the 51st Ohio, was in reserve when orders were received to move to the front. It was about two o'clock in the afternoon of the 29th of May, 1864. It was rumored that there was to be a reconnaissance in force. We were 'to feel the enemy.' The 66th Illinois led the way; they were famous as sharpshooters, and armed with repeating rifles, as they were, no equal number of the enemy could withstand their advance. We passed through an opening in the second line, the 66th deployed as skirmishers at short intervals, went over the breastworks, halted inside the skirmish line, and awaited orders. The 51st Ohio, followed in line of battle. The 12th Illinois formed double column at half distance in rear of the 51st. The formation made the commanders of the right and left companies of the 12th the rear-most men of the column. Close by one of them stood a large tree, about the trunk of which were heaped the knapsacks and haversacks of which the men had disburdened themselves, and near the tree stood three officers, whose movements were anxiously awaited. They were Colonel August Mersey, of the 9th Illinois, Brigadier-General Thomas W. Sweeney, and Major General G. M. Dodge, respectively brigade, division and corps commanders. The line was somewhat curved at this point. The brigade was in plain view of two armies, and the eyes of thousands were fixed upon us.

"The enemy's works were on the crest of the opposite hills, only a few hundred yards distant. Our advance would be detected at once, and would be obstinately resisted. The commanding officer was grave and resolute, as became a man, a word from whom, a wave of whose hand, would bring about instant and bloody conflict. The 66th alone was ordered forward, and they went with a rush, the crack of their rifles being heard in quick succession; the rebel skirmishers were driven inside their works, and we awaited the order to charge. At this moment, the tall form of an officer of the 66th was borne by us to the rear. 'Who is that?' called out Colonel Mersey. 'Lieutenant Ulrich,' was the reply. An exclamation of deep regret escaped the colonel at the loss of so highly esteemed an officer, notwithstanding the imminent peril of so many others. While we yet awaited the order which would have been almost a relief to this dread suspense, the musketry far off to our right swelled in volume, till it became a continuous and awful roar. An engagement had been precipitated at another part of the line, which seemed to preclude further demonstration by us. Our advance was recalled, and we lay on our arms to abide the event. As the afternoon wore away, the firing gradually slackened, and rumors reached us of an assault of the enemy on the Fifteenth Corps, which had been gallantly withstood. We were not long left in doubt. There came a mighty shout, which was borne nearer and nearer, and with it came the sound of bounding hoofs and clattering sabres, and, on a noble steed with flashing eyes and steaming nostrils, McPherson, hat in hand, his staff trying in vain to rival the speed of his chief, dashed toward us from the midst of conflict, his face ablaze with victory."

All through the 29th, heavy skirmishing was kept up; the Second Brigade, now commanded by Colonel August Mersey, forming Sweeney's first line of battle. At about eleven o'clock that night the enemy again attacked Sweeney's position.

"The bright flash of a musket to the right, and in front of our line, told of approaching danger. Almost instantly the whole picket line in front of Mersey's brigade was ablaze, and retiring before the advancing column. Scarcely had the pickets reached the works, before every man of the long sinuous line, which a moment before seemed wrapped in slumber, was up to his place, and the next moment the 51st Ohio and 12th Illinois poured a volley of death into the approaching column. A flash and a whiz was the reply. Our men now loaded and fired as rapidly as possible, while Welker poured an almost ceaseless fire from his four guns. * * * The night was dark, and a heavy air seemed to weigh down the sulphurous smoke, until the darkness was changed to grey, in which the dark figures of the men became visible—a sort of demon-looking set, engaged in a ghastly play with death. But it could not last long. The earth-works, together with the wild aiming of the rebels, gave us complete protection, while they were without any shield. Soon they renewed their attack at another place, then on Mersey again, and again to the right, until at three o'clock, when they recoiled from their last attack, they had made seven attempts to break our lines."*

In the gradual movement of Sherman's lines toward Allatoona, Mersey's brigade moved toward the left, on the night of May 31, relieving Davies's division. The following day all the line to the right was withdrawn, leaving Mersey's brigade as rear-guard for McPherson's whole command. The Confederates moved again into Dallas the same day, and their cavalry succeeded in gaining position in Mersey's rear; but, bending back his right, with the 12th Illinois, deployed on his left as skirmishers, he succeeded in withdrawing his isolated brigade, receiving the congratulations of his commander for the skillful movement.

By the 1st of June, McPherson's whole command had moved to its left five miles, and occupied General Thomas's former position in front of New Hope Church. On the 4th, Johnston evacuated his position and retired to Kenesaw Mountain, where he successfully resisted assault; and active operations, other than constant skirmishing, were necessarily deferred for several weeks on account of the condition of the roads, which were nearly impassable from heavy rains.

In the attack on Little Kenesaw, June 27, the 12th was but slightly engaged, having but three men wounded. On the 1st of July, McPherson was ordered to advance toward the Chattahoochee River, and threaten Nickajack Creek and Turner's Ferry. The movement commenced on the following day, and the enemy immediately abandoned his works around Kenesaw, and retreated to the Chattahoochee, intrenching himself on the line of Nickajack Creek.

On the 4th, the 12th, with its corps, moved from Marietta, by the Sandtown road, to the Chattahoochee River, on the opposite bank of which batteries had been erected to oppose a crossing. Finding this impracticable, McPherson made a strong demonstration upon the enemy's left, and, shortly after nightfall, the lines came into collision. The artillery practice at short range, to which a portion of the regiment was treated on the night of July 4, 1864, will not be forgotten by the survivors. A single shell caused a loss in Co. "A" of four men. Our generals had wisely abandoned the reckless policy of forcing the fighting where the enemy had, in this campaign, carefully prepared intrenchments in his favor, consequently it became necessary at times to keep his attention engaged, while the blow should be struck at a distant and unguarded point. Before day-break, on the morning of July 5, the main body of McPherson's command was withdrawn from the enemy's front and put in motion for Roswell, a village on the Chattahoochee River about twelve miles east of Marietta. This march to Roswell, via Marietta, tried the endurance of McPherson's troops to the utmost. It was made with all the speed possible. The day was hot, the dust was stifling, but the men stood it pretty well till one or two o'clock in the afternoon, when they began to succumb. The pace was kept up without intermission, the ranks being thinned by exhaustion more and more rapidly, till, when the grateful waters of the river appeared in sight at Roswell, regiments had dwindled to companies.

No time was to be lost, the opposite bank was to be gained, and the men waded into the wide but shallow stream,—floundering and falling among the moss-covered boulders, the hard-won crossing was made, and the men formed into line as fast as they arrived.

Before the long twilight had closed, nearly all the stragglers had crossed, and, from the commanding officer down, all breathed more freely that the important movement had been successfully completed. The enemy abandoned the line of the Chattahoochee, and retired to Atlanta. On the 13th, the remainder of the Army of the Tennessee joined the Sixteenth Corps at Roswell, where the troops enjoyed a few days of much needed rest.

On the 16th, the command marched from Roswell, and reached Decatur on the 19th, whence the advance to the works before Atlanta was continued on the line of the Decatur railroad,—General Dodge on its right, and Logan and Blair on its left. As the army closed in around the city, the gradual shortening of the lines threw Dodge a little in reserve; and at noon of the 22d he was ordered from his position, at the right of McPherson's line, to his extreme left, to occupy a hill to the southeast of Atlanta, which had been captured by Blair the evening before, and which gave the left a commanding position, overlooking the heart of the city. To reach this hill, the command was obliged to move diagonally, by a narrow wagon track, leading from the Decatur road through the woods toward the southwest. The division had halted, and the men were resting at ease, when, with scarcely a moment's warning, they were rushed into the midst of the battle of the 22d of July.

The rebel commander, on the preceding night, had evacuated an extended line of works, north and east of Atlanta, and, with a portion of his force, had occupied an interior and more strongly fortified line, leaving available for the attack which he meditated two corps, viz., his old command, still known as Hood's Corps, and Hardee's Corps. The latter, by a night march, had gained a position in rear of McPherson's left, and, by attacking simultaneously with Hood's Corps in front, was to envelop and overwhelm McPherson's command before Sherman could reinforce this wing. The plan was a bold one, and, but for the fact that General Dodge's command was at that moment, by a fortunate combination of circumstances, in the best possible position to repel this most unexpected attack upon our rear, it might have been successful. Hardee's men were evidently taken aback by the presence of so strong a force; they expected little, if any, organized resistance, but at their very first onset encountered a line which had apparently been formed in anticipation of such an event. There was a fight, in which the Second Division, under the eyes of McPherson himself and his assembled generals, won its brightest laurels—the last fight, indeed, upon which McPherson ever looked, for, having seen the attack at this point repelled, he rode straight to his untimely death.

The line of the Fifteenth Corps having been broken at the intersection of the railroad leading from the east into Atlanta, General Logan sent for reinforcements. The messenger encountered General Sweeney, who, in General Dodge's absence, assumed the responsibility of detaching a portion of his division to General Logan's assistance. Colonel Mersey's brigade accordingly, under General Logan's personal guidance, moved rapidly from the scene of its recent conflict in a north-westerly direction, until the line of the railroad just mentioned was struck; then westwardly until within two hundred and fifty or three hundred yards of the works, then in possession of the enemy, when, by fling to the right, the brigade was brought into line, and with a rush it re-took the works. This timely success restored confidence and order; and when this eventful day drew to a close, the Army of the Tennessee was intact and the enemy foiled at every point. Colonel Mersey's brigade re-joined its division late that night, and when morning dawned, the 12th Illinois found itself occupying an angle of the works which projected boldly toward the city from the southeast. This position was held until it became clear that the advantages of position were too greatly in favor of the enemy to warrant further extension of our line in this direction.

On the night of the 26th, the Army of the Tennessee, General Logan commanding, abandoned its works, and made the circuit of the armies of Generals Thomas and Schofield, coming in on the right flank, where, on the 28th, near Ezra Church, it was again furiously assailed, with far less effect, however, than on the 22d.

The Macon railroad was finally seized and destroyed some days later, near Jonesboro', by temporarily abandoning the works in front of Atlanta and compelling the enemy to come out to defend his line of communications. Hood was again defeated, and the hard-fought campaign came to a close with the fall of Atlanta.

With its command, the 12th then went into camp at East Point, where, by order of General Howard, now commanding the Army of the Tennessee, it was transferred, September 26, 1864, Captain Robert Koehler, of Co. "D," commanding the regiment, to the Fourth (Adams's) Brigade. The Sixteenth Corps, consolidated with the Fifteenth, was placed under the command of General Osterhaus. General John M. Corse succeeded Sweeney in the command of the Second Division; and, it having been found that Hood was crossing the Chattahoochee, he was ordered to move to Rome with Adams's and Rice's brigades, there joining his Third Brigade (Rowett's), which formed the garrison of that post, and with his united force be ready to strike in whatever direction circumstances might demand. General Corse assumed command at Rome on the 29th of September. On the same day, a telegram was received from Sherman, intimating that Hood was crossing the Chattahoochee in the direction of Blue Mountain, and directing General Corse to watch for his appearance in, or about, Cedartown, a few miles south of Rome. During the first days of October, the cavalry of the enemy destroyed the railroad near Big Shanty, captured a train near Ackworth, tore up the track three miles south of Allatoona, and was threatening Dalton. On the 4th of October, Sherman signaled to Corse, from Kenesaw, that Hood was moving on Allatoona, thence to Rome. From the Allatoona heights, large fires could be seen along the track toward Big Shanty, showing that Hood's army was near the line of the railroad north of Kenesaw. A second signal from Sherman directed Corse to move to Allatoona with his whole division. Not having sufficient transportation, Corse was obliged to send to Kingston for extra cars. These were thrown from the track in moving to Rome, and on the evening of the 4th, Corse was able to get but twenty-seven cars ready for his command. At half-past eight, he set out for Allatoona with a portion of the 12th, under Captain Koehler, and portions of four regiments of Howett's brigade. The force arrived at Allatoona at one o'clock on the morning of the 5th, and the train was immediately sent back to Rome for more troops; which, however, owing to an accident on the road, did not arrive until nine o'clock in the evening. The garrison of Allatoona consisted of the 4th Minnesota, 93d Illinois, a part of the 18th Wisconsin, and the 12th Wisconsin Battery—in all eight hundred and ninety men, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Tourtelotte. General Corse took with him, from Rome, detachments from the 39th Iowa, Lieutenant-Colonel Redfield; 7th Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Pewin; 12th Illinois, Captain Koehler; 50th Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Hanna; and 47th Illinois, Captain Vansteenburg—in all, one thousand and fifty-four men; making the total Union force at Allatoona, one thousand nine hundred and forty-four. The outposts were attacked by the enemy soon after the arrival of the reinforcements under Corse. At day-break, the troops were withdrawn from the town, and posted on the ridge divided by the railroad cut; the 12th Illinois, with the 4th Minnesota and 50th Illinois, being stationed east of the cut and in the rear of a redoubt commanding the railroad, which was held by troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Tourtelotte. On the opposite, or west, side of the railroad cut, stationed on the hills that covered the redoubt on that side, were the 7th Illinois and 39th Iowa. These troops were early attacked by Young's Texan Brigade, which advanced from the west, and were also threatened on the north by General Sears, who was rapidly driving in the Union skirmishers from that direction. Captain Koehler received orders to form his detachment of the 12th Illinois on the crest of the railroad cut, facing west, and to direct his fire upon the hill and ravine north of the opposite fort, where the 93d Illinois was posted, and which General Sears was driving from that position. The 12th occupied the position ordered for about thirty minutes, and by its fire broke Sears' attack on the force fighting on the west spur, on which he had charged after sweeping away the companies of the 93d Illinois. The 12th, while fighting on the east side of the cut, lost one officer and five men wounded. Receiving orders to throw his regiment across the railroad to the support of the troops holding the west fort, which was now assailed by the rebels, Captain Koehler moved into the cut and up the opposite hill, under a heavy and severe fire, which killed and wounded several of his men. On reaching the summit, he found the fort and rifle-pits so thickly occupied by other troops, that he was obliged to form his men without other shelter than that afforded by a small building used as quarters for a section of artillery. The men were cruelly exposed there; but soon after succeeded in gaining possession of the rifle-pits in front of the fort, this being now almost empty, as the other troops who had occupied it had sought shelter within the redoubt, where, also, a small portion of the 12th were placed for lack of room in the rifle-pits. The artillery of the little redoubt was silent, for want of ammunition, and it was now surrounded on north, south, and west—the enemy drawing nearer and nearer, filling every hollow of the rough ground, and, from the shelter of logs and stumps, pouring in a murderous fire within musket range of the fort. The engagement lasted until about four o'clock p. m. Every part of the poorly constructed rifle-pits was enfiladed by the incessant fire of the enemy, but the men of the 12th remained there until the rebels were repulsed, fighting with coolness, bravery and determination.

Officers and men alike executed all orders with prompt decision, regardless of danger and exposure. Five, out of seven, company officers were wounded, but remained at their posts, and, in spite of their suffering, encouraged and cheered on the men until the enemy finally fled in confusion, leaving the little band at the fort masters of the field, and Allatoona safe. The regiment lost ten killed and forty-seven wounded. At the close of the engagement the men left the rifle-pits, and that night bivouacked on the battle-field in front of the fort. It remained at Allatoona until the 7th of October, being assigned to the Third Brigade, until it could rejoin its own.

After the battle of Allatoona, the 12th returned to Rome, where it remained with its division until November 10, 1864. While at Rome, General Corse had the surplus stores, and the sick that had accumulated, removed to Nashville and Chattanooga, and on the 10th, having first destroyed the public storehouses, he evacuated the place, and with his command reached Atlanta on the evening of the 14th, for the march to the sea. For the purpose of making this great march, Sherman's army was divided into four wings; the right commanded by Major-General O. O. Howard, the left by Major-General H. W. Slocum. The 12th, with Corse's division of the Fifteenth Corps (General Osterhaus, which formed the right hand column of the right wing), marched from Whitehall on the 15th of November, and, together with its division, reached Savannah on the 12th of December, participating in the various engagements on the route. On the 17th, the regiment was detailed to guard the prisoners taken at Fort McAllister, by General Hazen's division of the Fifteenth Corps, and to take them to Hilton Head. On the night of the 20th, Hardee evacuated Savannah, and it was occupied immediately by Union troops. The 12th Illinois returned from Hilton Head to Savannah on the 10th of January, 1865, and on the 28th, started with the Fifteenth Corps, now commanded by Major-General John A. Logan, on the march for Goldsboro', N. C., a distance of over six hundred miles. Corse's division reached Goldsboro' March 24th, where it remained until April 10th, when Sherman started in pursuit of Johnston. The regiment entered Raleigh on the 14th of April, and the following day was stationed at Morrisville, where it remained until Johnston's surrender, April 26th. On the 29th, with Howard's corps, it marched northward by Lewisburg, Warrenton, Lawrenceville and Petersburg to Richmond, and thence to Washington, where it participated in the grand review, on the 24th of May. It left Washington June 6th, and proceeded to Louisville, Ky., where it was mustered out, July 10, 1865, and received its final discharge, on July 18th, at Camp Butler, Ill.

JOHN MCARTHUR, general manager of the Chicago & Vert Island Stone Company, was born in the county of Renfrew, Scotland, November 17, 1826, and is the son of John and Isabella (Nelson) McArthur. Being a bright and intelligent boy, and quickly mastering the branches of education taught in the schools of his native village, the parish minister desired to educate him for his own calling, but the boy preferred a more active career. Consequently, when he was fourteen years of age, he learned the trade of a blacksmith in his father's shop, and there worked until 1849, when he came to Chicago and engaged in business with Carlisle Mason, his brother-in-law, as a machinist and blacksmith, under the firm name of Mason & McArthur. From the first period of his residence in this city, Mr. McArthur took an engrossing interest in military matters, particularly in the local military companies. When the Chicago Highland Guards were organized, by Captain John McKay, in August, 1855, Mr. McArthur was chosen third lieutenant; the following year, he was made first lieutenant; and, in 1858, was elected captain, which position he held until the outbreak of the Rebellion—the company being one of the best in Chicago. In 1858, the firm of Mason & McArthur was dissolved, Mr. McArthur then commencing the manufacture of steam boilers, which business he continued for about three years. In 1861, he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Washington Independent Regiment, of which the Highland Guards formed a part. At the formation of the 12th Illinois Infantry, in April, 1861, he was elected its colonel, and was with the regiment during its three months' campaign at Cairo and Caseyville; was again made colonel when the regiment re-enlisted for three years, and was soon after stationed at Paducah, Ky., with General E. A. Paine's command. During the latter part of 1861, he was acting as brigadier-general, and soon after the battle of Fort Donelson received his commission as brigadier-general, this distinction being for meritorious service in action. He was wounded in the first day's battle at Shiloh, a ball passing through his foot, which wound disabled him for more than a month. At Corinth, on October 3, 1862, his brigade was in the advance, and bore a most honorable part in the battle of the day. For meritorious service at the battle of Nashville, Tenn., he received his brevet as major-general, on the recommendation of General George H. Thomas, "for conspicuous gallantry and efficiency during the battle of December 15-16, 1864, before Nashville, Tenn." As such officer he was in command of a division in the Army of the Tennessee; and in this position, and in those which he had held prior thereto, he gained an enviable name and reputation, for personal bravery and his many admirable soldierly qualities. He was mustered out of service in September, 1865, when he returned to Chicago. He was Commissioner of Public Works from 1866 to 1872; after which he engaged in the foundry business on the North Side for several years. In December, 1872, he was appointed Postmaster of Chicago, which position he retained until March 10, 1877; when he engaged in the commission business, and remained there until 1882. He then organized the Chicago & Vert Island Stone Company, which was incorporated in the spring of 1883. Mr. McArthur was married, in May, 1848, to Miss Christina Cuthbertson, of Scotland. They have seven children—John, Cuthbert, Bessie, Ada, Arthur W., James N. and Walter S.

ARTHUR CHARLES DUCAT is one of the few military characters in Chicago who has ever kept alive his love for the profession, and has, up to a comparatively recent date, been actively engaged in the service of his country and his adopted State. He was born in Dublin, Ireland, February 24, 1830, being the youngest son of Mungo and Dorcas (Atkinson) Ducat. Early showing a special aptitude for scientific pursuits, he received a thorough education in the theoretical and practical details of his chosen profession—that of a civil engineer. In 1851, he came to Chicago, and readily found employment on several important railroads and public works. In 1857, as secretary and chief surveyor of the Board of Underwriters, he commenced the long and eminently successful career as an insurance man, which is properly detailed in the chapter devoted to that topic. In this position, he did good service in protecting the first fire engines of the city against the threatened attacks of many reckless members of the volunteer department, and was chiefly instrumental in drafting and passing the ordinance for the establishment of the paid fire department. For several years previous to the breaking out of the war, he had been studying, with ardor and perseverance, the principles of military science, mastering many of the leading works, and preparing himself for the conflict which all thoughtful men realized must come. Upon the firing on Fort Sumter, Mr. Ducat threw himself, heart and soul, into the service of his adopted country, and his previous training and forethought had peculiarly fitted him for playing a leading part. At first, he raised a corps of engineer soldiers, sappers and miners, whose services, however, were not accepted. Resigning his position on the Board of Underwriters, in April, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the 12th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, but was shortly afterward promoted to the rank of lieutenant and adjutant, and subsequently to the captaincy of Co. "A." Accompanying General Charles F. Smith to Paducah, Ky., he was promoted to the rank of major. In recognition of merit and gallantry, exhibited in the battles of Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He afterward participated in all the battles of General Grant's campaign, displaying rare ability, and distinguishing himself for brilliant and gallant conduct. In August, 1862, he was assigned to duty as senior officer on the staff of Major-General Ord, and participated in the battle of Iuka, and served as picket and outpost officer of the Army of the Tennessee. Upon General Rosecrans assuming command of the army, Lieutenant-Colonel Ducat became his inspector-general, in which capacity he served at the battle of Corinth. He also served at this time as senior aide-de-camp and chief of the grand guards and outposts, invariably winning the highest opinions for conspicuous bravery and ability. Later, when General Rosecrans took command of the Army of the Cumberland, he became his acting chief-of-staff and acting inspector-general, and subsequently was appointed inspector-general of the Army and Department of the Cumberland. It was while serving in this capacity that he formed and established the famous system of grand guard, outpost and picket duty, adopted by the Army of the Cumberland, and was author, also, of the bureau of the inspector-general's department, which systems, with very slight alterations, were adopted by the War Department at Washington, for the United States Army, and in the organization of the signal corps for the Army of the Cumberland, at Nashville. During the advance of the army from Bowling Green to Nashville, and the raising of the siege of the latter place, and the famous reorganization of the Fourteenth Army Corps, he acted as chief-of-staff as well as inspector-general, and was relieved as chief-of-staff by the lameated Garshes, who was killed at the battle of Stone River; subsequently, the late President Garfield was appointed to the position, Ducat being appointed inspector-general of the army, it being the military bureau and a position which he seemed to court. General Ducat continued to hold his office of inspector-general, until his incapacity for duty, by disease, contracted in the service, required his resignation and withdrawal from the service. This enforced retirement drew forth many expressions of regret from the general officers, and others, who appreciated the genius and ability displayed in his efficient management of his several commands and of the inspector-general's department, and in the other important positions which he had filled in the service. He was then offered the position of brigadier-general in the Invalid Corps, but preferred to leave the service if he could not serve in the field. Some of the testimonials he received from generals like Grant, Thomas and Rosecrans, are especially noteworthy and distinguishing. In the spring of 1863, General Ducat was appointed inspector-general of the Army of the Cumberland, on the staff of Major-General Rosecrans, but failing health, on account of overwork and exposure, forced him to resign his position, which fact called forth the most unqualified official praise of his services from Generals Rosecrans, Thomas and Grant. Passing over his successful career in the insurance business during the succeeding eleven years, for the reason already referred to, it is found that, in June, 1875, General Ducat was entrusted by the Governor with the duty of reorganizing the State Militia, and the result was the basis of the present effective organization of regiments and battalions. The bill for the development of a State national guard, which passed in 1877, was also the product of his mind and labors, and Governor Cullom very properly appointed him major-general of the division, comprising three brigades. During the railroad riots of that year, General Ducat rendered the city invaluable service in suppressing those unlawful elements which threatened to make of Chicago a second Pittsburgh—handling his little army with such skill, all over the State, that no riot was permitted to gain headway; everywhere in the State the rioters were met by the troops, and General Ducat proved himself as able an administrator as a general. In June, 1869, he resigned his position as major-general, and in July the Legislature abolished the office, leaving the brigade commanders to report direct to the adjutant-general of the State. Since then, General Ducat has devoted himself strictly to that business with which he has been prominently identified for so many years.

NINETEENTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

This was one of the ten regiments organized under the act of the State Legislature, passed at a special session, in April, 1861, and was known as the regiment from the State-at-large; it having been made up of companies from different parts of the state, which had been accepted by the Governor over and above the number necessary to complete the first six regiments called for by the President. Although this was the case, and from its number and date of organization it would seem to have been a regiment organized on the second call, and the different companies only get a record from that date, still it is a fact that some of the companies possess a record antedating any company in the first six regiments, or in the whole Grand Volunteer Army of the Union. Co. "E" (Chicago Highland Guards) was an organized company in the State's service, dating its organization back to 1855. This company, on the fourteenth day of January, 1861, tendered its services to the Governor and to the State authorities, three months before Sumter was fired on; it was accepted, and on the 21st of April, 1861, was ordered to assemble in its armory, and it remained there under orders till the 23d, when it was ordered to Springfield.* Cos. "A," "K" (Chicago Zouaves), and "D," were also organized before the call of the President (Co. "A," on March 23d), and were sent, on the 21st of April, by order of Governor Yates, to Cairo with the expedition under the command of General R. K. Swift, to secure that important point. While these companies were performing the duties assigned them, the first six regiments were organized at Camp Yates, but they were not enrolled in any of them. The 10th was mustered into the State service May 4, 1861, and remained at Camp Yates, Springfield, until June; when it was sent to Chicago, reorganized, and on the 17th of June, 1861, was mustered into the United States service for three years. On the 22d of the same month, John B. Turchin was appointed colonel of the regiment, the regimental roster being as follows:

Field and Staff: Colonel, John B. Turchin; Lieutenant-Colonel, Joseph R. Scott; Major, Frederick Harding; Adjutant, Chauncey Miller; Quartermaster, Robert W. Wetherell; Surgeon, Samuel C. Blake (who resigned in a few months, and was succeeded by Roswell G. Bogue); First Assistant-Surgeon, Preston H. Bailhache; Chaplain, Augustus H. Conant. Colonel Turchin was promoted brigadier-general July 17, 1862, and Lieutenant-Colonel Scott was promoted colonel, August 7, 1862. Alexander W. Raffin, Co. "E," was promoted lieutenant-colonel July 22, 1862, and James V. Guthrie, of Co. "C," was promoted major September 6, 1862, vice Frederick Harding, resigned.

Line Officers: Co. "A" (Chicago Zouaves), Captain, James R. Hayden; First Lieutenant, Clifton T. Whanton; Second Lieutenant, John C. Long, transferred to the Regular Army in 1862. Co. Guthrie; First Lieutenant, William Ennis; Second Lieutenant, Leaveans J. Keeler. Co. "D" (Chicago Light Infantry), Captain, Charles A. Colby; First Lieutenant, James R. "K," (Chicago Zouaves), Captain, John H. Clybourn; First Lieutenant, Presly N. Guthrie; Second Lieutenant, Charles H. Shepley.

COLONEL JOHN B. TURCHIN (Ivan B. Turchinoff), of the Nineteenth Regiment, was a Russian by birth, and became a student in the military school, at St. Petersburg, in his youth. After a thorough training there, he was made a lieutenant in the Russian Army, remaining in that position until promoted to the rank of captain. Being then selected as one of the état-major, or staff, he was sent back to school, where he remained three years longer. After perfecting himself theoretically in all branches of military art, he graduated with honor, and, on the opening of the Crimean war, was made first assistant to the engineer of the Grand Duke, afterward, Emperor Alexander. The defenses of the Finland coast were planned by him, and adopted by his government. During the war, he became disgusted with the tyranny and despotism of government as exercised in the army, and, having become somewhat democratic in his views, he obtained leave of absence for the purpose of visiting Germany. From Germany he came to America; adopted engineering as his profession, and at the time of his election to the colonelship of the 10th, was in the engineer department of the Illinois Central Railroad.

The 10th was especially and particularly a Chicago regiment, although some of the companies were from other parts of the State; and when, on the 12th of July, it became known that the regiment was ordered to move to the front, the camp was thronged with friends of the boys, anxious to bid them good-bye.

At four o'clock p. m., tents were struck, baggage and camp equipage packed, and at seven o'clock the regiment was drawn up in line, ready to march. At eight, led by Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, it wheeled into the densely crowded avenue and marched to the Lake Shore depot, where thousands were waiting to say the last farewell. It arrived at Quincy, Ill., on the 13th, and on the 14th, three companies, "F," "G," and "I," were moved to Quincy, under command of Major Harding. Co. "E" was detailed to guard the railroad bridge over Fabius River; Co. "C," the bridge over North River; the rest of the companies—"A," "B," "D," "H" and "K"—were sent to Hannibal, Mo., and thence to Palmyra, within forty-eight hours after leaving camp at Chicago. The regiment remained in that portion of Missouri, guarding railroads, scouting, and doing good service until the 27th of July, when it was ordered to St. Louis, and thence with General Fremont's expedition down the Mississippi River, landing at Bird's Point, Mo., opposite Cairo. It was immediately detailed for outpost duty, and moved to Norfolk, six miles down the river, the most advanced post of the Union Army. The duty required of the regiment there was very arduous, and was well done. It was there visited by Messrs. Hurd, Long and Hoyne, of Chicago, who, as a committee in behalf of the citizens, presented it with a stand of colors. It remained at Norfolk until the 14th, when it was withdrawn and sent to Pilot Knob, Mo., where it remained until the 29th of August, when it moved, with General Prentiss's column, against the rebels near Dallas. When near that point, the 19th was put in the advance, and entered Dallas, but found no enemy. The march was continued to Jackson, where the troops halted. It remained there until the 8th of September, when it moved to Cape Girardeau, and thence by boat to Cairo, and encamped at Fort Holt, on the Kentucky shore, where it remained until the 16th of September, when it was ordered to Washington.

J. B. Turchin

This closed its connection with the armies in Missouri and on the Mississippi. During the two months it served in the Department, it traveled a distance of over two thousand miles, having been almost continuously on the move, either as a regiment or in detachments. On the 17th of September, the regiment took cars at Sandoval, on the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad, en route for Washington, but it was destined not to reach that point, as one of the trains, containing companies "E," "F," "G," and "I," broke through a bridge (No. 48), near Huron, Ind., killing Captain B. Howard, of Co. "I," and twenty-four enlisted men, and wounding Lieutenant Clifton F. Wharton, of Co. "A," and one hundred and five enlisted men, seven of whom died. Fortunately, Drs. Bogue and Bailhache, the regimental surgeons, and a staff-officer, were in the last car, and, escaping without injury, attended to the wounded. Captain Howard was for many years postmaster at Galena, a soldier in the Mexican War, and a most efficient and popular officer. The following is the list of the killed:

Masten Kelley, Co. "E," private; J. W. S. Babitt, Co. "F," corporal; Charles H. Valentine, Co. "F," musician; David Noble, Co. "G," private; Stephen C. Leabock, Charles M. Brastem and

Charles H. Calling, Co. "G," privates; Bushrod B. Howard, captain, Co. "I"; Samuel J. Clark, Jerry Ingraham and Albert H. Painter, Co. "I," corporals; Henry Bauas, Robert Bruce, Laurence Carroll, N. Connelly, William Frost, William Harwich, Jacob Coleman, John Brown, Henry Conner, John Douglas, Peter M. Fowler, William Kinger and Joseph Smith, privates, and Anton Raffner, musician, of Co. "I."

The engine was sent forward for assistance, and the first train, containing the remaining companies of the regiment, which had safely passed the bridge a few minutes before, was stopped about twelve miles beyond Huron, and sent back to the scene of the disaster. With Colonel Turchin, was his heroic and helpful wife, and the two were equal to a host in efficiency and usefulness. All through the night, the work of rescuing those yet alive from the wreck went on. Shortly before noon of the following day, a special train, containing one hundred and fifteen wounded, was started for Cincinnati. On arriving in that city, they were removed to the Marine Hospital, where every attention and care was bestowed upon them. The bodies of twenty-five killed were also taken to Cincinnati, and placed in vaults in Spring Grove Cemetery, whence they were taken to their former homes by their friends.

Colonel Turchin, in writing of the catastrophe and the criminal carelessness of the railroad companies, in allowing such frail structures to be used as caused the accident to his own command, said

"Our regiment, after the disaster on the night of the 17th of September, 1861, on the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad, at bridge No. 48, was entirely broken. Out of three companies that suffered most, hardly one company could be formed. One-third of the arms of those companies were entirely ruined, and knapsacks, blankets and accoutrements greatly damaged. One captain and twenty-four men were killed, and over one hundred men, including one lieutenant, wounded—of whom, perhaps, thirty or forty will not be fit for service. Out of three companies, one hundred and thirty men have left the ranks—a number hardly possible to be lost in the most severe battle. I am an old soldier, but never in my life have I felt so wretched as when I saw, by moonlight, my dear comrades on the miserable pile of rubbish, below agglomerated cars, and heard the groans of agony from the wounded."

Robert Brand, Esq., mayor of Galena, in a report to a meeting of the citizens of that city, relative to the accident, paid the following tribute to Colonel and Madame Turchin:

"This report would be incorrect were I to omit the names of Colonel Turchin and his heroic wife; to thank the colonel for his care and attention in providing for his soldiers, and the facilities he extended for the performance of my sad duties to the dead. To hear the wounded men speak of the heroic conduct of the brave Mrs. Turchin when the accident occurred; how, when the dead, dying and mutilated laid in one mass of ruin; when the bravest heart was appalled, and all was dismay, this brave woman was in the water, rescuing the mangled and wounded from a watery grave, and tearing from her person every available piece of clothing to use as bandages for the wounded, proves, beyond all question, that she is not only the right woman in the right place, but a fit consort for the brave Turchin in leading the gallant sons of Illinois to battle."

Her devotion to her husband's soldiers in their peril was such as is described above, and subsequently, during their long hours of suffering in the hospital, her care for the wounded men was that of a tender mother for her sons.

The regiment, on arriving at Cincinnati, was ordered into camp at Camp Dennison, to await orders, and, on the 23d, took boat for Louisville, where it arrived on the 25th, and was, on the same day, sent to Lebanon Junction, where it remained, guarding the Louisville & Nashville Railroad and Lebanon Branch Railroad, until October 22d, when it was moved to Elizabethtown. While in camp there, the regiment was thoroughly drilled, and became distinguished for its fine military discipline. It also found leisure to devote itself somewhat to literature, a regimental paper, styled the "Zouave Gazette," being published during the months of October and November, 1861, in the office of the defunct "Elizabethtown Democrat." Several numbers of this paper are now in the possession of the Chicago Historical Society. October 30, 1861, was its first issue, and it notes that Dwight L. Moody visited the camp, on invitation of Chaplain A. H. Conant; the resignation of Lieutenant Cunningham, Co. "D," and Lieutenant Drum, Co. "I," on account of ill-health; and the promotion of First Lieutenant Charles H. Shepley to the captaincy of Co. "I."

The editors of the Gazette were William B. Redfield, formerly of the Chicago Evening Journal, and Lieutenant Lyman Bridges; publisher, Lieutenant William Quinton; printers, William J. Ramage, Co. "C"; J. H. Haynie, Co. "D"; T. H. Dawson, Co. "E"; and E. Archibald, Co. "H"; pressman, Charles H. Wright; and William H. Christian, printer's devil. In No. 3, is an acknowledgment of the reception of a splendid set of guide colors, presented to the regiment by Mrs. and the Misses Carney, of Chicago; also an account of an expedition to Big Springs, by a command under Major Harding, then provost marshal of Elizabethtown, and the capture of certain secessionists, arms, etc.

After the accident at "Bridge No. 48," Captain Hayden, of Co. "A," and Lieutenant Bridges, of Co. "G," returned to Chicago, and recruited to fill the ranks of the 19th.

From Elizabethtown, the regiment moved to Bacon Creek, Ky., where it was brigaded with the 18th Ohio, the 24th Illinois, and 37th Indiana, under command of Colonel Turchin. General Mitchel having been placed in command of the troops at Bacon Creek, there organized his famous Second Division, of which the Eighth Brigade was always the advance, and the 19th the advance of the brigade. The regiment remained there until the 10th of February, 1862, when the division moved to Green River, halting there until the 13th, when the order to move to Bowling Green was given, and the column moved forward, the 19th in the advance. It arrived in front of Bowling Green at three p. m., on the 14th, in time to exchange a few shots with the rear guard of the rebels, but too late to save the bridge across the Big Barren River, so that the troops could not cross at once. The men were allowed a few hours' rest, after which they were again in line. General Mitchel having determined to occupy the city that night, established a ferry some few miles below the town, to which point the troops were marched. The 19th was first to cross, and the first Union regiment in that stronghold of the confederacy. It remained at Bowling Green, as rear guard, and then moved on to Nashville, where it arrived on the 4th of March. Remained there until the 18th, and then moved to Murfreesboro', moving thence, April 5th, and arriving on the 6th at Shelbyville, and on the 9th at Fayetteville. On the 10th, it moved toward Huntsville, which it reached at about six o'clock a. m. The expedition was a complete success. Several rebel officers were captured at the hotels, and a large number of locomotives and cars were also taken by the victors.

There the regiment had one day's rest; when it was pushed west along the railroad to Decatur, which point the rebels evacuated on its approach. There Lieutenant-Colonel Scott resumed the command; and from thence it moved to Tusculumbia, Ala., using the cars to transport them to within fifteen miles of the town, and marching the rest of the way. The Eighth Brigade halted about two miles from town; the 19th pushed on, and occupied it the same night, put out pickets, and bivouacked. On the night of the 21st, one of the picket-posts, held by Co. "C," under command of Captain James V. Guthrie, was attacked, and the outpost on the Luka road, commanded by Sergeant A. Burns, driven in. The reserves made a stout defense, and held their ground until Colonel Scott arrived from town with reinforcements, and drove off the enemy. Co. "C's" loss was one man killed and two wounded.

While the regiment was at Tusculumbia, two companies, "E" and "F," under command of Captain Alexander W. Raffin, were left to guard some bridges on the railroad at, and near, Hillsboro' Station. Captain Raffin held Hillsboro' with Co. "E," with an outpost of twelve men of that company, under command of Lieutenant James G. Campbell, of Co. "F," at a railroad bridge two miles west of the station. On the night of the 21st, this outpost was attacked by a force of the enemy, some four hundred strong, and, after a brisk fight, was compelled to fall back toward Hillsboro'. The rebels fired the bridge; and would have destroyed it, had not Captain Raffin, hearing the firing, hastened to the aid of the guard with the rest of Co. "E." He arrived in time, drove off the rebels, and succeeded in extinguishing the fire and saving the bridge.

After remaining a week at Tusculumbia, the country around Decatur being evacuated, the regiment fell back toward Decatur. During this movement, an attack was made by a large force of rebel cavalry, who captured part of the wagon-train and some prisoners. The regiment then returned to Huntsville where it remained until the 13th of April. On that date, the 19th and 24th Illinois and the 37th Indiana were ordered to reinforce troops at Athens that had been attacked. Again the 19th was the advance guard, as it always was when a fight was anticipated. The column reached the town early next morning; but as the rebels had fallen back, it remained there as a part of the garrison until the 26th of May, when it was ordered to Fayetteville, Tenn., where it remained till the 2d of June. An expedition planned against Chattanooga, under command of General Negley—Turchin's Brigade having been appointed as a part of the force—left Fayetteville on the 2d of June, 1862. The 19th took no important part in the expedition until the 6th, when it was detached from the column, and sent across the mountains to Chattanooga, in front of which place it arrived at four p. m., having driven in all the enemy's scouts and pickets, capturing some of them. The regiment took a position about three-quarters of a mile from town, put out pickets, and prepared to hold the position. The rest of the forces were still some fifteen miles distant, and could not be up till noon of the next day, so that the position of the 19th was none of the safest.

The next day, General Negley arrived, and prepared to open the action. Two companies of the 19th, "A" and "G," commanded by Captains P. N. Guthrie and Lyman Bridges, were deployed as skirmishers in front of the water-batteries of the enemy, being supported by Cos. "E" and "D," under command of Lieutenants D. F. Bremner and W. A. Calhoun. About three o'clock p. m., the enemy opened fire on the skirmishers, keeping it up for nearly three hours, when the enemy's guns were silenced; the firing of the skirmishers being so correct that the rebel gunners dared not remain at their posts. At about seven o'clock, the line was recalled. The casualties of the 19th Illinois in this action were Corporal T. Hanley, of Co. "A," mortally wounded, and Sergeant T. M. Beatty and Theodore Cole, severely wounded. Subsequently, July 21, the regiment was ordered to Huntsville, from which place the various companies were distributed along the Memphis & Charleston and the Tennessee & Alabama railroads, as guards. It performed this duty until the 26th of August, when it was ordered to Nashville, General Buell having decided to evacuate north Alabama. A part of the regiment arrived at Nashville on the 27th. The remainder were not relieved so soon, and were further delayed by the burning of two bridges by guerrillas, who made an attempt to capture one of the trains on which Cos. "A," "B," and details from other companies were being transported. The attack was made at Richland Creek by a strong force under Colonel Biffle, a noted guerrilla leader, who, to insure success, had burned the bridge in front and rear of the train and pulled the spikes out of some of the rails, so as to throw the train from the track, and then concealed themselves in a cornfield to await its arrival. They were successful so far as throwing the train from the track was concerned, but its capture was quite another thing. The instant the train ran off, the concealed rebels poured a volley into the cars, killing one and wounding seven or eight of the men, hoping thus to throw them into confusion. In this they did not succeed; for the boys, as soon as they found out what was the matter, and almost before an officer could give an order, were out of the cars, in line, and advancing on the rebels. This turn of things was unlooked for, and, although the enemy greatly outnumbered the boys, they ran into the woods and escaped, leaving two prisoners and some horses and equipments in the hands of the victors. Under direction of their officers, the men soon had the cars on the track again, but the bridges being burned, they could get no farther. On the next day, companies "C," "D," "E" and "I," of the 19th, and General Negley, with troops from Columbia, arrived. The bridges were soon repaired, and on the 30th the whole force arrived at Nashville. About the same time a large force appeared in front of the stockade held by Co. "K," a few miles farther on the road to Nashville, and demanded its surrender. Lieutenant Bell, who was in command, refused to do so, and informed the rebels that if they wanted his post, to come and take it; which invitation they did not accept. On the 31st of August, the regiment was on the road for Murfreesboro', where it arrived September 1; and on the 5th of September was again at Nashville, where it remained, forming a part of the garrison, under the command of General Negley. Of constant hard duty, short rations, and short and sharp skirmishing, a full share fell to the 19th Illinois.

The army having returned to Nashville, and General Rosecrans having assumed command under the new organization, General Negley's division, to which the 19th belonged, was assigned to the center of the army, under command of General Thomas. On the 10th of December, it moved from Nashville and camped on the Franklin pike, about eight miles from Nashville. There, until the 26th of December, the time was passed in drilling and perfecting the men, and on that date, the whole army moved against the enemy at Murfreesboro', and on the night of the 29th, was in front of the rebel position. On the morning of the 30th of December, the regiment was deployed as skirmishers, and entered the cedars, to develop the position of the enemy. They were soon found, and driven back across the Wilkinson pike, some distance into the woods; but a force still held a strong position in a brick kiln, close to the pike, and annoyed the regiment very much. These Colonel Scott determined to dislodge, and, with the reserve of the regiment, attacked the position and took it. The right of the skirmish line being too far advanced, it fell back to the pike, and held that line until relieved by McCook's troops, which came up and took position on the right of Negley. The 19th, being withdrawn from the skirmish line, returned to its position in the line, and was not engaged during the rest of the day.

On the morning of the 31st, the troops were early under arms, and Negley's division was about to advance, when all on the right was confusion and disorder. McCook had been attacked in flank, and was rapidly driven back towards Murfreesboro' pike, thus exposing the right flank of the center to the enemy. Negley's division quickly changed front, and for a while succeeded in checking the advance of the enemy; but, finally, overpowered, had to fall back to the edge of the cedars. They here made a brave stand, but again were forced to retire. There, the 19th Illinois performed an act of bravery and daring that should give it a high position in history. General Rosecrans had brought up the reserves, and, while forming them on the open ground between the pike and the cedars, it was necessary that the rebels should be checked, until his lines could be completed. The 19th Illinois, alone and single handed, remained in the cedars; and not only did they hold their position, but the gallant Scott advanced them still farther into the woods, where they remained almost half an hour, with the rebels in front and on both flanks. There, Captain Murchison was wounded, and Lieutenant Hunter, of Co. "B," Captain Garriot, of Co. "H," Lieutenant Bell, of Co. "K," and a host of brave men, fell, dead or wounded. Still they held their ground until General Rosecrans's lines were formed, and then retired in good order behind the new line of battle, leaving in dead and wounded one hundred and ten men—nearly thirty-three per cent. of the men engaged, Negley being held in reserve.

The 19th Illinois was not engaged again until the afternoon of the 2d of January, 1863, when, an attack on the left being anticipated, the division moved from the right, where it had been supporting McCook. At about three o'clock p. m., the rebels, under General Breckinridge, made a desperate assault on the left of the line, and, after a sharp fight, broke it, driving it back across Stone River, and for a few minutes, all seemed lost. Then the famous question, "Who will save the left?" was asked and answered; and bravely did the 19th do its part. Rosecrans ordered Negley's division to restore the line; at it they went, the 19th Illinois leading, and checked the rebels on the bank of the river. The 19th plunged into the river, crossed, re-formed, and, without waiting for the other regiments to cross, charged a rebel battery that was doing great mischief to our lines. On they went, and, under a withering fire, broke the rebel line, capturing four guns and a rebel flag. This check to the rebel assault decided the battle of Stone River; and to no regiment in the army was due more credit and honor than to the 19th Illinois. The regiment lost heavily in officers and men. The gallant Colonel Scott fell, mortally wounded, leading the final charge. Always impetuous and fearless, he was in advance of the line, a conspicuous mark for the enemy. The regiment had another brave officer to take his place—Lieutenant-Colonel Raffin; who immediately assumed command, and led on the regiment to final victory. Captain Chandler, of Co. "E," a brave and faithful officer, fell, shot through the head, immediately after crossing the river. Lieutenant Wellington Wood, of Co. "H," also went down, mortally wounded, at the same time.

After the battle of Stone River, the regiment remained at Murfreesboro' with the army, doing picket duty and drilling; and to such perfection was it brought that it was acknowledged to be the best drilled regiment in the Army of the Cumberland. As a proof of this, the following incident may be related. At the close of a review and inspection of General Negley's division by General Rosecrans, General Negley ordered the 19th Illinois to move from the line, take position in front of the general commanding, and go through the manual of arms and bayonet drill. The men executed the various movements with the precision of clock-work; all the muskets moved as one, and all the hands rose and fell as if one will controlled them. Next came the bayonet drill; which they executed with so much perfection that General Rosecrans (who, during the manual of arms, had been riding up and down the line) dismounted, and walked along in front of the regiment, clapping his hands, and saying: "Good! good! Splendid! splendid! With fifty thousand such men, I could cut my way anywhere." After the drill was over, he complimented each company commander on the efficiency of his men. The general inspector, also, in his report, mentioned the 19th Illinois for their efficiency, cleanliness, and soldierly appearance, as an example for the army.

The regiment took part in the campaign against Tullahoma, and followed Bragg's retreating army to the foot of the mountains, but was not engaged, except in slight skirmishes, and suffered no loss, except the capture of one or two prisoners. The pursuit being over, it went into camp at Dechard, Tenn., where it remained some time; marched thence to Cowen Station, thence over the mountains into the camp at Cave Springs, near Stevenson, Ala., where it remained until September 1, when it moved across the Tennessee River with the army, toward Chattanooga. Crossing the Raccoon or Sand Ridge into Lookout Valley, it marched, up and over Lookout Mountain, into McLamore's Cove, where it had a brisk skirmish with the enemy, but drove them off, and occupied the ground on the 10th of September. The whole division being over the mountain, it marched in the direction of LaFayette, Ga., advancing about three miles, when indications of the enemy caused a halt and formation in line of battle. The troops bivouacked that night in line of battle, no fires being allowed. Brisk skirmishing took place on the following day, in which the regiment participated. At about one o'clock, the whole line was withdrawn to David Cross Roads and formed a new line—Cos. "A" and "K" being advanced as skirmishers, and Co. "K" posted behind a stone wall, where it did splendid work in protecting the retreat of the old skirmish line, which had been left out to cover the withdrawal. As the skirmishers neared the wall, the boys of Co. "K" cried out to them to lie down, and they did so. On came the rebels, thinking to capture them. They were allowed to come almost up to the wall, when a volley from behind it scattered and drove them back. This position was held for a time, and then the whole force fell back to Baily's Cross Roads, where it remained until joined by General McCook's troops, when it moved towards Chattanooga, and on the night of the 18th was at Crawfish Springs. On the 19th, the battle of Chickamauga opened, and at about four o'clock, p. m., the 19th Illinois got into action, and continued under fire until night. On the morning of the 20th, skirmishing began at daybreak. About eight o'clock a. m., Stanley's brigade was withdrawn from the line and moved to the left, at which point the battle was already raging. It reached its new position about ten o'clock a. m., just in time to meet a charge of the enemy, which it checked, and then, charging in turn, drove the Confederates in great disorder through the woods about half a mile, capturing General Adams and staff and a large number of prisoners; but not being supported they were unable to push their advantage farther. The enemy, being reinforced and supported by a battery, then forced the brigade back. It retired in good order, bringing all its prisoners and most of its wounded.

It was then placed in position, by General Thomas, on the ridge in the rear of its former position. In this charge, the 19th Illinois lost heavily in killed and wounded. It was about one o'clock p. m. when the brigade took its last position on the ridge.

Until this time, our army had been beaten and forced back at every point; but the Fourteenth Corps was now re-formed and posted along the ridge, to hold which was necessary for the safety of the army. Each man seemed to understand this, and all were resolved to die at their posts, but to never retreat therefrom. The first position assigned to the 19th Illinois was near some log-houses on the ridge. A breastwork of rails was quickly arranged, and behind this it awaited the onset. Nor did it wait long. On came the enemy, covering their advance with a shower of bullets; but to no purpose. They were hurled back. While the fight was the hottest, the log-houses took fire, and, being dry and very combustible, threw out such an intense heat as to scorch the clothing on the men at the works. But still they kept their place, and did not move until the rebels were driven back. The regiment was then moved about one hundred yards farther to the right, where it remained for the rest of the day.

The rebels made several more desperate charges, but were each time driven off with great loss. At about four or five o'clock, they made their last assault; and at one time the flag of the enemy was planted on a portion of the works, about in front of Co. "K," which, however, still held its position, with its left exposed to a flank fire, and kept the enemy in check until a force was rallied strong enough to drive off the enemy. This was done by Captain D. F. Bremner, of Co. "E" of the 19th Illinois, and Lieutenant Carlin, of the 18th Ohio. Twice the regiment exhausted its ammunition, which was supplied the last time from the boxes of the killed, wounded, and prisoners. When the rebels fell back, there were but three cartridges to each man in the regiment. At about eight o'clock p. m., the 19th, with the rest of the army, fell back to Ross-ville, and bivouacked. On the 21st, the brigade was posted in Rapville Gap, and held it against several attempts of the rebels to take possession of it, until about eleven p. m., when it fell back to Chattanooga.

The whole army was put in position around Chattanooga, fortifications were thrown up, and every preparation made for defense. The army being reorganized, the regiment was assigned to King's brigade (Second), Johnson's division (First), Fourteenth Army Corps, General Palmer commanding, and, in common with the rest of the army, was busily engaged in throwing up earthworks and strengthening the defenses of the town, doing its share of picket and outpost duty until November 22d, when it left its camp for a position in front of Fort Negley, where it remained till the 25th, when it took its place in the line of battle, and moved forward to the assault of Mission Ridge.

In the battle fought on the 25th of November, 1863, one of the most glorious and decisive of the war, the 19th took a prominent part and earned an undying fame. The order to advance being given, the "Army of the Cumberland" moved out of the woods, in which they were formed, in line, and on, across the open field between the wood and the ridge. It was the sight of a lifetime—once seen, never to be forgotten. Away to the left stretched a long line of blue, with glistening muskets and waving flags, moving onward, steady and irresistible, sweeping everything before it. The musketry of the Rebels at the foot of the ridge, the steady and unceasing fire of the artillery on the summit, had no ability to check or stop the line. Over the rifle-pits at the foot, up the side of the mountain, and over the rampart that crowned it, swept the triumphant army. The brave Corporal Patterson, of Co. "E," carrying one of the flags of the regiment goes down, shot through the brain; but the flag hardly reaches the ground, for another fearless soldier, Patrick McDonald, of Co. "K," seizes it, and waves it again in the face of the enemy. Almost at the same time, Sergeant George Steel, with the other flag, goes down, shot in two places (face and wrist), but John Brosnahan, of Co. "K," grasps it from the wounded sergeant, and rushes forward up the ridge, Soon Patrick McDonald goes down, shot in the thigh, when Captain D. F. Bremner takes the flag, bears it to the summit, and plants it—the first flag on the ridge on the right of Bragg's headquarters—receiving fourteen bullet holes through his clothing and having the flagstaff shot in two in his hand. He, together with Corporal Thomas G. Lawler, David McArthur, of Co. "E," John McCarthy, of Co. "K," Lieutenant D. Morehouse and Sergeant Rhea, of Co. "I," Sergeant Stanger, of Co. "D," and some other brave men of the 19th Illinois were the first Union soldiers on the summit of Mission Ridge from the line before mentioned. Joseph Schlayte carried the colors of another regiment (the color-bearer being shot), to the top of the ridge, and was severely wounded in the foot and had the flag staff shattered in his hands. The regiment also captured one piece of artillery, which afterwards was taken off by a regiment of Sheridan's division. The loss of the 19th Illinois in this battle was twenty-five killed and wounded, as follows:

Killed.—Corporal William Patterson, color-bearer, Co. "E"; and private Stephen Babit, Co. "I."

Wounded.—Captain D. F. Bremner and Lieutenant James W. Raffan, Co. "E" (slightly); Captain James G. Campbell, Co. "I" (severely); Lieutenant Lester G. Bangs, adjutant (right knee amputated); Alonzo J. Stickney, John L. Sagle, Henry Anderson, Springer Galley, George Miller, John McConchie and James Merrill, Co. "A" (seriously); George Gould and James McDonald, Co. "C" (mortally); Thomas Mahoney and John Reawik, Co. "D"; Sergeant George Slue, color-bearer; W. C. Fuller and John Man, Co. "E"; John Van Brunt, Ensley D. Babbitt and James F. Regan, Co. "I" (mortally); John P. Clay, Co. "H"; Leopold Henneger, Co. "I" and Patrick McDonald, Co. "K."

The regiment bivouacked on the field, and next day took part in the pursuit of the rebel army, arriving that night at Grayville, Ga., near which place it assisted in the capture of three pieces of artillery and some wagons and prisoners. In the morning it was again on the road, and, on its arrival at Ringgold, formed part of the line to be used in the support of the troops who were assaulting the rebels on Taylor Ridge, but did not participate in the action. The pursuit being abandoned, it returned to its camp at Chattanooga, where it passed the winter months, doing ordinary camp and guard duty until February 22, 1864, when a reconnoissance toward Dalton, Ga., again called the 19th Illinois to active duty. On the 23d, it was engaged in skirmishing at Tunnel Hill, where it lost one man killed—First Sergeant Jackson, of Co. "B," a brave and energetic soldier. On the afternoon of the 25th, the brigade was ordered to relieve General Morgan, who had been sharply engaged with the rebels in Buzzard-Roost Gap. The 19th Illinois and three battalions of regulars, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Raffan of the 19th, formed the first line. The regiment was in line all night, and at day-break the rebels opened a brisk fire, and during the day made repeated, but vain, attempts to drive it from its position. At night, the line was withdrawn, and the regiment moved to Tyner Station. Thence it moved to Grayville, Ga., where it remained until May 3, 1864, when it was transferred to the First Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps, Brigadier-General Turchin, commanding. Thus after two years it was again under command of its first colonel and first brigade commander.

On the 7th of May, it moved from its camp to do its part in the grand advance to Atlanta. It participated in the battle of Resaca, but lost no men in this action, nor in any of the subsequent movements. It performed faithfully all the duties assigned to it, advancing as far as Acksworth Station, Ga., from whence it was, on June 8, 1864, ordered to Chicago to be mustered out, its term of service being about to expire. It arrived in Chicago, June 17, and was, on July 9th, mustered out of service. It left Chicago July 12, 1861, over one thousand strong, and received, during its term of service, a large number of recruits; it returned, June 17, with less than five hundred men. How the regiment was regarded by its different brigade commanders is best told by one of them, Colonel Stanley, who in a letter to Governor Yates, paid the following high tribute to the bravery and efficiency of its officers and men. He says:

"At Stone River, at Chickamauga, in the short but severe engagement at Davis's Cross Roads, Ga., September 11—in all these, as in all other places where vigilance, courage and fortitude have been required—the 19th has done its whole duty. On September 20, in that terrible slaughter on the field of Chickamauga, first in that fearful charge, when with three small regiments (about eight hundred men in all) we drove and routed Adams's brigade of eleven hundred veterans and one of the best Confederate batteries, wounding and capturing their brigadier-general and covering the field with his slain, and then retired, unsupported and in order; afterward in the afternoon of the same day in the brilliant and successful defense of the hill from noon until night, repulsing successive charges of overwhelming numbers of the enemy, my brigade won again an imperishable fame. The 19th has done its whole duty—has borne its share of danger and toil, and come off the field with honor, if with lessened ranks. Quick and prompt in all their movements; ready, at the word of command; there is one thing in which few equal them, and that is, that in all their charges and defenses they remain intact—do not separate, but act all together, and hence efficiently.

"I desire, in this connection, especially to commend to your Excellency the commanding officer—Lieutenant-Colonel Raffan. Previous to his taking command, the regiment had been first led by the brave and accomplished Turchin; afterward by the no less brave and gallant Scott; hence his was a third place to fill, and it may be sufficient to say that he has sustained himself well. I have never seen his equal before the enemy. He or his regiment have never turned their backs on the foe without orders—have never in any case run away from the enemy.

Always when a charge has been ordered in which the 19th took part, the enemy have given way. "In the camp, on the march, on picket, skirmishing, fighting, they can be relied on."

COLONEL JOSEPH R. SCOTT was elected colonel of the 19th Illinois Infantry, at the organization of the regiment, at Springfield, in May, 1861. Resigning in favor of Colonel John B. Turchin, he was elected lieutenant-colonel, and served in that position until Colonel Turchin's promotion to brigadier-general, July 17, 1862, when he was promoted colonel of the regiment, and commanded it until he received a fatal wound at the battle of Murfreesboro', January 2, 1863. He was born in Canada, but became a resident of Chicago while yet a youth. Through his own exertions and resolute perseverance, he acquired a more than ordinarily good education, with little aid from teachers or school. From his youth, he developed a peculiar fondness and capacity for military studies, which he brought into practical use, in Chicago, by organizing, in 1856—at which time he was a young clerk of about twenty years—a company of young men called the National Cadets. Two years later, this company was reorganized, by Colonel E. E. Ellsworth, as the United States Zouave Cadets, of which Ellsworth was the first commander and Scott the first lieutenant. When the Zouave Companies were reorganized in the spring of 1861, at the breaking out of the war, Scott was one of the first to offer his services to the Government, and at the formation of the Zouave regiment in Chicago, he was elected its commander. He accompanied the troops that composed General Swift's Cairo expedition, and with a company of his Zouaves, boarded two rebel steamers at that place, and seized a large quantity of arms and munitions of war. He led the 19th, as its colonel, in the advance on Bowling Green; the expedition under General Mitchell, when, as a part of Turchin's brigade, it was the first to enter Huntsville, Decatur and Tusculumbia; in the expedition under General Negley to Chattanooga; participated in all the marches and hardships of the regiment during the summer and fall of 1862; and finally led it through the bloody battle of Murfreesboro', and across Stone River on the 2d of January, 1863, to victory, but also to his death.

ELLSWORTH'S CHICAGO ZOUAVES.

UNITED STATES ZOUAVE CADETS was also the name of this organization, the germ of which was a company of young men, organized in Chicago, March 19, 1856, by Joseph R. Scott, and called the National Guard Cadets.* The original officers were: Captain, Joseph R. Scott; First Lieutenant, W. W. Lawton; Second Lieutenant, W. B. Smith; Third Lieutenant and Ensign, N. G. Vail. For some time this company had the reputation of being the best in the State; which is saying but very little, when it is considered to what perfection it attained, under the masterly command of Colonel Ellsworth. By the spring of 1859, however, the crude discipline maintained among the National Guard Cadets had so relaxed, that the organization was threatened with dissolution, having only about twenty members. Their uniforms were shabby, the company was deeply in debt, and in a demoralized condition generally. On the 27th of April, 1859, this relic of the National Guard Cadets was reorganized by Colonel Elmer E. Ellsworth, Assistant Paymaster-General of Illinois. He was then a young man, scarcely twenty-two years of age, full of military ardor and tenacity of purpose—brave, dashing, handsome and able. As is known to all Americans, he afterward became a National character, being the first commissioned officer of the United States to fall in defense of his country in the late war.

The debts of the old company were assumed; stringent rules were created, prohibiting members from entering drinking saloons or disreputable places while in uniform, under penalty of expulsion. A new uniform was adopted; consisting of light blue pants with buff stripe, dark blue frock coat with buff trimmings, cap of dark blue with red, white and blue pompon, and white cross-belts. A knapsack, with red blanket neatly rolled and strapped on top, completed the outfit of the "infantry uniform." The name of the company was changed to the "Cadets of the 60th Regiment." The armory was exchanged for more commodious quarters in Garrett Block, where Central Music Hall now stands. Three drills a week were instituted, and that earnest and persistent discipline commenced, which made the company the model Zouave organization of the United States, and one of the finest in the world. In less than a month, over fifty recruits were added to the membership. On the following 4th of July, after parading the streets, they gave an exhibition drill on Lake Street, in front of the Tremont House. This was the first introduction to a Chicago public of the Zouave drill, or, more properly speaking, the bayonet exercise movements in "double time," and the skirmish drill. The exhibition made a decided sensation and stirred the enthusiasm of the company to such a high pitch that they voted to change the name to the "United States Zouave Cadets," and adopt a new uniform. This consisted of a bright red chasseur cap with gold braid; light blue shirt with moire antique facings; dark blue jacket with orange and red trimmings; brass bell buttons, placed as close together as it was possible to put them, and within an inch of the border on both sides and around the neck; a red sash and loose red trousers; russet leather leggings, buttoned over the trousers, reaching from ankle half-way to knee; and white waist belt. The jacket did not button, was cut low in the neck, without collar. Easy fitting, high-laced shoes, with thick, broad soles were worn, all made after the same pattern.

The National Agricultural Association, which held its annual fair in Chicago, in September of that year, offered a prize of a beautiful stand of colors to the best drilled company in the country. Drills were resumed, notwithstanding the warm weather; and on the day fixed for the contest (September 15), the Zouaves entered the lists with sixty men, going through about the same evolutions as on the 4th of July previously, and were awarded the prize, as the "Champions of the United States." But one other contesting company, the "Highland Guards of Chicago," appeared on the ground, owing to the short notice given, and to its being the season of the year when drills were generally suspended. The honor, thus so easily won, was a questionable one, and therefore, five days later, a challenge was issued to any company of the militia or regular army of the United States or Canada—the company agreeing to pay the expenses of any successful competitor who should wish to make the contest in Chicago, and also to make a tour of the United States in order to give other companies a chance to contest for the stand of colors. On the 10th of October, the Zouaves participated in the opening of the Chicago & North-Western Railway, as guests of the company. At Fond du Lac, by special request they gave an exhibition drill. On the return train, the Zouaves were presented with a bouquet composed of over three hundred pieces of ribbon, clipped from the hats of the lady excursionists, as a memento of the trip. It was afterward mounted on a silver pedestal and occupied a conspicuous place in the Armory. A "return excursion" by the people of Wisconsin was undertaken, and extensive arrangements were made by the citizens and Zouaves for their reception and entertainment in Chicago; but all these plans were frustrated by a terrible accident which happened to the excursion train when near Watertown, Wis., in which eleven persons were killed and twenty-eight wounded. Of course, all thoughts of continuing the excursion were abandoned.

During the next three months the company added a gymnasium to the other attractions of the armory, and which occupied the north end of their commodious drill hall. By January, 1860, they had so increased in efficiency and strength, that Governor William H. Bissell appointed them the "Governor's Guard of Illinois"; and, sad to say, on the 14th of the following March they were called to Springfield and assigned the "post of honor" at his funeral. About this time (January, 1860), the Zouaves adopted the "Golden Resolutions," as they were called by a Chicago paper, which added so much to their fame throughout the country. They bound the members, upon pain of expulsion, and publication of offense and offender's name, to keep away from gambling, drinking or billiard saloons and houses of ill-fame. Under the earnestness and firmness of Colonel Ellsworth, all opposition to the rules melted away, and each member promised to maintain them, and the United States Zouave Cadets soon became known from Maine to Georgia as a company of strictly disciplined, bright, hardy, temperate and moral gentlemen.

On February 2, 1860, active preparations for the contemplated summer tour of the United States commenced. So enthusiastic were the young men that they resolved to sacrifice all evening calls upon friends, all parties, visits to the theatre, etc., until June 20, and drill every night, except Sunday, from seven to eleven o'clock. If the boys were well enough to be out of bed, and imperative business did not prevent, they were required to be at the Armory, or run the risk of being arrested and brought there in disgrace. A system of fines for inattention or carelessness during drill was adopted. The slightest error or irregularity seldom escaped the vigilant eye of the commander, and woe to the delinquent when detected; for the fine was generally accompanied by a reprimand, couched in language more forcible than elegant. Occasionally the culprit was ordered to the wall, and there, facing it, compelled to exercise himself in the manual of arms for half an hour or so. Those unable to drill were required to seat themselves on a settee provided for the purpose, and pay strict attention to the movements of the others. When the company rested, they were allowed to talk; when they "broke ranks" they were permitted to leave their seats, but were required to resume them again when the command "Fall in" was given. The occupants of this settee were dubbed "The Sore-toe Squad," and were the unhappy victims of many a joke from the wags of the company. Many a poor sick fellow has been known to drag himself through three hours of hard drill rather than occupy the "pillory," as the settee was called. After drilling an hour and a half, arms were stacked, and the company marched to the supper-room, where hot coffee and sandwiches were served. At nine o'clock, drill was resumed, and continued until 10:30 p. m. At all drills the fatigue uniform and knapsack were worn. To insure the greatest uniformity possible, the men's hair was cut alike, and mustaches and goatees allowed to grow. Some half-a-dozen, who were unable to comply fully with this regulation, were placed in the rear rank, and many jokes were cracked at their expense. A part of the drill also consisted in jumping horizontal bars, climbing ladders hand over hand, etc. Subscriptions toward defraying the expenses of the eastern tour came in slowly, and, in consequence of this, and the death of Colonel Ellsworth's brother, the date fixed for leaving Chicago was changed from June 20 to July 2. In fact, it required all the tact and persuasive powers of Ellsworth to keep the men from giving up entirely. During the entire month of June, the men slept in the Armory—first on camp-cots and then on the floor.

At length the long looked-for day of departure, July 2, arrived. No one was allowed to take any citizen's clothing. Before leaving the Armory for the cars, Ellsworth formed the company in a circle, and, standing in the center, delivered a stirring speech, concluding with these words:

"By the Eternal! The first man who violates his pledge while on the tour shall be expelled forthwith, stripped of his uniform, and sent back to Chicago in disgrace. So help me God!"

This resolve he had occasion very soon to put into execution. The company, numbering fifty-one officers and men, the "Light Guard" band (fifteen men), and five servants, made a street parade through several of the business thoroughfares, escorted by the "Light Guard" and "Highland Guards," to the depot, and amid the cheers of the military and citizens, and the booming of artillery, they entered the cars, and the journey was begun. The names of those who made the tour were: Captain, Elmer E. Ellsworth; Second Lieutenant, H. Dwight Laffin; Surgeon, Charles A. DeVillers; Commissary, Joseph R. Scott; Paymaster, James B. Taylor; First Sergeant, James R. Hayden; Second Sergeant, Edward B. Knox; Quartermaster-Sergeant, Robert W. Wetherell; Color-Sergeant, Benjamin B. Botsford; Privates, Fred J. Abby, Gerritt V. S. Aiken, Merritt P. Batchelor, John A. Baldwin, William Behrend, Augustus A. Bice, Samuel S. Boone, Edwin L. Brand, Joseph C. Barclay, James A. Clybourn, Harry H. Hall, George W. Fruin, Louis B. Hand, Charles H. Hosmer, William Inness, Louis L. James, Ransom Kennicott, Lucius S. Larrabee, John C. Long, Waters W. McClesney, Samuel J. Nathans, William M. Olcott, Charles C. Phillips, Robert D. Ross, B. Frank Rogers, Clement Sutterly, Charles Scott, Jr., Charles W. Smith, Charles C. Smith, Edwin M. Coates, Freeman Conner, William H. Cutler, William N. Danks, James M. DeWitt, George H. Fergus, Charles H. Shepley, Ira G. True, Smith B. VanBuren, Harry S. Wade, Sidney P. Walker and Frank E. Yates.

From lack of space, a narrative in detail can not here be given of the eastern tour, during which the Zouaves visited Adrian and Detroit, Mich., Cleveland, Ohio, Niagara Falls, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, Troy, Albany, West Point, N. Y., New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Mo., Springfield, Ill., Washington, D. C., Salem and Charlestown, Mass. At all these places, especially at the National metropolis, they were feted and praised in the most unstinted terms, so that when they left Springfield, Ill., for Chicago, on August 14, they were the most prominent and popular military organization in the United States. During the tour they had received many presents, such as fatigue-caps, epaulets, swords, plumes, cartridge-boxes, badges, buttons, ladies' gloves, handkerchiefs, ribbons, fans, and even jewelry. Before leaving Springfield, these articles were taken from the baggage, and fastened to the knapsacks and uniforms, giving the company a very singular appearance. It resembled nothing more than a traveling variety store or bedecked Christmas tree.

Arriving at Chicago, the victors were awarded a grand ovation, which was participated in by all the local militia, the political torchlight clubs, and the Fire Department. Their reception at the "Wigwam" was warm. With enthusiastic pride, Mayor Wentworth delivered the congratulatory speech. In behalf of his command, Colonel Ellsworth fully responded to these public marks of favor, after which the company executed a few of their famous movements, and proceeded to the Briggs House to partake of the elegant banquet there spread for them. This terminated the tour of nearly four thousand miles, extending over a period of forty-three days, the longest ever made, before or since, by any militia organization in this country. Not only had the precision, strength and grace of their movements won for them a national reputation, but their uniform had so captivated the public taste that, while in æsthetic Boston, an enterprising dress-maker had captured one of the Zouaves long enough to take a pattern of his jacket. This she fashioned into a lady's Zouave jacket, which became very fashionable among the élite.

Shortly after their return to Chicago, at the earnest request of her citizens, the Zouaves gave an exhibition drill at the "Wigwam," for the benefit of the Home for the Friendless. This was their last appearance as an organization.

In October, 1860, the company disbanded, and a "skeleton regiment," called the First Regiment Light Infantry, was formed, as had previously been proposed by Colonel Ellsworth. His plan, which was to have a full complement of field, staff and line officers for a regiment of ten companies, was only partially carried out, owing to his frequent absences, in the pursuit of his law studies with Abraham Lincoln, at Springfield.

Early in the spring of 1861, Co. "A," Chicago Zouaves, consisting of members of the old Zouave Cadets, was organized by James R. Hayden, its organization being completed March 21, with the following officers:

Captain, James R. Hayden; First Lieutenant, John H. Clybourn; Orderly Sergeant, Robert W. Wetherell; Second Sergeant, James M. DeWitt; Third Sergeant, Charles H. Hosmer; Fourth Sergeant, Robert D. Ross; President, Chauncey Miller; Secretary, Ira G. True; Treasurer, A. B. Hatch.

The company, when organized, numbered seventy, and the exciting events soon following, caused the ranks of the Zouaves to rapidly fill up. By the middle of April, they had three hundred names enrolled, and other companies formed, of which Co. "B" was under the command of Captain John H. Clybourn, and all under Captain Joseph R. Scott.

These companies offered their services to Government at the breaking out of the war, and accompanied General Swift, on his Cairo expedition, April 21, 1861. On arriving at Big Muddy bridge, a long wooden structure over the Big Muddy River, on the Illinois Central Railroad, at Carbondale, fifty-seven miles north-east of Cairo, where secession influence was reported to be strong, Captain Hayden, of Co. "A," and Lieutenant Guthrie, of Co. "B," with their commands, and a section of artillery, under Lieutenant Willard, were detailed to remain and guard the bridge. The remainder of General Swift's command proceeded to Cairo, where the Zouaves remained, doing good service, until May 2, when Cos. "A" and "B" returned to Springfield, to join a regiment organizing there.

While in Cairo, the Zouaves, commanded by Captain Scott, and a section of Chicago Light Artillery, under Captain Smith, boarded the secession steamers, "C. E. Hillman" and "John D. Perry," as they neared

Cairo, carrying arms and ammunition from St. Louis to Memphis, and confiscated their cargo. The boats were run ashore at Bird's Point, opposite Cairo, deserted by officers and crew, and brought by Captain Scott to Cairo. The companies of Captains Hayden and Clybourn arrived at Springfield too late to join either of the regiments formed under the first call of Government, and were mustered out of service, receiving one month's pay from the State. A regiment was formed the following month, under the "ten-regiment bill," called the "Regiment of the State-at-large," and sometimes the "Chicago Regiment." This afterward became the 19th Illinois Infantry, but, under the original organization at Springfield, in May, 1861, Joseph R. Scott was elected colonel of the regiment. It had, when ordered into camp, at Camp Long (named in honor of ex-Alderman James Long), on Cottage Grove Avenue, four Zouave companies, as follows:

Co. "A," Captain James R. Hayden; Co. "B," Captain John H. Clybourn; Co. "C," Captain William Iunis; Co. "D," Captain James V. Guthrie.

Captain J. H. Clybourn's company was changed to Co. "K." He resigned his command in June, for the purpose of raising a Zouave regiment, to be called the "Lyon Zouaves," in honor of General Nathaniel Lyon, killed at Wilson's Creek, Mo. Captain Clybourn was succeeded by Presly N. Guthrie. The further history of these Zouave companies is included in that of the 19th Illinois Infantry.

Colonel Ellsworth, who was in Washington when the first call for troops was made, hastened to New York City, and organized a regiment from the Fire Department, of which he was appointed colonel—the 11th New York Infantry. Six of his old company joined him there, and were appointed first lieutenants; seven held office in the 19th Illinois Volunteers; five in the 44th New York State Volunteers, and six in the United States Army. Nearly every member of the "Old Zouaves" held commissions during the war, and were scattered through the regiments of a dozen States. Two were in the Confederate army. Members of the company, during the war, served as officers in three batteries of artillery, four regiments of cavalry, twenty-six regiments of infantry, and in the Quartermaster's Department and Signal Corps.

In conclusion, it may be of interest to briefly trace the career of the principal officers of the company who participated in the eastern tour:

COLONEL ELMER E. ELLSWORTH, soon after his return to Chicago, went to Springfield, to study law with Mr. Lincoln and to secure his co-operation in carrying out the great idea, which he hoped to spend a life-time in perfecting into a system, viz., the founding of a National Militia Bureau. Then and there began that warm friendship, unfortunately of short duration, so unaffectedly evinced by President Lincoln upon the occasion of the young officer's sad and untimely death. After having taken part in the presidential canvass with vigor and ability, he accompanied the President-elect and his party to Washington, being charged with his safe conduct. Upon the breaking out of the Rebellion, he went to New York City, where he organized the 11th New York Volunteers (Fire Zouaves). He and his command were mustered into service at Washington, May 7, 1861, the first regiment sworn in for the war. On May 24, they were transported by two steamers to Alexandria, Va. There, as is well known, Colonel Ellsworth was shot while attempting to haul down a rebel flag.

SURGEON CHARLES A. DEVILLERS, formerly an assistant surgeon of the French army service, in Algiers, a Frenchman and an accomplished swordsman, had done much to perfect young Ellsworth in the manly use of his favorite arms. He was subsequently appointed colonel of an Ohio regiment.

JOSEPH R. SCOTT, who served during the trip as commissary, was afterward elected colonel of the 19th Illinois Infantry, resigned in favor of Colonel Turchin, and accepted the lieutenant-colonelcy. After the promotion of the latter, he became colonel. He was killed at the battle of Stone River, January 2, 1863.

PAYMASTER JAMES B. TAYLOR afterward became connected with the 11th Massachusetts Regiment.

FIRST SERGEANT JAMES R. HAYDEN became captain of Co. "A," 19th Illinois Infantry, and is now in the government service, at Olympia, W. T.

SECOND SERGEANT EDWARD B. KNOX became first lieutenant of Ellsworth's Fire Zouaves, accompanied the regiment to Alexandria, served with credit through the war, and has been a resident of this city since 1870.

QUARTERMASTER SERGEANT ROBERT W. WETHERELL served in the same capacity in the 19th Illinois Infantry.

TWENTY-THIRD ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

IRISH BRIGADE.—On April 20, 1861, the following call was published in the Chicago newspapers:

"Rally! All Irishmen in favor of forming a regiment of Irish volunteers to sustain the Government of the United States in and through the present war, will rally at North Market Hall, this evening (April 20th), at seven and one-half o'clock. Come all. For the honor of the Old Land, Rally! Rally for the defense of the New! (Signed), James A. Mulligan, Aldermen Comiskey and M. C. McDonald; Captains M. Gleason, C. Moore, J. C. Phillips, Daniel Quirk, F. McMurray, Peter Casey; Citizens, Daniel McElroy, John Tully, Philip Conley, T. J. Kinsella."

There were already several organized Irish companies in Chicago—the Montgomery Guards, Emmet Guards and Shields' Guards—and the patriotic Irish citizens of Chicago did indeed rally at the call.

The meeting on the 20th was addressed by Colonel Mulligan and others, and the enrollment list was then opened. In an hour and a half three hundred and twenty-five names were signed, recruiting officers appointed, and T. J. Kinsella, P. Conley and D. Quirk appointed a committee to procure equipments. Reports of the meeting speedily reached neighboring towns, offers of companies from abroad were as speedily returned, and in a week twelve hundred Irishmen had tendered their services to the country as enrolled members of the "Irish Brigade."

When it was found that the regiment could not be accepted under the first or second calls of Government for troops, a meeting was held, at which nearly every member of the organization was present, and it was resolved not to disband, but to go on and perfect the equipment and drill of the regiment, and offer it to the War Department, as an independent regiment, for the war. Colonel Mulligan was sent to Washington to urge its claims to acceptance, and accomplished his mission on the 17th of May, the "Irish Brigade" being the first independent Illinois regiment accepted by the War Department.

On the return of Colonel Mulligan from Washington, a brick structure on Polk Street, known as "Kane's Brewery," was secured and occupied as barracks by the regiment, under the name of "Fontenoy Barracks." The "Irish Brigade" was mustered into the United States service by Captain T. G. Pitcher, U. S. A., as the 23d Illinois Infantry, June 15, 1861, under the following officers:

Field and Staff (All of Chicago).—Colonel, James A. Mulligan; Lieutenant-Colonel, James Quirk; Major, Charles E. Moore;

Faithfully
Jas. A. Mulligan

Adjutant, James F. Cosgrove; Quartermaster, Quin Morton; Surgeon, William D. Winer; Chaplain, Thaddeus J. Butler.*

Line Officers.—Co. "A" (Detroit Jackson Guards): Captain, John McDermott; First Lieutenant, Patrick J. McDermott; Second Lieutenant, John H. Daley. Co. "B" (Montgomery Guards, Chicago): Captain, Michael Gleason; First Lieutenant, Daniel W. Quirk; Second Lieutenant, Edward Murray. Co. "C" (Chicago Jackson Guards): Captain, Francis McMurray; First Lieutenant, Patrick Higgins; Second Lieutenant, Robert Adams. Co. "D" (Earl Rifles, Earlville): Captain, Samuel Simson; First Lieutenant, Thomas McClure; Second Lieutenant, James E. Hudson. Co. "E" (Ogden Rifles, Morris): Captain, Franklin K. Hullbnd; First Lieutenant, George D. Kellogg; Second Lieutenant, Henry Pease. Co. "F" (Douglas Guards, LaSalle County): Captain, David P. Moriarty; First Lieutenant, Lawrence Collins; Second Lieutenant, Patrick O'Kane. Co. "G" (O'Mahoney Rifles, Chicago): Captain, John C. Phillips; First Lieutenant, John A. Hines; Second Lieutenant, Martin Wallace. Co. "H" (Ottawa City Guards): Captain, Charles Coffee; First Lieutenant, Thomas Hickey; Second Lieutenant, Thomas J. Ray. Co. "I" (Shields' Guards ("A"), Chicago): Captain, James Fitzgerald; First Lieutenant, Timothy L. Shanley; Second Lieutenant, Patrick J. Ryan. Co. "K" (Shields' Guards ("B"), Chicago): Captain, Daniel Quirk; First Lieutenant, James H. Lane; Second Lieutenant, Owen Cunningham.

On July 14, the regiment received orders to report at St. Louis, and left Chicago that day to proceed to its destination, via Quincy, Ill.

It then mustered nine hundred and thirty-seven men, of whose appearance, as they left the city, the Chicago Tribune, of that date, indignantly remarks that

"Hard usage had made their single military suit look quite unlike freshness," and that "although in material the men are a credit to any section they are in outfit a disgrace to Chicago, as a city; Cook, as a county, and Illinois, as a state."

On arriving at St. Louis, the regiment was thoroughly armed and equipped, at the Arsenal, and on the 23d of July, it was ordered to Jefferson City, Mo., to protect the Legislature, then in session.

Francis McMurray, captain of Co. "C" (Chicago Jackson Guards), died at Jefferson City, August 2, 1861, and Second Lieutenant Robert Adams, of Chicago, was promoted captain in his place. Captain McMurray was an experienced officer, who had served in the Mexican War. He abandoned a lucrative law practice in Chicago to serve his country, and, for several weeks, from his private means, subsisted the company which he raised.

The "Irish Brigade" remained at Jefferson City until the last of August, its ranks increasing by daily enlistments, until at that time it numbered one thousand one hundred and thirty-five infantry, one hundred and thirty-three cavalry, and seventy-six artists. A Jefferson City correspondent of the Missouri Democrat thus describes the brigade, and its surroundings, at that time:

"Stationed on a commanding breezy hill, with the town and the country at the will of their field-guns, and surrounded by broad, smooth parade grounds, are the gleaming tents of the gallant 'Irish Brigade,' under Colonel Mulligan.

"They present a beautiful appearance, with the stars and the green flag waving over the white encampment. It is a regiment of bold, disciplined and willing men, who, upon occasion, will make themselves rivals of the famed 69th. Their officers are gentlemen of large experience, education and courage. * * The brigade seems to be the favorite of the town, and its officers are courted by the first circles. Well they may be, for one rarely meets such gallant gentlemen as Captains Moriarty, Phillips, Quirk, Simson and Pease. Adjutant Cosgrove's breast blazes with medals—for all the leading Crimean engagements. Lieutenant-Colonel Quirk is an accomplished tactician, and Major Moore his worthy rival in the art. The Colonel, who has gathered about him this capital display of art and arms, is a young, cool, daring officer, possessing the respect and confidence of his men in an unusual degree."

On the last day of August, the "Irish Brigade" was ordered by General Fremont to proceed to Lexington, one hundred and sixty miles up the Missouri River, to reinforce the troops already stationed at that place under Colonel Peabody, which consisted of several hundred Home Guards, a portion of the 13th Missouri Infantry, and six hundred of the 1st Illinois Cavalry, Colonel T. M. Marshall. Colonel Mulligan reached Lexington with his command on September 9, and, as senior officer, assumed command of the post. Lexington was one of the most important points in Missouri, and the Confederate leaders of the State were determined to possess it.

Driven from the town only the preceding week by the approach of the Federal troops, Claiborne Jackson had been obliged to adjourn, sine die, the Confederate Legislature then in session, and turn his steps southward, leaving $800,000 in gold, and the State seal in possession of Colonel Peabody. In the meantime, the Confederate force, under Price and his subordinates, was marching rapidly toward the north, and was between Warrensburg and Lexington, when Mulligan assumed command at the latter place.

The town of Lexington, situated on the south bank of the Missouri River, was divided into Old and New Lexington—the latter, which was the principal village, being about a mile west of the other almost deserted village, with which it was connected, along the river road, by a scattered settlement. Midway between the two villages, on a slight acclivity, was a large brick structure known as the "Masonic College," which, on the arrival of Colonel Mulligan, was occupied by Peabody's troops, and which they had strengthened by a slight breastwork. This building became Mulligan's headquarters, and around it he concentrated all the Union force. The breastwork was extended so as to enclose the building, and the troops set about the construction of an outer earth-work, ten feet in height, with a ditch, eight feet in width, running back to the river bluff and inclosing an area capable of containing a force of ten thousand men. The hospital was located just outside the intrenchments, to the west, or toward New Lexington.

On the 10th of September—the day after his arrival at Lexington—Colonel Mulligan sent Lieutenant Ryan, of Co. "I," with a squad of twelve men, on the steamer "Sunshine," back to Jefferson City, to urge the necessity for reinforcements. Forty miles below Lexington, the "Sunshine" was captured by the Confederates, and Ryan and his men taken prisoners. Mulligan well knew the critical position of the Union force, and anxiously waited for reinforcements, but none came. The men labored steadily on the intrenchments until the 12th, when the advanced pickets, under Captain Quirk, were driven in, reporting the near approach of the enemy. By noon, Price had surrounded the Union force and posted his troops at both Old and New Lexington. An attack was made, that afternoon, on the angle of the intrenchments held by Captains Fitzgerald, Quirk and Phillips, which was repulsed with considerable loss. The rebels finding shelter behind the few buildings still remaining at Old Lexington, our troops succeeded in shelling and destroying most of their shelter in the course of a few days. The siege was kept up by Price day after day, and day by day the situation of the little garrison grew more desperate. The supply of water was cut off, and food was almost entirely exhausted; still, the brave Mulligan replied to the summons to surrender and to fight no more on Missouri soil, "The Irish Brigade makes no compromise." On the 18th, at nine o'clock in the morning, the enemy made another attack on the works. The force of Price had been increased to twenty-eight thousand men and thirteen pieces of artillery, and stationing his guns at every available point, he opened a terrific fire, which he kept up until seven in the evening. About noon, the rebels captured the hospital, which Colonel Mulligan had not fortified, believing the white flag floating from its walls would be held sacred by any foe. It was taken, however, and from its balcony and roof the sharpshooters of the enemy poured a deadly storm of bullets within the intrenchments. In the hospital were one hundred and twenty wounded men, Rev. Father Butler, chaplain of the regiment, and Surgeon Winer. It could not be left in rebel hands, but it was not easy to find a company brave enough to face the leaden storm outside the intrenchments. Two companies attempted the task, and failed. Four companies of the Missouri Infantry, led by Captain George B. Hoge, of that regiment, formerly of Chicago, fought well, but were driven back, with their leader a prisoner. The Chicago Montgomery Guards were ordered forward. The distance was eight hundred yards. Giving his men a brief exhortation to be brave and do their duty, Captain Gleason ordered a charge, and with the words, "Come on, my brave boys," led them across the open space, up the slope, and to the hospital door; when, driving the enemy down the hill behind, what were left of the Montgomery Guards took possession of the hospital. Thirty, of the eighty, that started, were killed or wounded. Captain Gleason was shot through the cheek and arm.

On the 19th, the rebels renewed the attack on the intrenchments, sheltered behind breastworks made of hemp bales saturated with water, which they rolled forward as they advanced. On the afternoon of the 19th, the enemy charged over the intrenchments at the point where the Missouri Home-Guards were stationed, and planted their flag on the top of the intrenchment. The Irish Brigade was ordered to leave its position on the opposite side of the works, and re-take the position. The heaviest charge of the day followed, the flag being captured and the rebels driven back. Colonel Mulligan was wounded at this time. On the 20th, the white flag was raised by the commander of the Home-Guards, on that part of the fortifications assigned to them. It was taken down, and they retreated within the inner line of breastworks and refused to fight. One more charge was made on the enemy on the afternoon of the 20th, led by Colonel White, of the 8th Missouri, in which that brave officer was mortally wounded.

A council of officers was held that evening, and it was decided that further resistance was useless, and that Mulligan must surrender. Major Moore, of the brigade, was sent to General Price, at his headquarters at New Lexington, to learn the terms of capitulation. They were unconditional surrender—the officers to be retained as prisoners-of-war, the men to be released on parole, surrendering arms and accoutrements. At four o'clock on the afternoon of the 21st, the Federal forces were marched out of the intrenchments, taking with them only their personal effects. The officers were retained at Lexington, and the privates, about fifteen hundred in number, were taken across the Missouri River, and marched that night to Richmond, and thence to Hannibal, the following day, where they were released. They were met at Hannibal by General Prentiss, and arrived at Quincy on the 23d, where they were received with the kindness their faithfulness and courage had merited. General Price treated Colonel Mulligan with marked courtesy, and refused to accept the surrender of his sword. The green flag was torn in shreds by the men of the regiment, and each man took a piece—thus the flag was not captured.

The total loss of the "Irish Brigade," at Lexington, was one hundred and seven, of which the following is the best list that can be obtained:

Co. "A," commanded by Captain John McDermott: Killed—Patrick Carey, John W. Smith, J. J. Armstrong, Wounded—John Kelley, John Hoffman, John Foley, Alexander Campbell, William Floyd, Alexander Dnohoo, Thomas Jarvis, Thomas White. Co. "B," commanded by Captain Michael Gleason: Killed—Michael Grenahan, Frank Curran, William Mulligan, F. Cummings, Patrick Fitzgerald, Edward Conlee, —McCarthy, John Drenlaney, John Gallagher. Wounded—Captain Gleason, Lieutenant Edward Murray, Corporal —Keeffe, George Bennan, H. K. The following joint resolutions, presented by Hon. Isaac N. Arnold, were adopted by Congress, December 20, 1861:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the thanks of Congress be presented to Colonel James A. Mulligan and the gallant officers and soldiers under his command, who bravely stood by him against a greatly superior force, in his heroic defense of Lexington, Mo.

Resolved, That the 23d Regiment of Illinois Volunteers—the Irish Brigade—in testimony of their gallantry on that occasion, are authorized to bear upon their colors the word 'Lexington.'

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate these resolutions to Colonel Mulligan and his officers and soldiers."

On October 8, 1861, the 23d Illinois was mustered out of service, at St. Louis, by order of Major-General Fremont.

Colonel Mulligan was still a prisoner in the hands of Price, having refused to accept a parole. He was soon after exchanged, and returned to Chicago. Enthusiastic crowds greeted him all along his route from St. Louis; and his welcome at Chicago, November 8, was simply a general ovation, in which all classes joined. Refusing the more formal reception tendered him, on the plea that time was too precious to be thus spent, he hastened to Washington, to petition the President for the restoration of the "Irish Brigade" to United States service. He was successful in his mission, and, on December 10, 1861, it was restored, by order of Major-General McClellan, and ordered to fill its ranks to the maximum. Recruiting headquarters were established at Camp Douglas, Chicago, the regiment was soon filled, and was then employed in guarding prisoners at the camp, until June, 1862.

While the regiment was stationed at Chicago, Captain Franklin K. Hulburd, of Co. "E," died of diphtheria, on May 5. The "Mulligan Battery," or "Rourke's Battery," officially known as Battery "L," 1st Illinois Light Artillery, was recruited and attached to the regiment, while it was at Camp Douglas. Its officers were: John Rourke, captain; John McAfee, senior first lieutenant; Charles Bagley, junior first lieutenant; William L. McKenzie, senior second lieutenant; Michael Lanry, junior second lieutenant, most of whom were of the "Oconto (Wisconsin) Irish Guards." The battery accompanied the command to Virginia, and did good service in the Shenandoah Valley campaigns, being chiefly used in sections in different parts of the country.

On June 14, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Annapolis, via Harper's Ferry. On arriving at the latter place, it was detained a few days, that point being threatened by the enemy, and was thence ordered to New Creek, Virginia, in the military department of Major-General Wool. A large depot of government stores was situated at New Creek, which Mulligan's command was ordered to protect against a threatened attack of General Ewell. For the defense of this post, Fort Fuller was constructed, by Captain Coffey Co. "H," Irish Brigade, and which the regiment garrisoned until September 1, when it moved toward Clarksburg,—menaced by the enemy at that time,—and, by rapid movements, saved both that town and Parkersburg from an attack. In October, an expedition under Lieutenant Colonel Quirk, with Companies "A," "C" and "D," of the 23d, a small cavalry force, and a section of Rourke's Battery, was sent out to Greenland Gap, on the Ridgeville road, to intercept a force of Stuart's cavalry, which was advancing towards Petersburg with supplies for the enemy. This force was reached when within about five miles of Petersburg, and a charge made upon the camp, which resulted in routing the squadron, with a loss of three killed, sixteen taken prisoners, and a large number of horses and cattle captured. On November 10, Mulligan was ordered to attack a rebel force, which, under Imboden, was raiding the valley. Companies "B," "D" and "K," of the "Brigade," under command of Major Moore, attacked the rebel camp, on the south fork of the Potomac, that night, capturing forty prisoners and a large quantity of army supplies.

On the 26th of December, Colonel Mulligan having been assigned to the command of a brigade, Lieutenant-Colonel Quirk commanded the regiment, under whom it moved, on January 3, 1863, to the relief of Colonel Washburne, at Moorefield, Va.; arriving, after a forced march of forty miles in nineteen hours, to find that the rebels had fallen back, on hearing of the approach of reinforcements. The command returned to "Camp Fuller," on New Creek, where, on April 3, 1863, it was assigned to the Fifth Brigade, Colonel Mulligan commanding, First Division, Eighth Army Corps—Lieutenant-Colonel James Quirk having command of the regiment.

On the 25th of April, the command moved to Grafton, and, on the same day, Co. "G," Captain Wallace, stationed at Greenland Gap, was attacked by General Jones, with some three thousand cavalry. Greenland Gap is a pass through the Knobley Mountains, only wide enough for the road and a small mountain stream. Captain Wallace was left with a detachment of his own company, and a few men of Co. "H," 13th Virginia Infantry, under Captain Smith, to guard the western entrance to the pass. Wallace occupied a wooden church commanding the mouth of the gap, and Smith a log house near by.

General Jones could not enter the pass without dislodging them, and made three successive charges on the little force, which maintained its position stoutly for five hours. After dark, the rebels succeeded in firing the church, and just as the roof was falling upon him, Captain Wallace, ordering his men to throw their arms into the burning building, surrendered his command. The prisoners were sent to Richmond, and some months later were exchanged and re-joined their regiment. The killed and wounded of the rebels in this affair were more in number than the entire Union force. Five out of the eight rebel officers engaged were either killed or wounded.

The 23d Illinois was engaged in the battle with Imboden's forces at Phillippi, April 26, and three days later with the enemy under General Jones, at Fairmount.

On the 6th of July, Colonel Mulligan moved, with his brigade and some additional troops, to Hancock, Md.; where it was believed the rebel army, under Lee, would attempt to cross the Potomac in the retreat from Gettysburg. Colonel Mulligan was placed in command of all the Federal troops at this point, and advanced his command to near Hedgeville, on the opposite side of the Potomac, where he met and had a slight engagement with a portion of Lee's cavalry under Hampton. Not receiving reinforcements from Mead, Mulligan was compelled to re-cross the Potomac, and was then ordered to move with his brigade to Petersburg, Va., which place he reached on August 16, and before the close of the month had well fortified and strengthened it, by constructing Fort Mulligan. On the 4th of September, the regiment had an engagement with Imboden and his "Rangers," in the gap of Petersburg, in which the latter were routed. On September 11, an expedition under command of Captains Fitzgerald and Wallace, was dispatched from Petersburg, which attacked a rebel force under McNeal, near Moorefield, Va., and completely scattered it—the guerrillas flying to the mountains.

On October 25, 1863, the Second Division of the Department of West Virginia was organized, and Mulligan assigned to its command, with orders to make New Creek his headquarters after November 8. The 23d, under Colonel Quirk, was assigned to the Second Brigade, Colonel Thoburn, Second Division, with headquarters at Petersburg, where it remained until December 10, when the brigade moved as support to Averill's cavalry on an expedition to cut the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. In this expedition, which was successful, the forces of the Confederate leaders, Jackson, Early and Echols, were met and defeated, and the brigade returned to Petersburg, where Colonel Thoburn was commandant.

On January 30, 1864, Colonel Thoburn, finding that Early was about to attack him in force, evacuated his position and retreated to Ridgeville, where he joined a detachment of Mulligan's forces from New Creek, and moved, with him, to attack Early near Moorefield. Reaching the south branch of the Potomac, at McNeil's Ford, Mulligan found the passage disputed by a portion of Early's force, under Rosser; but, by the aid of his artillery, he crossed the river, and marched toward Moorefield, where Early was stationed with his main command. A skirmish fight was kept up until he reached the town, where the rebels made stubborn resistance. A fight of about three hours ensued, when the enemy was driven into and through Moorefield, falling back toward Harrisonburg, and finally into the Shenandoah Valley. During the fight, Captain Michael Gleason, of Co. "B," was taken prisoner, but was re-captured. After pursuing Early's troops six miles, Mulligan returned to New Creek, leaving the 23d to guard Greenland Gap, near Petersburg. On the 23d of April, 1864, the 23d returned to Chicago for the purpose of re-enlisting as veterans, and for a veteran furlough. Its numbers, now reduced from eight hundred to three hundred and fifty fit for service, told of the hard campaign through which it had passed in Virginia.

On the expiration of furlough, the regiment returned to Virginia, where it again formed a part of the First Infantry Division (Colonel Mulligan), Twenty-Fourth Corps (General Crook), Army of West Virginia. The division was ordered to move to the support of General Hunter, then between Staunton and Lynchburg, Va.; but on the defeat of that General, the order was rescinded, and Mulligan's command was ordered to occupy Leetown.

In July, 1864, the Confederate force, under Early, advanced north nearly to Washington, threatening that city. Reinforcements were hurried to the support of General Auger, commanding the defenses, and Early was compelled to retreat across the Potomac. Supposing that he had continued his retreat toward southern Virginia, General Crook, with his small corps, moved from Harper's Ferry, with the intention of occupying Winchester, but soon found that Early was in his path. On the 23d of July, his cavalry advance was attacked at Kernstown, and Mulligan's division, which was then at Stone Mills, was ordered forward to its support. The cavalry was forced back on the 23d, but, on the following day, Early renewed the attack. Crook's advanced brigade having been driven back, the engagement became general along his line, of which Mulligan's division formed the center. Too late, General Crook found that he was fighting Early's whole command of thirty thousand men with his two small divisions. During the severe struggle on the 24th, the 23d and Mulligan's whole division fought bravely to hold back the enemy, at least long enough to save the trains, and in this were successful, but at a fearful cost to the little command. Colonel Mulligan was killed while in the advance leading his men, beseeching the 23d Illinois, with his last breath, not to lose the colors of the "Irish Brigade." "Lay me down, and save the flag," were his last words—fit words for the brave young commander. After Colonel Mulligan's death, the First Division was assigned to the command of Colonel J. Thoburn, under whom the 23d Illinois participated in Sheridan's campaign in western Virginia. August 4, 1864, Sheridan assumed command of the Army in the Shenandoah Valley, the First Division then being encamped in the vicinity of Frederick City. On arriving at, or near, Charleston, Va., in the first movement of Sheridan against Early, the 23d Illinois, by command of Major-General Crook, being reduced in numbers through constant service, was consolidated, August 29, into five companies:

Co. "B," Captain Harry Pease; Co. "D," Captain Samuel Simison; Co. "G," Captain Martin Wallace; Co. "K," Lieutenant Patrick Ryan; Detachment "F," Lieutenant Stewart S. Allen. The organization was thereafter officially known as Battalion 23d Illinois Veteran Infantry.

In September, 1864, Captains Patrick McDermott, of Co. "A," and James J. Fitzgerald, of Co. "I," with such other line officers as did not enlist as veterans, were mustered out of service at Chicago. Under the new organization, the battalion participated in the engagements at Opequan Creek, Strasburg, and Fisher's Hill, in September, and at Cedar Creek, which closed the campaign in the valley, in October. General Thoburn, the division commander of the 23d, was killed at Cedar Creek.

After the overthrow of Early in the Shenandoah Valley, the command of General Crook was ordered to join the Army of the James, commanded by General Ord, and proceeded to the vicinity of Richmond.

In the latter part of March, the command was ordered from Richmond, to take part in the attack on Petersburg. On the 1st of April, Foster's division, in which was the 23d Illinois, arrived in front of the outer line of defenses, assaulting them in the vicinity of Hatcher's Run. After the outer line was carried, the troops advanced and took position before Fort Gregg, on the south side of the city. This redoubt, one of the strongest in the main line of fortifications around Petersburg, and which was held by Harris's Mississippi Brigade, was assaulted and carried by storm on the 7th—the 23d participating in the attack. The following extract from a letter of an officer of the Irish Brigade, dated Burksville, Va., April 7, 1865, and published in a Chicago newspaper, gives the names of the killed and wounded:

"Richmond and Petersburg have at last fallen, and the old Irish Brigade colors were the first inside of the fort that Lee called the key of Petersburg, namely Fort Gregg. The 23d and 30th Illinois regiments fought, side by side, at the taking of the fort, and were the only two Illinois regiments in the armies of the Potomac and James."

Killed and wounded in the 23d, Captain P. M. Ryan, commanding, at the storming of Fort Gregg; Sergeant-Major George B. Sexton, severely wounded. Co. "A" (Old Montgomery Guards), Lieutenant James M. Doyle, commanding; Wounded—Color-corporal Peter Mechan, Corporal Lovelkin; Privates Richard Burns, Edward Downey, Patrick O'Brien, John Martin, Benjamin Thompson. Co. "B," Lieutenant James Burns, commanding; Killed—Private Edward O'Dwyer; Wounded—Sergeant John Bisby, Color-corporal John Creed; Privates Boyd D. Simpson, Peter Church, John Connors, Ira Wade. Co. "C," Lieutenant Patrick Foley, commanding; Killed—First Sergeant Thomas Cliff, Wounded—Corporal Henry Nott, Sergeant Richard Crowley; Privates James Fighe, Henry Welch. Co. "D," Lieutenant D. Coston, commanding; Wounded—Sergeant Thomas O'Donnell, Privates Michael Lowry, Michael McDonnell, Thomas Quinn, John P. Cavin, Michael Regan. Co. "E," Lieutenant Edwin Coburn, commanding; Killed—Private Charles Briedert. Wounded—Sergeants Florence and Sullivan; Privates William Riordan and Martin Crehan.

After the surrender of Lee, the 23d was ordered back to Richmond, and was on duty near that city until July, 1865, when it was mustered out, and returned to Chicago.

In Richmond, on the 27th of April, 1865, five additional companies were added to the 23d Illinois, raising it to a full regiment, the acting field and staff officers after that date being as follows: Colonel, Samuel Simison; Lieutenant-Colonel, Patrick M. Ryan; Major, Edwin Coburn; Adjutant, Boyd D. Simpson; Quartermaster, Thomas McGirr; Surgeon, John S. Taylor.

COLONEL JAMES A. MULLIGAN was born in Utica, N. Y., in 1830. He was of Irish parentage, and, although American born, his sympathies and interests from boyhood were warmly enlisted in behalf of the nationality and religious faith of his parents. He came to Chicago, with his family, when he was but six years old, and was here educated at the University of St. Mary's of the Lake, of which he was the first graduate, receiving, in 1850, the degree of Master of Arts. After leaving college, he accompanied John L. Stevens, the noted traveler, subsequently president of the Panama Railroad, on his last trip to South America, and on his return read law in the office of Arnold, Larned & Lay. In 1854, he edited for a short time the Western Tablet, a Catholic weekly paper; in 1855, was admitted to the Bar, and commenced the practice of law. At the organization of the Shields' Guards, in 1854, young Mulligan was elected first lieutenant; in 1858, he was corresponding secretary, and in 1860-61, was captain of the company. In 1857-58, he was appointed by President Buchanan to a clerkship in the Interior Department, and spent the winter in Washington; on his return to Chicago continuing his law practice as partner of Henry S. Fitch, United States Attorney for the Chicago District. In October, 1859, Mr. Mulligan was married, by Rt. Rev. Bishop Duggan, to Marian Nugent, daughter of Michael and Alice (Grant) Nugent, of Chicago, who proved, during the coming years of trial, a true and heroic wife, following the fortunes of her husband in his campaigns from Missouri to Virginia, and compelling the respect of not only her husband's command, but of his enemies, by her patient dignity, and courageous endurance of dangers and sorrows. At the breaking out of the Rebellion, Mulligan, with other patriotic citizens of Chicago, raised the 23d Illinois Volunteers, of which he was elected colonel. It was offered to the Government, but not accepted under the first or second calls for volunteers, the great number of regiments offered Governor Yates causing the rejection of that, with many others. Not being willing to disband the regiment, Mr. Mulligan visited Washington, and offered it to the War Department as an independent organization, and as such it was accepted May 17, 1861. Although tendered a brigade while in Washington, Mulligan refused to accept the command, as his regiment could not form a part of it. At the battle of Kernstown, near Winchester, Va., fought Sunday, July 24, 1864, Colonel Mulligan received three wounds, any one of which might have proved fatal. His conspicuous bravery, as he led his men in person to the front, rendered him a mark for the enemy's sharpshooters. As he fell from his horse, his staff and his old regiment rallied round him, determined to bear him from the field. The enemy, perceiving the movement, concentrated their fire on the little group above which waved the colors of the Irish Brigade. These colors becoming endangered in the struggle, Colonel Mulligan gave his last command: "Lay me down, and save the flag." Lieutenant James H. Nugent, his nineteen-year-old brother-in-law, obeyed, was wounded slightly, but resumed his place in the little band which surrounded the Colonel, but a second bullet was fatal in its effect, and the lieutenant fell dead. Colonel Mulligan was carried to a farm-house in the vicinity, but died July 26, 1864. Mrs. Mulligan learned the sad news at Cumberland, Md., formerly her husband's headquarters, and started immediately for the field. She brought the remains of her husband from Winchester, Va., to Chicago, where the last honors that the city could render its brave son, were sadly paid, and all that was left of him on earth, was tearfully laid away to rest in Calvary Cemetery. The family of Colonel Mulligan consists of his widow and three daughters. Colonel Mulligan, aside from his qualities as a soldier, was an accomplished gentleman. Well educated, he was gifted with a mind capable of making that education of practical use to himself and to his country. He was an able writer, clear, bold, concise, yet thorough; his literary productions are remarkable for their eloquence, fearlessness and energy. As an orator, he had few superiors. Of a commanding presence, excellent voice, and unbroken flow of language, he never failed to win the attention and deserve the admiration of his listeners. In all relations of life he was a conscientious, upright man, and a Christian gentleman.

CAPTAIN DANIEL QUIRK was born in Kerry, Ireland, and when a mere boy, emigrated with his parents to America, and made his home in Chicago. He early became a member of the "Shields' Guards," and was elected captain of Co. "B" of the Guards, which was mustered into service as Co. "K" of the 23d, and participated with that famous regiment in its campaigns in Missouri and Virginia, under the lamented Mulligan. At the close of the war, with his brother James, lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, he returned to the city and engaged in commercial pursuits. He was also for a time a valued employé of the post-office, but was obliged to resign, about 1887, on account of ill health. He then visited Ireland, but did not entirely recover, and died in Chicago, in July, 1889.

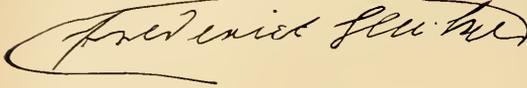

THOMAS BRENAN, assistant county treasurer, and one of the old residents of Chicago, is a native of Nova Scotia. His father paid his first visit to this city in 1838, but afterward returned to his home at Marimichi, New Brunswick, and subsequently removed to Prince Edward's Island, where he had a farm. There young Brennan spent his early days, coming to Chicago in 1849, with his parents, three brothers and four sisters. Going into business at first as a clerk in a hardware establishment, he subsequently moved to Peoria, where he clerked in a hotel for a season. He next accepted a position as cashier and paymaster in the construction of the Bureau Valley Railroad. He continued in that position until the completion of the line, and from 1855 up to the opening of the war, engaged in commercial pursuits. Until the fall of 1864, he followed the fortunes of the 23d Illinois Regiment (Mulligan's brigade) as division quartermaster. Returning to Chicago, after engaging in pursuits of a commercial nature, he was appointed cashier in the city collector's office in 1869. He retained that position about four years and, in 1873, became cashier in the city treasurer's office. In 1875, Mr. Brennan was elected assessor of the West Town, which position he resigned to accept the assistant city treasurership under W. C. Seipp, with whom he remained for two years. He was then for two years with Mr. Seipp's successor, Rudolph Brand, resigning his position with Mr. Brand, to accept the position of assistant county treasurer, which was proffered him by County Treasurer William C. Seipp, on his election to the office. Mr. Brennan has been a member of the Board of Education since 1878, and in recognition of his varied and effective service rendered to the cause of education, the "Brenan School," in the Fifth Ward, was named in his honor by the Board of Education of 1884. He is a member of the St. Vincent de Paul Confraternity and many other benevolent organizations, Mr. Brennan having been as intimately identified with philanthropic enterprises as he has been with the care of the civic financial interests, and was a charter member, and is at present one of the Board of Directors, of the St. Mary's Training School for Boys, at Feehanville, in Cook County.

TWENTY-FOURTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE TWENTH-FOURTH ILLINOIS, or the original "HECKER JÄGER REGIMENT," was composed exclusively of German companies, two of which, the Union Cadets and Lincoln Rifles, were organized for the three-months' service, and were among those troops, who, on the 19th of April, 1861, left Chicago for Cairo. There they did service until in June, 1861, when they joined the remaining eight companies. Of these, six were recruited in Chicago, one in Ottawa, and the other in Bloomington. After its formation, the regiment occupied "Camp Robert Blum," on Cottage Grove Avenue. While there, some changes were made in its organization, and Frederick Hecker, the heroic leader of the German re-on the whole, the entire command was made up of excellent fighting material. It soon transpired, however, that some of the officers in the 24th regiment, as well as in other volunteer regiments raised in the beginning of the war, had, in the excitement of the hour, been elected without special reference to their qualifications, and finding the military service not quite agreeable to their comfort, gradually dropped out, to make room for better material from the ranks.

volution of 1848, of St. Clair County, who was then serving as a private in Sigel's 3d Missouri Infantry, in which he had enlisted at the outbreak of the war, was elected colonel, June 15. Geza Mihalotzy, then at Cairo with his Rifle Company, was elected, at the same time, lieutenant-colonel.

On the 18th of June, the regiment was presented with a superb stand of silk colors, exquisitely mounted, the presentation address being made in German by Otto Ludwig, Esq. Colonel Hecker received the flag, and turning to his soldiers, said in their native tongue:

"Soldiers! Comrades! It is now twelve years ago, that I stood opposed in strife to the despots of Europe, and took up arms against them in behalf of freedom and independence. I now take a solemn oath to here defend the same. If we shall come to any engagement with the traitors to liberty, I will be your leader. I, on foot, will ask you to follow me; and if I fall, I only ask you to bring me back from the field, having avenged me. My hair is gray, the last hours of my life are not far off, but the arms I have taken up for our dear adopted country shall only be laid down with life. I will lead you to victory. Will you follow this flag?"

The 24th was mustered into service at Chicago, July 8, 1861, by Captain T. G. Pitcher, U.S.A., under the following officers: *

Field and Staff.—Colonel, Frederick Hecker; Lieutenant-Colonel, Geza Mihalotzy; Major, Julian Kune; Adjutant, Julius

Faun; Quartermaster, Henry Wendt; Surgeon, William Wagner; Assistant Surgeon, Carl Stock.

Many of the members of the regiment had been in active service in the German and Austrian armies, and,

The regiment left Chicago early in July, under orders to report at Alton, Ill., whence it moved to St. Charles, Mo., and thence to Mexico, Mo. It remained at Mexico until the 28th of July, when it was ordered to Ironton, Mo., where it joined General Prentiss's brigade. On the 3d of August, a detachment of the 24th, under Lieutenant-Colonel Mihalotzy, was thrown forward to Centreville, where secession troops had gathered in force, threatening communication with St. Louis. The regiment moved to Pilot Knob, Mo., where General Grant was then in command, on the 8th of August, and was sent, by him, to Fredericktown, on the 14th, with instructions to effect a junction with the Union troops at Cape Girardeau. The command reached Cape Girardeau, and moved thence to Cairo, early in September, and on the 15th of the month received orders to join the army of the Potomac at Washington. Arriving at Cincinnati, it was detained by the railroad accident which disabled the 19th Illinois, also en route for Washington. Meanwhile, however, the Confederate General Buckner had taken possession of Muldraugh Hill, about thirty-five miles south of Louisville, on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and threatened the capture of that city. The regiment therefore received counter-orders, and left Cincinnati, on the 29th of September, for Louisville.

It was the first command of Union troops that trod the soil of Kentucky during the earlier days of the Rebellion, and upon its arrival in Louisville, the loyal people there accorded the regiment a most hospitable and brilliant reception. After a few hours' rest, the command proceeded to Colesburg, and from there, on the next day, part of it took possession of Muldraugh Hill, a few miles further south, General Buckner having seen fit to fall back on Green River. There it remained until November 30th, when it was assigned to Turchin's (Eighth) Brigade, Mitchel's (Third) Division, of the Army of the Ohio, and went into camp near Elizabethtown, Ky., where the 19th Illinois also was stationed.

During the campaign, a serious misunderstanding arose between Colonel Hecker and some of the Chicago officers, which finally culminated in the resignation of the former, together with Major Kune, Captains Lang and Reed, and First Lieutenants Gerhardi and Busse. Colonel Hecker subsequently organized and commanded the 82d regiment. Geza Mihalotzy was promoted colonel; John Van Horn, lieutenant-colonel; Julius Standan, major; George A. Guenther, captain, and E. F. C. Klokke, first lieutenant of Co. "A"; George Guenther, first lieutenant of Co. "E"—all those so promoted being Chicago men.

On the 22d, Turchin's brigade marched to Bacon's Creek, where it remained until February 10, 1862; when intelligence having been received of the surrender of Fort Henry, the movement on Bowling Green and Nashville commenced. Mitchel's division left camp on the 10th, Turchin's brigade leading the column of infantry. After a march of forty miles over a frozen, rocky road, obstructed by trees felled by the enemy in their retreat, the Big Barren River was reached, and as soon as an old ferry boat could be repaired, the infantry, in the dead of night, crossed in parties of fifty—all that the boat would hold at one time. The 24th was the first regiment that crossed, and, with the 19th, pushed on toward Bowling Green choosing to face the possible enemy yet lingering there, rather than the bitter cold of that winter night. The town was reached and found to have the greater part in flames, the rebels having set fire to their stores and the railroad buildings.

Leaving Bowling Green on the 24th of the month, the regiment arrived at Edgefield, opposite Nashville, which place General Johnston had previously occupied as headquarters, on the 27th. Nashville was surrendered the following day, and the troops crossed the river, and went into camp. Mitchel's division having been assigned the task of penetrating the enemy's country to Huntsville, Ala., and, by occupying that place, severing the main line of communication between the rebel armies in the east and in the west, the command moved to Murfreesboro', remaining there until April 4th, building bridges, repairing roads and making ready for the coming campaign. Huntsville, Ala., was a railroad center of vital importance to the enemy, and it was reported that it would be defended to the last. The war was to be carried into the enemy's country, and it was to be success, or annihilation, to the Union force. On the date specified, Mitchel's division marched to Shelbyville, twenty-six miles from Murfreesboro', and on the 7th advanced to Fayetteville, fifteen miles north of the state line of Alabama.

On arriving at Fayetteville, General Turchin solicited, and obtained, permission from General Mitchel to advance with his brigade, and, if possible, surprise and capture Huntsville, before the enemy was prepared for defense.

On the morning of the 10th, the expedition marched from Fayetteville. Turchin's brigade, which consisted of the 19th and 24th Illinois, 18th Ohio, 37th Indiana, 4th Ohio Cavalry and Simonson's battery, was followed by the other two brigades of the division at a little distance. Their progress was slow and exceedingly laborious, owing to the terrible condition of the roads, which led through swamps and forests or over high and precipitous hills, up which the mules could hardly drag the wagons. The men bivouacked at night around their fires, without shelter, and before daylight of the 11th re-commenced their march.

About six o'clock in the morning, Kennett's cavalry, which was in the advance, came in sight of the town. A section of Simonson's battery was placed in position on the Meridianville road, which, while the infantry was coming up, by a few well directed shots succeeded in capturing a locomotive which, with train attached, was steaming out of Huntsville, toward Stevenson, carrying one hundred and fifty Confederate soldiers, who then became prisoners. As the infantry came up, Colonel Mihalotzy sent a detachment of the 24th to tear up the track and prevent the escape of any trains.

The cavalry in the mean time entered Huntsville, taking the town completely by surprise, and capturing, without a blow, all the rebel soldiers that garrisoned the place, besides seventeen locomotives, one hundred and fifty cars, and an immense amount of railroad and war material. On the same day Huntsville was occupied, the 24th and two companies of the 19th Illinois, with one section of Simonson's battery, moved to Decatur on the Memphis & Charleston Railroad, and captured, in the fortifications built there for the protection of the Decatur bridge, five hundred bales of cotton, and on the opposite side of the bridge the full equipage of a Confederate regiment. Turchin's brigade pushed on from Decatur to Tusculumbia, in western Alabama, and some sixty miles from Huntsville. This point was seized and occupied, thus extending Mitchel's line from Stevenson on the east, along the railroad, to Tusculumbia on the west, about one hundred and twenty miles. With the small force at his command, so long a line could not be held, and Turchin's brigade, after occupying Tusculumbia until April 22, was obliged to fall back to Huntsville. The command reached Jonesboro' on the 24th, crossed the Tennessee at Decatur, on the 26th, and reached Huntsville on the 30th. On May 1, the brigade was sent to Athens, from which Colonel Stanley had just been driven by the enemy's cavalry, with orders to occupy and hold the place. The brigade was stationed there nearly a month, during which time accusations derogatory to the character and discipline of General Turchin and a portion of his command, were preferred by officers presumably jealous of both commander and command. The culmination of the charges was the trial by court-martial of General Turchin, and, although the final result was a signal vindication of his fair fame, the immediate result was the transfer of the troops that he had drilled so long and faithfully to another commander.

On May 26, the 24th Illinois marched to join General Negley's forces at Fayetteville, Tenn., and with them, on the 1st of June, set out on an expedition to Chattanooga, to disperse a force of cavalry, concentrated at that point. On the 4th of June, the command encamped at the foot of the Cumberland Mountains, crossed Waldron's Ridge on the 5th, and, driving back General Adams's cavalry across the valley, arrived opposite Chattanooga, on June 7. A portion of the enemy's cavalry was found on the north bank of the Tennessee, on the arrival of Negley's command. He formed his line, with the 24th deployed as skirmishers, and moved forward, the cavalry re-crossing the river on their advance. Batteries were placed in position commanding the town, the enemy's guns were silenced, and the Union troops remained on the north bank of the river until the 7th, when, being unable to procure supplies, General Negley was obliged to abandon the attempt to occupy Chattanooga, and withdrew. The regiment arrived at Stevenson on June 11, and marched thence to Jasper, Tenn. While at Jasper, Captain Kovats and Lieutenant Gerhardt of Co. "F," when on a scouting expedition with a small party, along the Tennessee River on June 21, encountered the Confederate pickets and a skirmish ensued, in which Captain Kovats was severely and Lieutenant Gerhardt slightly wounded. Captain Kovats returned to Chicago, and a few months later resigned his command.

From Jasper the regiment moved to Battle Creek, and thence, on July 11, to Tullahoma, remaining on the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad, employed in guarding various stations, until September 7, when, Bragg having commenced his march into Kentucky, it proceeded with General Buell's Army to Nashville. It was there assigned to Starkweather's (Twenty-eighth) brigade, Rousseau's division, McCook's corps, and, with the rest of Buell's Army, marched to Louisville, where it arrived on the 28th of September.

On October 1, it marched from Louisville in pursuit of Bragg, and on the evening of the 7th, encamped with the brigade near Mackville. On the morning of the 8th, after marching about twelve miles, the command reached Chaplin Hills, near Perryville, and formed on the extreme left of Rousseau's division. The ranks of the 24th had been sadly thinned, ere this, by disease and hardships. Colonel Mihalotzy was left behind at Louisville, severely sick, as were also Lieutenants Schweinfurth, Borneman and Poull, all of Chicago. The field-officers were all sick, and only seven commissioned officers were left to the ten companies, fit for duty. Captains acted as field-officers, and lieutenants and sergeants as captains commanding companies. The men who acted as field-officers in this battle, the first one in which the regiment was actively engaged, were Captain August Mauff and Captain George A. Guenther; and the companies were commanded as follows:

Co. "A," by Sergeant Charles Fritze, afterward its second lieutenant; Co. "B," by First Lieutenant Andrew Jacobi, afterward transferred to another regiment, and promoted; Co. "C," by First Lieutenant William Blanke, afterward captain; Co. "D," by Sergeant-Major William Vocke, afterward second lieutenant, adjutant of the regiment, and finally captain of Co. "D"; Co. "E," by First Lieutenant, Arthur Erbe, subsequently captain of Co. "H"; Co. "F," by Second Lieutenant Hugo Gerhardt, afterward first lieutenant; Co. "G," by First Lieutenant Peter Hand, afterward captain of Co. "G"; Co. "H," by Captain Frederick Hartman, fatally wounded; Co. "I," by Captain August Steffens; Co. "K," by Sergeant August Bitter, afterward second and first lieutenant of Co. "G."

The regiment occupied the height of a wooded hill at the left of Rousseau's line, with a portion of the 33d Ohio deployed as skirmishers in the woods at its foot. As General Jackson's and General Terrill's troops in front were first attacked by the enemy, and driven back, panic stricken and demoralized, passing to the rear of Rousseau's division, the enemy pressed forward and heavily attacked his left, held by Starkweather. The 2d Ohio and 24th Illinois were ordered forward, to support the skirmishers. The 2d Ohio was driven back, but the 24th Illinois, personally led by General Rousseau, who on many occasions praised the regiment as among the best under his command, reached the position and went into action on the left of the 33d Ohio. With the first fierce charge of the rebels, the regiments to the right and left, both made up of new recruits, broke, and could not be rallied. The 24th was ordered to charge bayonets; this they did, and then, clubbing their muskets, a hand-to-hand conflict ensued, and the rebels were finally driven from the front of the regiment. Captain Fred. Hartman, of Co. "H," received a fatal wound, his death occurring on November 10. Captain August Steffens, of Co. "I," Lieutenant Peter Hand, of Co. "G" (Chicago German Turners), Joseph Broesch, the brave color-bearer, and Carl Kirchner, color-sergeant, were killed; in short, about one-third of the entire command were stricken down, but the regiment rallied around its colors, and fought until the enemy was routed. Generals McCook and Rousseau accorded to Starkweather's brigade, and especially to this regiment, the honor of having saved the left of the army. At one crisis of the battle, the artillery horses at the left were all killed, or had become unmanageable. The 24th Illinois and 79th Pennsylvania were ordered to hold the enemy in check while the guns were drawn from the field by hand by the 1st Wisconsin, and the order was successfully carried out.

With the brigade, the 24th participated in the pursuit of Bragg to Crab Orchard, and returned to Mitchellsville, where it was employed in guard and provost duty for a short time.

On December 7, it marched toward Nashville, and went into camp at Stewart'sboro', near that city, on the 9th. In the organization of the Army of the Cumberland, under Rosecrans, Starkweather's brigade was still designated the Twenty-eighth, Rousseau's (Third) division, but formed a part of the center, under Thomas.

The command left camp, on the morning of the 26th of December, and moved toward Murfreesboro', on the Nashville and Murfreesboro' turnpike, arriving, on the 30th, at the crossing of the Stone River, on the Jefferson pike, about nine miles below Murfreesboro'. There the brigade, which formed the extreme left of Rousseau's division, was detached, and, with Stone's battery, left to cover the pike and guard the trains. During the day, it was attacked by Wheeler's cavalry in force, but succeeded in routing it with a loss of eighty killed, wounded and prisoners. The next morning the brigade reported to General Rousseau, and was formed in line of battle on the left of the division, in the dense cedar wood which Rousseau's command occupied. As this division was held as reserve, the brigade suffered comparatively little from the enemy, but much from hunger and cold. General Rousseau says, in his report of the battle:

"The rain on the night of the 31st, which continued at intervals until the Saturday night following, rendered the ground occupied by my command exceedingly sloppy and muddy, and during much of the time my men had neither shelter, food nor fire." (The horse of Lieutenant Starkweather was killed by a cannon ball on the 1st of January, and so famished were the men that steaks cut from it were broiled and eaten on the field.) "Day and night in the cold, wet and mud, my men suffered severely, but during the whole time I did not hear one single murmur at their hardships, but all were cheerful and ever ready to stand by their arms and fight. Such endurance I never saw."

After the battle, the regiment went into camp near Murfreesboro'. At the reorganization of the army, on the 9th of January, the designation of Starkweather's brigade was changed, becoming the Second Brigade, First Division (General Baird), of Thomas's Fourteenth Army Corps.

On June 24th, with the brigade, the 24th advanced toward the enemy, posted at Tullahoma amid the fastnesses of the Cumberland Mountains. After driving Bragg's advance from Hoover's Gap, turning his position at Tullahoma, and expelling his army from middle Tennessee, Rosecrans pressed on toward Chattanooga.

On the 4th of September, Baird's division crossed the Tennessee River at Bridgeport, and, on the 9th, crossed the Lookout Mountains, and encamped in the vicinity of Trenton, Ga. The following day the division was ordered forward to the support of Negley, who had advanced across McLemore's Cove to Dug Gap, and there encountered the enemy in force. On the falling back of Negley to Stevens's Gap, Starkweather's brigade acted as rear guard to the Union troops. On the 17th, Baird moved from Stevens's Gap to Owen's Gap, the next day to Crawfish Springs, and, on the 19th, with Thomas's corps, moved to the left and formed line-of-battle at Chickamauga Creek. Thomas's line was formed on the LaFayette road, facing Reid's and Alexander's bridges, where the enemy had crossed in force the evening before.

At about ten o'clock a. m., Croxton's brigade of Brannan's division, became engaged. Brannan's division formed the left of Thomas's line; Baird joined him on the right. Croxton's brigade, as stated, became engaged at about ten o'clock on the morning of the 19th, and had nearly exhausted its ammunition when Baird advanced to its support, Starkweather's brigade in reserve. The enemy was driven back, Croxton's brigade moved to the rear to replenish their ammunition boxes, and General Baird halted his command to re-adjust his line. Before this could be completed, his right and front were attacked by an overwhelming force, and Scribner's and King's brigades driven back, in disorder, through Starkweather's reserve brigade. The 79th Pennsylvania, which was in front, was likewise thrown back in dismay, leaving Ruch's battery wholly exposed, with the 24th Illinois, a few steps away, in the rear. There now ensued a desperate struggle for the possession of the battery, many of its men having fled or been killed. The loss sustained by the regiment, in this encounter, was even greater than that suffered at Perryville. Colonel Mihalotzy was shot through the hand while waving his sword and urging his men on to save the battery; Major George A. Guenther was severely wounded in the shoulder, while other officers, and many men, were stricken down and disabled. For a time, the regiment stood alone against an overpowering force of the enemy, until finally Johnson's division came to their relief, and, driving the enemy before it, aided in saving the battery. At noon of that day, when the engagement was over, the division commander, General Baird, rode past the brigade, when Colonel Starkweather, its commander, took occasion to say to him in loud tones of praise, pointing to the 24th regiment: "General Baird, the boys of the 24th are bully boys. They saved my battery this morning. I'll never forget it." The brigade bivouacked that night in the open field, and on the morning of the 20th were early placed in line of battle, somewhat protected by barricades thrown up during the night. When the retreat was ordered, toward sunset, the brigade retired to a line of defense near Mission Ridge, and, on the 22d, fell back with the army to Chattanooga.

In the assault on Mission Ridge, November 25, the brigade formed a part of the reserve, taking no part in the active engagement. It joined in the pursuit of the enemy as far as Stevens's Gap, and then returned to camp at Chattanooga, where it remained until February, 1864, when it accompanied the Fourteenth Corps in the flight on Dalton, by way of Tunnel Hill.

On the afternoon of the 24th of February, the regiment participated in a sharp little engagement to the right of Dalton, when, toward six o'clock in the evening, it was advanced as an outpost into Buzzard Roost Gap, a deep, narrow pass traversed by Mill Creek, and situated between an impassable mountain range on the left, known as Rocky Face Ridge, and a high and imposing peak on the right, called Buzzard Roost. The regiment was advanced far into the gap, and took possession of a wooded hill, from which there was a steep rise toward the Roost, with the creek on the other side, above which towered abruptly and almost perpendicularly the Rocky Face. The sky was clouded, and the air damp and chilly. Two companies were stationed on the crest as pickets, while the reserve remained at a short distance in the rear. At nightfall, the rebels were seen marching up in large numbers to the right of the regiment, on the slope of the Roost, where they kindled their camp-fires, to rest for the night. A few of the pickets, therefore, returned to the regiment with the report that they were face to face with the enemy's outposts, which had been advanced later in the evening. A few isolated shots fell, from time to time, from the rebel lines, which showed plainly that the enemy was only a few feet from the pickets, and the utmost quiet had to be observed to prevent a discovery of the regiment's position. At about midnight, Colonel Mihalotzy went to the front for the purpose of making a personal inspection of the picket-line, when a shot was fired. Not another sound was heard, but the Colonel returned in a few minutes, and it was found that he was dangerously wounded, a ball having penetrated the right side of his body. The regiment maintained its position until daybreak, when it withdrew a few hundred yards, and there held the front of the line the entire day. During the ensuing night, all the troops who had participated in the expedition returned toward Chattanooga, where Colonel Mihalotzy died of his wounds, March 11, 1864, and was interred at the National Cemetery there.

Upon the death of Colonel Mihalotzy, the command of the regiment devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel John Van Horn, who, however, owing to old age, resigned his position on the 21st of March, 1864; whereupon Major George A. Guenther assumed command, and continued therein until the term of service of the regiment expired.

After the expedition to Dalton and Buzzard Roost, the regiment was encamped, first at Tyner Station and next at Grayville, Ga. On the 2d of May, 1864, the command started, with the army under Sherman, on the Atlanta campaign. During the march, it participated in a number of engagements, chief of which were the battles of Resaca (May 14, 1864), and of Kennesaw Mountain (June 22-28, 1864). Its term of service having expired, it was returned to the rear, during the latter part of July, 1864, and on the 6th of the following August, was mustered out of the service of the United States, at Chicago. A fraction of the regiment, composed of men who had joined it after it had been mustered into the service, and whose term of three years had, therefore, not been fully completed, was formed into one company, known as Co. "A," under command of First Lieutenant Frederick Zengler and Second Lieutenant Paul Lippert. It remained attached to the Third Brigade, First Division (General R. W. Johnson), Fourteenth Army Corps, and was finally discharged from the service at Camp Butler, on August 1, 1865.

COLONEL GEZA MIHALOTZY was a native of Hungary, a trained soldier, and an active participant in the Magyar struggle to throw off the yoke of Austria. On the failure of that revolution, in 1848, he came to Chicago, and was for some years engaged in business in the city. As related in the foregoing pages, he entered the service of his adopted country at the beginning of the war, and faithfully performed all his duties until his death. The men in his command ever held him in the highest regard on account of his many soldierly and manly qualities, and mourned his death as that of a personal friend.

THIRTY-SEVENTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized in Chicago, in the summer of 1861, as the "Fremont Rifle Regiment," by Julius White, for many years a member of the Chicago Board of Trade, and, at the time, collector of customs of the port of Chicago. Three of its companies—the Manierre Rifles, Captain John W. Laimbeer; Turner Rifles, Captain Henry N. Frisbie, and the company of Captain Ransom Kennicott, were recruited in the city. The regiment went into camp at Wright's Grove, North Side, and was mustered into the United States service September 18, 1861. While in camp, a fine banner, painted by G. P. A. Healy, was presented the regiment by the Board of Trade. It was of blue silk; on one side, being a portrait of General Fremont, and on the reverse, representations of three of the chief events of his life. Colonel White was presented with a splendid black charger by the merchants of Chicago, and Lieutenant George R. Bell, of Co. "G," a sash and sword by the members of the Chicago Bar.

Besides the officers above mentioned, there were, from Chicago, Captain, subsequently Major and Lieutenant-Colonel, Henry N. Frisbie; Adjutants Anton Nieman and Charles B. Chroniger, Quartermaster John H. Peck, Surgeon Luther F. Humeston, Chaplain Edward Anderson, First Lieutenant Wells H. Blodgett, of Co. "D," subsequently colonel of a regiment of Missouri

Infantry; and First Lieutenant Isaac C. Dodge, of Co. "I."

Following is the regimental roster at date of muster:

The usual order of arranging companies did not prevail in the 37th. The companies were arranged in regular order, from right to left, and thus Co "K" held the left flank on all occasions.

The 37th left Chicago for St. Louis, Mo., September 19, 1861. On the 30th of the same month, it was assigned to General Pope's division, and ordered to Booneville, Mo. While stationed at that post, difficulties arose between the Booneville Home Guards and an officer of Pope's staff, which threatened for a time to become serious. Lieutenant-Colonel Barnes, of the 37th, was appointed commander of the post, and brought order out of disorder in a short space of time. In October, the regiment was ordered to Otterville, and formed a part of Fremont's expedition into Southwestern Missouri, leaving that place, October 29, 1861. On reaching Houmansville, November 2, orders were received to march with all haste to Springfield. Colonel White drew up the regiment the next morning, and requested all those unable to make the forced march to remain behind, and accompany the train, which was under command of Captain Peck. One hundred and sixty remained behind, and the balance, without equipments, set out on the sixty-three-mile march.

Upon this occasion, when the regiment was within a few miles of Springfield, occurred a singular circumstance, and which, to the superstitious, was quite startling. The regiment had been drawn up on the plain, not having learned of the order placing General Curtis in command of the Department, and under which General Fremont was then en route. A boisterous prairie wind was sweeping along, and rudely playing with the elegant colors of the regiment, when General Fremont rode toward the command. As he approached, the bearer raised the banner to salute his superior, in the behalf of the "Fremont Rifles," when, with a sharp report, the beautiful standard was rent from fringe to fringe, straight across the noble figure of the General himself.

The regiment reached Springfield on the 4th, remaining four days, and on the evacuation of that city, marched thence to Syracuse, Mo. The regiment then marched to the Lamine River, where it was ordered to go into winter quarters; but had hardly commenced building its log huts, when it was ordered to Sedalia, and thence back to Otterville, where it remained through a part of the winter of 1861-62, in Camp Lamine, on the Lamine River, where the regiment suffered extremely from sickness caused by cold and miasma.

In December, 1861, Colonel White having been assigned to the command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Army of the Southwest, consisting of the 37th Illinois, 59th Illinois, and Davidson's Peoria battery, the command of the regiment devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Barnes. Under him, it moved with the Third Division, General Jeff. C. Davis, on the 25th of January, 1862, to Lebanon, Mo., where it joined the forces of General Curtis, and participated on the 7th of March in the hard fought battle of Pea Ridge, Ark.

On the 7th of March, the line of General Curtis stretched nearly three miles; from Sugar Creek on the left, held by Sigel and Asboth, to Elkhorn Tavern on the right, where Colonel Carr confronted Price. The center, near the little village of Leetown, was held by Davis's division. On the afternoon of the 7th, the division was ordered forward to support Osterhaus's division at its left, the Second Brigade forming the left of the division. The brigade took position on the Fayetteville road, with the Peoria battery so posted as to command the valley of Sugar Creek. The command, consisting of about nine hundred and fifty men, was here attacked by a heavy force under Major-Generals Ben McCulloch and McIntosh, supported by a body of Cherokees under John Ross. This force formed in a dense thicket to the right of Colonel White's brigade, and the two lines advanced, without a gun being fired, until they were separated by a space of only about seventy yards. A bloody contest was here waged for three-quarters of an hour. The 37th Regiment, in command of Major Black, was left without support on its right, the lines there being broken by the enemy's advance and the whole fury of the attack being borne by the single line of this regiment with its supporting battery. In clear ground the result would have been simply annihilation, but sheltered by the thick woods that hid their weakness, and armed on the flanks with the Colt's revolving rifles, that seemed to pour a ceaseless fire, the regiment withstood the attack, forming its broken lines five times within a space of one hundred yards. Here it was that, out of about four hundred and fifty men present for action, one hundred and thirty-four were killed and wounded. In front of the devastating fire of the rifles and the enormous Belgian "72" and "69" caliber guns, with which the 37th were armed, the enemy were piled up in great heaps. During the fifth formation of the line, the Peoria battery was carried by a desperate rebel charge, but was at once re-captured by the brave soldiers of the 37th. The First Brigade took position to the right, the lines were again moved forward, the center was saved, and fighting was over there for the day. The weight of the attack had at first fallen on the right wing, and then had rolled to the left, when it was checked and finally driven back. Dickinson, Payne, Hawes, Blodgett and Messrs. Kennicott and W.

P. Black are especially remembered among the officers of the line, for their gallantry.

The 37th followed the enemy about a mile beyond the battle-field, and then, after resting two hours, marched to a position on the main road, in the direction of Cassville, where it bivouacked for the night. In this engagement, First Lieutenant Orville R. Powers, of Co. "E," of this regiment, was mortally wounded, surviving only long enough to be advised of the victory that crowned the second day's engagement. Major John C. Black, after having his horse shot under him, was severely wounded early in the battle; but remained on the field, with wounds undressed, until the fifth formation and until peremptorily ordered by his brigade commander and the surgeon to leave. Captain W. P. Black was also wounded, but remained on the field and in command of his company through the two days' battle; and the same is true as to Capt. E. B. Payne. The total loss of the regiment on the afternoon of the 7th, was twenty-one killed and one hundred and thirteen wounded.

On the morning of the 8th, the 37th, with its brigade, was ordered to a position in front of the enemy, who had taken a strong position at Elkhorn Tavern. The command was first formed in open field with Davidson's (Peoria) battery at the extreme right. After holding this position about half an hour, exposed to the fire of the enemy's guns both in front and on one flank, the troops were ordered to fall back to the shelter of the woods, out of range of the rebel artillery. The Peoria battery was established in a new position, and, supported by the Second Brigade, by its well directed fire did fearful damage to the enemy. As Sigel came up on the left of the Third Division, the Second Brigade was withdrawn from the support of the Peoria Battery, and with the remainder of the division, joined in the advance on the enemy. Before Elkhorn Tavern was reached, the rout of the rebels was complete, and the 37th Illinois halted at that point, which was about a mile and a half in advance of the position it occupied in the morning. The loss of the regiment on the 8th was six wounded, none killed. Chaplain Edward Anderson of Chicago received most honorable mention, in the reports of Colonel Julius White, for his efficient conduct on the battle-field, caring for the wounded at all hazards, and doing all in his power to relieve their suffering. Oscar Howe, the little drummer-boy of the regiment, although severely wounded, would not leave the field, but carried ammunition to the men for seven hours, in the midst of shot and shell. On the return of the regiment to Chicago, he was made an honorary member of the Board of Trade, and, later, was sent to the Naval Academy by the President.

After the battle of Pea Ridge, the regiment was stationed at Cassville, Mo., under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Black, Colonel White having been promoted brigadier-general for services at that battle. It was fifty-five miles from any support, and, with the 1st Arkansas Cavalry, 1st Battery (Hubbard's), 1st Missouri Cavalry and a section of the Peoria battery, for four months kept the frontier of the southwest in complete subjection for a distance of over one hundred miles. During the period, two successful expeditions were made, one to Neosho and one to Berryville. The regiment moved thence to Springfield, Mo., where it arrived June 29, 1862. On the 30th of the same month, Colonel White, having been made a brigadier-general, was transferred to Fremont's Department of the Shenandoah Valley. Lieutenant-Colonel Barnes, of Rock Island, was elected colonel, Major Black was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy, and Captain H. N. Frisbie, of Chicago, was made major of the regiment. On the route from Cassville to Springfield, the army trains were fired on, and privates Miesner and King killed. The regiment was next ordered to Ozark, Mo., and Colonel Barnes placed in command of the post. While there, Cos. "A" and "K," with a force of cavalry, all under Colonel Barnes, made an expedition to Forsythe, Mo., on the 15th of August, to break up a band of guerrillas under the notorious Dick Campbell. About this time Colonel Barnes severed his connection with the regiment. In the latter part of the same month, the command, under Lieutenant-Colonel Black, marched to Springfield, where it was transferred to General Schofield's Department and assigned to the Second Division, Colonel Houston, Army of the Frontier.

On September 29, 1862, the regiment marched from Springfield to Newtonia, and, after taking part in that battle, marched, via Pea Ridge and Osage Springs, to Fayetteville, Ark., where it again met the enemy. It soon after returned to Camp Lyon, twenty-five miles south of Springfield.

On the 4th of December, the Second and Third Divisions of the Army of the Frontier, under General F. J. Herron, moved from their camps, in the vicinity of Springfield, Mo., for the purpose of relieving General Blount, who lay to the southwest, at Cane Hill, Ark., where he was threatened with an overwhelming force of the enemy, under General Hindman, who had flanked his position at that point, and was now moving to cut off the reinforcements for which Blount had telegraphed to Herron.

The 37th Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Black commanding, and the 26th Indiana, Colonel Clark, formed the right of the Second Division, which was commanded by Colonel Houston. After marching one hundred and five miles, this division arrived at the battle-field of Prairie Grove, about noon of the 7th, and found that the cavalry advance had been routed, with the capture of their wagons. Hindman's force consisted of about twenty-four thousand men, in four divisions, under Generals Parsons, Marmaduke, Frost and Rains. It was posted, with an artillery force of twenty-two guns, along a wooded ridge which skirted a prairie of about three-quarters of a mile in width, some twelve miles south of Fayetteville. General Herron, after sending forward the 1st Arkansas Cavalry as an advance (which was captured), had only six regiments of infantry, three batteries, and some five hundred cavalry—about thirty-five hundred men. Blount, on the right, had perhaps seven thousand five hundred additional troops, supplied with a vastly superior artillery force.

Soon after the Second Division reached the battleground, Herron's left, held by the 20th Wisconsin and 19th Iowa, was hard pressed by the enemy, and these regiments were ordered to charge a battery which was in position on the ridge in front.

The charge was a magnificent one, and the National colors were successfully planted on the battery; but, advancing still farther over the hill, they were met by a force of the enemy, that hurled them back, broken, bleeding and shattered. The 37th Illinois and 26th Indiana, were moved from the extreme right of the Second Division, to renew the charge. Led by Colonel Houston in person,—the 37th being under the command of, and led by, Lieutenant-Colonel Black—the two regiments moved across the prairie to the foot of the hill, on the crest of which was the battery they were ordered to charge. They moved straight up the hill in the face of a most terrific fire, gained the summit, drove back for a brief space the rebel line, and then, first the Indiana, and finally the Illinois regiment, was compelled to fall back, with Lieutenant-Colonel Black wounded and disabled. The regimental loss was seventy-eight killed and wounded out of a total force of less than three hundred and fifty men and officers.

The regiment was re-formed by the officers at a point designated by Colonel Black, who halted the colors, and established the new lines, about four hundred and fifty yards from its former position on the hill, and was attacked here by the rebels, who charged across the prairie, but were driven back through the woods and over the brow of the hill.

Under command of Major Frisbie, the 37th participated in the pursuit of Hindman to VanBuren, on White River, Ark., leaving camp at Prairie Grove, on the 27th of December, and returning on the 31st, having marched one hundred and twenty miles in five days. After leaving Prairie Grove, the regiment was stationed for a brief period at Raleigh, and afterward, under Colonel Black, who was still all but disabled by wounds, participated in the engagement at Chalk Bluffs, near Cape Girardeau, where Lieutenant Joseph Eaton, of Co. "H," was killed. Early in June, it returned to St. Louis, where it embarked with Herron's division, of which it now formed a part, and proceeded down the Mississippi to Young's Point, crossed the Peninsula to Warrenton, below Vicksburg, on the 12th, and on the 15th joined Grant in front of Vicksburg, where Herron's command was assigned position on the extreme left of the Federal line, and was employed in picket duty and work on the intrenchments, until the capitulation of the city. The labors and fighting here were of the most extreme description; there was no cessation; the men were in the trenches day and night, the hours of duty numbering thirty-six out of every forty-eight. During the siege, and until the close of the war, Colonel Black was in every action in command of the regiment. After the surrender, it remained without the fortifications until the 12th of July, when Herron was ordered to reinforce N. P. Banks, at Port Hudson; but news being received of the surrender of the post, he was ordered on an expedition up the Yazoo River. In connection with the gun-boats he ascended the Yazoo River to Yazoo City, where he remained until the 23d, when the division returned to Port Hudson, and thence proceeded down the Mississippi to Carrollton, near New Orleans, where it went into camp. The only regiment under fire in the fight at Yazoo was the 37th, and it captured the only prisoners taken in action.

In October, the division of General Herron was transferred to the Thirteenth Army Corps, and as the Second Division of that corps embarked with Banks's expedition to the Rio Grande. The 37th, with the command, landed at Brazos Santiago, where a small force of the enemy was scattered, and on the 9th of November went into camp at Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, opposite the Mexican city of Matamoras. It remained in Brownsville, at Fort Brown, engaged in garrison duty until the 10th of February, 1864, when the three hundred and twenty-seven men, remaining of the one thousand and thirty-five who left Chicago in 1861, re-enlisted as veterans, and the following March (1864) returned to Chicago on veteran furlough, where the remainder of the regiment received a public welcome from the Board of Trade, to which it delivered its battle-worn flag, and received in return a new stand of colors. On the 26th of April, it again started for the front, reaching Memphis on the 29th. From Memphis, the regiment set out with General Sturgis's expedition into western Tennessee and northern Mississippi, participating in several skirmishes with Forrest's cavalry. In May, the regiment joined its command at Simsport, La., and, with the troops in General Canby's department, took part in various expeditions in the southwest during the succeeding months. In February, 1865, it was ordered to Pensacola, Florida, and thence to Mobile, where it arrived on April 2. The following day it took its position in the line of investment around Fort Blakely and, by the side of the 20th Iowa, joined in the charge upon the works on the 9th.

Justice has never been done to this, the last great engagement of the war; for be it remembered that Lee surrendered at ten o'clock a. m., and this contest took place at 5:50 p. m. of April 9, 1865. The fortifications around Blakely comprised a vast system of redoubts and connecting curtains, that stretched along the left bank of the Tensas (Alabama) River like a crescent, with its horns withdrawn and resting on the banks. It was manned by three thousand four hundred troops, had some forty great guns in position, was protected by ravines and abatis in front and an elaborate system of torpedoes, which covered the whole plain with their unseen dangers—the entire defense being supported by the gunboats that had, up to this time, escaped Farragut's fleet. The 37th Illinois, under command of Colonel Black, was on the extreme left of the assaulting lines. Next in order was the 20th Iowa, Lieutenant-Colonel J. B. Leake, afterward general, commanding. The necessary orders having been given, the various brigades and regiments, at five o'clock, took position in the trenches and awaited the signal for attack, which was given by six shotted guns, fired at 5:50 p. m. on the right. Immediately ten thousand men were in motion, driving straight for the front. Their onset was greeted by every gun, small and great, on the rebel side, the right of the lines being most fiercely opposed. The center and left reached the earth-works simultaneously, and, in ten minutes from the firing of the signal, they "held the fort." Every gun, all the battle-flags, an immense amount of war material, a mile of fortifications, three thousand prisoners of war, and the city of Mobile were the immediate fruits of the victory. But all this was not accomplished until six hundred of our men had been killed and wounded; yet during the ten minutes from the time the signal gun was fired until the last hostile flag went down, not the slightest wavering took place. At home, the people were so absorbed in the affairs around Richmond that this, as bloody, dashing and successful an episode as any in the war, was scarcely spoken of; and thousands do not know of it to-day.

The flag of the 37th Regiment was among the first over the walls. The second in command, Major Ransom Kennicott, since lieutenant-colonel, ably seconded his superior. Private James M. Culbertson, son of C. M. Culbertson, of Chicago, was the first man of the regiment on the works.

Very eulogistic mention was made, in official reports, of the 37th Illinois and its officers. Colonel Black was brevetted brigadier-general for "gallant and meritorious conduct in the assault on Blakely batteries." Other promotions and distinction followed. But the end of the war was reached. The 37th was, however, so much of a favorite that it was detained by the War Department until May 15, 1866, during which interval it was commanded by Colonel Kennicott, Colonel Black having resigned August 15, 1865. The regiment then was constituted a part of the corps of occupation in Texas, performing post and garrison duty at Galveston, Sabine City, Beaumont, Columbus, Houston and other points. It was then (May 15, 1866) mustered out, and sent home. The 37th was in thirteen battles, sieges and skirmishes. It lost more than two hundred men in action and only had some ten prisoners captured. It was under fire fifty different days, marched on foot three thousand five hundred miles, traveled by rail and boat about twelve thousand miles, and campaigned in every Western and Southern State that was in hostility to the Government. It furnished one brevet major-general and one brevet brigadier-general to the Federal roster, and a number of officers to the regular army, also officering a number of regiments from its subalterns and its rank and file. The men who were once connected with it, and who are now respected and beloved citizens, may be counted by the score. As residents of Chicago may be mentioned Major E. A. Blodgett, of the Chicago West Division Street Railway Company; William P. Black, of Dent, Black & Cratty Bros., lawyers; General Julius White, real estate; Colonel E. B. Payne, lawyer; Colonel E. B. Messer; and Colonel Ransom Kennicott, in the United States Revenue Service. A marked peculiarity of the organization of this regiment was the youth of its officers, who were rarely over thirty years of age, and generally under twenty-five.

JULIUS WHITE is a native of New York, and was born in Cazenovia on the 29th of September, 1816. He first came to Chicago in 1836. Shortly after the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. White received the appointment of collector of customs for the port of Chicago. But the civil war broke out, and he determined to enter the army, and the day of the first battle of Bull Run, he applied to the Secretary of War and obtained authority to raise a regiment of infantry. The regiment was mustered into the service of the United States as the 37th Illinois Regiment, on the 18th of September, 1861, and, under the command of Colonel White, who resigned the collectorship of customs, was assigned to service in Missouri, under General Fremont. In the campaign that followed, Colonel White commanded a brigade, and was wounded at the battle of Pea Ridge. For his services in this battle, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, in June, 1862, and assigned to the Army of Virginia, under General Pope. He served under Colonel D. S. Miles at the defense of Harper's Ferry, in September, 1862, having been ordered there two days before the surrender, and was commended by the military commission which investigated the subject, as a "capable and courageous officer." Colonel D. S. Miles, who commanded the post, was obliged to surrender to the rebels, and General White became a prisoner of war. As soon as he was exchanged, he applied for immediate orders, and was assigned to the command of the Eastern District of Kentucky, a mountainous region overrun with guerrillas. During his command of this district he was engaged in several battles. Upon the organization of the Twenty-third Corps, in 1863, he was assigned to the command of the Second Division, and conducted the right wing of General Burnside's Army of the Ohio into East Tennessee, participating in the battles of Loudon and Knoxville. Returning home on sick leave, in the spring of 1864, he was, on his recovery, stationed at Springfield, then the rendezvous for drafted men and volunteers for the State of Illinois, where he remained until June, 1864, when he joined the Army of the Potomac, under General Meade. He was assigned to the Ninth Army Corps, and served for a time as chief-of-staff to General Burnside, and afterward as commander of the First Division of the Corps. He participated in a number of battles and engagements through the summer and fall of 1864, until he was prostrated by severe and protracted illness. This finally compelled his resignation, and he returned to private life. General White, during his military career, received the official commendation of every officer under whom he served, viz., Generals Meade, Burnside, Warren, Curtis, Pope and Jefferson C. Davis; was entrusted with a major-general's command during the whole of the last two years of his service, and was brevetted to that grade "for gallant and meritorious services during the war." In 1872, he was appointed, by President Grant, Minister-resident of the United States to the Argentine Republic. On his return from there, he resumed business in Chicago, where he has since resided, with the respect of the community, devoting much of his time to the relief of unemployed or disabled soldiers.

WILLIAM P. BLACK was born in Woodford County, Ky., November 11, 1842. His ancestry were Scotch-Irish, and for several generations, on the paternal side, they were prominent Presbyterian ministers. Dr. John Black, his father, passed much of his life in the South, but closed his short and brilliant career, at the age of thirty-seven in Allegheny City, Pa. In 1847, during the year of her husband's death, Mrs. Black removed to Danville, Ill., with her family of four children, William, the second son, being then less than five years of age. In 1850, she married Dr. William Fithian, an eminent and worthy gentleman, and a public character. In the fall of 1860, young Black entered Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind., pursuing his studies with energy and success, making and sustaining a reputation as a clear, brilliant and powerful speaker, his design being at that time to enter the ministry. But the outbreak of the war changed his plans and career. On April 15, 1861, Mr. Black enlisted with about forty other students of the college, including his only brother, as a private soldier in Co. "I," 11th Indiana Infantry Zouaves, commanded by Colonel (afterward General) Lew Wallace. At the end of the three months' campaign he was mustered out as corporal, and at once engaged in the work of recruiting a company in Vermilion County, Ill., for the three years' service. As captain of this organization (Co. K), he was mustered into the service, in Chicago, September 18, 1861, being assigned to the 37th Illinois Infantry, then known as the "Fremont Rifles." He received his commission as captain on the first of the month, being then less than nineteen years of age. This position he filled faithfully for over three years, sharing with his regiment its toilsome marches, brisk skirmishes, and bloody battles, chief among which may be mentioned Pea Ridge and Prairie Grove, Ark. (where one-third of the Federal forces were killed and wounded), the siege of Vicksburg (in the latter part of which Captain Black held the most responsible and dangerous position of brigade picket officer, in permanent charge of the brigade rifle-pits), and the occupation of Texas. The young officer was mustered out with a well-deserved reputation for faithfulness and bravery. Instead of pursuing his theological studies, he decided to follow the legal profession, and, in the fall of 1865, commenced his studies in the office of Arrington & Dent, Chicago. In about sixteen months, he was admitted to practice, and returned to Danville. He remained there but a year, however, and Judge Arrington having died, December 31, 1867, Mr. Black became a partner with Thomas Dent during the succeeding March. His career since that time, in his chosen profession, has been one continuous march of progress. His ability and courtesy have gained him hosts of clients, admirers and friends; and although his steps were diverted from the task of formally promulgating the Gospel, his character, as a business man, is a continual proof that he would not have chosen amiss. As a member for years, and an Elder for a time, of the First Presbyterian Church, of Chicago, he was always active in religious work, and, both then and since, has given much time to evangelical labors. Mr. Black never has been a politician, but during the summer of 1872, upon moral ground, he opposed the Republican party and supported Greeley. As a man of letters, also, Mr. Black stands high; his contributions to the literature of the day being noted for a finish and brilliancy, which would make him a marked man, had he not given his time and best energies to his chosen profession. In recognition of his services as a lawyer and a litterateur, in 1874, Wabash College conferred upon Captain Black, the degree of M. A. Mr. Black was married May 28, 1860, to Miss Hortensia M. MacGreal of Galveston, Texas, a Christian lady of strong intellect, ripe culture, and deep enthusiasm, of religious experience. She is the eldest daughter of the late Peter MacGreal, who was one of the leading lawyers of that commonwealth.

THIRTY-NINTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

YATES PHALANX.—The 39th Illinois, as originally organized, was distinctively a Chicago regiment, but failing to secure acceptance under either the "six-regiment bill" or "ten regiment bill," finally disbanded—several of the Chicago companies becoming identified with other regiments. In the original organization there were Chicago companies, commanded by Captains W. A. Peaslee, T. O. Osborne, O. L. Mann, J. C. Felton, H. Snyder, W. B. Slaughter (formerly pastor of the Wabash Avenue M. E. Church), Austin Light, W. H. Ranstead and D. Vaughn. On April 24, Captain W. A. Peaslee was elected colonel, and other officers were chosen. The regiment, then numbering one thousand men, was quartered in the old Wigwam, near Lake-street bridge. After being refused acceptance in May, as stated, wearied with repeated delays, the men became discouraged, and a part of the companies disbanded or joined other regiments. The officers retained a skeleton organization, believing that more regiments must soon be needed, and some of the Chicago companies—companies made up of solid men—mostly mechanics in good circumstances, waited for the organization of their chosen regiment. The defeat at Manassas, which occurred while Captain Orrin L. Mann was at Washington, urging the acceptance of the regiment, gave Illinois the privilege of raising more troops. The 39th was accepted, the work of recruiting and reorganizing resumed with vigor, and it was finally mustered into United States service in August, 1861, all of its field and staff officers, and some of the line officers, being from Chicago.

Thomas O. Osborne was unanimously elected colonel, but resigned in favor of Captain Austin Light, late a sergeant in the regular cavalry, who had served in the Florida and Mexican wars, and who proved a most excellent drill-master for the regiment.

The field and staff officers were: Colonel, Austin Light; Lieutenant-Colonel, Thomas O. Osborne; Major, Orrin L. Mann; Adjutant, Frank B. Marshall; Quartermaster, Joseph A. Cutler; Surgeon, Samuel C. Blake; First Assistant-Surgeon, Charles M. Clark.

Companies "F" and "G" were largely officered in Chicago, Co. "F" being commanded by Captain Amasa Kennicott, and Co. "G" by Captain W. B. Slaughter.

On October 11, the regiment left Chicago for St. Louis, and on the 27th, left Benton Barracks for Williamsburg, Md., where it was attached to General Kelley's command, which formed a part of General Banks's corps. While at this point, Colonel Light was dismissed from service, on charges connected with his former army experiences, and Lieutenant-Colonel Osborne succeeded to the command of the regiment. On December 14, the 39th was armed with Springfield rifled muskets, and on the 18th moved to Hancock to reinforce General Kelley, who was threatened with an attack by Stonewall Jackson. On December 22, the regiment was sent across the Potomac into Morgan County, Va., where it remained until January 2, 1862, engaged in scouting and guarding portions of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. At that date (January 2), three companies were at Alpine Station, on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, opposite Hancock; two at Sir John's Run, three miles distant, also guarding railroad; one at Little Cacapon, and three under Major Mann, with a section of Muhlenburg's artillery, were stationed at Berkeley Springs, six miles south of Alpine Station. On the 3d, Major Mann, with forty men, while out on a scout, toward Winchester, was discovered by Stonewall Jackson's advance brigade, that general having commenced his movement toward Hancock with his entire command. In the skirmish which ensued, one of Major Mann's men was killed and eight wounded. The remainder succeeded in escaping to Berkeley Springs, where, with the aid of the artillery the three companies under Major Mann, held the whole Confederate force in check thirty-six hours—long enough to allow the remainder of the troops to cross the Potomac to Hancock, when the detachment at Berkeley fell back to Sir John's Run, where it forded the river to Hancock through water four feet deep—the ice fringing both shores. The loss of the command was one killed, two wounded and fourteen prisoners.

On the day preceding Jackson's advance, several regiments had been withdrawn from Hancock to strengthen other points, which fact was duly reported by Confederate scouts; hence the advance in force toward Hancock to break up the railroad, capture the stores at Alpine Station and drive Kelley from his position at Hancock. The station was vigorously defended and the advance of the Confederates was practically a failure, they being forced to fall back without accomplishing the object of their expedition, except in destroying several railroad bridges. After the retreat of Jackson, the regiment again guarded railroads until March 13.

In February, 1862, General Banks, then holding the Shenandoah Valley, was ordered by McClellan to move the Fifth Corps to Manassas, and thence repair and hold the Manassas Gap Railroad to Strasburg, thus re-opening communication between the valley and Washington. At this time Stonewall Jackson, with his division of about twelve thousand men, was posted at Winchester, whither he had retired on the evacuation of Manassas. On the advance of Banks, he retired from that place, and, pursued by Shields's division, to which the 39th was then attached, fell back twenty miles south of Strasburg, while Shields returned to Winchester. During this movement, Banks had withdrawn the remainder of his troops from the valley, and Jackson, informed of the fact, retraced his steps, and on the 23d, attacked Shields near Winchester.

At the opening of the battle, Sullivan's brigade (the left of Shields's line), of which the 39th formed a part, was posted three miles out from the town, on the Strasburg road, as reserve to Kimball's division, covering the approaches in the direction of Strasburg. The first attack was by the enemy's right, Ashby's cavalry first charging the left of the line. The 39th Illinois, with part of the 8th Ohio and four pieces of artillery, all under command of Colonel Osborne, were sent to the support of the advance, and the enemy was there repulsed at all points, after which he made no further attempt upon the left during the day. The whole force of the Confederates, under Jackson, was transferred to the right of the Federal line, and a part of Sullivan's brigade was detached and sent to the support of that part of the field. After the defeat of Stonewall Jackson at Winchester, he was pursued again to Strasburg, whence he made his way southward, and Banks, with his troops, remained in the Shenandoah Valley, making Strasburg his headquarters.

From this time, the 39th was in charge of Lieutenant-Colonel Mann. With the 39th, two companies of the 1st Vermont Cavalry, and four pieces of artillery, he crossed the Massanutten ridge of mountains into the Luray Valley, and engaged the enemy at two different crossings of the Shenandoah River, capturing thirty-five prisoners and a fair-sized baggage train. Major D. W. Munn, now of Joliet, particularly distinguished himself in this engagement. Soon afterward, the 39th, with Shields's division, was detached from the Department of the Shenandoah, and assigned to the Department of the Rappahannock, commanded by General McDowell, who was then at Fredericksburg with an entire army corps, waiting to advance overland and attack Richmond, in co-operation with the Army of the Potomac, advancing by way of the peninsula. The 39th Illinois, 13th Indiana, 62d Ohio, and 67th Ohio, then composed the Second Brigade of Shields's division, under command of General O. S. Ferry, of Connecticut. The division joined McDowell's command at Fredericksburg, and, on the 26th of May, that general moved from the place, to join McClellan at Hanover Court House, but had proceeded only a few miles when Shields's division was detached and ordered again to the Shenandoah Valley, to co-operate with Banks and Fremont against Jackson, who had made another irruption into the valley, threatening to attack and destroy their divided forces in detail. Before Shields could effect a junction with Banks, Fort Royal had been surrendered, and the Federal forces had been driven from Winchester, followed by Jackson, nearly to Harper's Ferry. "To head off Jackson" was now the important matter, and Shields hastened toward Strasburg, hoping thereby to unite with Fremont, advancing from the west, and thus prevent the skillful commander's escape. On the 31st of May, just as they were about effecting a juncture, Jackson slipped between the two, and retreated up the valley. Then followed another long and fruitless pursuit. Shields's division advanced by the Luray Valley, and met Jackson at the crossing of the Shenandoah at Port Republic, where the Federal advance, under General Carroll, was repulsed, and Jackson continued his retreat toward Richmond, to reinforce Lee. General Ferry was subsequently assigned to the command of Shields's old division, and under him the 39th, on June 29, was sent up the James River, to reinforce McClellan, arriving during the engagement at Malvern Hill. It was immediately ordered to the front, and remained there until McClellan retreated, returning to Suffolk early in September. It there remained in camp until January, 1863, sharing in skirmishes at Black Water, Zurich and Franklin.

In January, 1863, the regiment proceeded, with General Foster's corps, to Newbern, N. C., to join Hunter's expedition against the defenses of Charleston Harbor. From Newbern, it was ordered to Hilton Head, S. C., and, on April 1, again embarked with Gilmore's expedition for the reduction of Fort Wagner. General Osborne then commanded the First Brigade of General Alfred H. Terry's (First) division, Gilmore's (Tenth) corps. Lieutenant-Colonel O. L. Mann commanded the regiment, which went into camp on Folly Island, April 2, 1863, after driving off the enemy's pickets, and remained there until July. On July 10, General Gilmore landed his troops on Morris Island, and immediately commenced operations for the reduction of Forts Sumter and Wagner and Battery Gregg. Fire was opened on Fort Sumter, August 17, and after several days' bombardment it was substantially silenced, but the siege of Wagner went on. The ground occupied by Gilmore's army, on Morris Island, was a stretch of low sand hills along the northern extremity of the island, opposite Fort Wagner. No tree, shrub or weed grew there, and the only shelter of the troops was light tents without floors, which were torn from the pins that held them during every gale. Fort Wagner was a strong inclosed work on the northern part of the island, Battery Gregg being on the extreme northern point. Fort Wagner mounted fifteen or twenty guns, which commanded the narrow approach from the south, over which, in rough weather, the sea swept from shore to shore, submerging batteries, and delaying the work of the sappers and miners. Between this portion of the approach and the fort, the ground was filled with torpedo mines. After the unsuccessful attack of the 18th of July, the men were continuously under a rain of fire and shells; and, under that fire, in the midst of clouds of burning sand, that fairly lacerated the flesh, they advanced their parallels until, on the 20th of August, a portion of Terry's division was ordered to carry the ridge, about two hundred and fifty yards from the fort, at the point of the bayonet, and to hold it. This was successfully done, the Confederate sharpshooters retiring to the fort. September 5, the bombardment of Wagner commenced, and was continued forty-two hours, when an assault was ordered, in which the 39th, led by Lieutenant-Colonel Mann, displayed most conspicuous courage and gallantry. The fort was captured, and the 39th was in possession, as a trophy, of the gun from which was fired the first shot on Sumter. Sixty prisoners were captured in the works. Captain Joseph Woodruff, Co. "K," and several men, were killed in Fort Gregg, while on duty, by the explosion of a shell, fired from a rebel battery.

On December 7, the regiment returned to Hilton Head, where the men re-enlisted as veterans (being the first in the Department of the South that so re-enlisted), and returned home on furlough and to recruit. On March 19, 1864, they started again for the front, joining the Army of the James, at Yorktown, and moving thence up the James to Bermuda Hundred, where they landed on May 5,—this point of debarkation being a narrow neck of land between the James and Appomattox rivers—ten miles north of Petersburg, and twenty miles south of Richmond. A defensive front across the neck of land was immediately thrown up, and Butler's line formed, with his right resting on the James, and his left (Gilmore's corps) on the Appomattox. Between the army and Richmond, were lines of Confederate intrenchments, batteries and forts; one of the strongest fortifications being at Drury's Bluff, on the south bank of the James. On the morning of the 12th, General Butler made a general advance toward Richmond. Gilmore's corps, on his left, was ordered to attack the right of the enemy's outer line of defenses, on Wooldridge's Hill, which it succeeded in turning, and holding the position; which, however, only revealed an interior line, extending on the Confederate left to Drury's Bluff, and on their right beyond any point visible. The position gained by Gilmore, too, was so commanded by their works as to be useless.

An attack on the inner works was ordered for the morning of the 16th, but during the night of the 15th, Beauregard, taking advantage of a dense fog, and an unfortunate break in the picket line of the Union forces, made a savage attack on Butler's position—commencing an assault upon the right, held by Smith's corps, quickly followed by repeated attacks upon Gilmore's line, of which Osborne's brigade formed the extreme left. As the right was gradually pressed back, Terry's division was ordered to Smith's support, and was there engaged in a hot and fierce contest, until the whole army was ordered back within the intrenchments at Bermuda Hundred. Captain James Wightman and Adjutant J. D. Walker were killed while cheering on their men, and General Osborne, Major S. S. Linton, Captain H. M. Phillips, Lieutenant A. W. Wheeler, Lieutenant Kidder and Lieutenant Kingsbury were severely wounded. The total number killed, wounded and missing in the regiment, was two hundred.

On May 20, the rifle-pits in front of Terry's division were captured by the enemy, and a bloody fight ensued for their re-capture; forty being killed and wounded in the 39th. In this engagement, which occurred near Wier Bottom Church, the regiment captured a large number of prisoners, among whom was Brigadier-General Walker. Lieutenant-Colonel Mann, who commanded the 39th, was seriously wounded in the fight, leaving the regiment without a field officer. On June 2, the regiment was again engaged in front of the lines at Bermuda Hundred, losing a large number in killed, wounded and missing. Lieutenant Albert W. Fellows was among the killed, and Lieutenant A. C. Sweetzer lost a leg. Again, on the morning of the 16th of June, having then been moved forward to the Petersburg & Richmond Railroad, the 39th met the enemy under Longstreet, and in the encounter which ensued, lost about thirty-five men; Captain O. F. Rudd, a most accomplished and brave officer, there receiving a mortal wound. During the several engagements at Bermuda Hundred, from May 20 to June 19, the total loss of the 39th was twenty-three killed, one hundred and thirty wounded, and thirteen missing.

On August 14, it crossed the river, and on the 15th and 16th was engaged with the Tenth Corps in the battles at Deep Bottom, or Bailey's, Creek, on the north bank of the James River; the expedition being commanded by General Hancock of the Second Corps. Terry's division made a direct attack on the enemy's left flank on the morning of the 16th, and succeeded in carrying the line, capturing three colors and two or three hundred prisoners, the 39th losing twenty-six killed, seventy-seven wounded and eight missing. On October 7, it met the enemy near Chapin's Farm, and held its hastily constructed works against three charges; and again, on the 13th of October, took part in a charge on the Confederate works on the Darbytown Road, seven miles from Richmond. Out of two hundred and fifty men who went into this charge, seventy-two fell; fifteen killed, fifty-seven wounded. During the winter of 1864-65, it was engaged in frequent skirmishes but no regular engagements. During March, 1865, it received about one hundred recruits, and on the 27th of that month, with the First Brigade (Colonel Osborne, First Division (General Foster), General Gibbon's corps, to which it has been transferred, took position on the left of the Army of the Potomac for operations against Petersburg.

Captain Homer A. Plimpton commanded the regiment. After the assault and forcing of the enemy's intrenchments at Hatcher's Run, Foster's division was thrown forward to assault Forts Gregg and Alexander, two strong, inclosed works, the most salient and commanding south of Petersburg. The former, Fort Gregg, which was stormed by Osborne's brigade, was held by Harris's Mississippi Brigade, and was defended with the utmost bravery and intrepidity. In the assault against this stronghold, the 39th Illinois and the 13th Indiana fought side by side, and both fought gallantly and well. The charge of the 39th was made across an open swamp, with a heavy fire from front and sides ploughing through the ranks. Just at the base of the fort was a ditch twelve feet wide and ten feet deep, with steep, slippery sides. Into this the men rushed, and climbing the opposite side, by digging footholds in the bank with their bayonets, gained the fort, and, after a hand-to-hand struggle of half an hour, triumphantly planted their flag on the parapet.

As a testimonial to the exceptional bravery displayed, a magnificent brazen eagle, cast for the purpose, was presented to the regiment, for its color-staff; Colonel Osborne was made a brigadier-general, and the color-sergeant, Henry M. Day, who was severely wounded while planting the colors on the fort, was presented with a medal-of-honor by the War Department for gallantry on the field. General Osborne's brigade led the advance of the army in the pursuit of Lee, and by a prompt movement succeeded in gaining the Lynchburg road, and preventing the escape of his forces—that being his only line of retreat. After witnessing the surrender, the 39th was sent to Richmond, where it remained until August, thence to Norfolk, where it was mustered out of service, December 6, 1865, and immediately started for Illinois, arriving at Camp Butler, Springfield, on the 12th of the same month, where it received final pay and discharge. The 39th was a "Lone Star" wherever it served, but maintained the splendid reputation that its State had for good soldiery. The records show that it had more men killed and wounded than any other regiment from the State. The 20th Illinois, however, had a larger number actually killed.

ORRIN L. MANN was born in Chardon, Geauga Co., Ohio, November 25, 1833. Removing with his parents to Michigan, while still in infancy, his youth and early manhood was spent in that State. First working on a farm, then as a blacksmith, and finally devoting two years to study at Albion Seminary, Mich., he struggled along until 1853, when he came to Chicago and commenced teaching, in order to acquire the means for still further continuing his studies. In 1856, he entered college at Ann Arbor, but was compelled, by reason of ill health, to abandon his studies in his junior year, when he again returned to Chicago. At the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion, all his energy and enthusiasm were aroused in the Union cause. As early as the latter part of April, the work of recruiting for the "Yates Phalanx" commenced. Mr. Mann first enlisted as a private, and soon raised a company for this regiment. His war record is included in that of the 39th Illinois Infantry. Elected major at the reorganization of the regiment, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel after his gallant defense of his position, near Bath, Va., and, Colonel Osborne being in charge of a brigade, he led the regiment in several severe engagements in the Shenandoah and Luray valleys, and at Morris Island, in the siege of Forts Wagner and Gregg, commanded the brigade which stormed and captured the former. Part of the winter of 1863-64, he spent in Chicago, recruiting for the 39th. Returning with his command to the East, in the spring of 1864, it was assigned to the Army of the James, General B. F. Butler. Proceeding up the James to Bermuda Hundred, Lieutenant-Colonel Mann engaged in the severe battle before Drury Bluffs, in which Colonel Osborne was seriously wounded, and many other field and line officers were either killed or wounded. The command devolved on Lieutenant-Colonel Mann, and in the gallant charge at Wier Bottom Church, May 20, 1864, to regain possession of a line of rifle-pits captured by Longstreet's troops, he led the charge with his regiment, capturing a large number of prisoners, and driving the Confederates from the position in front of our intrenchments. He received at this time a severe wound, which confined him to the hospital until autumn. For gallantry in this action, he was brevetted brigadier-general. During the early winter of 1864, he served on a court-martial at Fortress Monroe, and on January 1, 1865, was assigned to staff duty under Major-General Ord, and served as provost marshal of the District of Eastern Virginia, with headquarters at Norfolk. After the fall of Richmond, General Mann received his commission as colonel, with orders to join his regiment at that point, but the civil authorities proving inadequate to the task of governing Norfolk, he was assigned to the full command of the Southeastern District, with headquarters at that place. Again assuming the office of provost marshal, with power according to his brevet rank, he organized a military commission, and soon succeeded in reducing to quiet the turbulent elements of the still half-rebellious district. General Mann remained at Norfolk until December, 1865, when he returned to Illinois, to be mustered out of service with his regiment. Soon after the close of his military career, he received an appointment as collector of internal

The New Era.

The Yankees have come—and are still coming. The day of retributive vengeance is coming also—vengeance—not on helpless women and innocent babes, nor on the great mass of the people, but on those wicked and designing men who have been the cause of all your woe. People of the State of Louisiana—a little more than three years ago, this was the garden spot of the Sunny South. The vast plains watered by the Mississippi, Red River, Bayou Teche and the Atchafalaya—the most fertile regions in the world—were, teeming with wealth, doted with innumerable villages, country mansions and beautiful plantations, nature and art vying in their adornment, each plantation a village in itself—a kind of independent sovereignty, of which the planter, "master of all he surveyed," was the prince consort, elegance and refinement characterized 20 of your homes, and all that heart could wish was yours.

Your resources were developed, your trade and commerce protected by a most beneficent government, whose executive was sworn to protect you in all your interests, in all your local laws which your State Legislature had enacted, or should enact under the Constitution of the United States and the National Congress, in which you had a large representation.

What more could you could any people ask? Living, under the protective folds of the flag of the best government under the sun, you bid fair to rival the odies in wealth, and you were a happy, prosperous people.

But a mighty change has taken place.

Ambitions, designing men, who were willing to sacrifice the happiness of their country, who hesitated at no means of gratifying the cravings of their selfish ambition, have plunged you in the vortex of a civil war, and brought ruin and misery on your heads.

The warrior has dilt his sword in blood, and wrote his name on fields and cities of desolation.

Your beautiful homes have been laid waste, sorrow and mourning have been brought to every fireside; some of your best blood has been spilled—your commerce has been destroyed, and you have been slaves to a "Reign of Terror" scarcely less horrible than that which existed in France during the bloody Revolution. Your sons, your husbands and your fathers have been torn from your arms, and compelled to shed their blood in a tyrant's cause. Hundreds of your citizens—willing to take up arms against the United States Government—have been hunted down by negro hounds, and by men—scarcely less fierce and blood-thirsty than the brutes themselves—and mercilessly shot or hung.

Your domestic peace and happiness have been destroyed, and the happiness of hundreds of all joys the most sweet and sacred, exists but in memory.

And where are the golden promises of your leaders? Have they ever fulfilled them? Can they ever fulfill them? They have deceived you from the beginning. Humanistic promises have been broken, not in fact, in no single instance have they fulfilled a promise that they have made to you.

They have plunged you deep in misery and ruin, and the history of your State for the past three years, is written in tears and blood.

But a brighter day is coming. Thus the black war clouds that are now rolling over you, is a rift, through which the Sun of peace shines with brilliant rays. It is as inevitable as the decree of Fate, that our arms, wielded in so just a cause, must be victorious, and the chain of your troubles will be broken. And you can hasten the day. Thousands of your people have been only waiting for an opportunity to renew their allegiance to the "Old Flag," and that opportunity has now come.—Now is the time to strike.

Of course you may prefer to obtain, that we shall never cease to fight till light to the grave. Northern States to the Gulf of Mexico—from the Atlantic to the Pacific—were but one people, ONE FLAG, ONE GOVERNMENT!

Escaped Union Prisoners.

As the advance guard of the 3d Division of the 12th Army Corps were marching on Natchitoches, they were approached by two men, who from their appearance, were at first supposed to be rebel deserters, but upon a more intimate acquaintance they proved to be E. Rushton and J. M. Town, of Co. B, 19th R. g't Iowa volunteers. We sun up their history as follows:

They were captured on the 23th of September last, near Morganza, La., and were taken to Tyler, Texas, where they remained a short time, and then were marched to Suresport, on Red river, where they remained through the winter, suffering for the want of clothing and blankets, having been robbed of all their possessions by the thieving devils who captured them. They were kept a short time at Greenwood, a small town some three miles from the Texas line, where they made their escape on the night of the 26th ult. The rebels becoming alarmed at the near approach of Steele's cavalry had ordered that all the Union prisoners be hurried off again to Tyler. They thought that they had traveled far enough at Confederate expense and would try to walk about a little on their own hook. To attempt to escape in such a country, so far from the Union lines required a good deal of courage, but they were equal to the task. The manner adopted to carry out their purpose was rather a novel one, indeed. They dug a hole in the ground large enough to hold them, and crawled in and were covered u by a comrade who did not feel strong enough to attempt to escape with them. Here they remained until the latter part had left the place, when they came out of their hiding place and started for Alexandria where they supposed they would find our army. But they were saved much trouble by meeting our advance, as before stated. They met with many narrow escapes from falling into the rebels hands again, but in this case, as in many others, fortune favored the brave, and they are now in the enjoyment of liberty with the Union army. We understand they had valuable information to communicate to Head quarters. By their request they have been assigned to duty as Provost Guards in the 3d Division of the 12th Corps.

Progress of Union sentiment.

A our advancing and victorious Union army enters and takes undisputed possession of the smart little towns along its line of march, it is truly interesting to witness, the gradual decline of Southern prejudice against the "Yankee nation," as developed by the peculiar manner of the soldiers first enter the town and commenced to promenade the streets, they see nothing but closed doors and closely curtained windows, that gives to every house a complete gong away from home appearance, and would lead one not acquainted with their "sly tricks" to suppose that he had entered the silent city of the dead. At the end of the second hour the smallest possible corner of the curtain is seen to rise slightly and a small portion of the "human face divine" is seen to dart suddenly back from the light and the curtain falls again to its place as before. At the end of the third hour one half of the curtain is drawn aside, and a solemn though pretty face is seen in very near proximity to the glass, while the body is hidden by the folds of the drapery that covers the other half of the window. At the end of the fourth hour both curtains are drawn aside and the dear creature stands courageously exposing her lovely form to the admiring gaze of the vulgar Yankees as they pass. At the end of the fifth hour the door is seen to open a few inches and a female profile is seen protruding through the slight opening, and a nice little waiter advances as far as the outer edge of the door sill, and taper fingers steal out and plays with the knob of the door. At the end of the sixth hour, the door is thrown back against the wall, and its place supplied by the ample folds of a full dressed Southern belle, and the passing officer bears a few notes of the "Bonny Blue Flag," sung very soft and low. At the end of the seventh hour she actually ventures to stand upon the veranda steps and even smile upon the "candids" on the side-walk. At the end of the eighth hour she has discovered that Yankees have no horns, and ventures down to the gate, and placing both hands upon the pickets, bends her head forward and looks first up and then down the street, and laughs heartily at the pranks of some officers in various frolic, and exclaims "Oh My! he will surely be here!" As the ninth hour approaches its close she stands on one side of the gate and chats freely with a real living Yankee on the other, while both their hands play with the latch. At the middle of the tenth hour the gate is opened and both have disappeared, but where they have gone is nobody's business, but the "UNION AS IT IS TO BE," is restored, as far as they are concerned at least. It is thus that the Union sentiment is restored wherever the army goes.

False Impressions.

We beg to assure our citizens that all Yankees look very much like other American people, and that there are among our soldiers no Grifins or misshapen beings, as has been represented. For some it may seem superfluous to make this statement, but we are led to it by overhearing a lady ask a soldier if it was true that some four troops had but one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead, as she had been told by Confederate soldiers. The wicked soldier gravely informed her that it was not too true; that there was a regiment of them, and that they dressed in an eastern costume, wearing very broad de fronsures, and that many of them wore Amazons. The good woman declared she would watch and wait, that she might see them when they came.

Such misrepresentations only tend to damage the rebel cause.

revenue for the First District of Illinois, and later entered into the business of brick making, in which he was still engaged at the time of the great fire of 1871, from the effects of which he lost heavily. Rallying from this disaster, he embarked in the real estate business, in which he is still engaged, the firm now being Mann & Congdon. General Mann has served a term in the State Legislature (1874-76); was coroner of Cook County from 1878 to 1880; and from November 1880, to November 1882, held the office of sheriff of Cook County. He was married at Ann Arbor, Mich., August, 1862, to Adelia A. Sawyer, their children being May, June and Maud.

FORTY-SECOND ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE FORTY-SECOND REGIMENT was organized at Chicago, July 22, 1861, as the 1st Regiment, Douglas Brigade, by Colonel William A. Webb. In August, the regiment went into camp at Cottage Grove, the 2d and 3d regiments of the "Brigade" afterward the 51st and 55th Illinois being also in camp at the same time. There the regiment was thoroughly drilled by Lieutenant-Colonel Malmberg, an excellent Swedish military scholar and disciplinarian, who had left the Land Department of the Illinois Central Railroad to occupy that position. At the time of its organization, the 42d had four Chicago companies—"Robbins Rifles," Captain George Vardan; "Mystic Rifles," Captain W. H. Boomer; "Drummond Guards," Captain Charles C. Phillips; and "Roberts Guards," Captain Joseph N. Gettman. Various changes were made before the regiment was mustered into service, but its companies, besides those mentioned, were mainly recruited in Cook County. It was mustered into service September 17, 1861, one thousand and fifty-one strong, under the following officers:

Field and Staff (all of Chicago except Chaplain).—Colonel, William A. Webb; Lieutenant-Colonel, David Stewart; Major,

W. A. Webb

The 42d Illinois was thoroughly equipped by the Chicago War Committee, and left the city for St. Louis on September 20. On the 18th of October, by order of General Fremont, it joined General Hunter at Tipton, Mo., and was assigned to General John M. Palmer's brigade, then stationed at Warsaw, Mo. It reached Warsaw, October 25, and went into camp, remaining until November 1, when it was ordered to move to Springfield, which Hunter and Pope had occupied since the removal of Fremont. The regiment was obliged to leave Warsaw on an hour's notice, and, being destitute of means of transportation, had to leave its tents behind—marching the distance of ninety-seven miles in sixty-two hours. After remaining in Springfield from the night of the 4th until the 9th, on the evacuation of the city by the Union forces, it returned to Warsaw, and thence moved to Smithton, Mo., where it went into winter quarters, December 13. The regiment suffered terribly from the effects of this forced and unnecessary march to Springfield and return. For fifteen days it was entirely without shelter. The men, wrapping their blankets around them, would lie down to sleep in the chilly air, with only the sky for a roof, and, tired and exhausted, in the morning would begin again the fatiguing march. It was a new experience thus early in the war, and brought inevitable sickness in its train. Colonel Webb, acting Lieutenant-Colonel Roberts (promoted in place of David Stuart, resigned), and many of the men were prostrated before the regiment reached Smithton. Colonel Webb never rallied. He died at Smithton, December 24, 1861, of typhoid fever.

WILLIAM A. WEBB was a native of Maine. He was a graduate of West Point, and, in 1853, received the commission of brevet second lieutenant, in the 4th U. S. Infantry, being subsequently commissioned first lieutenant in the 5th Infantry. At the breaking out of the war, he received a commission dated May 14, 1861, as captain in the 16th Infantry. He subsequently accepted the position of mustering officer and of commissary of subsistence, at Chicago, and, under his superintendence, many of the regiments which left the city, were organized. At the time of the organization of the Douglas Brigade, Captain Webb took an especial interest in its formation, and so largely gained the affections of the men that he was unanimously elected colonel of the first regiment of the brigade; a position which he accepted, with the permission of the War Department. After conducting the regiment to Missouri, he returned to Chicago to settle the affairs of his office, and then, leaving it in charge of Lieutenant John Christopher, re-joined his command at Tipton, and after a brief period of active service, succumbed to the united influence of exposure and fatigue. Young, brave and handsome, he was almost an idol with his soldiers, and was beloved and respected by all. He was buried at Chicago, with military honors, December 28, 1861.

On the death of Colonel Webb, Lieutenant-Colonel Roberts was promoted colonel, and the regiment remained in camp at Smithton, until February 3, 1862, when it proceeded, via St. Charles, Mo., to Fort Holt, Ky., which it occupied until March 4, and thence moved to Columbus. It left the latter place, on the 15th, for Island No. 10, where it remained in active service until the surrender of the post, on April 11. On the night of April 1, an expedition, under Colonel Roberts, was sent to the upper, or No. 10, Fort, which succeeded in spiking the guns of the rebel battery, and returned unscathed. The expedition embarked at midnight in boats, fitted out with men from the 42d regiment and seamen belonging to the squadron, and in the midst of a terrible thunder storm, set out for its destination. Colonel Roberts had previously ascertained accurately the locality of the battery, but owing to the dense darkness, and the violence of the storm, the bend in the river, where it was situated, was passed without the members of the expedition discerning it, until a flash of lightning showed that they were within a few rods of its face. The lightning also revealed to the sentinels the approach of the boats, and without waiting to look further, they fired wildly, and fled. The soldiers landed, silently climbed up the earthworks, swung over the parapet, and quickly the six guns were spiked, two sixty-four pounders, three eighty pounders, and one nine-inch pivot gun with cushion lock. After the surrender of the Island, the 42d joined General Pope's forces, and with them proceeded down the Mississippi toward Fort Pillow, where, on the 14th of April, Pope's command was ordered to join Halleck's forces, then moving toward Corinth. Embarking on transports, the troops steamed up the Tennessee, and reached Hamburg, landing April 22. There, on the 24th, Pope's command was partially reorganized, the 42d, 22d, 27th and 51st Illinois regiments, with Houghtaling's battery, constituting the First Brigade (General John M. Palmer), First Division (General E. A. Paine), Army of the Mississippi. Pope's command left camp at Hamburg, April 27th, and, on the 30th, established a new camp some eight miles north of Farmington, Miss., which place was held as an advance post by the Confederates. On May 3, Paine's division was detailed for a reconnoissance in force. Proceeding some five miles toward Farmington, the enemy's pickets were encountered, and driven back to their reserves, which, from behind barricades of fallen trees, kept up a sharp fire on the approaching column. The 42d Illinois, 10th and 14th Michigan, and Houghtaling's battery, all under Colonel Roberts, were there detached from the division, and ordered to the right, taking the road leading to Nichols's Ford, where they arrived and remained until five o'clock in the afternoon, guarding the ford, to prevent a movement of the Confederates on Paine's right flank. They then joined the main force a little north of Farmington. This movement had driven the enemy through the swamp north of the town, while its participators repaired the bridge over Seven Mile Creek, and finally pressed the rebels until they retreated through Farmington toward Corinth, leaving the town in possession of the Union forces. Pickets were advanced to the south of Farmington, and a telegraphic station established there. On the morning of the 9th, the advanced pickets were attacked by a heavy force of the enemy, and driven back to their reserves. Palmer's brigade was ordered to the front, to their relief, and a hot engagement ensued—the brigade and advanced guard becoming engaged with the troops of Bragg, Van Dorn and Hardee, who had moved out from Corinth, to drive Pope back toward the Tennessee. The battle was fiercely contested for nearly five hours, when, the enemy threatening to outflank Palmer, he withdrew, in accordance with orders, to the main force south of Seven Mile Creek. The enemy did not pursue, but retired through Farmington to Corinth. The 42d Illinois lost two killed and twelve wounded in the engagement.

On the 17th, the regiment, with its brigade, marched to Farmington, where intrenchments were thrown up, and the Army of the Mississippi remained until the 29th. On the 28th, General Rosecrans assumed command of the right wing, Army of the Mississippi, (Paine's and Stanley's divisions) and, on the 29th, the advance toward Corinth re-commenced. On the night of the 30th, Beauregard evacuated the city, and Palmer's brigade, marching by the direct road from Farmington, was among the first troops to enter the captured works, and the flag of the 42d Illinois one of the first that floated in the town. At five o'clock in the afternoon, the regiment, with Paine's column, moved in pursuit of the enemy, taking the advance at the crossing of Tusculum Bridge on the evening of the 31st. The enemy disputing the passage of this bridge with artillery planted on the opposite bank, Colonel Roberts, with the 42d, blazed a road to a point three-quarters of a mile above, where a foot-bridge was constructed of fallen trees, over which his command passed, and the following morning took possession of Danville, from which the enemy retreated. The following day, the First Brigade, Colonel Roberts commanding, reached Booneville, and encamped, remaining until the 4th, when it was again ordered forward as support to a force of cavalry and artillery under General Gordon Granger. With Granger, the command continued the pursuit nearly to Baldwin, Miss., where it was discontinued and the regiment returned to camp at Booneville. General Granger says, in his report,

"Too much praise can not be awarded to Colonel Roberts and his splendid brigade for their promptitude and eagerness to follow the enemy."

On June 5, the regiment made a reconnoissance on the Blackhead Road; but no enemy being discovered, returned to camp, and remained until the 11th, when the brigade moved back to camp at Big Spring, near Corinth.

On June 10, Buell left Corinth with the Army of the Ohio, to follow up Bragg; and, June 27, Pope was assigned to the Army of the Potomac. In the reorganization of the Army of the Mississippi, at Corinth, Colonel Palmer was placed in command of the First Division, and Colonel Roberts succeeded him in command of the First Brigade, Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Northrup succeeding in command of the 42d Illinois. On July 20, the division left camp at Big Spring, it having been assigned to guard the line of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. The 42d was ordered to Tusculum and thence sent to Courtland, Ala., where it was stationed from July 25 to September 3, 1862, doing good service in the warfare against the guerrilla bands that infested the region, constantly threatening the Federal lines of communication. On September 3, with Palmer's division, the regiment commenced its march toward Nashville, Bragg having crossed the Tennessee on his raid into the North. The division reached Nashville September 13, after a harassing and difficult march and some skirmishes with the enemy, in one of which, at Columbia, Tenn., September 9, one man of the 42d was killed. Lieutenant-Colonel Northrup resigned on September 7, and Major N. H. Walworth assumed command.

With Negley's division, the command of General Palmer garrisoned Nashville from the time of Buell's departure, September 15, until the arrival of Rosecrans, November 10. Communication with the North being completely cut off during that time, and the two divisions entirely isolated from any other portion of the Federal Army, they were obliged to live "from hand to mouth" as best they could. Railroad communication was opened with Louisville a few days later. On the 6th of November, the 42d assisted in repelling an attack of the Confederate cavalry, under Morgan and Forrest, on Nashville, and a little later surprised and captured Captain Portch, with a squad of Morgan's men, bringing in their arms and horses.

In the organization of the Army of the Cumberland, December 10, the 42d Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Nathan H. Walworth commanding, was assigned, with Roberts's brigade, to Sheridan's (Third) division, Right Wing, General McCook. The division, which consisted of Roberts's, Shaeffer's and Sill's brigades, left Camp Sheridan, on the Nolensville pike, near Nashville, on the 26th of December, 1862, to meet Bragg's army at Murfreesboro'. On the 30th, the division, then the advance column of the right wing, arrived at a point about three miles from Murfreesboro', where the enemy's infantry pickets were encountered and driven back nearly a mile, when the resistance became so strong that Sheridan formed line of battle—Roberts on the left, Sill on the right, Shaeffer in reserve—and placed his artillery in position. His line was formed to the right of the Wilkinson pike, and, at two o'clock

p. m. the whole line advanced, the skirmishers clearing the line in front. At sundown, position was taken for the coming conflict—Davis's division of McCook's corps joining Sheridan's right, but thrown back so as to form nearly a right angle with it. Negley's division joined Sheridan's on the left. Early on the morning of the 31st, Sill's brigade was attacked, and, after a severe struggle, drove the enemy back to his intrenchments; but General Sill, a brave and much beloved officer, was killed during the conflict. As the right of McCook's corps fell back in disorder, the attack was renewed on Sheridan's right, which was now exposed to fire from the enemy in front and rear. Sill's brigade, and the reserve brigade which had been sent to its support, were withdrawn, and Roberts was ordered to charge the enemy with his brigade, while the other troops were being re-formed. This was, in Sheridan's words, "very gallantly done," the brigade capturing one piece of artillery, and holding the enemy in check until a new line was formed, to which Roberts's brigade then fell back. In this position, the division fought until its right was again turned, when it was ordered to move to the left and form on Negley's right, Roberts's brigade being placed at right angles to Negley's line, facing south, and the other two brigades at right angles to Roberts's, facing west. In the latter angle thus formed, known as the "bloody angle,"* sections of Hescoc's and Bush's batteries were placed. General Sheridan says of the engagement at this crisis:

"In this position I was immediately attacked, when one of the bitterest and most sanguinary contests of the whole day occurred. General Cheatham's division advanced on Roberts's brigade, and heavy masses of the enemy, with three batteries of artillery, advanced over the open ground which I had occupied in the previous part of the engagement, at the same time the enemy opening from their intrenchments in the direction of Murfreesboro'. The contest then became terrible. The enemy made three attacks and were three times repulsed, the artillery range of the respective batteries being not over two hundred yards. In these attacks Roberts's brigade lost its gallant commander, who was killed. There was no sign of faltering with the men; the only cry being for more ammunition, which, unfortunately, could not be supplied on account of the discomfiture of the troops on the right of our wing, which allowed the enemy to come in and capture our train."

The division held its ground until the ammunition was almost utterly exhausted, and until Lieutenant Taliaferro, commanding a section of the battery at the angle formed by Roberts's and Shaeffer's brigades, was killed and his horses shot, and the other batteries were disabled or captured. Shaeffer's brigade, entirely out of ammunition, was then ordered to fix bayonets and await the enemy. Roberts's brigade was ordered to fall back fighting. This it did, passing through the cedars in the rear unbroken, and was put again into action on the Murfreesboro' pike, where the enemy threatened to break Rosecrans's communications. The brigade, although it had but three or four rounds of ammunition, "cheerfully went into action, gallantly charged the enemy, routing them, re-capturing two pieces of artillery, and taking forty prisoners."

At night, the whole division was placed in position on the Murfreesboro' pike, where the above-mentioned action took place, remaining until the 6th, when it moved to camp on Stone River, three miles south of Murfreesboro', on the Shelbyville pike. Every brigade commander in Sheridan's division was killed in the battle of the 31st of December, and the ranking officer—Colonel Herrington, of the 27th Illinois Infantry—in the Third Brigade, being wounded and a prisoner, Colonel Luther P. Bradley, of the 51st Illinois, succeeded Colonel Roberts in command. Lieutenant-

Colonel Walworth was promoted colonel of the 42d Illinois, with rank to date from January 1, 1863. The 42d lost at Murfreesboro' twenty-two killed, one hundred and sixteen wounded and eighty-five prisoners. Among the killed were the following:

Co. "A": Privates Eli Carson and John Minneck. Co. "B": Lieutenant Julius Lettman, of Chicago; Private F. Titskey. Co. "C": Private C. T. Bart, William E. Emory, W. Reynolds. Co. "E": Sergeant J. Hall; Privates D. E. Arnold, A. J. Northrup. Co. "H": Sergeant C. P. Chapman; Corporals M. Mattocks and C. N. Harrison; Private A. Jeffrey. Co. "I": Corporal A. Smith; Privates G. J. Carpenter and John Therson. Co. "K": Sergeant T. C. Bowen, Corporal O. M. Benson.

In the reorganization of the army after the battle of Stone River, McCook's right wing of the army became the Twentieth Army Corps. The 42d still remained in the Third Brigade (Bradley's), Third Division (Sheridan's). In March, it took part in the expedition toward Franklin in pursuit of Van Dorn, as far as Columbia, returning to camp at Murfreesboro', March 14. With Rosecrans's army it entered upon the Tullahoma campaign, June 24, reaching that stronghold on July 1. Bragg having evacuated it on the night before, the 42d joined in his pursuit, crossing the Tennessee River on September 2, and on the 5th arrived at Trenton, Ga.

On the 11th, the Twentieth Corps reached Alpina, Ga., the extreme right of Rosecrans's army, and on the 14th, commenced the return march up Lookout Valley, to join Thomas. On the 17th, Sheridan arrived at Stevens's Gap in Lookout Mountain, and on the 19th at Gordon's Mills, where he was posted at the right of Crittenden's corps. The other division of McCook's corps had been sent to the assistance of General Thomas, Sheridan's being the only one of the Twentieth Corps left at the right, to hold the position at Gordon's Mills. At three o'clock in the afternoon, Bradley's brigade was sent to the relief of Wood's division at the Widow Glenn house. Colonel Bradley being wounded by the first volley, Colonel Walworth assumed command of the brigade, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hottenstein of the 42d. The brigade succeeded in driving the enemy from the front of that division and across the Chattanooga and LaFayette road, re-capturing the 8th Indiana Battery and taking a large number of prisoners from Hood's division of Longstreet's corps. General Wood personally thanked Colonel Walworth for recovering his battery on the field. During the night of the 19th, McCook was ordered to so post his command as to form the right of the new line of battle for the succeeding day. In compliance with this order, Bradley's and Lytle's brigades were posted on the extreme right of the Union line, Wilder's mounted-infantry being placed in position to protect their right flank the following morning. At ten o'clock on the morning of the 20th, these two brigades were ordered to the left to support Thomas, and Sheridan's Third Brigade (Laibold's) was sent to the support of Davis's division.

While these movements were in progress, Wood's whole division (joining Davis on the left), through some misunderstanding of orders, was withdrawn from the front line of battle, leaving a wide gap between Davis and Reynolds; which the former, with his small force, vainly endeavored to fill. The enemy was quick to see this unguarded point, and Longstreet's troops poured through the gap in overwhelming numbers, separating Sheridan's and Davis's divisions from the rest of the army. Sheridan had recalled his two brigades, which had been ordered to the left, and they met the onset of the enemy as they were moving to position. They made a gallant resistance, but the odds were too great; Lytle was killed, and with the remainder of the division, Bradley's brigade was obliged to fall back to Mission Ridge, and at night to Rossville. The 42d lost in the battles of the 19th and 20th, twenty-eight killed, one hundred and twenty-eight wounded, and twenty-eight prisoners.

Major James Leighton, Lieutenant Ezra A. Montgomery and John A. Hall were killed. Among the wounded were Captains Joseph W. Foster, William H. Boomer and F. A. Atwater; Lieutenants G. A. Marshall, Orville Powell, M. C. Bryant, Edward Hurson, Stephen Reynolds, M. J. Simonds; Sergeants Sherwin W. Kink, M. Kennedy. Severely wounded and prisoners: Sergeants L. H. Needham and A. B. Bemis. Missing: Sergeants William E. Harlock, James H. Dehue; Corporal James Stillier; Privates George Wright, J. P. Restrap and Benjamin Wright.

On the 22d, the regiment with the Twentieth Corps fell back to Chattanooga, where it was engaged in work on the fortifications until the reorganization of the army. On October 30, McCook's and Crittenden's corps (Twentieth and Twenty-first), were consolidated, and the Fourth Corps organized under command of General Gordon Granger, to which Sheridan's division was assigned as the Second Division. The regiment remained in Chattanooga, suffering with the rest of the army from exposure and lack of provisions and proper shelter, until the 23d of November, when, with the division, it advanced from Fort Wood to the first line of rebel works at Orchard Knob, which were carried and occupied by the Union troops, Grant and Sherman establishing headquarters at the Knob.

On the 25th, it took part in the battle of Mission Ridge, the regiment forming a part of Sheridan's skirmish line. Its loss was five killed and forty wounded. Lieutenants George C. Smith, of Co. "E," and Alfred O. Johnson, of Co. "G," both of Chicago, died in the following December of wounds received in the battle. The regiment was ordered, on the 27th, to proceed with Granger's corps to Knoxville, to relieve Burnside, the city being besieged by Longstreet's forces. The siege having been raised before the arrival of Granger, his troops remained in the vicinity of Knoxville, in camp at Stone's Mill; where, on the 1st of January, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer organization, and, on the 15th, marched to Dandridge, Tenn., to meet Longstreet. After an engagement on the 16th, the Fourth Corps retired to Knoxville, and thence to Loudon, Tenn., where the 42d went into camp, and enjoyed the first full rations it had received for six months. The troops suffered fearfully during that cold stormy winter in Tennessee, both from cold and hunger. Being entirely without tents, the command lived in sheds made of poles and covered with rubber-blankets and evergreen boughs, before which fires were kept burning at night.

On January 21, the 42d started for Chattanooga, arriving February 2, and leaving for Chicago on veteran furlough on the 21st. At the expiration of furlough, it re-joined its command at Chattanooga, where it arrived April 27.

In the reorganization of the Army of the Cumberland for the Atlanta campaign, the Fourth Corps was placed under General O. O. Howard. General Sheridan having been assigned to the Cavalry Department in the Eastern Army, Major-General John Newton, succeeded him in command of the Second Division. The 42d Illinois remained in the Third Brigade, then commanded by General Harker. The regiment joined the Fourth Corps at Cleveland, Tenn., whence it moved with the Army of the Cumberland on the Atlanta campaign, on May 3. Newton's division arrived in front of Rocky Face Ridge, on the route to Dalton, on May 8, and Harker's brigade was thrown to the summit of the precipitous bluff, driving the enemy back along the ridge some three miles, when its further advance was successfully withstood by the rebels, who had fortified a deep gorge, which they held until the ridge, and the pass through it (Buzzard Roost) were evacuated, on the 13th. The principal loss in Newton's division at Rocky Face occurred in Harker's brigade.

On the 13th, Newton's division passed through Snake Creek Gap, and joined the rest of the Fourth Corps before Resaca on the 14th, the corps being on the extreme left of the Federal line, facing Hardee's Confederate corps. With its brigade, the regiment participated in the battle at Resaca, and in the pursuit of Johnston's army, through Calhoun and Adairsville, to the Etowah River at Cassville. At New Hope Church, near Dallas, the command was under fire from the 26th of May until June 4, when it advanced to Pine Top Mountain. The enemy evacuated this position on June 14, falling back to his main works, toward Kennesaw. On the 15th, the 42d and 51st Illinois, led by Colonel Bradley of the latter, made a gallant and successful attack on the advanced works, of the Confederates driving the occupants back to their reserves and taking possession of the ridge which they had occupied, the whole division advancing to the position at night, and throwing up strong fortifications.

Howard's corps advanced to, and besieged, the enemy's works on Kennesaw, June 19. Skirmishing was constant until June 27, when an assault was ordered, Newton's division being chosen to make the attack upon the left center of the rebel works. Harker's brigade formed the right of Newton's column. The rebel batteries were on a wooded ridge, which was protected at its base with palisades and abatis, and they swept the entire ground in front of Harker's, Wagner's and Kimball's assaulting brigades.

The assault was made in column of regimental divisions—two companies in width, thirty lines deep. Colonel Opdycke's 125th Ohio led the column. An army correspondent, in his account of the engagement, says of the charge of Harker's brigade:*

"When the bugle pealed forth the clarion note for the advance, the brigade sprang into line, and marched boldly from their trenches, sweeping over the enemy's scattered pickets, and gaining the rifle-pits where his skirmishers were posted. The enemy opened a terrible fire of musketry, grape and canister, but our boys poured into the ravine equi-distant from the hostile trenches, and began to ascend the slope beyond, fast becoming slippery with blood. At this moment a battery opened on their right, enflading the column and disordering its lines, without, however, lessening the impetuosity of the lads. Many swarmed to the rebel works, and after vainly endeavoring to scale the works, took lodgment at their base, fighting desperately, within reach of each other, over the parapet; so close that several of an advance regiment were dragged over by the hair, and captured.

"The struggle lasted one hour and twenty minutes—regiment after regiment planting its colors on the ramparts only to be driven back. Harker, the fearless and beloved commander, upon whose shoulder the star had rested but a brief month, fell mortally wounded at the head of his column, and died two hours after. No one who saw his cheerfulness when going into the fight, and his glorious bearing during the action, to the moment he was hit, would have dreamed that, a few hours before, he had quietly handed a packet to a comrade not selected for the assault, asking him to send it home. "I shall be killed," said he, in conclusion. * * * The noble brigade at last fell back, bringing their dying chief with them, but leaving a fifth of their number, killed and wounded, on the field."

General Harker was killed when within only about fifteen yards of the rebel works. After Johnston had evacuated his position at Kennesaw, and our army occupied Marietta, the works which Newton's division had charged were examined, and found to be most thorough fortifications, and impregnable to assault except at enormous loss. Sherman entered Marietta on July 2.

Johnston's army advanced to the Chattahoochee River, where it once more entrenched a position, from which it was again routed. On July 9, Newton's division marched to Roswell, to cover the crossing of cavalry, returning to the north side of the river, and re-joining the corps on the 13th. On the 20th, it crossed Peach Tree Creek, and took up its position on the south bank of the stream, in front of the advanced line of rebel works around Atlanta, and about seven miles from that city. When the Fourth Corps formed its line of battle, an interval of about three miles intervened between Newton and Wood on his left, which the former was obliged to hold with a thin line of skirmishers. At noon of the 20th, Newton's division moved from the bank of Peach Tree Creek, a strong skirmish line being sent forward to drive the rebel sharpshooters from the rifle pits, which they occupied in advance of their main works.

Newton's skirmishers comprised six regiments—four from Kimball's and two from Wagner's brigade (the latter under command of Colonel Blake), and were commanded by Colonel Barrett, 44th Illinois. The men slowly forced their way up the ridge, driving the sharpshooters; and in half an hour had forced them back to their main works, three hundred and fifty yards further back. Blake and Kimball immediately occupied the ridge, and set the men to throwing up a rail barricade in their front. Bradley's brigade (formerly Harker's) was formed along the Buckhead and Atlanta road, in the rear, facing to the left; Kimball's brigade was formed to the right of the road, Blake's to the left. While the regiments in the front were still engaged in constructing their barricades, the division was attacked by Walker's and Bate's rebel divisions, which suddenly emerged from the woods beyond the open fields at the top of the ridge. Immediately after the assault commenced upon Newton's front, at about half-past three p. m., Colonel Bradley sent the 42d Illinois and 64th Ohio to the support of Colonel Blake, where they, with every regiment in the division, did most glorious fighting, not one brigade yielding an inch of ground. On the 22d, the division moved to Atlanta, and took up a position with the corps in front of the defenses; which it retained with slight change until the night of the 25th of August, when it left the trenches, to accompany the army in the movement to the right and rear of Atlanta. Striking the Macon Railroad on September 1, it was engaged in destroying the track through the day, and then moved to Jonesboro'. After pursuing the forces of Hood from Jonesboro' to Lovejoy station, it returned to camp near Atlanta on the 8th, at the close of the campaign. The total loss of the regiment since the opening of the campaign, was twenty killed eighty-nine wounded and seven prisoners.

The army was reorganized at Atlanta, in preparation for Sherman's "march to the sea" and the occupation of Nashville by Thomas. Major-General D. S. Stanley succeeded Howard in command of the Fourth Corps, and General Wagner succeeded Newton in command of the Second Division. On September 25, with Wagner's division, the 42d left Atlanta for Chattanooga, where it arrived October 19, and thence moved to Pulaski, Tenn., where troops were concentrating to join Thomas at Nashville. On November 22, with Schofield's and Stanley's corps, it commenced the retreat to Nashville, participating in the engagements at Spring Hill and Franklin, November 29 and 30, at the latter terrible battle being posted some distance in front of the defenses as advance guards, and in the attack by Hood losing twenty-four killed, ninety-five wounded and thirty prisoners.

The Fourth Corps, Wagner's brigade, forming the rear guard, reached Nashville December 1, and the 42d participated in the battles before that place, December 15 and 16, losing two killed and eleven wounded. It then joined in the pursuit of Hood to Lexington, Ala., a distance of eighty-two miles, over the most horrible roads and in the most severe and stormy weather. On the arrival of the brigade at Lexington, December 31, Hood had crossed the Tennessee, and the pursuit was abandoned. On January 1, 1865, the regiment, with the Fourth Corps (commanded by General T. J. Wood, after General Stanley was wounded at Franklin), moved from Lexington, arriving at Decatur, Ala., via Huntsville, January 6, and there remaining, as part of the garrison, until April 1, when it proceeded to Nashville. From Nashville, it was ordered, June 15, to New Orleans, en route for Texas, to garrison some still uncertain posts. It embarked at New Orleans July 18, disembarked at Port Lavacca, Texas, July 23, and proceeded to Camp Irwin, returning to Lavacca, August 17, where it remained on garrison duty until again ordered to Indianola, to be mustered out, on the 16th of December, 1865. The regiment left Indianola on the 20th, New Orleans on the 24th, and returned to Camp Butler, Springfield, Ill., for final payment and discharge, which it received January 10, 1866.

COLONEL GEORGE W. ROBERTS, son of Pratt and Ann (Wilson) Roberts, was born in East Goshen, Chester Co., Penn. He received his common school and academic education at Westchester, Penn., and Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and, after a collegiate course, graduated with high honors from Yale, in June, 1857. After preparatory law studies in Westchester, Penn., he was admitted to the Bar, January 8, 1858, and in the spring of 1860 removed to Chicago, and practiced law in the office of E. S. Smith until June, 1861, when, with William A. Webb, he commenced recruiting for the 42d Illinois Infantry, freely devoting both time and money to the advancement of its interests. On its organization, he received a commission as major, on September 17 was elected lieutenant-colonel, and with the regiment left Chicago for the seat of war in Missouri. After a short campaign in that State, under General Fremont, Colonel Webb, died from the consequences of over-fatigue, and, on December 24, Lieutenant-Colonel Roberts was promoted colonel of the regiment, which remained under him as regimental or brigade commander until his death at Stone River. Colonel Roberts remained in personal command of the 42d until after the battle of Farmington, in May, 1862, on the advance to Corinth. He then took command of General Palmer's brigade, the latter returning to the North on sick leave, and from that time was acting brigade commander until he was formally assigned to the Third Brigade of Sheridan's division, before the battle of Murfreesboro'. In that terrible struggle, on Wednesday, December 31, 1862, he fell, mortally wounded, while leading his men to a charge. Colonel Roberts was conspicuous among the crowd of young heroes developed by the National struggle, for manly courage, high aspirations and lofty aims, as well as for his keen, mental grasp of military science, and his calm, quiet self-possession in the most critical and dangerous situations.

COLONEL N. H. WALWORTH, senior member of the firm of Walworth & Reed, was born in Oneida County, N. Y., in 1832. His father was Elisha Walworth, a very active business man of that county, who carried on a mercantile and a milling establishment. Elisha Walworth died in 1878, at the age of eighty-three. Colonel N. H. Walworth's mother was Sallie (Halbert) Walworth, who was born in 1794, and who died in 1875, dying, as did Elisha Walworth, in the house to which they moved when they were married. The education of Colonel Walworth was obtained at Rome Academy and Cazenovia Seminary. He moved to Illinois in 1855, and, upon the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion, entered the Union Army as captain of Co. "C," 42d Illinois Infantry Volunteers. In December, 1861, he was promoted to the rank of major; in October, 1862, to lieutenant-colonel; and on February 15, 1863, to colonel of the regiment. From his promotion to major, until May 15, 1864, when he resigned, he was in command of the regiment; and in the battle of Chickamauga and Mission Ridge he was in command of a brigade in Sheridan's division. His business career since returning from the war is contained in the sketch of the lumber firm of Walworth & Reed. Colonel Walworth was married, in 1855, to Miss Adelia E. Cornish, of Oneida County, N. Y. Her father was Hosea Cornish, who was born within a few miles of Plymouth Rock, and some of whose family are still in that locality. The maiden name of Mrs. Walworth's mother was Emily Ward, who was a daughter of Dr. Ward, of Oneida County, N. Y. Both Hosea and Mrs. Emily Cornish are still living in that county, he at the age of eighty, she at the age of seventy-three.

FIFTY-FIRST ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

During August, 1861, it was proposed that the various home companies of Chicago, which, as a part of the reserve corps, had been drilling for months past, should be organized under the new militia law, as the 1st Regiment, Illinois State Militia. These companies were the Chicago Light Guard, Captain P. Wadsworth; Anderson Rifles, Captain Samuel B. Raymond; Garden City Guard, Captain John M. Loomis; Scammon Light Infantry, Captain John Baldwin; Bryan Light Guard, Captain George Letz; Chicago Citizen Corps, Captain S. B. Perry; Wentworth Light Infantry, Captain N. E. Hahn; Ellsworth Zouaves, Captain Brand; Fremont Fencibles, Captain Rufus Rose; and the companies of Captains Chadbourne and Luther P. Bradley.

The call for volunteers for United States service soon became so urgent that this idea was abandoned. Captain Loomis was appointed colonel of the 26th Illinois during the month; some of the companies joined regiments organizing in the city, and others underwent various company changes. It was finally decided to organize the existing home companies into a Chicago regiment, to be called the "Chicago Legion." The following is a copy of the official order issued by Adjutant-General Mather, September 20, 1861, providing for the organization of the regiment:

"GENERAL ORDER No. 107.

"It is ordered by the Commander-in-Chief that the Union Railroad Guard, Captain H. F. Westcott; Sturges Light Guard, Captain J. G. McWilliams; Bryan Light Guard, Captain Heffernon; Fremont Fencibles, Captain Rufus Rose; Yates Light Guard, Captain William P. White; Scammon Light Infantry, Captain Brown; Anderson Rifles, Captain A. L. Hale; Higgins's Light Guard, Captain Wentz (George H.); Tucker Light Guard, Captain Gardner (Isaac N.); Mathew Light Guard, Captain C. H. Roland, shall compose the Fifty-first Regiment (Chicago Legion) Illinois Volunteers.

"There may be attached to said Regiment one company of Cavalry and one company of Light Artillery—said companies to be raised by voluntary enlistment for said purpose, and not to be selected from any of the companies of cavalry or artillery heretofore reported and accepted by the State.

"The Commander-in-Chief of the State forces, or the proper officers of the U. S. Army, may, at any time, detach the said companies, or either of them, and detail them for any separate service, to be assigned in the discretion of said officers."

Governor Yates appointed as colonel of the regiment, Gilbert W. Cumming, a well known lawyer of Chicago; for lieutenant-colonel, Luther P. Bradley; and for major, Samuel B. Raymond—both old citizens of Chicago; the latter for a long time connected with the famous Chicago Fire Brigade.* On October 8, the regiment, numbering over nine hundred men, went into camp (having at that time a company of cavalry, afterward detached), and was mustered into the United States service, at Camp Douglas, December 24, 1861, the original roster being as follows:

Field and Staff.—Colonel, Gilbert W. Cumming; Lieutenant-Colonel, Luther P. Bradley; Major, Samuel B. Raymond; Adjutant, Charles W. Davis; Quartermaster, Henry Howland; Surgeon, William C. Hunt; Chaplain, Lewis Raymond.

Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, Henry F. Westcott; First Lieutenant, James E. Montandon; Second Lieutenant, Antonio DeAnguera. Co. "B": Captain, Isaac N. Gardner; First Lieutenant, Henry W. Hall; Second Lieutenant, George I. Waterman. Co. "C": Captain, Nathaniel B. Petts; First Lieutenant, Albert M. Tilton; Second Lieutenant, Albert Eads. Co. "D": Captain, Ezra L. Bralnard; First Lieutenant, Theodore F. Brown; Second Lieutenant, James S. Boyd. Co. "E": Captain, John G. McWilliams; First Lieutenant, Thomas T. Lester; Second Lieutenant, Augustus B. Sweney. Co. "F": Captain, George L. Bellows; First Lieutenant, Robert Houston; Second Lieutenant, Andrew H. Frazer. Co. "G": Captain, George H. Wentz; First Lieutenant, Merritt B. Atwater; Second Lieutenant, Orrin S. Johnson. Co. "H": Captain, John T. Whitson; First Lieutenant, William H. Greenwood; Second Lieutenant, Charles E. Whitson. Co. "K": Captain, Rufus Rose; First Lieutenant, Otis Moody; Second Lieutenant, Albert L. Coe.

The 51st remained at Camp Douglas until February 14, 1862, when it left Chicago for Cairo, where it was assigned to General E. A. Paine's division, and remained until the 27th. It then crossed the Ohio River, and, on March 4, moved to Bertrand, Mo., and, on the 10th, it joined General Pope's army at New Madrid. There, with the 22d Illinois, constituting Paine's Second Brigade, Colonel Cumming commanding, it participated in the movements of the army under Pope; which resulted in the evacuation of New Madrid by Major-General McCown, during the night of the 14th, abandoning all his guns, ammunition, supplies, etc., without an effort to destroy them. The regiment, with its command, occupied the works at New Madrid until April 7; when, Island No. 10 having fallen, General Pope crossed the Mississippi River to the Tennessee shore.—Cumming's and Morgan's brigades of Paine's division in advance,—marched on Tiptonville, where General Mackall and six thousand retreating Confederates from Island No. 10 were captured, besides more than one hundred cannon, munitions and supplies of all kinds.

On the 10th, the regiment, with its command, returned to New Madrid, and with Pope's forces descended the Mississippi in transports to Fort Pillow, at which point Pope was ordered to join General Halleck's army at Hamburg, Tenn., to participate in the movement on Corinth. The troops reached Hamburg, landing April 22; and in the reorganization of Pope's command on the 24th, the 51st, 22d, 27th and 42d Illinois regiments, with Houghtaling's battery soon after changed to Hescoc's, were designated the First Brigade (known as the "Illinois Brigade," Colonel John M. Palmer, commanding), First Division (General Paine), Army of the Mississippi. On April 27, the division moved from camp at Hamburg, and arrived near Farmington, Miss., on the route to Corinth, April 30, and after a reconnoissance to the south of the town May 3, remained in camp north of Seven Mile Creek until the 9th. On May 8, a line of skirmishers was advanced to the south of Farmington, supported by a brigade of Stanley's division, south of the creek.

On the morning of the 9th, this advanced guard was heavily attacked, and Palmer's brigade was ordered immediately to the front, to its relief. The engagement speedily assumed the dimensions of a serious battle—three Confederate divisions having moved out from Corinth, under Bragg, Van Dorn and Hardee, their united forces amounting to twenty thousand, with thirty pieces of artillery, with intent to intercept the forward movement of the Federal troops. After an engagement of several hours, the Federal forces were withdrawn to the north of Seven Mile Creek. June 17, the division marched into Farmington, and remained there until the 29th. On the 28th, General W. S. Rosecrans assumed command of the right wing of the Army of the Mississippi (Paine's and Stanley's divisions), and the advance recommenced the following day. On the 30th, Beauregard evacuated Corinth, and Palmer's brigade was one of the first that entered the city. On the evening of the same day, under command of Colonel Roberts, of the 42d Illinois, the brigade joined in the pursuit of the retreating enemy, reaching Booneville on the 2d of June, where it went into camp; afterward, removed to Big Springs, near Corinth, on the 14th.

Five new divisions being organized by General Rosecrans, one of them was assigned to the command of General John M. Palmer, the command of his brigade devolving upon Colonel George W. Roberts. The 51st moved from camp at Big Springs, with Palmer's division, on the 28th of July, and marched to Tusculum, Ala., and then moved, via Athens, Ala., to Nashville, Tenn., where it arrived, September 12, after a most fatiguing and harassing march.

On arriving at Nashville, General Palmer's command went into camp on College Hill; and from that time until the 6th of November, when the rebel cavalry under Morgan and Forrest was driven from before the city, the troops, while constantly engaged in labor on the fortifications, subsisted on half rations. On September 20, Colonel Cumming having resigned, Lieutenant-Colonel Bradley was commissioned colonel of the 51st. On the 16th of November, Rosecrans arrived at Nashville, having succeeded Buell in command of the Army of the Ohio, which he reorganized, in December, as the Army of the Cumberland. General Palmer, in the reorganization, was assigned to the command of a division in Crittenden's corps, and his old brigade, under command of Colonel Roberts, was transferred to the Third Division (General Philip H. Sheridan), Right Wing (General McCook) of the Army of the Cumberland. The brigade was designated the Third. On the 14th, the division marched to Camp Sheridan, seven miles out from Nashville on the Nolensville pike, where it remained until the 26th, when the movement against Bragg, at Murfreesboro', was commenced. On the 30th, Sheridan's division had the advance of McCook's corps, Roberts's brigade leading the division. During the 30th, there was severe skirmishing with the enemy, who were steadily driven toward Murfreesboro', and at night the division was formed in line of battle on the right of the Wilkinson pike, and was in view of the enemy's position. Roberts's brigade, which formed the left of the division, rested on the pike, and joined Negley's right brigade, on the opposite side. The troops rested on their arms through the night of the 30th; and on the morning of the 31st, the extreme right of the corps having been driven back in confusion, about day-break, the attack reached the right of Sheridan's division, held by Sill's brigade, about seven o'clock a. m., and soon extended to the left, the whole division fighting most gallantly, until every brigade commander and many of the regimental commanders were killed, and it was obliged to fall back for lack of ammunition to prolong the struggle.

General Sill was killed early in the morning, while leading his men in a charge; and directly after this misfortune, Johnson's and Davis's divisions, to the right of Sheridan, having been driven to the left and rear, the exultant foe followed in pursuit, and completely turned Sheridan's right, and exposed his line to an enfilading fire. Withdrawing Sill's brigade and the supporting regiments to a new line, Sheridan ordered Colonel Roberts to charge the enemy in the timber to the right, which was successfully accomplished. An extract from General Sheridan's report of this battle is as follows:

"In this position I was immediately attacked, when one of the bitterest and most sanguinary contests of the whole day occurred. General Chestnut's division advanced on Roberts's brigade, and heavy masses of the enemy, with three batteries of artillery, advanced over the open ground which I had occupied in the previous part of the engagement, at the same time the enemy opening from their intrenchments in the direction of Murfreesboro'. The contest then became terrible. The enemy made three attacks and were three times repulsed, the artillery range of the respective batteries being not over two hundred yards. In these attacks, Roberts's brigade lost its gallant commander, who was killed."

The most desperate fighting was done at the angle* formed by the brigades of the division. Captain Houghtaling, after exhausting all his ammunition, attempted to have his battery drawn off by hand, the horses all being shot, but had to abandon it. Lieutenant Taliaferro, commanding a section of Hescoc's battery, at the same angle, was killed, and his pieces were drawn off by his men. Two pieces of Bush's battery were captured. At eleven o'clock a. m., Colonel Roberts was killed, and Colonel Harrington, of the 27th Illinois, the ranking officer of the brigade, being wounded and a prisoner, its command devolved on Colonel Luther P. Bradley, of the 51st. Major Charles W. Davis took command of the regiment, and after he was also wounded and disabled, it was commanded by Captain H. F. Wescott, of Co. "A," until the close of the battle. The division fell back to the Murfreesboro' pike, Roberts's brigade fighting as it retreated, and on arriving at the pike was again engaged in repelling an attack by the enemy. Fifteen officers were killed in Sheridan's division, in the battle before Murfreesboro'. Not a colonel, except Bradley, was left in Roberts's brigade. The 51st lost fifty-seven killed, wounded and prisoners. Charles Mansfield, the color-bearer, and another, who took his place, were killed, and the regimental flag torn to atoms. Lieutenant John S. Keith, of Co. "A," was killed; Major Davis, Captain James S. Boyd, Co. "B," and Lieutenant H. A. Buck, of Co. "K," the first two of Chicago, were wounded. Corporal Whitson, Lieutenant A. L. McCormick and Captain John D. Jones were among the wounded. Among the privates killed were George D. Martin and John H. Slayton, of Co. "B"; and George Sturtevant, of Co. "H." On the 6th, the brigade moved to camp, three miles south of Murfreesboro'.

In the reorganization of the Army of the Cumberland, January 10, after the battle of Stone River, the designation of the organizations known as Center, and Right, and Left Wing, were changed to Fourteenth, Twentieth and Twenty-first corps, the Twentieth Corps remaining under the command of General McCook. On March 4, with Bradley's brigade, the 51st, commanded by Captain John G. McWilliams, moved from camp at Murfreesboro', with Sheridan's division, toward Spring Hill, in pursuit of the enemy under Van Dorn and Forrest, with whom they had an encounter on the 8th, and succeeded in driving them from the field. On June 24, with Rosecrans's army, the regiment set out on the Tullahoma campaign, and, after a rest in camp on the heights of the Cumberland, near the site of the "University of the South," the command moved down the mountains into the Tennessee Valley, reaching Bridgeport, Ala., on July 30. There the division remained until September 2, when it crossed the Tennessee and moved to the foot of Sand Mountain. On the 11th, McCook's corps reached Alpine, Ga., a point thirty miles to the right of Thomas at Stevens's Gap. On the 14th, having received orders to move to the left and join Thomas, the corps marched up Lookout Valley, and, on the 19th, reached the Chickamauga Valley, and formed on the extreme right of the Federal line. Sheridan's whole division was at first posted at Gordon's Mills, but at noon Bradley's and Laibold's brigades were sent to the support of Davis's division, at Widow Glenn's house, near the center of the line. At four o'clock, Bradley's brigade was thrown to the front to relieve Davis's division, and, in the words of the corps commander, "gallantly drove" the enemy from the open ground and across the Chattanooga and La-Fayette road, after a sanguinary engagement, re-capturing the Eighth Indiana battery, which had previously been taken by the enemy, and capturing also a large number of prisoners belonging to Hood's division of Longstreet's corps. During the brief time that it took to accomplish this, the 51st, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Raymond, lost ninety men out of two hundred and nine engaged; among whom were, Lieutenants Albert C. Simmons, of Co. "G," and Henry A. Buck, of Co. "K," the latter a young lawyer from Michigan, who enlisted at Chicago, and was shot while bravely leading his company in the charge.

During the night of the 19th, the men erected barricades, and on the morning of the 20th were again placed in position on the extreme right of Rosecrans's new line, and a little to the right and rear of Widow Glenn's house. Wilder's mounted-infantry was posted, on the morning of the 20th, at the right of Bradley. At ten o'clock, Bradley's and Lytle's brigades were dispatched to the support of Thomas, and Laibold's to the support of Davis's division. While this movement was in progress, and while Davis was vainly endeavoring to fill, with his thin ranks, a gap at his left (caused by the withdrawal of Wood's division from the front line of battle, through a misunderstanding of orders), the enemy made a fierce attack, and Hood's and Buckner's charging columns, piercing the fatal gap in Rosecrans's line, separated the Twentieth Corps from the rest of the army. Bradley's and Lytle's brigades met the onslaught of Longstreet's troops as they were endeavoring to re-join their division, to assist in repulsing the attack. Forming on the Chattanooga road, they struggled well and bravely, but, with the rest of the corps at the right, were forced back to Mission Ridge. In the evening, the brigade reached Rossville, where it bivouacked for the night, and the following morning returned to the front, threw up barricades, and occupied them until the 22d, when it marched to Chattanooga, where it was employed on the fortifications, and in guard and fatigue duty, until the middle of October. On October 10, the Twentieth and Twenty-first corps were consolidated, and the Fourth Corps, under Major-General Gordon Granger, was organized. The 51st was assigned to the Third Brigade, Colonel (C. G. Harker), Second Division (Major-General Sheridan), Fourth Corps.

On Monday, November 23, the advanced works of Bragg before Chattanooga were captured, and Orchard Knob was occupied by Generals Grant and Thomas as headquarters; Sheridan's division occupied the captured works to the right of the Knob.

On the 25th, Mission Ridge was stormed. This was the "soldier's battle," and bravely they won it—the Confederates, according to their own reports, sustaining "the most ignominious defeat of the whole war—a defeat for which there was but little excuse or palliation." At Mission Ridge, the 51st lost thirty out of one hundred and fifty men engaged. Captain George L. Bellows, Co. "F," of Chicago, was among the killed, and Lieutenant-Colonel Davis was again wounded. Lieutenant-Colonel Raymond having resigned on October 6, Major Charles W. Davis was promoted lieutenant-colonel, and as the commanding officer led the regiment in the attack on Mission Ridge.

On November 28, the Fourth Corps marched from Chattanooga to the relief of Burnside, besieged at Knoxville by Longstreet, arriving December 9. Before, however, Knoxville was reached, Longstreet had been repulsed, and had retreated to the valley of the Holston, near Morriston. The 51st went into camp in the vicinity of Knoxville, in December, where it was joined by Colonel Bradley. In January, 1864, it returned to Chattanooga, where, on February 10, the men re-enlisted as veterans, and returned home on furlough, reaching Chicago, February 17. At the expiration of furlough, the regiment returned to the front, leaving Chicago, March 28, by rail, for Nashville, whence it marched to Chattanooga, and joined the Fourth Corps at Cleveland, Tenn.

In the reorganization of the Army for the Atlanta campaign, General Oliver O. Howard was assigned to the command of the Fourth Corps of the Army of the Cumberland, General John Newton succeeded Sheridan in command of the Second Division, the latter being transferred to the Cavalry Department in Virginia. The Third Brigade, of which the 51st formed a part, remained in command of Brigadier-General C. G. Harker. The Atlanta campaign was opened May 3, on which day the regiment, with the Fourth Corps, advanced from Cleveland to Catoosa Springs, in the movement upon Dalton, Ga., where Johnston's army was intrenched, beyond the almost impregnable barrier of Rocky Face Ridge, through a gorge in which ran the railroad and wagon road to the town. Both crest and pass were strongly fortified, and occupied by Johnston as his advanced position. On the 8th, Newton's division reached the northern end of Rocky Face, and Harker's brigade was detailed to scale its precipitous sides, secure a footing on the crest, and drive the enemy along the ridge, while other forces should push him back into the mouth of the gorge. The brigade reached the top of Rocky Face, and moved south along the crest, driving back the Confederate outposts and skirmishers a distance of two or three miles, and, until the reserves were encountered in force in a strongly intrenched position, crossing the narrow summit of the ridge and protected by a deep gorge in front. On May 9, the whole of Newton's division was thrown to the top of Rocky Face, but the gorge in Harker's front could not be carried, and no advance was made, although five separate assaults were made upon the enemy's lines. On the night of the 12th, Johnston evacuated his position at Dalton, it having been flanked by the passage of Sherman's troops through Snake Creek Gap. Newton's division passed down the western slope of Rocky Face, and marched through Snake Creek Gap with Schofield's corps, re-joining the Fourth Corps at Resaca, to which place the Confederate army had fallen back and again intrenched itself—two lines of works extending from northeast to southwest in front of the town.

The attack on the enemy's position at Resaca was commenced on the morning of the 14th, Newton's division having joined Cox's, of Schofield's corps. The first assault on the works was made by Schofield, who succeeded in gaining the portion of advanced rifle-pits in his front, but, his ammunition failing, he could not hold them, and was relieved, brigade by brigade, by Newton. Harker's brigade relieved Manson's, of Cox's division, and held the pits, but with severe loss. Captain Thomas T. Lester, of Co. "K," was killed here, and twenty of the 51st were wounded. General Harker was injured during the movement, by the explosion of a shell.

Joining with the brigade in pursuit of the enemy, on the 16th, the regiment passed through Calhoun, Adairsville and Kingston, Hardee's rear guard being driven into Cassville on the 19th. The next day the Confederates crossed the Etowah, burning the railroad bridge behind them, and took up position at Allatoona Pass.

At the Etowah River, the Federal army rested till the 22d of May, when it moved toward Dallas, Ga. On the morning of the 25th, Hooker's Corps met, and had an engagement, with the enemy at New Hope Church, near Dallas. Newton's division came up to his support at six in the afternoon, forming on his left. There, intrenchments were thrown up, and the troops remained until Allatoona was flanked by the gradual movement of Sherman's troops to the left, and Johnston was forced to evacuate his position at New Hope Church and retire farther to the south, on the night of June 4. Although not in any serious engagement during these eleven days, the brigade was constantly exposed to the fire of the enemy, the opposing lines being so near each other that Confederate sharpshooters, enconced in their well protected lunettes, a little in advance of their main works, could pick off the Federal soldiers if they ventured outside the intrenchments. One officer and eleven men of the 51st were thus wounded.

The Fourth Corps moved from its position at New Hope Church on the 5th of June, and, on the 7th, was in camp at, and near, Ackworth, about ten miles below the Etowah River. There the army remained three days, and then moved, on the 10th, to near Pine Mountain, where the enemy had taken position and intrenched. On the 11th, the first train passed over the new Etowah bridge, and arrived at Big Shanty, once more bringing plentiful supplies to the Federal army.

During the night of the 14th, the Federal line having advanced toward the left of Pine Knob, the position was abandoned by the enemy, who fell back to his main line, a little distance south of the Marietta and Burnt Hickory road. A signal station was established on the Knob, and communication opened with Schofield to the right and McPherson to the left, and, on the afternoon of the 15th, the forward movement of the Fourth Corps again commenced; Newton's division leading the movement, Harker's brigade in advance, and the 51st and 42d Illinois deployed as skirmishers under command of Colonel Bradley. The Confederate pickets were soon encountered, and driven back about half a mile to their advanced works, which were composed of railway ties and situated on the west of a small ridge. There they took refuge, but were again driven from their shelter by the determined advance of the two regiments, which were ordered to secure, and hold, the works. Other regiments were thrown forward as skirmishers, the line advancing to within about a hundred yards of the enemy's main works, where a line of rifle-pits had been thrown up. From this position, the Federal skirmishers were withdrawn to the ridge held by Bradley, which was deemed so valuable that the whole line was advanced to, and occupied, it during the night, throwing up strong fortifications. The main line was not engaged on the 15th; the skirmishers, however, by their courage and gallantry, won high praise, the ridge being held by them despite a heavy fire from the enemy's artillery. Captain Albert M. Tilton, of Co. "C," 51st Illinois, was wounded in the engagement—the total loss of the regiment being thirteen, killed and wounded.

On June 17, the enemy again withdrew from the front of the corps, and concentrated around his last stronghold, north of Marietta—Kenesaw. There Sherman's army confronted Johnston's during two weeks; but it appeared futile to merely oppose the enemy, and it was determined to assault his works on Monday, the 27th of June. The attack on the left center was assigned to Newton's division; Harker's brigade formed the right of the storming column, Wagner's the left, and Kimball's the reserve.

The position to be carried was a ridge, on the crest of which were heavy fortifications, built in conformity with the most approved style of engineering, and in their front were the customary rifle-pits, filled with sharpshooters. The brigade charged across the intervening space, and scattering the rebel soldiers from their advanced pits, rushed on to the foot of the ridge. There a battery opened on its right, enflanking its ranks and mowing down the men by the scores; but, without wavering, the storming column moved up the slope, where many of the men, after endeavoring vainly to scale the works, took lodgment at their base, fighting desperately over the parapet. Driven back, bleeding and mangled by the terrible fire encountered on the crest of the ridge, General Harker gathered the remnant of his brigade for a last and desperate charge. The assault was made; but the brave leader, and many of his equally brave soldiers, fell at the foot of the works they valiantly, but vainly, strove to gain.

The 51st Illinois was one of the regiments conspicuous for its bravery in the attack, and its losses were severe. Among the killed, was the young and accomplished Adjutant, Henry W. Hall, of Chicago, who fell within a few rods of the intrenchments, while leading the regiment to the assault. So conspicuous was his courage and manly bearing that even the rebel officers and soldiers were forced to admire, and afterward expressed their regret at the necessity of firing on so brave a foe. Lieutenant Archibald L. McCormick, of Co. "E," was also killed, and two other officers were wounded. The total loss of the regiment was fifty-eight, killed and wounded.

Colonel Bradley succeeded General Harker in command of the Third Brigade, and was promoted brigadier-general on the 30th of the following month, when the command of the 51st devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Charles W. Davis, of Chicago.

On July 5, the Fourth Corps reached the Chattahoochee River, and on the 9th, Newton's division marched to Roswell, and crossed the river, to cover the crossing of cavalry. On the 13th, it re-joined the corps on the Buckhead road, and, on the 20th, crossed Peach Tree Creek, and took position on its southern bank, before the enemy's advanced line of defenses, in front of Atlanta. Howard had sent two of his divisions to the left the preceding day, in anticipation of an attack on that flank; and when the army had taken position south of Peach Tree Creek, there was an interval of about three miles between Newton and Schofield on his left. This gap Newton covered with pickets from his division, which lessened his force in front by three or four regiments. The left of his line covered the bridge over Peach Tree Creek, and the road on which the army trains of the Fourth Corps were gathered. About noon, on the 20th, the division advanced from the bank of the creek, deploying six regiments as skirmishers. In front of the division was a wooded ridge, upon the top of which was the first line of Confederate rifle-pits, their principal works being in the woods beyond. The Federal skirmishers speedily drove the occupants of the rifle-pits back upon their reserves, and Newton advanced his division to the ridge, which was within three hundred and fifty yards of the main rebel works. Line-of-battle was immediately formed, the formation taking the form of a "T"—the perpendicular stroke representing the Atlanta road, along which Bradley's brigade was formed, facing to the left; the right half of the horizontal line, the position of Kimball's brigade, to the right of the road; the left half, Blake's brigade. A section of artillery was in position on Bradley's left.

As soon as the ridge was occupied, Blake's and Kimball's brigades threw up a barricade of logs and earth in front of their lines. A fresh line of skirmishers was deployed in front of the division; and at about half-past three, just as it was ordered to advance, the heavy columns of the enemy emerged from the woods in front, and bore down upon Newton's front. The enemy did not wait to send forward a skirmish line, but charged in solid lines of battle, two and three deep. The skirmishers were driven in in disorder, rushing over the hastily constructed works, and for an instant—but only for an instant—throwing the right of Newton's line into confusion. Immediately after the rebel assault commenced, three regiments were sent from Bradley's brigade to the support of those in front, his remaining force forming in line-of-battle along the Atlanta and Buckhead road. Almost as soon as Walker's division struck Newton's front, a portion of Bate's division, penetrating the gap already mentioned at the left, confronted Bradley's command, with the design of gaining the bridge over Peach Tree Creek. This column of the enemy was routed and captured by Bradley's brigade, assisted by an extemporized regiment of non-combatants and stragglers, commanded by General Thomas in person, who had been watching the progress of the fight from a position in rear of Newton. Everywhere the Confederates were repulsed; and at nightfall, after repeated charges, they were driven back to their barricades, so shattered that they made no attempt to resist the advance of our troops on the following day.

The 51st, with its division, reached the rebel defenses in front of Atlanta on the 22d, and remained in the trenches it first occupied, with slight changes, until the movement to the west and rear of the city was commenced. On July 27, General D. S. Stanley took command of the Fourth Corps, with which the 51st participated in the movement on the Macon Railroad and Jonesboro'. The regiment also joined in the pursuit of the Confederate forces to Lovejoy's Station, after which the regiment returned to Atlanta, and went into camp, near that city, on September 8.

At Chattanooga, on October 18, one hundred and ninety-two drafted men joined the regiment, and, after a brief expedition to Alpine, Ga., the regiment, with Stanley's corps, joined Schofield's forces at Pulaski, Tenn., whence the united force fell back to Columbia on November 24. The Confederate army under Hood having advanced, Stanley was ordered forward to protect his trains, and Wagner's division, forming his advance, reached the town just as Forrest's cavalry was on the point of moving upon it. The cavalry was driven back, but the command was assailed soon after by a much stronger force of both cavalry and infantry. The Third Brigade lost one hundred and fifty killed and wounded, including General Bradley and Captain George I. Waterman, A.A.A.G. Fighting was kept up until dark, but the road was held until night, when the army trains and divisions of the Fourth and Twenty-third corps were on their way to Franklin, with Wagner's division acting as rear guard. At noon, the division reached Franklin, before which Cox's division of the Twenty-third Corps had already thrown up a line of slight intrenchments.

At about half-past three, Hood's whole army appeared in front of this little advanced force. Stewart's, Cheatham's, Lee's and Forrest's corps swept down the pikes in magnificent array, their lines reaching almost as far as the eye could reach. At this crisis, through some strange fatality or misapprehension, the two advanced brigades, which were to retire within the defenses if the enemy appeared in force, were ordered "Forward." Of course they were hurled back, and driven, routed, through the center of the main line. It could not be otherwise—the panic reached the regiments to the right and left of the Columbia pike, behind the defenses; and as they fell back, the Confederate host poured in, planted their flag on the breast-works, and attempted to form on the inside. How what seemed irremediable disaster was turned to victory by the heroic charge of Wagner's First Brigade, led by the fearless Opdycke, has often been told. The advantage that Hood had gained he soon lost, and the Federal lines were not again broken. Although the Federal loss was great, the loss of the Confederates was vastly greater, Hood reporting it at four thousand five hundred, including one major-general and four brigadier-generals killed, and as many wounded. The loss in Bradley's brigade was very severe—the 51st, alone, losing Lieutenant Calvin H. Thomas, Co. "H," killed; Captain Albert M. Tilton, of Co. "C"; and Lieutenants Jesse Johnson, Co. "A," and Charles F. Hills, Co. "K," both of Chicago, wounded; fifty-two privates killed and wounded, and ninety-eight missing, mostly prisoners. General Stanley was severely wounded, and General T. J. Wood took command of the Fourth Corps. The battle raged furiously until late in the evening, when Hood withdrew; and, at midnight, Schofield's little army also withdrew from the defenses at Franklin, crossed the Harpeth, and, about noon on the following day, reached Nashville.

The 51st was engaged in the battles before Nashville, December 15–16, but escaped with light loss. On the 17th, it joined in the pursuit of the defeated rebels through Brentwood Pass, and southward to Lexington, where it was learned that Hood had crossed the Tennessee at Bambridge; but, on December 8, pursuit was discontinued and Wood's corps (Fourth) was sent to Huntsville to garrison that post, where it remained until spring.

On March 31, 1865, the 51st, with its division, moved to Greenville, East Tennessee. It was there joined by Co. "I," which had been mustered into service at Camp Butler, March 28, under Captain Henry Augustine. On April 15, the 51st moved to Nashville, where, on June 15, Co. "F," Lieutenant James Skidmore, commanding, was mustered out of service. On June 16, the regiment moved from Nashville, under orders to report at New Orleans, and was sent thence to Texas, embarking July 28, and disembarking at Port Lavacca on the 31st. After remaining a brief time at Camp Placidor, it moved to Camp Irwin, where it was mustered out of service, September 25, 1865, and left Texas for home, arriving at Camp Butler, Springfield, Ill., where it received final payment and discharge, October 15, 1865.

COLONEL GILBERT W. CUMMING was born in Stanford, Delaware Co., N. Y. In early life he entered the ranks of the New York State Militia as a private, and because of his energy and talent was promoted to the colonelcy of his regiment, holding the office for six years. In 1858, he removed to Chicago and engaged in the practice of law, wherein he continued until he was made colonel of the 51st. He was a thorough disciplinarian and tactician and a very popular officer. Ill health obliged him to resign his command in the fall of 1862, when Lieutenant-Colonel Bradley succeeded to the command of the regiment.

GENERAL LUTHER P. BRADLEY was born in New Haven, Conn., and in his early manhood held various offices in the militia of his native State. In 1855, he settled in Chicago and for several years was connected with the firm of Munson & Bradley, as book-keeper. His early military proficiency becoming known to his friends, they solicited him to accept a captain's commission in Co. "D," 1st Illinois State Militia. This he did, and from that position was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the "Chicago Legion," when it was organized. On the resignation of Colonel Cumming September 30, 1862, he was promoted colonel of his regiment, and after the battle of Stone River was acting commander of the Third Brigade, Sheridan's division, receiving his commission as brigadier July 30, 1864. During the preceding campaign with Sheridan, and through the Atlanta campaign, under General John Newton, both General Bradley and the brigade he so ably led were conspicuous for bravery and faithful service in whatever position the fortune of war might place them.

MAJOR SAMUEL B. RAYMOND was born in Otsego County, N. Y., and came to Chicago in 1848. He was for a time a printer in the Western Citizen office, and subsequently became engaged in mercantile pursuits; and, still later, was associated with Hubbard & Hunt in the insurance business. He held the office of captain of the Citizens' Fire Brigade two years. Upon the fall of Sumter, he organized the "Anderson Rifles," which he brought to a remarkable condition of efficiency. He was elected lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Regiment of State Militia, from which he was transferred to the position of major of the 51st. On September 30, 1862, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel; resigning therefrom October 6, 1863.

ADJUTANT CHARLES W. DAVIS was a native of Concord, Mass., coming to Chicago in 1854, and remaining with S. C. Griggs & Co. (publishers) for five years. Adjutant Davis was promoted major September 30, 1862, lieutenant-colonel October 6, 1863, and colonel, May 11, 1865.

CHAPLAIN LEWIS RAYMOND was born in Walton, Delaware Co., N. Y. He had two sons in the 51st; one, Major Samuel B. Raymond, another a private in Co. "K." Rev. Mr. Raymond came to the West in 1853, being for five years pastor of a Baptist Church in Milwaukee, and also pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Chicago. He remained with the 51st, sharing its dangers and hardships, until November 6, 1864, when he resigned at Chattanooga.

QUARTERMASTER HENRY HOWLAND was born in Conway, Mass. He had been a resident of Chicago several years, engaged in the lumber business. He was a good business man and a prominent member of the Young Men's Association. He was promoted brigade quartermaster June 9, 1862.

FIFTY-SEVENTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

The organization of the 57th Illinois Infantry was commenced in Chicago by Colonel Silas D. Baldwin, formerly Inspector of First Brigade, at Cairo, Ill., on September 24, 1861. This regiment, known in the city as the "National Guards," was mustered into service December 26, 1861, the following officers being residents of Chicago:

Field and Staff.—Colonel, Silas D. Baldwin; Lieutenant-Colonel, Frederick J. Hurlbut; Adjutant, Norman E. Hahn; Quartermaster, Edward Hamilton; First Assistant-Surgeon, Henry S. Blood.

Line Officers.—Co. "C": Captain, William S. Swan; First Lieutenant, Robert B. Morse; Second Lieutenants, Moses S. Lord and Frederick Laycock. Co. "E": Captain, Robert D. Adams; First Lieutenants, Bradley D. Salter, David Kenyon, Edward Martin and John E. Delear; Second Lieutenants, William Wayman and Thomas Laverty. Co. "G": Captain, Gustav A. Busse; First Lieutenant, Fritz Busse. Co. "I": Captain, Benjamin H. Chadburn; First Lieutenant, Theodore M. Doggett.

The regiment, armed with French Minié rifles, and with a pioneer force attached, which was equipped by the colonel at his own expense, left Chicago for Cairo on February 8, 1862, numbering, at that time, nine hundred and seventy-five men. From Cairo, the regiment was hurried forward to Fort Donelson, where it was attached to Colonel John M. Thayer's (Third) brigade, General Lew Wallace's (Third) division, and under that officer, participated in the three days' battle before that stronghold.

On the capitulation of Fort Donelson, it marched back to Fort Henry, and encamped about a month; when it embarked with General C. F. Smith's division for Pittsburg Landing, having been assigned to Sweeney's (Third) brigade, Second Division, Army of the Tennessee, which occupied the center of the line-of-battle at Pittsburg Landing. With the Second Division, commanded by General W. H. L. Wallace, General Smith being extremely ill, the 57th participated in the battle of Shiloh. At half-past eight, on the morning of April 6, 1862, the division moved from its camp, on the plateau between the Tennessee and Briar Creek, to the support of Prentiss's division, which had already been driven back through its camp, with the loss of nearly all its artillery, and had again formed along an old sunken road, extending from Briar Creek on the left nearly to the Corinth road on the right. The Second Division was formed on Prentiss's right, and extended from the Corinth road northwesterly, behind a clear field, to the head of a deep ravine, or gorge, filled with a tangled impenetrable thicket. Sweeney's brigade formed the right of Wallace's line, its right resting on the ravine mentioned, which ran far to the rear of the brigade. Along the edge of this gorge, which the Confederates called the "Hornet's Nest," General Wallace posted a line of sharpshooters. All through the day, from morning until half-past four in the afternoon, the Confederates made vain attempts to advance up the slope of this deadly ravine. Gladden's, A. P. Stewart's, Gibson's and Hindman's brigades were successively hurled down the slope by the fearful fire of musketry and artillery along the line of Wallace's division. Finally, the concentric fire of eleven Confederate batteries was directed on the one remaining battery of Prentiss, which was posted at the right of the Corinth road where his line joined Wallace's, and it had to be withdrawn. At about the same time, Hurlbut, at the left of Prentiss, gave way, and the enemy, under Bragg, following the advantage, passed to his rear; another division poured through the gap left on Wallace's right by the withdrawal of McClernand, and passed to the plateau between him and his camp, while another force under Polk was hurled against the front of the two divisions.

Thus encircled, General Wallace ordered his command to cut its way, through the enemy in the rear, to the landing. Colonel Sweeney had been wounded, and Colonel Baldwin, of the 57th, was in command of the right brigade. The 50th and 57th Illinois, with Colonel Baldwin, faced the fire in their rear, and escaped to the landing. The 58th Illinois and 8th Iowa, of the same brigade, were captured. General Wallace fell mortally wounded, and his body could not be brought from the field. The 57th Illinois lost in the engagement one hundred and eighty-seven officers and men, killed, wounded and missing, among whom were Major Norman B. Page, Captain Robert D. Adams, Co. "D," and Lieutenant Theodore M. Doggett, Co. "I," killed; and Lieutenant William Kendrick, Co. "I," taken prisoner while ministering to his dying friend. Captain William S. Swan was seriously wounded, and returned, after the battle, to Chicago, re-joining his regiment as soon as his wounds permitted.

The 57th, with other regiments and detachments that succeeded in reaching the vicinity of the landing, formed a new line under General Hurlbut, in support of Colonel Webster's artillery, which was posted on a commanding position about half a mile from the river. This last position was attacked by Withers's and Chalmers's Confederate commands, which were speedily drawn back, and the contest for the day was ended.

On Monday, April 7, the 57th, with other regiments of Wallace's division, commanded by Colonel J. M. Tuttle, of the 7th Iowa, acted as support to Nelson's division of Buell's army.

On the reorganization of the army by Halleck, Brigadier-General T. A. Davies was assigned to the command of the Second Division of the Army of the Tennessee. Colonel Baldwin remained in command of the Third Brigade, consisting of the 7th, 50th, and 57th Illinois regiments. The regiment afterward participated in the laborious advance to Corinth, and there went into camp near the town, until the following October.

On September 28, 1862, General Van Dorn, having concentrated his forces at Ripley, Miss., moved northeast, to attack Rosecrans at Corinth. On the night of October 2, he bivouacked at Chewalla, and early the following morning arrived before the old Confederate line of defenses around Corinth. During the night of October 2, Rosecrans issued his orders for the formation of his line of defense. His divisions were directed to move forward and take position in advance of his inner line of redoubts, which were within a short distance of the town—Hamilton's division on the right, Davies's in the center, and McKean's (Sixth) on the left—on the Chewalla road, with three regiments of Oliver's brigade advanced to the outer line of works. About nine o'clock, Van Dorn, advancing from Chewalla, attacked McKean's outposts, and he sent to General Davies an urgent demand for reinforcements. The Third Brigade, Colonel Baldwin, was detached from the Second Division, and moved to the support of Colonel Oliver, who was posted on a hill near the intersection of the Memphis Railroad with the outer line of works. A severe contest took place on his outer line, Lovell's Confederate division attacking McKean's regiments, and finally outflanking them on the right, penetrating between them and Davies.

The Third Brigade, with the rest of the advance troops, was compelled to retire; and, with McArthur's brigade, it formed a new line south of the Memphis Railroad, in rear of Battery "F," about three miles from Corinth. In this position the Third Brigade was on the right of McKean's line. At about two o'clock p. m., Davies's division had been forced back, leaving a gap upon McKean's right, of which the enemy took advantage, gaining the camps of McArthur's brigade and threatening to outflank the entire division. Baldwin's brigade, and the 17th Wisconsin of McArthur's brigade, were ordered to charge. Advancing rapidly, they drove a Mississippi brigade from, and a half mile beyond, the Federal camps, and re-captured several sections of artillery. The Confederates again advanced in force, and the brigade was ordered to fall back to division line; after which it fell still farther back, to the vicinity of Battery Phillips, southwest of Corinth. During the night, the brigade re-joined its division, and moved to the north of the town where Davies's division was formed, with its right resting on Battery Powell, its left on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. The Third Brigade, then reduced to about nine hundred men, occupied a position somewhat advanced, in the center of Davies's line. At about nine o'clock on October 4, the Confederates, under General Green, advanced, from the woods, north to Corinth, directing the weight of their attack on the right of Davies and Battery Powell, which latter was soon, in their possession. The division was ordered to fall back, as the battery, if turned upon them, would enfilade the entire works. Baldwin's brigade fell back about two hundred and fifty yards, and there re-formed, maintaining that position and keeping up a steady fire, until the troops at the right had re-captured the battery and turned its guns on the enemy, when it moved forward and occupied its first line. The attack of Maury's troops on Davies's left reached the Third Brigade. The Confederates were driven back, followed by the brigade on a counter-charge, until it found itself under the fire of its own batteries. The loss of the 57th in the two days' engagements was forty-two, killed and wounded, Colonel Baldwin being among the latter.

The next day after the battle, Captain Swan was placed in command of the prison, and, with a detachment from the 57th regiment, guarded the prisoners until they were exchanged at Vicksburg, on the 18th of the month. These numbered about eleven hundred men. About the 15th, the balance of the regiment escorted the remaining prisoners to Guntown, Miss., where they were also exchanged.

The brigade pursued the enemy as far as Ruckersville, Miss., returning to camp at Corinth, October 12. On December 18, it went on a scout to Lexington, Tenn., marched thence to Henderson Station, on the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, and afterward returned to Corinth, forming a part of its garrison during the year.

Colonel Moses M. Bane, of the 50th Illinois, wounded at Shiloh, having returned to the field, assumed command as ranking officer of the Third Brigade, which was enlarged by the addition of the 39th Iowa and 18th Missouri regiments. On April 15, 1863, the brigade, under General G. M. Dodge, moved toward Tusculumbia, Ala., and marched through Iuka, Glendale and Burnsville to Bear Creek, on the Alabama line, arriving on the evening of the 16th. On the 17th, a bridge, made from the timbers of a log house in the vicinity, under the supervision of Colonel Rowett, was constructed across the stream at Town Creek, over which a line of skirmishers and artillery was thrown, and the enemy dislodged from the opposite bank. The command then moved forward to Cherokee, where it had a sharp skirmish with a portion of Forrest's cavalry. On the 25th, Dodge connected with Streight's command at Tusculumbia, which moved the following day on its ill-fated expedition into Georgia. The 57th, with Dodge's troops, moved, on the 27th, to Town Creek, where, after nearly a day's skirmishing, it gained possession of the railroad bridge, effected a crossing, and drove the enemy three miles. On the 29th, the command returned to Tusculumbia, and thence to Corinth, arriving on May 3.

The regiment remained in camp at Corinth until November 4, when, with Dodge's entire command, it moved eastward, arriving at Pulaski, Tenn., November 11. It was then assigned to outpost duty at Linnville, on the Nashville & Decatur Railroad, twelve miles from Pulaski, where, on January 17, 1863, all of the regiment, except Co. "C," which remained in Tennessee, re-enlisted for a further term of three years, and the following day it proceeded, via Nashville, to Chicago on veteran furlough, arriving on the 27th.

Among the changes in the regiment, which returned under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel F. J. Hurlbut, were the following: Lieutenant W. F. Conkey, Co. "A," had been appointed general superintendent of contrabands in Tennessee; Lieutenant J. W. Harris, Co. "F," superintendent of contraband camp at Pulaski, Tenn.; Lieutenant F. Busse, Co. "G," to situation in navy-yard at Memphis; Lieutenant J. Weyrick, Co. "H," quartermaster of Third Brigade, Third Division. The regiment left again for the field on March 9, having received two hundred and fifty new recruits while at Chicago, raising its number to four hundred and ninety. On the 15th, it reached Athens, Ala., and was garrisoned there until May 1, when it joined Sherman's army at Chattanooga, and moved with Bane's (Third) brigade, Sweeney's Second division, Sixteenth Corps (General Dodge), on the Atlanta campaign.

The Second Division, with the Army of the Tennessee, moved to the range of hills overlooking Resaca, Ga., from which the enemy was dislodged by the division. On the evacuation of Resaca by Johnston, May 15, Sweeney's division was ordered to lay a pontoon bridge across the Oostenaula River at Lay's Ferry, and throw out a column on the main road toward Calhoun, to harass and retard the retreat of the Confederates. The bridge was laid, and the division started toward Calhoun in pursuit, encountering the enemy at Rome Cross Roads, where an engagement occurred, which lasted until nearly night. The enemy were driven by the Second Division, which then marched to Kingston, and thence to Rome, where, on May 22, it captured many prisoners. Bane's brigade garrisoned Rome until October.

In the reorganization of the army, at the conclusion of the siege of Atlanta, the Sixteenth was consolidated with the Fifteenth Corps, under the latter designation. The Second Division of the Sixteenth Corps was merged in the Fourth Division, under General J. M. Corse; the 57th then being in the Third Brigade, Fourth Division, Fifteenth Army Corps. On September 29, 1864, General Corse reached Rome with the balance of his division, and assumed command of the post. The same day, he received a telegram from General Sherman, intimating that Hood was crossing the Chattahoochee in the direction of Blue Mountain, and directing him to watch for the appearance of the enemy in the neighborhood of Cedar-town. Spies and scouts were sent out from Rome in every direction; the 9th Illinois Mounted-Infantry made frequent reconnoissances, but nothing definite was learned until the 2d of October, when it was ascertained that Wheeler's cavalry had destroyed the railroad near Big Shanty, and had moved to assault Dalton. The same day, the Confederates captured a train near Ackworth, and tore up the railroad at a point three miles south of Allatoona. On the 4th, General Sherman signalled from Kenesaw, to Corse at Rome, that Hood was moving to Allatoona; and ordered him to move at once, with his whole force, to reinforce the garrison at that point, which consisted of a small force under Colonel Tourtelotte. On the same evening, October 4, General Corse, with the 39th Iowa, Lieutenant-Colonel Redfield commanding; 7th Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Rowett commanding; 15th Illinois, Lieutenant-Colonel Hanna commanding; Cos. "A" and "B," 57th Illinois, Major Eric Fosse commanding—all of the Third Brigade, Colonel Rowett—started for Allatoona, where the command arrived at one a. m. on the morning of the 5th, and immediately started the train back to Rome for the remainder of the brigade. On its return, a break in the road, caused by the heavy rains, delayed the train, and the remaining companies of the 57th, under Lieutenant-Colonel Hurlbut, did not arrive at Allatoona until about eight o'clock p. m. of the 5th.

Soon after the arrival of General Corse with reinforcements, Colonel Tourtelotte's pickets were driven in. At daybreak, the two companies of the 57th Illinois, under Captain Vansteinburg, of Co. "B," with some companies of the 39th Iowa, were sent forward by Colonel Rowett to the skirmish line, on the right of the railroad. General Corse moved his troops, under cover of the skirmishers, from the town to the summit of the ridge, east and west of the cut, where two small redoubts had been constructed, one on either side of the cut. He formed line-of-battle with the 39th Iowa and 7th Illinois, under Colonel Rowett (later reinforced by detachments of the 12th, 15th and 93d Illinois), on the west ridge, Colonel Tourtelotte's command holding the east redoubt. At about nine o'clock, the skirmishers were driven in, and took position in the rifle-pits surrounding the redoubt. French's Confederate division, under Generals Young and Sears, moved immediately on Corse's position, their line extending from the railroad on the south, in a half-circle around to the west, and to a considerable distance over, and beyond, the railroad on the north. General French, after thus surrounding the little force, called upon General Corse to surrender, "to avoid a needless effusion of blood," giving him five minutes to decide. The brave commander quickly replied that his command was "prepared for the needless effusion of blood," and continued his preparations for the terrible contest that he knew was at hand.

The fighting for the next two hours, in the words of General Corse, "was of a most extraordinary character." Young's Texas brigade attacked from the south and west; Sears and Cockerall from the west and north; the weight of the assault falling on the right of Corse's line. By eleven o'clock a. m., the ranks of the Confederates were so broken that they were obliged to reform for a regular assault on the fort; to which, and to the trenches surrounding it, Corse's command was by that time withdrawn. There the contest was renewed and continued without cessation until nearly four o'clock p. m., when the enemy was finally repulsed, after one of the most heroic struggles of the war. Cos. "A" and "B," 57th Illinois, fought in the west redoubt, after being driven back from the skirmish-line, and met the following losses:

Co. "A": killed, Thomas Ward, Phillip Bohaler; wounded, Thomas Minza; missing, William Duell. Co. "B": killed, Michael White; wounded, Lieutenant G. N. Barr, Corporal Hiram Lewis, Privates John James, John W. Clark, Granville Garo, George H. Guler.

Colonel Richard Rowett, commanding the Third Brigade, was seriously wounded, and the command thereof devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel F. J. Hurlbut, 57th Illinois, who reached Allatoona with the balance of the regiment on the evening of the 5th—a break in the railroad, as above narrated, preventing his earlier arrival. During the night of the 5th, that part of the regiment which had recently arrived was employed in digging rifle-pits; and on the morning of the 6th, there being no signs of the enemy, details were sent out to bury the dead and bring in the wounded. On the 7th, the brigade marched to Cartersville, and the next day to Kingston, where one company of the 57th was left in charge of prisoners captured at Allatoona. The rest of the regiment, with the Third Brigade, arrived at Rome on the 9th, and went into camp.

On October 13, it moved with the brigade six miles out from Rome, on the Cave Spring Road, and met the enemy, who was on his northward march, driving him several miles, with a loss to the regiment of seven men, killed and wounded.

On November 10, with General Corse's division, it commenced the march from Rome to Atlanta, and thence, with Sherman's army, moved, on the 15th, toward Savannah, arriving in front of that city December 10. On January 27, 1865, it marched north with its division, and was engaged, on the 19th, 20th and 21st of February, at Bentonville, reaching Goldsboro', on the 24th. It moved on the 10th of April to Raleigh, and, after Johnston's surrender, to Richmond and Washington, where it participated in the grand review, on May 24, and in June moved to Louisville, Ky. It there remained with the Fifteenth Corps until July, when it returned to Chicago, arriving on the evening of the 8th, via the Chicago, New Albany & Louisville Railroad.

The boys disembarked at the crossing near Camp Douglas, and immediately marched to barracks provided for them in the eastern part of the enclosure, being shortly thereafter mustered out.

Following is a partial roster of its officers at the time of the regiment's return:

SILAS D. BALDWIN was born in New Haven, Conn., January 15, 1821; a son of Anni and Martha (Smith) Baldwin. His father was a farmer, and a brave soldier of the war of 1812. Silas attended the district schools, and when only eight years of age raised a company of his comrades—fifty strong. He was cadet, for some three or four years, a member of the New Haven academy. In fact, from boyhood he evinced that military capacity which was his dominant characteristic in after life. When he was only eighteen years of age, he went South, located in Franklin, La., and opened a large general store at that place, where he remained for five years, receiving, in 1841, his first baptism as a military man. During that year, Governor Roman appointed him a captain and military instructor in St. Mary's Parish. The Comanche Indians were then giving the early settlers much trouble, and Captain Baldwin, as a bright, dashing young officer, played no unimportant part in several celebrated rescues, notably the "Bob Walker" affair. In the fall of 1839, just previous to his departure for Louisiana, Captain Baldwin had married Miss Lucy Ann Hill, a native of Guilford, Conn. On September 8, 1843, he had the misfortune to lose his young wife, who was buried at Bayou Atchafalaya. In that locality, Captain Baldwin attempted to establish a plantation. His inexperience, especially in Southern agricultural matters, caused him to fail in this undertaking, and, in 1845, he returned to New Haven, removing soon afterward to Bridgeport. At these two cities he engaged in the boot and shoe business, and was proprietor, at the latter city, of the Tremont House, among the best known railroad hotels in the State. Mr. Baldwin remained in Bridgeport from 1846 to 1857, marrying his second and his present wife, the year succeeding his settlement there, Miss Mary C. Hall. While a resident of Bridgeport, he organized the Eagle Guards, subsequently changed to Washington Light Guards, a military organization famous throughout that part of the country. Of the sixty members of the company who received instruction from him, forty-two became commissioned officers in the War of the Rebellion. He became its commander, and then was appointed lieutenant-colonel and colonel of the 8th Connecticut Regiment. At the time Colonel Baldwin decided to come West, in 1857, he resigned his military office. Locating in Milwaukee, Wis., he engaged in the manufacture of gas machines, governors and other apparatus, having obtained patents on many important improvements. From that time until the present he has followed this line of business, and now is in receipt of a very comfortable royalty from his patents, especially as regards improvements in gas and gasoline machines and burners. In Milwaukee, he also continued his career as a military man, becoming connected with the Light Guards, one of the finest organizations in the State, and acting for a portion of the time as its instructor. Coming to Chicago in the fall of 1860, he remained in this city for about a year. In the winter of 1861, he went to New York, with the idea of establishing himself in that city. In April, however, when Fort Sumter was fired upon, he returned to Chicago, and, although a staunch Democrat, entered heart, body and soul into the Union cause, being among those who most strenuously insisted upon the possession of Cairo as a strategic point for the Federal cause. He therefore assisted in organizing the first expedition that left Chicago for that place, having charge of the troops and train, in his position of brigade inspector and military instructor. Smith's battery was also with this expedition. While stationed at this point, his principal duties were confined to stopping boats coming down the river and preventing express offices from sending packages across the river into Kentucky, the neutral State. General Baldwin had the honor of firing upon a steamer belonging to Kentucky, the first boat which was brought to by a Union shell, and for his temerity a demand was made upon General Prentiss, the commander at Cairo, for "the man that fired the shot," but he refused on the grounds that he was not responsible to any one but his Government. General Baldwin was mustered out of the three-months service, and returned to Chicago, where he raised the 57th Illinois Infantry. Returning to Chicago at the close of the war, he continued to engage in the improvement and manufacture of gas apparatus. In February 1879, the city government recognized his ability in this line by appointing him gas inspector. General Baldwin joined the Masonic Order as early as 1852, becoming a member of St. John's Lodge, No. 3. He still takes a decided stand with the patriotic element of the Democratic party, being one of the founders of the National Veteran Association, organized in the spring of 1884. Five children have been born to him,—only one, Robert Hall Baldwin, who was born February 8, 1867, is now living.

FIFTY-EIGHTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE FIFTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT, or "McCLELLAN BRIGADE," was organized at Camp Douglas, Chicago, December 25, 1861, and there mustered into United States service, January 25, 1862. It was then composed of nine companies, the remaining company ("H") not being mustered in until February 7, 1862. Of the field and staff officers, Adjutant Lewis H. Martin, Quartermaster George Sawin and Assistant Surgeon George F. Heideman were Chicago men. Cos. "B," "D" and "F" were raised, and mainly officered, in Chicago; Cos. "A," "C," "E" and "H" partially so. Following is the original roster of the regiment:

Field and Staff.—Colonel, William F. Lynch; Lieutenant-Colonel, Isaac Rutishauser; Major, Thomas Newlan; Adjutant, Lewis H. Martin; Quartermaster, George Sawin; Surgeon, Henry M. Crawford; Chaplain, Patrick J. R. Murphy.

Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, Robert W. Healy; First Lieutenant, Eugene Lynch; Second Lieutenant, Hiram M. Van Arman. Co. "B": Captain, Thomas D. Griffin; First Lieutenant, Abraham Vanderburgh; Second Lieutenant, John W. Babbit. Co. "C"; Captain, George W. Kittell; First Lieutenant, Sanford W. Smith; Second Lieutenant, Joseph G. Burt. Co. "D": Captain, Nicklaus Nicklaus; First Lieutenant, George Glassner; Second Lieutenant, Gustav C. Kothe. Co. "E": Captain, Karl A. Rutishauser; First Lieutenant, Charles Kittell; Second Lieutenant, Joseph Stauffer. Co. "F": Captain, Frederick Kurth; First Lieutenant, Julius Kurth; Second Lieutenant, Louis W. Pfeif. Co. "G": Captain, James A. Bewley; First Lieutenant, Loring P. Fuller; Second Lieutenant, Robert H. Winslow. Co. "H": Captain, Lawrence Collins; First Lieutenant, John C. Loneragan, Second Lieutenant, Danforth L. Scott. Co. "I": Captain Philip R. Heelan; First Lieutenant, David J. Lynch; Second Lieutenant, Job Moxom. Co. "K": Captain, Patrick Gregg; First Lieutenant, John Tobin; Second Lieutenant, John W. Gregg.

The 58th Illinois was composed of the best material; its officers were educated men, and many of them, being men of means, contributed largely to the support of the regiment while in camp.

Colonel Lynch was educated at the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind., as was Captain Robert W. Healy, of Chicago. Captain Gregg, Co. "K," was a graduate of the Royal College of Surgery, Dublin; Captain Kittell, Co. "C," a graduate of Rush Medical College, Chicago; Lieutenant McArthur, a student of Oberlin College; and Lieutenants (afterward captains) Fuller and Winslow were clergymen. Lieutenant Joseph G. Burt, of Chicago, afterward adjutant, raised Co. "C," of which he was elected lieutenant. He received four wounds at the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and at the latter battle was captured. After months of imprisonment, he was released on parole, and reached Chicago in company with General Prentiss, Colonel Lynch and others. He soon had a return of an illness contracted during his captivity, and died at his home in Chicago, November 9, 1862.

On February 11, 1862, before the regiment was thoroughly organized, virtually without arms, and with only a few weeks' drill or discipline, it was ordered to the front. Reaching Cairo on the 12th, it reported to General E. A. Paine, was assigned to the Third Brigade (Colonel J. M. Thayer), Third Division (General Lew Wallace), and immediately embarked on the steamer "Fanny Bullitt," for Fort Donelson; where it arrived at midnight of the 13th. On the following morning, it was temporarily assigned to Lauman's brigade, Second Division, General C. F. Smith, and a portion of the regiment was detailed for skirmish duty during the day. On the 15th, it joined its own brigade, with which it participated in the attack on the enemy's left, in which all the ground previously lost by McClernand was recovered, and the brigade advanced to within one hundred and fifty yards of the intrenchments, holding the position until the capitulation. The regiment suffered at Fort Donelson more than others which had been longer in service. The boys were unprovided with haversacks, and fell short of rations; their arms were worthless; and, in common with the rest, they were without tents or fires. The weather, which had been mild and pleasant, changed during the battle to a cold, sleety storm, with a northwest wind, which rendered the sufferings of those not yet inured to camp life almost unbearable; yet the new regiment bore these hardships with courage and cheerfulness. Fort Donelson capitulated on the morning of the 16th, and the 58th, with its command, after remaining there until the 18th, moved to Fort Henry, arriving at noon on the 19th.

With Colonel Thayer's brigade, it embarked at Fort Henry, on the transport "Boston," and ascended the Tennessee to Crump's Landing, about four miles above Savannah, where the division of Lew Wallace disembarked, and, on March 12, was marched to Purdy, some twelve miles southwest, where it destroyed the railroad, and the same evening returned to the transports. The following morning, it went into camp about a half-mile from Crump's Landing, where it remained until the 29th, when it proceeded to Pittsburg Landing, to join the division of General W. H. L. Wallace (commanding in place of General C. F. Smith, who was, at that time, sick, and soon after died). It was assigned to the Third Brigade, Colonel T. W. Sweeny, and went into camp near the Landing, where it received new arms, and remained until the 6th, engaged in perfecting its organization and in drill.

On the morning of the 6th, the 58th was ordered to move forward on the main road from the Landing, and take up a position there with the 7th Illinois, in support of a battery. This position they held, with some slight changes, until four o'clock in the afternoon. The battery was once charged, and retreated, leaving one gun on the field, which the two regiments took possession of, and held. As the forces gave way to the right and left, the regiment took possession of a log-house, to its left, and, shielded by that and a pile of cotton bales, again made a stand. This position was held some fifteen minutes, when it was flanked, both on right and left, with large forces of the enemy in the rear. Orders were given by Colonel Lynch to the regiment to cut its way through, but only enough to form three companies succeeded in the attempt. The rest were wounded or taken prisoners.

Two officers and twenty-five privates were killed, and two hundred and twenty-three of the regiment, including the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major and adjutant, were captured. Eight officers were wounded, as were a large proportion of the privates, who were taken prisoners. Among the officers killed were Lieutenant Louis W. Pfeif, Co. "F," Chicago, and Captain James A. Bewley, Co. "G," of Dement. Captain Karl Rutishauser, Co. "E," and Lieutenant John C. Loneragan, Co. "H," died of wounds, received in the engagement, soon afterward. The captured men were confined in various rebel prisons at Mobile, Selma, Montgomery, and other points, in Alabama, and at Macon, Griffin and Madison, Ga., for about seven months, their number being reduced in that time, in consequence of privation and cruel treatment, to one hundred and thirty.

On the 17th of October, 1862, these were gathered in Libby Prison, Richmond, Va., where they were paroled and sent to Annapolis. They returned to Illinois in December, reaching Camp Butler, Springfield, on the 23d. The officers were paroled on October 15, 1862. That portion of the regiment not captured at Shiloh, with fragments of the 8th, 12th and 44th Iowa, all of Wallace's division, were formed into the "Union Brigade"; the detachment of the 58th being under command of Captain Robert W. Healey, Co. "A," the ranking officer remaining to the regiment. Under him the command participated in the siege of Corinth, and in the pursuit of Beauregard's forces as far as Jonesville, Miss.

One company of the 58th was engaged at Iuka, losing seventeen in wounded and prisoners, and it also participated in the battle of Corinth, October 3 and 4.

The regiment was re-united at Camp Butler, in December, 1862, where it remained until June 28, 1863, Colonel Lynch being in command of the post. During this time its ranks were again filled, and it was thoroughly organized and drilled. During the remainder of the year, portions of the regiment garrisoned Cairo, Mound City, Paducah, and Mayfield, Ky. Cos. "A" and "B," stationed at Mayfield, on November 9, had a sharp skirmish with a party of guerrillas, pursuing them to a point on Obion River, four miles from Union City, Tenn., where, in attempting to cross the river, the rebels were routed with a loss of eleven killed and fifty-three captured. In December, the same companies had another encounter, in aid of the loyal citizens of Mayfield, in which another gang of guerrillas, which had been prowling about the neighborhood, committing depredations on the property of Unionists, and threatening their lives, was routed and driven from the neighborhood, the detachment losing several of its number in killed, wounded and captured; of the latter, five captives belonged to Co. "B" (Chicago), and were all recovered the following day.

January 1, 1864, the regiment concentrated at Cairo, where the men re-enlisted as veterans. Colonel Lynch was promoted to be commander of the First Brigade, Third Division, Sixteenth Army Corps, the 58th being commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Rutishauser. On January 21, the regiment proceeded to Vicksburg, where it joined General Sherman's forces, and, on February 3, with Smith's division, left Vicksburg on the famous raid through Mississippi, known as the "Meridian raid," reaching Meridian on the morning of the 15th, having marched, in the eleven days, about one hundred and sixty miles, passing through Clinton, Jackson, Brandon, Hillsboro' and Decatur, and routing the enemy in various skirmishes. At Meridian, the arsenal, railroad buildings and commissary stores were destroyed, and, on the 20th, the expedition started on its return to Vicksburg, reaching there on March 2. During the return march, some five thousand contrabands joined the army, who were sent in advance of the troops.

On March 10, the 58th, with General Smith's forces, embarked for General Banks's Red River expedition. Proceeding up the Red River and the Atchafalaya, the troops reached Simsport, La., on the 12th, where they disembarked, and the next morning the regiment marched up the Atchafalaya River, to the embouchure of the Bayou Glaize (Yellow Bayou). At Simsport, it was decided that the forces under General Smith should march overland to Fort DeRussy, thirty-five miles distant, while the gunboats proceeded up the Red River to co-operate with them at that point. The column started at night of the 13th, and reached the fort at three o'clock the following afternoon—re-building a bridge and repelling several threatened attacks of the enemy's cavalry during the march.

Fort De Russy, which consisted of two distinct and formidable earth-works, connected by a covered way, and mounting two field and two siege guns at the time of its capture, was situated about a quarter of a mile from the bank of the Red River on the slope of a ridge, and had a casemated battery of three guns commanding the river. As General Smith's column approached the fort, it opened with its four guns, all it had at command—firing shells and shrapnel. The cannonading was answered by the Federal column, and after it had continued two hours, a line of skirmishers was sent forward. In the midst of the heavy fusillade that followed, the 58th Illinois and 8th Wisconsin were ordered to lead a charge on the works. Just as the two regiments reached the ditch, the garrison surrendered, and the colors of the 58th were the first planted on the works. The gunboats came up just as the fort surrendered, and hence were not needed in the engagement. The main force of the enemy, under General Walker, made their escape from the fort before the engagement, leaving only three hundred men to defend the works. These, with eight heavy guns, two field-pieces, and a large quantity of munitions of war, fell into the hands of the victors.

Immediately after the surrender of the fort, the regiment embarked with the Third Division, and proceeded to Alexandria, arriving March 16, 1864, and remaining at that point several days, awaiting the arrival of General Banks. The forces of General Smith then moved twenty miles up the river to Grand Ecore, La., and there remained until the 7th of April, when they marched toward Shreveport, the Thirteenth and Nineteenth Corps having preceded them two days. Under General A. J. Smith's command were two divisions of the Sixteenth Corps, his own (Third) and General Mower's (First). The First Brigade of the Third Division was commanded by Colonel Moore; the Second by Colonel Lynch, of the 58th Illinois; the Third by Colonel Shaw, of the 14th Iowa.

On the 8th, at sundown, Smith's command reached Pleasant Hill, having been delayed five hours on the road by the wagon-trains of the advance. During the same day, General Banks had met the enemy at Mansfield, or Sabine Cross Roads, sixteen miles in advance of General Smith, and had been thoroughly whipped, with very heavy loss, and were driven back in disorder to Pleasant Hill, where the Federal troops were again attacked the next day. The following in regard to the part performed by the 58th Illinois in the engagement of the 9th, is from Colonel Lynch's report of the battle:

"In accordance with orders received, we marched from Grand Ecore, La., on the morning of the 7th. After proceeding some fifteen miles on the Shreveport road, we went into camp for the night. On the morning of the 8th, we were detained somewhat, in waiting for the Second and Third Brigades to pass. We started at eight o'clock a. m., and arrived near Pleasant Hill at dark, having marched twenty-one miles that day. During the afternoon, heavy cannonading was heard in our front, denoting an engagement between our advance (Thirteenth and Nineteenth Corps) and the enemy. At two o'clock a. m. of the 9th, we were in line-of-battle, awaiting the approach of the enemy, who had defeated the Thirteenth and Nineteenth Corps. We remained on our arms until ten a. m., when we moved forward about one mile, and formed in the following order in the east center of the field, namely, the 89th Indiana Infantry in front, the 9th Indiana Battery in its rear, and the 58th and 119th Illinois Infantry in rear of the battery. We remained in this position until 12 m., when the 58th and 119th Illinois were moved by the left flank to a point about three hundred yards to the left, and formed on a ridge in the woods, facing outward. From this point, the 58th Illinois was moved about half a mile to the front, and left, of the original position. Here this regiment was halted, and a breastwork of fallen timber thrown up, behind which the men took shelter. After these arrangements were made, skirmishers were thrown out from this regiment and the 119th Illinois. The 89th Indiana was then moved a little distance to the left, to support the 3d Indiana Battery on the right and the 1st Vermont Battery on the left. The 9th Indiana Battery was placed in position on the right of the 3d Indiana Battery, and about two hundred yards therefrom, there being a New York regiment between. In this position we remained until four p. m., when musketry in our front admonished us that the fight had begun. Soon the enemy advanced from the woods, driving before them a brigade of Eastern troops, which had occupied a position in a ravine or ditch on the opposite side of the field. Pursuing this brigade, and flushed with victory, the rebels continued to advance with yells that carried terror to many a stout heart. Still pressing on, they drove our troops back, and even had possession of one of our batteries (Battery "L," First United States Artillery), when, on a sudden, the 58th Illinois Infantry, which had been advanced to the left, and front, appeared in the edge of the woods on the enemy's right flank. The order was given to charge, and with unearthly yells, and with lightning-like rapidity, they were on the enemy. Fierce was the struggle, and nobly did the brave 58th do their work, driving the before-victorious enemy before them. They halted not until they drove the rebels into the ditch in front. Here we captured about four hundred prisoners, whom I sent to the rear, in charge of an officer, with instructions to report them to Brigadier-General Mower, but who delivered them to a staff officer, belonging, I have since understood, to the Nineteenth Army Corps. The 58th Illinois claim to have captured more prisoners than they have men in the regiment. Certain it is, that their furious attack completely turned the flank of the enemy, and decided in a great measure the fate of the day. At this point, the battle was most fierce; success seemed first to favor one and then the other. Twice were our boys driven back between the guns of the abandoned Battery "L," United States Artillery, and as often did they rally and repulse the enemy. At last the enemy were driven into the woods in confusion, and three pieces of artillery captured by the 58th Illinois. * * * The 58th, after entering the woods, became separated, a portion following the colors, and the remainder accompanying myself. After coming into the woods, I found the men in the greatest confusion, but knowing our situation was most precarious, I ordered all to push forward. With a rush the men obeyed, the color-bearers to the front. Closely we pressed the rebels, driving them to the left through the woods, and up the road for a distance of over three miles. Never did a man flinch, although the enemy outnumbered us six to one—the number of colors with us probably deceiving them as to our real strength. In the pursuit, so close were we to the rebels that our men seized them by the collars, bayoneting some, and capturing others, while in the very act of firing their pieces. Six caissons, and a large number of very fine horses were taken by us during this charge. Having pursued the enemy three miles, I found him forming beyond an open field in considerable force. Hastily forming my broken column, I found myself opposed to about three thousand rebels, while my force did not exceed as many hundred. I directed the men to open fire, which was done at once, causing the rebels to break in confusion. Being so far from any support, I found it necessary to re-join our main force, and at once ordered a return, in which we were unmolested. It being quite dark, and being burdened with our wounded, which we brought with us, I was compelled to leave the caissons, though I, at the time, supposed we were to bring them off in the morning. Having moved back to the open field, we joined the other regiments of the brigade, and after obtaining a supply of ammunition, moved out with the brigade about a mile upon the road over which we had driven the rebels, there formed line of battle, and remained during the night. At this time, the 58th Illinois was detached, and moved to its original position behind the fortifications upon the left of the open field.*

Captain John Tobin, commanding Co. "K," was shot through the heart while leading his men in this charge. The total loss of the regiment is not officially reported.

On April 10, Banks's forces fell back toward Grand Ecore,† where they remained until the 23d, and thence retreated to Alexandria, which point was reached on the 29th. As soon as Admiral Porter had his gunboats over the falls‡ above Alexandria, about May 13, that place was evacuated by the army, which marched thence to Simsport, meeting the enemy at Marksville Prairie on the 16th, and on the 18th at Yellow Bayou, which empties into the Atchafalaya a few miles above Simsport.§ In the latter engagement, the 58th lost heavily. The advance, with the trains and stores, and also a large portion of the main force,

* It may be remarked that the manner in which the Confederates were whipped by General A. J. Smith at Pleasant Hill was a potent consolation to the soldiers, who had been so unmercifully trodden under Banks at Mansfield. The omission of N. P. Banks's military life is made purposely; had the Government pretermitted it, in a similar manner, very many lives and thousands of dollars' worth of property might not have been sacrificed. The reputation which Banks had as the "Rebel's Commissary" is too well-known to need repetition.

† An old army song recites how:

"In eighteen hundred and sixty-four, Foot Ball! says I;
In eighteen hundred and sixty-four, Foot Ball! says I;
In eighteen hundred and sixty-four, we all skedaddled from Grand Ecore,
And we'll all drink stone-blind; Johnny, fill up the bowl!"

‡ General Godfrey Wetzel performed the engineering necessary to raise the falls so that the gunboats could pass over them.

§ The writer saw a number of dead from this engagement lying on the ground, prior to their burial in the common trench, and nearly all were shot in the head, showing the closeness and fatality of the enemy's aim.

had crossed the bayou, when the enemy, under command of Major-General Polignac, attacked Smith's forces, which formed the rear. A bloody though brief engagement followed, in which the Confederates were routed with the loss of about three hundred prisoners. Colonel Lynch was wounded during the engagement; and the 58th Illinois, which, with the 6th Massachusetts, and 14th New York and 3d Maryland Cavalry, bore the brunt of the fighting, suffered severely. Lieutenants James E. Moss, Co. "E," and Charles Maager, Co. "D," the latter of Chicago, were killed. Nine color-bearers were shot, one of whom—Fred. Mink—refused to yield the colors to another until he was wounded in both arms.

The regiment, with its division, arrived at the crossing of the Atchafalaya on the 19th, where a bridge was constructed, and on the 20th, the river was crossed and the army again entered Simsport, when General Canby superseded General Banks. From Simsport, the 58th, with Smith's command, returned to Vicksburg, which point was reached May 24. The rebels having attempted to blockade the Mississippi, at Columbia, Ark., the division moved up the Mississippi, and, in an engagement near Lake Chicot, drove him toward the west. After a pursuit of several miles, it marched to Columbia, and thence moved up the river to Memphis, where, on the 10th of June, the veterans received a thirty days' furlough and returned to Illinois, the non-veterans being sent to LaGrange, Tenn., from which place, in July, they moved, with General Smith's corps, to Tupelo, Miss., and participated in the engagements with Forrest's cavalry near that place, returning to Memphis after a march of two hundred and sixty miles. The veterans there re-joined the regiment, August 6, and the following day the regiment marched with General Smith's forces into Mississippi, on the "Oxford raid," returning on the 29th. September 5, it moved on a campaign against General Price, who was raiding Missouri. After pursuing Price through southern Missouri, General Smith's force returned to St. Louis, September 29, and thence moved to Jefferson City, on the Missouri River, and west to Lexington and Independence, in pursuit of Price, who was then moving toward the south, raiding eastern Kansas as he went. Price's forces having been defeated by General Blount, in Kansas, the troops returned to Jefferson Barracks, St. Louis, arriving November 18, and after resting for a few days, and refitting for another expedition, proceeded with the Sixteenth (Smith's) Corps up the Ohio and Cumberland rivers to reinforce General Thomas, at Nashville, arriving December 1, and taking position in the defensive works on the right of the line. The regiment participated in the battles of the 15th and 16th, and joined in the pursuit of Hood's army as far as Clifton, Tenn., where it encamped, January 2, 1865, and, with the Sixteenth Corps, was thence taken in transports down the Tennessee to Eastport, Miss. At that point, the non-veterans, whose term expired February 7, 1865, left, to return to Illinois. On January 23, the veterans and recruits were consolidated into four companies, under the designation of Battalion 58th Illinois Infantry, Major R. W. Healy, of Chicago, commanding battalion, Washington B. Pullis, of the same city, retained in service as captain of Co. "A," and John O. Kane, as captain of Co. "D." On February 9, the battalion left Eastport, proceeded to Cairo, and thence to New Orleans, where, in March, it joined General Canby's forces, and on the 5th, moved to Dauphin Island, to take part in the operations against Mobile. On the 25th, the command arrived before Spanish

Fort, where it remained until April 3, employed in picket and other duty, and where Lieutenant Thomas Malloy was killed. It then moved to Fort Blakeley, and remained in front of the works until the 9th, when it participated in the final charge on the works, and, after the surrender, went into camp near Mobile. At Mobile, it was joined by six companies, raising it to a full regiment, when it marched one hundred and eighty miles to Montgomery, Ala., where it remained employed in garrison duty until April 1, 1866, when it was mustered out of service, and returned to Camp Butler, Springfield, for final payment and discharge.

SIXTY-FIFTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

The SIXTY-FIFTH ILLINOIS, known as the "SCOTCH REGIMENT," was recruited early in 1862, the first recruits being placed in Camp Douglas on January 30, of that year. It was organized at that post by Colonel Daniel Cameron, and mustered into United States service May 5, 1862, its colonel and other field-officers being from Chicago. Co. "H," "The Glengarry Guards," was recruited and officered in the city; Co. "G," in Cook County.

The Field and Staff officers, and the officers of the Companies mentioned were: Colonel, Daniel Cameron, Jr; Lieutenant-Colonel, William S. Stewart; Major, John Wood; Adjutant, David C. Bradley; Quartermaster, James C. Rankin; Surgeon, George K. Park; Chaplain, Charles T. Roe. Co. "G": Captain, Iranoff Willentzki; First Lieutenant, Alexander W. Diller; Second Lieutenant, Louis H. Higgins. Co. "H": Captain, Alexander McDonald; First Lieutenant, Lysander Tiffany; Second Lieutenant, John J. Littler.

The regiment remained at Camp Douglas until June 21, 1862, when it was ordered to the East, to participate in the defense of Washington. It was stationed at Martinsburg, Va., during a part of the summer, Colonel Cameron being placed in command of the district, and then, with other troops, under the command of Colonel Miles, was sent to garrison Harper's Ferry, upon the surrender of which post the regiment was captured. It was paroled the following day, September 16, and sent to Camp Douglas, Chicago, where it remained until April, 1863, when it was exchanged, and all, except two companies, were sent to join General Julius White's command, in Kentucky.

During June, the regiment made a successful expedition up the Sandy River, against the Confederate General Candill. It remained in eastern Kentucky until August, when it returned to Camp Nelson, Lexington, Ky., to move with Burnside's army over the Cumberland Mountain to Knoxville. The regiment was in the Second Brigade (Colonel Cameron commanding), Third Division General J. D. Cox, Twenty-third Corps (Major-General George L. Hartstaff). The Twenty-third Corps, forming Burnside's right, moved, by way of Tompkinsville, Somerset and Chitwood's, to Montgomery, where it was joined by the left wing, under the personal command of Ambrose E. Burnside, and the united force moved on Kingston, thus turning Cumberland Gap. During September, the Ninth Corps joined the Twenty-third, and the latter was advanced thirty miles beyond Knoxville, to Loudon, retiring to Knoxville on the approach of Longstreet.

The 65th was joined at Knoxville by the two companies which had remained behind at Camp Douglas, and, with Cameron's brigade, was assigned to the defense of the South Side Heights, taking part in the engagements of the 25th and 29th of November. The army remained in winter quarters in East Tennessee through the winter, with the exception of a brief expedition to Dandridge, in January, 1864.

The army suffered extremely during the winter. General Cox says * that the troops endured the extremest want until the beginning of March. The cattle that had been collected at Knoxville before the siege, grew so thin for lack of forage, that, by January those turned over to the troops for beef could scarcely stand from weakness. It was the custom of the commissaries to drive the poor creatures over a little ridge in the field where they were corralled, and kill only those too weak to get over—only those that must soon die anyway, keeping the others a little longer for future use. Bread was made of corn ground into meal, cobs and all. The troops foraged diligently but could procure but very little from the exhausted country.

With January, 1864, came a terrible storm from the northwest, covering the ground with ice and sleet. The half-naked soldiers hovered around their camp-fires, some without coats, some without pantaloons, some with tattered blankets tied like petticoats about their waists. An officer, passing among them with words of sympathy and encouragement, was greeted with the cheery response, "It's pretty rough, General, but we'll see it through." Even during that fearful time, cheers were heard ringing out from one and another of the regimental camps, indicating that the regiment had "veteranized," as it was then called when a majority of the rank and file had re-enlisted for another three years, or during the war. The only inducement the Government offered was that those re-enlisting should, in their turn and as rapidly as it was safe, have a furlough of thirty days at home. The 65th was one of the regiments that thus veteranized, and in March it returned, with over four hundred men, to Illinois on furlough.

At the expiration of a month it returned to the field, and joined Sherman's army, for the Atlanta campaign, twenty-five miles below Kingston, Ga. The Twenty-third Corps then occupied the extreme right of Sherman's line—Cox's (Third) division in the advance. Cameron's (Second) brigade consisted of the 65th Illinois, 24th Kentucky, 103d Ohio and 65th Indiana. On the morning of the 15th of June, a general advance of the Union line was ordered. The 65th was brought into a sharp engagement at this time, the Confederate line being carried, and Johnston's troops driven back to Gilgal Church. The 65th occupied the abandoned works the following day, and was engaged continuously in skirmishing until the 20th, when the head of Schofield's column reached the crossing of Noses Creek on the Sandtown Road, and Cameron's brigade was ordered to make a serious effort to cross. The creek was deep and unfordable, the stream being so high as to cover the bottom-land skirting its banks. The planking of the only bridge was torn up, and the enemy's cavalry, with artillery, disputed the passage. Volunteers were called for, and about fifty men of the 65th stepped forward and, with a few others, under command of Colonel Casement, of the 103d Ohio, charged across the bridge, drove back the enemy and held the bridge-road until the remainder of the brigade crossed on the timbers and string-pieces. The regiment, with its division, occupied successive positions at Cheney's House and Culp's Farm, drove the enemy from the south bank of Olley's Creek on the 27th, and intrenched a position south of Marietta, in the Nickajack Valley.

On the 8th of July, Cameron's brigade crossed the Chattahoochee near Soap Creek, the crossing being a complete surprise to the enemy. During the advance from the Chattahoochee to Atlanta, and while intrenched before that city, the regiment was engaged in numerous skirmishes. On the 29th of July it was in the severe engagement at Ezra Church, in rear of Atlanta, and again, on the 6th of August, in another at the crossing of Utoy Creek. On the 18th, Captain James Duquid, Co. "A," with four companies of the 65th, drove the enemy from near the crossing of the East Point and Campbelltown roads, and, on the 26th, with Casement's (formerly Cameron's) brigade, it engaged in the movement on the Macon Railroad south of Atlanta, reaching "Rough and Ready" Station on the 30th, destroying the road at that point, and advancing thence to Jonesboro', where it participated in the battle of September 1. The Atlanta campaign being then ended, the Twenty-third Corps went into camp at Decatur on September 9th, remaining until October 5, when it marched, in pursuit of Hood, to Allatoona and Rome, and thence, through Kingston, to Resaca, Summerville, and Gaylesville, Ala., arriving at the latter place on the 20th. Remaining seven days, the regiment, with Schofield's command, then returned to Dalton, where it arrived on the 29th, and thence moved by rail to Nashville, arriving November 7. From Nashville it moved to Pulaski, Tenn.

Finding that the enemy was likely to get in his rear, and prevent his junction with Thomas, at Nashville, Schofield abandoned Pulaski on the 22d of November, and commenced his retreat, reaching Columbia on the 24th, where he made a stand at the crossing of Duck River. On the 25th, Casement's brigade, Third Division (General J. D. Cox), of which the 65th formed a part, was ordered, with other troops, to the north side of the river, to cover the pontoon bridge at the ford and hold the crossing. The position was strengthened the following day, and stubbornly held against Hood's attempts to cross, the 65th losing three officers and fifty men, killed and wounded. At night on the 29th, the division marched to Spring Hill and thence to Franklin, arriving on the morning of the 30th. Intrenchments were hastily thrown up in front of the village, the Columbia pike, on which Hood was advancing, being left open to enable the artillery and wagons to pass to the rear. The opening was commanded by an intrenchment crossing the road a little in the rear. The 65th occupied a position behind the breastworks lying to the left of the Columbia pike, and near the railway and Harpeth River.

The attack of the Confederates was made about four in the afternoon; the attack on Casement's line being made by parts of Loring's and Walthall's divisions. The Second Brigade occupied a slight knoll, well intrenched. General John Adams, leading the first charge on the position, leaped the ditch and mounted the parapet, where his horse was killed, and he was thrown inside the Federal lines, mortally wounded. Generals Quarles and Scott were both wounded in leading assaults on this portion of the line, a captain being the ranking officer in Walthall's division at the close of the battle. The 65th captured the colors of the 15th Mississippi Infantry, Adams's brigade, which made the first charge; and at the close of the contest more than two hundred dead and wounded Confederates covered the ground in its front, attesting the desperation with which it defended its position. The battle raged until long after dark, when Hood withdrew and the Federal forces crossed the Harpeth, and, on the morning of December 1, joined the army of General Thomas at Nashville.

On December 15-16, the 65th participated in the battle of Nashville, and afterward joined in the pursuit of Hood to Clifton, Tenn., where the regiment remained until January 15, 1865. On January 14, General Schofield received orders to move with the Twenty-third Corps from Clifton, and with that and the Tenth Corps, Major-General Alfred H. Terry, operate against Wilmington, N. C. The 65th, with other portions of the corps, moved by boat to Cincinnati, thence by rail to Washington and Annapolis, where it embarked February 2, for Wilmington, landing at Fort Fisher on the 7th. Until the 15th, Cox's division was engaged in the attempt to cross Myrtle Sound by means of pontoons; when they were forced to Smithville, crossed Cape Fear River on the 16th, and commenced the advance on Fort Anderson. The division succeeded in turning the fort on the 18th, and during that night it was abandoned by the enemy, and, with ten pieces of heavy ordnance, fell into the hands of the division. The Confederate General Hoke retreated to Town, or Smithtown, Creek, eight miles above the fort, and took refuge in another strongly fortified work at that point, from which he was routed on the afternoon of the 20th, Casement's brigade having waded through the marsh in front of the works, and, with Sterl's brigade, charged upon the position. The fort was defended by Hapgood's brigade, temporarily commanded by Colonel Simonson. The troops made a brave resistance, but were broken by the assault, and finally routed with the loss of the colonel and three hundred and seventy-five of the brigade captured, besides three pieces of artillery. Wilmington was evacuated on the night of the 21st, and the 65th, with the other troops, had the gratification of celebrating Washington's birthday in the captured city. On February 26, 1865, the regiment, with Cox's division, embarked for Newberne, which it reached on the last day of the month. On March 6, it moved to Kinston, whence five companies, except veterans, were sent to Chicago, under Captain Duquid, of Co. "A," to be mustered out, their term having expired.

On the 21st of March, the railroad having been repaired, the Third Division, with the remainder of the Twenty-third Corps, entered Goldsboro', and was there joined in a day or two by Sherman. The 65th marched from Goldsboro' for Raleigh on April 10, where it remained until the surrender of General Johnston's army. From Raleigh, the additional non-veterans, Major Kennedy commanding, were ordered home for muster-out. The remaining veterans moved to Greensboro', N. C., and went into permanent camp, being consolidated under the company letters "H" and "K." Co. "B" was filled to the maximum with drafted men, and four new companies were assigned to the regiment, on May 1. In June, four officers and two hundred and fifty men were assigned to the regiment from the 92d Illinois, two officers and one hundred and twenty men from the 112th Illinois, and twenty-five men from the 107th Illinois. Lieutenant-Colonel William S. Stewart was mustered as colonel, with rank dating from July 31, 1864. On July 13, 1865, the regiment was mustered out, and departed for Illinois, arriving at Chicago July 22, where it received final payment and discharge, July 26, 1865.

GENERAL DANIEL CAMERON was born in Berwick-upon-Tweed, April 13, 1828, and was a descendant of the Camerons who lost their all under Lochiel, at Culloden, in 1746. His father was a publisher, who numbered among his friends some of the most talented men of the country, such as John Mackey Wilson, Robert Gilfillan, Allan Cunningham, Carr, and others. Daniel Cameron removed to America in 1851, and settled in Cook County, near Chicago. In the spring of 1854, with Messrs. Cook and Patterson, he bought the Chicago Current, which was merged in the Young America soon after. During the same year, Messrs. Cook, Cameron and Sheahan established the Chicago Times, issuing the first number on August 20. Mr. Cameron became one of the editors of the paper the following fall, and remained joint-editor and proprietor until 1858, when he retired from the firm on account of ill-health. In 1859, he returned and took part in the direction of the paper until 1861. After the death of Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, of whom he was a warm personal and political friend, and the subsequent disruption of the Democratic party on war issues, Mr. Cameron raised the 65th Illinois Infantry, known as the "Scotch Regiment." Of this he was chosen colonel. He remained at Camp Douglas with his regiment, being in command of the camp for a brief time, from the early spring of 1862 until June, when he was ordered to join the Army of the Potomac and participate in the defense of Washington. He was assigned to the command of the District of Martinsburg, and, with his command, afterward formed a part of the garrison of Harper's Ferry surrendered by Colonel Miles in September, 1862. After being exchanged, he was sent, with his command, to Eastern Kentucky, and on the departure of Burnside to occupy Knoxville, was appointed to the command of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-third Corps, accompanied the Army of the Ohio in its march over the Cumberland Mountains to Knoxville, and participated in the subsequent defense of the city against the assaults of Longstreet's forces. For his brave and successful defense of the South Side Heights—the position assigned to him—he received the congratulations of General Burnside, and was placed in temporary command of the Third Division. During the Atlanta campaign, he commanded his old brigade, having received a commission as brigadier-general, and at the close of that campaign retired from active service. He was afterward engaged in politics—acting with the conservative branch of the Democratic party. He supported Horace Greeley for the presidency, and soon after the close of that campaign retired to his farm, seventeen miles northwest of Chicago, where he died. He was married, in 1850, to Mary Ann Ward, of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and has had a family of twelve children, of whom several are still living.

THREE MONTHS REGIMENTS OF 1862.

In the latter part of May, 1862, when the main portion of the Army of the Potomac was confronting the Confederate forces on the line of the Chickahominy, and McDowell's corps, relieved from the defense of Washington, was marching to reinforce it, Stonewall Jackson made his bold irruption into the Shenandoah Valley, pushing back the army of General Banks to Winchester, whence it retired, May 25, to the north of the Potomac, and Jackson continued his advance almost to Harper's Ferry, capturing prisoners, and devastating the country as he moved.

Great alarm was felt in Washington for the safety of the capital, and, in addition to the concentration of all available forces already in the field for its protection, orders were issued by the War Department, demanding of Governor Yates that all the volunteer and militia force in the State be organized and forwarded immediately. Although this order was revoked two days later, five regiments—67th to 71st inclusive—were organized for three-months' service, and in two weeks were in camp. All of these, with the exception of the 71st, remained on guard duty in the State, thereby releasing veteran troops and allowing them to proceed to the field.

Of the infantry regiments thus organized, the 67th and 69th were partially recruited and officered* in Chicago, both being organized at Camp Douglas, and remaining there in charge of prisoners-of-war during their entire term of service.

The 67th Illinois was commanded by Colonel Rosell M. Hough, formerly major in the 9th Illinois Cavalry, and the 69th by Colonel Joseph H. Tucker, long connected with the military organizations of the city, and, at the breaking out of the Rebellion, colonel of the 60th Regiment, I. S. M. One of the companies which joined the 69th regiment was composed almost entirely of students from the Chicago University, under the command of Captain Lansing B. Tucker. The "University Cadets" became Co. "C," of the 67th Infantry, and, with the regiment, went into camp at Camp Douglas. The young captain was taken ill of camp fever before the summer had passed, and, after two weeks of suffering, died August 18, 1862, then but eighteen years and three months of age. He gave his all—a patriot's life—upon the altar of our country's freedom.

SEVENTY-SECOND ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

FIRST CHICAGO BOARD-OF-TRADE REGIMENT.—The 72d Regiment, Illinois Volunteers, was raised, in response to President Lincoln's call on July 6, 1862, for three hundred thousand volunteers, to serve for three years. On July 21, an enthusiastic meeting of the Chicago Board of Trade was held, when that organization determined to raise and support a battery of light artillery, and one company of infantry to support it. On the evening of the 23d, John L. Hancock, president of the Board, announced that the battery was recruited full, and had been tendered to the President, and it was then resolved to raise a regiment of infantry, which should be especially under the care and patronage of the Board, which would guarantee to each member a bounty of $60, in addition to that ordinarily paid. The Board-of-Trade War Committee also offered a premium of $100 for the first full company raised for the regiment, and Gilbert Hubbard & Co. proffered a magnificent stand of colors and $70 additional. The same evening, Isaiah H. Williams offered a company which he was raising, and it was accepted, becoming Co. "F" of the regiment. The Board asked the co-operation of the Young Men's Christian Association, which had contemplated, and commenced, raising a regiment, and that body immediately authorized its committee—J. V. Farwell and J. C. Wright—to convey its acceptance of the proposition, pledging itself to raise five companies. The Young Men's Association had offered the command of the five companies to the Board, "the tender to be unencumbered by any expression of preference."

On the evening of the 23d, the "Hancock Guards," which had been raised as a support to the Board-of-Trade Battery, within the last forty-eight hours, was offered to the Board, and became Co. "A," of the 72d Illinois.

* See Table of Chicago Officers, at close of Military chapter.

George H. Heafford was the first man that enrolled himself as a member of the Hancock Guards, and Joseph Stockton the second.

In less than two days enough companies were offered to make it certain that a regiment could easily be raised, and on August 23, just one month after recruiting commenced, the regiment was complete. Co. "E," Captain William B. Holbrook, one of the companies raised by the Young Men's Christian Association, gained the premium for being the first filled to the maximum, and in camp.

The 72d was almost exclusively a Chicago regiment, its field and staff officers, every captain but one, and nearly every other line-officer, being Chicago men. Among the companies were the "Scripps" Guards,* composed of clerks and other employes of the post-office, which, as Co. "C," was the regimental color-company. The "Havelock Guards" ("B") was one of the companies raised by the Young Men's Christian Association; the "Underwood Guards" ("D") was recruited by Messrs. Underwood & Co. and J. A. Sexton, first lieutenant 67th Illinois Infantry, who was transferred to the 72d; and the "Shepherd Guards" ("F") was offered by Isaiah H. Williams, formerly lieutenant of Co. "I," 13th Illinois.

The following is the full regimental roster of Chicago officers:

Field and Staff.—Colonel, Frederick A. Starring; Lieutenant-Colonels, Joseph C. Wright, Joseph Stockton; Majors, Henry W. Chester, Joseph Stockton, William James, Jr.; Adjutants, Ebenezer Bacon, Benjamin W. Underwood, George H. Heafford; Quartermasters, Benjamin W. Thomas, Albert G. Gibbs; Surgeon, Edwin Powell; First Assistant-Surgeon, Benjamin Durham, Jr.; Second Assistant-Surgeon, Edwin A. Beers, McHenry County; Chaplain, Henry Barnes.

Frederick A. Starring, colonel of the 72d, was a native of Buffalo, N. Y., but had been for several years a resident of Chicago. Although but twenty-eight years of age, he had had experience in frontier warfare, having previously graduated at a military school. Lieutenant-Colonel Wright, a leading member of the Chicago Board of Trade, was also a graduate of a military academy.

The regiment was mustered into the service of the United States, August 23, 1862, and left Chicago for Cairo the same day, where it remained until September 6. From the 6th to the 17th, it was stationed at Paducah, Ky., and was then ordered to Columbus, remaining at the latter post, as part of the command of Brigadier-General Davies, until November 21. While at Columbus, Captain Isaiah H. Williams was appointed provost marshal of the place, and inaugurated many needed improvements. He established a Soldiers' Home for the care of the sick, a substantial market, a public school and Sunday-school, and in various ways placed military and civil affairs upon a higher and a better basis.

The regiment was subjected to a thorough course of drill and military discipline, and acquired those soldierly habits which afterward enabled it to pass through its first battle with the coolness and nerve of a veteran organization. On October 6, the 72d took part in an expedition to Clarkson, Mo., where a rebel camp was attacked, its occupants dispersed, and several prisoners taken. On November 21, it was ordered to join General Quimby's (Seventh) division, McPherson's (Seventeenth) army corps, at Moscow, Miss. With this command it accompanied Grant's army on his Mississippi campaign as far as the Yazooapataha River, when, on December 20, the disaster occurred at Holly Springs, thirty miles north of Grant's headquarters, by which the immense stores there accumulated were destroyed by Van Dorn. This village had been made the principal depot of supplies for Grant's army, while the railroad farther south was being repaired, and, through the cowardice and incapacity of the commanding officer, the whole, estimated to be worth $4,000,000, fell into the hands of the enemy, the pusillanimous commander not striking a blow in its defense. By reason of the loss of his stores, Grant was forced to fall back toward Memphis, and the 72d Illinois was detailed as guard to the wagon-train on the route. On arriving at Memphis, it went in camp near the city, on the line of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad, where it remained until January 19, 1863, when it was ordered into the city for provost duty, in which it was employed until March 1, in the meantime making an expedition to Horn Lake Creek, where it dispersed a band of Blythe's guerrillas.

On January 22, 1863, Adjutant Ebenezer Bacon died in hospital at Memphis, and was succeeded by First Lieutenant Benjamin W. Underwood, of Co. "D." In the spring of 1863, an effort was made to flank the defenses north of Vicksburg, reaching Haines's Bluff by way of the Yazoo pass, and Coldwater, Tallahatchie and Yazoo rivers. On March 1, Quimby's division was sent from Memphis to the relief of an expedition under General Ross, which had penetrated these rivers nearly to the junction of the Tallahatchie and Yazoo, where Fort Pemberton, strongly garrisoned by the Confederates, under Major-General Loring, had arrested his progress, and forced him to abandon the enterprise. On March 21, General Quimby, with his command, reached the retreating forces, assumed command, and returned to Fort Pemberton, where, on the 23d, he received an order from Grant to withdraw, a new line of operations having been decided upon, looking to the turning of Vicksburg on the south. In pursuance of this design, the Army of the Tennessee was concentrated at Milliken's Bend, twenty miles above Vicksburg, early in April, the 72d then being in Ransom's (Second) brigade, Sixth Division (Brigadier-General John McArthur commanding), the regiment arriving at the point of concentration on April 23. Ransom's brigade was detached from the division, to guard-points between Milliken's Bend and New Carthage, Colonel Starring, with the 72d, remaining encamped at Richmond, La., from April 25 until May 10, when it moved down the west bank of the Mississippi, crossed at Grand Gulf, on the 12th, and marched to join McPherson's corps at Jackson, Miss. The brigade reached Raymond on the 16th, while the battle of Champion Hill was in progress, and, although it was immediately hurried forward, it did not arrive on the battle-field until the engagement was nearly over. The brigade was ordered forward in pursuit, and marched until midnight, renewing the pursuit on the morning of the 17th, and reaching the vicinity of Black River Bridge, in the rear of Vicksburg, soon after the capture of that position.

On the 18th, Ransom's brigade marched to Vicksburg, and advanced to a position on the right of the Jackson road, and within half a mile of the rebel fortifications, the brigade being on the extreme right of McPherson's corps, joining Giles Smith's brigade of Sherman's corps on the left. The following day, an assault was made on the enemy's works by McPherson's corps, in which the brigade gained a position in the ravines south of the Graveyard road, within eighty rods of the fortifications, and spent the 20th and 21st in skirmishing and constructing rifle-pits. In the assault upon the enemy's works, May 22, Ransom's brigade won a noble name for bravery and discipline. The brigade was formed in a ravine in front of the fortifications, the 95th Illinois, in advance, followed by the 72d and 11th Illinois and the 14th and 17th Wisconsin. The story of that charge has been often told: how, at a signal, the men sprung forward to the assault with a cheer, but had hardly advanced twenty steps, when they were met by such a pitiless storm of grape and canister from the rebel batteries, that the column wavered an instant, with the colonel and color-bearer of the advance stricken down, Colonel Nevins, of the 11th Illinois, killed, and Lieutenant-Colonel Wright, commanding the 72d, mortally wounded. After bravely holding their ground for some time, General Ransom ordered the brigade to retire, one regiment at a time, and in order, the 72d Illinois to move first, and the 17th Wisconsin to remain to cover the movement. The brigade slowly and steadily fell back to the cover of the ravine they had occupied before the charge, every regiment moving without confusion, and with the precision of a parade drill. The loss of the 72d in the engagements in the rear of Vicksburg was about one hundred and thirty.

Among the officers, were Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph C. Wright, who died in Chicago, July 6, 1863, of wounds received at Vicksburg, on May 22, and Lieutenant Henry C. Mowry, Co. "E," and James A. Bingham, Co. "G," both of Chicago, killed on the field. Captain John Reid, Co. "K," Lieutenants Daniel W. Whittle and Glen C. Ledyard, Cos. "B" and "C," Sergeant S. D. Barnes and Corporal B. F. Hoyt, were seriously wounded. The following are the names of the privates reported killed: Co. "A," P. J. Nelson, Scepter T. Harding and Thomas Russell. Co. "B," William Naugle, James Gordon, C. G. Garrett, Adam Roth and James Finerty. Co. "C," M. W. Humbert and Matthew Bacon. Co. "D," Sergeant A. A. Walker, Edwin A. Kane, Corporal W. W. Works, Privates Odell, Hopkins and Tole. Co. "E," H. W. P. Moore, George L. Browne and William Eisenhart. Co. "F," Michael Figu. Co. "G," John Kurrash. Co. "H," Charles Pettit and Thomas Watson. Co. "I," Abraham Hoyt and Christopher Lovell. Co. "K," Daniel Temple and Corporal Bloomfield.

After the assault of the 22d, the 72d Illinois, with the other forces around Vicksburg, was employed in the operations of the siege, constructing approaches, etc., until the 4th of July, when, Pemberton having capitulated, the brigade of General Ransom entered the city, following General Logan's division—those being the first troops to enter the captured stronghold. On the following day, the 72d, with its brigade, went into camp within the old line of works, where it remained a day or two, when it embarked for Natchez, Miss., of which place General Ransom took possession, capturing a large number of prisoners, a quantity of rebel stores, and six thousand head of cattle intended for Johnson's army. The regiment remained at Natchez until October 17, employed in provost and guard duty, when it moved, with the brigade, to Vicksburg, Miss., and remained at that post until October 30, 1864, participating, during that time, in an expedition to Benton, Miss., on May 7, 1864, and in the Grand Gulf expedition on July 18, 1864. On October 30, 1864, the regiment was ordered to report to Major-General O. O. Howard, who, on the death of McPherson, had succeeded to the command of the Army of the Tennessee. Arriving at Nashville on November 13, too late to join Howard, who was with Sherman's army, it was ordered to join Schofield's command at Columbia, Tenn., which it did on November 21, the same day that Hood moved his forces north of the Tennessee River, with intent to capture Nashville. General Schofield's command evacuated Columbia on the evening of the 29th, and fell back through Spring Hill to Franklin, where it arrived on the morning of the 30th, and immediately commenced throwing up a line of defenses around the south and west of the town—the north and east being protected by the Harpeth River.

The 72d Illinois, with Schofield's Second division, was posted west of the Columbia pike, which passed directly through the center of the Federal line, facing south. At four o'clock in the afternoon, Hood, with his entire army, moved to the attack, his center charging down the Columbia pike, hurling the advanced Federal line back over the breastworks, through the center of the reserves, and, pressing his own exultant troops into the gap, turning back the regiments to the right and left of the pike, and planting his flag on the breastworks. The 72d was still working on the breastworks when the enemy appeared in sight; and when the advanced guard thus swarmed over the parapet, and the troops to the left, next the pike, were hurled back, it retreated to the second line, where it rallied, and, returning to the front, held the line until dark. In attempting to repulse the first onset of the enemy, Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph Stockton and Major William James, both of Chicago, were severely wounded, and the command of the regiment devolved upon Captain James A. Sexton, of this city. The entire loss of the regiment, in killed and wounded, was nine officers and one hundred and fifty-two men.

After the repulse of Hood, the Federal forces left the defense at Franklin, and the following day joined Thomas at Nashville, where the 72d was assigned to the corps of General A. J. Smith, which arrived the same day from Missouri, and was placed in position on the right of the Union line surrounding the city. With that command, it participated in the engagements of December 15-16, and in the pursuit of Hood's flying forces that succeeded. Hood escaping across the Tennessee, the pursuit was discontinued, at Lexington, on the 24th, and Smith's corps was taken, in preparation for a campaign in Mississippi, by boat from Clifton to Eastport, Miss., the head of steamboat navigation on the lower Tennessee, arriving at the latter place January 13, 1865. On February 9, with Smith's (Sixteenth) corps, the regiment moved toward New Orleans to join General E. R. S. Canby's forces, arriving February 21, and remaining encamped eight miles below the city until March 12, when active operations against Mobile were inaugurated by the transportation of Smith's corps across the Gulf of Mexico, and up Mobile Bay, to Fish River, Alabama. The 72d, with the First Brigade, arrived on Dauphine Island, at the mouth of the Bay, on March 17, and the following day, crossed to Cedar Point, on the western shore of the mainland, where its landing was protected by a heavy fire from the gunboats. It remained a few days, making a feint of an attack on the city, and then re-joined the corps on the eastern side of the Bay, near Smith's Mills, which point was ten miles up Fish River.

The advance on Mobile was resumed on the 26th, and on the 27th the troops arrived in front of Spanish Fort, the strongest fortification on the east of Mobile. Lines were established at distances of from three hundred to four hundred yards, and the siege pressed vigorously until April 3, when the troops had built an earth-work and mounted siege-guns within two hundred yards of the fort. On the evening of the 8th, the men were ordered into the pits, and the attack commenced. By midnight, the enemy's guns were silenced, when the First and Third brigades of Smith's corps charged and carried the works. The following morning, the 72d, with the First Brigade, moved to Fort Blakely, where the division was held as support for the divisions of the Thirteenth Corps, which were engaged in the charge on the fort. On April 9, the works were captured, and Mobile won. The 72d remained in camp there until the 14th, when it marched to Montgomery, Ala.—two hundred miles—arriving on the 25th. After encamping there until May 23, it moved to Union Springs, Ala., forty-five miles distant, and there remained, engaged in post duty until July 19, when it repaired to Vicksburg, where it was mustered out of the service August 6, 1865, and thence came directly to Chicago, arriving with twenty-two officers and three hundred and ten men. On its return route, the regiment was attacked, at Yerger's Landing, by a gang of drunken rebels, and Private Levi Derby, of Co. "E," was killed, and Sergeant-Major Charles V. Blake seriously wounded.

The "First Board-of-Trade Regiment" met with a warm welcome at Chicago, on its return on August 12, 1865. It was greeted by a salute of thirty-six guns, and received at the depot by a committee of the Board of Trade and a large delegation of citizens, who escorted it, through the streets, to Bryan Hall. There the regiment stacked arms in the upper-hall, and descended to enjoy the magnificent banquet prepared in its honor. The formal ceremonies of welcome were then inaugurated by C. Randolph, president of the Board of Trade, who was followed by the many enthusiastic friends of the returned soldiers.

The 72d was mustered into service with thirty-seven officers and nine hundred and thirty men; total, nine hundred and sixty-seven. Its strength when mustered out was twenty-two officers and three hundred and ten men; total, three hundred and thirty-two. Seven of its officers and seventy-eight privates were killed in action; three officers and one hundred and thirty men died of disease; three officers and seventy-six men were taken prisoners. During its term of service it received four hundred and fifty recruits, of whom two hundred and seventy were transferred to the 33d Illinois Veteran Regiment, at Meridian, Miss., on the return of the 72d.

Following is the return roster of the field and staff officers:

Colonel, F. A. Starring; Lieutenant-Colonel (Brevet Brigadier-General), Joseph Stockton; Major, William James, Jr.; Adjutant, George H. Heaford; Surgeon, Edwin Powell; Assistant-Surgeon, Charles A. Bucher; Sergeant-Major, Charles V. Blake; Quartermaster-Sergeant, D. Ford; Commissary-Sergeant, George M. Curtis; Hospital Steward, E. O. Gratton.

COLONEL JOSEPH STOCKTON, senior member of the transportation firm of Joseph Stockton & Co., and agent for the Empire Transportation Line, Chicago, Ill., was born in Pittsburgh, Penn., August 10, 1831. He came to Chicago in March, 1852, and went to work for George A. Gibbs & Co., commission and forwarding merchants, on South Water, near Wells Street. He stayed with them for several years and mastered the general features of the business. He then went into the American Transportation Company's office as clerk, and from there to the freight office of the Fort Wayne Railway, where he remained until he enlisted in July 23, 1862, in the First Board-of-Trade Regiment. He was mustered in on August 21, as first lieutenant of Co. "A." was afterward promoted to captain of the company, and on the resignation of Major Chester was promoted major of the regiment. The regiment was assigned to the Seventeenth Army Corps. The history of that army corps is the history of the western army until the close of the Rebellion. In April, 1863, two companies of his regiment were detailed as General Grant's body guard, and he was offered command of them, with the position of provost marshal on General Grant's staff; but he declined, preferring to remain with his regiment. He served with Grant's army through the campaign in the West, ending with the capture of Vicksburg. On the death of Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph C. Wright, who was mortally wounded at the assault on the enemy's works on May 22, Major Stockton was promoted to his place. After the fall of Vicksburg, Colonel F. A. Starring was put on detached service, and Lieutenant-Colonel Stockton took command of the regiment, and retained it until the close of the war. At the battle of Franklin, Tenn., November 30, 1864, he was wounded, and came home on a furlough; he was absent, however, from his command but a month. The other incidents of Colonel Stockton's military career can be read in the history of the regiment, except that he was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general for meritorious services in the field. In his civil life, it may be mentioned that, in 1858, he commenced the transfer business, in company with John Burnett, with five drays and horses, and, after twenty years, the firm now employ one hundred horses with everything they require to do business. The firm is now composed of General Stockton, his brother John and S. J. Glover. In politics, Mr. Stockton is an ardent Republican, and has taken an active part in all the presidential campaigns. He has been a Lincoln Park Commissioner for over thirteen years, and the public owe to his energy and perseverance many of the most important improvements of that beautiful resort. On February 7, 1865, General Stockton was married to Miss Kate E. Dennison, of Pittsburgh, a companion of his childhood. She bore him two children, John T. and Josephine, and died in November, 1868. On June 28, 1876, he married Miss Anne E. Brien, by whom he had one daughter, Annie, born in November, 1879. General Stockton is a member of the Citizens' Association, a director of the Illinois Humane Society, and secretary of the Half-Orphan Asylum. He is a member of the Illinois Commandery of the Loyal Legion, also of the Union Veteran Club and of the Union Veteran League. He belongs to Waubansia Lodge, No. 160, A.F. & A.M., and has been an active member of the St. James' Episcopal Church ever since coming to Chicago.

EDWIN POWELL, a physician and surgeon of thirty years' standing in Chicago, was born in Jefferson County, N. Y., October 12, 1837. He is the son of John and Evelyn (Brainard) Powell. After acquiring such an education as he could at home and in the high school, at Theresa, N. Y., he decided to go West. Having paid a visit to his maternal uncle, Dr. Daniel Brainard, of Chicago, he decided to adopt the medical profession. In the fall of 1851, he entered Knox College, and passed through the preparatory department. He matriculated at Williams College in 1852, and graduating in 1856, obtained his degree of A. B., standing well in a class of seventy-six members. Immediately after leaving college he entered the office of his uncle, where he continued his medical studies and became interne physician at the United States Marine Hospital. This position Dr. Powell held for about seven years. From the fall of 1856 to the summer of 1861, he also acted as demonstrator of anatomy in Rush Medical College. In July of that year he entered the United States service as surgeon, and in the following year was assigned to the 72d Illinois Volunteer Infantry, participating in all the engagements in and around Vicksburg. During the siege he had charge of the hospital of the Seventeenth Army Corps; and after Vicksburg surrendered, the Third Army Corps having consolidated with the Seventeenth, he had the superintendency of all medical matters, and conducted the McPherson General Hospital with marked ability and professional skill. The hospital was one of the largest established by the service, and Surgeon Powell's services were so thoroughly appreciated that, during the siege of Vicksburg, he was made brevet lieutenant-colonel and afterward colonel, besides receiving a gold medal from his corps. He was also present during the siege of Mobile, and was promoted to be surgeon-in-chief of General Carr's division, following the army through Alabama and other Southern States. Dr. Powell retired from the service in 1865, and returned to Chicago to practice his profession. He has resided here since, recognized by the profession and the public as a leading physician and surgeon, having been adjunct professor of surgery at Rush Medical College, and, at a later date, professor of military surgery and surgical anatomy. He was also, for a time, one of the surgeons of the Cook County Hospital, and is especially noted for operations for lithotomy and ovariotomy, and also possesses an enviable reputation as a teacher of clinical surgery. In 1877, Dr. Powell traveled through Europe for the purpose of making observations relative to the medical profession and practice, and gave, while there, especial attention to anti-septic surgery, as exemplified by the celebrated Professor Lister, of King's College Hospital, London, Eng.

J. A. SEXTON was born in Chicago in 1843. His parents were Stephen Sexton and Ann (Gaughan) Sexton, of Rochester, N. Y., who settled in Chicago in 1834. At the age of nine, he commenced his business life, being thus early thrown upon his own resources. In 1861, at the breaking out of the war, he enlisted in Co. "I," 19th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the three months' service; re-enlisted in the 67th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and was made first lieutenant of Co. "E" of same regiment; was then transferred to the 72d Illinois Infantry, and promoted to captain of Co. "D." He commanded the regiment through the battles of Columbia, Duck River, Spring Hill, Franklin and Nashville, Tenn., and through the Nashville campaign. In 1865, he was assigned to duty on the staff of General A. J. Smith, Sixteenth Army Corps, and served until the close of the war. While in the service, he purchased a plantation in Lowndes County, Ala. In 1867, he came to Chicago, and established the firm now known as Cribben, Sexton & Co., at the same time carrying on his plantation in Alabama until 1869. Mr. Sexton married Laura L. Woods, daughter of William Woods, an early settler of Chicago. She died in 1876, leaving four sons—William S., George W., Ira J., and Franklin C. His second wife was Augusta Lowe, of Chicago; they have two children—Laura A. and Mabel N.

CHARLES RUDOLPH EDWARD KOCH is the son of Augustus and Josephine (Von Lutz) Koch, and was born in Birnbaum, in Polish Prussia, April 24, 1842. While he was quite young, his parents came to America and settled in Manitowoc, Wis., where he received a partial education at the common schools. When he was fourteen it became necessary for him to assist his father in his business, and, in 1859, young Koch came to Chicago in search of his fortune. He then obtained work on a farm in the vicinity of this city, and subsequently became a pupil of Dr. Kennicott, in the study of dentistry, with whom he remained until August, 1862, when he enlisted in the 72d Illinois Infantry. He served with this regiment until May, 1863; was present throughout the Northern Mississippi campaign and the Yazoo Pass expedition, also participating with his regiment in the sanguinary battles of the Vicksburg campaign, including the siege at that place. While at Natchez, Miss., he was detailed as chief clerk at General Kansom's headquarters, and in November, 1863, he was appointed captain in the 49th United States Colored Infantry, and was then detailed for several months on the staff of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, Lorenzo Thomas, who was at that time organizing colored troops in the Southwest. He remained on this duty until February, 1864, when he was relieved, pursuant to his own request, and joined his command, at that time stationed in Louisiana, with which he served until May, 1865. At that date he was made provost marshal at Yazoo City, Miss., and remained in that office until August, when he was promoted to be provost marshal of the western district of Mississippi, with headquarters at Vicksburg, and retained this position until he was mustered out in March, 1866. In October, 1865, the war being over, he tendered his resignation, upon which, General Force, the district commander, in approving the application, said: "Captain Koch is a faithful and valuable officer, but by the time his resignation can be accepted, his services as military provost marshal may be spared." General Slocum, the commander of the Department of the Mississippi forwarded "Approved" to General P. H. Sheridan, commanding the Military Division of the Gulf, at New Orleans, and he returned it "Disapproved. The services of faithful and valuable officers can not be dispensed with at this time," much to the chagrin of the applicant. His career in the military service is indicative of the man; entering the service as a private, by his own merit he was advanced to that of corporal, first-sergeant and captain. Coming to Chicago a poor boy with but a partial education, he has worked himself to a position among the foremost in his profession. In 1866, after the termination of his military service, he returned to Chicago, and again entered the office of Dr. Kennicott; subsequently being associated with him in business, which association continued until 1871. In that year he commenced business for himself, and has since pursued the practice of his profession alone. In 1869, he was elected secretary of the Chicago Dental Society, and in 1875, became its president; from 1871 until 1875 he was the secretary of the Illinois State Dental Society, and while occupying that office edited its annual publications. Dr. Koch was president of the Illinois State Dental Society in 1877, and is at present chairman of its standing committee on Science and Literature. He has also been a frequent and valued contributor to professional and current literature, and devotes a large quantity of the time not occupied by his professional duties to literary studies. During the labor riots in 1877, he united with a number of veterans in forming a company to be utilized in the maintenance of law and order; of this company he was chosen captain. This company performed efficient service during the entire week, until the ordinary police authorities were enabled to preserve the peace. After the labor riots, he organized a company for the First Infantry, I. N. C., and served as its captain during one term of three years, but declined to receive a new commission for a second term. Dr. Koch always retained a strong attachment for military matters, and preserved great interest in anything pertaining to veteran organizations. He was one of the originators of the Union Veteran Club in 1878, and, as vice-president, presided over its first meetings. He was adjutant-general of the Grand Army of the Republic of Illinois, and was largely instrumental in re-planting this organization in the State of Indiana, where it had died out, and where to-day it is in a most flourishing condition. He has also been commander of his Post in this Order, and inspector-general on the Department Staff. He is a member of the Illinois Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States. He was married in 1868 to Mrs. Sylvia Bigelow, daughter of the late Hon. Otis Adams, of Grafton, Mass., by whom he has three daughters living; Josephine Mand, Alice Blanche and Mabelle Grace.

EIGHTY-SECOND ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE EIGHTY-SECOND INFANTRY, named "SECOND HECKER REGIMENT" in honor of Colonel Frederick Hecker, its first colonel, and formerly colonel of the 24th Illinois Infantry Volunteers, was, like the latter, almost exclusively composed of German members, and a Chicago organization. One company—"C," the "Concordia Guards"—was an Israelitish company (the Israelites of Chicago collecting, within three days, $10,000 among themselves for its benefit), and Co. "I" was composed of Scandinavians.

The regiment was organized at Camp Butler, Springfield, Ill., September 26, 1862; and was mustered into the United States service at the same place October 23, 1862, the following being the original roster:

Field and Staff.—Colonel, Frederick Hecker; Lieutenant-Colonel, Edward S. Salomon; Major, Ferdinand Rolshausen; Adjutant, Eugene F. Weigel; Quartermaster, Hermann Pansé; Surgeon, George Schloetzer; Chaplain, Emanuel Julius Richhelm.
Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, Anton Brubn; First Lieutenant, Edward Kafka; Second Lieutenant, Charles E. Stueven. Co. "B": Captain, Augustus Bruning; First Lieutenant, George Heinzman; Second Lieutenant, Charles Lanzendorfer. Co. "C": Captain, Jacob LaSalle; First Lieutenant, Mayer A. Frank; Second Lieutenant, Frederick Bechstein. Co. "D": Captain, Mathew Marx; First Lieutenant, William Warner; Second Lieutenant, Frank Kirchner. Co. "E": Captain, Robert Lender;

First Lieutenant, Rudolph Mueller; Second Lieutenant, John Breech Culler. Co. "F": Captain, Frederick L. Weber; First Lieutenant, Erich Hoppe; Second Lieutenant, Lorenz Spoeneman. Co. "G": Captain, William Neussel; First Lieutenant, Joseph Gottlob; Second Lieutenant, Conrad Schonder. Co. "H": Captain, Emil Frey; First Lieutenant, Johann Spörre; Second Lieutenant, Joseph Riegert. Co. "I": Captain, Iver Alexander Weid; First Lieutenant, John Illiborg; Second Lieutenant, Peter Hanson. Co. "K": Captain, Joseph B. Greenhut; First Lieutenant, George W. Fuchs; Second Lieutenant, Dominicus Kleusch

On November 3, 1862, the 82d left Camp Butler, nine hundred strong, under orders to join the Army of the Potomac. It arrived at Arlington Heights, November 9; was attached to General Franz Sigel's division, and marched to Fairfax Court House, November 19. On December 11, it moved to Stafford Court House, where it was assigned to the First Brigade (Colonel Schimmelfennig), Third Division (General Carl Schurz), Eleventh Army Corps (General Stahl); and, with that command went into camp near Aquia Creek, Va., December 19, where the regiment remained until January 20, 1863, a part of the corps only participating in Burnside's attack on the heights of Fredericksburg. On January 20, a forward movement of the army was ordered, which was commenced, but abandoned on the 23d, a severe storm having rendered the roads absolutely impassable. Wagons, ambulances, batteries, caissons, were mired in every gully, almost beyond the possibility of extrication, and the troops returned to winter quarters as speedily as possible. In this movement, which was known as the "Mud Campaign," the 82d participated, advancing to Hartwood Church, where it encamped until February 6, and then moved again to Stafford Court House. With Howard's command, the 82d moved from Stafford Court House, April 27, and marched toward Chancellorsville. Arriving at Kelley's Ford on the Rappahannock, it crossed on the evening of the 28th, and, after a few hours' rest on the southern side, moved to the Rapidan River, near Germania Mills, crossing that ford to Locust Grove, and forming line-of-battle along the Fredericksburg pike on the morning of the 30th. On the morning of May 1, small rifle-pits were dug and barricades made. At noon, May 2, the regiment was placed in position, facing south, in the second line-of-battle, with the 157th New York. About five o'clock, the enemy attacked the First Division, holding the first line of the Third Division, which, after brief resistance, gave way. The second line, comprising the 82d Illinois and the New York regiment, held the enemy in check until a new line was formed in their rear, when it fell back about fifteen yards, leaving seventy killed and wounded on the ground it had occupied. While forming and rallying his men, Colonel Hecker was wounded, and fell from his horse while riding to the rear. Major Rolshauson, in going to his aid, was also wounded, when the regiment retired in good order. The loss of the 82d, before it re-joined the brigade, was one hundred and fifty-six killed or wounded, including seven commissioned officers. Lieutenant-Colonel Salomon was not with the regiment, being ill in Chicago at the time.

The 82d participated in the engagement on May 4, and then returned to camp at Stafford Court House, where it had a much needed rest until June 12, when it moved on the Gettysburg campaign. Before it could reach Gettysburg, General Reynolds was killed, but his brave and sorely-pressed divisions still held their position near the Theological Seminary, above the town. At noon, General Howard arrived on the field, and assumed command of the troops, the immediate command of the Eleventh Corps devolving on Carl Schurz. This corps was thrown into position to the right of the First, and received, soon after, the weight of the first attack of Ewell's fresh troops, which forced it back to the village of Gettysburg, where the officers, to save their men from the terrible fire through the main streets, attempted to march them diagonally by cross streets through the town, the attempt resulting in confusion, degenerating into a panic. General Schimmelfennig, an old Prussian officer, commanding the First Division, was cut off from his command, but concealed himself, and finally escaped to the Union lines.

General Howard instantly selected Cemetery Hill, south of Gettysburg, as his line of defense, to which point the troops were withdrawn and re-formed, the First Brigade of the Third Division acting as rear guard—the 82d Illinois guarding the rear of the brigade in the retreat to the new position. The Eleventh Corps, in the line of battle of the following days, held the center—the crest of Cemetery Hill and the declivity in its front. The Third Division occupied the right of Howard's line, joining Slocum's Twelfth Corps on their left. Toward evening, on Thursday, the 2d of July, Ewell's Confederate corps, by a sudden rush on our right, carried a portion of the line of rifle-pits, which had been constructed, during the day, in front of Slocum's and Schurz's line, and which were protected by only a single brigade—the right having been weakened to support Sickles, on the left, against the terrific assault of Longstreet's forces. On Friday morning, the battle raged in the woods in front of Schurz. The rebels were still in the rifle-pits, and the infantry were fighting them where our gunners could give no aid, for fear of killing friend as well as foe. From early morning until past eleven—seven hours—the men fought to regain those rifle-pits, when Ewell's corps was finally repulsed, and the Union line advanced to its former position. Colonel Salomon, with the 82d, made a charge upon the pits in his front, driving the Confederates back, with the loss of more prisoners than the number of his command. During the three days' fighting, Colonel Salomon had two horses shot under him, while leading his regiment, which was especially complimented by Generals Howard and Schurz, for its bravery and efficiency during the struggle. Its losses were one hundred and thirty-one killed, wounded and missing. Captain Emil Frey and Lieutenant Eugene Hepp, Co. "H," were taken prisoners. The 82d then joined in the pursuit of Lee, through Virginia, and then, on September 25, marched to Manassas Junction, en route for Tennessee. On October 19, Colonel Hecker was assigned to the command of the Third Brigade of Schurz's division, and the 82d regiment was transferred to that brigade.

On October 19, Hecker's brigade was advanced to Russell's Gap, a gorge in Raccoon Mountain, which it held and defended while Hooker's forces passed through the gap into Lookout Valley, and thence to Wauhatchie, at the foot of Lookout Mountain, where they arrived October 28. On that night, the 82d had an engagement with Law's division of Longstreet's corps, and afterward joined the main army in Lookout Valley.

The 82d, with the Eleventh Corps, remained in Lookout Valley until November 22, when it joined Grant's forces at Chattanooga, and participated, on the 23d, in the attack on the enemy, near Orchard Knob. On the 25th, Schurz's division participated in the attack on Mission Ridge, and the following day reported to General Sherman, and took part in the pursuit of Bragg's forces. The Eleventh Corps arrived at Cleveland, Tenn., November 29, and thence marched to Charleston, where orders were received to move to the relief of Burnside, at Knoxville. When this order was received, the troops under Sherman's command had no provisions nor a change of clothing; their shoes were almost worn out, and there was but a single blanket to a man, from Sherman down to the privates. A march of eighty-four miles was before them, through a mountainous country, in the middle of winter, and with the prospect of a battle at the end of the march.

This was all borne with the courage peculiar to the Union soldiers who felt, with Sherman, that "Twelve thousand fellow soldiers were beleaguered in the mountain town of Knoxville, that they needed relief, and must have it in three days. This was enough." The command reached Loudon, December 2, and then marched to Marysville, where intelligence was received of Longstreet's retreat, and the Eleventh Corps was ordered to return to Athens, and thence to Charleston and Chattanooga. At Chattanooga, the corps was returned to Hooker's command December 17, and again went into camp in Lookout Valley, moving to Whiteside, Tenn., in January, 1864.

In the reorganization of the army by Sherman for the Atlanta Campaign, the Eleventh and Twelfth corps, Army of the Potomac, were consolidated as the Twentieth Corps, Army of the Cumberland, under command of General Joseph Hooker. General Hecker resigned March 4, 1864, and the 82d, under Colonel Salomon, was assigned to the Third Brigade (Colonel J. S. Robinson), First Division (General Alpheus S. Williams), of the Twentieth Corps. The regiment left Whiteside on May 3, 1864, joined the corps at Triune on the 7th, and marched, by way of Snake Creek Gap, to Resaca, arriving there on the 13th. On the afternoon of the 14th, the enemy attacked our left. The troops resisted for a few moments; then wavered; and finally fell back, through the woods and over the barricades, toward and beyond Major Simonson's famous 5th Indiana Battery. A few stopped, after passing the barricade, to support the guns; but the Confederates charging the second time with terrible yells, the remnant of the brigade were put to flight, and nothing but Major Simonson, with his six guns, and his few brave men that manned them, seemed to stand between the army and disaster. Just then, a cheer was heard, and down the gorge came Robinson's brigade on the double-quick, and, charging across the field, drove the enemy back to the woods, and saved the battery and the left of the army. Every man of the brigade won the highest praise for gallantry.

The 82d occupied the field for the night, and on the following day was again engaged in an assault on the enemy's main line. On the morning of the 16th, the Confederates retreated from their works, and before daylight evacuated Resaca, and retreated across the Oostenaula River, the regiment joining in the pursuit.

On May 25, the 82d, with the First Division (General Williams), which was leading Hooker's column, became engaged with the enemy soon after crossing the bridge over Pumpkin Vine Creek, about half-way between Burnt Hickory and Dallas. The First Division was first brought into action, and was some time opposed alone to the attack of the whole Confederate force, but gained and held the advanced ground before the enemy's main line at New Hope Church, until reinforcements arrived. For their action in this affair, General Thomas publicly complimented the men on their bravery. Johnston's main line could not be carried; and on the 26th, the troops threw up intrenchments, which they occupied until the Confederates, under Johnston, evacuated their works on June 6. The loss of the 82d Illinois on the 25th, in the advance toward Dallas, was eleven killed and sixty-nine wounded, out of a total of two hundred and forty-five in the ranks. In the forward movement of Sherman's army, June 5, the 82d took part in the various skirmishes which finally dislodged the enemy from his position on Lost Mountain, west of Marietta.

On June 15, the 82d participated in an assault on the enemy's main line of works near Pine Mountain, there losing five killed; and, again, on the 17th, it lost one killed and three wounded in an attack on the enemy's intrenched position, south of Noses Creek. By June 23, Hooker had advanced toward Kenesaw, remaining near there until July 3, when, the Confederates having abandoned their works on Kenesaw Mountain, the First Division commenced the forward movement toward the Chattahoochee River. In the battle at Peach Tree Creek, Williams's division held the right of Harker's line, Geary's held the center, and Butterfield's (commanded by General Ward) the left. Robinson's brigade held the left of Williams's division. To the right of Hooker was General Palmer with the Fourteenth Corps, to the left was Newton's division of Howard's Fourth Corps. The following account of the battle, and particularly of that portion engaged in by Robinson's brigade, is from the pen of an officer of the First Division who participated in the engagement.*

"On the 19th instant, the Army of the Cumberland arrived in position south of the Chattahoochee and to the north of Atlanta. The Fourteenth Corps occupied the right wing the Fourth the left, and the Twentieth the center. The line extended along the north bank of Peach Tree Creek and in a direction perpendicular to the line of rebel works bordering the Chattahoochee.† The position thus adopted compelled the enemy to change his front, and assume a new line of defense. In the meantime, the armies of the Tennessee and the Ohio were expected shortly to sever the Georgia Railroad, near Stone Mountain, and to march toward Atlanta, in a direction threatening the right flank and rear of the rebel army.

"On the 20th instant, a general advance in the direction of Atlanta, was begun. By ten o'clock a. m., the Twentieth Corps had arrived in position on the heights skirting Peach Tree Creek on its south bank. The First Division joined the Fourteenth Corps on the right, the Second Division held the center, and the Third joined Newton's division of the Fourth Corps, on the extreme left. A heavy picket was thrown out, and was considered a sufficient precaution against any hostile demonstration of the enemy, since nothing was thought of but an advance against his position. The troops were permitted to rest quietly in the shade, and were not troubled with building the usual breastworks deemed necessary at each change of the line of battle. Temporary barricades of rails were thought a sufficient strengthening of the line for all necessary purposes.

"Thus the day wore away until two o'clock p. m. Comparatively little firing had followed the movements of the troops—just enough to reveal the presence and position of the enemy. The developments anxiously hoped for in the movements of McPherson and Schofield seemed to be awaited as the signal for active demonstrations by the Army of the Cumberland. But the enemy, appreciating the desperate condition to which he was being rapidly brought, rebought himself to make one bold, dashing, determined effort to thwart our designs. Accordingly, early in the afternoon a fierce, rapid fire broke out along our picket lines, which quickly grew into a volley-roll of musketry in front of Ward's and Geary's divisions. The storm soon extended along the line toward the right, where Williams's division lay grouped along the crest of a rather high and densely-wooded hill. Between Williams's and Geary's divisions lay a deep hollow, down which, marked by the timber, the enemy was now advancing in heavy masses. General Williams, with that sudden inspiration which characterizes true military genius, saw, at a glance, the arrangement of his troops which, according to the nature of the ground and the unexpected exigencies of the moment, was best adapted to meet this unlooked-for demonstration of the enemy. He hurried his brigades into position on the double-quick, and although they moved with all possible celerity, was unable to get them in their proper places ere they received a terrific fire from the enemy.

"Robinson's brigade hastened along the crest of the hill, then, facing by the left flank, marched down the slope to receive the swarming masses of the over-confident and defiant foe. The fire of the enemy was so murderous, and his advance so impetuous, that it seemed for a time as if Robinson's line must surely yield. It was an awful moment. The combatants were mingled with each other, and fighting hand to hand. The safety of the corps, and, indeed, of the entire army, seemed to depend upon the courage and determination of those devoted men. Should they give way, the enemy would gain possession of the hill, command the rear, break the center, capture hundreds of prisoners, all our artillery, and drive the remnant of our troops back to the creek, and, perhaps, to the Chattahoochee. But not one inch would those intrepid veterans yield. Though their ranks were fearfully thinned, and the tangled forest became strewn with bleeding forms as with autumn leaves, yet they determinedly maintained their position and compelled the enemy to withdraw, leaving his dead and wounded mingled with the brave heroes who had fought and fallen beneath the starry folds of the flag of the Union."

Another writer says:

"The rebel attack rolled toward the left until General Williams's division was fully engaged. It had advanced, to close up on Geary, General Knipe's brigade in the center, General Ruger's on the right and Colonel Robinson's on the left. It fought from four o'clock until long after dark, in a dense forest, without yielding a foot. It was a fair stand-up fight, in which Williams's division lost more heavily than any other in the engagement. When the enemy first advanced against Colonel Robinson's brigade the rebels held up their hands, as if to surrender, upon which, seeing our lads hesitate, they instantly poured a volley into them. These wretched and cowardly tactics were practiced on other portions of the line. * * * I have seen most of the battle-fields in the southwest, but nowhere have I seen traces of more deadly work than is visible in the dense woods in which Geary's right (and Williams's left) were found. Thickets were literally cradled by bullets, and on the large trees, for twenty feet on the trunk, hardly a square inch of bark remained. Many were torn and splintered with shell and round shot, the enemy in his attack on Geary and Williams using artillery, which they did not bring into action on other portions of the line."

The 82d Illinois performed its part worthily with the rest, each man firing from one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and forty rounds of ammunition during the three hours' engagement.

On the 22d, the Twentieth Corps moved to Atlanta, where the 82d, with its brigade, remained until the movement to Atlanta was commenced on the 27th. At this time, the Twentieth Corps was commanded by General Williams. At the Chattahoochee, General H. W. Slocum joined, and took command of the division, which, on September 2, entered and occupied Atlanta, Robinson's brigade joining the division and encamping near the city September 4, having marched that day from Montgomery Ferry on the Chattahoochee. From September 12, until October 4, the 82d guarded Confederate prisoners, and was then employed on the defenses around Atlanta until the 15th, when it formed part of extensive foraging expeditions.

On the 15th of November, with the Third Brigade (Colonel Robinson), First Division General N. J. Jackson), Twentieth Corps (General A. S. Williams), Left Wing, Army of Georgia, General I. W. Slocum, the 82d Illinois moved from Atlanta on the famous "march to the sea." The brigade moved out by the Decatur road on the 16th, and was then assigned as rear guard of the corps, and reached Milledgeville November 22. It then was made advance guard of the division and corps, and moved to the defenses around Savannah.

On the 28th, the regiment marched with the army through South Carolina, reaching Chesterfield March 1. On March 16, it was on the front line at Averysboro', being under fire from noon until dark, and losing about fifteen men. Again, on March 19, at Bentonville, the brigade was thrown to the front, and, being flanked, fell back and re-formed about a quarter of a mile in the rear, throwing down a rail fence for a barricade. There it maintained its position, the enemy charging several times, and being repulsed with great loss. In this action the 82d lost twenty-five men. On March 24, the command reached Goldsboro', where, after their march of sixty-five days, a permanent camp was formed, the men received new, and much needed, clothing, and revelled in the luxury of once again receiving full rations. On April 10, camp was broken, and the men arrived at Raleigh, N. C., on the 16th, when, after marching eighteen miles farther in pursuit of the Confederates, news was received of Johnston's surrender, and the 82d, with its corps, returned to Raleigh and went into camp.

On April 20th, they started for Washington, arriving at Alexandria, May 20, and, after participating in the grand review at Washington, on the 24th, the 82d was mustered out of service, at the same place, June 9, and returned to Chicago, arriving June 16; having marched, during its term of service, two thousand five hundred and three miles, and participated in many severe engagements, with honor to itself and the city which sent it to the field. The regiment returned with three hundred and ten men, under the following officers:

Colonel, Edward S. Saloman, brevet brigadier-general; Lieutenant-Colonel, Ferdinand Rolshausen; Adjutant, Otto Balk; Quartermaster, Hermann Panse; Surgeon, Charles E. Boerner; Assistant-Surgeon, Hermann Deitzel. Co. "A": Captain, Anton Bruhn; First Lieutenant, Charles E. Stueven. Co. "B": Captain, George Heinzmann; First Lieutenant, Eugene Hepp. Co. "C": Captain, Frank Kirchner; First Lieutenant, William Loeb. Co. "D": Captain, Rudolph Mueller. Co. "E": First Lieutenant, Moses O. Lindberg. Co. "F": Captain, Eugene F. Weigel; First Lieutenant, Frederick Thomas. Co. "G": First Lieutenant, Carl Lotz. Co. "H": Captain, Emil Frey; First Lieutenant, Joseph Riegert. Co. "I": Captain, Joseph Gottlob; First Lieutenant, Christian Erickson. Co. "K": Second Lieutenant, George Bauer.

The regiment was greeted at the depot by crowds of friends, and escorted to the Turner Hall, where it was welcomed by William Rapp, Esq., of the Staats Zeitung, Colonel Hecker, its old commander, and others; Colonel Saloman replying, in behalf of the regiment, to the numerous congratulatory speeches. On the 19th, it was tendered a public reception, at the great Sanitary Fair, then in progress, returning thereafter to Camp Douglas, where it received its final pay and discharge a few days later.

FRIEDERICH KARL FRANZ HECKER was born in Eichtersheim Grand Duchy of Baden, September 28, 1811. His father was a man of influence and culture, the fiscal agent of the celebrated Prince Primas of Dalberg, who bestowed on him the title of Aulic Councillor. Friederich was carefully educated, and, in 1830, entered the University of Heidelberg, afterward continuing his studies at Munich, where he passed a successful examination and was created Doctor of Laws. After practicing for a time at Karlsruhe, he went to Paris where he spent a year in the study of French law, and on his return to Germany married and settled at Mannheim, Baden, where he devoted himself to the practice of his profession. In 1833-34, he was drawn into politics and became one of the leaders of the movement in opposition to the existing government and in favor of a complete German union and free institutions. In 1842, he was elected a member of the Second Chamber of Deputies, and so strongly urged a representation of the people in the German Bundestag or Diet, which then was simply a permanent convention of the representatives of princes, that he was pronounced revolutionary and dangerous; but refusing all overtures from the Government he threw up his commission as representative, and sought rest and relief abroad. After his return to Baden, he was again elected representative, again became leader of the opposition, and was in that position at the time of the downfall of the Orleans dynasty in France (February 24, 1848) and the outbreak of the German revolution of the same year. After the failure of the people to establish a national government and the formation of a provisional regency of the empire, many of Hecker's former colleagues became supporters of the new government, despairing of the success of the national constitution formed at Frankfurt. He, however, remained true to the principles he had so long advocated, and roused the standard of revolt in the Duchy of Baden, proclaiming Germany a republic. The Government sent an army, under General Von Gagern, against the insurgents, and they were obliged to disband. Hecker withdrew to Switzerland, thence to France, and embarked at Havre for America. In May, 1849, a second insurrection broke out in Bavaria, Württemberg and Baden, in which the regular army joined the insurgents. Messengers were sent to New York to recall Hecker; but before he reached France this insurrection also had been quelled in a brief campaign, by the Prussian Army, and the National parliament at Stuttgart had been forcibly dissolved by Government. Hecker accordingly returned to America, and made himself a home near Lebanon, St. Clair Co., Ill. He purchased a farm, upon which he quietly resided until the outbreak of the Rebellion, when he was solicited to take command of the 24th Illinois Infantry, and accepted the command June 17, 1861. In December of the same year, he resigned and accepted the same position in the 82d Illinois. After the battle of Chancellorsville, in which he was severely wounded, he was placed in command of a brigade, and, with Hooker's corps, joined the Army of the Cumberland at Chattanooga. In March 1864, he resigned, and retired to his farm. He once visited his native land, in 1873, where he was received with the honors due his distinguished services and sacrifices in its behalf. Colonel Hecker died on March 25, 1881. His funeral was attended by delegations of distinguished citizens from many of the large western cities. Colonel Hecker was one of the grandest characters which the revolution of 1848 produced. A man of great influence and wealth, a lawyer of uncommon ability and wonderful eloquence, he sacrificed all his worldly possessions, honors and position to a true and unselfish patriotism, and became the acknowledged leader of the people's cause. The revolution of 1848 having failed, as stated, he fled to the United States, and established himself as a farmer in St. Clair County. There he became one of the staunchest anti-slavery agitators, and in all political campaigns before the outbreak of the Rebellion proved himself the most eloquent German speaker in the ranks of the Free Soilers. In the city of Cincinnati, as well as in St. Louis, the German population have erected to his memory an enduring and costly monument in one of the public squares. Colonel Hecker was married October 24, 1839. One of his children, Arthur, is farming on the old estate; Malvina, married to Rudolph Mueller, is living in Chicago, her husband being a merchant; Erwin, a farmer, lives near Summerfield, Ill.; and Alfred and Alexander, merchants, are residents of St. Louis.

GENERAL EDWARD S. SALOMON was born in Schleswig Holstein, December 25, 1836. He received a liberal education in his native city, adding the study of military science to the general branches she had hitherto pursued, when the revolution of 1848 and the war against Denmark aroused fresh interest in those studies among the German youth. At the close of the war, he went to Hamburg, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1854, when he emigrated from his fatherland, and made his home in America. He arrived in Chicago the following year, and for a short time was employed as a clerk in a small store in the North Division, and subsequently as bookkeeper in a hat and cap store. He commenced the study of law in 1853 with Davis & Buell, was admitted to the Bar the following year, and later became a member of the firm of Peck & Buell. In 1860, he was chosen alderman from the Sixth Ward, and occupied that position until the commencement of the war, when he gave up his law business, and entered the service as second lieutenant in the 24th Illinois Infantry. At the close of 1861, when Hecker resigned his position as colonel of the 24th regiment, Salomon, who had been successively promoted first lieutenant, captain and major, also resigned, and was instrumental in raising the 82d, or "Second Hecker Regiment," of which he was appointed lieutenant-colonel. At the time of the battle of Chancellorsville, the first serious battle in which the regiment was engaged, Lieutenant-Colonel Salomon was sick in Chicago, and consequently did not participate in the engagement, but joined his regiment in Virginia as soon as able, and commanded it during the three days' struggle at Gettysburg, receiving the encomiums of his division commander for his coolness and determination in repulsing the attack of Ewell on the right of the Union line on July 22. Colonel Hecker, who had been absent from his regiment on account of a wound received at Chancellorsville, returned to the field after Gettysburg. Lieutenant Colonel Salomon was appointed provost marshal general on General Howard's staff, and served in that capacity during the remainder of the summer. In September, Howard's corps was ordered to Chattanooga, to join the Army of the Cumberland. General Hecker was promoted brigadier-general, and assigned to the command of the brigade, and Lieutenant-Colonel Salomon succeeded him in the command of the 82d Illinois. With his regiment, he participated in the battle of Mission Ridge, the march to the relief of Burnside, and in the many and severe engagements of the Atlanta Campaign, during the summer of 1864, from May until September, including Resaca, Dallas, Pine Mountain, Kenesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek, and the siege and capture of the city of Atlanta. After the capture of Atlanta, Colonel Salomon was sent to Nashville with orders, and not being able to re-join his regiment before it set out on the march through Georgia, remained with General Thomas, and was assigned to the command of a brigade during the battles before Nashville in December. He then left, in command of some troops, for Savannah, where he re-joined his regiment, and participated in Sherman's march through South and North Carolina, taking quite a prominent part in the battles of Averysboro' and Bentonville. At the close of the war, he was appointed brevet brigadier-general, to date from March 13, 1865, for distinguished gallantry and meritorious services, and with his regiment returned to Chicago the following June. In the fall of 1865, he was elected by the Republicans as county clerk of Cook County, and held the office until November, 1869.

The 88th Illinois left Chicago September 4, 1862, under orders to report at Louisville, Ky. In the excited state of public feeling incident upon Bragg's invasion of Kentucky, and the necessity of hurrying Union forces to the front, this, like many other regiments, left for active service without arms or proper equipments, but on reaching Jeffersonville, two days later, received the needed supplies and immediately marched to Covington, opposite Cincinnati, which was threatened by a rebel force under Kirby Smith. Returning to Louisville, it was there assigned to the Thirty-seventh Brigade (Colonel Nicholas Gruesel), Eleventh Division (General Philip H. Sheridan), Army of the Ohio (General Buell). On the 1st of October, it moved with the command from Louisville in pursuit of Bragg, and on the 8th, just a month from leaving home, took a brave and honorable part in the bloody battle of Perryville, in which battle Sheridan's division occupied the left of the Federal line. At about three o'clock in the afternoon, Gruesel's brigade was ordered to the front, the 88th being detailed to the relief of the 36th Illinois, in support of a battery which occupied a commanding position in front of the enemy's right. This position it held, repulsing several attacks, until the rebels retreated—their right being the first to break—when, with the brigade, it followed in pursuit until the enemy were out of range. The regiment, both officers and men, were publicly complimented by the brigade commander, for their coolness and efficiency in this their first battle. The casualties reported were as follows:

Co. "A": Killed, John Johnson; mortally wounded, John Jackson; wounded, Thomas J. Hoge, Frank W. Gordon, William Kemp, Samuel Underhill. Co. "B": Mortally wounded, S. S. Correll; wounded, Corporal C. H. Sheldon, John Lynn, George A. Kilson. Co. "C": Wounded, David Hinchman. Co. The regiment joined in the pursuit of the rebel force to Crab Orchard, which point was reached on the 15th. There the pursuit was abandoned, and the command marched thence through Lebanon and Bowling Green to Edgefield, opposite Nashville, arriving at that place November 7. On the 17th of November, it crossed the Cumberland, and went into camp six miles south of Nashville, on the Nolensville pike.

In the reorganization of the army under Rosecrans, on November 20, Sheridan's division was assigned to McCook's corps, which formed the right wing of the Army of the Cumberland. The 88th Illinois still remained with Sheridan, forming a part of Sill's brigade, officially known as First Brigade, Third Division, Right Wing. With its division, the regiment moved from camp near Nashville, on the 26th of December, marching on the Nolensville pike toward Murfreesboro', where Bragg's army was concentrated. On the 30th, the command arrived before Murfreesboro', Sheridan's division forming the left of McCook's line-of-battle, Davis's the center, and Johnson's the right. The right of Sheridan's division was held by Sill's brigade, the 88th Illinois in first line-of-battle. On the morning of December 30, the brigade moved down the Wilkinson turnpike toward Murfreesboro', until the head of the column encountered the rebel pickets, who, after a sharp skirmish, were driven back and the command again advanced to a position about two and a quarter miles from the town, when General Sill formed line-of-battle to the right of the road down which he had advanced. In front of his position, beyond some open cotton-fields, was a heavy belt of timber occupied by the enemy's skirmishers. Artillery also was posted in this timber, but was dislodged during the day by Bush's battery, supported by the 88th Illinois and other regiments on the skirmish line, the rebel pickets being driven back to their main line. Major George W. Chandler, while leading the skirmishers, received a slight wound in the face, and his horse was killed by a misdirected shot from the brigade battery in the rear. Toward night, the brigade advanced over the cotton-field in its front, as far as Harding's house, where, throwing out pickets, the troops lay on their arms, without fires, through that bitterly cold winter night. Across the narrow valley in front of Sheridan's division the enemy had massed a heavy force, under shelter of a thick cedar wood, the narrowest point in the valley being directly in front of Sill's brigade, of which the 88th Illinois was the advanced regiment on the left. At day-break on the morning of the 31st, the enemy attacked the Right Wing. Johnson's division and the right of Davis's were driven back, and the exultant Confederates then concentrated their attacks on the left of Davis's line, held by Woodruff's brigade, and the right of Sheridan's, held by Sill's. They were bravely repulsed again and again, only to renew the assault. General Sill was killed while gallantly leading his men in a charge, after which his brigade retired slowly to its original position, and was formed in a line at right angles to the first, in support of its battery. Sheridan's division fought until its ammunition was exhausted and all of its brigade commanders killed. After six hours of the hardest fighting of the day, he ordered it to fall back—his men dragging all but eight of his guns through the cedars, in his rear, to the Murfreesboro' pike, where he re-formed his command.

Among the killed in the 88th Illinois at Stone River were:

Major Chandler was wounded in the battle, but remained on the field. Captain George W. Smith, Co. "A," was severely wounded, and was taken to a house on the field, which was captured by the enemy, when he was made prisoner. After remaining some four days in the hands of the rebels, he made his escape into the Union lines, on an old horse with a rope halter, without saddle, and which a negro helped him to mount, and was sent to Nashville, whence he returned to Chicago, and remained at his home until his wound permitted him to re-join his command, just at the beginning of the middle Tennessee campaign. Lieutenants Homer C. McDonald and Dean R. Chester, of Chicago, were among the wounded.

The especial part taken in the battle by the 88th is thus described by a participant:*

"The morning of the 31st of December, 1862, broke cold and cheerless. The men were stiff with the cold, having lain without fires, in a muddy cotton field, in front of Harding's house during the night. The position of the regiment was on the left of the brigade, and in the first line of battle. Day had scarcely dawned before the pickets opened fire all along the lines, and ere the sun had risen, the rebels advanced in force on the right wing under General McCook.

"Four regiments of the enemy marched directly on the position held by the 88th. Colonel Sherman gave orders that not a gun should be fired until he gave the word, and was obeyed. A brigade of four regiments in column were coming steadily on with their battle flags displayed. The regiment waited until the first line was within seventy-five yards of where it lay. With a yell, the enemy took the double-quick for the charge, and then our colonel gave the order to 'Fire, and fire low' A simultaneous discharge of all the muskets in his command answered, and as that volley went tearing through the rebel ranks, it shook them as if an earthquake was rumbling beneath their feet. So unexpected was the volley, that the whole column came to a dead halt, giving the 88th time to reload. Again the rebel officers succeeded in getting the column to advance; and again another volley, more terrible than the first, swept through their ranks, from the heavy guns with which the regiment was armed. This they could not face, and the remnant of the brigade sank to the ground to find shelter. The colonel now ordered his firing upon them as they lay, and soon drove them from our front in utter confusion.

"For six hours we were under heavy fire without cessation, and with empty cartridge boxes were forced from the field where Sheridan's division fought so nobly against overpowering numbers and saved the day. One hundred and fifty-one men, out of four hundred and sixteen, which was the effective force of the regiment in the morning, lay on the field at night or in the hands of the enemy."

Dr. George Coatsworth, the faithful and devoted surgeon of the regiment, died at Murfreesboro', January 9, 1863, of pneumonia, contracted on the field while faithfully laboring for the relief of the wounded. He had been like a tender brother and friend, both to the officers and "the boys" under his charge, and they alike deeply mourned his loss.

Lieutenant Joshua S. Ballard, of Chicago,—a young man only twenty-three years old, and the pride of the regiment, died in the hospital at Murfreesboro', April 9, 1863. He had just been appointed acting assistant-adjutant on Colonel Sherman's staff. After the battle of Stone River, Colonel Greusel, who succeeded General Sill, resigned, and Colonel Sherman was assigned to the command of the First Brigade, which he held until April 21, when he was relieved by General William H. Lytle, of Chicago. Lieutenant-Colonel Chadbourne being ill, Major George W. Chandler took command of the regiment, which he led, except during a brief interval, until his death at Kenesaw.

'The 88th remained in camp at Murfreesboro' until June 24. During this period, the Army of the Cumberland was reorganized for the coming campaign, the 88th Illinois, however, remaining in the First Brigade (General Lytle), Third Division (General Sheridan), Twentieth Army Corps (General McCook). Leaving Murfreesboro' on June 24, Sheridan's division reached Tullahoma on the 1st of July, and thence proceeded to Bridgeport, Ala., where, on the 2d of September, it crossed the Tennessee River, moved over the mountains to Trenton, and thence marched over Sand Mountain and up Wills' Valley to Alpine, Ga., where McCook's corps formed the extreme right of Rosecrans's army—about thirty miles from Thomas at Stevens' Gap, on its left. Rosecrans, finding that the enemy had evacuated Chattanooga and concentrated at LaFayette, twenty miles south of that point, ordered the immediate return of McCook's corps, and the concentration of all his forces along the east side of Chickamauga Creek. The roads were terrible, the weather was stormy, and rations were short, but the troops re-traced their steps as rapidly as possible, General Lytle's command, consisting of three brigades, forming the rear guard. Colonel Silas Miller commanded Lytle's brigade during the march to Chickamauga Creek; General Sherman was sick in Chicago, and the 88th was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Chadbourne.

On Saturday, September 19, the command overtook the remainder of the corps near Crawfish Springs, the extreme right of the line. During the day, two of McCook's divisions were ordered to report to Thomas at the left, and Sheridan to move to, and hold, Gordon's Mills. This was accomplished, and during the afternoon of the same day, two brigades of Sheridan's division were also withdrawn for the support of Thomas, leaving only Lytle's brigade to hold the position at Gordon's Mills. The brigade remained on the east bank of the creek during the day, and fell back about two hundred paces, to bivouac for the night, but before morning was ordered to close up on the center, and shorten the line of battle. Again, on the 20th, McCook was ordered to send two of Sheridan's brigades, "with all possible dispatch," to support the left. Lytle's and Walworth's (Bradley's) were hurried from the extreme right, and rushing down the Chattanooga road on the double quick, formed in rear of the Widow Glenn's house,—Rosecrans's headquarters. They had scarcely taken position when the center and right of the Federal line was fiercely assaulted, and they were ordered to change front and return to assist in repelling the onslaught. Longstreet's troops were now pouring through the fatal gap in the Union line, caused by the withdrawal of Wood's division. Davis, to the left, was driven back by the advancing enemy, taking with him Laibold's brigade of Sheridan's division. Then Lytle, in whose first line was the 88th Illinois, was struck by the yelling and exultant host. The command struggled bravely, fighting for half an hour against utterly hopeless odds, but, finally, out-flanked and subjected to a murderous front and flank fire, was compelled to withdraw, to escape annihilation or capture. The gallant Lytle, brigade commander, was shot at this point, and the 88th lost very heavily—about one hundred men out of the three hundred with which it went into action. After the death of General Lytle, Colonel Miller took command of the brigade, and under him it marched to Rossville, and bivouacked for the night.

The war correspondent of the Chicago Tribune wrote of this regiment as among the bravest, saying that if he were to particularize all who distinguished themselves, he would have to send almost the entire roster. He mentions, however, the gallantry of Lieutenant-Colonel Chadbourne, who, although suffering from the pain of a severe contusion of the thigh, still retained command; Major Chandler, "urbane and pleasant, yet brave as a lion," whose voice rang cheerily out, above the din and tumult and roar of battle, crying, "Come on, boys; I won't ask you to go where I am afraid to lead"; Adjutant Orson C. Miller, "quiet and self-centered, yet full of daring and endurance"; Captain George W. Smith, then senior line officer, who, acting for a time as a field officer, "was in all places where the battle raged fiercest"; and Captain John A. Bross, who, his company being on picket at the time of the enemy's attack, not only extricated his men with consummate skill, but fought his way back, step by step, that his regiment might have more time to prepare for the shock.

The list of casualties is incomplete. The regiment lost eight killed, three mortally wounded, twenty-seven seriously and twenty-six slightly wounded, seventeen missing.

Among the killed, were Henry J. Brook and William R. Silex. Among the wounded were Lieutenant-Colonel Chadbourne; Captains J. W. Chickering and George A. Sheridan; Lieutenants Alexander C. McMurry, William Lawrence, Henry C. Griffin, Henry W. Bingham, Noah W. Rae; Corporal M. I. Metcalf; Privates A. J. Hayes, John M. Holly, Andrew German, Jacob Wright, Patrick Reynolds, Thomas O'Neil, Brice Worley, H. H. Hoff, and W. Best.

The regiment threw up intrenchments near Rossville, which it occupied until noon of the 22d, when it marched to Chattanooga, and was there employed on the fortifications until the reorganization of the army and the assignment of General Thomas, on October 16, to the command of the Army of the Cumberland. In the reorganization, the Twentieth and Twenty-first corps of McCook and Crittenden were discontinued, and the Fourth Corps, General Granger, was organized. The 88th Illinois was assigned to the First Brigade (Colonel Francis T. Sherman), Second Division (General Phil. H. Sheridan), Fourth Corps. On the 23d of November, Sheridan's and Wood's divisions captured "Orchard Knob," the most advanced of the enemy's works before Chattanooga, and it became thereafter the headquarters of Grant and Thomas. On the 25th, the assault on Mission Ridge was made, Sheridan's division forming the right center of the charging column. At about half past three in the afternoon, the signal—six guns fired in rapid succession from Bridge's battery, on Orchard Knob—was given, and eager troops set forward. Three lines of rifle-pits were to be captured—the first near the foot of the ridge, the second about half way up, and the third on the crest, where the heavy breastworks were protected by some fifty pieces of artillery. Lieutenant-Colonel Chandler, commanding the 88th at Mission Ridge, said, in his report of the battle:

"The regiment on the 23d (November) was on picket in front of Fort Negley, when the movement of the army was begun. We were relieved on the morning of the 24th, and ordered to join our brigade, which had moved to the left during the night. At eleven o'clock, on the 25th, under the direction of Colonel Sherman, I took position behind the breastworks on the picket line to the left of the road leading out from the left of Fort Negley. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the regiment, with the brigade, advanced to the rise of ground on which had been the enemy's picket line, where it was halted. The regiment occupied the right of the second line, and, at three o'clock, under the immediate direction of Colonel Miller, who had the direction of the second line, moved to the assault of the enemy's works on Mission Ridge.

"We advanced in quick time, until we reached the edge of the timber, when we took the 'double-quick' across the plain, a distance of half a mile, to the first line of works, the enemy firing into our ranks from the first line, and pouring grape and canister from the batteries on the crest of the ridge. Here, under the little shelter afforded by this first line of works, the men sank from exhaustion. We remained here only a few minutes, and advanced to the second line, driving the enemy in confusion before us. The men were now so completely exhausted, and there was kept up such a galling fire from the enemy, that a farther advance seemed out of the question. A few moments of rest, however, and they followed the colors, which were ordered forward. The advance was slow, but sure, having to contend not only with the direct fire, but enfilading fire from the right. When near the upper works of the enemy, we halted, waiting for the troops on our right to move forward and draw from us the fire which enfiladed our line of advance. This fire not in any way diminishing, I ordered the colors forward on the works, which a moment afterward were carried, and the 'Stars and Stripes' waved triumphantly on Mission Ridge, the enemy being in full retreat in great confusion. The distance from where the charge was begun to the top of the ridge was at least one and a half miles across a wide, open plain, and up a long steep hill, protected by three lines of rifle-pits—one at the foot, the second about half way up, and a third on the crest of the ridge, with artillery at the top. The time occupied was about one and a half hours. The regiment rested on the ridge until about one o'clock the next morning, when, with the brigade, we moved to the front, a mile and a half, and halted until about ten o'clock, when we moved forward to Chickamauga Creek. In the afternoon we returned to camp.

"I desire to make honorable mention of the officers of this regiment, all of whom did their duty most gallantly. Captain George W. Smith, of Co. "A," acting field officer, was conspicuous for his bravery while urging on the almost exhausted men, until, about two-thirds of the way up the hill, he fell, severely wounded. First Lieutenant Dean R. Chester, commanding Co. "G," was shot through the leg while crossing the plain, but gallantly led his company to the second line of works.

"Second Lieutenant Henry L. Bingham, commanding Co. "H," was killed just before reaching the second line, but proved himself entirely worthy the straps he had so recently mounted. First Lieutenant Edward E. Tucker, commanding Co. "D," was conspicuous for his daring, moving among the men and urging them forward. Sergeant Richard Realf was everywhere, urging on those who fell behind from other regiments, as well as those of our own. It affords me great satisfaction to mention our brave color-bearer, Sergeant John Cheever, who gallantly carried our banner, planting it always in the advance, for the regiment to rally on; never letting it trail in the dust, but waving it encouragingly to those behind and defiantly to the enemy before him; never faltering until he waved it over the top of Missionary Ridge. It is difficult to select any one from the ranks, and give him special mention, where all behaved so well; but I must mention Corporal Thomas Lacy, of Co. "K," and private William Ibsester, of Co. "C," who seemed to vie with the colors for the advance."

In the charge on Mission Ridge, Lieutenants Charles H. Lane, Co. "C," and Henry L. Bingham, Co. "H," both of Chicago, were killed. Among the wounded were First Lieutenants Sylvester Tismouth and William Lawrence, and Second Lieutenant Lewis B. Cole, all of Chicago.

On the return of the 88th to camp at Chattanooga, it was ordered, with its division, to prepare for a forced march to Knoxville to relieve Burnside, there besieged by Longstreet.

After a march of one hundred and thirty miles the command reached Knoxville on the 7th of December, just in time to join in the pursuit of Longstreet, who, on learning of the advance of the Union forces, raised the siege, December 4, and retreated toward Virginia. General Sherman returned to Chattanooga with his own corps, leaving Granger's corps to strengthen the Army of the Ohio in East Tennessee; and, after the pursuit of Longstreet was ended, it was stationed in the vicinity of Knoxville, at Blain's Cross Roads for the remainder of the winter. The campaign in East Tennessee was an uneventful one, the 88th meeting the enemy but once; when, in January, 1864, Longstreet temporarily left his winter quarters near Morristown and marched to Dandridge, about forty-five miles from Knoxville, where he was met by Granger's corps, and a slight engagement ensued. The men during that winter fought a much harder battle than that with the enemy. Hard marches over execrable roads, short rations, and scanty clothing and shelter, tried patience and endurance sorely. The weather was bitterly cold, the new year opening with a gale from the northwest, which reduced the temperature below zero; yet, through it all, the soldiers kept up their courage and spirits, and, hovering round their camp fires, some without coats, some without pantaloons, some with tattered blankets tied like petticoats about their waists, greeted with hearty cheers each new announcement that another regiment had veteranized.

In the early spring of 1864, Granger was relieved of the command of the Fourth Corps, and Major-General Howard took his place. In the reorganization of the army for the Atlanta campaign, Colonel Sherman continued in command of the brigade, the 88th Illinois was assigned thereto, in Newton's division, Howard's (Fourth) corps, which was ordered to concentrate at Cleveland, Tenn., in preparation for the forward movement. On May 3, it broke camp at Cleveland, and moved to Catoosa Springs, near Ringgold, Ga., where Howard formed his line of battle, Newton's division forming the left, Stanley's the center, and Wood's the right. On the 7th, Newton's division, consisting of Sherman's, Wagner's and Harker's brigades, arrived at the foot of "Rocky Face," an almost inaccessible ridge, rising some five hundred feet above the level of the surrounding country, the crest of which was a sheer precipice of solid rock, in height from twenty to sixty feet. Mill Creek Gap, a narrow gorge through Rocky Face, commonly called Buzzard's Roost, was traversed by the Atlantic & Western Railway, and by the direct wagon road to Dalton, where Johnston's army was concentrated. The enemy had strengthened this pass with artillery, and taken up position there, on being driven from Tunnel Hill. On the 8th, Harker's brigade, of Newton's division, was thrown up the steep northern face of the ridge, driving back the enemy about three miles, along its crest. The following day Sherman's and Wagner's brigades were advanced to the same position, but were unable to proceed farther, the enemy holding a strongly fortified gorge in front, upon which five separate assaults were vainly made. On the 12th, Johnston's forces evacuated Buzzard's Roost, the position having been turned, and fled, through Dalton, southward to Resaca. The 88th, with Newton's division, joining in the pursuit, marched down the western side of Rocky Face, and passed through Snake Creek Gap to Dalton, joining the other divisions of the corps at Resaca the following day.

On the 14th, it participated in the battle of Resaca, its position being on the left of the Federal line. The brigade was ordered to advance and relieve a brigade in front, that had carried, but could not hold, a portion of the enemy's outer defenses. To reach this position, the troops had to cross Camp Creek, and move across an open field, under a severe fire of artillery and musketry. After the intrenchments were reached, a desperate struggle ensued for their possession, but the enemy was finally forced back, and established a new line several hundred yards in rear. On the 15th, the 88th, with Newton's division, was moved toward the right of the line, and, on the evacuation of the town by the enemy, was given the advance in the pursuit, crossing the Oostenaula River at Resaca, and moving down the direct road toward Calhoun and Adairsville. As the division reached the latter place, the enemy's rear guard were met in strong force, having taken a position and thrown up barricades, behind which they succeeded in resisting, for a short time, the advance of the column.

On the 16th, Hardee's rear guard was driven into Cassville; on the 20th, Johnston's army crossed the Etowah, and the Federal army went into camp for a few days' rest. On the 23d of May, Newton's division crossed the Etowah, and on the 25th was ordered to the support of Hooker, who was engaged with Hood's corps at New Hope Church. After the evacuation of Dallas, June 5th, the Fourth Corps moved to Ackworth, leaving Kimball's brigade to guard the hospitals until the wounded could be safely removed. A force of rebel cavalry attempted to take these shelters of wounded men, and succeeded in capturing a few mutilated prisoners. In the advance of the army, Kenesaw Mountain was reached on the 20th; and, on the 24th, the Fourth Corps, Newton's division holding the center, was ordered to attack and, if possible, carry an advanced line of the enemy's fortifications. The assault was made in the forenoon. The rebel skirmishers in front of Newton were driven from their rifle-pits, and the command advanced to the foot of the ridge, on the crest of which was a strong line of works; but they were there stopped, and forced to fall back to the line of intrenchments just vacated by the enemy. These they took, and held possession of; and so near were they to the enemy's lines that the skirmishers who occupied them could easily converse with the skirmishers of the enemy. On the 24th, Sherman ordered an assault to be made on the enemy's works on the 27th. Of the three storming columns, Newton's division was selected to assault the enemy's left center, to the southward of Kenesaw.

On the morning of the 27th, preparations for the assault commenced, and at half-past eight the signal for the charge was given. It is thus described in the letter of an army correspondent:

"The ground in front of Newton is open and rolling. The rebel main works occupy a light ridge covered with timber, and his batteries sweep the whole space between the lines. Harker's brigade, on the right, was formed in column of divisions, left in front, and Wagner in the same order on the left. Kimball's brigade retired on Wagner's left, with orders to guard the flank, and support whichever of the brigades seemed the weakest, and was formed in column of divisions, right in front. Harker, debouching from the forest, is met by a withering fire of artillery and musketry, but still holds straight forward toward the rebel works. Finding that Wagner and he are moving in such close proximity as to create confusion, should he desire to deploy, Harker obliged to the right, moved off again slowly under a very destructive fire, and Wagner hastened forward to a depression where his men might be sheltered somewhat from the seething fire of grape and canister that swept through and tore his ranks. Think of columns, at the distance of six hundred yards from artillery, having a continuous storm of grape and canister, and you have the ordeal through which these brave fellows passed.

"Wagner was still exposed to enfilading fire from artillery, and soon from the flank fire of infantry that the enemy sent out to effect his dislodgement. During the advance, Wagner's troops were struck so heavily at the very first shot, that a good portion crumbled off and drifted to the rear. Enfiladed, and unused to such formations for battle, it required all the firmness and sternness at command to keep the men to the work.

"Now and then a little silt from the line, like the premonitory snow-slides that warn of the avalanche, drifted back; and Kimball was ordered up to Wagner's relief — to pass over him, and, if possible, to enter the rebel works. The rebels perceiving the movement, sallied out, and, forming on Kimball's left, annoyed him very much. An order came to 'Form in column of battalion,' and at once the lines took a shape in which the troops were more readily handled; it was a return to the 'good old style,' as the boys said; and then the battle raged furiously. * * * Kimball and Wagner battle on, essay again and again to advance, and at last push up to the very works, when a terrible volley sweeps through the line, cutting down many of their bravest, trustiest officers. Kimball loses the brilliant Chandler, the light of whose intellect seemed to illumine every difficult subject and adjust it with the wisdom of a sage."

The 88th Illinois, now commanded by Major George W. Smith, entered Marietta with its command, which marched thence to Roswell on the Chattahoochee River, crossed the river on 9th of July, and fortified the hills on the southern bank. On July 9, while north of the Chattahoochee River, Colonel Sherman, then chief of Howard's staff, was riding out, unattended except by an orderly, and passed over a portion of the road which our pickets had occupied the preceding day, but from which they had been withdrawn without his knowledge. Intent upon the purpose of his reconnoissance, before he was aware, he was in the midst of rebel pickets, who took him without firing a shot, and carried him prisoner to headquarters on the south side of the river, calling out, in triumph, to our pickets that they had "Got old Sherman," believing that they had captured the commander-in-chief of the army. Colonel Sherman was kept a prisoner three months, when he was exchanged, and returned to Chicago.

Newton's division re-joined its corps at Phillip's Ferry, arriving on the 13th. On the 20th, it crossed Peach Tree Creek on the Buckhead road bridge, the other divisions of Howard's corps being two miles to the left. About noon, the order for the advance on Atlanta was given, and the column moved forward about half a mile south of the creek, driving the rebel sharpshooters back through the woods, and formed on a ridge covering the road to Collier's Mill, Kimball's brigade on the right, Blake's on the left, and Bradley's in reserve on the road leading to the bridge to the rear.

Fresh skirmishers were thrown forward, and the advanced brigades commenced throwing up a barricade of rails and logs in front of their position. Before their task was completed, Watkins's and Bate's divisions of Hardee's corps appeared moving down from the forest in front, "their columns seeming to be endless." Our skirmishers were driven back to the frail defenses, and Walker came swooping down on the brigades in front, while Bate aimed for the road leading to the bridge across Peach Tree Creek. As the long line charged down on Newton's troops, far outflanking Kimball on the right, Goodspeed's guns opened as they reached a point about seventy-five yards from the barricade, and every musket in the front was blazing. The line wavered; and the guns of a Michigan battery, hastily brought into action on Kimball's right, added to their demoralization. In twenty minutes, they were completely routed, and Newton's troops, "their lines so thin that they looked like skirmish deployments," so much territory had he to hold, were masters of the field. Could Newton's left be turned, the army would be divided and Atlanta saved; and Hood did not rest satisfied with his first attempt, although it was repulsed along the whole line from left to right. Toward night, he again attacked Newton's position; but batteries were placed so as to sweep the valley of Clear Creek, on which the left rested, and the enemy was again driven back, leaving two hundred dead in front and to the left of Newton's line. Hood's forces withdrew from their intrenchments south of Peach Tree Creek, on the night of the 20th, and the following morning the Federal army closed in on Atlanta. The division of which the 88th Illinois formed a part did not participate in the battle before Atlanta, July 22, the Fourth Corps forming the extreme right. On the 27th, Howard relinquished command of his old corps, to assume command of the Army of the Tennessee, rendered vacant by the death of Major-General McPherson on the 22d. The command of the Fourth Corps was assigned to Major-General D. S. Stanley.

Under Stanley, the division took part in the siege of Atlanta, and during the gradual investment of the city was ordered to destroy the Macon Railroad, the enemy's last line of communication, and then attack Hardee at Jonesboro'. The Macon railway was reached September 1, and Newton's and Kimball's divisions tore up and destroyed every rail from Rough and Ready to within two miles of Jonesboro', and then line-of-battle was formed with Opdycke's brigade, holding the center of Newton's division. The rebel skirmishers had taken position and thrown up barricades in front of their main fortifications, which they defended stubbornly, but were driven back upon the reserves, leaving many prisoners. During the night, Hardee evacuated Jonesboro', and retreated toward the south, the command following, in pursuit, to Lovejoy's Station, sixteen miles southeast of Atlanta, on the Macon Railroad, where the enemy was found strongly intrenched, with an advanced line of skirmishers in rifle-pits. The pits were captured, and the command remained at Lovejoy, the advance holding the rifle-pits, until the 5th of September, when orders were received announcing that the campaign had ended, and that the army would fall back to Atlanta, rest one month, and "prepare for a winter's campaign." At the termination of the Atlanta campaign, Brigadier-General D. S. Wagner succeeded Major-General Newton in the command of the Second Division, Fourth Corps.

The 88th Illinois was assigned to Colonel Emerson, Opdycke's brigade, Wagner's division, with which it proceeded to Chattanooga, in the latter part of September, to strengthen the garrison at that place. On the 26th of October, the remainder of the Fourth Corps was detached, and proceeded to Chattanooga, with orders to report to Thomas, at Nashville, for the coming campaign. When it was known that Hood had crossed the Tennessee, and concentrated his army on its northern bank, at Tusculumbia and Florence, in pursuance of his design to march on Nashville, General Thomas ordered Stanley to move, with his command, to Pulaski, on the railroad connecting Nashville and Decatur, but practically the southern terminus of railroad communication from Nashville, owing to the destruction of the railroad bridges between it and Decatur. On November 3, the Fourth Corps reached Pulaski, where it was joined on the 11th by General Schofield, who assumed command of all the forces concentrated there, consisting of Stanley's corps and Cox's division of the Twenty-third Corps. By November 15, when Sherman took his departure from Atlanta on his famous march through Georgia to the sea, Forrest's cavalry had joined Hood, and the Confederate leaders were hurrying their preparations for a march, in the hope of placing their army between Schofield and Nashville, before he could reinforce Thomas at that place. The advance of the enemy was begun on the 20th, and Schofield, sending his surplus stores from Pulaski, retreated to Columbia, Wagner's division covering the rear. During the night of the 27th, the whole of Schofield's army moved to the north side of Duck River, at Columbia, destroying the pontoon and railroad bridges, to prevent the passage of Hood's forces, which were close behind. From this point, the wagon trains were sent forward to Spring Hill, and Wagner's division, Opdycke's brigade in the advance, was ordered to the same place, for their protection. Before reaching Spring Hill, news was received that Forrest had crossed Duck River during the night, and was moving on the town. The troops were hurried forward on the double-quick, and arrived at almost the same moment with Forrest.

Opdycke's and Lane's brigades were posted in a position to cover the approach to the village and to protect the army trains and the railroad. Without a moment's halt, the 88th, now consolidated with the 74th Illinois, was deployed as a skirmish line, and soon succeeded in driving the enemy from its front. Bradley's brigade of the same division, posted in a somewhat isolated position to the east of the turnpike, was attacked by a heavy force of the enemy under Cleburne, and was obliged to fall back, General Bradley being severely wounded. Captain Lyman Bridges, of Chicago, did good service with his batteries, his effective fire leading the rebels to believe that the whole army was at Spring Hill. During the night of the 29th, Wagner's division remained in the position it had occupied during the day, waiting for the remainder of the army to come up. Early in the morning, as soon as troops were in movement toward Franklin, Opdycke's brigade was again designated as rear guard for the army, the 88th Illinois still forming the rear skirmish line. The regiment arrived at Franklin about noon on the 30th, having several sharp skirmishes with the rebel cavalry on the route. Before its arrival, a line of intrenchments had been thrown up at the southern edge of the village by the advance troops. These were on both sides of the Columbia turnpike, the width of the road being open to enable the trains and artillery to pass. When Opdycke's brigade reached Franklin, it was placed as reserve on the west of the Columbia turnpike, two or three hundred yards in rear of the main line of intrenchments, and the other two brigades of Wagner's division were posted on the same road, about half-a-mile in front of the main line, with directions to retire within the intrenchments and join Opdycke's brigade, as reserves, when Hood should advance in force.

At about half past three o'clock, Hood's forces appeared before Franklin, the center moving down the Columbia turnpike. "Along a mile and a half of front, the imposing array of the Confederate army could be seen, advancing at quick-step, with trailed arms, the artillery in the intervals galloping forward, unlimbering and firing as soon as they were within range." Just at this juncture, through some mistake, Wagner's two advanced brigades unfortunately received an order to fire, instead of to fall back to the reserves; and as the immense rebel host rushed on them with a cheer and a yell, they were swiftly driven back, broken and demoralized, seeking to gain the shelter of the breastworks in their rear. As they swarmed over the works, followed closely by the charging columns of the enemy, the brigades of the Twenty-third Corps, occupying the works near the turnpike, were trampled down and carried back by the panic-stricken, disorganized mass, leaving a space the length of a regiment unoccupied on each side of the road. Over the parapet rushed the rebels, and had just captured four guns, when the reserves, headed by Opdycke, were upon them. Says a soldier of the 88th, who participated in the struggle :

"Rebel yells of triumph rang in our ears, and we all knew that unless on our part there was instant fighting, as furious and desperate as last hope could make it, nothing but irretrievable disaster could possibly result. In the twinkling of an eye, therefore, our brigade was under arms. There was no time to form brigade front; we charged by regiments, the consolidated 88th leading and clearing the way. Colonel Smith, Major Holden and Adjutant Realf were on horseback; there was indeed no time to dismount had we desired to do so. In all my life I never saw, in all my readings I never read of, a more knightly scene than when Colonel Smith, at the head of the charging column, cap in hand, dashed hither and thither in the white heat of the fray, nerving the brave, shaming the coward—an unconscious hero every inch of him. Presently his horse was shot; presently, the major's—the adjutant's escaped being hit. Well, an awful time, for a while, we had of it. I never saw hand-to-hand fighting before. Captain Barnard shot two rebels with his revolver; Corporal Newman, of company 'G,' nearly severed a rebel captain's head with an ax; somebody actually pinned a rebel soldier to the breastworks by the stroke of a pick-ax. I saw a rebel color-bearer knocked flat with the butt-end of a musket, and there were bayonets without number. But, thank God, we stayed the rebel tide. Then, when we had things safe, we got up the stragglers, and by and by affairs assumed shape and order. But Hood was not content; again and again, until the eleventh time, he charged us with desperate frenzy. The slaughter was horrible; the ground was actually slippery with blood and gore."

The account is not too highly drawn. Probably there was no more terrible fighting during the war than at Franklin; and to Colonel Opdycke and his brave men is universally accorded the credit of saving the army there.

Confederate officers were slain on the parapet, leading their command to the assault, and their men lay piled in heaps around them. Cleburne's division, which met the charge of Opdycke's brigade, left a thousand officers and men, besides its leader, on the field. In Quarles's brigade, a captain was the ranking officer at the close of the battle. Quarles, Adams, Strahl and Stafford were only four of the distinguished rebel officers that met their death in the deadly assaults of that day. Twelve Confederate generals and a long list of colonels were among their slain.

At midnight, Schofield's army withdrew to the north-side of the Harpeth River, Opdycke's brigade, of which the 88th Illinois formed the rear guard, bearing from the field, as trophies of its valor, ten battle flags of the enemy; of which the 88th captured one division and four regimental. On the morning of December 1, the troops arrived at Nashville, where the Fourth Corps (temporarily commanded by General Wood, General Stanley being disabled by a wound received at Franklin) was assigned the center of General Thomas's line of defenses around the city. While in camp at that place, Generals Thomas, Wood and Wagner paid the regiment a visit, and publicly thanked it for the important services it had performed at Franklin, saying, that with the exception only of Colonel Opdycke, commanding the brigade—with whom he shared the honor—"to the special gallantry and exertions of Colonel Smith, more than to those of any other man, was due the repulse of the rebel column, the safety of the army and the victory of the day."

Major Smith, who, after the death of Lieutenant-Colonel Chandler, had been promoted lieutenant-colonel, and had been acting colonel of the 88th, was brevetted colonel after the battle of Franklin.

The command of the Second (Wagner's) Division was assigned to General Elliott at Nashville, and, in the battle of the 15th of December, it formed the right of the Fourth Corps, storming and entering the enemy's works before the city, just after the assault on Montgomery Hill. The division took three pieces of artillery and many prisoners. After resting awhile in the captured works, it marched in pursuit of Hood's army, toward the Franklin pike. Darkness coming on before the command reached the pike, the troops bivouacked that cold December night on the field, with orders to advance at daylight the following morning; if the enemy was in front to attack him; if he had retreated, to pursue him till found. At daylight, the command again advanced toward the enemy, Elliott's division leading. Driving the enemy's skirmishers steadily back, it gained the Franklin pike, and pushed forward until within about a half-mile of the enemy's main line of defense in the Brentwood Hills. The division was not engaged in the bloody assault upon Overton Hill, but, on the repulse of the brave column thrown forward to carry that position, moved forward to the assault of the works in its front, which were carried and many prisoners captured. The division bivouacked at night within a mile of the Brentwood Pass—the point where the pike from Nashville to Franklin passes through the Brentwood Hills—and the following morning continued the pursuit over a road strewn with arms, accoutrements, blankets, and everything the enemy could divest himself of in his retreat. On the 18th, the head of the column reached Rutherford Creek, a rapid stream, which the heavy rains of the last day had swollen to a torrent. The enemy had destroyed all the bridges as he retreated, and on the southern bank of this stream had posted artillery and infantry to contest its passage. It could not be forded, and rafts were unmanageable, being carried away by the force of the torrent as soon as launched. Forest trees were felled, in the hope that some might be found high and strong enough to span the river, but all expedients were futile. The pontoon train was not yet up, and, until the enemy could be driven from the opposite bank, a bridge could not be constructed.

Late in the afternoon a small body of troops succeeded in crossing on the ruins of a railroad bridge below, and drove the enemy from the southern bank. The following day, Opdycke's brigade constructed a bridge, over which the infantry passed, and marched that night to the northern bank of Duck River. The Fourth Corps continued the pursuit to Lexington, Ala., where, by order of General Thomas, it was discontinued. This pursuit, the commanding general said, was without a parallel in the war. It was continued for more than a hundred miles, at the most inclement season of the year, over a road, the whole of which was bad, and thirty miles of which were wretched almost beyond description. From Pulaski to Lexington the depth of mud was unfathomable. Nearly all the artillery had to be left at the former place, that extra horses might be attached to the few pieces taken forward, and but a small amount of ammunition or supplies of any kind could be taken beyond Pulaski. The pursuit being discontinued, the command marched to Huntsville, Ala. where the 88th, with its brigade, went into camp January 5, 1865, and remained until March, 1865. During March, the regiment participated in an expedition to Bull's Gap, East Tennessee, and in May moved to Nashville, where it was mustered out of service June 9. On June 12, it arrived in Chicago, and was quartered at Camp Douglas for the night. The following day, with the 89th Illinois (Railroad Regiment), it received a public welcome at the Chamber of Commerce, from the Board of Trade and from the Railroad companies of Chicago. The 88th left Chicago with nine hundred names on its rolls; it returned with two hundred and nine, all told—the remainder having fallen victims to the casualties of war. Its worn and tattered flags, inscribed with the names of Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, Resaca, Peach Tree Creek, Franklin, were brought triumphantly home; and the old flag, which they bore with them from Chicago, was returned—a bunch of shreds—to the Board of Trade, who had presented it.

This sketch of the 88th Illinois is fittingly closed in the words of Colonel Smith, at the reception of his regiment, in Chicago, by the Board of Trade. After a brief account of the services of the command, he says:

"As I remember the time that we went out from here—nine hundred strong,—and think now that we have come back, bringing with us, of these men, only two hundred and nine, I think of the men we have left buried in their simple graves, all the way through Kentucky and to below Atlanta. There they lie, an honor to their country and an honor to you all. We have lost, by battle, by the casualties of the service and by sickness, the balance of our number. We have never been recruited, with the exception of some fifteen or twenty men.

"I can not refrain, gentlemen, as I am standing here, from saying a word in behalf of the memory of one whom you all loved, and of whom you all have often heard—to whom, as much as to any other man, the discipline, the drill and the efficiency of the 55th regiment is due. A braver, truer, nobler man never breathed; we lost him in the assault, last June, on Kennesaw Mountain—Lieutenant-Colonel George W. Chandler. I might mention other officers, from their positions less conspicuous, equally gallant and brave; and if I had the names, I could read to you, from the ranks, an array of men who have fallen bravely fighting; good, true, honest, earnest men—men who went out and attacked their enemies with a purpose, and died nobly maintaining that purpose."

The roster of the 88th, on its return, was as follows:

Brevet Colonel commanding, George W. Smith; Major, Levi P. Holden; Adjutant, Richard Realf; Acting Adjutant, A. C. McMurtry; Quartermaster, Edward G. Tacker; Surgeon, William P. Pierce, Assistant Surgeon, Fred. E. Kopp; Chaplain, Joseph C. Thomas. Co. "A": Captain, John H. Merrill; First Lieutenant, Albion G. Burnap. Co. "B": Captain, Henry H. Cushing; First

FRANCIS T. SHERMAN, who has been a citizen of Chicago for the past fifty years, is a native of Connecticut, born in Newtown, December 31, 1825. His father was Hon. Francis C. Sherman, who, with his family, came to Chicago in 1834, and engaged in the manufacture of brick, erecting, also, the first brick business house built in Chicago. He subsequently built a great number of buildings here, notable among which is the Sherman House, which is now one of the oldest hotels in the city. The mother of Francis T. Sherman was Electra Trowbridge, daughter of Reuben Trowbridge, of Danbury, Conn., and a woman noted for her force of character, strong intellectuality, blended harmoniously with all those traits that form the highest type of true womanhood. Francis T. grew up in what was then the frontier town of Chicago; and, when not in school, was engaged in helping his father to earn the family livelihood. Their first brick-yards were located out on the prairie; which then meant that portion of the city bounded by Adams Street on the south, Madison on the north, and the river on the west; and here the son used to work, driving an ox-cart, hauling clay, filling the pits, and doing all sorts of rough labor about the yards. From the age of eighteen until he was twenty-four, he was employed, successively, as clerk in a grocery store, in the Chicago post-office, and as secretary to the Board of Appraisers of Canal Lands. All health compelling him to resign the latter position, he went to California in the spring of 1849, and there remained until November, 1850. On his return to Chicago, he engaged in business, which he continued until the summer of 1861. In October, of that year, he entered the Union army, as lieutenant-colonel of the 57th Illinois Infantry Volunteers, an organization known as the Mechanics' Fusiliers. This regiment was soon disbanded, being mustered out of service in February, 1862. On March 8, following, he was again mustered into service, as senior major of the 12th Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, which position he held until August, when he was appointed, by Governor Yates, to the command of the Second Board-of-Trade Regiment, the 88th Illinois Infantry Volunteers. Colonel Sherman participated in the battle of Perryville, which was fought on October 8, and in the battle of Stone River, December 31, in which engagement his regiment took an active part. While the Union forces were still lying in front of Nashville, after the battle of Stone River, Colonel Sherman was assigned to the command of the First Brigade, Second Division, Twentieth Army Corps; and commanded that brigade through all the events of the campaign, resulting in the capture of Chattanooga. On the reorganization of the Army of the Cumberland, by which General George H. Thomas succeeded General Rosecrans in the command, Colonel Sherman was assigned to the command of the First Brigade, Second Division of the Fourth Army Corps, serving, as such, during the siege of Chattanooga, until it was raised by General Hooker, and participating in the battles of Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge, the latter fought on November 25, 1863, and resulting in the defeat of General Bragg and his entire army; also, taking part in the siege of Knoxville, where his brigade remained until in the spring of 1864, when the Fourth Army Corps joined the Atlanta campaign. At that time he was appointed chief-of-staff to General O. O. Howard, and accompanied the Fourth Army Corps through the campaign, until it reached the bank of the Chattahoochee River. There, while on a reconnaissance, on July 7, 1863, accompanied only by an orderly, he inadvertently ventured within the enemy's lines, and was captured. He was taken to Atlanta, thence to Macon, and finally sent to Charleston, as Sherman closed around Atlanta. On the journey to Charleston, over the Savannah and Charleston Railroad, Colonel Sherman, with a number of other Union officers, jumped from the train, during the night, and attempted to escape. The greater number were re-captured immediately, but the colonel and a few others eluded their pursuers, and concealed themselves in the woods until the second midnight, when they were re-captured by blood-hounds. They were thrown into the city prison, at Charleston, and thence transferred to the workhouse, which was commanded by the guns at Fort Wagner. In September, Colonel Sherman was sent to Richmond for exchange, which was effected October 7, when he returned to Chicago, and soon after was directed, by order of the Secretary of War, to report for duty to General Phil. H. Sheridan, commanding the Middle Military Division, with headquarters at Winchester, Va. Colonel Sherman was appointed assistant inspector-general, on General Sheridan's staff, and served in that capacity until after Lee's surrender, participating in the cavalry raid of that dashing Union officer, through the valley of Virginia; the battle of Waynesboro', which destroyed the remnant of Jubal Early's command; the destruction of the James River Canal; and other engagements favorable to the Union arms. He fought in the battles of Dinwiddie Court House, Five Forks, Sailor's Creek, etc., and witnessed the surrender of Lee, at Appomattox Court House. The papers of this surrender were signed in the house of one Wilbur McLane, who, singularly enough, was the owner of a goodly portion of the ground on which was fought the first battle of Bull Run. March 13, 1865, Colonel Sherman was brevetted brigadier-general, and was subsequently promoted to that rank by regular appointment. He accompanied General Sheridan to New Orleans, in May of that year, and was appointed provost marshal general of the Military Division of the Gulf, which position he held at the date of his muster-out, in February, 1866. He afterward returned to the South, where he made heavy investments in a Louisiana sugar plantation; which venture, however, proved a failure. In 1867, he returned, with his family, to Chicago, and, after the great fire of 1871, engaged in various mercantile pursuits. In 1879, he embarked in his present business, as the senior member of the firm of Sherman & Marsh, the manufacturers of barbed wire. General Sherman was married October 8, 1851, in the town of Northfield, Cook County, to Miss Eleanor N. Vedder. They have four children; the eldest, Ella, is the wife of Eben J. Marsh; Lulu, the second daughter, is the wife of J. Frank Aldrich; Francis C. and Eaton G., the two sons, are attending school.

ALEXANDER C. McCLURG was born in Philadelphia, Penn. He received his education at Pittsburgh and at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio. After graduating, he entered upon the study of the law, with Hon. Walter H. Lowrie, chief-justice of Pennsylvania. Enthusiastic devotion to study soon broke down his health, and the law was reluctantly abandoned. In quest of health and occupation, he arrived in Chicago, in 1859, and entered the house of S. C. Griggs & Co., booksellers, as a junior clerk. In this business he rapidly rose to a position of trust. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861, he enlisted as a private in a company which was offered to the Government, but as the State's quota was already full, the company was not accepted, and the young patriots returned again to their civil pursuits; later, however, upon a further call for troops, Mr. McClurg united with others, and raised a company, called the "Crosby Guards," and with them, he was mustered into the United States service as a private soldier, on August 15, 1862. A few days later, he was unexpectedly, and without any agency of his own, elected captain of the company, which went into the field at once, as a part of the 88th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, under Colonel F. T. Sherman. Cincinnati and Louisville were both, at that time, threatened by the forces under Bragg and Kirby Smith, and the new regiment was hurried to the defense, first of one and then of the other of these cities. Moving south under Buell, the regiment was heavily engaged in the battle of Perryville, where the company of Captain McClurg lost severely in killed and wounded. After this final retreat of Bragg at Nashville, Captain McClurg was detailed as judge-advocate of a general court-martial, where his industry and ability attracted the attention of General McCook, who detailed him for duty as acting assistant adjutant-general of the corps staff. In this position he served with zeal and ability throughout the arduous campaign which culminated at Chickamauga. When, after this engagement, the army was reorganized, Captain McClurg was assigned to duty as adjutant-general of a division under General Baird, and was soon after invited by General Philip H. Sheridan to take a position on his staff. After General Sheridan was assigned to duty in the eastern army, and began his brilliant career in Virginia, the flattering invitation was again renewed by letter, but Captain McClurg felt it his duty to remain with the command, where he was already in a responsible position, familiar with his duties, and in a way to be useful. As adjutant-general of Baird's division, he served with distinction through the siege of Chattanooga and the battles around that city. In the battle of Mission Ridge, his horse was twice shot under him in the charge upon the ridge, and his gallantry in the action was specially mentioned in the official reports. Shortly after this, and while Sherman's great army was preparing for the Atlanta campaign, Captain McClurg was called from division headquarters to corps headquarters, and was assigned to duty as adjutant-general of the Fourteenth Army Corps, one of the largest and finest corps in the army, until shortly before that time under the command of Major-General George H. Thomas, the corps then being commanded by General John M. Palmer. In this position, Captain McClurg soon became widely known as one of the most capable industrious, and zealous staff officers in the western army; untiring in his activity, he participated in nearly every skirmish and battle of this long and arduous campaign. A month before the fall of Atlanta, General Palmer was relieved, and Major-General Jeff. C. Davis was appointed to the command of the corps. He at once wrote to the Secretary of War, asking for the promotion of Captain McClurg to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and based his application upon his long and efficient service, and especially on his distinguished gallantry and valuable services in the battle of Jonesboro', which had just occurred. The promotion was promptly made; and very soon after General Davis created Colonel McClurg chief-of-staff, as a further recognition of his merits and services. In this position he continued until the close of the war, being promoted successively to the brevet rank of colonel and brigadier-general. He received the encouragement of Major-Generals Sherman, Thomas, Davis and others, to apply for a position in the regular army, for which it was thought his qualities peculiarly fitted him; but like so many others, who had rendered valuable services in the field, he preferred to return at once to civil life, carrying with him, as his most valuable possession, a sword inscribed with the names of Perryville, Stone River, Liberty Gap, Chickamauga, Chattanooga, Mission Ridge, Ringgold, Adairsville, Big Shanty, Chattahoochee River, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Jonesboro', March to the Sea, Savannah, Aversyboro' and Dentonville—in all of which he had borne an honorable part. Although, like most soldiers, on return to civil life he was without capital, he was offered and accepted a partnership in the old house of S. C. Griggs & Co., in which he remained until, upon the division of that firm, he entered the present well known firm of Jansen, McClurg & Co. His only connection with military affairs since the war has been as the first colonel of the First Regiment Infantry, Illinois National Guards, in the building up, equipping and disciplining of which he rendered several years of good service to this city and State. Under his tutorage, that organization first reached the high degree of efficiency which it has since so handsomely maintained.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JOHN A. BROSS, fifth son of Deacon Moses Bross, was born at Milford, Pike Co., Penn., February 21, 1826. After completing a thorough academical course at Chester Academy, Orange Co., N. Y., then taught by his brother William, afterward lieutenant-governor of Illinois, he commenced the study of law at Goshen, N. Y. In 1848, he removed to Chicago, concluded his studies in the office of Hon. Grant Goodrich, and, after serving a short time as assistant United States marshal, devoted himself to the practice of his profession, in which he soon won an honorable position. When recruiting was difficult, and the call of the President for three hundred thousand more volunteers, in July, 1862, seemed to appeal to a deeper feeling than even the first fervor of patriotic impulse, he determined that duty called him, and he raised and offered a company to the Chicago Board of Trade, then recruiting a regiment, which was accepted and became Co. "A," 88th Illinois Infantry. With that regiment he participated in the battles of Perryville, Murfreesboro' and Chickamauga, and the many hard marches and sharp skirmishes of the Murfreesboro', Tullahoma and Chattanooga campaigns. On Governor Yates's call for the recruiting of a colored regiment in Illinois, he entered call to the work with his whole heart, resigning his command in the 88th to assume the formation and discipline of the 29th U. S. Colored troops. Establishing headquarters at Quincy, he entered upon this work, which, under his able management, became a success so far as the proficiency of the men in all soldierly duties was concerned. Owing to the late call for colored troops in the State, many had enlisted elsewhere, and but six companies could be raised. Of these he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel, April 7, 1864, and ordered to join Burnside's (Ninth) corps at Annapolis. The corps having moved toward Petersburg on his arrival, he was ordered to Camp Casey, near Washington, and placed in command of a brigade; with which he moved to the front in June, reaching the army and taking his place in the trenches before Petersburg, June 19. When it was known that the colored division was to make a charge on the works, after the explosion of the mine beneath the principal fort, the 29th Illinois was selected to lead the column, and, with Colonel Bross at their head, gallantly led it. Five color-bearers were shot down, and then the Colonel, seizing the flag, carried it to the top of the works, and planted it on the parapet. When, too late, it was found that all was of no avail and that advance was hopeless, the order was given to retire, and while striving to extricate his faithful and heroic men, who had gallantly followed their beloved leader to the "jaws of death," he was stricken down by a ball, and died without a groan, leaving behind an unsullied name and a record of which his relatives and friends are deservedly proud.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL GEORGE W. CHANDLER was born in the parish of St. Armand East, Missisquoi Co., Canada East, August 27, 1832. He received a good common school education in his native parish, and completed his studies in Vermont, the native State of his mother. He came to Chicago in September, 1855, and entered the banking house of George Smith, where he remained four years, accepting, in 1859, a clerkship in the city comptroller's office, which position he held until the summer of 1862. When President Lincoln, in July, 1862, called for three hundred thousand volunteers, to serve three years, he solicited and obtained from Governor Yates authority to raise a company for one of the regiments then being recruited by the Board of Trade. With the aid of George A. Sheridan, he finally recruited two companies, and upon their organization was elected captain of the "Kimball Guards"—so named in honor of George M. Kimball, the friend and patron of the company. The company became Co. "C." of the 85th Regiment, and upon the promotion of its first captain, George A. Sheridan, was chosen to succeed him. On the organization of the regiment, Captain Chandler was unanimously elected major, and was commissioned as such November 8, to rank September 4, 1862. Major Chandler shared the fortunes of the 85th in camp and on the march, in bivouac and battle; always brave, cheerful and faithful, knowing well how to obey and how to command; winning the respect of his superiors and the love of his subordinates; cool and fearless in action; thoughtful and considerate of his soldiers; a brave, tender, noble man and soldier ever until the last. His appointment by General Rosecrans as the commander of the "Brigade of Honor," which he designed to form after the battle of Stone River, was a compliment well merited,—no less a compliment because the design was not carried out. From Murfreesboro' to Chickamauga, Major Chandler had almost continuous command of the 85th, both the colonel and lieutenant-colonel of the regiment being absent from the field on detached service or from illness. At Chickamauga, he was in the hottest of the fight, and after that battle was promoted lieutenant-colonel. He led the regiment at the storming of Mission Ridge, and escaped unburnt; but, he says, "Had I been killed—and I little expected when near the top of the ridge to escape with my life—I should have died, as I would wish were I to be killed in battle, on the field of duty, fighting for the best Government God ever gave to man." During the coming Atlanta campaign he died, "as he would wish, on the field of duty." During that campaign the Fourth Corps was almost continually in the advance; and the division, heretofore led by Sheridan, did the same good work under Newton. For the charge on the Confederate works at Kennesaw, June 27, 1864, the Fourth Corps was ordered to furnish three brigades. One of these was Kimball's, in which was the 85th Illinois. Lieutenant-Colonel Chandler was shot through the body, while leading his regiment to the charge, and died almost instantly on the field, as he desired. His remains were brought to Chicago, and laid in Bryan Hall, where crowds of sorrowful friends and citizens gathered in honor and remembrance of the true-hearted, brave young man, who had fought his last battle for freedom and for them. The Board of Trade, Mercantile Association, Young Men's Association, and Young Men's Christian Association united in the solemn funeral services on July 7, after which "all that was mortal of him" was taken to Canada for burial with his kindred.

EIGHTY-NINTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE EIGHTY-NINTH ILLINOIS, or "RAILROAD," REGIMENT, was organized at Chicago, under the direction and superintendence of the various railroad companies of Illinois, in August 1862, and was composed principally of railroad employes—its organization being under the especial care and supervision of Robert Forsyth, of the Illinois Central Railroad, and W. D. Manchester, of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad. Besides these, the following gentlemen were active and earnest in their exertions, in behalf of the organization: Colonel C. G. Hammond, of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad; Joseph H. Morse, Pittsburgh & Fort Wayne; A. Bigelow, Michigan Central; Charles S. Tappan, Chicago & North-Western; W. L. St. John, Chicago & Rock Island; S. C. Baldwin, Chicago & Milwaukee; C. C. Wheeler, Chicago, Alton & St. Louis; E. Anthony, Galena & Chicago Union.

Of its officers, as first organized, the following were Chicago men:

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles T. The 89th receiving orders to report to Louisville, Ky., left Camp E. H. Williams, Chicago, on September 4, and arrived at its destination September 7. General Bragg had then invaded the State, his army being concentrated at Bardstown, with the force of Kirby Smith occupying Lexington. The secession element was jubilant, and the Union people were trembling. Major-General William Nelson had been repulsed at Richmond, and had fallen back to Louisville.

Three days after the arrival of the 89th, Kirby Smith's forces reached Latona Springs, only seven miles from Cincinnati, threatening the invasion of Ohio and Indiana. The regiment, with General Buell's army, moved from Louisville and encamped on the west side of the Kentucky River, opposite Frankfort, on the evening of October 6, arrived at Lawrenceburg on the morning of the 8th, and drove a force of rebel cavalry from the place, and pursued them to "Dog Walk," where, the following morning, it was attacked by a portion of Kirby Smith's force. The 89th was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Hotchkiss, Colonel Christopher never having joined the regiment, of which he resigned the command soon after. On the 11th, the Second Div-vision joined in the pursuit of Bragg to Crab Orchard, and then returned to Bowling Green, arriving on the 31st of October. At that place, Co. "F," Captain William D. Williams, joined the regiment, and a few days later the Second Division moved toward Nashville; there, the 89th was detached from the command, and, with a section of Goodspeed's battery, stationed at Tyre Springs, on the railroad route, where it remained two weeks, re-joining its brigade on November 17, near Nashville.

On the morning of December 26, 1862, Rosecrans's movement upon Murfreesboro' was commenced. The 89th, with Johnson's division, moved from Nashville, and, on the 27th, reached Triune. On the morning of the 29th, the brigades of Generals Kirk and Willich moved towards Murfreesboro', by the Bole Jack road, and on the 30th the line of battle was formed for the anticipated struggle. The brigades of Kirk and Willich formed the extreme right of the Union line—Kirk's facing to the south, and Willich's in a line nearly perpendicular to it, facing east, with Edgerton's battery at the angle formed by the two brigades. The dawn of the morning of the 31st saw the overwhelming attack of the enemy on the right, the brave defense of Kirk, his sad repulse, the capture of the Union batteries, and the general disaster that befell McCook's corps.

Willich's picket-line was attacked early in the morning, while he was absent; and as he was hurrying back to his brigade, his horse was shot, he was made prisoner, and his command left without either brigade or division commander. When the picket-line was attacked, the 39th Indiana rushed forward to its support, but, with the other advanced regiments and Goodspeed's battery, was driven back in confusion, leaving the 49th Ohio and 89th Illinois exposed to a direct cross fire from the advancing enemy. The 89th fell back about four hundred yards, when the companies of Captains Willett, Whiting and Comstock, with Co. "F," under command of Lieutenant Wells, were re-formed and posted in a lane, where they made a brief stand, and were then ordered by Colonel Hotchkiss about five hundred yards farther to the left, where they joined Captains Rowell's and Blake's companies, which were posted in the woods bordering a small creek. There they made another stand, and succeeded in temporarily checking the rebel advance in their immediate front. Captain Henry S. Willett, of Co. "H," was there killed. The regiment soon after was joined by other portions of the brigade, and all, under command of Colonel Hotchkiss, took a position in the woods near the Wilkinson turnpike, and for a time checked the advance of the rebels over the open field in its front. Colonel Wallace, of the 15th Ohio, as senior officer, assumed command of the brigade at this juncture; and in obedience to his order, Colonel Hotchkiss still further retired his regiment to Rousseau's reserve division. On the night of Friday, under command of Captain Williams, of Co. "F," it served as infantry support to Stoke's (Chicago Board-of-Trade) battery, guarding the ford over Stone River, while Negley's troops charged Breckenridge, in the closing engagement of the battle. Sergeant-Major John M. Farquhar, of Chicago, and First Sergeant Erastus O. Young, Co. "A," were both promoted for bravery manifested during this engagement.

Among the killed were Corporal William H. Litsy, Co. "H"; privates James Nichols, Co. "E"; Moses Beaver and Elijah Youlin, Co. "F"; Dewitt C. Scudder, George W. Murray, David H. Bester, Co. "G"; Henry Huggins, Co. "H"; William Holden, Co. "I." Fifty-five of the regiment were wounded. Major Hall was captured and taken to Fortress Monroe, where he remained until spring, when he was exchanged and returned to the regiment. Total loss in killed, wounded and missing, one hundred and forty-nine.

After this battle, the 89th Illinois and the 32d Indiana were placed in the front line of Willich's brigade, and with it went into camp on the Shelbyville turnpike, south of Murfreesboro'.

On the 7th of January 1863, Colonel Christopher resigned, and Lieutenant-Colonel Hotchkiss was promoted colonel. The enlisted men of the regiment (which Colonel Gibson, brigade commander during General Willich's imprisonment, pronounced, "by all odds, the best for its age in the service,") presented Colonel Hotchkiss an elegant sword, through Bryan O'Connor, as a mark of their appreciation and esteem. Major Duncan J. Hall, who was taken prisoner at Murfreesboro', was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and Captain William D. Williams, of Co. "F," to be major.

Rev. James H. Dill of Chicago, chaplain of the regiment, formerly pastor of the South Congregational Church, and the "Puritan" correspondent of the New York Independent, died January 14, 1863, on board the "Lady Franklin" while on his way back from Chicago to re-join his regiment, which he had been obliged to temporarily leave on account of sickness. On learning that his "boys" had been engaged in action, he started for the front before he was able, and died of typhoid fever before he could reach them. Captain Travis O. Spencer, of Co. "B," accepted the chaplaincy. John M. Farquhar, of Chicago, was promoted captain of Co. "B," and William H. Rice, of Chicago, was promoted captain of Co. "A," in place of Captain E. A. Smith, resigned.

After the capture of General Willich at Stone River, the First Brigade was temporarily under the command of General William H. Gibson. General Willich was liberated, and re-joined his command April 14, 1863.

The advance of Rosecrans's army from Murfreesboro' toward Tullahoma commenced on June 24. General Johnson's division, Willich's brigade leading the column, marched from Murfreesboro' by the Shelbyville pike, and turned toward Old Millersburg to the left, reaching that place about noon. Colonel T. J. Harrison, of the 39th Indiana, with a force of mounted-infantry was thrown forward toward the cannon in the front, to reconnoitre, and on his reporting a strong force of the enemy posted in front of Liberty Gap, General Willich's brigade was ordered forward to his support. The 15th Ohio, supported by the 89th Illinois, was deployed to the right, and the 49th Ohio, supported by the 32d Indiana, to the left of the road, with Goodspeed's battery in reserve. In this order the brigade advanced, the rebel skirmishers falling back upon their main force, which was posted along the crest of hills forming the northern entrance to the gap. As it would almost certainly involve a terrible sacrifice of life to attempt to carry those heights by direct attack, General Johnson determined to flank the position, and ordered forward a portion of John F. Miller's brigade to support Willich. The command then moved forward, the line so extended as to outflank the position of the enemy, and, firing, as it advanced, with coolness and deliberation, ascended the heights and completely routed the rebels from their chosen position, before the arrival of the reserve regiments. These were now advanced to the gap, and the enemy pursued about a mile, after which the advanced brigades were relieved by other troops of the division, and before night the Federal picket-line was established at the southern entrance of the gap.

All through this day, and through the night, the rain poured continuously, but the men were so exhausted after the march and struggle for the entrance of the gap that they slept on the wet ground, rolled in their blankets, till the morning of the 25th brought renewal of the strife. On that morning, Willich's brigade was again ordered to the front, to relieve Baldwin's at the picket line. In the new line, the 89th Illinois formed the right and the 32d Indiana the left, with the 15th and 49th Ohio in reserve. About noon, a strong line of rebel skirmishers descended the hill, crossed the creek, and advanced to the foot of the hill on which the 89th Illinois and 32d Indiana were posted, but were driven back, after a sharp contest of about half an hour, to the shelter of the timber along the edge of the creek. In less than an hour, the whole rebel left, heavily reinforced, with supporting companies and a line of reserves, and supported also by a battery on the hill, charged across the valley and up the hill, to within about twenty yards of the position of the two Union regiments, which quietly prepared to receive the shock. The weight of the rebel onset was directed against the center of the line, comprising the left of the 89th Illinois and the right of the 32d Indiana.

The regiments bravely held their position. The supporting companies rallied to their assistance, and for about twenty minutes a fierce and cruel contest was waged, the rebels being determined to force the Union line and occupy its position on the hill. That position was the key to the southern entrance to the gap, and, once in the enemy's possession, the Federal force could be driven back through the defile. To this end, repeated attacks were made on the position, but each time the rebels were driven back with heavy loss. To support the Union regiments, Goodspeed's and an Ohio battery were hurried forward. The enemy, also, received reinforcements and added batteries, and their attacks grew more and more furious and stubborn. At this juncture, Captain Bruce H. Kidder, of Co. "E," 89th Illinois, discovered two rebel infantry companies moving toward the right of his regiment, with the apparent intention of attacking it on that flank. He immediately moved his command, under cover of the crest of the hill, still farther to the right, and to a position about two hundred yards in advance of the main line of battle. There, sheltered by a fence, he awaited the approach of the rebels, until they were within forty yards of his ambush, when he gave the order to fire. The advancing companies recoiled before the well-aimed and fatal volleys, and fled wildly to the shelter of the wooded hills behind them, leaving eight dead and thirty wounded of their attacking party. As the ammunition of the two brave regiments, so long and hotly engaged, began to fail, the 15th Ohio was ordered to their support. With the aid of this regiment, one more determined effort of the enemy to plant his flag on the hill was repulsed with the most heroic bravery. During this last struggle, Captain Herbert Blake, of Co. "E," a citizen of Chicago, and a brave and Christian officer, fell, mortally wounded. George Sinclair, Chicago, of Co. "C," was also killed there.

A charge on the rebel position was finally made by the reserve regiment of the brigade, under command of Colonel Gibson, and Miller's brigade was ordered to the front to relieve the regiments which had, since morning, borne the brunt of the conflict. As the 89th Illinois was withdrawing, the enemy, construing it into a retreat, attempted once more to seize the position, but the regiment faced about, dashed down the hill, and, with their last remaining cartridges, charged the advancing rebels and drove them back across the field.

The charge of the Federal troops was successful, and the enemy was finally driven from the hill which he had fortified, and retreated toward Bellbuckle. Henry M. Cist, in his history of the Army of the Cumberland, says the fighting at Liberty Gap was the "most severe of the Tullahoma campaign," and among the brave and determined regiments that so worthily bore their part in that struggle, none had a fairer, or more heroic, record than the 89th Illinois.

The regiment remained at Liberty Gap until the 27th, when it marched to Manchester, and remained there until July 1, when it moved to Tullahoma, and remained until August 16, and then it marched to, and encamped at, the foot of Lookout Mountain, on September 2. On the 10th, McCook's troops crossed the mountains to Alpine, Ga., the extreme right of the Union line. On the 12th, McCook was ordered to join General Thomas at once. On the night of the 17th, he closed up on Thomas's right, at Chickamauga Creek, Johnson's division being the right of McCook's corps, which was still the extreme right of the Federal line.

On the morning of the 19th, McCook was ordered to send Johnson's and Davis's divisions to the left, to support Thomas. Brannon, of Thomas's corps, had been driven back, and Baird, to his right, was giving way, when Johnson's division moved to his support. It formed on Baird's right, with Willich's brigade holding the center, Dodge's brigade the right, and Baldwin's the left. Willich's brigade formed in two lines, the 89th Illinois on the right of the second line, in support of the 32d Indiana.

Baldwin's brigade, to the left, was first engaged, and then the center held by Willich. He had sent forward a line of skirmishers, who soon needed the reinforcement of their reserve companies in order to hold the advanced line. Willich moved his brigade forward in line-of-battle, and prepared to receive the onset of the advancing rebels. Their repeated charges were bravely and successfully repulsed, when they succeeded in planting a battery in front of the brigade, and, at close range, threw grape and canister into its ranks. A section of Goodspeed's battery, which was attached to the brigade, opened upon the enemy's guns, which the 89th Illinois and the 32d Indiana were ordered to charge.

Rushing forward at the call of the bugle, with a cheer, the regiments drove back the rebels about a hundred yards, who then faced about and rallied round their battery, determined to hold it to the last extremity. Moving steadily forward until they could almost touch their foes, the two regiments stood there and fought until the rebels were forced to fall back. Then making a headlong bayonet charge they captured all of the battery except one gun, which the enemy succeeded in drawing off by hand. A portion of the 89th, in their zeal to capture this gun also, pressed forward to a dangerous distance in advance of the brigade; but the line being re-formed, the whole command advanced about thirty yards, which position the division held about two hours. The division then occupied an advanced position at the extreme left of the line, with no support on either flank—Turchin's brigade on the right being three-quarters of a mile distant. So isolated and advanced a position could not be held through the night, and at the expiration of two hours, or at about sundown, not receiving reinforcements, orders were given for the command to fall back. Just at this time, the enemy, reinforced with fresh troops, made his second attack, striking, as before, the left of the division first, and attacking in quick succession Baldwin, Willich and Dodge. Willich's brigade received the rebels, as they struck its columns in their first furious charge, with a volley that sent them reeling back, but only to renew the attack with increased numbers and increased violence. The men of the brigade fought bravely, and the officers encouraged them by word and example, but the weight of numbers was too great, and it was forced back, leaving its dead and wounded in the hands of the enemy. It re-formed once more in rear of its former position, and, aided by the guns of its battery, finally caused the enemy to retire for the night.

During the night of the 19th, Rosecrans's army fell back to a new position. In this, Johnson's division was the third from the left, joining Baird on the left and Palmer on the right. During the night the men erected a rude breastwork in front of their line, which greatly sheltered the troops the following day. As the rebels were forcing back the troops to the left, the 89th Illinois was detached from the brigade to support Goodspeed's battery, one brigade of the division having previously been sent to support Baird. As this division fell back, the enemy rushed upon the flank and rear of the few troops of Johnson's division, but was held in check by them, aided by the well-directed fire of the battery, which was most ably supported by the 89th, until other troops, re-formed from Baird's command, rallied to their assistance, and the rebels were first driven back, and then, by a determined charge, completely routed. This attack on the extreme Union left was made by Siddell's division, which was finally driven by Turchin far beyond Baird's position. Willich's and King's brigades, afterward joined by Turchin's, were posted on the La Fayette road, on the withdrawal of the Federal troops to Rossville, to cover the movement, Willich's brigade acting as rear guard of the army. As Johnson's division was withdrawing, the 89th, still supporting Goodspeed's battery, was attacked by a force under L. E. Polk. The regiment fought bravely in support of its battery, but, before it was safe, Lieutenant-Colonel Duncan J. Hall, of Chicago, formerly Captain of Co. "A" of the 89th, and a young, brave and promising officer, had given his life in its defense, with his last breath urging his regiment to stand true to their country and their flag. Captains William H. Rice, of Co. "A," son of ex-Mayor John B. Rice, of Chicago; John W. Spink, of Co. "D"; and Thomas Whiting, of Co. "G," were killed at Chickamauga, and Lieutenant Amory P. Ellis, of Co. "B," was mortally wounded; Adjutant E. A. Bishop, Captain J. M. Farquhar, and Lieutenants J. W. Warren and John R. Darcey, were wounded, and Lieutenant H. W. Adams was taken prisoner. Willich's brigade was the last body of organized Federal troops to leave the field.

On the 22d of September, the army reached Chattanooga, and was at once set to work throwing up fortifications, which were so far completed early in October as to allow a brief rest to the troops.

The army of the Cumberland was reorganized October 20, and Willich's brigade, consolidated with Martin's, formerly of Davis's division, was designated the First Brigade, Third Division, Brigadier-General T. J. Wood, Fourth Army Corps, and was stationed on the left of Granger's line, resting against Fort Wood, and fronting Orchard Knob and Mission Ridge. Orchard Knob was a low fortified hill, about three-fourths of a mile beyond the Federal intrenchments, and formed the enemy's first line of defense.

The first aggressive movement of our army at Chattanooga, was an attack on this position, by Wood's and Sheridan's divisions, on the afternoon of November 23. The division moved out on the plain in front of the breastworks, about two o'clock p. m., and, with Willich's brigade advanced as a skirmish line, moved forward. Advancing rapidly across the open field, in plain sight of the rebel army on Lookout and Missionary Ridge, the skirmish-line drove the pickets to their intrenchments, and the divisions coming up, they were driven to their second line of rifle-pits, and finally sent in full retreat to the rear, leaving two hundred prisoners behind. Temporary breastworks were thrown up that night, and a larger force sent forward to maintain the position gained. It was then occupied by Bridge's (Chicago) battery; and Grant and Thomas established headquarters there, with a signal station, by which they could communicate with every portion of the army.

The 89th, with the brigade, remained at Orchard Knob until November 25, when the order was given for the attack upon Mission Ridge. The movement commenced at three o'clock p. m., at a signal of six guns, fired, in rapid succession, from Bridge's battery, at Orchard Knob. Wood's division was formed directly in front of the Knob, with Baird on the left and Sheridan on the right. Willich's brigade occupied the center of the division. In front of the lines was, first, a broken country, covered with dense woods; then an abrupt rise of ground, terminated by a narrow plateau, on which the enemy had located his camp. Beyond this rose Mission Ridge, its summit bristling with batteries, and strengthened with breastworks. Lines of rifle-pits were to be carried, before its summit could be gained. At the signal, the troops swept forward, advancing steadily through the woods, and across the open field in front of the enemy's intrenchments at the foot of the ridge, each command striving to first reach the enemy. The first line was captured at the point of the bayonet, and the routed rebels thrown back on their reserves, killed or taken prisoners. Hardly stopping to re-form, or for an order, the Union troops grimly charged up the steep and rugged ascent, and, without wavering or halting, at last, with loud hurrahs, gained the crest, and routed the enemy from his last position. Willich's brigade charged up the hill at a point where the ridge was formed like a horseshoe, the Federal troops occupying the interior. Batteries to the right and left, and in front, poured upon them a terrific fire; but, with Hazen's brigade to the right, and Beatty's to the left, it reached the top with the foremost, and planted its colors on the crest. The enemy held their ground at this point, until the brigade was less than a dozen yards from their breastworks, when they broke, in wild confusion, and fled, in panic, down the opposite slope of the ridge.

A portion of the brigade pursued them for nearly a mile, capturing, and hauling back, several pieces of artillery which they were trying to carry off. Among those of the 89th Illinois killed at Mission Ridge were Lieutenant E. D. Young, of Co. "A," and Captain Henry L. Rowell, of Co. "C," both brave and gallant officers, the latter from Chicago.

Willich's brigade occupied the summit of Mission Ridge until the 26th, when it went to Chattanooga, where it remained until it moved to Knoxville, arriving there December 7.

In the Atlanta campaign, the 89th Illinois formed a part of the First Brigade (commanded by Willich), Third division (General Wood), Fourth Army Corps (General Howard). The division occupied Tunnel Hill on May 7, and was ordered, with the First Division, to make a demonstration against Rocky Face Ridge on the following morning. They succeeded in gaining the summit of the ridge, and afterward joined in the pursuit of Johnston's army to Resaca, where it arrived on the 14th. In the operations against Resaca, General Willich was seriously wounded by a rebel sharpshooter, and was unable to re-join his brigade, during the campaign, the command of which devolved on Colonel William H. Gibson, of the 49th Ohio. During the night of the 15th, Johnston evacuated Resaca, and retreated south of the Oostenaula.

The 89th joined in the pursuit and in the subsequent engagement near New Hope Church, where it was engaged in the attack. The attacking column moved forward at half-past four. Hazen's brigade fought in front of the enemy's works nearly an hour, and until its ammunition was exhausted, when the First Brigade was ordered to its relief. The brigade rushed forward to the attack, gaining a position so near the breastworks that the men fell within ten feet of them. The 89th Illinois, 15th Wisconsin, and 49th Ohio, fought there two and one-half hours, renewing the assault four times, but were at last forced to retire to shelter from the enfilading fire of three batteries, which cut them down in the trenches they had so boldly carried. The Third Brigade was then ordered forward, not to renew the assault, but simply to hold the ground, that the dead and wounded might be recovered. The conflict raged furiously from the first attack, at half-past four, until seven, and did not cease until ten at night. The loss was terrible. The 89th Illinois lost one hundred and fifty-six officers and men; Willich's entire brigade (commanded by Gibson), one thousand and eighty-three; Hazen's, eight hundred and ten; Beatty's (commanded by Knefler), four hundred and one. Among the officers wounded in the 89th Illinois were Captain Dimick and Lieutenant Arenschild, of Co. "F"; Captain Samuel Comstock, of Co. "I"; and Lieutenant H. C. Wood, of Co. "C."

During the night of the 27th, the First Brigade entrenched itself about three hundred yards from the enemy's works, and occupied that position until the works were evacuated, on the night of June 4. On June 6, the division moved, with the rest of the Fourth Corps, to the neighborhood of Mount Morris Church, where it remained in camp until the 10th, when it moved to Pine Top Knob, which position was evacuated by the enemy on the 14th, who, on the 16th, fell back toward Kenesaw Mountain. Wood's division reached Kenesaw June 19. On the 21st, in an attack on an advanced position of the enemy, in which a part of Gibson's brigade was engaged, Captain William Harkness, of Co. "A" (formerly Lieutenant of Co. "H") was killed, and Lieutenant O. C. Pease, of Co. "E," wounded. Johnston evacuated his fortifications at Kenesaw, on the night of the 2d of July, and the following day the pursuit was renewed. On the 12th, the brigade crossed the Chattahoochee River, at Pace's Ferry, and went into camp on the south bank, where it remained until the 17th, when, with the rest of the division, it marched three miles down the river, to cover the laying of a bridge, for the passage of the Fourteenth Corps, returning to camp at night. On the 18th, it advanced to Buckhead, and, with the Third Brigade, made a reconnoissance to Peach Tree Creek the following day, when it was found that the enemy had burned the bridge over the stream, and was entrenched on the southern bank. The two brigades effected the crossing of the creek, in the face of the enemy, on the 20th, and entrenched on the southern side. Lieutenant Nathaniel Street, of Co. "D," 89th Illinois, received a fatal wound during the passage. On July 22, the division reached Atlanta, and entrenched a position within five hundred yards of the enemy's main works; which it occupied until the 25th of August, when, with the other troops, it withdrew to participate in the flank movement, eventuating in the evacuation of the city by Hood. On the 29th, the regiment took part in the destruction of the West Point Railroad, and, on the 1st of September, arrived before Jonesboro', in time to join in the pursuit of the enemy the following day. The Atlanta campaign ended on the 2d of September, and, on the 5th, the 89th Illinois, with its division, went into camp, about four miles from Atlanta, where it remained until October. From the 24th of August, when Colonel Gibson's term of service expired, until the close of the Atlanta campaign, the First Brigade was under the command of Colonel Hotchkiss.

Leaving Atlanta, October 2d, with the Fourth Corps, commanded by General Stanley, the 89th moved north in pursuit of Hood, who was retreating toward the Tennessee River.

The First Brigade, again commanded by Colonel John A. Martin, of the 8th Kansas, reached Kenesaw just in time to see the smoke of the conflict at Allatoona, and thence, passing over the mountains and through Kingston, Rome, and Resaca, reached Rocky Face on the 15th. On the 30th, the command reached Chattanooga, and thence moved to Pulaski, Tenn.; where Colonel A. D. Streight took command of the brigade. The 89th Illinois then participated in the engagements at Columbia and Franklin, on the route to Nashville, which it reached on December 1. On December 15, Streight's brigade moved into line, and, in conjunction with the Second (Colonel P. S. Post), was ordered to make an assault on Montgomery Hill, a strong position, about three hundred yards from the advanced Union line. The charge was made and the works captured, the brigade commander reporting that "the only unsettled question, for the time, seemed to be who, among our officers, should reach the works first."

On the 16th, an advance on the main works of the rebels was made by Post's brigade, which, supported by Streight's, charged Overton Hill, the enemy being driven toward Brentwood. In the engagements before Nashville, the 89th lost thirty-nine in killed and wounded. Lieutenant P. G. Taite, of Co. "G," was killed, Major B. H. Kidder and Lieutenant E. P. Walker, of Co. "A," were wounded.

The regiment participated in the pursuit of Hood's army to the Tennessee, and thence marched to Huntsville, Ala., where it remained in camp until February, 1865, when, with Colonel Hotchkiss still in command, it again returned to East Tennessee, and remained in that section until Lee's surrender. It then proceeded to Nashville, where it was mustered out of United States service June 10, 1865, and left that city, the same day, for Chicago. It arrived in the latter city June 12, and the following day received a public reception, with the 88th Illinois, by the Board of Trade and Railroad companies of the city. Colonel Hotchkiss, in response to congratulatory speeches, briefly said:

"The 89th left Chicago at the same time as the 88th, or three years ago, nine hundred strong. It has been recruited up to one thousand four hundred; that is, that number have been enrolled under its banner. It has lost, by casualties very largely, and we return now with three hundred men, two hundred others being in the field (transferred to the 50th Illinois). The balance have been lost. Among the lost is one lieutenant-colonel, seven captains, four lieutenants and over seven hundred men. Our history is written on the head-boards of rudely-made graves, from Stone River to Atlanta. Such a record we feel proud of."

Following is the return roster of the regiment, and the names of officers killed in action:

GENERAL CHARLES TRUMAN HOTCHKISS is a native of the State of New York, born in the town of Virgil, Cortland Co., May 3, 1832. He is the eldest son of Sylvester Wolcott and Mercy (Comfort) Hotchkiss, who, in 1834, removed to the territory of Michigan, settling on a farm in Calhoun County, near the present village of Homer. There Charles was reared, receiving an academic education at the Albion Seminary, until he had reached his sixteenth year. At that time, instead of entering college, as had been planned, he conceived the idea of studying telegraphy, and went to Wisconsin for that purpose; and, in 1850, came to Chicago, following that occupation here for some three years. In 1853, he entered the service of the old Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, when its western terminus was at Rockford, Ill., and subsequently became the freight agent for the road at this city. In 1857, he resigned this position to engage in business for himself, contracting and building bridges, docks, dredging and harbor work, and also in the lumber trade with his father, under the firm name of S. W. Hotchkiss & Son. He was thus employed until the breaking out of the Rebellion, in 1861. Under President Lincoln's first call for seventy-five thousand troops, issued in April of that year, Mr. Hotchkiss entered the three months' service, as first lieutenant and regimental adjutant of the 11th Illinois Volunteers, commanded by Colonel W. H. L. Wallace. At the re-enlistment of that regiment for the three years' service, in July, 1861, Lieutenant Hotchkiss was made a captain, and assigned to duty as assistant adjutant-general of the brigade commanded by Colonel Wallace, and participated in the battle of Belmont, Mo., the capture of Fort Henry, and the battle and capture of Fort Donelson. In April, 1862, he was assigned to duty as assistant adjutant-general on the staff of Brigadier-General W. H. L. Wallace, who commanded the Second Division of General Grant's army at the battle of Shiloh, in which memorable conflict he also lost his life. Following the death of General Wallace, Captain Hotchkiss was transferred to the staff of Major-General John A. McClernand, and assigned to duty as adjutant-general of the Reserve Corps, in General Halleck's command, consisting of the armies of the Tennessee, under Grant, the Ohio, under Buell, and the Mississippi, the latter under command of General Pope, and was with their forces in the advance on Corinth from Pittsburg Landing. In September, 1862, he was called from the front and appointed lieutenant-colonel, placed in command of, and took to the field, the 80th Illinois Infantry. On assuming command, he at once joined General Buell's army, at Louisville, Ky., and in January, 1863, was promoted to the colonelcy, commanding the 80th in all the battles fought by the Army of the Cumberland, with the exception of ten months, during which he commanded the First Brigade, Third Division, Fourth Army Corps, of that army, to which his regiment also belonged. During that time he participated in the battles of Perryville, Stone River, Liberty Gap, Chickamauga, Orchard Knob, Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, the campaign in East Tennessee, during the winter of 1863-64, and in all of the engagements of the one hundred and twenty days of the Atlanta campaign, from Chattanooga, beginning with the action at Rocky Face Ridge, May 9 and 12, and closing with the battle of Jonesboro', fought September 1, and the occupation of Atlanta, September 8, 1864. He was also in the skirmish of Spring Hill, November 25, the battle of Franklin, November 30, and the battle of Nashville, December 15-16, 1864, the defeat of General Hood's army, and the final overthrow of the Rebellion in the West. March 13, 1865, Colonel Hotchkiss was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, by brevet, "for gallant and meritorious services rendered during the war," which rank he still held at the date of his being mustered out of the service, June 10 of that year. Returning to his home in this city, General Hotchkiss again entered into business life, but, in August, 1866, was appointed to the position of United States Pension Agent at Chicago, which office he held until May 1, 1869. In the fall of that year, he became prominently identified with the citizens' reform movement, on which ticket he was elected city clerk, holding the position two terms, being re-elected on the famous fire-proof ticket which was placed in the field after the fire of 1871. Retiring, in 1873, from an office, the duties of which he had discharged to the entire satisfaction of the people of Chicago, General Hotchkiss engaged in the contracting business until 1880, when he became the proprietor of St. Caroline's Court Hotel, which he still conducts. General Hotchkiss married, December 10, 1855, Miss Frances E. Dye, daughter of Nathan Dye, an old and well known citizen of Chicago. They have one son, their only child, William D. Hotchkiss, who is now a civil engineer, and employed in the engineering department of the city of Chicago.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL DUNCAN J. HALL, son of Amos T. Hall, of Chicago, was born in Detroit, Mich., September 15, 1838. He was educated at Urbana University, Champaign Co., Ohio, and came to Chicago with his father's family in 1855. After reading law in the office of Walker, Van Arman & Dexter, he was admitted to the Bar in 1861. He exhibited a peculiar aptitude and fondness for legal studies, which, joined to his remarkable industry and perseverance, would undoubtedly have secured to him a high rank in his profession had not his patriotic feelings induced him to enter the army. Early in 1861 he joined the Seaman Guards, to learn military tactics; and when the proclamation for three hundred thousand volunteers was published, he enlisted in a company then forming, and was elected its captain. On the incorporation of his company with the 80th Illinois, he was elected major of the regiment, and from the time it entered active service until December, 1863, was acting lieutenant-colonel. At the battle of Murfreesboro', he was taken prisoner and carried to Atlanta, where he remained ten weeks, and was thence removed to Libby prison, and remained until April, 1863, when he was exchanged, and re-joined his regiment at Murfreesboro'. He was then promoted lieutenant-colonel, his commission dating January 7, 1863. He participated with the regiment in the engagement at Liberty Gap, and in the two days' battle at Chickamauga, being killed as the Federal forces were withdrawing from the field on the 20th of September, 1863. He lived only about two hours after he was wounded, dying on the field of battle.

NINETIETH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

THE NINETIETH ILLINOIS was organized at a meeting held at St. Patrick's Church, August 8, 1862, of which Reverend Father Dunne was chairman and James W. Sheahan secretary. During the preceding months, Father Dunne had conspicuously exerted himself in raising the regiment, and, at this meeting, he was, by acclamation, elected its temporary colonel, the regiment being long known as Father Dunne's Regiment. It was christened the "Irish Legion," and mustered into service September 22, 1862, under the following officers:

Field and Staff.—Colonel, Timothy O'Meara; Lieutenant-Colonel, Smith McCleary; Major, Owen Stuart; Adjutant, Edwin S. Davis; Quartermaster, Redmond Sheridan; Surgeon, Henry Strong; First Assistant Surgeon, John B. Davidson; Chaplain, Thomas F. Kelley.

Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, Patrick Flynn; First Lieutenant, James Conway; Second Lieutenant, Daniel Corcoran. Co.

"B": Captain, Michael W. Murphy; First Lieutenant, Thomas Gray; Second Lieutenant, Charles Bilingale. Co. "C": Captain Patrick O'Marah; First Lieutenant, John C. Harrington; Second Lieutenant, Thomas Murray. Co. "D": Captain, David O'Conner; First Lieutenant, John W. Kelley; Second Lieutenant, Peter O'Brine. Co. "E": Captain, Matthew Leonard; First Lieutenant, John McAssey; Second Lieutenant, Lawrence S. McCarthy. Co. "F": Captain, Richard C. Kelley; First Lieutenant, Patrick Feeney; Second Lieutenant, William White. Co. "G": Captain, John Murphy; First Lieutenant, David Duffy; Second Lieutenant, Patrick Campion. Co. "H": Captain, Peter Casey; First Lieutenant, Andrew Liddle; Second Lieutenant, George W. McDonald. Co. "I": Captain, William Cunningham; First Lieutenant, Joseph Teahon; Second Lieutenant, John J. O'Leary. Co. "K": Captain, Thomas K. Barrett; First Lieutenant, Peter Real; Second Lieutenant, John Larkin.

On September 27, the "Irish Legion" left Camp Douglas, nine hundred and eighty strong, for LaGrange, Tenn., whence it was sent, after four days' stay, to garrison Coldwater, Miss. There it had a skirmish, December 20, with Van Dorn's cavalry, in which the latter was repulsed. The 90th was then withdrawn to LaGrange, where, on March 3, 1863, it was assigned to Colonel John M. Loomis's brigade, which was composed of the 26th and 90th Illinois and the 12th and 100th Indiana.

On March 8, the brigade marched to Colliersville, Tenn., and then, on June 7, left for Memphis. On the following day, the brigade embarked for Haines's Bluff, on the Yazoo; there joined Sherman's forces, and remained in the vicinity of Vicksburg until its surrender.

On July 4, the 90th, with Ewing's division, pursued Johnston's retreating forces toward Jackson, returning from there to Vicksburg, where it embarked for Memphis. It then left Memphis, October 11, and took part in the defense of Colliersville.

In the attack on Tunnel Hill, near Mission Ridge, November 25, Loomis's brigade occupied the extreme right of the line, fighting its way along the western base of Mission Ridge, until it reached the railroad tunnel and embankment. Two brigades sent to its support were outflanked and driven back, but this, which formed the main attacking column on the western side, kept straight on in the face of the concentrated fire of artillery and musketry from the ridge in front, and drove the enemy to the shelter of the ravine beyond. In General Sherman's words, the brigade "engaged in a close struggle all day, persistently, stubbornly and well." At about four o'clock, some of the guns which had been concentrated at the north end of the ridge, were withdrawn, or turned in an opposite direction against the boys of the Cumberland, who were now assaulting the center of Mission Ridge, and before night Tunnel Hill was entirely abandoned by the Confederates. In the assault on this position, Colonel Timothy O'Meara, of the 90th Illinois, was killed, Lieutenant-Colonel Stuart was so badly wounded that for months his life hung by a thread, and Major Patrick Flynn was seriously wounded. The total loss of the regiment was one hundred and forty-three, killed, wounded and missing.

On the 26th, the regiment, with Sherman's forces, started in pursuit of Bragg, following him through the Chickamauga Valley, and, via Greysville, to Charleston, on the Hiawasse River, where the division was ordered to proceed to Knoxville to relieve Burnside. Knoxville was eighty four miles distant, and the soldiers were half-clad, their shoes worn out, they were without rations, and the weather was cold and stormy. Still they cheerfully pressed on, moving from Charleston, on December 2, and reaching Marysville on the 5th, where tidings were received of Longstreet's retreat, and Ewing's division was ordered to return to Athens, whence it marched to Chattanooga, by way of Cleveland. General Sherman, speaking of the troops accompanying him from the Mississippi to Chattanooga, and especially of the Fifteenth Corps, says:

"In reviewing the facts, I must do justice to my command for the patience, cheerfulness and courage which officers and men have displayed throughout, in battle, on the march, and in camp. For long periods, without regular rations or supplies of any kind, they have marched through mud and over rocks, sometimes barefooted, without a murmur, without a moment's rest. After a march of over four thousand miles, without a stop for three successive nights, we crossed the Tennessee, fought our part of the battle of Chattanooga, pursued the enemy out of Tennessee, and then turned more than one hundred miles north, and compelled Longstreet to raise the siege of Knoxville, which gave so much anxiety to the whole country. * * * I can not speak of the Fifteenth Army Corps without a seeming vanity, but, as I am no longer its commander, I assert that there is no better body of soldiers in America than it, or who have done more or better service."

The regiment went into winter quarters at Scottsboro', Ala., and in the reorganization of the army for the Atlanta campaign, in the spring of 1864, was assigned to the First Brigade (Colonel Reuben Williams), Fourth Division (General William Harrow), Fifteenth Army Corps (Major-General John A. Logan), and, with the Army of the Tennessee, moved from near Lee and Gordon's Mills, May 4, in the advance toward Johnston's position, at Dalton, Ga., where the Confederate army had concentrated. The 90th then moved to the vicinity of Resaca, and participated in the engagement at Bald Knob. Of Williams's brigade and the "Irish Legion," at Bald Knob, an eye witness says:

"Shortly after three o'clock, Colonel Williams's brigade, of Harrow's division, emerged from the wooded hill to the left of the road, and swinging round to the left of the Knob, entered the fight. His right is in open field, but his left is somewhat sheltered by the forest. From the time the brigade entered into action until five o'clock in the evening, it battles and bleeds, and at night-fall bears away five wounded officers, one killed, eighty-two wounded soldiers and fourteen killed. The figures speak, for the gallantry of the brigade, every regiment of which fought with all the bravery and tenacity that the occasion demanded. To this brigade the famous Irish regiment (the 90th Illinois) belongs. It is, indeed, a proud spectacle to see America's adopted sons from the Emerald Isle baring their breasts in battle, with the colors of the Union and the green flag of Ireland floating side by side."

At night, Colonel Walcott's brigade relieved Colonel Williams's, which was, however, engaged the following day. The losses in the 90th Illinois, at Resaca, were nineteen, killed, wounded and missing. Johnston evacuated Resaca on the night of the 15th, and the 90th joined in the pursuit, arriving at Dallas on the 26th. On the 28th, a furious attack was made on the Fifteenth Corps by Hardee, who afterward retreated with terrible loss. The only loss of the 90th was four men wounded on the skirmish line.

The following night, the Confederates made another attack on the right of Sherman's line, but were again repulsed. On June 15, Colonel Williams's brigade succeeded in gaining the enemy's flank, and Walcott's brigade, of the same division, attacked the position—which was the crest of a steep and wooded hill, held by Alabama troops—in front. The charge was bravely made, the men carrying the works that crowned the crest of the hill, and taking portions of the 31st and 40th Alabama prisoners, to the number of more than three hundred. Harrow lost but forty-five killed and wounded. The division was not engaged in the assault at Kencaw Mountain, on the 27th. Following up the pursuit of Johnston's army, the division moved to Decatur, where it arrived on the 19th, and the following morning moved to the front of Atlanta. The corps, which had advanced directly on the railroad from Decatur, formed on each side of it; General M. L. Smith's division in the center and on the line of the road, General Wood's on the right, and General Harrow's on the left, or south, of the road. Where the line crossed the railroad, there was a deep cut, which was left open and uncovered by cross-fire. After the violence of the battle on the extreme left of the line was over, on the afternoon of the 22d, Hood made a second attack, this time on the Fifteenth Corps. The charge was made by Cheatham's corps, which advanced along the line of the railroad, drove back the advance regiments of the corps, and charged down the gorge, or railroad cut, with the greatest fury—a portion reaching quite to the rear of the Fifteenth Corps, where it separated, a part scaling the bank to the left, the other to the right, where they poured a destructive fire directly on the flanks of the regiments next the road. As these fell back from the breastworks, other regiments poured up from the cut and over the works, forming a solid column, and charging along the inside of the Federal intrenchments. The center was totally dislodged from its position, and fell back, through the woods, to the right, where it re-formed, and, strengthened by the First Division, on the right, drove the Confederates in turn over the works.

The rebel regiments which climbed the bank south of the railroad where Harrow's brigades and the left of the Second Division held the works, did not have as good success. Although the enfilading fire drove the men back from the breastworks twice, they rallied as often, repulsed the Confederates, and held their ground. It was a desperate struggle—the men fought over the works hand to hand, with bayonets and with breech, but they held their ground, and drove the enemy back to his works before the city. The loss of the 90th was thirty-five, killed, wounded and missing.

Harrow's division remained in its position, south of the railroad and east of the city, until the 26th of July, when it was transferred, with the Army of the Tennessee, to the right of Sherman's line, at Ezra Church, west of Atlanta. There, on the 28th, the 90th participated in an engagement with the enemy, under General S. D. Lee, who moved out from his intrenchments to attack the Fifteenth Corps. Lee was repulsed, after a hard-fought battle, in which the 90th lost twenty-two, killed and wounded. Some four hundred yards in front of the position of the corps at Ezra Church, the Confederates had a long line of rifle-pits, from which their skirmishers kept up a constant and harassing fire on Logan's troops. On August 3, Logan ordered a charge on these troublesome pits; which were taken, in the morning, with little resistance, and held about two hours, at which time the enemy issued in force from his main works, to re-take them. Preparations not having been completed to defend them against so large a force, the men were re-called to their reserves, and, in the afternoon, details were again made from Harrow's and Lightburn's divisions to re-capture and hold the pits. Portions of three regiments from Harrow's division—including half of the 90th,—led by Major Brown, of the 70th Ohio, advanced at about four o'clock in the afternoon, this time in the face of a heavy artillery and musketry fire from the enemy's works, and again captured the long line of rifle-pits, with fifty additional prisoners. Major Brown, leading the detail, was killed at the head of his men. The 90th lost seven men, killed and wounded.

It was again engaged, at Jonesboro', Ga., August 31, 1864, at which place the division fought Cleburne's division, of Hardee's corps; the 90th losing sixteen men, killed, wounded and missing. It was also in the final engagement of the campaign, at Lovejoy Station, September 2, from whence it returned to East Point, and went into camp.

In the organization of the army, at Atlanta, for the "march to the sea," the 90th Illinois was transferred to Colonel Oliver's brigade, Hazen's (Second) division, of the Fifteenth Army Corps, General Osterhaus commanding. On October 4, the command broke camp at East Point, Ga., and, crossing the Chattahoochee, marched, via Allatoona, to Rome, and thence passing through Resaca, Snake Creek Gap, Villanow, and La Fayette, went into camp on Little River, near Gaylesville, on the 21st. On the 25th, it was engaged in a skirmish at Gadsden, and on the 29th commenced the return march to Atlanta, arriving at Smyrna Camp Ground, near the Chattahoochee, November 5. On the 15th, it started for Savannah, and reached Summertown on the 30th. Crossing the Ogeechee on the 7th of December, it drove the enemy from the bank, and, on the 12th, re-crossed at King's Bridge, and moved down its right bank toward Fort McAllister.

On the 13th the division marched to within about a mile of the fort, and, at fifteen minutes to five o'clock p. m., had completely invested it. The bugle then sounded, and the 90th, with eight other regiments deployed for the charge, rushed forward—over the line of torpedoes which had been laid outside the works; over and under and through abattis, ditches and breastworks; fighting until the enemy was driven to the last extremity and surrendered. The 90th lost three men killed and fourteen wounded, and was one of the first regiments to reach the works.

With Hazen's division, the 90th moved from Savannah to Beaufort, S. C., in January, 1865, and thence, in February, marched to Columbia, which was reached on the 16th. The division was engaged in the skirmish line at Bentonville, N. C., March 21, and went into camp at Goldsboro' on the 25th, where, on the 6th of April, news was received of the fall of Richmond. On April 12, Sherman's army moved from Goldsboro' against Johnston; Hazen's division pushing on through Raleigh and Hillsboro'; and, after the capitulation of Johnston, to Richmond, and thence to Washington, where the 90th participated in the grand review on May 24. June 6, it was mustered out of service, and immediately started for home, arriving at Chicago, June 10, 1865. On its return the regiment numbered only two hundred and fifty, of whom forty-one were crippled beyond carrying a musket. Three hundred of its number had been lost in battle, and the remainder by the various casualties of war. The following was the return roster of the regiment:

Colonel, Owen Stuart; Lieutenant-Colonel, (vacant); Major, Patrick Flynn; Adjutant, Edward S. Davis; Quartermaster, Redmond Sheridan; Surgeon, Charles A. Thompson; Assistant-Surgeon, John H. Scott; Sergeant-Major, Thomas McDonald; Quartermaster-Sergeant, John F. Hoben; Commissary-Sergeant, Lawrence Bracken; Musicians, F. H. Sloan and Charles Dunn. Co. "A": Captain, Daniel Corcoran; First Lieutenant, Andrew Phinney. Co. "B": Captain, Michael W. Murphy; First Lieutenant, Thomas Gray. Co. "C": Captain, James Dunne; First Lieutenant, James E. Casey. Co. "D": Captain, Daniel O'Conner; First Lieutenant, John W. Kelley. Co. "E": Captain, David H. Duffy; First Lieutenant, William Brice. Co. "F": Captain, Patrick Feeney; First Lieutenant, William White. Co. "G": Captain, John Murphy;

First Lieutenant, Patrick Campion. Co. "H": Captain, Michael M. Clark; First Lieutenant, Lawrence S. McCarthy. Co. "I": Captain, Thomas Murray; First Lieutenant, Timothy Mahoney. Co. "K": Captain, John McAssey; First Lieutenant, Jeremiah F. Riordan.

On Monday, June 12, the regiment was escorted from Camp Fry, through the streets of the city to the Sanitary Fair, by General John M. Loomis, and those of his old command in Chicago, where it was welcomed by Hon. Richard Yates in a complimentary speech, and afterward marched to the residence of Rt. Rev. Dr. Dunne, South Desplaines Street, forming in front of the house and giving three hearty cheers for the "Father of the Regiment." It then marched to the school-house connected with St. Patrick's Church, where Father Dunne affectionately welcomed his boys to their home, and Rev. Dr. Brennan read resolutions of congratulation and respect to the Irish Legion passed at a meeting of the Catholic Irish citizens of Chicago. The regiment then marched back to Camp Fry, where it was paid and received its final discharge a few days later.

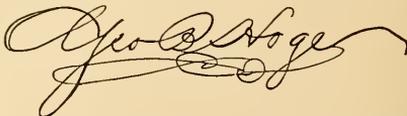

MAJOR JOHN MURPHY was born in County Wexford, Ireland, June 22, 1841, the son of James and Mary (Bent) Murphy. He attended the common schools until he was fifteen years of age, when he left his native country, to make for himself a name and a fortune. He arrived in Chicago, in April, 1856, and was employed by Murphy & Savage in the Marine Engine Works. There he became a proficient machinist, and was with the firm nearly six years. At the end of that time he left this city for Pike's Peak, and remained in Colorado for about two years, returning to Chicago to purchase mining machinery for the Colorado mines. Instead, however, he raised a company for the 67th Illinois, under Colonel Hough. He was immediately commissioned second lieutenant, in which capacity he served for four months, doing duty at Camp Douglas guarding the prisoners of war. He then organized a company for the 90th Illinois, recruiting it in this city, and was made its captain, being assigned to General Denver's division. In the battle of Mission Ridge, Captain Murphy distinguished himself in advancing the skirmish line, and, as a reward for his bravery, received what few men were ever honored with, a general order from the brigade, division, corps and department, complimenting him on his efficient services as an officer. Soon after the fall of Atlanta, Sherman's army moved on to the sea, and with it all that was left of the gallant 90th Illinois. Major Murphy, having passed through twenty-nine battles, came from the army wearing the proudest laurels of a soldier—the consciousness of having rendered his country service in her time of need, and of defending the flag which he had chosen from all the world as his standard of free thought and liberty. He was mustered out at Chicago, in June, 1865, and, returning to civil life, opened a small store, at the corner of Pearson and Wells streets, and maintained it successfully until the great fire swept it away. Soon after the fire, he established another grocery business, on West Indiana Street, remaining there temporarily until 1872, when he moved his stock back to the North Side. The next year he was elected collector of the North Town, and gave up the grocery business to establish a livery, which he did in company with Simon Stafford, the partnership continuing until the present time. He was first married, in 1865, to Miss Hannah C. Geary, of Chicago, by which marriage he has one son, James P. He was married the second time to Miss Mary O'Byrne, of Chicago. Mr. Murphy is a staunch Republican, having served the North Division of the city as supervisor, in 1876, and as alderman from the Seventeenth Ward, in 1881-82. At the time of the organization of the 2d Regiment of the Illinois National Guards, he served in the capacity of major and lieutenant-colonel.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

"THE THIRD BOARD-OF-TRADE REGIMENT" was the last military organization perfected under the auspices of that body. It was formed under the call of July, 1862, for three hundred thousand volunteers, and was filled up by consolidating four Cook County companies with three from Iroquois and three from Kankakee counties, the organization being effected on the 16th of September. On October 1, the regiment was mustered into

United States service, the following being the original roster:

During October, the 113th was employed in guarding rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, leaving Chicago November 6, 1862, for Memphis, where it was assigned to the Second Brigade (Colonel Giles A. Smith), Fourth Division (General Morgan L. Smith), Sherman's (Fifteenth) corps, and remained encamped at Memphis until November 26, when it marched with the corps on the so-called Tallahatchie Expedition, the force under Sherman moving to the Tallahatchie River, and joining Grant's expedition against Vicksburg, at Oxford, Miss. After its return from this expedition, December 12, it remained encamped at Memphis until December 24, when it embarked, with its division, at Memphis, disembarked at Milliken's Bend, twenty miles above Vicksburg, the following day, and marched fifteen miles west into Louisiana, to destroy a portion of the still uncompleted Vicksburg & Shreveport Railroad. After successfully accomplishing this task, it marched to join Sherman's army on the Yazoo River. The brigade was in reserve in the battles at Chickasaw Bayou, on the 27th and 28th, losing only two men wounded. General Morgan L. Smith, division commander, was wounded in the first day's engagement, and the Fourth Division was then temporarily commanded by General David Stuart.

On January 2, 1863, the troops proceeded to Milliken's Bend, and moved up White River fifteen miles, thence by the "cut off" across eight miles to the Arkansas, and up that river to Fort Hindman, or the Post of Arkansas, which was a strong fortification, thirty-five miles up the river, completely commanding its navigation. The parapet of the works there erected was eighteen feet across, with a ditch twenty-five feet wide by eight deep, with strong casemates, a banquette for infantry, and a strong line of rifle-pits. On January 10, the land forces debarked three miles below the fort, Stuart's division advancing by the road running near the river to within half a mile of the works. In this advance, Co. "A," 113th, was detailed as the support for two sections of Silversparre's battery. After driving the enemy from their rifle-pits, the regiment had to cross an open swamp, commanded by the guns of the fort. There Lieutenant Daniel Ferguson, Co. "A," Chicago, lost his leg by the explosion of a shell. The men laid on their arms that night, without fires or tents, and at half-past ten Sunday morning were in line of battle, ready to storm the works. General Stuart's division occupied the right center.

At one o'clock the gunboats opened fire, and half an hour later Giles M. Smith's brigade charged up to within short musket range of the enemy's line, where it found partial shelter in a ravine until three o'clock, when, the guns of the fort having been silenced by the fire from the gunboats, a general assault was ordered. The intrenchments in front of Smith's brigade were stormed by his command, and, after the surrender of the fort, the prisoners and all the defenses outside the fort proper were given into the charge of General Stuart, by General Sherman. One of the Chicago boys of the 113th, writing of the battle, says of the regiment :

"There was not a man that wavered or fell back; and if their old, treacherous guns did not snap the cap the first time, they tried them again and again, till they would go, and when one of their comrades fell who had a good gun, those who had poor would exchange, and go into them again."

At Arkansas Post the regiment lost five killed and twenty-two wounded. After the battle, Cos. "C," "D," "F," "I" and "K" were detailed to take prisoners to Camp Butler, and remained at Springfield, as guard, until March, 1864. One of these companies—"C," Captain George W. Lyman—was from Chicago. The remaining companies of the regiment went, with Sherman's corps, to Young's Point, nine miles above Vicksburg, on the western bank of the Mississippi, reaching that place on the 22d of January, 1863. There Colonel Hoge was appointed provost marshal for the Fifteenth Army Corps, holding that position until General Grant, in the spring, abandoned his design of turning Vicksburg on the north, and the army concentrated at Milliken's Bend for a new line of operations. On March 17, while yet at Young's Point, Colonel Hoge with his battalion, forming a portion of the troops under direct command of General Sherman, moved to the relief of Admiral Porter at Black Bayou.

This expedition is thus described in Greeley's "American Conflict":

"Admiral Porter, having reconnoitered the country directly eastward of the Mississippi; from Steele's Bayou, just above Milliken's Bend, and listened to the testimony of friendly negroes, informed General Grant that a devious route, practicable at that stage of water for lighter iron-clads, might be found or opened thence into the Sunflower, and so into the Yazoo below Yazoo City, but above Haines's Bluff; whereupon, Grant decided to attempt it, ascending with Porter in the ram Price, pioneered by several other iron-clads through Steele's Bayou to Black Fork or bayou, which makes across from Steele's into Deer Creek. Grant, finding their way constantly impeded by overhanging trees, hurried back to Young's Point for a pioneer corps, but was soon advised by Porter that there was more serious work ahead; when Sherman was sent with a division, most of which was debarked at Eagle Bend on the Mississippi and thence marched across to Steele's Bayou—here but a mile from the river—much of the distance being now under water, and requiring to be bridged or corduroyed before it could be passed. And such was the height of the water in the bayous and streams that our boats could with difficulty be forced through the branches of the trees which thickly overlaid those narrow water-courses, so that they were severally scraped clean of everything above their decks when they had been wearily driven and warped up the bayou and across Little Black Fork into Deer Creek, up that stream to Rolling Fork, and across into the Sunflower; down which they floated almost to the Yazoo, where their progress was finally arrested, and vessels and men obliged to retrace their toilsome, devious way to the Mississippi."

The portion of the division sent to Porter's relief, commanded by Sherman in person, and of which the 113th formed a part, did not reach the gunboats at Steele's Bayou; but marched twenty-three miles across the swampy country in mud, ankle-deep, from Black Bayou to the Sunflower, where, on the 21st, they had a skirmish with the enemy, who had erected batteries at the junction of the Sunflower and Rolling Fork, and was preparing to pass in the rear of the gunboats and cut off Porter's entire force. The troops under Sherman arrived just in time to prevent this, the rebels retreating after a slight engagement. During five days Sherman's command was without a change of clothing, and marched, slept and fought in mud and water—their general leading them on foot and sharing every hardship and privation with the men in the ranks. The troops returned to Young's Point on the 27th, and remained until the first of May, when Blair's division, to which the 113th belonged, was sent to temporarily garrison Milliken's Bend, leaving on the 8th to join in the movement of the corps to the south of Vicksburg. Marching down the west bank of the Mississippi, it crossed at Grand Gulf, and thence escorted a train of five hundred wagons to Clinton, Miss. With the division, the regiment crossed the Big Black, at Bridgeport, on the 16th, and, on the morning of the 18th, reached the Benton road, between Vicksburg and the Yazoo, Sherman's corps forming the right of Grant's line-of-battle in rear of the city, his right resting on the Mississippi, and his left, held by Blair's division, on the Benton road; Giles Smith's brigade on the right of the road. An assault was ordered at two o'clock p. m. of the 19th. Between the brigade and the enemy's works was a space of about four hundred yards, cut up by deep ravines, filled with standing and fallen timber, and exceedingly difficult to pass. Giles Smith's brigade was the first in the division to reach the works, the men gaining a position close up to the parapet, where they held their ground until night, but without being able to carry the works. Colonel Hoge was wounded in the head in the assault, and, after remaining in camp in the rear until June, was obliged to obtain leave of absence and return to the North to recuperate. In the assault of the 22d, Giles Smith's brigade charged the works, in connection with General Ransom's brigade of McPherson's corps to the left, charging up a steep hill to the very foot of the parapet and fighting with the most devoted bravery; but, as on the 19th, failing because success was impossible. In these two assaults two color-bearers of the 113th were killed and two wounded—one mortally. But four companies of the battalion were engaged, the list of casualties being reported as follows:

Co. "A": Seriously wounded, Lieutenant A. N. Baird; Corporals Henry Kemp, Levi James and John McGillick. Co. "B": Killed, Francis Huston, B. F. Fender; Orderly Sergeant A. J. Joslyn. Co. "G": Killed, Corporals William Anderson and G. C. Kidder; Privates Ferdinand Stack and Fred. Swain. Co. —: Killed, Morris Bird, Noah Kramer, Nicholas Dohl.

After the capitulation of the city, the battalion was detailed for provost duty at Chickasaw Bayou, north of Vicksburg, a region of swamps and sloughs, where the battalion lost ten per cent. of its number, and where nearly every officer and man was on the sick list, during the time it remained there. From Chickasaw Bayou, Major George R. Clarke was sent to Camp Butler, Springfield, to take command of the detachment there, and, in August, the battalion, under command of Colonel Hoge, was ordered to Corinth, Miss., where, October 1, Colonel Hoge was placed in command of the post. In February, 1864, the battalion returned to Memphis, and was there joined, on the 11th of March, by the detachment from Springfield, and was assigned to the Second Brigade (Colonel Hoge commanding), First Division, Sixteenth Army Corps.

On April 10, the regiment, under General S. D. Sturgis, marched to Bolivar, Miss., in pursuit of Forrest; but without any result, except marching two hundred and fifty miles to no purpose. On June 1, a second expedition, under General Sturgis, was dispatched from Memphis, and was composed of three infantry brigades, and twelve pieces of artillery, under Colonel W. L. McMillen, and General Grierson's division of cavalry, with four pieces of artillery. The Second Infantry Brigade, commanded by Colonel Hoge, of the 113th Illinois, was composed of the 81st, 95th, 108th, 113th, and 120th Illinois regiments, and Battery "B," 2d Illinois Light Artillery.

The troops moved from Memphis, on June 1, and marched through western Tennessee and northern Mississippi, to Ripley, before reaching which, on June 9, four hundred of the men had succumbed to the fatigue of the march, and been sent back to Memphis. On the morning of the 10th, the infantry column, Hoge's brigade in advance, again moved forward to the Hatchie River, and received repeated and urgent orders, to move up as quickly as possible, as the enemy was developing a large force and driving the cavalry back. The 113th reached Brice's Cross Roads, between one and two p. m., and those who could stand immediately went into action, relieving a portion of the cavalry. Many of the men were so exhausted that they were compelled, from faintness and vertigo, to lie down by the roadside, before the regiment arrived at the front. As fast as the regiments arrived, they were formed in line-of-battle, the brigade withstanding, for half an hour, a furious attack of the enemy, before the First Brigade arrived and could be brought into action. The First Brigade, also, held the Confederates at bay, for a time; but soon, both right and left were out-flanked, and finally driven back, forming another line, some distance to the rear. The Third Brigade (colored), which had been disposed along the train, as guard, was thrown to the front, as fast as the men could be assembled, and held the enemy at bay, while a portion of the artillery and train was moved out, toward the Hatchie, when it also was flanked, and joined in the retreat. The narrow road was blocked by the train; the enemy was in full pursuit; and the exhausted troops, without a place of shelter; without the possibility of reinforcements, became panic-stricken, beyond the possibility of rallying, and retreated rapidly toward Ripley; the artillery, and what was left of the train, being abandoned in the Hatchie swamp. Soon after daylight, on the 11th, the forces reached Ripley, thirty miles from the battle-field, where the command was partially reorganized.

At seven in the morning, a portion had moved from the place, when the Confederates, following up the pursuit, made a furious attack on the place, gained possession of the Salem road, on which the troops were moving out, and cut the command in two, Hoge's brigade being left in the town. The men fought there nearly two hours, the residents also firing upon them, from their doors and windows. Lieutenant James J. Conway, Co. "G," 113th regiment, was killed at Ripley; as was Colonel Thomas W. Humphrey, 95th Illinois, also of the Second Brigade. Colonel George W. McKeaig, of the 120th Illinois, was seriously—it was supposed, mortally—wounded. The total loss of the 113th, was five officers and one hundred and thirty-five men, killed, wounded, and prisoners, in the two engagements.

The troops reached Memphis, via Salisbury and Colliersville, making the whole distance of one hundred and thirty miles, in seventy hours, arriving on the 13th, with blistered feet, and nearly famished. Lieutenant H. P. Hosmer, of Chicago, is mentioned in the reports of the unfortunate expedition, as displaying especial courage and coolness during its progress.

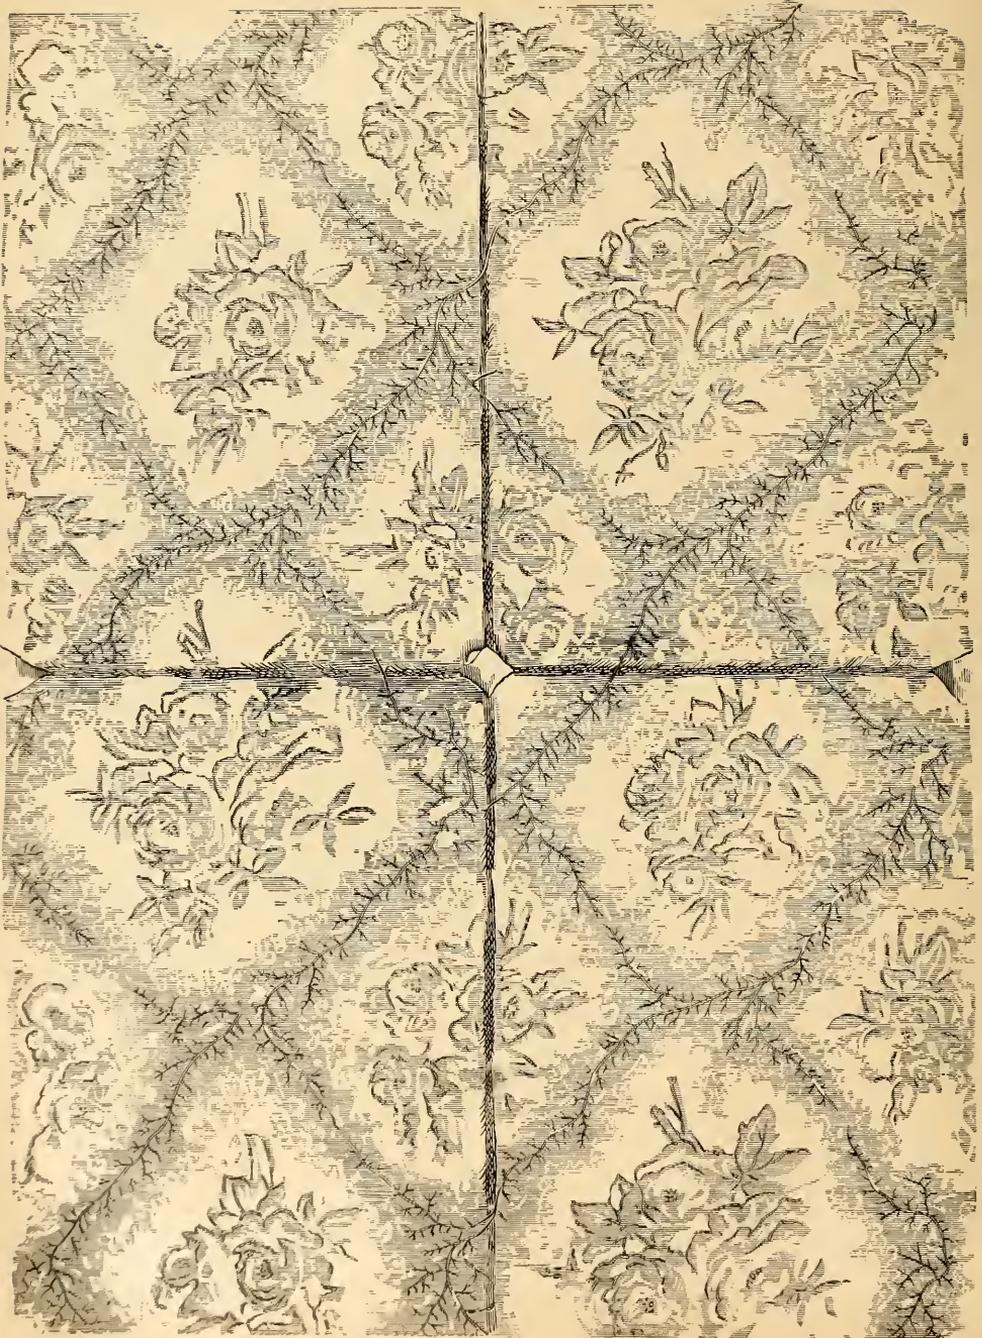

After its return to Memphis, the regiment was employed in picket duty until October, when it moved up the Tennessee River with the expedition of General C. C. Washburn, and participated in the battle at Eastport, Miss., losing two officers and fourteen men. It then returned to Memphis, where it was employed on provost and picket duty until it was mustered out of service, June 20, 1865. It arrived in Chicago June 22, where it was received by a committee of the Board-of-Trade, escorted to Metropolitan Hall, and welcomed by the officers and members of the Board. The regiment left Chicago with eight hundred and forty men, rank and file. It returned with two hundred and seventy-two, including twenty-eight officers. Two hundred and forty-two were left at Memphis, and it had recruited four hundred and ninety-two since its organization, giving a total loss of eight hundred and forty-six men.

The return roster was as follows:

Colonel, George B. Hoge; Lieutenant-Colonel, George R. Clarke; Major, Cephas Williams; Adjutant, John S. Lord; Quartermaster, John H. Taylor; Surgeon, L. B. Brown; Chaplain, A. L. Rankin. Co. "A": Captain, H. W. B. Hoyt; First Lieutenant, A. M. Baird. Co. "B": Captain, A. W. Beckett; First Lieutenant, John Jeffcoat. Co. "C": Captain, Harvey P. Hosmer; First Lieutenant, Robert Wilson; Second Lieutenant, A. C. Webber. Co. "D": Captain, R. B. Lucas; First Lieutenant, D. H. Metzger; Second Lieutenant, H. L. Frisbie. Co. "E": Captain, J. G. Day; First Lieutenant, C. A. Chatfield. Co. "F": Captain, George E. King; First Lieutenant, Alfred Fletcher; Second Lieutenant, William Bain. Co. "G": Captain, John G. Woodruff; First Lieutenant, George E. Kidder. Co. "H": Captain, B. Sutherland; First Lieutenant, H. Daniels. Co. "I": Captain, A. F. Kane; First Lieutenant, A. Tyler; Second Lieutenant, W. C. Shortridge. Co. "K": Captain, W. R. Hitt; First Lieutenant, V. W. Dashiell; Second Lieutenant, Edward Hall.

COLONEL GEORGE R. CLARKE is one of the oldest real-estate dealers in this city, and has handled some of the most eligible property that has been placed on the market. He was born at Unadilla Forks, N. Y., on February 22, 1827. His father, Dr. Henry Clarke, came to Chicago in 1836 and engaged in the practice of medicine, removing his family to this city in May, 1838, from Otsego County, N. Y. On June 15, 1839, George R. first came hither and commenced his education; then entered the Beloit College, Wisconsin, where he completed his junior year. He then was principal of the Monroe Seminary for eighteen months, taught one term at Milton Academy, then was superintendent of schools and edited the Sauck County Standard for eighteen months. In 1853 he removed to Chicago, and was admitted to the Bar; after which he practiced one year, and inaugurated the real-estate business which he has since maintained. In 1860, he spent two years in mining in Colorado, and in 1862 helped to recruit the 113th Illinois Volunteer Infantry; was made Captain of Co. "A," and from that rank promoted successively to that of major and lieutenant-colonel. In January, 1873, he married Sarah Dunn, who was born in Cayuga County, N. Y. He has one daughter by a former marriage, Nellie A., now Mrs. John Black. Colonel Clarke has taken thirty-two degrees of Masonry, and was a member of Chicago Consistory. In the year 1869, he laid out Morgan Park. But all these positions and occupations are the merest incidents in the Colonel's career compared with the work of his life, the founding and maintenance of the Pacific Garden Mission. This place, which was one of the worst places in Chicago, Mr. Clarke purchased and transformed into a mission, where the poorest and vilest can go and find a friend and comforter. The amount of good done by Colonel and Mrs. Clarke—for in all his missionary work she is his earnest coadjutor—is simply incalculable; they go into the highways and byways to seek those who are lost, and their ministrations are made to that class whom the churches seldom, if ever, reach.

FAC-SIMILE OF BACK OF NEWSPAPER "U. S. GRANT."

On account of the scarcity of paper in the Confederacy, wall-paper was taken from the walls of houses, and used as print-paper; the newspaper herewith presented is a specimen of this method.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVENTH ILLINOIS INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized at Camp Douglas, Chicago, and mustered into United States service September 6, 1862. Its Colonel, John Van Arman, was then, as now, a well-known and respected lawyer of Chicago, and also a skillful disciplinarian and tactician. Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton N. Eldridge, also a lawyer, Majors F. W. Tourtellotte and F. S. Curtiss, Adjutant John Van Arman, Jr., and other field officers were Chicago citizens.

Co. "B" (Woodworth Rifles, Chicago) was commanded by Captain Adoniram J. Burroughs, brother of President Burroughs of the Chicago University; and, by special arrangement of Governor Yates, was armed with rifles, to act as sharpshooters. Of this company Frank J. Woodward was afterward captain, acting generally on the engineer corps, and John R. Morgan and Harvey L. Mason, first lieutenants.

Co. "G" (Tourtellotte Guards) had, during its term of service, the following officers from the city: Captains, John S. Williams, Thomas Sewell; First Lieutenants, Thomas Sewell, Henry W. Adams; Second Lieutenants, Thomas Sewell, James A. Wheaton.

The regiment started for the field November 9, 1862, mustering at that time eight hundred and eighty-seven officers and men. Reporting to General Sherman at Memphis, it took part with his forces in the Tallahatchie campaign, from which it returned to Memphis December 13. It was there assigned to General Morgan L. Smith's division, and on the 20th of November embarked, with its command, for the Yazoo River, to participate in Sherman's attack on the defenses north of Vicksburg, at the Chickasaw Bayou. In the engagements at that place, the regiment lost twenty-four killed and wounded. General Smith was wounded; and, on the retreat of the forces, his division was assigned to the command of General David Stuart, of Chicago, under whom the 127th, with McClermand's forces, steamed up the Arkansas and took a conspicuous part in the capture of Arkansas Post, being the first regiment to break the enemy's lines and plant its colors in their rifle-pits.

Returning with the expedition to Young's Point, opposite Vicksburg, where Grant concentrated his whole army for operations against Vicksburg, it remained in camp, working on the canal, which was in progress of construction, and in other duties, until March 10, 1863, when it was sent, with other forces, up Steele's Bayou and Deer Creek to relieve Commodore Porter's gunboats, which had proceeded up to Black Bayou, where they were in imminent danger of capture by the Confederates. The object of the expedition being successfully accomplished, the troops returned to Young's Point, and the 127th, with Giles A. Smith's brigade, Blair's division, to which it now belonged, after proceeding up the Yazoo to take part in the feint on Haines's Bluff, started, on the 7th of May, to join Grant's army below Vicksburg.

After participating in the battle of Champion Hill, it moved to the rear of Vicksburg, with the Fifteenth Corps, and took position on the left of Sherman's line-of-battle, the left of Giles A. Smith's brigade joining the right of Ransom's brigade of McArthur's division.

The regiment was then commanded by Colonel Hamilton N. Eldridge, Colonel Van Arman resigning on account of ill-health.

The 127th participated in the assaults on the fortifications of Vicksburg, May 19 and 22, in the latter action losing heavily. After several color-bearers had successively fallen, the standard was then seized by Lieutenant-Colonel Eldridge, who led his regiment up to the works, upon which he planted its colors with his own hands. Lieutenant Thomas Sewell, Co. "G," an old employee in the Chicago Tribune office, there received a severe wound. The total loss was sixty-five men, killed and wounded. After the surrender of the city, July 4, 1863, the regiment marched with its division to Jackson, taking part in the various engagements resulting in the capture of that place; and upon its evacuation by Johnston, returned to the Big Black River, southeast of Vicksburg, where it remained encamped with the Fifteenth Corps until Sherman was ordered to move with his command to Chattanooga, to reinforce the Army of the Cumberland.

During this campaign, the regiment, with Giles A. Smith's brigade, Morgan L. Smith's division, participated in the long march to Chattanooga, the attack on the northern extremity of Mission Ridge, and the laborious and fatiguing march to the relief of Burnside at Knoxville, after which it returned to Larkinsville, and went into winter quarters. During the Atlanta campaign, it formed part of Logan's Fifteenth Corps, Army of the Tennessee, General McPherson. Smith's brigade, which consisted of the 6th Missouri, 111th, 116th and 127th Illinois, and 57th Ohio, was conspicuously brave and efficient throughout the campaign. At Resaca, May 14-15, the regiment, led by Colonel Frank S. Curtiss, took part with its brigade in a successful charge on a commanding portion of the enemy's works, which it captured and held against repeated assaults for its recovery. From this opening engagement until the close of the campaign, it took an honorable part in the many battles of the summer; at Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, the Chattahoochee, Decatur and Atlanta. From Peach Tree Creek to Atlanta, the division had the advance of the Fifteenth Corps, and was prominently engaged at Atlanta and in the engagements incident to Sherman's progress around the city to Jonesboro'.

At the conclusion of the campaign, the regiment went into camp near Atlanta, and, on the 4th of October, started on "the march through Georgia." After the capture of Savannah, it again moved north, on the Carolina campaign, and was engaged at Fayetteville and Bentonville, March 11 and 19, 1865, losing heavily at both places.

Upon the surrender of Johnston's army, it proceeded with the Fifteenth Corps to Washington, and, after participating in the grand review, in May, returned to Illinois for final payment and discharge, reaching Chicago, June 10, 1865, while the great Northwestern Sanitary Fair was in progress, at which it received a public and cordial welcome.

Of the eight hundred and eighty-seven men who left Chicago with the 127th, in 1862, but two hundred and thirty returned.

During its time of service, it marched over three thousand miles, and participated in more than one hundred engagements.

As a reminiscence of the regiment is what is known as the 127th Illinois Veteran Infantry Association. It was organized in September, 1869. The present officers of the association are J. F. Richmond, president; George H. Knott, secretary.

COLONEL HAMILTON N. ELDRIDGE, son of Colonel Reuben Eldridge, an officer in the Mexican War, was born, in 1831, in South Williamstown, Berkshire Co., Mass. After acquiring a preliminary education at East Hampton, Mass., he entered Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., in 1852, from which institution he graduated four years later, and, in 1857, from the law school at the same place. Upon graduating from the law school, he removed to Chicago, where, in 1858, he formed a partnership with F. W. Tourtellotte, an old friend and classmate, under the firm name of Eldridge & Tourtellotte, which business association continued until his death. At the organization of the 127th Illinois Infantry, September, 1862, he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, and, on the resignation of Colonel Van Arman, within a year, was promoted colonel. He led his command efficiently and gallantly; and after the assault on the defenses of Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, in which he displayed signal bravery, was promoted brigadier-general for his services on the field. At the close of the war, he resumed his law practice in Chicago, in which he was engaged until his death, which occurred November 27, 1882. He left a widow, now residing in Chicago.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SECOND AND ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOURTH.

Although not composed to any great extent of Chicago men, the 132d Infantry was organized at Camp Fry, and partially commanded by officers from this city. The command was organized by Colonel Thomas J. Pickett, of Moline, Ill., and was mustered into service for one hundred days from June 1, 1864. It moved for Columbus, Ky., on the 6th of June, and two days later arrived at that point, to report to Brigadier-General Henry Prince. On the 15th of June, the regiment arrived at Paducah, reporting to Colonel S. G. Hicks, and remained on duty there up to the date of its muster-out, October 17, 1864.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOURTH INFANTRY REGIMENT, Illinois Volunteers, was organized at Camp Fry, by Colonel Waters W. McChesney, of this city, and mustered into the service May 31, 1864, for one hundred days. A few days thereafter it was assigned to garrison duty at Columbus, Ky., and mustered out of service October 25, 1864. Both privates and officers were principally from Chicago; but the uneventful military experience of this regiment requires nothing more than a passing comment, annotating its incursion and excursion, in Chicago war annals.

THE STURGES RIFLES.

It has been mentioned that this company was raised and equipped through the liberality of Solomon Sturges, of Chicago. It went into camp on Cottage Grove Avenue, at Camp Sturges, where it remained until June 20, 1861; when, pursuant to an order from General McClellan, to report at Marietta, Ohio, it broke encampment, and, escorted by a vast crowd of friends, took the cars at the West Side Union Depot for its destination.

The following is the original roster of the company :

Captain, James Steele; First Lieutenant, Nathaniel E. Sheldon; Second Lieutenant, Marcus P. Forster; Third Sergeant, Gustav Jericho; Second Sergeant, Richard Bingle; Third Sergeant, Sylvanus E. Gault; Fourth Sergeant, William G. Fuller; Fifth Sergeant, Spencer Smith; First Corporal, George Durell; Second Corporal, Moses Lovejoy; Third Corporal, Samuel M. Burnham; Fourth Corporal, Charles W. Vickery.

With Barker's Dragoons, they were attached to the headquarters of General McClellan, forming his escort. They accompanied him on his Virginia campaign, participating in the battles of Philippi, Rich Mountain and Beverly. At Rich Mountain they fought dismounted, as sharpshooters, and were thereafter called the "Sturges Sharpshooters." Major Denison, of this company, had charge of the prisoners taken at Beverly, among them Colonel Pegram. Their term of enlistment was completed July 24, 1861.

CAVALRY.

Chicago was not largely represented in the cavalry companies recruited during the early portion of the war epoch. In the 1st, 2d and 3d Illinois Cavalry are no Chicago names. In the 4th Cavalry was Major Martin R. M. Wallace, promoted lieutenant-colonel December 5, 1862, and colonel June 3, 1863. Adjutant H. B. Dox also served for a brief time in the regiment. Co. "A" was raised by Captain Embury D. Osband, formerly captain of the "Lincoln Rangers," a local military company. Captain Osband was promoted major of the 4th Cavalry in February, 1863, and a year later was mustered out and appointed colonel of the 1st Mississippi Cavalry. Captain Charles C. James, Co. "C," was also a citizen of Chicago, but the regiment was mainly recruited and officered from other sections of the State.

MARTIN R. M. WALLACE was born at Urbana, Champaign Co., Ohio, on September 29, 1829. His father, John Wallace, moved with his large family to Illinois in 1834 and settled on a farm in LaSalle County. Young Wallace received his preliminary education in country schools and at the Rock River Seminary, of which his father was president of the board of trustees for a number of years. His father died September 29, 1850, the day Martin attained his majority. There was thus thrown upon his hands a large family to support and a complicated estate to settle; but he was fully equal to the emergency. Having chosen the law as his future profession, he entered the office of Dickey & Wallace, at Ottawa, Ill., as a student. The firm was composed of T. Lyle Dickey, afterward colonel of the 4th Illinois Cavalry, well known in the legal, political and military circles of the State, and W. H. L. Wallace, his brother, colonel of the 11th Illinois Infantry and afterward brigadier-general, who fell at the battle of Shiloh, on April 6, 1862. Mr. Wallace was admitted to the Bar in January, 1856, and removed to Chicago, where he engaged in active practice, in partnership with Thomas Dent. At the breaking out of the war, he assisted in recruiting and organizing the 4th Illinois Cavalry, and in October, 1861, received a commission as major of that regiment. He commanded one of the battalions through the battles of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and in December, 1862, upon the death of Lieutenant-Colonel William McCallough, assumed command of the regiment. This position he retained throughout the war, being promoted in 1862 to the lieutenant-colonelcy, and to the colonelcy in 1863. At the close of his military career he was brevetted brigadier-general. In August, 1866, General Wallace was appointed assessor for the Chicago district, serving in that capacity until May, 1869. In December of the latter year he was elected county judge, continuing in that position until December, 1877. From January, 1878, to December, 1880, he was county attorney, while from that time until the winter of 1884, he held no public office but gave himself entirely to private practice. In February, 1884, he was appointed prosecuting attorney for the city, and continues to serve the corporation in that capacity, besides having a good general practice. Judge Wallace is a member of Post No. 28, G. A. R., and is president of the National Veteran Association. General Wallace was married on September 2, 1863, to Emma R. Gilson. They have had six children, five of whom are alive—one son and four daughters. The son is at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass.

EIGHTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.

Though the 8th Cavalry can not be claimed as especially a Chicago regiment, the city, and Evanston, its suburb, contributed most valuable material toward its formation. Among its field-officers were Colonel William Gamble, and Majors John L. Beveridge, William H. Medill, George A. Forsyth and James D. Ludlam. Of its companies, "F" and "G" were recruited in Chicago, the officers being as follows:

Co. "F": Captain, Reuben Cleveland; First Lieutenant, Edward S. Smith; Second Lieutenant, Alvin P. Granger.

Co. "G": Captain, William H. Medill; First Lieutenant, George A. Forsyth; Second Lieutenant, Dennis J. Hynes. On the promotion of Captain Medill to major, and First Lieutenant Forsyth to the captaincy of Co. "A," Dennis J. Hynes was promoted captain of Co. "G," Malcolm H. Wing, first lieutenant, and George F. Warner, second lieutenant.

The regiment was organized at Camp Kane, St. Charles, Ill., by Hon. John F. Farnsworth, its first colonel. On the 18th of September, 1861, it was mustered into United States service, by Captain Webb, U. S. A., and on the 14th of October, one thousand one hundred and eighty-four strong, fully mounted and equipped, except as to arms, the command left for the seat of war, arriving at Washington on the 18th. It was ordered to camp on Meridian Hill, and marching up Pennsylvania Avenue paused in front of the White House to give three cheers for President Lincoln, who, while viewing its well filled ranks, called it, in his quaint language, "Farnsworth's Big Abolition Regiment," a name which clung to the 8th throughout its career. While in camp at Meridian Hill, the 8th was brigaded with the 1st Michigan and 4th Pennsylvania cavalry, forming the first full cavalry brigade in the United States Army. On December 13, having been supplied with arms, it crossed the Potomac on Long Bridge, and joined General Sumner's division, to which it had been assigned—its camp being near the Centerville road, about three miles west of Alexandria, Va. The 8th occupied "Camp California" until January 24, 1862, suffering greatly from the severe weather and continuous rains of the season. During the short time it remained there, the 8th lost thirty-five men by death. It thence removed to Alexandria, where it was quartered until spring.

On March 19, 1862, it joined in the advance on Manassas, returning to Alexandria April 10. On April 24, with Richardson's division, Sumner's corps, it embarked to join McClellan's army, at Fortress Monroe, for the ill-fated Peninsula campaign. From June 13, when the 8th reached the White House, three days in advance of McClellan and staff, until the 24th, when the advance reached Mechanicsville, on the north side of the Chickahominy, five miles from Richmond, that portion of the 8th under the immediate command of Colonel Farnsworth, was almost constantly in the advance. One squadron of the regiment (Cos. "D" and "F") was detached from the command on May 10, under orders to report to General Keys, commander of the Fourth Corps. This portion of the regiment, under Major Beveridge, who joined it that day, participated in the battles of Seven Pines and Fair Oaks, on May 31, and June 1, mostly employed in orderly and aide duty.

The battle of Mechanicsville, the first of the Seven Days' bloody fights, occurred on June 26. The pickets were attacked early in the morning. Captain R. M. Hooker, Co. "H," who had ventured out on a reconnoissance, was shot and fatally wounded by the advance guard of the enemy. The advance of the Confederates was so rapid, that it was impossible to bring the wounded man within the Federal lines, and he died, a few days later, in the hands of their opponents. The 8th fell back toward Mechanicsville slowly, holding back the enemy as long as possible, and on the arrival of the infantry at the front, retired to support a battery, remaining until the whole command was forced across Beaver Dam Creek. At Gaines's Mill, on June 27, the 8th was posted as support to batteries, and afterward as a guard across the rear of the battle-field. During the retreat to the James River, the 8th took the advance, reaching Harrison's Landing on July 1. There, Major Beveridge and detached squadron re-joined the regiment, which was employed in picket duty and scouting. Captain Reuben Cleveland, Co. "F," of Chicago, resigned on July 16, much to the regret of his command.

During the latter part of July and the first of August, Majors Beveridge and Clendennin made several scouts toward Malvern Hill, with detached squadrons, and, on the 3d of August, the regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Gamble, took part in the movement, in force, on that position, by the divisions of Hooker, Sedgwick, and others. In the attempt to capture the rear guard of the retreating Confederates, Lieutenant-Colonel Gamble was shot in the chest and severely wounded; two privates were killed and five were wounded. On the retreat from Harrison's Landing to Yorktown, the 8th Illinois Cavalry acted as rear guard to the army, Major Beveridge and his battalion in the extreme rear. On August 30, it embarked at Yorktown, and reached Alexandria, September 1 and 2. On arriving at Alexandria, the regiment was immediately ordered into Maryland, to assist in repelling the invasion of Lee. Crossing the Potomac on the 4th of September, it marched to Darnstown, Md., where Colonel Farnsworth, who re-joined the regiment at Alexandria, was placed in command of the cavalry brigade, and Major Medill took command of the regiment, all his ranking officers being sick or on detached duty. After skirmishes at Poolville and Barnesville, on the 8th and 9th (the regiment defeating the Confederate cavalry, under Lieutenant Stuart, at those places), it was again engaged, on the following day, at New Market, and soon after at Monocacy Church, where it captured the colors of the 12th Virginia Cavalry. It was engaged at Sugar Loaf Mountain, and, on the 15th, at Boonsboro'; at the latter place, defeating two Confederate regiments, under Fitz Hugh Lee, which retreated, abandoning two guns and leaving nearly two hundred killed, wounded, and prisoners, in the hands of the victors. The regiment lost Sergeant Robert McArthur, killed, and twenty-three wounded. One squadron of the 8th, with a part of the 3d Indiana, in the meantime had successfully met the enemy near South Mountain. On the 17th, the regiment participated in the battle of Antietam, supporting the artillery, and, on the retreat of the enemy, joined in the pursuit. On October 2, General Farnsworth's brigade made a reconnoissance to Martinsburg, Va., capturing prisoners and supplies, and rescuing Union prisoners. As the brigade left the town, its rear was struck by a large Confederate cavalry force, under Fitz Hugh Lee, and a running fight was kept up some little distance. The 8th Illinois, with a battery of flying artillery, formed the rear guard of the Union cavalry. Major Medill, leaving one gun with the rear squadron, sent the other pieces forward, to a commanding position, and had them masked and trained to sweep the road. The Confederates and the rear guard, in the meantime, skirmished vigorously, the former pressing close up, in the attempt to capture the gun. As they arrived within a couple of hundred yards of the masked battery, Major Medill's men cleared the road, and the battery then opened with grape, canister, and shell upon the Confederate column, throwing it into utter confusion, when the men, riding into the fields on either flank poured in a volley, which completed the rout. The Confederate loss was one hundred and fifty men, including prisoners. The 8th lost but sixteen men.

The regiment remained in camp, near Sharpsburg, until October 11, and then took part in the famous pursuit of Stuart's cavalry across the Potomac—the 8th making a distance of eighty-six miles in twenty-six hours, returning to Sharpsburg on the 13th. The following day, Major Beveridge relieved Major Medill in command, the 8th being then encamped at Knoxville, Md. In the movement toward Fredericksburg, the regiment was engaged with the enemy's cavalry, at Philomonte, Uniontown, Upperville, Barbour's Cross Roads, Little Washington, etc., arriving at Falmouth, on November 23, 1862. At Barbour's Cross Roads, Companies "A" and "B," under Captains Forsyth and Smith, charged upon a Confederate regiment and drove it from its guns; but, being unsupported, were compelled, after a sharp contest, to fall back, with the loss of two killed and five wounded. The regiment reached Falmouth, near Fredericksburg, November 23, and remained on Stafford Heights until after the battle of Fredericksburg, but taking no active part in the engagement.

The ensuing winter was spent in scouting, and picket duty, in the peninsula between the Potomac and Rappahannock rivers. In the spring, it was divided into three battalions, under Majors Beveridge, Medill, and Clendennin, and made a ten days' scout down the Peninsula, gathering supplies of all sorts, breaking up guerrilla bands, and confiscating "contrabands," of whom it brought back to camp some fifteen hundred. During the movement on Chancellorsville, in April and May, 1863, the 8th was attached to Averill's cavalry division, and took no part in the battle. In the early days of June, 1863, Lee commenced his march into Pennsylvania, and the 8th, temporarily attached to Davis's brigade, Devens's division, was constantly engaged in skirmishing with the enemy's pickets and skirmishers. On June 9, a severe cavalry fight took place at Beverly Ford, near Warrenton Junction, in which Captain John G. Smith, Co. "B," and Major Alpheus Clark, were mortally, and Captain George A. Forsyth and Captain D. J. Hynes seriously, wounded. In this battle, Major Beveridge being sick, and all the senior officers sick or on detached service, the 8th was commanded by Major Clark. He was wounded in the left hand, and the command of the regiment then devolved upon Captain Forsyth, and after he, too, was wounded, upon Captain Farnsworth. The wound of Major Clark proved fatal, from blood-poisoning ensuing, causing his death, at the Seminary Hospital, Georgetown, D.C., on July 5, 1863. Captain John G. Smith, after suffering amputation of the left leg, died at the same place, on June 16, 1863. The total loss was two killed and thirty-two wounded.

In the battle at Upperville, June 21, near Aldie Gap in the Blue Ridge, the 8th was the charging column, supported by the 12th Illinois. During the early part of the fight, Lieutenant-Colonel Clendennin commanded, and on his retiring from the field, the command devolved on Major William H. Medill, who led the regiment in successive charges on the enemy, routing and scattering three Confederate cavalry regiments—the loss in the 8th being but forty men, killed and wounded, while that of the Confederates was two hundred and fifty, besides one hundred taken prisoners, among whom were the lieutenant-colonel of the 9th and the major of the 11th Virginia Cavalry.

On June 25, Lieutenant-Colonel Clendennin was ordered to Alexandria, and Major Beveridge having rejoined his regiment, took command of the 8th, which reached Gettysburg June 30th. Early on the following morning, Cos. "F," "G," "I" and "K" were driven back from the picket-line on to Buford's command, followed by the enemy in force. For about three hours, Buford's force held the Confederates at bay, falling back slowly and fighting along the Chambersburg Road, and toward the Seminary Ridge, until General Reynolds's infantry corps arrived. After Reynolds arrived, the 8th with its brigade, was ordered to the left of the line to guard that flank, and so well performed its duty that it was publicly thanked by General Doubleday for saving his division from annihilation, when the combined forces of Hill and Ewell poured down on his brave but exhausted men. On July 2, Buford's command marched to Westminster, and, after the termination of the battle, joined in the pursuit of Lee's army to the Potomac, reaching Williamsport on July 6, where it had a skirmish with the enemy under General Imboden, who were found in considerable force engaged in building a bridge over the river to facilitate their escape. In the attempt to seize this bridge, Major Medill was killed, while leading forward a portion of the 8th, dismounted as skirmishers. Sergeant Richard C. Vinson and Alfred C. Bailey were mortally wounded, and Private Gale Carter, Co. "G," was killed. At Boonsboro', the regiment again met and drove the Confederates, losing one man killed and several wounded.

During the pursuit to the Rapidan, the 8th was constantly skirmishing at Funktown, Falling Water, Chester Gap, the Rappahannock River, Poney Mountain, Raccoon Ford across the Rapidan, and various other points. On September 23, the regiment went into camp at Stevensburg, where it remained until October 10, when the retreat to Manassas commenced. On October 18, the 8th followed in pursuit of Lee, and then went into winter quarters at Culpepper.

On November 4, Major Beveridge left the 8th, to take command of the 17th Illinois Cavalry—a loss to the 8th most sincerely regretted by officers and men. In December, Colonel Gamble, who had been absent on leave, returned and took command of the First Brigade, Lieutenant-Colonel Clendennin commanding the 8th. In January, 1864, three-fourths of the regiment "veteranized," and returned to Illinois on furlough, being the first regiment to enjoy this privilege, leaving Culpepper on the 11th, and reaching Chicago on the 18th. They received a hearty welcome at Bryan Hall, and then proceeded to camp at St. Charles, Ill., where recruiting was actively carried on. On February 18, before its furlough had expired, the 8th left for Washington, reaching that city February 25; and being joined the following month by detachments of recruits, and some of the sick who had not been able to move in February. During March and April, the regiment was employed in camp and patrol duty at Washington. In May, Brevet Brigadier-General Gamble was assigned to the command of Camp Stoneman, near Giesboro'; Colonel Clendennin, with five companies of the 8th, went to Belle Plain, to guard communication between the Rapidan and Grant's army; Companies "C" and "F" were sent to Acquia Creek; Co. "D" was sent to Alexandria; and four companies remained at Washington. Major Forsyth reported to General Sheridan at the front, and served on his staff during the remainder of the war.

Thus broken into detachments, the regiment performed duty within the Department of Washington and elsewhere until July, when a portion marched from Washington, under Colonel Clendennin, to intercept Mosby, and effecting a junction with the remainder of the regiment, it performed excellent service. It then, July 13, followed in the pursuit of Early, and afterward went to Muddy Branch, on the upper Potomac, where a part remained scouting and a part was detached and sent to Port Tobacco, to guard the Potomac in that vicinity. In November, the regiment was united, and went into winter quarters at Fairfax Court House, where—with the exception of a brief expedition to Maryland, in April, 1865, after the assassination of President Lincoln, when the regiment took part in the search for Booth,—it remained until June 19, when it left for Missouri, reporting at St. Louis June 27 and 28. On July 17, the 8th was mustered out of service at Benton Barracks, and ordered to Chicago for final payment and discharge, which it received July 21, 1865.

WILLIAM H. MEDILL was born in Massillon, Ohio, November 5, 1835. In 1858, the family removed to Stark County, Ohio, where he remained on his father's farm until 1859, when he went to Coshocton, in the same State, to learn printing in his brother's office. From April, 1852, until the fall of 1855, he was employed on the Leader, published by his brother, Joseph Medill, in Cleveland, removing at the latter date from that city to Chicago. From 1855 until 1861, he was engaged with his brother James in the publication of the Prairie Farmer; in the establishment and publication of the Stark County Republican, at Canton, Ohio; and from the spring of 1859 to the spring of 1861, as compositor on the Daily Tribune, of which his brother Joseph was then the managing editor and part proprietor. On the 15th of April, 1861, he joined Barker's Dragoons, and with it proceeded to Cairo, remaining at Camp Defiance until the dragoons, having been selected by General McClellan six weeks later as his body-guard, left to join him at Clarksburg, Va., in June. With the dragoons, young Medill participated in the engagements at Buckhannon, Rich Mountain and Beverly, in July, and in August returned with them to Chicago, his term of service having expired. The dragoons were mustered out on the 20th of August, and on the 24th, Mr. Medill applied to General J. F. Farnsworth, at St. Charles, Ill., for permission to recruit a company for the 8th Cavalry, then in process of formation. Receiving permission, he recruited the "Fremont Dragoons" to the maximum in less than two weeks, and it became Co. "G," 8th Illinois Cavalry. He was unanimously elected captain of the company. General George Forsyth, now of the regular army, and Colonel D. J. Hynes were elected first and second lieutenants of the same company. In March, 1862, Captain Medill, with his company, joined in the advance on Manassas, and in the pursuit of the retreating enemy to the Kappahannock he had command of the leading squadron. Captain Medill was not patient with the inaction and want of energy displayed in the army. On June 25, 1862, he writes: "We have wasted a month here in inaction. Our army is doing two things—ditch-digging and dying. The sickness and mortality this hot weather, in these marshes, are terrible. * * * I am disgusted at the way this fine army is employed. One part is ditch-digging, and another stands guard over the plantations and property of slaveholders, whose sons are in Lee's army fighting us." On June 26, Captain Medill was engaged at Mechanicsville, and also at Gaines's Mill and Malvern Hill. He commanded the extreme rear-guard squadron during the retreat from the Chickahominy, and on reaching Yorktown took command of the regiment. On September 10, Captain Medill was commissioned major, and commanded the 8th through the ensuing campaign in Maryland, meeting and defeating the Confederate cavalry at Damascus, New Market and Boonsboro', at the latter place charging successfully two regiments of Stuart's cavalry, capturing two guns and nearly two hundred prisoners, the Confederates leaving sixty-seven killed and wounded on the field in their precipitate flight. At Antietam he commanded the regiment; and after the enemy's retreat, the 8th led the cavalry in their pursuit. On January 1, 1863, Major Medill celebrated that day and the emancipation proclamation, by visiting, with a battalion of his cavalry, the surrounding plantations, and bringing into camp nearly one thousand "contrabands." Early in May, the regiment was divided into three battalions, one of which Major Medill commanded in the famous raid down the Peninsula. He also led the 8th Illinois at the Aldie Gap fight, greatly distinguishing himself in that engagement, capturing a Confederate lieutenant-colonel in single combat, in presence of his regiment. At Gettysburg he held a whole division of the enemy in check three hours at the opening of the battle and until reinforcements came up. In the pursuit of Lee's army, on July 6, 1863, Major Medill lost his life, while at the front, leading his regiment in an attempt to seize a bridge which the Confederates were throwing over the Potomac in the vicinity of Williamsport. He was struck by a Minié ball in the breast, which inflicted a mortal wound, and the following day was taken to the hospital at Frederick City, where he expired a week later, regretting only that he must die before he saw his country safe. He bitterly condemned the inaction of General Meade, whereby Lee's army escaped capture. He died July 16, 1863, and his remains were brought by his brother Joseph to Chicago, and interred with military honors in Graceland Cemetery. No braver man served or fell in the Union army, or one more devoted to his country's cause.

MAJOR JAMES D. LUDLAM, second son of Dr. Jacob W. Ludlam, was born in Cumberland County, N. J., June 22, 1833. He was educated a farmer, which occupation he followed until his removal to Chicago, in 1854. He engaged in mercantile pursuits in this city, in which he continued until the summer of 1861, when, with John L. Beveridge, he signed the muster roll of the 8th Illinois Cavalry, which was then being organized by Hon. John F. Farnsworth. When Co. "F" was organized, he was chosen first lieutenant; on the completion of the regimental organization, was appointed adjutant; and on the resignation of Captain Cleveland, was commissioned captain of Co. "F," his commission dating August 4, 1862. The same day, he was placed in command of a squadron, and participated thereafter in all skirmishes, battles, and marches of the 8th, until the Gettysburg campaign, when he was sick in hospital, at Georgetown. He re-enlisted, January, 1864, and, on March 4, was appointed major, and, in that position, shared the fortunes of the regiment, until his resignation in January, 1865.

NINTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.

THE NINTH CAVALRY was organized at Camp Douglas, Chicago, in September, 1861, by Colonel Albert G. Brackett, of Rock Island, Ill., and was mustered into service on November 30. Among its field officers from Chicago, were Major Rosell M. Hough, formerly aide to General Hunter, with whom he had served in Missouri, and, later, colonel of the 67th Infantry; Major, William J. Wallis; Adjutant, John H. Carpenter; and Quartermaster, Samuel H. Price.

MR. PRICE was a native of Virginia, but received his education in the North, graduating from Amherst College, and afterward practicing law in Windsor, Vt. He removed to Chicago in 1854, and engaged in mercantile pursuits until the opening of the war, when he offered his services to Governor Yates, and was given the position of Quartermaster of the 9th Cavalry.

Co. "F" was recruited in Chicago, by Captain Bernard F. Stampoffski, an old and well known citizen, who had formerly served in the Florida War, for eight months, and as a member of Co. "F," Second U. S. Dragoons, was engaged in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, in May, 1846. Lieutenant Erastus G. Butler, of the same company, served in Co. "E," 3d U. S. Artillery, in the Mexican War, and was at the battles of Monterey and Buena Vista. The officers of this company were exclusively Chicagoans during its whole term of service. Captain Charles S. Cameron, of Co. "K," abandoned a large and lucrative law business to enter the army. First Lieutenant Joseph H. Knox, Co. "K," son of Hon.

Joseph Knox, was a graduate of Williams College, and had just been admitted to the Bar when he joined the regiment. He served with the 9th until April 5, 1862, when he resigned, and was afterward appointed to a position on General Crittenden's staff, rendering valuable service at Stone River. First Lieutenant Charles T. Scammon, son of Hon. J. Y. Scammon, had just graduated from the Chicago University, when he joined the 9th Cavalry, and was elected lieutenant of Co. "L," serving in that capacity until promoted captain of Co. "H," January 15, 1863. During this time he also served on the staff of General Steele in Arkansas. Lieutenant Arthur M. Kinzie served with Co. "B" until the expiration of his term, September 30, 1864.

The 9th Illinois Cavalry left Chicago on February 17, 1862, and moved to Benton Barracks, St. Louis, and thence to Pilot Knob, where it commenced its long campaign in Missouri and Arkansas, as a part of the Third Brigade of General Frank Steele's division. With that command, it joined General Curtis's army at Jacksonport, Ark., on May 23, and, during June, participated in two serious skirmishes in the vicinity of the camp—losing twelve wounded and one missing at Waddell's Plantation, on June 12; and, on June 27, at Stewart's Plantation, two killed, and thirty-five wounded, Colonel Brackett being among the latter. On June 26, the Ninth, with Steele's division, commenced the march to Helena, Ark., arriving July 14. The troops suffered extremely during the march, from lack of water and rations, five men of the 9th dying from the hardships and privation endured. At Helena, the regiment was assigned to the Third Brigade, Fourth Division (Hovey's) of Steele's Arkansas Army. Two twelve-pounder mountain howitzers were assigned the regiment on September 15, which, under command of Lieutenant E. G. Butler, did good service during the expedition of General Washburn into Mississippi, of which the regiment formed a part. On January 9, 1863, it embarked with General Gorman at Helena, and proceeded up the White River to Duval's Bluff, which was found evacuated, and the expedition returned to Helena, arriving January 23. On April 7, the 9th moved to Memphis, and thence, on April 12, to Germantown, Tenn., where, with Colonel McCrillis's brigade, it was employed in scouting and skirmishing in Southern Tennessee and Northern Mississippi through the entire summer, being engaged at Coldwater on July 28, at Granada August 18, Salem October 8, and at Wyatt October 13. In November, the regiment marched from LaGrange to Colliersville, Tenn., where it was assigned to Grierson's cavalry division, and on December 4, took an honorable and conspicuous part in the battle at Moscow, Tenn. On February 11, it marched with Generals Grierson and Smith into Mississippi, and was engaged on February 20 at West Point, February 21 at Okolona, and on the 23d at Mount Ivy. The following day it went into camp at Germantown, Tenn., where, on March 16, it re-enlisted as a veteran organization. On the 17th it marched to Memphis, and immediately returned to Illinois on veteran furlough.

On April 27, the regiment returned to Memphis, and, in June, a detachment, with Grierson's cavalry, accompanied General Sturgis on his disastrous expedition to Guntown, Miss., acting as rear guard on the retreat of his forces. During the expedition, the 9th lost five killed, twenty-three wounded and twelve captured, out of one hundred and sixty engaged. It also formed a part of the force of General Grierson in his expedition with General A. J. Smith, to Tupelo, Miss. The 9th, forming the cavalry advance, had a severe engagement at Pontotoc, Miss., and was engaged July 14–15, at Tupelo and Old Town Creek, Miss. During August it accompanied General Giles A. Smith's expedition to the Tallahatchie, meeting the enemy on August 11, at Oxford, and, August 13, at Hurricane Creek, in the latter engagement losing four killed and several wounded. On September 4, it returned to camp at Memphis, and remained until September 30. Under Captain Blackburn, Co. "A," it then moved with General Hatch's division to Clifton, Tenn., where it crossed the Tennessee, and thence returned to near Florence, Ala., to meet the advance of Hood's army. On November 9, the regiment drove the enemy from a ford on Shoal Creek, which it was ordered to cross on the 11th, and strike the enemy in the rear. At the same time the brigade was to dislodge the enemy and cross at a lower ford. The command failed to dislodge the Confederates, who held the lower ford in force, but the 9th, by a sudden and unexpected attack on their rear, caused them to retire from their position sufficiently to allow the regiment to pass through their lines to the creek, which they re-crossed, and joined the brigade. On November 19, the brigade was ordered to advance from Shoal Creek to Bailey Springs. It crossed the creek and advanced a short distance, when it encountered General Buford's Confederate cavalry, which attacked and nearly surrounded it. The command, however, succeeded in re-crossing at another ford, and on the following day the retreat towards Nashville commenced. The 9th was engaged, November 24, at Campbellville, Tenn., in protecting the army train, and participated in the battles at Franklin and in front of Nashville. It then joined in the pursuit of Hood's army to the Tennessee River, and, at its discontinuance, moved to Huntsville, Ala., to Eastport, and finally to Gravelly Springs near Florence, Ala., where it went into camp January 10, 1865. On February 9, it again moved to Eastport, Miss., and remained in camp at that point until June 23, when it moved to Iuka, Miss.; thence, on July 4, to Decatur, Ala., and thence to Montgomery, Selma, and to Gainesville, Ala., arriving at the latter place August 20.

On October 31, 1865, it was mustered out of service at Selma, Ala., and ordered to Springfield, Ill., for final payment, arriving on November 8.

The 9th Illinois Cavalry marched twenty thousand miles, and was never employed in garrison duty after leaving Springfield in February, 1862.

SETH F. HANCHETT, sheriff of Cook County, has been a resident of Chicago for over twenty-seven years, most of which time he has held official positions of various kinds. After having served bravely and faithfully in the war, and leaving his left arm before Petersburg, Mr. Hanchett returned to Chicago in June, 1865, having just been discharged from the hospital at Washington. He was then employed for one year in the commission business, after which he was made superintendent of the Soldier's Home, but resigned in July, 1867, to accept the position of deputy sheriff under General John L. Beveridge. He was first bailiff in the County Court under Judges Bradwell and Wallace, and served as deputy sheriff under different administrations, until November, 1876, when Charles Kern was elected sheriff. From that time, for about a year, he, with W. H. Gleason, his present chief clerk, carried on a collection agency. Upon being elected clerk of the Probate Court, he retired from this business and gave himself to the duties of his new position until chosen, in the fall of 1880, to the more responsible office of sheriff. Mr. Hanchett is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Union Veteran Club, and has been treasurer of the Union Veteran League since its organization. Sheriff Hanchett was born near Mayville, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., April 30, 1842, his parents being Joseph C. and Sabrina (Howard) Hanchett. His mother dying when he was nine years of age, he was left to the care of an uncle, occupying himself until fourteen years of age by working on the farm and laying up a modest educational store at the district schools. In the latter part of August, 1856, he reached Chicago, having determined to seek his fortune in what was then the "Far West." But realizing the value of an education, young as he was, he took advantage of the presence of a relative at Marengo, Ill., and obtained another year's schooling at that place. After searching a few months for a location, he finally settled permanently in Chicago. He was employed by the North Chicago City Railway Company up to the breaking out of the war, when he joined the 9th Illinois Cavalry, as a private. He served with his command in the Southwest, until November, 1862, when he was seized with a Southern fever, and sent to the St. Louis hospital, his case being considered hopeless. But his strong constitution enabled him to withstand a fierce siege of sickness of about ten months' duration, and, during the latter part of 1863, he hastened to his old home, to join the 15th New York Cavalry. He served in the regiment under Generals Franz Sigel and Hunter, and was with Custer's division under General Sheridan, in 1864, in the Shenandoah Valley. He was also engaged in all the engagements before Petersburg, ending with the battle of Five Forks, April 1, 1865. In this last engagement, while charging the rebel lines, he was struck by the fragment of a shell and maimed for life, his left arm being subsequently amputated. In this, the third, last and triumphant charge, the rebel lines were broken, and the day saved for the Union forces. On June 27, 1867, he married Miss Lizzie L. Atkins, daughter of Robert J. Atkins. They have three children—Frank S., Seth R. and Bessie L.

EDWARD A. DAVENPORT was born in New York City, April 11, 1834, the son of Charles W. and Mary E. (Fitch) Davenport. On his father's side, he is a descendant of Rev. John Davenport, of Radcliff, England, who came to this country in the 16th century. On his mother's side, his great grandfather was commissioned Governor of Connecticut by royal appointment in 1754, and held his place for twelve years, until 1766, when the first Federal government was elected. His family moved to the State of Illinois, and settled in Henry County in 1837, where an investment in real estate was made. He received his early education in the schools of Henry County, and afterward attended school at Knoxville, Ill., and from there went to Rock Island, where he graduated, at the age of eighteen, and soon after opened a dry-goods store as a partner with his brother, whose interest he bought two years later, and continued the business alone until 1861, when he enlisted, at Cambridge, Ill., in Co. "C," 9th Illinois Cavalry. He remained in the service from September 10, 1861, until November 25, 1865, and for efficient military service was promoted, through the different ranks, to that of regimental commissary, with the rank of first lieutenant. He received his last commission on May 23, 1863, and remained with his regiment until November, 1864, when he was appointed on the staff of General Coon, as brigade commissary. He was an occupant of this position but a short time, when he was again promoted to division commissary under Major-General Edward Hatch, and remained with him until August, 1865, when he returned to his regiment, and was mustered out October 31, 1865. In 1866, he came to Chicago, and became connected with the Board of Trade, and held his membership for about ten years, and has been connected with the grain and commission business to the present time. He was married February 15, 1866, to Miss Elenora A. Soule, of Cambridge, Ill. They have three children—Edward A., Soule F. and Paul D.

TWELFTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.

THE TWELFTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY was partially organized at Camp Douglas in September, 1861, and remained at that place until February 26, 1862, engaged in recruiting, drilling and perfecting its organization. At that time its rolls embraced nearly five hundred men—of whom nearly two-thirds were recruited in Chicago. The field officers, and nearly all the officers of Cos. "A," "B," "C," "D," "E" and "G" were from this city, as were those of Cos. "H" and "I," the old "McClellan Dragoons," originally "Barker's Dragoons," which was assigned to the 12th Cavalry, December 25, 1862. Co. "K," also from Chicago, was assigned to the 12th late in December, 1863.

The regiment was formally organized and mustered into United States service at Camp Butler, Springfield, in February, 1862, and was then mounted and drilled until June 25, when it was sent to Martinsburg, Va., where its commander, Colonel Voss, was made post commander. The garrison consisted of the 12th Illinois Cavalry, the 65th (Scotch) Illinois Infantry, Captain Phillips's battery, of Chicago, and the 52d New York Infantry.

Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, with a small force, was placed in command of one of the outposts on the Martinsburg and Winchester pike, about five miles from the camp of the regiment, and while on a scout, September 5, encountered and routed a superior force of the Confederate cavalry, at Bunker Hill, killing and capturing a considerable number. At daybreak on the 7th, the enemy, strongly reinforced, made an attempt to surround and capture Lieutenant-Colonel Davis and his command. The latter sent to Colonel Voss for reinforcements, who instantly put himself at the head of his cavalry, then in camp, a section of Captain Phillips's battery and a battalion of the 65th Infantry, under command of Major Wood, of Chicago, and hurried to the succor of his sorely pressed outposts. On the arrival of Co. "A," Captain Thomas W. Grosvenor, the detachment led by Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, advanced at once to meet the Confederate cavalry. Several squads were driven from the woods and roadsides, falling back to the main body at Darkestville, followed closely by Captain Grosvenor's small detachment. At Darkestville a severe skirmish took place, in which Captain Grosvenor was severely wounded. His valiant "forty" men continued the conflict, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, until the remainder of the regiment came up and the Confederates were driven from the field, retreating to Winchester, to which place they were closely followed by a detachment, under the command of Captain Bronson, sent in pursuit by Colonel Voss. Twenty-five of their number, including Lieutenant Carroll, of the Maryland battalion, a grandson of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, were buried on the field, fifty were captured, with horses and equipments. Several of the 12th were mortally wounded, but none were killed. The regiment remained in Martinsburg until its evacuation, and then fell back to Harper's Ferry, on September 12. On the night of the 14th, the place being surrounded by the enemy, the cavalry received permission to cut its way through, and make an attempt to reach the Army of the Potomac. The column, under the command of Colonel Voss, left Harper's Ferry at 8 o'clock p. m., followed the line of the Potomac to near Williamsport, Md., captured a train of one hundred and twelve wagons and a large drove of cattle belonging to Longstreet's command, and finally joined McClellan's army at Jones's Cross Roads. The regiment was then made an integer of the Fifth Brigade, Colonel Voss commanding. At Williamsport, the brigade remained until December 8, 1862, moving thence to Dumfries Station, Va., where it remained until January, 1863, making a successful stand under Lieutenant-Colonel Davis against a cavalry raid on the town by General Stuart, on December 28, 1862.

On the reorganization of the cavalry, Army of the Potomac, the 12th was assigned to the Second Brigade, Third Division Cavalry Corps, and Colonel Voss appointed brigade commander. In April, 1863, General Hooker organized the cavalry into two divisions, one of which was commanded by General Stoneman, and in which was the 12th Illinois, under Lieutenant-Colonel Davis. This organization participated in the cavalry raid which followed, and at Thompson's Cross Roads, on May 3, it was detached from the command of General Stoneman for an independent expedition. It marched on that day from the bank of the South Anna, penetrated a region never before occupied by Federal troops, burned railroad bridges, destroyed telegraphic communication, and reached the Virginia Central Railroad, at Hanover Station, on the 5th, and destroyed the railroad buildings and stores at that point. About thirty officers and men were captured and paroled at Hanover. Lieutenant-Colonel Davis says in his report of this expedition:

"At Tunstall Station (near the White House on the Richmond and Yorktown Railroad), a train of cars, filled with infantry and a battery of three guns, was run out to oppose us. I thought it best to make an effort to break through, before the men could get out of the cars or the battery in position. I therefore brought up my two foremost squadrons, and ordered a charge, which was executed by them, Captain Roden with Cos. "D" and "G" taking the lead, and followed by Captain Shears with Cos. "H" and "I." This charge was made most gallantly. The infantry filled the embankment of the railway, and poured upon us a severe fire, but my men dashed up to the embankment in splendid style, and with carbines and pistols, responded to the fire with equal effect. It was, however, impossible to break through. There were formidable rifle-pits to the left of the road, and the enemy soon filled them, and we were forced to retire, with a loss of two killed and several wounded; among the latter, Lieutenant Marsh, who was among the foremost in the charge, and who received so severe a wound in the right arm that we were obliged to leave him in one of the neighboring houses. * * * Our total loss in this expedition has been two commissioned officers, and thirty-three enlisted men. We brought with us one hundred mules and seventy-five horses, captured from the enemy. We captured, in the course of our march, a much larger number, which we could not bring on. The amount of property destroyed is estimated at over one million dollars."

After the arrival of the regiment at Gloucester Point, it was engaged in a raid to within twelve miles of Richmond, and to Urbana, on the Rappahannock, and then re-joined General Hooker's army. While the regiment was in camp at Belle Plain in Virginia, Cos. "H" and "I" (formerly McClellan Dragoons) were assigned to the command. After the battle of Beverly Ford, on June 9, the 12th was assigned to Buford's (First) division, Gamble's (First) brigade, Pleasanton's cavalry corps, and participated in the engagement at Aldie Gap; and then proceeded to Gettysburg, where it arrived June 30, and occupied the place, after driving out two Confederate regiments.

After Gettysburg, the regiment was divided; one detachment being under General Kilpatrick, and joining in the pursuit of Lee's army. The detachment reached Williamsport July 6, where the Confederates were building a bridge across the river. The brigade charged on the enemy's pickets, drove them back, and pursuing them, participated in the many cavalry skirmishes and engagements which ensued, acquitting itself with bravery at Falling Waters, the Rapidan and at Stevensburg. It was then ordered to Washington, and, on November 20, 1863, was relieved from duty with the Army of the Potomac, was given thirty days' furlough, and ordered to Illinois to reorganize as a veteran regiment—this distinguished privilege being awarded to the 12th by the Secretary of War for "brilliant services in the field." It was the first cavalry regiment in the United States service permitted to return home to re-enlist.

The regiment reached Chicago on the evening of November 28, and had a grand reception at Bryan Hall, where patriotic and enthusiastic speeches were made, and a welcome awarded the 12th which showed that its course had been watched and warmly approved by the city and State. Adjutant-General Fuller was sent from Springfield, to thank the regiment in the name of the State for its services.

Following is the return roster, nearly all of whom are Chicago citizens:

Lieutenant-Colonel, Hasbrouck Davis; First Major, Thomas W. Grosvenor; Second Major, Stephen Bronson; Adjutant, James Daly; Quartermaster, L. J. Nissen; Surgeon, John McCarthy; Assistant-Surgeon, C. E. Wentworth; Commissary, Moses Shields; Chaplain, A. J. Warner.

Co. "A": First Lieutenant, William M. Luff. Co. "B": Second Lieutenant, Henry Lossburg. Co. "C": Captain William J. Steele commanding. Co. "D": First Lieutenant, Oliver Grosvenor commanding. Co. "E": First Lieutenant, Edward Vasseur. Co. "G": Captain, John H. Clybourn. Co. "H": First Lieutenant, Earl H. Chapman. Co. "I": Second Lieutenant, Clarence Aldrich.

After a brief rest, the regiment, which had been recruited to the maximum number of 1,256 officers and men, re-assembled at Camp Fry, and there remained until February 9, 1864, when it moved to St. Louis. From there, in March, it went to New Orleans, and thence up the Red River, to reinforce General Banks, participating, with considerable loss, in the engagements which marked his retreat from Alexandria. After returning to New Orleans, it went to Napoleonville, on the Bayou Lafourche, and, in September, joined General Lee's cavalry division at Baton Rouge. In November, with the 2d Illinois Cavalry, under the command of Colonel Davis, the regiment went on an expedition, with the division, to Liberty, Miss., where it was engaged in a severe action, in which the enemy was routed with loss. It subsequently participated in General Davidson's expedition against Mobile, and returned to Baton Rouge.

On January 7, 1865, it proceeded to Memphis, and joined General Osborne's division, where, by order, dated March 2, 1865, it was consolidated into an eight-company organization. The officers whose term had expired, or who were in excess of the number required, were mustered out of service, among which were the following from Chicago: Major Cephas Strong, First Lieutenant and Regimental Commissary Moses Shields, Captains William M. Luff, William F. Steele, and Charles G. Overocker, Lieutenant Charles F. Voss.

March 13, Colonel Davis was made brevet brigadier-general, having been acting brigadier for several months previously. The regiment was thenceforth under command of Colonel Hamilton B. Dox. In the latter part of January, 1865, with Osborne's division, it made a raid through Southeastern Arkansas, and on its return to Memphis, remained on duty in the vicinity until June, when it was ordered to join General Custer's cavalry division, at Alexandria, La. With that command it marched to Texas, and reported at Houston to Major-General Mower, commanding the Eastern District, where it remained until it was mustered out of service on May 29, 1866.

COLONEL ARNO VOSS was born in Prussia, on April 16, 1821. After his immigration to this country he resided for some years in Ohio, and was there admitted to the Bar. In 1848, he removed to Chicago, and, in December of that year, became editor of the Illinois Staats-Zeitung. He was succeeded as editor, during 1849, by Herman Kriege, and thenceforth devoted himself to the practice of his profession, building up a large and lucrative business before the opening of the Civil War. In 1852, Mr. Voss was elected city attorney, and was re-elected in 1853. In the meantime he had identified himself with the German citizen soldiery of Chicago, having been elected adjutant of the "Chicago German Odd Battalion," in 1850, when that organization was a part of the 60th Regiment, Illinois State Militia. In 1854, he was made adjutant of the newly organized "Washington Independent Regiment," which offered its services entire to the Government at the opening of the war. This command being accepted only in part, Colonel Voss, in the month of July, 1861, became connected with the 6th Illinois Cavalry as its major, and, somewhat later, assisted in the formation of the 12th Cavalry Regiment, giving up his law practice, and devoting himself entirely to the service of his adopted country. On the organization of the 12th, at Camp Douglas, he was chosen its colonel, and commanded that regiment during its first campaign in Virginia, during the summer and fall of 1862. On the morning of the 12th of September, 1862, Colonel Voss's regiment, with other forces attached to General Julius White's command, fell back to Harper's Ferry, from Martinsburg, their late headquarters. The same night the place was surprised, and nearly all its garrison, under command of Colonel Miles, was captured, but Colonel Voss, having received permission to attempt to cut his way through the enemy's lines, with a force of about two thousand cavalry, including his own regiment, successfully accomplished the hazardous undertaking, arriving at Greencastle, Penn., with a loss of but one hundred and seventy-eight men, and finally joining McClellan at headquarters in Sharpsburg. Colonel Voss was obliged to leave the service at the opening of 1864, on account of ill health, and for a few years thereafter resided on his farm in Will County, Ill. In 1869, he returned to Chicago and resumed the practice of law, and is now one of the masters of chancery of the Circuit Court of Cook County, to which position he was appointed on December 1, 1880. He was elected a member of the Legislature from the Sixth Senatorial District, in 1876, and declined a re-nomination to the same position in 1878.

GENERAL HASBROUCK DAVIS, son of Hon. John Davis, United States Senator and Governor of Massachusetts, was born in Worcester, Mass., April 23, 1827. In 1855, he came to Chicago and commenced the practice of law, which he continued until the summer of 1861, when he joined with Colonel Arno Voss in raising the 12th Illinois Cavalry, and upon its organization was elected lieutenant-colonel. On the resignation of Colonel Voss, August 11, 1863, he was promoted colonel, and commanded the regiment, both before and after his promotion, in its most important actions. On March 13, 1865, he received his commission as brevet brigadier-general, and remained in active service until August, 1865, when he resigned. His military record is that of a brave, honorable and sagacious officer. After leaving the army, he became connected with the Chicago Evening Post, as editor, and subsequently removed to Massachusetts.

THE CHICAGO DRAGOONS.—The Chicago Dragoons were organized in 1856, by Captain Charles W. Barker. The company became a popular one in Chicago, but the expenses of keeping it up were so great that, just before 1861, it existed only in name. When Fort Sumter, was fired upon, however, the company revived, and was one of the first to offer its services to Governor Yates. It was accepted, reported at Camp Yates, and at the passage of the act on May 16, 1861, authorizing the formation of a cavalry regiment, was mustered into State service. The squadron was ordered to Camp Defiance, Cairo, and on its arrival was assigned to picket duty, which it performed for six weeks. It then re-enlisted in the United States service, and was transferred from Cairo to Western Virginia, where it served as escort to General McClellan, participating in the battles of Philippi, Buckannon, Rich Mountain and Beverly. After remaining in the East, in service about three months, the dragoons returned to Chicago where they were mustered out of service August 20, and immediately consolidated with another company, under Captain Shearer, and re-organized as the McClellan Dragoons. The officers under the new organization were Charles W. Barker, captain; Thomas Braken, first lieutenant; Edwin A. Webber, second lieutenant; George W. Shearer, third lieutenant. They were mustered into service August 21, forty old members re-enlisting. After being for a short time attached to a regiment of regular troops, they were finally assigned to the 12th Illinois Cavalry, Colonel Arno Voss commanding, and thereafter served with that famous regiment.

THIRTEENTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.

THE THIRTEENTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY was organized in the fall of 1861, at Camp Douglas, Chicago, by Colonel J. Warren Bell, under authority of the War Department of October 15, 1861, with the concurrence of Governor Yates of Illinois.

The roster of field and staff officers was as follows:

Colonel, Joseph W. Bell; Lieutenant-Colonel, Theobald Hartmann; Major, Lothar Lippert; Second Major, Charles A. Bell; Adjutant, Thaddeus S. Clarkson; Quartermaster, Emil Neuberger; Surgeon, Charles Storck; Chaplain, Abner W. Henderson; Commissary, Hall P. Talbot. These officers were all from Chicago.

The regiment remained at Camp Douglas until February, 1862, when it moved to Benton Barracks, near St. Louis, where it was armed and equipped. It immediately marched into Southeastern Missouri, and was engaged in scouting and fighting guerrillas there and in Northeastern Arkansas until June. The headquarters of the command were at Pilot Knob, Colonel Bell commanding both regiment and post. The different companies were at times widely separated; four, under Lieutenant-Colonel Hartmann, were near the Arkansas State line; one company was at Cape Girardeau, one at Ironton, garrisoning the fort, and the rest were at Pilot Knob. In June, the regiment joined General Curtis's army at Jacksonport, and was assigned to the Third Brigade, Brigadier-General W. P. Benton commanding, and First Division, Major-General Fred. Steele commanding.

The command formed the advance of General Curtis's army on its march through Arkansas, during which, the expedition with supplies having met with disaster, the army was almost on the verge of starvation. The command was then turned toward the Mississippi River, and, on the 7th of July, the Confederates were encountered at Bayou Cache or Cache River. Colonel Bell succeeded Colonel Hovey in command of the forces engaged, which, besides the infantry, consisted of the 5th and 13th Illinois Cavalry and two batteries of artillery. Brigadier-General W. P. Benton subsequently arrived and assumed command. Of this battle, John S. C. Abbott, the historian, says Harper's Magazine, vol. 33, page 587: "But few have heard of the battle of Bayou Cache; and yet there was exhibited there military discipline and bravery which could not have been surpassed on the world-renowned arenas of Austerlitz and Waterloo."

The enemy consisted of six regiments of Texas cavalry, who were totally routed, with a loss of over one hundred killed, besides the wounded and prisoners. The ground was strewn with the dead for over three miles. The enemy retreated, a running fight being kept up by the cavalry until night and bad roads prevented further pursuit.

The 13th Cavalry arrived at Helena July 13, and there remained until fall, when it returned to Missouri, and was engaged in active service during the following winter, succeeding in driving the Confederates from the State.

In May, 1863, the eight companies of the 13th were consolidated into three, under command of Major Lippert; but subsequently nine new companies were added, making a strong regiment of nearly twelve hundred men.

The 13th, with General Davidson's cavalry, left Helena in July, 1863, and proceeded west to Brownsville, where General Marmaduke was met and defeated August 24-25. The enemy was again defeated at Bayou Metre, August 27-28. There were also engagements at Austin, August 31, and at Bayou Metre, September 4. The 13th joined in the pursuit and reached Little Rock on the 10th, at the head of the army, being the first regiment to enter the captured city. The regiment participated in the pursuit of Price to the Red River and in various raids into Northwestern Arkansas, returning to Little Rock in the middle of October, where Major Lippert died on the 18th of that month.

The regiment then moved to Pine Bluff, fifty miles below Little Rock. At that time, new companies joined the regiment, and Major Albert Erskine, who had shared the fortunes of the old 13th from the first, was promoted to the rank of colonel, and assumed command of the regiment. During the remainder of the winter of 1864, the regiment remained at Pine Bluff. On the 23d day of March, 1864, General Steele evacuated Little Rock, and commenced his famous race with Price for the possession of Camden, Ark. The 13th participated in the engagements of Arkadelphia, April 1; Okolona, April 4; Little Missouri River, April 6; and at Prairie du Anne on the 10th April—the last battle being a severe one, the cavalry repulsing an attack by Marmaduke. It was also engaged at Camden and Jenkins's Ferry during the last of April.

The regiment left Camden April 27, and returned to Little Rock, and during the following summer was stationed at Pine Bluff. The 13th was assigned to post duty at Pine Bluff, whence detachments were sent to take possession of Monticello, Camden and Washington. The regiment remained in Arkansas until August 31, 1865, when it was mustered out of service and returned to Springfield, Ill., for final pay and discharge, arriving September 13, 1865. The regiment numbered at that time twenty-four officers and four hundred and ninety-eight men. There were on the muster rolls of the regiment, from its organization until its final discharge, the names of over twenty-one hundred officers and enlisted men.

The following sketches of the best known Chicago officers make an interesting addendum to the above:

BREVET BRIGADIER-GENERAL JOSEPH WARREN BELL was born in Greene County, Tenn., December 25, 1814. He removed to Sparta when about twenty-one years old, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised his profession there. He removed to Nashville, in 1844, and came to Chicago in October, 1855. Here he was engaged in the banking business in 1856-57, when he resumed his law practice. In 1857, he was appointed by Governor William H. Bissell, major and paymaster on the staff of Major-General John B. Beaubien, commanding the Sixth Division, Illinois State Militia. A few months later, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in August, 1858, became quartermaster of the division, with the rank of colonel. October 15, 1861, he received authority from the War Department to organize a cavalry regiment, of which he was to be the colonel commanding. He established his headquarters in Chicago, proceeded to raise his regiment, and, December 7, 1861, was commissioned colonel of the 13th Illinois Cavalry. The regiment was organized at Camp Douglas, near Chicago, the camp being at that time commanded by Colonel J. H. Tucker, who was relieved about December, 1861. Colonel A. G. Brackett, 9th Illinois Cavalry, being the senior colonel present, succeeded to the command. The 9th Cavalry left in January, 1862, and Colonel Bell succeeded to the command of the camp and post. February 13, 1862, he was ordered by Governor Yates to proceed to St. Louis with his regiment, and report to Major-General Halleck, commanding the Department of the Missouri. Colonel Bell proceeded to Benton Barracks, then marched to Pilot Knob, assuming command of the post, and continued thus to act from March to June, 1862. In June, he joined General Curtis's army, and was with that command in its famous march through the wilds of Arkansas. At the battle of Bayou Cache, or Cache River, July 7, 1862, Colonel Bell succeeded Colonel Hovey in command of all the United States forces, until the arrival of Brigadier-General Benton. Subsequently, he was in command of the Third Brigade, First Division. He ascended the Mississippi River to Missouri with his regiment, in the latter part of 1862; was with General Davidson in that campaign, engaging in the battles and skirmishes; and finally succeeded in driving General Marmaduke and his rebels from the State. At the close of the war, Colonel Bell was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general by brevet, for "gallant and meritorious services during the war." In 1864-65, General Bell was solicitor of the Department of the Missouri. In 1867-69, he was Special Agent of the United States Treasury Department, under Secretaries McCullough and Boutwell. He then resumed the practice of law, having many cases before the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court of the United States. After the war, his residence, for the greater part of the time, was in Washington, D. C., where he died, in January, 1879.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL THEOBALD HARTMANN was born in Bernheim, Germany, and was thirty-five years of age when the 13th left for St. Louis. He was attached to the Bavarian cavalry in 1848, and, during the revolution of 1849, was taken prisoner and kept in close captivity for six hundred and twenty-three days. He then made his escape, and, with other refugees, came to this country. When the Rebellion broke out, in company with Colonel Knoblesdorf, he raised the 44th Illinois Volunteers, in which he held the rank of captain. Before that regiment left, he received authority to raise a battalion of cavalry, which was long and favorably known as "Hartmann's Dragoons." He was a most thorough officer, having had the advantage of a long experience in the cavalry service.

MAJOR CHARLES A. BELL, a son of the General, was one of the original Ellsworth Zouaves, the 11th New York Infantry. He was a first lieutenant, and in July, 1861, was a captain in the 3d Pennsylvania Cavalry, being present in several skirmishes upon the Potomac. In February, he was promoted to the rank of major of the 13th Illinois Cavalry, and served with his regiment in the campaigns in Missouri and Arkansas.

BREVET BRIGADIER-GENERAL ALBERT ERSKINE was born in Bristol, Maine, June 27, 1832. He became a resident of Chicago before the war, and, on the organization of the 53d Illinois Infantry, enlisted as a private, August 20, 1861. On the 13th of November, following, he was elected first lieutenant of Co. "E," 13th Cavalry, and on August 8, 1862, was promoted captain. He was promoted Major of the regiment on October 18, 1863, on the death of major Lippert, and, on the reorganization of the 13th at Pine Bluff, Ark., on April 11, 1864, was promoted colonel. On March 13, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general for gallant and meritorious services, having been mustered out of service at the discontinuation of the cavalry division, in January, 1865. On his return to Illinois, he was employed for a time in the Adjutant-General's office, and, later, was appointed chief clerk in the United States Assessor's office in Chicago. He died in Chicago, in 1876.

MAJOR LOTHAR LIPPERT was born in 1831, near Wurtzburg, Bavaria. At the age of seventeen, he voluntarily entered the army as a private, and served until 1859, when he resigned as first lieutenant, 5th Battalion of Sharpshooters, Bavarian army, and emigrated to the United States. He located immediately in Chicago, and engaged in mercantile business until the outbreak of the Rebellion, when he left his business and raised a company of infantry for the three-months' service. Not securing its acceptance by the Government, he joined with Colonel Charles Knoblesdorf in raising the 44th Illinois Infantry, and at its organization was elected captain of Co. "E," which he commanded during the campaign of 1861 in Missouri. Soon after the 13th Illinois Cavalry was organized, he was commissioned first major of the regiment through the instrumentality of Lieutenant-Colonel Hartmann, and joined the regiment in March, 1862, taking command of the First Battalion, then in Southeastern Missouri. His superior military ability attracted the attention of General J. W. Davidson, commanding the district of Southeastern Missouri, who appointed him assistant inspector-general on his staff, which position he occupied through the campaign of 1862-63, re-joining his regiment in the spring of 1863. He was severely wounded near Patterson, Mo., being disabled for some months. As soon as he could mount his horse he joined his command, and participated in the various cavalry fights which occurred during the advance of Steele's army on Little Rock. His health was undermined by his incessant activity and persistence in remaining at his post when suffering from illness, and, during a severe and protracted raid after the capture of Little Rock, it utterly failed, and he was taken back, in an ambulance, to that city, where he died on the 18th of October, 1863.

ADJUTANT THADDEUS S. CLARKSON was a native of Pennsylvania, and received his education in Maryland. He was an old resident of Chicago, having previously enlisted as a private in the Chicago Light Artillery. At the time of his departure he was twenty-two years of age. He was a brother of Rev. R. H. Clarkson, formerly rector of St. James Church, Chicago.

ADJUTANT W. WERTHER was born in Poland, in 1834, and received his education at a military academy. He served three years in the Prussian army as a commissioned officer. When the Rebellion broke out, he gave up a profitable business, and enlisted.

CAPTAIN JOHN E. KIMBERLY, commanding Co. "A," is well known in Chicago. He served with distinction in the Mexican War, and was with his company of the 13th Cavalry in all its battles and marches until he resigned. After the war he returned to Chicago and obtained a responsible position in the post-office, which he still holds.

CAPTAIN HENRY M. PETERS, commanding Co. "B," served with credit until the fall of 1862, when he resigned, and has since lived in Chicago. He is well known in political circles, and was for several years Warden of the Cook County Poor-House.

CAPTAIN ERNST F. RIEDEL, of Co. "C," after serving faithfully with his company, returned to Chicago and engaged in business. He died about 1882.

BREVET MAJOR WILLIAM W. BELL, captain commanding Co. "D," a son of General Bell, was nineteen years old when the war commenced. He recruited his company for the 13th Cavalry, and was with the regiment in its battles and marches in the campaigns of General Curtis in Missouri and Arkansas. Captain Bell was promoted to the rank of major, by brevet, at the close of the war, his commission from the president reading, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Cache River." At the close of the war he was, for several years, chief deputy collector of internal revenue in Chicago, and afterward was engaged in the banking business.

BREVET MAJOR ROBERT G. DVHRENFURTH, first lieutenant of Co. "D," was promoted to the rank of captain, and after being mustered out, at the consolidation of the regiment, raised a company for the 17th Illinois Cavalry, of which he was captain. He subsequently was promoted major by brevet "for gallant and meritorious services during the war." In 1865, he went to Europe and graduated at the University of Heidelberg, where he received the degree of Doctor of Laws. He then returned to the United States, obtained a clerkship at Washington, and rose, by competitive examinations and upon merit alone, from an ordinary clerkship to be examiner, principal examiner, and examiner-in-chief in the United States Patent Office, and is now assistant commissioner of patents.

KEYES DANFORTH was a corporal in Co. "F." In 1865, he was captain of Co. "K," and was detailed as aide-de-camp on the staff of Brigadier-General Powell Clayton. When General Clayton became Governor of Arkansas, after the war, he appointed Captain Danforth Adjutant-General of the State, with the rank of brigadier-general. In 1876, General Danforth removed to Colorado, and was appointed Clerk of the Supreme Court of that State. He died there about 1881.

SIXTEENTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.

The nucleus of the 16th Cavalry were two German companies, organized in Chicago; one (the Washington Light Cavalry) on July 19, 1858, by Captain Frederick Schaumbek; the other (Thielemann's Dragoons), early in the spring of 1861. Captain Schaumbek's company was one of the first offered to Governor Yates after his call for volunteers, reporting at Camp Yates prior to the passage of the special act of the State Legislature, passed May 3, 1861, and authorizing a cavalry regiment. Upon the passage of the act, the regiment was immediately mustered into State service—forming one of the battalions of five companies accepted during the month. Lieutenant-Governor Hoffman taking a special pride in the interest of the company, it adopted the name of "Hoffman's Dragoons," in his honor. Mr. Hoffman presented it with an elegant stand of colors at the time, which was received, in behalf of the company, by Arno Voss, formerly a member of the Washington Independent Cavalry. At the time of its entering the service, the company numbered ninety-five men, including officers, of whom sixty-five (all residents of Chicago) had been in military service in Europe.

Following is the original company roster:

Captain, Frederick Schaumbek; First Lieutenant, A. Rittig; Second Lieutenant, William Warner; Third Lieutenant, John G. Rolli; First Sergeant, Julius Jaehne; Second Sergeant, F. Marx; Third Sergeant, G. Sheef; Fourth Sergeant, L. Rodemeyer; First Corporal, Benedict Weinger; Second Corporal, H. Klein; Third Corporal, L. Von Look; Surgeon, W. Burchevard.

The company was accepted by the Secretary of War for three years' service, on June 21, and was nominally assigned to the 1st Illinois Cavalry. The dragoons had neither been armed nor paid for the time they had been in State service, and refused to take the oath mustering them into United States service, until arrears due had been paid and they could be suitably equipped, saying, properly enough, that the consequences of sending unarmed companies among enemies had been seen at Baltimore, and that they had had too active service in Mexico and Europe to believe it possible to fight with stones. On receiving their pay, and a promise of arms, they willingly took the oath, and were mustered into service for three years.

Thielemann's Cavalry company was organized in Chicago in the early summer of 1861. The following was the original roster of officers:

Captain, Christian Thielemann; First Lieutenant, Berthold

Ch. Thielemann

Marschner; Second Lieutenant, Matthew Marx; Orderly Sergeant, James W. Lavigne; Quartermaster, Milo Thielemann; Sergeants, V. Gravenstein, Matthias Thielemann, Charles G. Bausenbach, Henry Williams.

The company was accepted by the Governor on July 2, and immediately ordered to Paducah, where it remained until the fall. On November 1, Captain Thielemann was commissioned major, with command of a battalion composed of his own company of dragoons, then commanded by Captain Berthold Marschner, and a company recruited and commanded by Captain Matthew Marx. Captain Schaumbek's company was subsequently added to Thielemann's command, which, as

Fr. Schaumbek Major

"Thielemann's Cavalry," participated in the earlier campaigns of the army of the Tennessee.

In September, 1862, the War Department authorized the extension of the battalion—then in camp at Springfield—to a regiment. The new companies were recruited during the winter of 1862-63, and the organization completed the subsequent June,—the following being the roster:

Field Officers.—Colonel, Christian Thielemann; Lieutenant-Colonel, Robert W. Smith; Majors, Frederick Schaumbek, Milo Thielemann; Adjutant Joseph Gotthelf.

Line Officers.—Co. "A": Captain, William H. Dorchester; First Lieutenant, Valentine Grebenstein. Co. "B": Captain, Milo Thielemann; First Lieutenant, George Hamilton; Second Lieutenant, William S. Kelly. Co. "C": Captain, Julius Jaehne; First Lieutenant, John F. Marx; Second Lieutenant, Herman Scharenburg. Co. "D": Captain, Benedict Weinger; First Lieutenant, John Hoffmann; Second Lieutenant, Frederick Herfurth. Co. "E": Captain, Francis Jackson. Co. "K": Captain, Nathan C. Goodenow. Co. "L": Captain, Edward A. Wolcott.

In October, 1863, the 16th Cavalry was ordered to Knoxville, Tenn. On its arrival, a detachment, under Colonel Thielemann, was dispatched to garrison and hold the post at Cumberland Gap; a battalion, under Major C. H. Beers, was sent up Powell's Valley toward Jonesville, Va.; and the remainder, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel R. W. Smith, formed a portion of Burnside's force, participating in the defense of the city in November and December. On Longstreet's retreat from Knoxville, he attacked Major Beers's command near Jonesville, January 3, 1864, which, after holding its ground for ten hours against three brigades, and losing heavily in killed and wounded, was compelled to surrender. The battalion numbered three hundred and fifty-six men and fifty-six officers, less than two-thirds of whom survived the horrors of their long captivity at Andersonville, while those who lived to be exchanged reached home in a condition almost as bad as death. Second Lieutenant Samuel Osgood, Co. "L," was killed in the engagement at Jonesville.

At the conclusion of the campaign in East Tennessee, the regiment was ordered to re-cross the Cumberland Mountains and report at Camp Nelson, near Nicholasville, Ky., where it was re-mounted, and, as a part of General Stoneman's cavalry corps, left to join Sherman in Georgia, during the latter part of April. It arrived at Red Clay, Ga., May 10, and on the 12th was engaged in the battle of Varnell's Station, where Lieutenant Herfurth and twelve men were wounded and captured. It participated in the entire Atlanta campaign after May 10, taking part in the battles before Resaca, Dalton, Marietta, Kenesaw Mountain, Burnt Hickory, Peach Tree Creek, Allatoona Pass, Atlanta and Jonesboro'. Major Frederick Schaumbek, of Chicago, the first officer of the regiment to enlist in the service of Government, was killed in action, August 3, near Atlanta. At the conclusion of the campaign, the regiment returned to Decatur, Ga., where it remained until September 14, and was then ordered to Nicholasville, Ky. On its return, it was ordered to Waynesboro', near the Tennessee River, and a few days later fell back to Columbia, reaching that place November 24, after a running fight of three days with the advance of Hood's pursuing army. On arriving at Columbia, it was found that the enemy was attempting to cross Duck River at fords above the town, and the 16th, with small detachments from the 8th Michigan and 8th Iowa, under command of Colonel R. W. Smith, was sent to defend the crossing, which was successfully done, the position being held six hours against a vastly superior force. After its return to camp at Pulaski, on the termination of the pursuit, it was engaged in scouting duty until March, 1865, and, from that time until June, was successively at Spring Hill, Franklin, Columbia and Pulaski, Tenn., and at Holton, Ala., with detachments at Courtland and Decatur. On June 18, it concentrated at Pulaski, and on July 2, was ordered to Franklin, where it remained, employed in scouting and guard duty, until ordered to Nashville, where it was mustered out of service August 19, 1865. It arrived at Chicago August 23, for final payment and discharge, the Chicago officers at that time being Colonel Robert W. Smith, Lieutenant-Colonel Nathan C. Goodenow, Second Major Francis Jackson, Captain Frederick Herfurth, Co. "D."

The original force of the 16th was twelve hundred men. It received one hundred recruits, and at its discharge could muster only two hundred and eighty-three men—its casualties amounting to nearly one thousand. During its term of service the regiment marched about five thousand miles and engaged in thirty-one battles and numerous skirmishes.

SEVENTEENTH ILLINOIS CAVALRY.

In the fall of 1863, General John F. Farnsworth obtained permission from the War Department to raise the 17th Cavalry Regiment in Illinois, and at his invitation, and by the consent of Governor Yates, Major John L. Beveridge, of Evanston, undertook the recruiting and organization of the same, resigning his position in the 8th Cavalry for the purpose, on November 2, 1863. The 17th regiment was organized at St. Charles, Ill., nine companies being mustered into service on January 22, 1864, and the remaining three on February 12, 1864.

The following officers of the 17th were residents of Chicago or Cook County:

Colonel, John L. Beveridge; Lieutenant-Colonel, Dennis J.

John L. Beveridge

Hynes; Major, Hiram Hilliard; Adjutant, John A. Hynes. Co. "A": Captains, Francis Beaufort, Francis LeClair, and Scott W. Harrington; Lieutenants, Lyman S. Rowell and James B. Downs. Co. "B": Captain, Samuel H. B. McReynolds; First Lieutenants, Jonas L. Buck and Cyrus Smith; Second Lieutenant, Douglas W. Scott. Co. "K": Captain, Edward P. Grosvenor; First Lieutenant, Robert Sonders. Co. "L": Captain, Robert G. Dyhrenfurth.

The regiment moved from St. Charles to Alton, where it was employed, while awaiting its equipments, in guarding Confederate prisoners. Soon after the arrival of the regiment at Alton, the first and second battalions, under Majors Hilliard and Matlack, were ordered to Missouri,—the former to Weston, the latter to Glasgow. The third battalion remained at Alton, with regimental headquarters, until September, 1864, when it moved to Jefferson City, Mo., where it was joined by Major Matlack's detachment and one squadron of Major Hilliard's. The regiment, Colonel Beveridge commanding, reported to General John McNeil, at Rolla, Mo., to take part in the defense of Missouri and Kansas against the great raid just inaugurated by General Price. On September 27, General Ewing was attacked by two divisions of Price's army at Pilot Knob, and after defending the position from daylight until night, evacuated Fort Davidson, not being in sufficient force to hold the lines of retreat, and fell back toward Rolla, Mo., intrenching himself at Harrison on the 29th, where his command was attacked by the pursuing Confederates.

To save General Ewing from capture, and check the enemy, Colonel Beveridge moved from Rolla with the 17th and relieved the beleaguered garrison. The delay of Price's northward march at Harrison, enabled the military commanders in Missouri and Kansas to make preparations for still further arresting and foiling his movements, and much credit was due the 17th for its share in this result, the Legislature of Missouri publicly thanking Colonel Beveridge and his command. On October 11, the enemy was encountered at Booneville, and his skirmishers driven in, the cavalry then resting in line of battle until morning. On the morning of the 12th, Colonel Beveridge's brigade opened the attack, and afterward covered the backward movement of the division, guarding the bridge over which it was obliged to pass until the last troops were over. At the reorganization for the continuation of the campaign, Major-General Pleasanton having general command, the 17th, Colonel Beveridge commanding, was in McNeil's brigade. On the morning of the 19th, General Blunt, with Kansas troops, was attacked at Lexington, and the following day fell back to Independence, where another engagement took place, in which the cavalry attacked Price's rear guard, captured several pieces of artillery, and routed the Confederates. They were again defeated on the morning of the 25th, at the crossing of Mine Creek, Kas., the two divisions of Marmaduke and Fagan forming the right and left wings, and the whole under the personal command of General Price. Generals Curtis and Blunt, with their commands, aided by Pleasanton's troopers, swept the whole Confederate force back to the south bank of the creek, and again toward the Osage, with the loss of Major-General Marmaduke and Brigadier-Generals Cabell, Slemmon and Graham, besides a large number of regimental officers, eight hundred privates and nine guns. On the 28th, the command reached Newtonia, and then returned to Springfield, Mo., thence to Cassville, and then back to Rolla, which point was reached November 15, the regiment having marched, during the campaign of forty-three days, over one thousand miles, and suffered the loss of six hundred horses.

In the early winter of 1865, Colonel Beveridge was brevetted brigadier-general, and placed in command of a military district in the Department of Missouri, with headquarters at Cape Girardeau. Lieutenant-Colonel Dennis J. Hynes, chief of cavalry of the North Missouri District, of General C. B. Fisk's staff, was relieved and returned to the regiment, for a time being in command of a military sub-district, with headquarters at Pilot Knob, Mo. Major Hiram Hilliard was placed in command of the regiment, and Major L. C. Matlack detailed, by order of General Dodge, as provost marshal of the District of St. Louis. Major Philip E. Fisher was made chief of cavalry for the District of Rolla.

The 17th, having been re-mounted, was ordered, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Hynes, to Cape Girardeau, Mo., in April, 1865, and in May, served as escort to Captain J. F. Bennett, and Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, on their embassy to Jonesboro', Ark., to arrange terms with Jeff. Thompson for the surrender of his forces. The negotiation was concluded at Jacksonport, Ark., on June 5. The following month, the regiment was ordered to Kansas, the second battalion under Major Matlack being detached for service against the guerrillas of Central Missouri, with headquarters at Glasgow, Howard Co., Mo. After two months' service the detachment moved to Kansas, where the regiment had occupied posts along the plains through the summer, and the united command was mustered out of service at Leavenworth in November and December, 1865.

By order of the Secretary of War, Colonel Beveridge was retained in the service as president of a military commission, and was mustered out on February 6, 1866.

EX-GOVERNOR JOHN L. BEVERIDGE was born in the town of Greenwich, Washington Co., N. Y., July 6, 1824, a son of George and Ann Beveridge. He was reared upon a farm; in the winter attending the district school, where he mastered the common branches and obtained a taste of the higher studies. In the spring of 1842, when in his eighteenth year, his father's family moved to DeKalb County, Ill. During the next three years, by great persistence, he managed to obtain a year and a half of solid schooling—his academic education—at Granville (Putnam County) Academy and at Rock River Seminary, located at Mt. Morris, Ogle County. In the fall of 1845 he started out to make a place for himself in the world. His first experience was in teaching school in various counties in Tennessee. Next, he commenced to read law, and was admitted to the Bar. In the fall of 1849, through the mismanagement of his associate, he lost what little he had accumulated, and was left in debt. Two years later, having paid his creditors, he, with his wife and two children, went back to his father's house in DeKalb County, and soon afterward made arrangements to enter a law office in Sycamore. In the spring of 1854, he removed to Evanston, then just planted. Dr. Judson, his father-in-law, was the financial agent of the Northwestern University, and during Mr. Beveridge's first year's residence in Evanston, he occupied himself with business connected with that institution. In the spring of 1855, he opened a law office in Chicago, and continued his profession until the summer of 1861, slowly improving his condition and laying the foundation for a successful and remunerative practice. The war record of Governor Beveridge commences with his enlistment, August 27, 1861. He recruited Co. "F," 8th Illinois Cavalry, which several of the citizens of Evanston joined, and in September was unanimously chosen captain of the company. The next day he was selected by the line officers as one of the majors of the regiment. In October, the regiment was ordered to Washington, participating afterward in all the battles fought by the Army of the Potomac. Under General Stoneman he was in the advance upon Richmond. Upon the retreat of the army from the James River, his regiment was in the rear of the retreating forces, and his battalion the extreme rear guard. The 8th Regiment was the only cavalry force which crossed the river at Fredericksburg, and Major Beveridge led the force at Gettysburg, Williamsport, Boonsboro', Funkstown, Falling Waters, and between the Rappahannock and Culpepper. He resigned his commission in November, 1863, for the purpose of organizing the 17th Illinois Cavalry, of which he was commissioned colonel in January, 1864. He remained in command of it until October, 1865, when he was ordered to St. Louis to preside over a military commission for the trial of military offenders, and was finally mustered out of service February 6, 1866. Colonel Beveridge was brevetted brigadier-general for gallant and meritorious conduct on March 7, 1865. On his return to civil life he resumed the practice of his profession, and in the summer of 1866 he was elected by the Republicans to the office of sheriff of Cook County. He served the two years' term, then resumed the practice of law, and in November, 1870, was elected State senator from the Twenty-fifth District. He served during the winter of 1871 and at the special sessions of May and October. Receiving the nomination of his party for Congressman-at-large, he resigned his senatorship, and was elected to Congress in November, 1871. In November, 1872, he was elected lieutenant-governor, and in January, 1873, resigned as Congressman to enter upon the duties of his new position. On the 10th of January, 1873, he took the oath of office, and upon the resignation of General Oglesby as governor, who had been elected United States Senator, General Beveridge became governor of the State.

ARTILLERY.

OLD BATTERY "A," CHICAGO LIGHT ARTILLERY.—As early as May, 1854, a company, called the Chicago Light Artillery, was organized in the city by James Smith, first lieutenant of Captain Swift's "Chicago Hussars and Light Artillery," at the organization of that company in 1847. The first officers of the Chicago Light Artillery, elected May 5, 1854, were: James Smith, captain; Ezra Taylor, first lieutenant; E. W. Hadley, second lieutenant; H. S. Spears, commissary.*

*For full roster, see vol. 1, page 285.

In the spring of 1861, Colonel Ezra Taylor, of the Sixtieth Regiment, I. S. M., reorganized the Chicago Light Artillery, or recruited a second company to be attached to it—the two being thereafter known as Batteries "A" and "B." On April 19, 1861, the day that the first Union troops were fired upon in the streets of Baltimore, Governor Yates, of Illinois, was ordered by

Cairo proper, where Camp Defiance was located, is described, May 22, 1861, as a "Narrow peninsula or long point, sunken ten to twenty feet below the level of the rivers which meet at this point, and only preserved from inundation by a narrow wall, or levee, of mud. Along the inner bank of the levee, from the point at the junction of the two rivers (Mississippi and Ohio), and extending back a half-mile or more on the Mississippi shore, near Camp Defiance, are the principal barracks for the infantry and artillery. The camp of the Chicago Dragoons was up the river, from the point about two miles. Another mile up was Camp Smith, and that of the Lincoln Rifles close beside it. Here, several acres were cleared for drill ground, and the men were well employed, and consequently enjoyed better health than some of the companies nearer the point."

James Smith

the Secretary of War to send troops to Cairo to hold that important point. General R. K. Swift, of Chicago, in turn, was ordered by the Governor to arm and equip as quickly as possible, as strong a force as he could raise, also a company of artillery, "ready to march at a moment's warning."

In three hours after this order was received in Chicago, Co. "A" was recruited to full strength—about one hundred and thirty men—and ready to march under the command of the following officers: Captain, James Smith; First Lieutenant, Charles M. Willard; Second Lieutenant, Francis M. Morgan; Third Lieutenant, John R. Botsford.

At 11 o'clock on the 21st, forty-eight hours after receiving the dispatch, General Swift left Chicago with a force of four hundred and forty-six infantry (Chicago Zouaves, and Chicago companies of Captains Harding, Kowald and Mihalotzy), Co. "A," Chicago Light Artillery—four six-pounder guns and one hundred and thirty men. The battery was unprovided with shell or canister, but well provided with slugs, which it was able to use with good effect. On arriving at Big Muddy Bridge, on the Illinois Central Railroad, about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 22d, one section of the battery, under Lieutenant Willard, was detached and, with Captain Harding's Zouave company, was left to guard the bridge and vicinity. The remainder of the battery proceeded to Cairo, where its services were called into requisition on the 24th, to prevent traffic in contraband property between St. Louis and the rebellious States below Cairo. On the morning of the 24th, the steamers "C. E. Hillman" and "John D. Perry" left St. Louis, laden with arms and munitions for southern secessionists. Colonel B. M. Prentiss, who arrived at Cairo and took command of the forces there the same morning, was ordered by the Governor to stop these boats at Cairo and seize all goods that were contraband of war. He delegated the duty to Captain Smith, of the battery, and to Captain Joseph R. Scott, of the Chicago Zouaves, and these two young officers, with their companies, gladly performed it, boarding the vessels when they neared Cairo and confiscating large quantities of arms and ammunition. This act was approved by the War Department, and further shipments to ports hostile to the government were forbidden.

Battery "A" was mustered into United States service for three months, at Cairo, under a special act of the State Legislature, passed May 2, and during that term of service remained at Camp Smith, on the Mississippi River, about three miles above Cairo, where the company was thoroughly drilled, and won an enviable reputation for discipline and soldierly conduct. The surroundings at Cairo were uncomfortable at best. One of the company dismally writes that they "not only live through the day in mud and water, but sleep in it."

Captain Smith, being obliged to resign the command of the battery on account of ill-health, was succeeded by First Lieutenant Charles M. Willard, under whom it was reorganized and mustered into United States service for three years, July 16, 1861. Following is the original roster:

Captain, Charles M. Willard, promoted major; Senior First Lieutenant, Francis Morgan, promoted captain; Junior First Lieutenant, Peter P. Wood, promoted captain; Senior Second Lieutenant, Edgar P. Tobey; Junior Second Lieutenant, John W. Rumsey, promoted senior first lieutenant.

On September 5, the battery left Cairo, with General Grant's forces, for Paducah, where it arrived on the morning of the 6th, and took possession of the place without firing a shot, the Confederate troops leaving by railroad as Grant entered the town. The battery remained at Paducah, with the forces under General C. F. Smith, until in February, 1862. It was supplied by General Fremont with two additional pieces, at General Grant's request. It then moved to Fort Henry, forming a part of the expedition under Grant and Foote for the reduction of that fort. After the surrender of the fort, it occupied Fort Heiman, on the opposite side of the Tennessee, until February 13, when it moved, under command of Lieutenant P. T. Wood, with Grant's forces, toward Fort Donelson, before which stronghold it arrived on the 15th.

On the 16th, the battery, still attached to General Lew Wallace's division, was by him ordered to take position between the retiring forces of General McClelland and the enemy, pressing fast upon their rear, and hold the road against the advance of the Confederates. The regiments of Thayer's brigade were posted in the woods to the right and left. Scarcely had Lieutenant Wood placed his guns in position, when the rebels charged straight up the road and through the woods on either side—Battery "A" and the 1st Nebraska, on its right, being the principal points of attack. As to the manner in which this charge was repelled, General Lew Wallace says: "They met this storm, no man flinching, and their fire was terrible. To say they did well, is not enough—their conduct was splendid. They alone repelled the charge." Colonel Thayer, in his report of the battle, also gives the entire credit of driving back the enemy, and saving the retreating forces of McClelland, to Battery "A," the 1st Nebraska Volunteers, and to one company of Illinois Volunteers on the left of the battery. This was the last attack of the Confederates upon the Union line.

Honorable mention of the services of the battery at Shiloh, April 6-7, 1862, is made in the report of Major Ezra Taylor, chief of artillery on Sherman's staff. In the fight on Sunday, the battery was so disabled as to be able to work but three guns, although it lost none. One-third of its members and one-half of its horses were disabled.

After the battle of Shiloh, Battery "A" was for a time in the reserve corps of General McClelland, and was then, with General Wallace, sent across the country to Memphis, where it became permanently attached to the command of General W. T. Sherman, being assigned to his Second Division, commanded by General Morgan L. Smith. With the Fifteenth Corps, it took part in the battle at Chickasaw Bayou, December 27-28, 1862, and rendered effective service in the capture of the enemy's works at Arkansas Post, January 11, 1863. It accompanied Sherman in his feat on Haines's Bluff, April 30, and joined the Fifteenth Corps, at Bridgeport, on the Big Black, south of Vicksburg, on May 16. It then, on the 18th, was placed in position on a hill back of the city of Vicksburg, whence it kept up a destructive fire during the siege. While at Vicksburg, Battery "A" received, by order of General Sherman, a new armament of five Napoleons—twelve-pounder brass pieces—and a ten-pounder Parrott. Up to this time they had been using the old guns they had carried from Chicago to Cairo, in April, 1861, and fifty-eight of the men who then left the city with Captain Smith, were still connected with the battery, under command of Captain Peter P. Wood.

On July 5, the battery moved to Jackson, Miss., and, after the capture of that place, returned again to the Big Black, about twenty miles east of Vicksburg, where it remained encamped until, in September, Sherman's Corps was ordered to reinforce the Army of the Cumberland, at Chattanooga. On November 23, the battery, with the division to which it was attached, moved rapidly to, and took position at, the northern extremity of Missionary Ridge, near Tunnel Hill, where it supported the assaulting column of General M. L. Smith. The battery then joined in the pursuit of Bragg's army, returned to Chattanooga, marched thence to Larkensville, Ala., and returned to the vicinity of Chattanooga, in May, 1864.

On May 7, Captain Wood was obliged to leave the field on account of severe illness, the battery then being in the vicinity of Rocky Face Ridge, and Lieutenant John W. Rumsey took command. In the engagement of May 13, before Resaca, Lieutenant Rumsey was severely wounded by a shell. He was a brave and intelligent officer, highly esteemed by men and officers, and the loss of his services at the opening of the campaign was greatly regretted. The battery participated in the engagements at Dallas and Kennesaw Mountain, and, on July 12, 1864, its veteran members were consolidated with the veterans of Battery "B," under the designation Battery "A," First Illinois Light Artillery. The consolidated battery was commanded temporarily by Captain Samuel S. Smith, formerly lieutenant of Battery "E," First Illinois Light Artillery. Captain Smith was taken prisoner in front of Atlanta, and Senior First Lieutenant Robb was killed. E. P. Wilcox, of Battery "B," was appointed senior first lieutenant; Harrison Roberts, of Battery "A," junior first lieutenant, and Enoch Colby and James B. Dutch, second lieutenants. Lieutenant Wilcox was subsequently promoted captain, and Spencer S. Kimball appointed junior first lieutenant. When the army was reorganized at Atlanta, the battery was assigned to the command of General Thomas, and participated in the battles before Nashville, in December, 1864, those being its last engagements. It arrived in Chicago July 2, 1865, when it was mustered out and received final pay and discharge.

OLD BATTERY "B," CHICAGO LIGHT ARTILLERY. —Early in the spring of 1861, the Chicago Light Artillery, then consisting of one company, organized in 1854, by Captain James Smith, and commanded by him until 1860, was under the command of Captain Ezra Taylor, who had resigned the colonelcy of the 60th Regiment, 1. S. M., to accept the position. Fifty men were on the rolls of the company; its equipments were four brass six-pounders, caissons and harness complete, and its drill room was on the lower floor of the old armory, on Adams street.

Ezra Taylor

The officers of the company were Ezra Taylor, commander; Cyrus P. Bradley, first lieutenant; Darius Knights, second lieutenant; Charles M. Willard, third lieutenant; J. K. Botsford, first sergeant; E. D. Osband, second sergeant; Edgar P. Tobey, third sergeant; E. Mendson, fourth sergeant.

Immediately upon the call for troops, in April, the Light Artillery was reorganized by Captain Taylor. Co. "A" left for Cairo, under Captain Smith. Co. "B" was organized, offered to the Governor, accepted under the provisions of the "Ten Regiment Bill,"—passed May 2,—and was mustered into service under the following officers:

Captain, Ezra Taylor; Senior First Lieutenant, Samuel E. Barrett; Junior First Lieutenant, Levi W. Hart; Senior Second Lieutenant, Patrick H. White. Each of the above commanded a section of pieces. Junior Second Lieutenant, Israel P. Rumsey, was chief of line of caissons.

Non-Commissioned Officers.—Orderly Sergeant, Charles W. Everett; Quartermaster-Sergeant, Theodore P. Roberts; Chiefs-of-Pieces, with rank of Sergeant, John G. Loy, D. F. Chase, H. F. Townner, J. H. Moore, G. L. Purington, S. C. P. Bogue; Gunners, with rank of Corporals, Abraham Heart, C. H. Root, G. S. Blout, F. Wright, W. H. Prince, J. F. Whittle, William J. McCoy; Chiefs-of-Caissons, F. Whitfield, J. A. Moore, G. P. Clarke, J. C. McGrath, J. B. Easson, Thomas George.

The armament consisted of four six-pounder field-pieces, and two twelve-pounder howitzers; while the side arms were Colt's revolvers, caliber 45, and sabres.

The battery remained in Chicago, until June 1, when it proceeded to Cairo, and was there joined by Captain Taylor, who had been absent in St. Louis procuring arms for the artillery organizations of the State. In July, Battery "B" crossed the Mississippi River to Bird's Point, Mo., whence one section, under Lieutenant White, proceeded to Fredericktown, and took part in the engagement at that point, on October 21st.

At the battle of Belmont, Mo., November 7, 1861, the battery, under the personal command of Captain Taylor, did good service, it being the only artillery with Grant in that, his first, engagement. A member of the battery,—presumably young DeWolf, of Chicago, from the signature,—writes to the Chicago Tribune in regard to the section under Lieutenant White, which received the highest commendation from superior officers for bravery and efficiency:

"The trees were so thick, and underbrush so matted, that a path had to be cut through to allow the guns to pass, and only the heavy firing showed the men in which direction to move. Around the little village of Belmont was a clearing." In the woods, at its edge, the enemy had posted a masked battery, which opened on the section of Taylor's Battery under Lieutenant White, when within three hundred yards. After about an hour's heavy firing, the enemy withdrew their battery to a position further back, and Lieutenant White advanced his pieces to the place it had occupied. At this time, George White, of Chicago, was wounded, from the heated piece discharging its contents while he was ramming down the cartridge. * * After about fifteen minutes firing, the rebel battery was again forced back, this time taking their guns to the river bank, where they abandoned them, and took refuge on the steamer which lay in the river, ready to take them to Columbus. Lieutenant White then advanced his battery to the top of a little knoll, which commanded the enemy's camp, and after shelling it for a time, the camp was abandoned, and the whole force fled to the steamers. The battery was next ordered to advance to the bank of the river, and open upon the boats, which were crossing the river below with reinforcements from Columbus. By this time the men were nearly exhausted, and there were only four men able to do duty at working the gun. Sergeant D. F. Chase dismounted from his pad, and took the place of McCoy, the gunner, who was completely exhausted. While here, the men were exposed to a fire from the rebel sharpshooters, until the tents in which they were concealed were discovered and destroyed. Both canister and shell were used up, and several of the horses were shot. Sergeant Chase had his arm wounded, so that he was unable to do duty, and of the three remaining gunners, one loaded, while the other sighted and fired. The last position occupied was exposed to the fire of the artillery across the river in Columbus, but it did little damage. The order being given to return to the boats, the battery was taken off the field in good order, having captured two guns and enough horses to more than replace those that were shot.

Charles W. Everett, orderly sergeant of the battery, was mortally wounded in this engagement. He enlisted from the office of the Illinois Central Land Department, giving up a lucrative position to join the company. His remains were brought to Chicago for burial. Five of the battery were wounded, among whom was William DeWolf, of Chicago.

In the advance on Fort Henry, Taylor's battery was attached to Colonel W. H. L. Wallace's brigade, McClelland's division, and entered the fort on February 6.

On the afternoon of the 11th, Taylor's battery, with the same brigade and division, moved from Fort Henry on the telegraph, or direct, road to Fort Donelson. At night, the battery, with the Second Brigade, took position on a hill to the west of the enemy's works, where it rested until morning. Taylor's battery, at this time, consisted of one hundred and twenty men, four six-pounder field-guns, two twelve-pounder howitzers, and ninety-two horses, with one thousand seven hundred and thirty rounds of fixed ammunition.

Its guns were first brought into action Thursday morning, February 13, opposite the strong redoubt in the center of the rebel works, and at a distance of eight hundred yards. It afterward moved on the road leading to Dover, taking successive positions as it moved forward, until, at about 12 o'clock, the right and left sections took up a position within two hundred yards of the enemy's left wing, under a most galling fire of rifles and musketry from the Confederate intrenchments. There, Private Beckers, of Chicago, was killed by a sharpshooter.

OSCAR E. BECKERS was the only Chicago man killed at Fort Donelson. He was a native of Aix-la-Chapelle, Rhenish Prussia, who came to America in 1851, and settled in Chicago as a worker in marble. After a residence of a few years, he moved to New Orleans and thence to Arkansas. He was obliged to leave Arkansas at the breaking out of the war, on account of his avowed and outspoken Union sentiments, and returned to Chicago and enlisted in Taylor's battery, serving with it from its organization until his death at Fort Donelson. His last words were: "Go back, boys, and man the guns; I die for Liberty!"

The battery maintained its position, and, after half an hour, succeeded in silencing the opposing batteries. The brigade commander commended both the officers and men of these sections, in his report, for their coolness and daring. On Saturday morning, it became engaged, the enemy opening fire from six batteries, and charging, with heavy masses of infantry, upon the 17th Illinois, which was supporting the batteries. Colonel J. D. Webster related an incident of the Saturday's struggle. A desperate charge was made on one of the guns of the battery served by Lieutenant Levi W. Hart, of Chicago, and the boys being surrounded by the Confederates, and their horses in the rear, they dragged the piece off by means of a rope, and cut their way through the enemy. Another member of the battery walked a mile to the hospital to have a ball extracted from his leg, begging the privilege of returning to his piece after the operation.

The right wing of Wallace's brigade being driven back later in the day, the battery, in compliance with orders, retired to the top of the next hill, where two pieces only were brought into action, the ammunition being nearly exhausted. This was the last position taken, the enemy being soon in full retreat.

The brigade commander says of the battery and its commander, in his report of the battle:

"The conduct of Captain Ezra Taylor, commanding Light Battery "B," during the whole series of engagements, was such as to distinguish him as a daring, yet cool and sagacious officer, pushing his guns into positions that were swept by the enemy's shot, he, in person, directed the posting of his sections, and in many instances himself sighted the guns. Such conduct found its natural reflection in the perfect order and bravery that characterized his entire command. His battery of six pieces fired seventeen hundred rounds of ammunition during the engagement, being an average of about two hundred and eighty-four rounds to the gun."

Captain Taylor's whole loss in killed and wounded was as follows:

Killed, Private Oscar E. Beckers. Wounded severely, Sergeant James F. Whittle; Corporal B. Franklin Lilly; Privates Tyler A. Mason and Charles H. Meacham. Slightly wounded, Corporal William H. Prince; Privates William W. Lowrie, Francis N. Marion and Charles W. Pierce.

On April 1, 1862, Captain Taylor was promoted senior major of the 1st Illinois Light Artillery, and the command of Battery "B" devolved upon Captain Samuel E. Barrett. On April 4, Major Taylor was appointed chief of artillery in General Sherman's division, with orders to report to that commander at Shiloh. Battery "B" participated in the battles of the 6th and 7th of April. The following account, condensed from Major Taylor's report, gives the detail of its movements:

By instructions from the General commanding the division, Battery "B," commanded by Captain Barrett, was posted on the morning of Sunday, April 6, on the rising ground in front of Shiloh Church, on the road to Corinth. To the left of the battery was Hildebrand's Ohio brigade, which, with the battery of Captain Waterhouse, and the 4th Illinois Cavalry, formed the left of Sherman's division, the 77th Ohio being next to Taylor's old battery, the 53d Ohio forming the extreme left. The left of the division was first attacked by a large force of the enemy under General Hindman, and driven back. They then appeared directly in front of the position occupied by Waterhouse's battery (which was now supported by three Illinois regiments, sent forward by General McClelland), throwing, at the same time large masses of troops into the woods at his (Waterhouse's) left, whence the 53d Ohio had been driven back. In the meantime, the brigade of General Anderson, with Hodgson's battery, had attacked the position held by the 77th and the 57th Ohio regiments and Taylor's battery. The rebel battery was posted on the high ground across Oak Creek, and the infantry, descending into the miry, tangled ravine, charged up the opposite slope, only to be repeatedly repulsed and to renew the assault, the Ohio troops, supported by the battery, maintaining their ground three hours against four times their number. Major Taylor, in his report, says of the battle at this point:

"I went to the position occupied by Taylor's battery, Captain Barrett commanding, and ordered him to open fire with shell; which was done promptly, causing the enemy to take shelter in the timber, under cover of which he advanced to within one hundred and fifty yards of their guns, when they opened a tremendous fire of musketry, accompanied with terrific yells, showing their evident intent to intimidate our men. The only effect it had was to cause them promptly to obey the order given by me, to move their guns by hand to the point, and pour in a shower of canister, causing both the yelling and the firing of the enemy to cease for a time. In the meantime, the enemy was pushing our forces on the left of both the batteries—Waterhouse's and Taylor's. Seeing Waterhouse's battery limbering to the rear, and fearing the result of a hasty retreat, I hastened to their position, and finding them resting, I at once ordered them to unlimber, and contest every foot of ground, while I sent a messenger to find another battery to come to their assistance. My order was promptly obeyed, and they were soon throwing canister among the enemy. But their bravery alone could not drive back the masses, who now swarmed on their left, pushing back the infantry on the left, and opening a flank fire of musketry from a battery they had succeeded in planting in the timber. They were compelled to retire under a galling fire, leaving their guns and entire camp and garrison equipage on the field. * * * Some time after this battery had retired, and the infantry support on the left of Taylor's battery had fallen back, and the enemy had planted his flag on the ground occupied by Waterhouse's battery, I deemed it prudent to order Captain Barrett to limber to the rear, and retire in good order to a new position, which was accomplished without confusion, but owing to a number of his horses being shot, he was obliged to leave two of his caissons on the field, one of which he has recovered."

Major Taylor then instructed Captain Barrett to take up a new position near the left of the First Brigade in the First Division (General McClernand's); which he did, moving his battery back by the Corinth road, and acting with that division, in connection with Sherman's, through the remainder of the engagement. The losses in the battery were two killed and eight wounded.

With the 70th and 72d Ohio, under General Denver, it participated in the attack on the Confederates at the "Russell House," on the route to Corinth, and after that engagement was attached to Morgan L. Smith's brigade, with which it entered the first redoubt of the Confederates before that city, May 30. When the pursuit of Beauregard's forces was ended, it moved to Memphis, and after the failure of Grant's Mississippi expedition, left that point, with Smith's division, to take part in Sherman's attack on the defenses north of Vicksburg, at Chickasaw Bayou, in December, 1862. After the failure of that attempt, it moved with Sherman's corps to Fort Hindman, or Arkansas Post, and dragging the battery through the almost impassable swamps on the shore of the Arkansas River, participated in the assault on the Post on January 9, 1863.

General Smith receiving a severe wound at Chickasaw Bayou, the division to which the battery was attached was commanded temporarily by General David Stuart. After the return from Arkansas Post, it was assigned to Blair's division, Captain Samuel Barrett being promoted chief of artillery on General Blair's staff, and Israel P. Rumsey promoted captain of Battery "B." Under him the battery, with Blair's division, took part in the feint on Haines's Bluff, north of Vicksburg, April 30, and on May 16, joined the balance of Sherman's corps on the Big Black. Crossing the river at Bridgeport, after dislodging the enemy from the opposite bank, it moved to the north and east of Vicksburg, and was placed in position on one of the hills in rear of the city, whence its guns fired the first shots at the enemy's works. After the assaults of the 19th and 22d of May, it was in the front, at the left of the division, protecting the sappers and miners of Giles A. Smith's and General Ransom's brigades, in their approaches to the fortifications, its position being in front of the central fort, known as Fort Hill, which stood on the brow of a hill, thirty feet above the approach below. While in the rear of Vicksburg, Henry Henrotin, son of Dr. Henrotin, who was then Belgian Consul at Chicago, a young man only twenty-two, who enlisted at the organization of the battery and fought at Belmont, Donelson, Shiloh and Arkansas Post, was killed. Douglas K. Newell was also killed at Vicksburg, on May 20.

The battery accompanied General Blair's expedition to Mechanicsburg and Richmond, La., and was posted, on its return, on the west bank of the Mississippi, opposite Vicksburg, where it was exposed to a terrible fire from the enemy's water batteries. After the surrender of the city, it was sent to Lake Providence, and subsequently joined Sherman at his camp on the Big Black, east of Vicksburg, where it remained until the Fifteenth Corps was ordered to Chattanooga to reinforce the Army of the Cumberland. It took part in Sherman's attack on the northern point of Missionary Ridge, November 24; in the pursuit of Bragg's army; and in the expedition to Knoxville for the relief of Burnside's beleaguered forces. Returning to Chattanooga, it moved to Larkinsville, Tenn., and went into winter quarters. There, on January 1, 1864, the men received a new battery of Napoleon guns, ordered at Vicksburg, and in May, 1864, joined Logan's corps, Army of the Tennessee, for the Atlanta campaign.

Captain I. P. Rumsey served as chief of artillery, Second Division, during the campaign. The battery took part in the engagements before Resaca May 14-15, 1864, and in those before Dallas and at Kenesaw Mountain in June. In July, it participated in its last engagement at Nickajack Creek, driving a battery of four guns from the rebel works with two guns posted in the open field.

On the 12th, it was ordered back to Springfield, Ill., that the men whose term had expired might be mustered out of service; those enlisting in 1862 being consolidated with the same class from Battery "A," First Illinois Artillery, q. v. The roster of the battery was: Captain, Samuel S. Smith; First Lieutenant, Edward P. Wilcox; Second Lieutenant, Enoch Colby.

The casualties of the battery were: One officer died of disease; seven men killed or died of wounds; thirteen men died of disease; twenty-one discharged for disability, eight for wounds, twenty-three for promotion.

Following are the names, with places of death, of those of Batteries "A" and "B" who were buried at Rosehill, Chicago, January 7, 1866, on the occasion of the military funeral of soldiers of Batteries "A" and "B" and the Board-of-Trade Battery. Most of them were killed, or had died, after the consolidation of the batteries:

Battery "A."—Killed at Atlanta, July 22, 1864, John Earl. Battery "B."—Died at Vicksburg, 1864, Benjamin E. Warner, Jacob Dielman; killed at Atlanta, July 20, Samuel Haddock; at Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, Frederick Thompson; died at Millgrove, Ga., July 5, 1864, First Lieutenant Timothy M. Blaisdell; at Lovejoy's Station, Tenn., June 25, 1864, Charles L. Harrington; at Memphis, May 23, 1864, Ora McBride; at Vicksburg, April 21, 1864, John Mustard. Besides those mentioned, John Chalmers, Alexander Beidelman and John Stranberg were killed at Atlanta, July 22, 1864; George A. Kingsley died at Cairo, February 21, 1862; Frederick Johnson at Memphis, December 26, 1862; Charles Kinsman at Iuka, October 28, 1863.

Those who were killed at Atlanta were buried in one grave, north of the city, by members of the Board-of-Trade Battery. In the latter part of 1865, Taylor's Battery Association elected Major Barrett, Captain Wilcox and H. W. Dudley a committee to proceed to Atlanta and recover the bodies of their comrades from a southern grave. The bodies were brought to Chicago, and re-buried, January 7, 1866, with military honors, at Rosehill.

The following were the promotions in the battery:

Captain Ezra Taylor was promoted to major of First Illinois Artillery; to colonel; to chief of artillery of the Department of the Tennessee; and to brevet brigadier-general. Samuel E. Barrett was made captain, then major and chief of artillery, Second Division. Levi W. Hart was made captain of Battery "H" (Silversparre's battery), and P. H. White was made captain of the Chicago Mercantile Battery. I. P. Rumsey was promoted to the captaincy of Battery "B," and was chief of artillery of the Second Division, during the Atlanta campaign.

LIEUTENANT WILLIAM D'WOLF, son of Hon. William F. D'Wolf of Chicago, enlisted in May, 1861, in Co. "B," 1st Regiment Illinois Light Artillery, and was wounded in the battle at Bird's Point on November 7, the section of the battery to which he was attached capturing two guns, and receiving the commendation of Captain Taylor for bravery and efficiency. He was again engaged at Fort Donelson, and after serving with his battery for nearly a year, was promoted to a lieutenancy in the regular army "for gallant and meritorious conduct." General McClellan, by letter to the Secretary of War, personally requesting his appointment as one eminently proper to be made. On the 4th of April, 1862, he joined his regiment—the 3d Regiment of Artillery, Captain, afterward General, Gibson commanding, and, accompanying the Army of the Potomac to the Peninsula, was thrown into the battle of Williamsburg on the 4th of May, where his bravery and enthusiasm won the admiration, not only of his own superior officers, but of the disinterested observers. First wounded by a shell which killed his horse, he seized and mounted another, going forward with his guns to the front. Again wounded and disabled in both legs, he refused to leave the field until the battery was withdrawn. After the battle was over, he was conveyed to Fortress Monroe, and thence to Washington, D. C., where, in the home of the patriotic representative from the Chicago District, the late Isaac N. Arnold, he received the kindest and most tender care, but gradually failed, and, on the 2d of June, with his mother by his side, the brave and talented young man, breathed his last. The funeral of young D'Wolf took place at St. James Church, Chicago, a touching sermon being preached on the occasion by the late Rev. Dr. Clarkson.

BATTERY "B," FIRST ILLINOIS LIGHT ARTILLERY. (BRIDGES'S BATTERY.)—This well known and popular Chicago military organization was originally recruited and mustered into United States service at Camp Douglas, Chicago, as Co. "G," 19th Illinois Infantry, under the following officers: Captain, Charles D. C. Williams; First Lieutenant, Lyman Bridges; Second Lieutenant, Charles R. Roland.

Under these officers the company participated, with its regiment, in the Missouri campaign under Fremont, being stationed at Palmyra, Ironton, Frederickton, Jackson, Cape Girardeau, Bird's Point and Norfolk. In the accident near Huron, Ind., September 17,* of the twenty-seven persons killed, four belonged to Co. "G." In October, Captain Williams having been transferred, to the United States marine service, First Lieutenant Bridges was appointed captain, William Bishop first lieutenant, and Morris D. Temple second lieutenant. Under these officers, the company participated in Mitchel's campaign of 1862. At Winchester, Tenn., in June, 1862, Co. "G" was assigned to duty as provost guard and Captain Bridges as provost marshal of the place. In July, the command returned, via Bridgeport, to Huntsville, Ala., and was assigned to guard the railroad bridge at Mill Creek, where it remained until, upon Bragg's invasion of Kentucky, Buell's army was hurried north, when the 19th Regiment was sent to Nashville as a part of the garrison, General Negley commanding the post.

On arriving at Nashville, Captain Bridges was ordered by General Negley to fit up a light battery from captured guns then in the Ordnance Department at that post, man it with his company, and place it in position near the city hospital, as part of the defense of the city. Captain Bridges was assigned to duty as assistant engineer to Captain James St. Clair Morton, Engineer Corps U. S. A., and under him assisted in placing in position the heavy ordnance for the defense of the city. On November 13, 1862, by order of General Rosecrans, Co. "G" was detached from the regiment for duty as an artillery company, and sent to Gallatin with eleven hundred prisoners, to construct Fort Thomas, upon the completion of which the battery was assigned to, and remained at, the post until December 20.

It was then ordered to turn over its guns to an Indiana battery which had lost its own in an engagement at Hortonsville, a short time before, and to re-join the 19th Illinois Infantry, which it did on the battle-field of Stone River, on the night of January 2, 1863. With its old regiment, the company went into camp at Murfreesboro', after the close of the engagement, and on January 14, 1863, by order of the War Department, was permanently transferred from the 19th Illinois Infantry to a battery of light artillery of six guns—an entire new equipment being secured at Nashville during the month—and the battery was assigned to the Pioneer Brigade, Department of the Cumberland. Sergeants Lyman A. White and Franklin Seborn were promoted lieutenants, and the battery, with Rosecrans's army, marched, in June, on the Tullahoma campaign. On August 1, the battery was transferred to the First Brigade, Second Division, Fourteenth Army Corps—General Negley commanding the division, General Thomas the corps,—with which command it descended the Cumberland Mountains, crossed the Tennessee at Culverton's Ferry, on September 2, and encamped at the foot of Sand Mountain, in Lookout Valley, on the 4th. On the 8th and 9th, it crossed Lookout Mountain and moved forward to Dug Gap, where the enemy had thrown a large force, to hold the pass and secure their position at LaFayette. After a skirmish at this point, the command fell back to Stevens's Gap, and, on the 19th, took position on the west side of Chickamauga road, with the Second Division, on the right of Thomas's line at Owen's Ford.

On the 20th, the division was moved to the left to the support of Thomas, and during that day the battery was constantly engaged, losing twenty-six men—six killed, sixteen wounded, and four captured. Second Lieutenant William Bishop was killed at his guns, repulsing a charge on them by the enemy.

On the retirement of the army to Chattanooga, the battery was placed in position at Fort Negley, near the Rossville pike, remaining in this position until the re-organization of the Army of the Cumberland, when it was assigned, October 12, 1863, to the Third Division (General T. J. Wood), Fourth Army Corps (General Gordon Granger), and placed in position at Fort Wood, which was situated on an eminence about half a mile out of Chattanooga, in a southeasterly direction. From this position, the battery exchanged occasional shots with the artillery on the ridge, until the 23d of November, when the enemy was driven by the Fourth Corps from a line of advanced rifle-pits, extending north and south from Orchard Knob, a steep, craggy knoll, strongly fortified, and about midway between Fort Wood and Mission Ridge. Bridges's battery was advanced to, and placed in position on, the Knob, which became the headquarters of the commanding generals. On the 25th, the battery, by order of General Grant, fired the signal of six guns for the attack on Mission Ridge, retaining its position on the Knob, and supporting our troops in the assault until the victory was won. With the Fourth * See History of 19th Illinois Infantry.

Corps, it marched to Knoxville to Burnside's relief, and remained through the severe campaign of the winter among the mountains of Eastern Tennessee, re-joining the corps at Cleveland in April, 1864.

On May 2, with Wood's division of the Fourth Corps, then commanded by Major-General O. O. Howard, it joined Sherman's grand army at Catoosa Springs, for the advance toward Atlanta. On May 7, Wood's division occupied Tunnel Hill, and the following day the battery was engaged in the demonstration against Rocky Face Ridge, Johnston's impregnable position covering Dalton. The battery, with the division, remained in front of the ridge until the 12th, when, the position of the enemy having been turned by McPherson's command, the enemy evacuated Buzzard's Roost Pass through Rocky Face, and the battery, on the 13th, entered Dalton. It marched to Resaca the following day, and was in reserve before that place on the 14th and 15th. In the pursuit of Johnston's forces, the division reached Adairsville on the 17th, where the battery was brought into action, and a strong force of the enemy driven from the eastern side of Othkaluga Creek, where they occupied a strongly fortified position. South of Kingston, and near Cassville, the enemy was again encountered, and forced to evacuate entrenched positions, the works at Cassville being abandoned on the night of the 19th.

The command rested in camp near Cassville until the 22d of May, preparing for a further advance; and while there Captain Bridges was appointed chief of artillery of the Fourth Corps, his battery being placed under the command of Lieutenant Morris D. Temple. On the 23d, it crossed the Etowah, and traversing the Alatoona Range, reached Johnston's entrenched position at New Hope Church on the 26th, where it remained until June 6, occasionally engaged with the opposing batteries, losing one man killed and several wounded.

On June 6, the battery, with its division, moved eastward to the neighborhood of Mount Morris Church, near Ackworth, Ga., where it remained in camp until the 10th. While there, Lieutenant Morris D. Temple commanding, and Lieutenant William R. Bise, with all the non-veterans, were mustered out of service and left for Chicago. The command of the battery devolved on First Lieutenant Lyman A. White. Second Lieutenant Franklin Seborn was promoted first lieutenant, and Sergeants Clark E. Dodge and Lawman C. Lawrence received commissions as second lieutenants. Under these officers, the battery was engaged before Pine Mountain from June 10 to 14, when the enemy retreated to an entrenched line at Black Jack Hills, half a mile further south. The battery was advanced in front of this position and remained there until the 19th, when the enemy swung back to Kenesaw Mountain. From Sunday, June 19, to July 2, the artillery was engaged at frequent intervals, Lieutenant Franklin Seborn being mortally wounded while at his post working his guns.

With Wood's division, the battery participated in the movements and engagements prior to the battle at Peach Tree Creek, where it took position upon a knob one-half mile in advance of the line of battle, and, supported by two regiments of infantry, resisted the movement of a body of troops marching to attack the right. On July 22, it was placed in position before the main line of works northeast of Atlanta. There, works were constructed for the guns, and, after obtaining exact range, the battery opened and kept up constant fire upon the city and fortifications. On July 30, the artillery was consolidated into a corps organization, Captain Bridges commanding the artillery brigade of the Fourth Corps. Bridges's battery, as part of the brigade marched, August 25, to Proctor's Creek and Mt. Gilead Church, from which points it moved with Wood's division to Rough and Ready, Jonesboro' and Lovejoy's Station, where, after skirmishing three days, the campaign was ended.

On September 4, with the artillery brigade, it started for Atlanta, which it reached on the 7th, and, with the command, went into camp. It again moved in October, with the Fourth Corps, to Chattanooga, Tenn., and thence to Huntsville and Athens, Ala., in pursuit of Hood. The battery participated in the engagements at Columbia, Spring Hill and Franklin, November 28-30, being warmly engaged at the two latter places. It then marched with the artillery brigade to Nashville, and took part in the battle there, on December 15-16.

On December 21, 1864, the battery was transferred to 1st Regiment Illinois Light Artillery, as Co. "B"; Captain Bridges was promoted major of the regiment; the battery being officered as follows, on January 1, 1865: Captain, Lyman A. White; First Lieutenant, Clark E. Dodge; Junior First Lieutenant, Lawman C. Lawrence; Second Lieutenant, Alphonso W. Potter; Junior Second Lieutenant, William Peterson; First Sergeant, John Bartholomew; Quartermaster, William H. Clark.

Bridges's battery left Nashville June 24, arriving at Chicago in the early morning of June 27, 1865, and marched directly to Camp Douglas. The following day, a formal welcome was tendered it in Floral Hall of the Sanitary Fair building, Cyrus Bentley making the welcoming speech, after a few brief but cordial words from W. W. Boyington, Esq., president of the Bridges's Battery Association. At the close of the reception, the battery was tendered a banquet by the association, at which Mayor Rice presided, assisted by Colonel James H. Bowen, of the Governor's staff. Upon this occasion, the Mayor delivered an eloquent address to the battery, eulogizing them for their gallant bravery, their many daring feats and their fortitude in enduring great hardships. Addresses were also made by Colonel Bowen, Messrs. Boyington, Bentley, Holden, etc. The battery was mustered out of service at Chicago, on July 6, 1865.

During the last two years of service, it had been materially assisted by the Bridges' Battery Association, organized February, 1864, with W. W. Boyington, president; O. H. Salisbury, vice-president; Joseph W. Merriam, secretary; and C. N. Holden, treasurer. The association was formed to attend to the general interests of members of the battery and their families, keep the battery full to the maximum, secure to their families pensions and back-pay in case of death, attend to sanitary demands, and to erect a monument to the memory of those who might fall; all of which was done under the supervision of the Association—the last requisite being performed, with appropriate ceremonies, at Rose Hill Cemetery.

COMPANY "I," FIRST ILLINOIS ARTILLERY ("BOUTON'S CHICAGO BATTERY").—Battery "I," was organized in Chicago by Captain Edward Bouton, a resident of the city, and was mustered into service at Camp Douglas on February 10, 1862, under the following officers:

Captain, Edward Bouton; Senior First Lieutenant, Henry A. Rogers; Junior First Lieutenant, Albert Cudney; Senior Second Lieutenant, William N. Lansing; Junior Second Lieutenant, John C. Neely.

On March 1, the battery was ordered to St. Louis, where it remained until April 2, when it embarked for Pittsburg Landing, arriving on the 4th. It was assigned to Sherman's division, and was engaged both on the 6th and 7th. On the former day it was posted by Colonel Ezra Taylor in a good position near General Wallace's division, where, he says, it "did some excellent service in driving the enemy from a very commanding position—both officers and men behaving like veterans." On the 7th, one section, under Captain Bouton, was moved to the support of the brigade of Colonel William H. Gibson, who awarded it high praise for so promptly and skillfully silencing the battery which had been harassing his left. In the advance on Corinth, the battery participated in the engagement at the Russell House, May 21; and after the termination of the siege, and the evacuation of Corinth, it moved to Memphis with Sherman, arriving in July. On September 25, one section was sent with an expedition up the Mississippi River to Fort Randolph; and, in November, it accompanied the 46th Ohio on an expedition into Arkansas, where a band of guerrillas was broken up and Confederate property destroyed. During the same month, the battery was engaged with the enemy's cavalry in Mississippi; after which it returned to Memphis, and remained in camp until November 28, 1862, moving thence to LaGrange, and accompanying General Grant's army on the Tallahatchie campaign.

After the disaster at Holly Springs, it returned to LaGrange, and thence moved with the division of General J. W. Denver to Moscow, Tenn., and encamped, remaining until June 6, 1863. It then returned to Memphis, and, with Loomis's brigade, General W. S. Smith's division, embarked for Vicksburg, arriving at Snyder's Bluff, on the Yazoo, June 11. On the surrender of Vicksburg, it joined Sherman's forces, moving to attack Johnston, at Richmond; and after the evacuation of that city, returned to the Big Black, and went into camp, where it remained until Sherman was ordered to reinforce the Army of the Cumberland at Chattanooga. With the Fifteenth Corps, it was transported to Memphis, and thence set out on the march to Chattanooga, arriving in time to participate in the battle of Mission Ridge, November 25, 1863. After the battle, the battery, joining in the pursuit of Bragg, moved to Ringgold, and thence returned to Chattanooga, and remained encamped through the winter of 1863-64 at Bridgeport and Scottsboro', Ala.

On March 17, 1864, the battery—now about eighty strong—re-enlisted, and returned to Chicago on furlough, also for the purpose of recruiting the battery to the maximum.

In June, the ranks being again filled, it returned to Nashville, where the men were mounted, and it was assigned to Hatch's cavalry division. With that division, it participated in the battles before Nashville, December 15-16, being posted on the extreme right of General Thomas's line, guarding that flank. It took part in General Hatch's movement to flank Hood's left, which, under the protection of the well-handled artillery, proved completely successful, and, finally, the battery, joining in pursuit, followed Hood's flying forces to Florence, Ala., where the project was abandoned, and the battery, with the cavalry division, moved to Eastport, Miss., remaining at that post until it returned to Chicago, where it was mustered out of service on July 26, 1865. The following were its officers at the time:

Captain, John C. Neely; Senior First Lieutenant, Joseph A. McCartney; Junior First Lieutenant, Elisha S. Russell; Senior Second Lieutenant, Stephen Tart; Junior Second Lieutenant, Henry Bennett.

COLVIN'S BATTERY.—This battery was organized at Shawneetown, Ill., and mustered into service January 9, 1862, with Angrean Franklin as captain. Its first year's service consisted in guerrilla warfare, chiefly waged about Perryville, Ky. It was then ordered to Louisville, protecting the city until Burnside's Tennessee expedition was fitted out, when it joined in that movement, being attached to the First Cavalry Division. It was in the advance upon the capture of Knoxville, and also served with General Stoneman in Virginia. The losses of the battery by battle were not large, but sickness greatly decimated its ranks. John H. Colvin, of Chicago, formerly of Battery "M," became captain of the command in October, 1863, and Charles M. Judd its first lieutenant during the following February. In pursuance of orders from the Adjutant General's office, dated March 23, 1865, Colvin's battery was transferred and assigned as Battery "K," 1st Regiment Illinois Light Artillery, upon the consolidation of Cos. "E" and "K," 1st Artillery. A portion of its members, including Captain Colvin, were mustered out at Springfield, June 11, 1865. The balance, about eighty men, arrived in Chicago direct from Knoxville, one month later, being under command of Junior First Lieutenant John Huntsinger. The Senior First Lieutenant, Charles M. Judd, was absent at the time on detached duty. The balance of the command were mustered out of the service at Camp Douglas, Chicago.

Co. "L," SECOND ILLINOIS LIGHT ARTILLERY, (BOLTON'S BATTERY).—Battery "L" was organized at Chicago by Captain Bolton, its acceptance by the War Department being secured through the instrumentality of Isaac N. Arnold. It was mustered into the United States service February 28, 1862, under the following officers, of whom the captain, junior first and senior second lieutenants were residents of Chicago:

Captain, William H. Bolton; Senior First Lieutenant, Jabez H. Moore; Junior First Lieutenant, Edward A. James; Senior Second Lieutenant, Simon P. Tracy; Junior Second Lieutenant, Julius D. Roberts.

The battery left Chicago March 11, 1862, for St. Louis, where it remained until April 9, and then embarked for Pittsburg Landing, arriving on the 12th. It was there assigned to the Fourth Division, Army of the Tennessee, General S. A. Hurlbut, and participated in the advance on Corinth, Miss., and then moved to Memphis, Tenn., arriving in July. Six of the men of Bolton's battery died on the march from Corinth to Memphis, and forty-one were sent to the hospital, sick, between Shiloh and Memphis. During the month of August, the battery, with a force of infantry and cavalry, under General Veatch, was sent to Mooney Creek, ten miles from Memphis, to disperse a band of guerrillas; which duty was accomplished.

The battery then went, with Hurlbut's division, to Bolivar, Miss., and remained there until after the battle of Corinth, October 3-4, when it marched from Bolivar, on the 4th. The following morning the enemy's advance was encountered and driven back before the Tal-lanatchie was reached. After driving in the enemy's outposts, the battery advanced a mile, when it was again placed in position and ordered to open on the enemy's batteries, one of which was silenced and captured by Bolton's and a Missouri battery. During the hottest of the artillery firing, Charles S. Adams, of Chicago, while sponging out one of the guns of the battery, was accidentally wounded by the premature discharge of the piece, and died two days later at Bolivar from the wound. After advancing to the river and guarding the passage of the infantry, the battery was ordered across the river to take position on a hill, whence it opened on a Confederate brigade, which abandoned two stands of colors and fled from the field. These colors were presented to the battery, on the 12th of October, by General Hurlbut, in the presence of the artillery of the division, and were by the latter sent to Chicago and presented to the Mercantile Association. Besides young Adams, there were wounded in this engagement, Daniel French, William Tanner, Thomas McGuire and Corydon N. Johnson. Lieutenant Edward A. James, son of William James, was taken very ill from exposure and over exertion soon after the engagement, and returned to Chicago, where he died at the residence of his father, November 2, 1862. Simon P. Tracy, of Chicago, was promoted junior first lieutenant, and Orlando S. Wood, senior second lieutenant.

November 26, 1862, the battery was transferred from the Fourth to the Third Division, Seventeenth Corps, commanded by General John A. Logan, and participated in the Mississippi campaign of General Grant, advancing, by way of LaGrange, Holly Springs and the Tallahatchie, to Oxford, Miss., in December, 1862. It afterward, in February, 1863, moved to Lake Providence, and from there joined Grant's forces at Milliken's Bend for the movement on Vicksburg; after arriving at which place, it performed effective service during the siege. It participated in Sherman's expedition to Jackson, Miss., after the surrender of Vicksburg, having an engagement with the enemy on July 7 at Canton, in which, supported by the 11th Illinois, it successfully repulsed the charges of the cavalry. On its return, it marched into Louisiana in pursuit of General McCullough, returning to Vicksburg in the fall.

In November, 1863, Captain Bolton returned to Chicago, bringing with him the bodies of Lieutenant Simon P. Tracy and Corporal Charles B. Blake, both of whom died on September 9, and that of William Jones, Jr., who died on June 30.

On his return, by order of Major-General McPherson, the battery was supplied with new steel guns. In June, 1864, it fought under McArthur at Benton and Gleasonville, and the following month, under Major-General Slocum, at Clinton and Jackson, Miss.; when it returned to Vicksburg, and was assigned to the defenses of that post, in which duty it was employed until May, 1865, when the guns were dismantled and the men drew sabres and revolvers, and were mounted and performed orderly duty at headquarters, until they were mustered out August 9, 1865, under the following officers:

Captain, Thaddeus C. Hulanski, Chicago; Senior First Lieutenant, Daniel H. Pierce, Plainfield; Junior First Lieutenant, George C. Wise, Chicago; Senior Second Lieutenant, Levi B. Wightman, Joliet; Junior Second Lieutenant, James Cunningham, Chicago.

ALBERT M. FORBES was born in Keeseville, New York, June 20, 1840, the son of Albert G. and Hannah (Finch) Forbes. He attended the Institute at Fort Edward, New York, and at the age of seventeen came to Chicago and entered the Chicago University. Three years later he enlisted in the 2d Illinois Light Artillery, under Captain William H. Bolton. With that command, he participated in the battles of Shiloh, the siege of Corinth, the battle of Hatchie River, Holly Springs, Memphis and Vicksburg. His term of service expired, and he was mustered out of service in the fall of 1864. He did not, however, leave the army, but accompanied General Sherman through to the sea, and passed the grand review at Washington in 1865. He returned to Chicago, and for two years was a member of the Board of Trade. In 1867, he began teaming in a small way, purchasing one horse and an express wagon with which to make his start. His business has steadily increased, until at the present time he owns one hundred and twenty-five Norman horses, valued at $250 each, and has forty-seven teams in daily use doing the freighting for some of the principal wholesale houses in the city. He was married in 1865, to Miss Ella Finch of Keeseville, New York. They have five children; Carrie, Fred, Mabel, Grace and Ruth. Mr. Forbes is a member of Hesperia Lodge, No. 411, A.F. & A.M., of the Chapter, and of Chicago Commandery, No. 19, K. T.

COMPANY "M," SECOND ILLINOIS LIGHT ARTILLERY (PHILLIPS'S BATTERY).—This battery was organized at Camp Douglas, Chicago, by Captain John C. Phillips, in May, 1862. On the 22d of that month, it was ordered to Camp Butler, Springfield, where, on the 6th of June, it was mustered into United States service, under the following officers, all of Chicago:

Captain, John C. Phillips; Senior First Lieutenant, Edward

G. Hillier; Junior First Lieutenant, George W. Reed; Senior Second Lieutenant, W. C. G. L. Stevenson.

At Camp Butler the company received equipments, and, on the 16th of July, left to join General Wool's corps of the Army of Virginia, arriving at Martinsburg, Va., on the 24th, where it was attached, soon after, to General Julius White's command, General White being post commander. On the 24th of August, Ashby's cavalry, which had been making raids upon White's outposts, was attacked at Darkesville, by two sections of Phillips's battery, supported by two companies of the 12th Illinois Cavalry, and routed with the loss of twenty-five killed, fifty wounded, and forty-one prisoners. The battery remained at Martinsburg until September 12, when the place was evacuated on the approach of Stonewall Jackson, and the command retired to Harper's Ferry, the battery being stationed at Bolivar Heights. On the surrender of Harper's Ferry by Colonel Miles, September 15, the men of the battery were paroled and sent to Camp Douglas, Chicago, arriving on the 27th.

There the battery was refitted, and remained until May 12, 1863, when it was ordered to report to General Burnside, at Cincinnati, and left that day, under Captain Phillips, for the field, with one hundred effective men, ninety of whom were original members of the battery.

George W. Reed was promoted senior first lieutenant, and W. C. G. L. Stevenson, junior first lieutenant. Arriving at Cincinnati, the battery was ordered to join General White's command in Eastern Kentucky, and reported to him at Louisa on June 4. On the 14th, it moved, with White's troops, up the Big Sandy Valley to Beaver Creek, arriving on the 21st, and thence one section moved, with a detachment of cavalry under Major Brown of the 10th Kentucky Cavalry, to Gladesville, Va.; which place was stormed on July 6, and Colonel Cordell, with nineteen other officers and one hundred men were captured.

The expedition then returned to camp at Louisa, arriving on the 22d; on August 4, moved to Covington; and on the 8th, reporting to General Burnside at Camp Nelson, was attached to the Reserve Artillery, Twenty-third Army Corps, and went into camp at Danville, Ky. The battery moved with General Burnside's corps August 17, to occupy Eastern Tennessee, arriving at Knoxville, on September 15. On September 17, it was assigned to Carter's brigade of the cavalry division, and during the month, was engaged at Jonesboro', Carter's Station, and Zollicoffer. During October, it was engaged with the cavalry division at Blue Springs, Tenn., on the 5th and 10th, and on the 13th at Blountsville. After the latter engagement, the command pursued the enemy through Carter's Station, Zollicoffer and Bristol, to near Abington, Va., where the pursuit was discontinued, and the command went into camp at Rogerville, on the 19th.

On November 5, Captain Phillips was ordered to Nashville, leaving Lieutenant Stevenson in command of the battery. The following morning, the command (Carter's brigade and battery attached) was attacked by three Confederate brigades, under General Jones. After defending its position three hours without support, with the loss of four men killed and thirty-five captured, a retreat was ordered. The guns were spiked and abandoned, and the remainder of the battery,—eighty-six men—fell back to Morristown. After the siege of Knoxville, the battery was ordered to re-cross the Cumberland Mountain, and report at Camp Nelson, Ky., where it was consolidated with other batteries of the division. On April 11, 1864, Captain Phillips and Lieutenants Reed, Stevenson and Wheeler, were mustered out of service, and the battery, as a separate organization, ceased to exist.

CHICAGO BOARD-OF-TRADE BATTERY.—In the summer of 1862, the people of the North were quite generally depressed, over the failure of McClellan's Peninsular Campaign and the apparent impotency of the Union arms; and yet there were found strong characters in every community throughout the country, who were capable not only of sustaining a noble courage within themselves, but of inspiring enthusiasm in the despondent natures of those around them. The Chicago Board-of-Trade Battery owes its origin to this crisis in national affairs and to the invigorating presence and labors of just such men. S. H. Stevens,—warmly supported by Tracy J. Bronson, and Charles H. Walker, Jr.—was the prime mover in its organization, formulating, and presenting to the persons whose names appear, the following request:

C. T. WHEELER, President of the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago:

We, the undersigned members, request you to call, at an early day, a general meeting of the Board, to pledge ourselves to use our influence and money to recruit and support a battery, to be known as the Board-of-Trade Battery.

GEORGE STEEL,	G. L. SCOTT,
WILLIAM STURGES,	T. J. BRONSON,
E. AKIN,	C. H. WALKER, JR.,
M. C. STEARNS,	E. G. WOLCOTT,
I. Y. MUNN,	FLINT & THOMPSON.

In pursuance with this request, President Wheeler called a meeting of the Board for July 21, 1862. The attendance was large, the meeting being called to order by John L. Hancock, second vice-president of the Board. On motion of Charles H. Walker, Jr., it was resolved that the Board of Trade raise a company of mounted artillery for the war, and that they appropriate ten thousand dollars for that purpose. It was further resolved to pay a bounty of sixty dollars to each recruit, in addition to the Government bounty, and that each member of the Board pledge himself to receive back into his service, on his return, any employé who would join the company. The resolutions were received and passed with the wildest enthusiasm, and subscriptions were then called for. The firm of Walker, Bronson & Co. headed the list with $100, and, in a few minutes eighty-one names were added, and the sum raised to $5,121. The roll was then opened, and signed by S. H. Stevens, S. C. Stevens, J. W. Bloom, Calvin Durand, Valentine Steele, H. B. Chandler, A. F. Baxter, H. J. Baxter, and J. A. Howard. In this manner was the movement commenced which resulted in one battery of artillery and three regiments of infantry taking the field under the auspices of the Board of Trade, having that name as a military designation.

On July 23, $15,210 had been subscribed, and the company was full, and filled with the very best material. From all classes of mercantile and commercial life recruits enlisted in the battery, and with such rapidity that many who desired to join the company could not obtain a place, because its ranks were full. On July 23, just forty-eight hours after the roll was opened, a dispatch was sent to President Lincoln, offering the battery to the War Department, and asking that orders be given for the necessary subsistence, arms, uniforms, etc.; also stating that a regiment of infantry was being raised by the members of the Board to support the battery. On July 28, James H. Stokes was elected captain of the company by acclamation; on August 1, it was sworn into the United States service by Captain Christopher, and the same day elected its remaining officers and went into camp near Camp Douglas, one hundred and fifty-six strong, the original roster being

Captain, James H. Stokes; Senior First Lieutenant, George I. Robinson; Junior First Lieutenant, A. F. Baxter; Senior Second

Geo. I. Robinson

Lieutenant, Trumbull D. Griffin; Junior Second Lieutenant, Henry Bennett; Orderly Sergeant, Sylvanus H. Stevens; Quartermaster Sergeant, M. S. Sanford; Ordnance Sergeant, Calvin

Durand; Second Sergeant, F. G. Deane; Third Sergeant, Louis B. Iland; Fourth Sergeant, William Randolph; Fifth Sergeant, Abbott L. Adams; Sixth Sergeant, George Bowers; Seventh Sergeant, Menzo H. Salisbury; Corporals, W. M. Olcott, J. H. Hildreth, T. E. Baker, Thomas Tinsley, F. B. Rockwood, G. H. Wolcott, S. L. Ford, A. B. Lake, Fred. Dupries, Charles LeSuer, Charles Holyland, J. G. Peters.

Captain Stokes was a veteran artilleryer, having received his commission from General Jackson. He had been instructor of artillery tactics at West Point, and served as captain several years in the Florida war. Under his drill and discipline, the battery rapidly acquired skill and proficiency, and by September was ready for active service. On the 9th of that month, it left Chicago for Louisville, Ky., where it joined Buell's army.

In the campaign terminating in the battle of Perryville, it moved under General Dumont, on the left wing of the army, as far as Crab Orchard. Early in November, the command advanced with the army to Bowling Green, and thence to Nashville, where it joined the army there concentrated, about December 1, and went into camp near the city. On December 14, a squad of the battery, under Lieutenant Stevens, went out on a foraging expedition in the vicinity of Nashville, and while loading supplies into their wagons, were attacked by a mounted force of rebels. Homer Baker, John B. Sleaman, J. N. Williams, J. H. Buckingham, F. R. Richmond and Thomas Tinsley were captured, and J. J. Carroll, formerly of the Chicago Journal office, was wounded. Although his men had surrendered, Lieutenant Stevens advanced, with revolver in hand, on the immediate front of sixteen mounted rebels, who poured in a concentric fire. After the first volley, seeing him still in his saddle, as with one voice the cry was, "Surrender." He answered with his revolver; and on the instant followed another fusillade, and still he did not go down, and only turned to the rear when surrounded. His horse was shot under him. He fired eleven times and escaped, after having been the target of fifty shots at short range. At the solicitation of Sergeant Durand, the 19th Illinois came up on the double-quick, but too late to render much assistance.

At Nashville, the battery was attached to the Pioneer Brigade of the Army of the Cumberland, which consisted of three battalions of infantry and the battery, all under command of Captain James St. Clair Morton, one of the most distinguished engineers in the army.

On the march from Nashville to Murfreesboro', December 26-30, 1862, the brigade, protected by the battery, constructed two bridges over Stewart's Creek, arriving at the battle-field on the 30th. On the morning of the 31st, it was engaged in improving the fords of Stone River, on the left of the line, under fire of rebel cavalry, and soon afterward was ordered by General Rosecrans, in person, to take position in line-of-battle. The Board-of-Trade battery was stationed upon the highest point in the battle-field, on the ridge between the pike and the railroad—the First Battalion, Pioneer Brigade, Lyman Bridges commanding, being formed upon the left of the battery. The enemy poured in a heavy fire of grape, canister and musketry on the battalion, but an advance was made, notwithstanding. At 12 m., the enemy (General McCown's division) came down on the double-quick, in splendid order, with their standards flying. They were allowed to come within three hundred yards, when the musketry of the entire brigade, and the battery, with grape and canister, opened a most deadly fire, which the enemy returned as earnestly. The attacking column, however, reeled and fell back in disorder, the rebel colors being struck down and barely rescued. Many of the wounded reached the Union lines during the day and night, all declaring that the 12 o'clock charge was simply terrific. The 11th and 14th Texas regiments were principally engaged in this assault.

The enemy rallied his forces again at 5 o'clock p. m., advancing upon Bridges's left flank through a border of the woods. Lieutenant Stevens, of the Board-of-Trade battery, and Bridges's battalion, opened fire simultaneously, driving the Confederates back to the woods in disorder. Early on New Year's morning, the enemy again appeared on the left, when the brigade changed front, Captain Stokes moving his battery on the right of Bridges. In the meantime, through the bravery and skill of Lieutenant Stevens, a gun which had been abandoned by our men was seized by him and carried in triumph to the Board-of-Trade battery, and, until after the battle of Chickamauga, the battery retained its seven guns. On the new formation, the enemy advanced and opened fire, as he supposed, on our flank, but the return fire soon undeceived him, and in half an hour he fell back behind his intrenchments.

On the afternoon of the 2d, the artillery of the entire left wing of the Union forces, together with the batteries belonging to Negley's division and Stokes's battery, making fifty-eight guns in position, were massed on the left bank of Stone River. As soon as Breckinridge's command entered the open ground to his front, pressing on toward Van Cleve's division, this park of artillery opened a heavy and accurate fire. The havoc made in the advancing ranks was fearful, but the Confederate command swept on and drove their enemy across the river; where, with the assistance of the artillery fire, which continued to enflame their ranks, they were swept back, and driven into their line of intrenchments, by Negley's division. The part which the artillery took in this day's battle was simply stupendous, and no small portion of the honor gained by this branch of the service was due to the Board-of-Trade battery. Captain Morton eulogized the conduct of the artillerymen in the highest manner. They also won high encomiums from Rosecrans, under whose eye they fought. Captain Morton says:

"As the commanding general was everywhere present on the field with his staff, he can not but have remarked the good service done by Captain Stokes, who manifested the greatest zeal, and managed his battery with the utmost decision and success."

General Negley also, under whose orders the battery temporarily acted, says:

"The promptness displayed by Captain Stokes in bringing his battery into action by my orders, and the efficient manner in which it was served, affords additional evidence of his marked ability and bravery as an officer and patriot."

The First Battalion of the Pioneer Brigade, supporting the battery, was commanded, at Stone River, by Captain Lyman Bridges, of the 19th Illinois, who was wounded on the 31st of December, but remained in command of the battalion through the battle.

The loss of the battery during the engagements before Murfreesboro' was one officer wounded, three men killed and nine men wounded.

CORPORAL A. H. CARVER died in Nashville, during the last week of March, 1863, of wounds received at Stone River. He had been for many years a resident of Chicago, employed in the job department of the Tribune office. His remains were brought to the city, and buried from the Tabernacle Baptist Church.

Andrew Finney, formerly in the employ of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, J. S. Stagg and W. H. Wiley, the killed of the battery, were buried at Rosehill, Chicago, March 22, public funeral services being held at Bryan Hall, and a sermon in memory of William H. Wiley being preached at the Swedenborgian Church, on the same day.

Lieutenant Trumbull D. Griffin, Sergeants A. L. Adams and J. W. Bloom were seriously wounded; Corporal John A. Howard and Privates W. H. S. Odell, J. C. Camburg and J. D. Toomey were wounded.

The battery went into camp near Murfreesboro', after the battle of Stone River, and, in March, Captain Stokes was in command of the First Battalion of the Pioneer Brigade, his connection with the battery remaining the same. In April, the battery was changed from foot to horse artillery, and its complement augmented to one hundred and eighty-six men. It was also detached from the brigade, and assigned to the Second Division of Cavalry, General George Crook commanding. With the Second Division it marched on the Tullahoma campaign June 24, taking part in the skirmish with Wheeler's cavalry at the crossing of Elk River, Tenn. The battery then moved to Winchester, remaining until the latter part of August, when it crossed the Tennessee, September 2, and, with the Second Cavalry Division, ascended Sand Mountain, and took the advance in McCook's movement down Will's Valley, to Alpine, Ga. It then moved to Crawfish Springs, September 19, and the following day one section was thrown into action on the extreme right. R. N. Pearsall was the only member of the battery wounded. On the 22d, the battery fell back to Chattanooga, and then moved forty miles up the north bank of the Tennessee, to guard the fords in that vicinity against an anticipated raid of a large force of Confederate cavalry. In spite of the precautions taken, General Wheeler crossed four divisions on the morning of September 30, and moved up the river. As soon as General Crook discovered this, he ordered a pursuit of Wheeler. The battery, with the Second Brigade, Crook's advance, followed Wheeler's forces, and, on October 3, Miller's brigade, then in advance, met and routed the enemy near McMinnville. On the 5th, the command advanced to Murfreesboro', rested one night, and started again, on the 7th, in pursuit of Wheeler. A few miles from town the Confederates were encountered, and their rear guard was driven for about six miles, when the Second Brigade encountered Wharton's division, which immediately advanced upon the command, which was somewhat disorganized from the hurried pursuit. Quickly forming line, the brigade opened fire, when "just when he was needed more than any other man, Captain Stokes galloped up with his battery, opened fire rapidly, and drove the enemy again in retreat."

Half a mile before reaching Farmington (about five miles from where the last-mentioned engagement took place) the advance commenced firing on a rebel line of skirmishers. Long's (Second) brigade was ordered to the front, and halted on arriving there. Directly before it, the Lewisburg pike formed a straight cut through a very dense cedar glade. On the right and left, cedars, large and small, filled every space, and it was impossible for a horse to pierce the thicket. The enemy opened with his artillery—his battery being in position in the main street of the town, which was simply the continuation of the pike. To the right, and a little to the rear, of the position reached by the Board-of-Trade battery, was an open field of four acres, the cedars forming a hedge around it. The guns of the battery were unlimbered and dragged by the boys into position on the pike, at one corner of the field, and the Second Brigade was formed in column of battalions within the inclosure.

Meantime, Miller's command had dismounted, deployed in line on the right and left of the road, and advanced into the cedars. After a moment of suspense, the enemy's artillery opened a terrible fire upon the Second Brigade. The battery was posted in the cedar thicket, some four hundred yards distant from the Union troops, and poured into their ranks a heavy fire of grape, canister and shell, the infantry making one or two charges, at the same time attempting to turn both of General Crook's flanks. The Board-of-Trade Battery was ordered forward; but position could only be found for one piece, which was in full view of the enemy, and not over three hundred and fifty yards distant. This one gun was commanded by Lieutenant Stevens; and in three shots he disabled one of the enemy's pieces, blowing up a caisson, and throwing their ranks into confusion. Lieutenant Stevens's gun finally being disabled, and every man wounded, it was taken to the rear by hand, the narrow space not allowing any movement of horses. In the same manner, another piece was brought into position, and its rapid and vigorous firing soon silenced the opposing battery. At this moment, the Second Brigade, ordered to charge, broke through the enemy's line, scattering them to the right and left, and capturing four guns, some wagons, and several prisoners. The enemy being in an open country, a sabre charge was ordered, but the roads had been barricaded so as to render this impossible. The command went into camp for the night at Farmington, the captured guns being turned over to the Board-of-Trade Battery as trophies, to which it was certainly entitled. The pursuit was continued to Rogerville, where the battery, with Long's brigade, arrived October 9, and, Wheeler having re-crossed the Tennessee, it moved soon after to Maysville, near Huntsville, Ala., where it remained encamped through the winter of 1863-64.

In the spring, the battery returned to Nashville to reorganize and refit, receiving, in March, new Parrott guns from General Thomas, with the statement that "if any company had earned them, they had." It there joined Sherman's command, to take part in the Atlanta campaign. During this campaign, the Second Cavalry Division, to which the battery remained attached, was commanded by General Garrard, and moved with McPherson's Army of the Tennessee, guarding its right flank. With that command, it passed through Snake Creek Gap, and, after the battle of Resaca, crossed the Oostenaula May 15, at Lay's Ferry, and moved toward Calhoun, Ga., in pursuit of Johnston's army. It moved with the cavalry, guarding the right of the army line, until McPherson had passed through Calhoun and Kingston; fought the left wing of Johnston's army at Dallas, on the 28th of May, and when Sherman had flanked his position at Allatoona; then, with Garrard's cavalry, it moved to the left, toward the railroad. Colonel Long's brigade, to which one section of the battery was attached, joined the command at Ackworth, June 8, during this movement. The command then moved as guard to the left flank during the assaults at Pine and Kennesaw mountains, and, on July 1, relieved McPherson before the latter, when he commenced his movement toward the Chattahoochee. The Second Cavalry Division and the battery arrived at Roswell, on the north bank of the Chattahoochee, July 8; destroyed the factories there, which had been manufacturing canvas for the Confederate army, and secured and held the ford until relieved by infantry. It crossed at Roswell on the 9th, and remained encamped on the south bank until the 17th, when the advance to Atlanta was resumed. On the 18th, the Cavalry Division, forming the advance, reached and destroyed a portion of the Augusta railroad, seven miles east of Decatur; the following day drove the rebel cavalry from Decatur and entered that town, and, on the 21st, reached the works before Atlanta.

The same day, General Sherman ordered the command to Covington, forty-two miles east of Atlanta, to destroy railroad bridges across the Yellow and Ulfoufahatchee rivers, on the Augusta railroad; which was accomplished successfully, a large quantity of cotton, and two hundred prisoners being captured. In the movement of the cavalry upon the Macon Railroad, in August, two sections of the Board-of-Trade Battery, under Lieutenant George I. Robinson, participated. The forces which took part in the expedition were, the Third Division of Cavalry (Kilpatrick's), and Long's and Minty's brigades of the Second, all under General Judson Kilpatrick. Starting from Sandtown, north of Atlanta, on the 19th of August, they made a complete circuit of the Confederate army in the space of four days, fighting almost constantly with Ross's and Jackson's Confederate cavalry. They damaged the Macon road at Jonesboro', and at Lovejoy's Station captured a four-gun battery and a large number of prisoners, returning to Decatur on the 22d. The first assault on the column was made just as it reached the West Point Railroad, near Fairburn, where it was struck by the enemy, under Ross, with artillery and dismounted cavalry. The Confederates were driven from their position, and retreated across Flint River, destroying the bridge; from the eastern bank, disputing the crossing with artillery. At this point, their guns were silenced by Lieutenant Henry Bennett's section of the Board-of-Trade Battery. His men then rushed to the bank of the river, and dislodged the sharpshooters from the opposite bank, when the column crossed and advanced to Jonesboro'. The Confederate cavalry taking shelter in the buildings of this town, the artillery was advanced for the purpose of shelling them, when they mounted their horses and retreated, leaving Jonesboro' in Kilpatrick's possession. Three miles of the railroad and much public property was destroyed, and the column marched toward Lovejoy's Station, tearing up a portion of the Macon Railroad as it advanced. At Lovejoy's Station the column had a severe engagement with a whole cavalry division under Jackson, in which the brigades of the Second Division, with the help of the two sections of the battery, captured a battery of four guns, three stands of colors and many prisoners. During this expedition, General Eli Long, commanding the Second Brigade, was promoted to the command of the Second Division of Cavalry, to which the Board-of-Trade Battery remained attached.

With the division, the battery returned to Nashville, as a portion of General Thomas's command, soon after the termination of the Atlanta campaign; participating in the battles before that city, December 15-16, 1864. After the pursuit of Hood was ended, it was sent with the cavalry to Eastport, Miss., remaining encamped at that point until the spring of 1865, whence it moved to Chickasaw, Ala., and, on March 22, set out with Wilson's expedition for Selma and Macon. On April 1, the battery arrived at Plantersville, Ala. On the morning of April 2, Long's division arrived in front of Selma, Ala., which was held by a heavy force under Forrest. The works surrounding the place were exceedingly strong, consisting of a heavy line of earthworks, eight to twelve feet high, and fifteen thick at the base, with a ditch in front, four feet wide and five deep, partly filled with water, and, still in front of that, a stockade of heavy posts, five feet high, and sharpened at the top. Four forts covered the ground over which the assaulting column must advance—the ground being rough, and broken by a deep ravine. The works were charged and captured by a part of the Second Division, aided by the effective fire of the artillery. Two thousand prisoners and twenty pieces of artillery were captured. Captain George I. Robinson, commanding the Board-of-Trade Battery, makes the following statement in regard to the movements of his command, at and after the engagement at Selma:

"On the morning of April 2, at half-past seven o'clock, I again moved my battery in connection with the division, as per order of the division commander, on the road to Selma, Ala., in front of which I arrived about three o'clock p. m., and took up a position about two miles from the city, on the Summerfield road, awaiting further orders from the division commander. My position at this time was about fourteen hundred yards from the strong works of the enemy, behind which he was posted. At about half-past four o'clock, at an interview with the division commander, I was notified that the line was about to make the assault upon the works of the enemy, who had already commenced the use of his artillery upon our line. I was directed to conform the movements of my battery, as much as I could, to the movements and advance of our line, and to direct my fire so as to produce the most effect upon the enemy and to render the most assistance to the advance of the line making the assault. I therefore decided, that, as the line advanced, to advance one section of my battery as close to the enemy's works as the nature of the ground would permit, that my fire might be directed with more precision and effect. Noticing movements in the line on my right, which I supposed to be an advance, I moved one section forward about four hundred yards, thus exposing both its flanks to an almost direct fire from the enemy's artillery, while he was using it upon me, also, directly in my front. As I was thus in an advanced and very exposed situation, and having mistaken the movement of the line for an immediate advance, I withdrew this section to my first position, and kept up my firing from that point, until the line moved forward to the assault, when I moved my whole battery forward to the advance position referred to, replying rapidly to the fire of the enemy's artillery, until it was silenced by the close approach of our men to the works, which, in a moment more, were in our possession. From this advanced position, I was able, partially, to enfilade a long line of the enemy's works on my left, which was also enfiladed by the fire of our forces that had carried the works to my right and front, causing the enemy to seek shelter outside of the breastworks, and between them and the palisades, under the protection of which he was endeavoring to escape. Noticing this, I directed the fire of two of my guns down this line, and with good effect. At the same time, I ordered one section, under Lieutenant Griffin, to advance inside the works, now in our possession, for the purpose of engaging the rebel artillery that had now opened upon our line from works close up to town, riding forward myself to select the position for the section. The road was now being rapidly filled by an advancing column of mounted troops, which prevented this section from getting up as promptly as I desired; but I soon had it in position, closely followed by the balance of my battery, and opened upon the inner line of works, which, like the first, was soon in the possession of our troops, rendering further firing unnecessary.

"Receiving no further orders, and having learned that the brigadier-general commanding had been wounded early in the engagement, I held my battery, awaiting orders from his successor, which I received from Colonel Robert H. G. Minty, late in the evening, to go into camp. I have no losses to report during this engagement.

"On the morning of April 3, by direction of the colonel commanding division, I proceeded to destroy the captured ordnance along the line of works. * * * The guns were spiked, the trunnions knocked off of most of them, rendering them entirely useless until re-cast. The carriages and limbers, with field caissons, were burned. I also caused to be destroyed about four thousand and three hundred rounds of ammunition. On the evening of April 5th, I received orders from the colonel commanding, to have a section in readiness, at midnight, to accompany an expedition that was to be sent out. This section was furnished under command of Lieutenant Griffin, returning to Selma after an absence of twenty-four hours, having marched about forty miles. On the afternoon of April 8th, I crossed the Alabama River with my battery, and encamped, with the division, on the road leading to Montgomery, and five miles from Selma. On the evening of the 9th, I proceeded with one section of my battery to the Alabama River, at a point some six miles above Selma, with instructions to watch for and prevent any boats passing down the river. On the morning of the 10th, I was ordered back to my encampment, not having occasion to use my guns, and shortly afterward resumed the march, in connection with the division, toward Montgomery, encountering very bad roads, and camping at eight o'clock p. m. near Benton. Resuming the march on the 11th, we found the roads, at times, almost impassable, requiring much labor of a pioneer character, keeping the command up, and on the road, all that night. Continued the march during the 12th, and camped at Catona Creek. On the morning of the 13th, I marched my battery, in connection with the division, through Montgomery, camping seven miles east of it. On the 14th, the march was resumed toward Columbus, Ga., at which place the command arrived on the 17th, and from thence to Macon, Ga., where it arrived on the evening of April 20. * * *

"It will be observed that this battery has marched, in twenty-one days, upwards of six hundred miles, varying from twenty-two to forty-nine miles each day, or an average of about thirty miles; which, in consideration of the very bad condition of the roads for a large portion of the distance, I consider almost unprecedented in the movements of artillery."

Macon was taken without opposition. There, official information was received of the armistice between Generals Sherman and Johnston, and no further important military movement being made in the Central Division of the army, the battery returned to Nashville, and thence, in June, to Chicago, arriving at two o'clock on the morning of the 27th. The battery was met at Michigan City by a delegation of the members of the Board of Trade, which escorted it to the city, where it was greeted by a National salute of thirteen guns. At noon it was tendered a hearty welcome by the Board of Trade, where, on motion of P. L. Underwood, it was unanimously

"Resolved, That all surviving members of the battery, who have been in active service with it, be constituted honorary life members of the Board of Trade."

On the evening of the 27th, the Board of Trade gave a magnificent banquet at Metropolitan Hall, in honor of the return of the company from which they had expected so much, and which had never disappointed their expectations. The Chicago Tribune, in noting the return of the battery, and the eagerness of the citizens to do it honor, said truly, that it left Chicago for the field,

"in all respects a picked and chosen company, setting a brave example to their yet unwilling and hesitating fellow citizens. Like the gallant 7th of New York, they were the flower, and proved themselves the chivalry, of their city. It was, thenceforth, cowardly and infamous in any to hold back from the service, with such an example before their eyes. To the question, 'Who will go up to fight the Philistines?' every one of the eligible young men belonging to the Board of Trade had replied, 'I will.' And so eager were they of the honor of fighting in this commission for their country, that many of them offered to those who had already enlisted, large sums of money if they would resign in their favor. On that account—on account of the principle which animated them—because they needed no golden spur to urge them to the fight, the highest praise and honor was accorded to the battery."

The battery returned to Chicago one hundred and sixty-five strong,—officers and men,—the following being the return roster:

Captain, George I. Robinson; Senior First Lieutenant, Sylvanus H. Stevens; Junior First Lieutenant, Trumbull D. Griffin; Orderly Sergeant, Menzo H. Salisbury; Quartermaster Sergeant, Calvin Durand; First Sergeant, William Randolph; Second Sergeant, Abbott L. Adams; Third Sergeant, Frank Knight; Fourth Sergeant, P. L. Anton; Hospital Steward, D. D. Jacobs.

The battery was mustered out of service at Chicago, June 30, 1865, its losses having been eleven killed, thirteen disabled by wounds or disease, five died of disease, seventeen discharged from ranks for promotion, four transferred to other branches of service, five captured and incarcerated in Andersonville.

This sketch would be incomplete without some mention of Mrs. S. H. Stevens, and this is best done by repeating the words spoken concerning her by Rev. Dr. Tiffany, on the occasion of funeral services hereinafter mentioned. He said:

"There was one who took the place of Florence Nightingale, who went out with the battery, remained with the battery, and returned but two days before the battery; tireless in devotion to the sick and wounded, cheering despondent ones with a glad smile, soothing the anguish of pain and the restlessness of slow recovery, closing the eyes and folding the cold hands of the dead, the presence of one who has been called 'the Angel of the Battery' was a perpetual benediction."

On the 5th of July, 1865, the battery held a re-union at Bryan Hall, and, as a mark of their gratitude and love, presented her with a magnificent silver tea service. Sergeant William Randolph made the presentation speech, and Lieutenant Stevens, in the name of his wife, accepted the elegant and deserved tribute.

On January 7, 1866, the public funeral services in memory of deceased members of this and other batteries, were held at Crosby's Opera House, in Chicago; after which the bodies were interred with military honors at Rosehill Cemetery.

Those from the Board-of-Trade Battery buried at this time were: Charles W. DeCosta, who died at the general hospital, Nashville, February 2, 1863; James S. Wallace, at McMinnville, Tenn., August 9, 1863; Samuel Dodd, at Murfreesboro', March 3, 1863; J. Jouberts, from wounds received at Kenasaw Mountain, died August 2, 1864; Edward C. Fields, from wounds received at Decatur, Ga., August 4, 1864; Thomas Wygant, at Lovejoy's Station, Ga., August 20, 1864; George T. White, from wounds received at Lovejoy's Station, died at Vining's Station, Ga., August 28, 1864; M. V. B. Snow died at Wilmington, March 18, 1864; George Crane, killed near Pulaski, Tenn., December 24, 1864.

CHICAGO MERCANTILE BATTERY.—On July 29, 1862, the Mercantile Association of Chicago, voted that the rooms of the association should be opened to recruit an infantry company, to be called the Doggett Guards, which should be under its own special patronage and care. Finding that an artillery company, if raised, could be furnished with Carr's union repeating guns, the original intention of recruiting infantry was abandoned, and the muster rolls of the Mercantile Battery were opened at the rooms of the association on August 5. On August 8, the ranks were full, and fifty applicants had been refused. On August 13, the battery went into camp near Camp Douglas, and on the 29th of the same month was mustered into service under the following officers:

Captain, Charles G. Cooley; Senior First Lieutenant, Frank

C. Wilson; Junior First Lieutenant, James H. Swan; Senior Second Lieutenant, David R. Crego; Junior Second Lieutenant, Frederick B. Bickford; Sergeant-Major, Pinckney S. Cone; Quartermaster-Sergeant Edwin J. Crandall; Sergeants: Samuel H. Tallmadge, Thomas N. Sickles, George Throop, Warren P. Whitney, Edward J. Thomas, William K. Knight; Gunners, with rank of corporals: Fred. A. Sampson, John Lunt, Solomon F. Denton, Charles P. Hazeltine, Nelson James, John C. Leom.

The battery remained at Camp Douglas, waiting for horses and equipments and greater proficiency in artillery drill and practice, until November 8, 1862, when it moved, in obedience to orders, to Memphis, Tenn., starting from Chicago one hundred and fifty-two strong. Arriving at Memphis, it moved, on the 24th, with General Sherman, for the Tallahatchie, arriving at College Hill, near Oxford, Miss., on December 5. On December 9, the movement on Vicksburg by the Yazoo River, being determined upon, the battery returned to Memphis to prepare for it—arriving there on the 12th. On General Sherman's return to Memphis, he reorganized a portion of the forces there into two divisions, under Generals A. J. Smith and G. W. Morgan, to the former of which the Chicago Mercantile Battery was attached.

On December 21, the battery embarked with Sherman's army for an expedition against the northern defenses of Vicksburg, and reached Milliken's Bend on the 24th, and the following day, with Smith's division, marched twenty-five miles west, into Louisiana, to destroy a section of the Shreveport Railroad, which was struck at Dallas. The command then returned to Milliken's Bend, and joined Sherman on the Yazoo, near Chickasaw Bayou, on the 27th.

The next morning, the division advanced along the main road to Vicksburg to within a mile of the bluffs. The battery occupied various positions to cover the movements of the division, until the attack was abandoned, December 31, 1862, when, at midnight, one section of the battery, with the 108th Illinois Infantry, covered the retreat of the boats down the Yazoo. On the return of the troops to Milliken's Bend, General McClernand assumed command of the army, styling it the Army of the Mississippi, and organizing it into two corps—Thirteenth and Fifteenth—commanded by Generals Morgan and Sherman respectively. The Chicago Mercantile Battery remained attached to General A. J. Smith's division, which was designated the Tenth Division, Thirteenth Army Corps.

On the 5th of January, 1863, the battery, with Smith's division, embarked at Milliken's Bend for an expedition fifty miles up the Arkansas River, against Fort Hindman, or Arkansas Post. In this movement, the battery was temporarily attached to the Ninth Division, General Osterhaus. On January 11, the gunboats moved up the river and opened fire, followed by the field artillery. On the left, Colonel Sheldon, under General Osterhaus's direction, ordered the sections of the Mercantile Battery under his command to a position within two hundred yards of the enemy's defenses, to cover the assault of the infantry on the eastern face of the fort. The section under Lieutenant Wilson, on the opposite shore, opened into the enemy's line of rifle-pits, and did good execution. The battery received public thanks from General Osterhaus for the efficient service it rendered in its first engagement, and for the "excellent and gallant conduct of both officers and men." The command of the captured post was assigned to General A. J. Smith, as a token of the conspicuous merit displayed by himself and command during the engagement.

The command re-embarked at Arkansas Post on the 17th, and moved down the Mississippi to Young's Point, nearly opposite Vicksburg, where the battery went into camp on the 25th. General Grant assumed personal command of the movements against Vicksburg on the 30th, and General McClernand took command of the Thirteenth Corps. Most of the officers were sick at this time, and Lieutenant Swan was appointed to command the battery; which remained at Young's Point until March, when it moved, with the division, to Milliken's Bend, fifteen miles above Vicksburg, and again encamped until the middle of April. The change from the malarial swamps and poisonous water of Young's Point to the beautiful location at Milliken's Bend, was a grateful one to the boys; and once settled in their "shebangs" among the oaks and magnolias,* with roses and jasmine making fragrant the soft April air, good rations and improving health made the terrible winter, just passed, seem like a fearful dream.

* The members of the battery will remember how the practical jokes of "Tom" Egan also enlivened the camp.

On April 15, the battery broke camp at Milliken's Bend, and marched with the division, as a part of Grant's army, on the famous expedition against Vicksburg, by way of the Big Black River, arriving on the morning of May 1, near Magnolia Church, about three miles west of Port Gibson, Miss. There the enemy was encountered, and the battery heavily engaged, the Confederates being driven back to Fort Gibson, which they evacuated during the night.

From May 3-6, the battery, with its division, was near Willow Springs, waiting for supplies, and after leaving there reached the neighborhood of Raymond on the 15th. On the 16th, it advanced—Smith's division forming the left of McClernand's corps—on the direct Raymond road toward Edward's Station, meeting the enemy at Champion Hill, some eight miles out of Raymond. At Champion Hill, the fighting in Smith's division was confined to the artillery and skirmishers, the Mercantile Battery having a severe engagement, at short range, with a rebel eight-gun battery, in covering the advance of the left. At daylight, on the 17th, the battery joined in the pursuit of the enemy to the Big Black bridge, the Thirteenth Corps arriving at about eight o'clock a. m., and driving the Confederates from the position, with the loss of eighteen pieces of artillery and nearly two thousand prisoners.

The command crossed the Big Black May 18, and marched to within four miles of Vicksburg. On the 19th, it formed on the right of the Baldwin Ferry road, behind the crest of a hill overlooking Two Mile Creek, in plain view of the enemy's defenses a mile west. The battery opened fire from the summit of the hill, and, as soon as the enemy's skirmishers were driven back, advanced across the creek to the hill on the opposite side, covering the infantry in the assault of that day. On the 22d, a section of the battery was moved by hand to a position within twenty-five feet of the fortifications, which position it held through the day, covering Lawler's and Landrum's brigades in their heroic, but disastrous, assault on the fortifications near the Baldwin road. General McClernand remarked of this episode, that "Captain White carried one of his pieces quite to the ditch, and, double shotted it, forced it into an embrasure, disabling a gun in it ready to be discharged, and scattering the rebel cannoniers." Although the defenses of this point were carried, and the Union colors planted on the parapet, where they remained nine hours, it was a barren triumph—the Confederates falling back a little distance to an inner work, on higher ground which commanded the interior of that carried, and prevented its occupation—all but one of those who gained the interior being killed. The assailants remained in the ditch outside until nearly dark, when the attack was abandoned and the battery and infantry withdrawn.

At the close of the siege, the battery, then with General E. O. C. Ord, who succeeded McClernand in command of the Thirteenth Corps on June 18, took part in General Sherman's movement against Jackson, Miss., entering that city on Johnston's evacuation, July 17. After remaining until the 21st, engaged in the destruction of portions of the lines of railroad centering there and other Confederate property, the command returned to Vicksburg, and encamped a short time, until the Thirteenth Army Corps was transferred to the Department of the Gulf. On August 6, the battery, with that corps, proceeded to New Orleans, and thence to camp at Brashear City, where the designation of the Tenth division was changed to the Fourth, of which General Burbridge was the commander, and General Ord commanded the corps. In October, the battery, with a part of its division, moved from camp at Brashear City to Opelousas, and thence to Barras Landing, near Bayou Teche, where it encamped until November 1. It then marched, with one brigade of Burbridge's command, down the Teche to Muddy Bayou, and on the 3d participated in the battle of Grand Coteau, wherein Major-General Washburn commanded the Federal forces, comprising the Third and part of the Fourth divisions.

On the return of the expedition, the Fourth Division went into camp at New Iberia, where it remained until December 19, when it moved to Algiers, and was assigned to duty as part of the Texas expedition, under General Washburn. Leaving Algiers, on January 5, 1864, it disembarked at DuCroz, near the mouth of the Rio Grande, on the 12th. There the command remained until the 20th of February, employed in guard and garrison duty, after which it returned to Algiers, landing there on the 24th, and moving thence by rail to Berwick City, on the 5th of March. There, the Fourth Division of the Thirteenth Army Corps, commanded by General Landrum, and the Third Division, General Cameron, were placed under command of General T. E. G. Ransom, under whom they started with General Banks's miserable Red River fiasco.

Leaving Berwick City, on the 13th, the battery, with the division, marched by way of Opelousas, through Holmestown, to Alexandria, where it arrived on the 26th, and thence marched to Natchitoches, where General Banks's army concentrated for his contemplated movement on Shreveport, the head of steamboat navigation on the Red River. General Banks's forces consisted of a part of the Nineteenth Corps (composed of Eastern troops formerly commanded by himself, and at that time by General Franklin), the Third and Fourth divisions of the Thirteenth Corps (commanded by General Ransom), the Cavalry Division (commanded by General Lee*), and detachments of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth corps (under General A. J. Smith).

On the 6th of April, the whole force, with the exception of General Smith's command, moved from Natchitoches, and, on the evening of the 7th, encamped at Pleasant Hill, a little settlement in the pine woods, thirty miles distant. On the morning of the 8th, the march was resumed—the Fourth Division, to which the Mercantile Battery was attached, leading the infantry. The cavalry advance, supported by Emerson's brigade of the Fourth Division, after severe skirmishing with the enemy,† finally reached an opening in the pine forest, some fifteen miles beyond Pleasant Hill, termed Sabine Cross Roads, and three miles southeast of Mansfield, where the Confederates, under General Kirby Smith, were encountered in force, and its further advance totally checked. The remainder of the Fourth Division, commanded by General Ransom in person, was hurried forward in support, arriving at about half-past two o'clock p. m., and immediately formed in line-of-battle, at the rear of a large open field of irregular shape, through which the road to Mansfield passed in a northwesterly direction. A narrow belt of timber divided the field on the right of the road.

flank. The remainder of the Fourth Division was formed in rear of the belt of timber on the right, the Chicago Mercantile Battery occupying a position in the center of the field. Nim's battery was then advanced to the extreme front; three pieces on the left of the road, one in the road, and two on the right. The Confederates occupied a strong position on rising ground in the edge of the woods, on the farther side of the "clearing," their line, through which ran the road, curving around toward the Union right. At about half-past four, the Fourth Division moved forward through the belt of timber in its front, and immediately engaged in heavy skirmishing with the Confederates. Ransom's skirmishers were driven back, and the enemy immediately moved in heavy columns from the woods, and advanced, across the clearing in his front, upon the Union right and center, which held its ground bravely, and, after severe fighting, checked and, finally, partially repulsed the enemy. The Confederates moved from their flank with such rapidity, and the troops in the front were so long delayed by the non-receipt of orders to retire, that Federals and Confederates were charging across the field in a jumble of blue and gray, and were equally the recipients of the steady fire from the batteries; the Federals, in addition, receiving some desultory shots from the "Johnnies," with whom they were thus intimately and unpleasantly associated. Before the right had accomplished this, however, the Confederates had attacked the left. General Ransom attempted to withdraw his division and form a new line on a ridge in the woods, a little in the rear; and, while engaged with Captain White in an effort to retire the Mercantile Battery to the desired position, was shot through the knee, and carried to the rear just in time to escape capture.*

The effort to retire the Fourth Division was utterly futile, the Confederates rushing in overwhelming force on the left, scattering the cavalry, which fled in utter confusion, capturing Nim's battery and pushing the infantry back through the woods in complete disorder. The only road—a narrow pass through the pine woods—was completely blocked by the baggage train.† The Third Division, hurrying to the front, was pushed back in the general rout; the Mercantile Battery could not be taken from the field, but in the attempt to save it, or render it worthless, Captain White was wounded and captured, Lieutenants George Throop and Joseph W. Barr killed, Lieutenant Cone captured, one non-commissioned officer and one private killed, nine privates wounded and eighteen captured. Among the captured were Sergeants I. L. Day, Henry C. Brackett, George E. Bryant, and Privates William Munn, of Chicago, and J. W. Arnold and Sanford L. Parker, of Rockford. They were held in captivity, subjected to the hardships of prison life, fourteen months, being exchanged during the Red River parole, May 20, 1865.

After this battle, the battery was ordered back to New Orleans, where it went into camp to recruit and procure new guns. In May, 1864, the battery was furnished with infantry arms and equipments, and details were required from the command for fatigue and guard duty on the fortifications. Through some unfortunate misunderstanding of the duties to which they were liable while temporarily serving as infantry, the battery, commanded by Lieutenant Henry Roe, so * General Ransom subsequently died from the effects of this wound—one of the bravest soldiers and finest men whose life was sacrificed during the war.

† When the cavalry skirmishing commenced, General Banks, accompanied by his "paper collar" escort, dashed by the marching column, and, in reply to the cheers of the men, he jubilantly boasted that "We'll drive these rebels back to their lairs"; which he did not do.

* The military genius which thus had the baggage train up with the advance of the army, is too apparent in its idocy to need comment. The fact that Kirby Smith's attack in force was an utter surprise to Hanks, proves how well the latter had the country scouted. The Confederates had kept skirmishing with the Federal troops, and falling back before them, until the latter, under the masterly inefficiency of Hanks, were drawn into the disastrous rout at Sabine Cross Roads.

replied to this order as to cause the arrest of Lieutenant Roe and other officers, for alleged disobedience of orders, by Lieutenant-Colonel Viall, commanding the post. Lieutenant Roe being exonerated and released, the dismounted battery was provided, in August, 1864, with horses, equipments and guns, and attached to a cavalry division, under General Davidson, under whom it started on an expedition to destroy the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. After proceeding to Baton Rouge, it was ordered to Pascagoula, and, on May 8, 1865, returned to New Orleans, and there it remained in camp until June, when it was ordered to Chicago, where it arrived July 3, and was mustered out of service July 10. On its return, the battery numbered one hundred and thirty men, of whom only thirty-five were original members of the company.

The officers, on its return, were

Captain, P. H. White; Senior First Lieutenant, P. S. Cone; Junior First Lieutenant, F. D. Meacham; Senior Second Lieutenant, Henry Roe; Junior Second Lieutenant, James C. Lincoln.

In closing this brief itinerary of the movements of this battery, it is a matter of simple justice to the members and their many relatives and friends in this city, to state that no body of men could have fought more bravely or determinedly, than did the Chicago Mercantile Battery at the battle of Sabine Cross Roads; and there is no doubt but that the boys would have got their guns off the field, if that incomprehensible N. P. Banks had not conveniently massed the baggage wagons in the road. But they were there, and that settled the fate of the guns. The writer of this annotation was present at that battle, and deems that, with the single exception of the battle of Manassas, the battle of Sabine Cross Roads stands alone—sui generis—a monument to Nathaniel P. Banks, and one which no Union soldier who ever participated in the disgraceful "skedaddle" can either condone, forget or forgive. Had it not been for General A. J. Smith, who checked the triumphant onslaught of the Confederates, the entire Union army would have been marched to Camp Tyler prison.
